I see the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome) is here. He knows much better than I the amount of money that has been poured into the Sudbury area through various development programs. He would be in a better position than I to decide whether or not a smelter is required in that area instead of exporting the ore to another province. Probably he is also in a better position than I to say whether or not financial assistance is required to build that smelter. But I think he would agree, on behalf of all the people of Sudbury, that they are not very interested in exporting any resource that would assist in the growth of the Sudbury area. Perhaps he would also admit that neither Inco nor Falconbridge needs a handout from the government. If they accept a handout in the form of some tax concession, then these companies should be prepared to give the people an equity, to the extent of the assistance that is provided, in one form or another.

All across the nation, and particularly in resource-based areas of Canada, we are desperately in need of secondary industry. In my area there are two reasonably large iron pelleting mines. I am not suggesting that we should take away from Jones and Laughlin their captive mine, though rumour is circulating that they have sold the mine to the other operating mine simply because Dofasco is Canadian and Jones and Laughlin is not. Whether or not they have taken note of the nationalistic leanings of the Canadian people and decided that this sale would be to everybody's advantage, I do not know, but that is the rumour. What I do know is that northern Ontario has enough iron ore to operate a very large steel mill for many years. There is an immense amount of iron ore in northern Ontario, and this resource can be supplemented from northern Quebec where in the Belcher Islands there is an almost unlimited amount of iron ore. If the government wanted to solve regional problems in northern Ontario, then the installation of an up to date steel mill that would employ several thousand people in the secondary industry that would be built around it would give the Canadian public their money back many times over.

Another problem in northern Ontario is that at the present time there is potential for three additional pulp mills. This potential exists in the Spragge area, at the eastern point of Georgian Bay, and in my own area either at Elk Lake or somewhere along the Montreal River. As far as my own constituency is concerned, this mill is needed. Not only do we need it to create employment; it is needed because the timber on a limit that is much larger than the size of the British Isles is overripe. This limit was held for many years by the E. B. Eddy Company and only recently reverted to the Crown because E. B. Eddy decided to revitalize the K.V.P. mill at Espanola and instal pollution control devices, and as a result found themselves with insufficient funds even to consider the construction of another pulp mill in the Elk Lake area.

I am well aware that we have had our ups and downs in the last several years in the production of newsprint. I am also well aware that no company is keen on building another mill. Yet on the west coast mills are being built. Indeed, mills are being enlarged in northern Ontario. A mill in my area is not only necessary to provide employment and to be an outlet for goods and services; it is absolutely essential if we are fully to utilize the resource of the area. Although this resource is renewable, if the lumber becomes overripe it deteriorates and its value suffers.

In my opinion, if a mill is going to be built in the Elk Lake area within the next five years, it will have to be built with government money. Perhaps not all of the financial assistance will have to be provided by the government, but there would have to be a large contribution by the government. If E. B. Eddy decides to build the mill, we should give them 25 per cent of the capitalization, we should provide them with up to $5,000 for each job created, we should give them a tax free benefit and we should make a number of other concessions to them. Why does not the government put this sort of proposition to the company: If you build this mill with a 60 per cent interest, then we will put up the other 40 per cent and the Canadian public will own that 40 per cent. You will be serving the needs of the people of the area and be providing a valuable service in developing one of our prime resources. At the same time you will have allowed the general public to invest in a Canadian concern.

This bill provides that if Canadians invest some of their tax money, other people will be able to participate on a direct basis. I am not sure you can have it both ways. As far as I am concerned, that proposition sounds a loaded one. If the minister is sincere in this regard, I think he should limit the financial angle to some sort of pension plan where the money invested would grow and the government would participate in the growth of that money. I am not sure that you can justify the "have-nots" having an investment portfolio with the government kicking in tax moneys all the time.

However, the public are not interested in the niceties of these situations; they are interested in the orderly development of the resources of this nation, and with government participation. In this regard there have been regional programs but I think that part of the fault with regional programs lies with the present minister, or certainly with those colleagues of the minister who have a regional identity and direction. But that is not really the crux of the matter. I think the crux of the matter is that some initiative must be provided by the government and the government will have to participate in development of resources.

Therefore, the limitation of $1 million means that in most cases the industries in the resource areas and in the mid-Canada corridor who need assistance will not get it. In fact, the bill is discriminating against them. It is very easy to put money into Toronto, Vancouver or Montreal, and if you really believe in city states perhaps that is where you should put the money. Maybe this is what the Liberal government is going to do anyway. But if we are interested in the orderly development of this nation, as I see it the money with which the government will assist will have to be provided through the Canada Development Corporation.

If there is to be assistance in respect of orderly development, initiative will have to be shown in other areas such as the resource field which in turn will provide assistance in respect of employment, goods and services. Those of us from northern Ontario have said—I believe this is true of every member from northern Ontario—we do not care whether the benefit goes to Sudbury, Timmins or northern Quebec, because anything that is good for any part of the northern area is good for the area as a whole. If investment is made by private enterprise or by government, the result will be felt generally by all the people in the area. So we are not suggesting that something be undertaken in one specific place or another.

I have suggested that three smelters are absolutely necessary in the area where the base material is produced. They should be located in the resource area, and beside the refineries must be built the secondary industry which is more economic in such an area than anywhere else. The difficulties in respect of manpower and some other fields could be overcome by the influx of capital from government sources and the infusion of private capital that would follow government initiative.

I have been interested in watching the machinations of even some of my colleagues in respect of taking all the money in the area development fund for a year and building a pipeline from Prudhoe Bay down to Edmonton. If we built this pipeline, obviously we would have to look after the problem of ecology and take into consideration the indigent people in the area. As well, we would have to make arrangements for training the Indian and native populations in the area so that they could be employed. But we would eliminate any idea of bringing oil down the west coast which would have the potential of pollution.

I am pleased to learn that the government is thinking of making some kind of arrangement in this respect. We could take all the money we have and put it into one enterprise that would have a terrific secondary industry potential for the whole area. I think the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) would be prepared to say that if we should run a 48-inch or a 60-inch line to carry both oil and gas, this would even do something for Edmonton. I am pleased that some of my colleagues now think this might not be such a bad idea and are making a noise in that direction. I am pleased to know that the noises are being made by people who are not the least enamoured of nationalized industry. Those that have opposed nationalization have probably frightened away more people than enough. I say, however, that if the government decided to put money into the Canada Development Corporation for the benefit of industry, and provide equity, that pipeline could be built and much of the disaster that may befall generations to come could be eliminated by an expenditure made in one year.

I do not know whether the government intends to make any changes in respect of the Canada Development Corporation. They talk about their willingness to give $100-odd to the old age pensioner. Really, they will not give it to him but will do a number of things, and if he meets a number of requirements he might get the money. Perhaps it will be the same in respect of the Canada Development Corporation. Perhaps if a number of conditions are met and circumstances develop in a satisfactory way, some of the things suggested may be done. Surely there are enough members in this House who would like to see an agency established which would have sufficient money to provide for the direction of development of our nation, rather than merely helping some of our industries higgledy-piggledy.

Some time ago I was surprised to hear a woman from one of the universities talking about the mid-Canada corridor. She said she had to get her point of view across because the government was going to participate in Rohmer's scheme in respect of the mid-Canada corridor. I was very surprised because I wondered how the government could participate without taking it over. Would they give somebody else the money to do it, and give the land that would be necessary to establish the mid-Canada corridor project to somebody else? How would it be done? I think if members would look at the Canada Development Corporation bill they would see one way in which it could be done in order to provide maximum benefit to the Canadian public.

I do not believe we should have anything less than an agency which would have the ability to provide the wherewithal either on a direct participation basis or totally in the development stage in respect of industries in the resource areas of this nation, for the greatest benefit of the largest number of Canadians. I think this is a serious enough matter that the government should accept the amendment and take back this bill for reconsideration.

The other night the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) listened to many members from both sides of this House speaking about whether it is worthwhile to investigate and implement methods that would guarantee the retention of Home Oil in Canadian hands. Although the minister expressed surprise, I believe most members would agree that Canadians in general are not so concerned about buying back Canada as in changing the direction in which the future of the country will go. In order to make that change there must be a totally different orientation in the development of our resource areas. This change can come only through large infusions of money from the Canadian public, and this must be done through the Canada Development Corporation if it is to be national in scope and provide the greatest possible benefit to the largest number of Canadians.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, for the past 12 years I have recommended something along the lines proposed in the bill. I do not want to join those who say that we should nationalize everything, because that concept is 60 or 70 years out of date. This is the era of the multinational corporation and we have fallen behind in that we have not kept up with our competitors in world trade. All that I hope the CDC will do at present is initiate a new look and to set up a research team of experts, not well-meaning, wishful-thinking people but people who know as much about world trade as do the Japanese, the West Germans or our neighbours to the south. That is leaving out the Russian bloc about which I know very little. These three blocs at least have done their homework, but we have fallen behind.

I cannot see any sense in putting a vast amount of money such as $250 million or ten times that amount into the Canada Development Corporation unless we know the direction in which we are going and unless we have markets in view, because we are after world trade. I think it is putting the cart before the horse to start setting up a company, selling its shares and asking the Canadian taxpayer to underwrite the initial cost unless we have well thought-out plans telling us in which direction we should go. It is almost too late now. The fact is that at the present time we are no longer masters of our own house. Such markets as we have are largely controlled by multinational corporations. At present their headquarters are not in Canada but in one of the three blocs I mentioned—the European bloc, the American bloc or the Japanese-Asiatic bloc.

Unless I miss my guess, the entry of Britain into the Common Market will cut off one more outlet for Canadian goods. Britain has been forced to join one of these international power blocs. That is what the Common Market is—nothing more nor less than the complete integration of customs, trade and manufacturing as well as, unfortunately for Canada, the agricultural industry. All this is in one big basket.

To the south of us there are 200 million people, well organized, in a self-sustaining economy, and the strides they have made in the last 25 years have staggered the western world. It has not been an accident. We cannot blame the Almighty for deserting us in our hour of need. The Japanese also have gone to work. They sent a team of experts to Canada and found out that Canadians by and large love cameras. What did they do? They put competition out of business so far as cameras and camera equipment are concerned. They did the necessary research and now they have the market. Once one has a market, it is nothing at all to set up a corporation of any size. Inexperienced as I am, if I were given an unlimited market I could find not only the shareholders but the money to finance a corporation, because markets are the lifeblood of trade.

The first thing we should do is find out what Canada has to sell to the world. We are in a good position and always have been so far as raw materials are concerned. That is not our problem. Our problem today is that we have aspired to being one of the foremost manufacturing nations in the world. Considering our population, we have not done badly, but obviously we have not done well enough. Just today I received in my mail two releases stating that before October of this year Chemcell Limited, which hires 1,000 chemical experts in the area of greater Edmonton, will lay off no less than one-third of their personnel.

I do not want to be a Jeremiah, but I hope this is not a tremor before an earthquake and this will be an earthquake for 350 families whose pay will be directly affected. These people will be jobless due to lack of planning over the last 25 years. I am not partisan about this. This is not the time to be throwing stones. Now is the time for an emergency approach, for an all-party approach. Now is the time when I keep my ears open even to those to the far left, to find out what they can offer in the way of an answer. I do not write them off, but I have not heard much of an answer from them yet.

Certainly the answer is not to nationalize all companies in Canada. On the contrary, I think the answer probably is to use the initiative and imagination of which Canadians have always had plenty, to do the homework and to get into the international markets as rapidly as possible. It will not be an accident if we capture new markets or if we retain the ones we have; it will be solid planning. Perhaps the young people of our country do not know us very well and are not aware that our generation accomplished much along the road to affluence which they now enjoy. But we have not done a good selling job to our own people, nor have we tried to involve them with their know-how, their ambition, their imagination, their courage and their youth. We should put them to work, making them what Canadians could very easily be, the greatest salesmen on earth.

At the end of World War II in particular we were foremost in the field of world public relations, and we have blown it. This is not to be personal or partisan, but we have blown it. We have lost our markets and our preferred position in many areas. Instead of laying off a third of our well trained, efficient, capable and hard working Canadians we should be looking for more experts to man more factories, to set up more corporations and, if it is not out of date in this age of piety, to make more money for the Canadian people so that we can afford some of the frills and some of the security about which we boast so highly. Yet we have not so far eliminated poverty in many areas. It will be very sad if the affluence which we have cannot at least be maintained for the future.

Canada Development Corporation

With the unlimited natural resources we have, and most of them undeveloped, surely we can do better than complain when the Americans, who have done their homework, saved their money and invested in a good thing, namely, our Canadian future, are doing such a job of development in Canada. Yet they are called silly names—capitalists and imperialists. The fault, Mr. Speaker, lies with us. I do not think that nationalization of any of our industries is necessary. I agree with government participation. I think it was good when the government developed Trans-Canada Air Lines, now Air Canada. I am looking forward to the day when we sell Air Canada back to the Canadian people, who set it up. We paid for it and we have a right to own it. It is a big project. It cost a lot of money.

After a while, nationally owned corporations become tired and start to lose money. Instead of being the assets they were originally, the new broom sweeping clean, they are a liability. It will be an empty dream to suggest that we create a pool of government taxes and funds and do nothing but buy up defunct corporations. I hope this is not going to be some grandiose scheme to buy out entrepreneurial industries that have failed in world markets, with the beautiful thought that by digging into a pool of tax free money we will be able to shore-up dying industry. That just will not work.

We have to find out what we can sell. Then we have to make those products and get out and sell them. I was greatly heartened a few years ago when we called in our trade commissioners from all over the world and read the riot act to them. I do not know how many of them were fired, but then they took an interest; some planning was done. I believe that out of this we developed the Industrial Bank. We had some idea of the things in which Canada could involve herself. I think it was this positive, outward-looking that set us to work retraining our young people and retraining the older people who were out of jobs.

I have tried to find out what will happen to the 325 families affected by the Chemcell closedown. So far as I know there is no plan to retrain them to fit into the pulp industry. It seems to me we must undertake an emergency operation, call it what you like.

We will need co-operation at the three levels of government. If the government of Alberta gives a charter to set up a pulp industry in the foothills of the Rockies, I do not know why experts from Chemcell should not be sitting around the table with those who are setting up the pulp mill to find out how many of these 325 people can be retrained to fit into that industry. I have had chemical training myself and I do not think it would be too difficult if you were in the formaldehyde business to work in a plant producing sulphuric acid. I hope I am not being too subtle. You need sulphuric acid and strong alkalies in the pulp industry for bleaching the paper and other products.

Surely people who have worked in a Chemcell factory producing formaldehyde should be able to work in the pulp industry. Why wait until October when these people are on the unemployment rolls? Why not do it now? Don't waste time blaming people because it has not been done in the past. What are we going to do from here on in? What kind of co-operation can we expect from all three levels of government? What kind of co-operation can we expect from this chamber? Let us not waste time throwing stones; instead, let us chip in a bit and build something.

We need full employment in this country. We shall not get it by talking about bigger and better welfare payments. This is just like a snake chewing on its tail; after a while there is no more snake left. To have full employment we must have busy factories, and the only way to have busy factories is to go out and get the markets. We need a great deal more than know-how about producing, than how to get the products to market cheaply. We need more than a transportation policy. We must have a sale at the other end of the line.

There is certainly no use asking the people of Canada to invest in any kind of white elephant. If I set aside some of my hard earned wages and stop wasting my time travelling around the world on holidays, or going south of the line on holidays instead of staying in Canada, if I invest in the future development of Canada I want to know whether I will be protected from unnecessary taxation. If I am encouraged to make what I consider to be an honourable profit in developing the resources of Canada, I should at least expect to be treated the same as people who benefit from tax concessions in this country. I think that the taxpayers of Canada should have an opportunity to write off their losses in the development of the oil industry. An American investing in drilling oil in Alberta can write off any losses he has against his income tax. Of course he can afford to develop our oil when he may be 35 per cent or 40 per cent better off than a Canadian as far as income tax is concerned.

I believe there are a great many Canadians who want to gamble on the future of their country, but you will not get many of them to respond until they have at least equality in the taxation field. I am afraid we have created uneasiness in Canada by suggesting that profit is necessarily bad. I do not agree with that. I believe that thrift has to be rewarded. I believe that most people in Canada want to work. I think most people in Canada will work, but when they are asked to invest they should have as much guarantee as we can give them.

I am not asking for Utopia or a slice of the moon. I am asking the government to guarantee that in the foreseeable future it will not take away the benefits of their thrift and the benefits of their investment in our country. The intricacies of the financial structure of this country have always eluded me somewhat. I do not fully understand the implications of the floating dollar, but I do know that, when we are exporting from our embryonic industries things such as chemicals made in our petrochemical plants in Edmonton it makes it very difficult to keep the plant going if you are afraid that after you have produced $1 million worth of formaldehyde you will have to sell it for 7 per cent less within the next year. This happens.

[Mr. Bigg.]

The floating dollar has seriously hit our petrochemical industry and our pulp industry. You need only look at the stock market to see this. I do not suggest for a minute that the floating dollar is the only factor; nevertheless, it is a contributing factor. When we do the research which I think will be necessary if the Canada Development Corporation is to work, in so far as it will work, we shall need to take cognizance of the broad picture and determine how stable is the money market and what kind of selling market exists for our commodities. The market, of course, is tied very closely to our floating dollar. I think we are gambling. I hope that our financial experts know what they are doing when they take the drastic step of either pegging or unpegging the dollar.

The chemical industry in Canada is worried about this, the pulp industry is worried and all Canada is worried. Our bacon has been saved in other fields because at present we have in asbestos and nickel almost a world monopoly. Our trade in those commodities has in part accounted for our enormous favourable balance of trade. Nevertheless, the small Canadian companies are still going out of business by the hundred.

I hope that the Canada Development Corporation will not only be interested in keeping the large corporations going. I believe by and large that the large, multinational corporations need very little help from us. Some of them are bigger than countries and stronger than governments and need very little help. The Canadian entrepreneur, the man whom the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is encouraging, must be helped to begin new enterprises and to create new jobs. Of course we must decide whether the new companies are valid enterprises. I do not suggest that we set up a dictatorship; nevertheless, if we are to put the Canadian taxpayers' money behind a venture, we ought first to do our homework. We ought not to encourage people to set up box factories when boxes are not needed, or shoe factories that make only for the left foot shoes. It is passing strange that those people who talk most about planning have been deplorably lacking in the ability to make those plans work.

Private enterprise has created 99 per cent of the affluence we now enjoy. Since North America has led the way to affluence, I do not see that we need go to others for leadership. I say, by all means learn how the Japanese did what they have done in the Pacific. Learn what West Germany did in Europe and learn what the Americans did south of our border. Nevertheless, we must develop our own Canadian economy. The problems of those countries are not our problems. America has not our transportation problems. It does not lack a large home market. That economy is self-sustaining. We in Canada must develop the kind of economy which suits us. We must have a well co-ordinated transportation policy. We must try to locate our industries where they will be viable.

I think we could take a page out of the Japanese book. The Japanese government can tell a factory that it will not be in a competitive position. This is where our own government could step in; it could see that research is properly done and that advice is fairly spread across the board. Government experts can advise. They should be able to go to a private agency and say, "We do not think this is going to work, because..." The government must be encouraged to say, "Before putting in the Canadian taxpayers' money we must be conviced that this will be a viable industry."

This is a big country and we need a flexible policy. I believe in the distribution of wealth. I believe we should do all we can to help people in various areas. I believe that we should try to set up industry where there is no industry. On the other hand, I think we would be foolish if we tried to put the steel industry of Hamilton on Baffin Island. I would much rather see a seaway built, as was done, with the consequence that ships could sail up the St. Lawrence and up to Hamilton and transport iron ore from Baffin Island, northern Quebec, northern Ontario or from wherever it could be found, cheaply and efficiently, and also transport steel to places where it can best be used.

Let us see what the Japanese have done with Alberta coal. It has been in Alberta for a long time. The Japanese did the research, now they are shipping 100 million tons of coal to Japan. The Japanese are in a unique position in Asia. At present, Asia is theirs. Can we compete? I think we can. We will not do it by wishful thinking and by returning to nineteenth century nationalism. We will not do it by carrying on the class war. That has been won; in Canada there are no classes; nobody in Canada has a monopoly on profits. The unemployed in Quebec, New Brunswick or Alberta can still go to work if they are willing to adopt, willing to reclassify and to retrain. I am only begging that we do all we can to make this easy for them. We must set up more national trade schools. we have done this in the past, but not enough of it. Also, we ought to anticipate some of the problems that may arise. We ought to go to the chemical industry and to the pulp industry with our experts and find out their problems. We need more communication.

Some years ago, when Canada's trade was slumping, I made a suggestion which I still think is valid. How many of us know where the products we use are made. One thing we could do right now is buy Canadian. It would be a good idea if our products carried a recognizable stamp. It could be a red maple leaf, if you think that would not desecrate our flag, or a beaver.

An hon. Member: A red one.

Mr. Bigg: We could stamp on the product, in letters the size of which could be legislated and would vary with the size of the containers, if you like, the quantity of Canadian labour, Canadian raw material, etc., that had gone into the product. We might begin with "30 per cent Canadian made" and grade the scale right up to "100 per cent Canadian made". When we reach 100 per cent, let us have a gold maple leaf or a gold beaver, because that would show the product was 100 per cent Canadian raw materials, labour and expertise. This would not shock the Japanese; people already know what is made in Japan.

• (5:40 p.m.)

We can do a great deal to find out what Canadians want and need. I have mentioned the automobile industry. What about a bumper that will withstand the jolts we receive from the heavy traffic on our roads? I do not care whether the Asians, including the Japanese, have one or not. We should do research on what we need.

An hon. Member: Why don't they fill in the potholes?

Mr. Bigg: Indeed. Our unemployment is at one of the highest rates in modern times. If we carried out proper research on pollution, we could kill two birds with one stone. By replanting our forests we would also be cleaning our air. I suggest that many young people would enjoy replanting forests during the summer. While we are at it, we might as well plant hardwood trees. What initiative are we taking with regard to our water problems? A question was recently asked in this House about whether the government was planning or helping to build a pipeline from Prudhoe Bay. The answer was that the government had not been asked. The government must start taking the initiative rather than waiting to be asked. The government should have investigated the matter of Prudhoe Bay as soon as the news was released. When I heard the news, I stood in my place and said that we should get on with the pipeline now. This is still my thinking. Those who do not agree say that we must think about the ecology of the north. That is pretty well balanced. A pipeline would be far less dangerous to the north than a supertanker sinking in the Arctic.

Our chosen leaders should not hide behind the excuse "Nobody asked me". As I understand it, Members of Parliament are to take the flag and say, "Follow me". We should not wait to be asked what we are going to do about a pipeline, planning or unemployment. We must not wait for an earthquake or a flood before we act. Noah built an ark. When it started to rain, he was ready. We know there will be slumps, periods of unemployment and automation which will result in the loss of jobs for many people. We must be ready for this. It is not good enough to sit around for three years and then when a problem arises say we are sorry but we do not have any plans. If we act in this manner, it will be a sorry spectacle.

Canadians are tired of us. They are talking about a new method of running Canadian affairs. Have we worn out the Parliamentary system? Is it no longer capable of accepting the challenge of leadership? Canadians want leadership, not foolish and half-hearted moves. In fact, sometimes they are broken-hearted moves. Why should we not forge ahead? If we are not experts, and few of us are, we should get a few dollar men in here. There are people who know how to run General Motors; they might be pleased to assist. There are talented men in this chamber who are not being paid what they are worth. There may be men in industry who would be willing to donate some of their time. C. D. Howe donated his considerable talents so that we were able to reach the stage we did at the end of World War II. There is nothing partisan about that, coming from a Tory.

I think we are failing when we do not ask industry to do something about our high unemployment rate. If we believe in planning, let's do some planning. As I stated at the beginning of my remarks, it is not necessary to nationalize everything; however, it is necessary to plan. It is certainly necessary to plan if we are going to ask Canadian taxpayers to underwrite any of these segments of industry. They have a right to know why. If it is a gamble, they have a right to know. If we do not know what is going to happen, we must be honest enough to tell them. If they are to be asked to invest $1,000 a year in the Canada Development Corporation, they must have assurance from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) that he will not take it all back through some fancy capital gains tax. If that is the case, they may as well spend their money in Europe or the Caribbean.

I would like to invest in Canada's future along the lines of the CDC. The public leaders should show the Canadian people that they are going to be masters in their own house. I do not think it is necessary to expropriate anyone who has invested an honest dollar in this country. We need know-how. We must build up our stocks, work as a nation and be thrifty as we were in the past. I have drawn up a timetable. I do not know how accurate it is, but it can be a target. In round figures, Americans own 75 per cent of all Canadian industry at present. If we work hard, by 1976 this figure could be 70-30. By 1981 it could be 65-35. I am not going to read the whole list. For every five years we could reverse the trend by 5 per cent. According to my figures, by the year 1991 the ratio would be 50-50 and by the year 2000, 60-40. This cannot be done overnight. We cannot expropriate our blood cousins who had much more faith, initiative and more sense to gamble than ourselves. However, we can do it if we want.

At the present time we have not developed more than 10 per cent of our potential in Canada. In the next century the world could be ours, not in an imperialistic sense but by the fact we would be masters of our own house. If we are able to develop the wealth of Canada properly and methodically and participate in that development ourselves, in 25 years we could be so wealthy that we would have to give away a good deal of that wealth for our own good.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) told us that he and his party were not able to support this legislation, and from this premise he reached the conclusion that the bill was inadequate. I would remind him that from a premise of that kind there are at least two possible conclusions. The very fact that Bill C-219 is being belaboured from the right by speakers such as the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Bigg) and from the left by speakers of the New Democratic Party suggests that the government has steered a satisfactory middle course between excessive state control and the absence of adequate direction.

[Mr. Bigg.]

The hon. member for Timiskaming, and this is a good example of his party's analysis of the bill, said the measure makes no provision to assist small companies. He probably had in mind clause 6(2)(b) which provides that the corporation shall invest in the shares of corporations in which the real value of the shareholders' equity after investment by the company will be, or is likely to become, $1 million or more.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this power is not to assist small companies or, indeed, to assist large companies. It is not to assist companies, as such, at all. The purpose of the CDC, as stated at the beginning of the bill, is quite clear. It is to establish a corporation which will help develop and maintain strong Canadian-controlled and managed corporations in the private sector of the economy. That is the first purpose. The second is to give Canadians greater opportunities to invest and participate in the economic development of Canada. In investing in a company, the CDC will be doing so for the purpose of obtaining a much larger economic benefit. This, it seems, is a purpose which has not been understood by some hon. members opposite.

In fact, hon. members opposite, especially those in the New Democratic Party, have been ambivalent in their expressions of view on the question of profit. Sometimes they take the view that the whole scheme is wrong because it involves the profit motive. At other times they acknowledge, as did the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman), that the profit motive is not bad in itself and that there must be some profit orientation here.

It would seem the best way to look at this is to ask whether the profit criterion is to be taken as short-term or long-term profit. If this corporation were to be interested in grasping at every short-term benefit which came along, it would obviously not be fulfilling the larger purpose which the government and, I hope, Parliament will entrust to it. But if the corporation takes a long-range view of profitability, it will not only achieve the protection of the money invested in it but it will achieve the much broader purpose of making a major contribution to the development of the economy within the hands of Canadians.

I should like to refer briefly to the comments made yesterday by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland). He said the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) was presenting us with a bill which would create a private corporation completely beyond the influence of the government and motivated solely by the desire to maximize profits. It is very easy to win a battle if you set up straw men to attack. The fact is, the purpose of the bill is not that at all, nor is that the kind of entity which the legislation establishes.

Initially the government would be the sole shareholder and would obviously possess as much control as it wished to exercise over the affairs of the corporation through its power to appoint directors. Even if it were reduced subsequently to its 10 per cent holding, as envisioned in the legislation as a possibility, it would still be in a position to vote its full shares in the corporation rather than to appoint the limit of four directors to which hon. members opposite referred. This is provided for in clause 40(1) as follows:

> The Minister of Finance may . . . annually appoint not more than four members of the board of directors in lieu of voting the shares held by Her Majesty in right of Canada—

The wording of this clause would suggest that this is to be a more exceptional power and that normally the government would exercise its right to vote its full shares. Then, of course, if the board failed to work in the way anticipated, the power would always remain with this House to amend the legislation to achieve whatever results were considered necessary.

I trust, however, that action of this kind will never be needed and that provision has been made for the proper degree of direction, the introduction of the correct degree of national purpose in the operation of this new vehicle, making it unnecessary for the government to take extraordinary measures.

This does raise an important point, nevertheless. I should like to endorse the comments made by my hon. friend from Etobicoke (Mr. Gillespie) and by my hon. friend from Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) that this legislation merely provides a framework—the policy has still to be worked out and established. For example, it is necessary to establish a science policy; I trust any effort made in this direction will be considerably aided by the report of the Science Committee of the other place which we expect to receive in the next few months.

We need to work out and establish a policy concerning foreign ownership; such a policy is now in gestation within the government and we trust that it will soon be presented to the House for comment. We need, as my hon. friend from Scarborough East put it, to develop an over-all industrial policy. It is only in this context that the legislation before us becomes fully meaningful, because it is only in this context that the board of directors of the new corporation and, indeed, the government itself will be able to achieve the national purposes which we hope for in general but which have yet to be specified in particular.

May I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. As it is now six o'clock, the House will adjourn until 2 p.m. tomorrow. As I wish hon. members a safe journey home, may I suggest to them that they might consider whether the CDC ought to take over the removal and use of our snow, which is one of the more plentiful resources of Canada at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, February 25, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

GRAIN

TABLING OF ANNOUNCEMENT RESPECTING WHEAT GRADES EFFECTIVE AUGUST 1, 1971

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table under Standing Order 41(2) two copies, in French and English, of an announcement respecting the Canada Grain Act, particularly concerning grades that will be applicable in the new year.

BARLEY—ANNOUNCEMENT OF INCREASE IN INITIAL PAYMENT FOR CURRENT CROP YEAR

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the House of a 10 cent increase in the initial payment for barley in the current crop year to $1.01, basis No. 3 Canada Western 6 Row in store at Thunder Bay. The increase is effective March 1 and an adjustment payment of 10 cents will be paid on deliveries in the period August 1, 1970 to February 28, 1971.

The market demand for barley has been strong and selling prices have risen sharply in recent months. The Canadian Wheat Board believes that additional export sales for May, June and July delivery could be made if the board could be certain that producers would deliver the extra barley in time to meet any new sales commitments that are undertaken. To permit the Wheat Board to take advantage of current barley prices and sales opportunities it is essential that farmers deliver barley as soon as possible during this crop year.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be to thank the minister for heeding the comments I made yesterday with regard to tabling announcements in the House. I thank him for it. However, in dealing with the increase of 10 cents in the initial price for barley I must say it would appear that the amount of barley available to the Wheat Board is such that the board may not in fact be taking advantage of the potential sales. This points up one very glaring fact. Last year the government felt that certain acreages should be taken out of production and as a result asked that the land be left in summerfallow. It is obvious that the government made a mistake in not encouraging barley production at that time.

Mr. Lang: It did.

Mr. Korchinski: The minister suggests the government did so, but the farmers obviously are withholding barley because of their own requirements and because of the price they are receiving. The very fact that in the middle of the season the Wheat Board has taken the step of increasing the initial price indicates that it is not in a position to guarantee delivery of this grain. This is a sad state to find ourselves in. In one year we tell the farmers not to deliver and then, six months after the new crop year has begun, we find we have to use inducements so the farmers will deliver the particular type of grain for which there is a market.

While it is encouraging that a payment is to be made which will be helpful in so far as the income position is concerned, I understand the Wheat Board has not been in a position to make sales on the future market. I understand that the Wheat Board has also announced new quota regulations. That, of course, is another subject.

There are many weaknesses in the proposal which has been presented. One has to do with the amount of grain that will be delivered or the size of the quotas that will be available for the delivery of this grain. I do not wish to go into that subject in depth. I shall only say that the government is in an awkward position in trying to explain why it asked for a reduction in production and now tells the farmers to deliver everything they have.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister's action is very timely. One could have forecast that action of this type would have to be taken if the Wheat Board hoped to get into position the barley it needed since otherwise the producers simply would not deliver it in sufficient quantities. I believe it also reflects a good, aggressive selling program on the part of the Wheat Board in the last year. It is fortunate for the farmers that the Board did undertake such a program. It is fortunate also, as the previous speaker stated, that we had some good rains last year and farmers planted more barley than might have been expected.

I suggest that the minister might consider there are many farmers who just do not have a quota base in their books for the delivery of barley. The Wheat Board should be considering how it can get delivery of barley in the hands of farmers who did not have barley last year.

I suggest that the minister might also take a pretty close look at the block system. I have had two reports in the last week indicating that grain was called forward, permits were issued and the grain was put in position but the cars did not appear. Whether this is chronic or not I have no way of knowing. But if the minister wants barley in position, as I am sure he does, I suggest that he also take a good hard look at what is happening at individual points. I may say that I passed along the information I received to the Wheat Board and asked them to check it out. I suggest to the minister that he keep a pretty close eye on this situation.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that western barley producers will receive a higher initial payment as of March 1, 1971, with retroactive effect to August 1, 1970, as the minister said in his statement.

This shows that if a particular problem is examined thoroughly it is realized at times that retroactivity is justified. This is one of the reasons why I asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) very recently to consider the possibility of making price increases for powdered skimmed milk and Cheddar cheese retroactive.

I am happy to see that the export market is becoming stronger so that barley producers may continue to gain by it. I hope that the difference in price will benefit farmers mostly and not only middle men.

The minister also stated that it is essential that farmers make the required arrangements to deliver their barley as soon as possible. I remember that, last year and during the preceding winter, there were some fairly heated debates in the House on the arrangement from which grain producers were to benefit thanks to the CN or the CP. In short, this indicates, I believe, that delivery means are to be dependent on the possibilities for making cars available to producers.

Further, there is a shortage of grain in Eastern Canada. We receive many complaints that mills and producers cannot rely on a normal supply and that prices are rising steeply thus contributing to an increase in the production costs of eggs, broilers, pork-meat, etc.

I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture to consider seriously this problem and, while granting to the western farmer the advantage to which they are rightly entitled, to take some steps, in order to avoid penalizing too harshly the eastern producers as far as prices are concerned, so that they may be in a position to compete. It would be advisable, in my opinion, not only for eastern or western farmers but also for all Canadians to avoid any cause of disagreement in the country.

FISHERIES

DESTRUCTION OF FISHING GEAR BY FOREIGN DRAGGERS —REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. That matter is the criminal behaviour of certain fishing trawlers of various foreign states within the territorial waters of Canada in areas off the south and west coasts of Newfoundland. These trawlers are carelessly or deliberately, certainly contemptuously, running through and destroying the fishing gear of Canadian inshore fishermen. When these Canadian fishermen protest, the foreign captains display the same linguistic ability as the Prime Minister and tell them to fuddle-duddle.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member may have a very good case to submit to the House for the consideration of hon. members under Standing Order 43, but I suggest that he does not help his case when he goes beyond the very limited terms of Standing Order 43. If the hon. member has a motion, he should indicate what it is.

Mr. Carter: I was merely pointing out the seriousness of the problem and the indifference shown by the people concerned. Under the Criminal Code these actions are classed as vandalism, wilful destruction of property, and incitement to riot. Under the War Measures Act they would constitute real or apprehended invasion. If these actions occurred ashore, the government would muster the troops, parade the RCMP—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a motion he should put it, otherwise I will not allow him to do so. We will go on with the next order of business.

Mr. Carter: I therefore move seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall):

> That this House urges the government and, in particular, the Minister of Justice, the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and the Solicitor General, to seize those foreign vessels that are committing criminal acts in Canadian waters and to punish the masters and crews, and
> That the Fisheries Committee of this House be directed to make a full study of the adequacy of Canada's maritime patrol, the feasibility of a beefed-up integrated fisheries, coast guard and naval force, and the whole question of traditional fishing rights.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for St. John's West. This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

CONCURRENCE IN FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington) moved that the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, presented to the House on Monday, February 22, 1971, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

HOUSE OF COMMONS

WELCOME TO MEMBER FOR VANCOUVER EAST ON RETURN FOLLOWING ILLNESS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice who I hope will be in the House later on. While on my feet, I might express my pleasure at seeing back in the House today a member who has been absent for some time because of illness, the hon. member for Vancouver East.

REVOCATION OF PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT PRIOR TO EXPIRY—SUBSTITUTE LEGISLATION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Does the government intend to revoke the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act, as it has the power to do, prior to its expiry on April 30?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): That intention has not been expressed, Mr. Speaker. I could link this question to one which was asked the other day as to whether we would bring an Act into the House before that expiry date. My answer was that the government had committed itself to proceed in the House in some way before April 30. Beyond that, there is nothing I can add today.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I ask the Prime Minister if the government intends to bring in legislation prior to April 30, and can he assure the House that any such legislation will not be as repressive and reprehensible as the present statute?

AMENDMENT OF CRIMINAL CODE TO MAKE PURCHASE OF FIRE ARMS MORE DIFFICULT

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In view of recent activities of the FLQ and the increased sales of M-1 rifles in Montreal, will the Prime Minister inform the House whether the government is planning any amendments to the Criminal Code to make it more difficult to purchase fire arms?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I believe the Minister of Justice has dealt with questions like this in the past. I would refer the question to him.

ALLEGED REQUEST BY QUEBEC GOVERNMENT FOR REPLACEMENT OF PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Has the Quebec government asked the Prime Minister of Canada to introduce before April 30 new legislation to replace the present one?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I could not say whether this is a request, Mr. Speaker, but in the course of discussions which took place between the Quebec government and ours, a few months ago, we informed each other of what the next steps should be. I would not refer to an entente, but the subject was discussed by both sides, and there was no objection, from either party, regarding steps to be taken.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would clearly state if the premier of Quebec would like to see the existing legislation revoked, and perhaps a new one introduced?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, once again I do not wish to speak on behalf of Quebec's premier. He has not expressed the wish to have the legislation revoked.

As far as future measures are concerned, it will behoove the federal government and the Canadian Parliament to discharge their responsibilities, when the federal government introduces his proposals, and then it will not be a question affecting only Quebec or any other province, but the country as a whole.

WAR MEASURES ACT—PAYMENT BY QUEBEC FOR SERVICES OF ARMED FORCES

Mr. André Fortin (Lobinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the right hon. Prime Minister.

In his discussions with the Prime Minister of Quebec, did the province ask officially not to pay for the maintenance of armed forces during the October crisis?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I dealt with this matter twice in the last few days and I have nothing further to say at the moment. Discussions were initiated between the two governments and the parties concerned have reached no final decision.

[English]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Having regard to the fact that both the Prime Minister and the Prime Minister of Quebec have indicated that troops went into Quebec at the request of the Quebec government, and bearing in mind the provisions of part I of the National Defence Act, has any attempt been made under the War Measures Act or other authority by the government to vary the incidence of the total cost falling upon the province of Quebec, or will the government introduce legislation to vary the provisions of the National Defence Act to that effect?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): The hon. member is correct in saying this involves the National Defence Act rather than the War Measures Act. It will be my intention to seek on behalf of the Department of National Defence reimbursement of out of pocket expenses incurred by participating in the Quebec events from the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Then it will be for the government to discuss with the province of Quebec the question of its share of the cost.

Mr. Baldwin: I was about to address a question to the Minister of Justice but he is not here. The Prime Minister would probably only befuddle the issue—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Fuddle-duddle!

Mr. Hees: There he goes again.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: I should like to ask the Acting Minister of Justice whether he has been requested to obtain an opinion from the law officers of the Crown as to whether or not there can be any change in the law which now provides that the full cost will fall upon the province of Quebec?

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): This is a very important question and one which I shall draw to the attention of the minister.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFF OF EMPLOYEES BY CHEMCELL LIMITED—REQUEST BY ALBERTA GOVERNMENT FOR ASSISTANCE

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question to the hon. Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Since Chemcell Limited has announced the closing of its chemical plants in Edmonton and Two Hills, Alberta, would the minister say whether the government is considering the establishment of one or more special programs to alleviate the situation in this province? Would he also say whether the government of Canada has received a request from the Province of Alberta or whether there have been any discussions with this government in order to deal with the loss of jobs by all the specialists working for this company?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, as far as I know, there have been no contacts between my department and the government of Alberta with respect to those closings.

As to the employees affected by them, they will benefit from the regular programs of the department and, more important, from those of the Department of Manpower and Immigration. I know of no other.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. minister could indicate how retraining people who have doctorates in chemistry will solve the problem.

HEALTH

ASSISTANCE TO MEDICAL PROFESSION IN CONTROLLING MEMBERS ALLEGEDLY EXPLOITING MEDICARE PROGRAMS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the concern expressed by the Canadian Medical Association as to the inability of the profession to discipline or to control individual members who are exploiting medicare programs, can the minister say whether the government will assist the profession in this important matter?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, that is a very valid observation and I think the government would be prepared to consider it. The hon. member may know that about a year and a half ago we did meet with the Canadian Medical Association in an endeavour to approach the profession throughout Canada to limit fee increases, and that was successful for a short time. Perhaps this new effort will have a similar effect; I hope so. I would also remind the hon. member that the provinces have a good deal to do with this matter in terms of setting fee structures.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement on behalf of the Canadian Medical Association that it would be helpful to have full information concerning fees collected by doctors on a national basis, will the government consider doing what it can to see that this information is provided?

Mr. Munro: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I did not hear the concluding words of the hon. member's question.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I asked whether the government will do what it can to see to it that information regarding fees charged by doctors on a national basis is made available to the profession so that it can do the job of disciplining its own members.

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to look into the matter.

QUEBEC—RETRAINING—ALLEGED SHORTAGE OF TEXTBOOKS AND EQUIPMENT

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I want to direct to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Considering that complaints have been filed to the effect that a certain number of schools offering retraining in Quebec are short of textbooks and equipment, and since the federal government is helping pay the expenses involved in offering these courses, would the minister tell us whether it was stipulated at the time the agreements were signed with the province of Quebec that schools providing the courses would supply students with the required textbooks and equipment so they could reap full benefit from these courses?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think it is clear in all our relationships with the provinces that when we place students into training it is expected that the training will be of adequate quality. I include all aspects of training, whether it be equipment, books or what have you. If the hon. member has a specific instance that he knows of where there seems to be some failure in this regard, I would be very pleased if he would bring it to my attention so that I can check into the matter.

SUGGESTED EXTENSION OF FARM ADMINISTRATION COURSES TO WIVES

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

I should like to ask the minister whether he has received, from the Department of Education of Quebec, a request to the effect that, in the next adult training courses program, farmers' wives be allowed to take farm management courses?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware whether such a request has come from the province of Quebec particularly, but I should like to inform hon. members that the training courses that are available in different provinces in regard to business management in farming operations are indeed available to wives as well as to husbands. However, it is the policy of the department not to offer training in the first instance to the wife and husband of the same family, on the theory that it is better to have one member of as many households as possible take this training.

RETRAINING—CONTROL OF TEXTBOOKS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the minister and ask him whether, in view of the large subsidies granted by the federal government for those training courses, he assumes a degree of control over the textbooks used?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker, the quality of these basic courses is determined by the provincial institutions, or by the institutions which are chosen by the provinces for the purpose. Of course, the manpower offices do have a function in ascertaining that training generally is of the kind that is desired, but it does not go beyond that.

IMMIGRATION

ACTION TO DEAL WITH BACKLOG OF APPEALS AND APPLICATIONS FOR LANDED STATUS

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration a question. In view of the huge backlog of immigration appeals and applications for landed immigrant status, when will the minister remedy this intolerable situation and inform the House what he has decided to do with some of the unpalatable recommendations in the Sedgwick report?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I really have nothing to add to previous answers to this question. We are working on particular solutions to this obviously very serious problem, and I hope that before long this will result in legislation being placed before the House.

PERMISSION FOR PEOPLE TO WORK WHILE AWAITING DISPOSITION OF APPLICATIONS OR APPEALS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in light of the very long delays in processing applications and appeals, is the government giving consideration to permitting people who are waiting long periods of time to work until their applications are approved or rejected?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is fairly standard practice on the part of the department to give a work permit to persons who are past the special inquiry stage and, having failed at that stage, are awaiting an appeal. It may be an unsatisfactory result in some ways, but we have felt it essential to give this general permission rather than to leave these people without the opportunity to work.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that there are people who have not reached that stage and have been waiting for as long as 12 months before their applications are considered and are unable to work during this period, would the government give consideration to permitting them to work until their applications are dealt with?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think cases where the waiting period at that stage is anything like the length the hon. member suggests are very rare. I think it may remain the best policy to look at these cases individually rather than have a blanket rule.

DRAFTING OF PERMANENT PUBLIC ORDER BILL—DISCUSSIONS WITH QUEBEC

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether any instructions have been given for the drafting or preparation of a permanent public order bill, and whether such a bill is being discussed by the minister or his officials with the government or officials of the province of Quebec, as the Prime Minister of that province has said?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I want to apologize to the Leader of the Opposition for not being here at the opening of the House. The Department of Justice is considering what parliamentary action should be taken, as has already been stated to the House by the Prime Minister. I have had no discussions with the province of Quebec relating to such legislation or relating to whether or not there should be legislation.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I heard the minister. Did he say that he had or had not had such discussions?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I have not.

Mr. Stanfield: Then has the Minister of Justice any explanation to give as to why the Prime Minister of Quebec would say that such discussions have taken place?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands on a supplementary.

QUEBEC—COMPENSATION FOR THOSE ARRESTED AND RELEASED WITHOUT CHARGE—RETURN OF FINGERPRINTS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Justice whether he has received any reply to his letter to the Minister of Justice of Quebec regarding compensation for those persons who were arrested and then released, whether any compensation is going to be paid for their loss of employment, and whether the federal government is going to contribute to such compensation?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think what I said to the House was that I was going to write the Attorney General of Quebec about the problem of returning fingerprints. I did not say I was going to be in written communication with him about the problem of compensation. What I did say and report to the House was that Mr. Choquette had said that questions of compensation were being referred to the protecteur du peuple or ombudsman in Quebec, and that the Attorney General of Quebec would consider what to do after he had received the recommendation of the ombudsman in individual cases.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Were any of the persons who were arrested but not charged fingerprinted and, if so, under what authority were they fingerprinted since no charge was laid against them?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I have already stated to the House, Mr. Speaker, that under the Identification of Criminals Act, as we interpret it, fingerprints can only be taken if a person has been charged. When I was Acting Solicitor General I advised the RCMP to return fingerprints to those police forces from which they had been received, and that has been done. That is all we can do in so far as the federal jurisdiction is concerned. In reply to the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, I said I would communicate with the Attorney General of Quebec to advise him officially of the action we had taken and of the opinion of Parliament. To date I have not received a reply to that letter.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): On what authority were they taken in the first place?

CONCLUSION OF AGREEMENT WITH WEST GERMANY ON EXCHANGE OF PENSION BENEFITS

Mr. Keith Hymmen (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can he advise the House when he anticipates that negotiations might be completed and an agreement signed between the Canadian government and the government of West Germany regarding the exchange of pension benefits?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker. It is expected that the German delegation will come to Canada in March and that the whole matter will be settled and signed by the end of that month.

FINANCE

DISCONTINUANCE OF SALE OF PRESENT CANADA SAVINGS BOND SERIES

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Is it the intention of the government in the near future to discontinue further sales of the present issue of Canada savings bonds?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I withdrew these sales yesterday, or announced the withdrawal of sales effective a week hence.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, will there be any replacement of this series of savings bonds with another series at a more realistic interest rate, or will there be no savings bonds available to the public for a period of time?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, it is not the present intention of the government to introduce another issue until the normal issue which will come out in November.

FISHERIES

DESTRUCTION OF FISHING GEAR BY FOREIGN DRAGGERS—REQUEST FOR DEFENCE AIRCRAFT AND SHIPS TO PROTECT CANADIAN RIGHTS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has he received requests for Canadian forces aircraft or ships to do surveillance work on Canada's east coast, specifically the coast of Newfoundland, to enforce our fishing regulations and to protect the rights of Canadian nationals whose gear is being destroyed as a result of infringements by foreign vessels?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have already had informal requests in this regard from, among other people, my colleague the Minister of Transport.

Mr. McGrath: Has the minister acted upon these requests and, if so, are Canadian forces aircraft and ships presently conducting surveillance in the area to see that no further infringements occur?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, aircraft are conducting surveillance of our maritime approaches at all times. With regard to the possible deployment of surface units, I would like to make an announcement in due course.

DESTRUCTION OF FISHING GEAR BY FOREIGN DRAGGERS—REPRESENTATIONS TO GOVERNMENTS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the infringement of Canadian rights off the Atlantic coast of Canada, what representations has he made to the governments of the nationals concerned pointing out to them that they are infringing upon Canadian rights in the Atlantic coast area?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure about the assumptions underlying this question. It may be that the hon. member is quite right. I have been discussing the general situation with the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry and we think we will take measures that will be effective.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

PROPOSED GRANT FOR PULP MILL IN MEADOW LAKE AREA

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of statements by the Premier of Saskatchewan that a regional incentive grant will be made for a pulpmill at Meadow Lake, and in view of other reports that no commitment has been made, can he indicate whether he has made a commitment on this matter and, if so, what is the nature of that commitment?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I made no commitment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, will the minister assure the House that grants for pulpmills, whether this one or others, will not be made until assurances about pollution control standards have been given by the Department of Fisheries and Forestry, which it is anticipated will soon become the department of environment?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I can give this assurance, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

GRASSLAND INCENTIVE PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR GRANTS TO EASTERN FARMERS TO GROW GRAIN

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question.

As grants will be given to allow Prairie farmers to convert their cornfields into grassland, could the Minister of Agriculture tell us whether he has similar grants considered for Eastern Canada farmers who could convert their grasslands into cornfields?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ALLEGED TRAFFICKING IN INDUSTRIAL MILK QUOTAS—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture which is based on a written question concerning trafficking in industrial milk quotas in this country. It was placed on the order paper some time ago but the minister has refused to provide this information. Will he undertake to provide the information I asked for at that time concerning the trafficking in industrial milk quotas? Will he produce the information I requested?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in the question asked by the hon. member he wanted a list of all the people within the electronic files where transfers of quotas had taken place. This would require something like 700 hours of work, and I am not willing to undertake that job at that cost.

Mr. Nesbitt: That is not the reason the minister gave at the time. He keeps giving different reasons. I would suggest that at ten o'clock—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether the hon. member would ask his supplementary question.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, I would request that Your Honour put this on the late show at ten o'clock.

FILLING OF POSITION OF PRESIDENT

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Could he advise the House of the success he has made in persuading someone to accept the presidency of the Canada Development Corporation?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is not a matter of persuading people. We cannot appoint a head of a corporation that has not yet been approved by Parliament.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, some time ago the minister said he expected to be able to make an announcement soon. I ask him whether his confidence in this regard is due to the fact that he has given serious consideration to following the example set by his former colleague, the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question relates to a bill that is now before the House and is not in order.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: I gather the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings wishes to rephrase his supplementary question.

[Mr. Olson.]

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I will make the question very simple. Is the minister holding off the making of this announcement because he is giving serious consideration to following the example of his former colleague and appointing himself?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, is the minister going to—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would ask for the hon. member's co-operation. He has asked a question which I think the minister should not be allowed to answer. Perhaps the hon. member might ask this question when we resume consideration of the bill to which this matter has reference.

Mr. Hees: I would ask him whether he is considering appointing himself as president of the corporation—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is the minister rising on a question of privilege? If so, I hope it will be different from the one raised by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings. As all hon. members know, only a limited period of time is available to hon. members during the question period, and if we spend it on questions of privilege, legitimate or otherwise, hon. members who have legitimate questions to ask will be penalized. I really think we should go on to the next question.

Mr. Benson: I agree, Mr. Speaker.

INDUSTRY

IMPORTATION OF BAUXITE FROM GUYANA BY ALCAN

Mr. Paul Langlois (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

In view of the announcement by the Prime Minister of Guyana of the nationalization of bauxite industries, can the minister assure the Canadian people, and particularly those employed in the aluminum industry of the Saguenay-Lake-St. John region, that the supply of bauxite from Guyana will be maintained at its present level for Arvida plants?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, Alcan have assured us that their operations in Canada would not be affected by recent developments in Guyana, particularly concerning supplies of raw materials.

YOUTH

ALLEGED HARASSMENT OF TRANSIENTS BY POLICE AND OTHER AUTHORITIES

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): I would like to address my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The minister, in his program on drugs, approaches the problem by treatment and research. However, a national health and welfare study on transients indicates that 38 per cent of last summer's travellers were subject to harassment by police and other authorities. When will the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Justice meet to solve this inconsistency?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I do not agree with the observations of the hon. member. If he is asking a question concerning legal sanctions in this area, I think he should direct it to my colleague, the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Rynard: I will readdress my question to the Minister of Justice.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Would the hon. member be good enough to specify which part of the question he would like me to answer?

Mr. Rynard: Yes, I will, Mr. Speaker. A national health and welfare study has indicated that 38 per cent of last summer's travellers were subject to harassment by police and other authorities. When will the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Justice meet to solve this inconsistency?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the Chair might have suggested to the hon. member from the start that this appears to be an argumentative question. I would think the hon. member is really making a submission to the ministers concerned.

Mr. Rynard: I should like to address a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Will he give consideration to granting a day of debate to discuss this troublesome situation?

INVESTIGATION OF TASK FORCE FINDING CONCERNING POLICE METHODS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It concerns the report of the task force on youth services. Since the report says that in many cases police agencies used highly questionable methods to gain information leading to arrests and convictions, can the minister advise whether or not he is having this matter investigated further and whether he has asked the Solicitor General to investigate it and take it up with the Attorneys General of the provinces?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No decision has been taken yet with respect to the contents of the particular report to which the hon. member is referring.

Mr. Benjamin: May I ask the Minister of Justice whether, in view of what this report has to say about the present vagrancy laws and a uniform juvenile age, he is giving consideration to bringing in amendments to these laws?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I was, long before the report was published, Mr. Speaker.

MANPOWER

ADVERTISING OF JOB OPPORTUNITIES IN EUROPEAN PRESS

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): My question is addressed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Could he say whether his office has received representations from groups such as the Federation of Parents and Teachers of British Columbia urging the abandonment of job advertising published in the European press reportedly stating that there are job opportunities in Canada at this time of unemployment?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether that group is among the groups which did write about the subject some time ago. The fact is that specific job advertising was stopped by the department some months ago, although of course the department continues to bring Canada generally to the attention of people abroad as part of the ongoing campaign for the future.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I will take the question as notice.

PROVISION OF DOCKING FACILITIES AT COME-BY-CHANCE, NFLD.

Mr. Walter Carter (St. John's West): My question is to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Could he advise the House as to the status of the proposal to supply docking facilities at Come-by-Chance, and could he say whether public tenders will be called for this work?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I should like to take this question also as notice.

INCENTIVE GRANTS—ACQUISITION OF PROPORTIONATE EQUITY IN RECIPIENT COMPANIES

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In awarding these various incentive grants amounting sometimes to millions of dollars and ranging in value from $3,000 to $5,000 per job, has the government considered acquiring equity in the recipient company proportionately equivalent to the grant made?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that the hon. member's question is in the form of a submission. I think he has to assume that the representation or suggestion he is making to the government will be taken into account.

Mr. Rose: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I thought that the minister was about to reply to my question. It seems to me that there is a basic inequity in the fact that when a recipient company makes a profit its shareholders get the benefit, but it if loses the public picks up the tab.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INFORMATION CANADA

DISTRIBUTION OF BROCHURE, "TOYS: A GUIDE TO CONSUMER BUYING"

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): My question is directed to the minister in charge of Information Canada. Since we have just learned that the first publication of his department entitled "Toys: A Guide to Consumer Buying" was not mailed to the public until late January, can the minister say whether this guide for Christmas shopping is eleven months early for next Christmas or one month late for last Christmas?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): The hon. member is about five days late in asking the question. It was in the paper last week. But I plead innocent. It is not our publication, and Information Canada cannot take credit for the distribution of these materials. It is in the hands of the government printing bureau and not Information Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bell: In view of the takeovers and would-be takeovers in the publishing industry in Canada, will the Prime Minister assure the House that, God forbid, the only one we have left in Canada will not be Information Canada?

INVESTIGATION OF STATEMENTS OF ALEXIA BANDY, BRANCH EMPLOYEE

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (New Westminster): My question is for the Minister without Portfolio in charge of citizenship. Could he advise the House if he has anything to report with respect to the inquiries he has undertaken into the somewhat questionable statements made by Alexia Bandy in British Columbia?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): Certain statements made by Mr. Bandy some two weeks ago do appear not to have been consistent with his responsibilities as a public servant, even a short term or casual one. This has been brought to his attention and he is no longer in the field but is devoting his efforts to completion of the documentation for which he was temporarily hired.

Mr. Baldwin: With those qualifications he ought to be in the cabinet.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

TRANSFER OF DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT EMPLOYEES TO CORPORATION—RETENTION OF PUBLIC SERVICE BENEFITS

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Can the minister advise if a formal transfer of employees from the Department of Transport to the Cape Breton Development Corporation has taken place yet and, if not, at what stage are the negotiations and how soon will they be completed? Further, when the transfer takes place will these workers continue to enjoy the same benefits as they did in the Public Service?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I think the employees who were transferred from the Point Edward Industrial Park to Devco will enjoy the same working conditions as they had before. They will retain all the benefits they had under the Public Service. As you know, recently the Public Service Alliance has been certified as bargaining agent for Devco employees. I do not know what kind of conditions they are going to establish, but I assume the interests of all parties will be safeguarded.

FISHERIES

DESTRUCTION OF FISHING GEAR BY FOREIGN DRAGGERS —REPRESENTATIONS TO GOVERNMENTS RESPECTING OBSERVANCE OF LAW

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have a further question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the statement made by the Minister of National Defence that he has already received representations from the Minister of Transport concerning the infringement of our sovereignty by foreign fishing trawlers, will the minister appeal to his counterparts in the countries concerned requesting them to abide by our fishing laws and the rules laid down by the International Commission for the North Atlantic Fisheries for the preservation of our fisheries resources?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if there has been any breach of the law we certainly will take the necessary steps.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): May I ask the Minister of Fisheries if in fact an infringement did take place? If so, can he tell us the extent of the infringement and what steps he has taken to cope with it?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, no infringement of our sovereignty, no breach of our laws, has taken place. There was one minor incident just outside our limits two days ago. All of the foreign trawlers at the moment are 25 or more miles away from our shores. A ruling has been made that all Canadian trawlers must stay outside 12 miles from shore, and this applies particularly off the west coast of Newfoundland. These rules applying to our own trawlers will automatically apply to all foreign vessels as well.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There are three or four members rising on supplementaries and there is just about one minute left before the end of the question period. If hon. members think that the time should be spent on supplementaries, perhaps we might allow one supplementary to the hon. member for South Shore, then try to get in two or three additional questions, and continue with this subject tomorrow.

Mr. Crouse: My supplementary is very brief, Mr. Speaker. I would like to ask the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry what surveillance he is carrying out to make certain that there is no infringement of our sovereignty rights in Atlantic Canada?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, there are three fisheries protection vessels in the area. Overflights are taking place, and additional resources are available from the Department of Transport and the Department of National Defence.

Inquiries of the Ministry

GRAIN

INCLUSION OF DELIVERIES TO FEED MILLS AS PART OF QUOTA

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the new quota regulations and procedures for the coming crop year as announced today, can the minister tell the House if deliveries by a producer to feed mills or possibly to large feed lots will become part of his quota allotment?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there has been no change with regard to those deliveries.

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was beginning to wonder if it would be quicker to place my question on the order paper.

Mr. Bell: No, it wouldn't.

Mr. Peddle: My question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of Premier Smallwood's statement two days ago that the second phase, the long-term development agreement, between the minister's department and the province of Newfoundland is ready to be signed, but not signed, and that the government of Newfoundland is all ready to sign, would the minister say if he regards the agreement as being ready to sign and indicate when this signing might take place?

GRAIN

BARLEY—INCREASE IN INITIAL PRICE—GRADES ACCEPTED BY ELEVATORS

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the minister's announcement today of a ten cent increase in the initial price of barley, and as many elevator points will only accept barley as No. 1 or 2 feed, even if it has previously been graded 3 cw., which has caused many farmers to hold back on barley deliveries—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member ask his question?

Mr. Stewart (Marquette): Would the minister tell the House if this situation has been investigated and corrected?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any difficulty farmers have in delivering the barley which is required for market. Of course, those farmers who have malting barley, and who have been holding it for that purpose, are in some cases in a certain degree of uncertainty. Across the Prairies, and certainly in Manitoba, there is a good deal of barley that could go into elevator space if it were delivered by farmers.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are a number of members who wish to ask supplementary questions—I notice the hon. member for Mackenzie and the hon. member for Assiniboia—and there are also supplementaries to previous questions, but the question period has expired. We will try to resume these important matters during the question period tomorrow. Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, I was going to ask the Government House Leader about the business for the rest of this week and next week, but before that is done I notice that the Minister of Justice very graciously rushed in to answer the question that his parliamentary secretary took as notice, and if the House gives unanimous consent he might answer.

Mr. Trudeau: No.

Mr. Baldwin: Otherwise, I will hold it until tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I did ask for the business of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member put the question in such a confusing way that the Chair took it for granted the hon. member was willing to put off satisfying his curiosity about several matters until tomorrow, but I gather he would like the President of the Privy Council to reply to his original question.

Mr. Baldwin: That is my choice.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we shall continue with the Canada Development Corporation bill, followed by the Budget bill, the young offenders and the Yukon minerals bills. However, as the first orders on Friday I would like to call the report stages of Bills C-217 and C-185, and probably the same stage of Bill C-2 on Monday.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

[Mr. Stewart (Marquette).]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise only to prompt the hon. member for Peace River to the effect that we had an agreement about the length of speeches today.

Mr. Baldwin: I was just on the point of rising to suggest that since there has been so much interest in this subject and it has been returned by popular demand, we might agree to have four 20 minute speeches from the first speakers for each party, and thereafter 15 minutes for succeeding speakers, which might permit a greater number of members to participate.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO PROVIDE EMERGENCY FINANCIAL SUPPORT TO OFFSET ESCALATING EFFECTS OF EMPLOYMENT POLICY ON ASSISTANCE FUNDS

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina) moved:

That this House condemns the government's failure to foresee and take steps to provide for the escalating effects of its employment policy upon the social assistance funds of the provinces and municipalities and its failure to consult and co-operate with the provinces and municipalities in providing emergency financial support and employment programs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the escalating effects of the government's deliberate unemployment policy to combat inflation continue to plunge our nation's economy deeper into a major recession and to increase unemployment in all parts of Canada, and the end is not yet in sight. The government has always bragged about its greatly expanded role in the economy of the nation and the new and modern way in which it would manage its monetary, fiscal and economic policies. Even the Bank of Canada would not escape its dominion, according to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) yesterday.

The government has, at great expense, hired hundreds of advisers, this being the secret of how to hone the economy to a fine edge. They were to be the experts, the input boys, the epitome of energy and wisdom. They were to have the ideas for the government, to make plans, to predict, to manage and direct. Their salaries were to be fixed in anticipation of superlative results. But what went wrong? As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) leaves I ask him, why do we not hear about these legions of whiz kids any more? They were recruited to get results, and not just be buffers between the Prime Minister and reality. Could it be that this computerized human army came up with the wrong advice? Has he been receiving incorrect advice from some deputy ministers which has resulted in this country's economy being struck by a sledge hammer? In either case, the only proper conclusion is that this government is being steered by those bureaucrats who are as incompetent in economic management as a befuddled Prime Minister and his cabinet are incompetent in judging their incompetency.

This government's failure to foresee, and take steps to provide for, the escalating effects of its employment policy has precipitated a welfare crisis for the provinces and municipalities across the land, particularly for the city of Toronto which, as I shall explain later, is suffering from a double effect. The government brought about this crisis without consulting with or advising the provinces and municipalities in advance. It has belatedly, and after much pressure, endeavoured in a limited untimely, ineffective and unfair way to repair some of the damage. While this action will prove to be of some utility in the long term, what is required is emergency financial support and emergency employment programs now.

Let me illustrate the positions in which the municipality of metropolitan Toronto and its central borough, the city of Toronto, find themselves. Metro Toronto administers all welfare and social assistance in the metropolitan area and turns down no applicant for welfare. It charges the boroughs for the number of persons assisted, not on the basis of permanent or temporary residence but on the basis of assessment in each borough. The cost falls not on the general populace, as does income tax, but on the owners and tenants of real estate in each borough. Metro pays 20 per cent of welfare assistance, the province of Ontario pays 30 per cent and the federal government pays 50 per cent. As unemployed people from all over Canada migrate to the Toronto area seeking work, they find it necessary in many instances to apply for welfare.

Since most of these people gravitate to the centre of the metropolitan area, the city of Toronto harbours more than its share of them. In 1969, metro had an estimated population of 2,316,000 and about 30 per cent of the people live in the city of Toronto. But since the city has 43 per cent of the total assessment for metro, its taxpayers are required to pay 43 per cent of all metro's operating costs, including welfare. Thus, the city of Toronto not only has an escalated bill for local applicants, but suffers from the double effect of being in metro at the centre of the national focus for itinerant applicants from all parts of Canada and paying for 43 per cent of them. Thus, Mayor Dennison of Toronto, finding his budget affected in an abnormal, unexpected and unfair fashion, is of course only doing his duty to every owner and tenant of land in his city when he seeks an emergency meeting with the Prime Minister to claim emergency financial support.

A complicating and exacerbating factor in the picture is that if seasonal unemployment benefits slated to expire on May 15 next are not extended, thousands more will be applying for welfare. Social Services Commissioner, John Anderson, of metro Toronto predicts that as many as 10,000 more people across metro might be forced to seek assistance if the unemployment insurance dries up on the scheduled day. So now, not only Mayor William Dennison and his executive council from the city of Toronto, but also metro Chairman Albert Campbell and his entire metro council are heading to Ottawa to see the Prime Minister.

In 1970, the metro department of social services spent $50,596,543, being $5,503,231 more than it had estimated for the year. Its 1971 estimate is $75,424,228 which is an increase of about 50 per cent. The direct payment of general welfare assistance is mainly responsible for these increases. The direct welfare share paid for 1969 was roughly $20 million; for 1970 $30 million and is estimated to be $47,700,000 in 1971. If seasonal unemployment benefits are not extended beyond May 15 next, then the projection for metro's 1971 direct welfare costs is $70 million. So, no wonder every borough in metro, probably every municipality in Ontario, and above all the city of Toronto, are alarmed by the emergency they are currently and imminently facing.

This chaos arises at a time when there is one financial crisis after another facing Canadian cities. The growing militancy among government employees, along with increased unionization has proven costly. In the past, the pay of municipal workers and school board employees tended to lag in periods when there were rapid advances in wages and salaries paid by industry. That is changing. More government workers are now saying, "We want to get ours along with everybody else".

Cities are extremely vulnerable to this sort of challenge. They cannot shut down operations all at once the way Massey-Ferguson can close a plant if it is struck or losing money, as is the present case in my riding where 900 employees are to be laid off March 1. When you have a period of employee militancy and threats to suspend vital services, you tend to get a rapid increase in salaries.

A second factor in the financial squeeze is the higher costs for equipment and supplies, construction costs and all costs associated with health services. A third factor is the slowdown in the increase of provincial aid available to the cities. This is caused by the fact that the provinces are now themselves up against the wall for the same reasons that the cities find themselves pinched. The provinces have in turn not even been able to pry additional funds out of the federal government, except on a loan basis at high interest rates.

Toronto has had to raise taxes at a fairly rapid clip, but there are limits as to how fast and how far they can go. Called upon to face 43 per cent of the operating costs of all metro, plus the welfare crisis bind, its taxpayers are screaming. Another great problem is that if your taxes go too high, you create more severe economic conditions and consequences, forcing business to move away and forcing the more well-to-do residents out into the suburbs, causing the abandonment of housing by owners as well as tenants. Property taxes are harder on people with low incomes than on those with high incomes, and property owners are discouraged from making improvements for fear of increased assessments. Another bad effect of higher property tax rates is that housing becomes more expensive. Housing is one of the most highly taxed items in our entire revenue system, and you only get credit for such taxes in computing income tax when you rent your property.

While the municipalities are pleading with the higher levels of government to take direct responsibility for financing some vital municipal activities, such as the whole range of welfare services, health care and, to a greater degree than at present, education, they are suddenly stunned by the impact of the federal government's employment policy which has reverberations throughout their structures. And while this government slumbers on these problems and seeks to rush through this House an omnibus bill that will water but not fortify the cabinet, save with respect to salary increases, what is the American government doing to meet a similar but not such severe crisis in the United States.

President Nixon's latest approach to aiding cities and states is based on two concepts: first, special revenue sharing funds or block grants and, second, general revenue sharing. Under President Nixon's program, total aid to state and local governments will increase substantially. It will eliminate 130 existing federal programs by granting money to states and localities for specific, detailed purposes in six areas, education, urban development, transportation, manpower training, rural development and law enforcement. It will turn over $11 billion a year to local governments in the form of annual "block grants" to be spent in these six broad areas with few strings attached. This will do away with a host of grant-in-aid programs that Congress has authorized over the years for dealing with a variety of domestic problems. These existing aid programs will be telescoped into the new block grants. For instance, $2.6 billion will be earmarked for transportation to assist urban mass transit, airport improvement, highway building and beautification and traffic safety and $2 billion will be allocated to such fields as model cities, urban renewal and rehabilitation, sewer and water facilities. The administration will take away $10.4 million in grants-in-aid programs, so that the net federal cost will be $700 million. The whole program should be more efficient than the existing hodgepodge. The administration calls this "special revenue sharing", as distinguished from its "general revenue sharing" plan.

Under general revenue sharing, an entirely new government undertaking, President Nixon has proposed that a fixed percentage of the federal personal income tax should be turned over each year to states and localities for their use, with no strings attached. The president has recommended 1.3 per cent of taxable personal income. This is estimated to provide an additional $5 billion in the first full year of operation, rising to $10 billion by 1980. In a recent message to Congress, the President pointed out that federal aid to the states and localities had grown from less than $1 billion in 1946 to over $30 billion in 1970. So, that is the order of escalation of aid in the United States. Here the local governments are being handed not more money, but loans and escalating problems. Here, the total budget for urban infrastructure for 1971 is a mere $153 million for the whole country.

In past proposals for tax reform, our federal government has systematically refused to present a program that would take into consideration provincial and municipal taxing problems. Such a reform would have permitted provinces and municipalities to have the necessary revenues to meet their current needs. In 1968, 69 local governments in Ontario went into debt by $275 million. That is a sum equal to 20 per cent of total revenue raised from all local sources. It is a stark fact that local governments lack the financial resources to meet present obligations, let alone to assure any additional functions such as welfare services due to high unemployment.

There is a short term solution to this problem, and it is for the federal government to increase its share to the Canada assistance plan in order to alleviate the burden of the municipalities. By refusing to help the provinces, and especially the municipalities, to meet their increased costs, the federal government is shirking its responsibilities. As the government has created unemployment because of its policies, it should at least pay to maintain unemployed employables and their dependants.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ryan: Like 45 per cent of the leaders of Canadian municipalities, Mayor Dennison of Toronto advocates the immediate introduction in Canada of a shared cost emergency employment plan to enable the immediate hiring of employables for work on worthwhile projects. He says that in Toronto's situation, which has 41.5 per cent of Metro's welfare applicants, even the hiring of a few hundred men for the next few months for useful work would have a snowballing effect on employment, help his city's economy generally and keep his taxes down. In addition, necessary projects could be completed. He suggests a cost-sharing formula of 50 per cent federal, 25 per cent provincial and 25 per cent municipal. This would, in effect, have the higher levels of government pay the labour content and the municipalities the material content.

The emergency implementation of such a program would be heartily welcomed by the city fathers, by myself and, even more, by the thousands of hard-pressed homeowners and small businessmen in the core of downtown Toronto who will otherwise bear the whole brunt of this crisis in their next year's tax bills. A federal loan for the project of $1,600 million at the rate, as of March 1, of 6.79 per cent is not the answer. The city will have to repay the whole of the loan, plus the interest, which adds insult to injury. It must be apparent to the Prime Minister that if grants have to be paid from income taxes so, too, do loans, and that the repayment of the latter will not only unquestionably have to come from the taxpayers of Toronto, but will be much more onerous by reason of the interest charges which will be additionally payable. Furthermore, the income tax spread or collection base is from all of Metro and from every taxpayer, and not just the property owners of Toronto. In the last budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), provision was made for a $17 million loan to Metro Toronto. Nothing was made available directly to the city of Toronto. The entire sum was to go to Metropolitan Toronto.

I sincerely hope that all hon. members from Metro ridings who continue to support the government, although with less and less enthusiasm with every passing day, will urge the government to try to remedy the huge blunder it has made in mismanaging the economy of the country by being helpful to Mayor Dennison and Chairman Campbell when they come to Ottawa. Even charity begins at home, but their requests are not charity; rather they are justice.

The care and attention lavished on the states and localities of the United States is in stark contrast to the degree of consulation and assistance to the local governments in Canada. Not only is an urban council and an environment council needed here, but so is a financial and economics council meeting quarterly, so that all levels of government will know the current situation and be in a position to assist with economic planning. I dare say that if such a council had been operative over the last few years, this current unemployment and welfare crisis would not be upon us. Britain is a unitary state and is just as aware of its municipal problems as of its foreign affairs; but over here no way is open to us, unless the federal government seeks agreement with the other levels of government. This it has a duty to do in a federated state.

I know that the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Andras), responsible for housing and urban affairs, has had his hands full with housing problems and has been doing a job in respect of them; but he has been seriously neglecting his responsibility for urban affairs. It is time that he turned his attention to some innovative short and long term solutions to the problems that we are dealing with in this debate today. I urge him to go to the United States, over to Britain and mainland Europe and learn from their experience.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member. I must interrupt him at this point to bring to his attention that, pursuant to the agreement put forward and adopted earlier today, his time has expired. He may continue if he has the unanimous consent of the House. Does the hon. member have that unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Ryan: I urge him to make these visits to foreign lands and not let constitutional hangups trouble him too much. Practically everything he will want to do can be done by agreement among the three levels of government and be perfectly constitutional, despite the weird and wonderful world of the Prime Minister. Where there is a will, there is a way, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Kaplan) seeks the right to ask a question of the hon. member. As the hon. member's time has expired, this can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House.

Alleged Non-Support of Employment Programs

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There does not appear to be unanimous consent.

Consequently the Chair now recognizes the hon. member for Villeneuve.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I represent Témiscamingue riding and not Villeneuve.

In any case, I wish to express my sincere thanks to my colleague from Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) who has given me the opportunity to speak ahead of him this afternoon. This courtesy does him credit and shows that in the House of Commons, whatever our political ideas, it is always possible to help one another from time to time. So I am grateful to him for having provided me with this opportunity.

The non-confidence motion moved by the official opposition holds nothing new. This leads me to say that identical causes generally produce identical results.

We could have read exactly the same non-confidence motion in 1961 when the country was administered by a Progressive Conservative government. In fact, there was in Canada one million unemployed at that time, and we could have read, and I quote:

That this House condemns the——Progressive Conservative—

—government's failure to foresee and take steps to provide for the escalating effects of its unemployment policy upon the social assistance funds of the provinces and municipalities and its failure to consult and co-operate with the provinces and municipalities in providing emergency financial support and employment programs.

Mr. Speaker, if, at that time, the Progressive Conservative government had taken the measures required to correct the situation, we would probably not have to face the present problem. At any rate, it is obvious that the No. 1 problem in Canada is unemployment, the consequence of which is poverty.

While the government attempts to fight unemployment and restore some measure of prosperity in Canada, there is not a single day when we cannot read in a newspaper, hear over television or radio that such or such an industry is in the process of closing down or curtailing production.

Here is a recent example: Massey-Ferguson has announced that 2,750 employees will be laid off, supposedly because it has too much equipment. In the textile, footwear, clothing, automobile industries, in short in every field, there is talk of lay offs, because sales are lagging.

In the lumber industry, the closing down of plywood and other plants is being considered because there is overproduction and the surpluses cannot be sold.

Let us see what is going on in the mining industry. In my own area, within a few weeks the Wasamac gold mine will lay off 350 employees. And this morning, I got a telephone call from the unemployment insurance office in Rouyn advising me that the Molybdenite mine of Lacorne will be laying off 180 people next week-end.

The Cadillac Moly mine has already closed down. Industries are folding up while the government sets up new departments to fight unemployment. What a joke! The more talk there is of fighting unemployment, the more unemployment is allowed to grow. New departments, such as the Department of the Environment, are set up to co-ordinate the activities of all other departments. There is a proposal to create the Canada Development Corporation in order to promote new industries while we cannot use what our industry, our farmers for instance, can produce. Why? Because no valid solution is brought forward.

And when we get a day such as today to set out our suggestions, we realize the lack of interest for a matter as fundamental as this one not only among members of Parliament but also among newsmen always looking for scandals and sensational news. A look at the press gallery is enough to note that there is only one man there and he is probably from the Canadian Press. There is no representative of the press nor of the CBC. When we deal with serious matters and can suggest solutions, nobody is there to hear us.

If we had announced this morning that we would discuss the trial of Paul Rose in Montreal, the gallery would be full to hear us speak about it. When we refer to economic solutions to problems now confronting us, the gallery is empty. Mr. Speaker, it is shocking to see the behaviour of those people who claim that they inform the Canadian people. They took off as soon as we began discussing this non-confidence motion.

Mr. Speaker, the Créditistes tell the government once again that its solutions are ineffective. The government is not using the right means to solve the unemployment crisis. There is talk of increasing the purchasing power of the people. I read recently in Le Petit Journal of Montreal the following editorial signed by Mr. Maurice Roy, which I quote:

• (3:40 p.m.)

A shower of dollars.

The sixth part of the report of the inquiry commission on health and welfare recommends the payment of a guaranteed minimum income to all citizens, if Quebec succeeds in retrieving from Ottawa the income security systems.

In short, this is social credit in disguise.

It is not I who wrote that, but Mr. Maurice Roy. I keep on quoting:

The same proposal, advocated for a long time by Mr. Réal Caouette, was considered utopic. One must try to understand now why granting $2,000 to single persons and $3,400 to married couples is not utopic anymore. By the way, let me remind you that Réal Caouette has never cost as much to taxpayers as the works of the health and welfare commission. Learned economists suggest that the payment of a guaranteed income would contribute to the stimulation of economy.

For the past thirty years now, we have been suggesting an increase in the purchasing power of Canadians, so as to stimulate the Canadian economy. The economists as well as the government said that we were preaching something utopian. And now, they do recognize the fact that a yearly guaranteed income would contribute to stimulate the economy.

I go on with my quotation:

Maybe but on the condition that money should be properly spent. Would this shower of dollars on people help them to work? Maybe but at the present time, many recipients would rather stay home because it is paying off.

Given all these problems, a second enquiry commission will probably have to be appointed in order to implement the recommendations of the first one.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Maurice Roy indicates that this is social credit in disguise because the proposals of the commission tend to apply measures aimed at taking money from the wealthy in order to give it to the destitute, which is exactly contrary to social credit.

What does the social credit advocate? The party advocates a minimum vital requirement, which is the annual guaranteed income, not to be taken from the pockets of those who do own something, but to be provided by Canada's immense resources, by resorting to the funds of the Bank of Canada, by setting up the funds required just as the people of Canada are able to create goods and services in Canada. To the same extent that Canadians are able to develop their country, it is the government's duty to use the services of our financial institution called the Bank of Canada.

We would then respect the assets of those who have something, and would deprive none. Canada can afford to give something to everyone. It is a fact that the population as a whole, besides spending its whole income, the national annual income, is indebted to finance companies by $12 billion. Why? Because Canadians do not have the purchasing power required to acquire existing products. Why are factories closing down? The management of Massey-Ferguson gave us the answer: We have too many machines, they said. Do we have too many machines? Do we have too much farm equipment or unsufficient consumption? Let us find out from the farmers in Western Canada, in the central provinces, in the province of Quebec and in the Maritimes! If these people have all the farm equipment they need for their work, we will get an extraordinary market. Massey-Ferguson would have twice as many employees if they could sell the farm equipment they produce. What should the government do to solve the problem of lay-offs, of unemployment, of misery and so on? Several times we made proposals in the House.

We request, for instance, that all married persons with an annual income under $5,000 be exempt from income tax. We request the same for single people earning less than $3,000 a year.

When we ask that old age security pensions, widow pensions and disability pensions be increased to a minimum of $150 a month, we shall be put down again for utopians, although this is only the way to increase the consumer's purchasing power.

When we request the establishment of students' salary, not a program to get them into debt or to abet laziness, but a program to assist effectively those who want to study and do somehing in life, we suggest that this is a right similar to any worker's, provided of course they are seriously interested in getting their degrees.

So we suggest that a salary be paid to students. We are a nation where freedom exists. I have seen Communist countries where students are paid salaries, the University of Moscow, for one. In fact, I was in Moscow with my good friend, the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Cyr), and we talked to students. They were not being paid much, no, but just the same they were getting $30 a month. This kind of money in Russia amounts to quite a substantial sum when one considers that workers are getting only $45 or $55 a week.

Similar legislation would help our young people get a training and take active part in building up a well-balanced society. They would no longer dream of overthrowing this society of ours because they would feel capable of being integrated into it. Our young people would have more faith in the future.

Another point I want to insist upon is the national dividend. The reaction is always the same: it would promote laziness and create inflation. Still, we never had any national dividend nor any social credit administration and look at the kind of inflation we can get into!

One year ago, for the purpose of fighting infiation, the government authorized the Bank of Canada to raise its interest rate. So chartered banks followed suit and interest rates skyrocketed.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) then replied "This will help fight inflation, what does it matter if unemployment results". Naturally, unemployment resulted. There was a smothered uprising in Quebec. There is protest throughout Canada. Even in British Columbia youth are revolting against the system. Then the Prime Minister wakes up and says that to fight unemployment they will cut interest rates. So they lower interest rates to reduce unemployment, so they say, and they create more inflation because the system is basically inflationary.

They fool the population year after year. Thanks to a few billion dollars, we will probably create jobs in the spring and then call an election to make the people believe that the government has finally managed to lick unemployment, even if it should mean more unemployed next fall.

We speak of a national dividend, not to create inflation but to balance the purchasing power of the Canadian people with the goods available in Canada. We are told that the gross national product will be of $90 billion this year, and that the Canadians will earn about $65 billion. There will be a gap of $25 billion between what the people produce and what they earn. We want to balance the purchasing power with present production, in goods and services.

Mr. Speaker, I have repeatedly suggested that this solution be tried out. Let us not adopt the monthly dividend right now, in order not to make a mistake. However, I ask the government to try and apply our solutions.

The government should direct the Bank of Canada to distribute forthwith to each Canadian citizen, man, woman or child, the sum of $100. That would be a distribution of purchasing power not affecting prices and directly originating from the Bank of Canada. The money supply would be increased by 2.1 billion dollars. A family of 10 persons would get $1,000; a family of 5 would receive $500; a family of 2 would have $200, and a bachelor would get $100. It would not take more than two months to bring about a change in this country.

If the people have a greater purchasing power at their disposal, they will empty the shelves in stores. Merchants will go and get products from industries. If industries sell their products, they will hire unemployed people to increase their production. We will then, thanks to the consumers, have efficiently fought unemployment in Canada.

We would not hear then that Massey-Ferguson has laid off 2,750 employees. We would not hear about the closing down of sawmills, textile plants and others.

There will always be some other problems to solve. We agree. The problem lies in the lack of purchasing power.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) has spoken about the over-production of milk, for example, in the province of Quebec; he maintains that our dairy industry produces too much and that dairy producers must be penalized if they exceed their quota.

Mr. Speaker, that is a big lie spoken to the people of Canada. I know families in Montreal and in my own riding, and also in Hull-and there may be some in Ottawa who would need seven, eight or maybe even ten quarts of milk a day for their children. But they can only afford one or two each day. And we are being told that there is an over-production of milk.

Mr. Speaker, the problem in our country is under-production of milk, clothing, farm machinery and automobiles.

Mr. Speaker: May I interrupt the hon. member to remind him and the House that he has run out of time, under the order adopted by the House earlier today.

The hon. member may, of course, carry on with his remarks, provided there is unanimous agreement by the House.

An hon. Member: Agreed.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank my hon. colleagues, and I shall not take up any longer the time of the House.

I would like to suggest again to the government that Social Credit has been derided, ridiculed, but that, today, we are confronted by the serious problem of poverty and increased unemployment in Canada, problem likely to lead to chaos, to discontent and rebellion, not only in Quebec, but throughout the country.

That is why I seriously urge the government to consider the situation, keeping in mind the proposals of Social Credit. Let us try them, and if these solutions prove inefficient, let us put them aside. But if they should prove effective, we shall all turn Créditistes!

[English]

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, we are debating the very serious financial position of most of the cities of Canada and the provinces because of the tremendous increase in the cost of welfare today. This, in turn, has been brought about by the unprecedented increase this last year in the number of people unemployed in Canada. The figures we received earlier this month indicated that 668,000 people were unemployed in January, 1971. If one adds the 100,000 people attending manpower training courses, one sees that over three-quarters of a million people are in fact unemployed.

The seasonally adjusted percentage of unemployed in January was 6.2 per cent. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) took pride in, and were happy with, the fact that the seasonally adjusted rate had come down. Only a government headed by a millionaire, by a man who has never had to worry about where his next meal would come from, a government headed by a man who did not have to worry about how to finance his next trip to a distant part of this world, could take pride in and be happy with a statistic such as that. Only a government that played the numbers game could ignore the tremendously difficult, indeed traumatic conditions faced by so many people in this country.

I talked this morning to some of the people in the public welfare department in the city of Winnipeg, and let me make it clear that, compared to some areas in Canada, Winnipeg is doing quite well. I heard over the radio a couple of days ago an interview with the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané). He talked, and talked much more eloquently than I could, about the situation in his constituency, where in most of the towns 30 per cent of the people were on welfare and in the rural areas 50 per cent were on welfare. This is not the case in the city of Winnipeg, but I should like to put on the record a few illustrations of the kinds of problems the city has had to meet and the kind of people to whom the city has had to render assistance in the past year as a result of the tremendous increase in unemployment.

Before I do that, I do want to make it clear once more, as I have in the past, that these three-quarters of a million unemployed did not result from an accident but rather from a deliberate plan by the government, as enunciated by no less a person than the Prime Minister. Last year, in answer to a question about how determined he was in his attempts to beat the rising cost of living, the Prime Minister said he would not be deterred even if we had to have 6 per cent unemployment, he would not curtail his program of restraint because inflation had to be overcome. We now have 8 per cent unemployment, and it is this which has given rise to the problem that I am going to refer to in a moment.

The city of Winnipeg has had for several years a supplementary welfare plan. In cases where a man is working full time but has a large family, or where illness strikes a family, or in cases where because of lack of qualifications the wage earned is insufficient to meet the needs of the family, the city of Winnipeg supplements welfare assistance. I should like to cite the case of a married man with seven children who had worked in a plant for a number of years. His education was not very good and he was unable to get a better job, so the city supplemented his earnings to the extent of somewhere between $50 and $100 a month. The plant, like so many other plants, was experiencing difficult times and had to lay off this man. As a result, today the city is paying the full cost of welfare for the family, which amounts to something in the neighbourhood of $400 a month.

Then, there is the case of a family of five. The husband had no formal skills but through his work had gained experience as a cook. As long as he was working he was able to manage, but when he was laid off he was unable to find another job as a cook. He has been doing casual work, such as driving a taxi, but he has not been able to earn enough money to keep his family, so the city paid him supplementary welfare.

My third case is that of a young man who is putting himself through university, something that the country has been urging our young people to do in order to improve their educational qualifications. He is now in the third year of his bachelor of science course and he has helped maintain himself by part time work during the school year and by working full time in the summer as a clerk. Recently he was laid off. He has been unable to get any part time work, so is now receiving welfare assistance from the city of Winnipeg. To his consternation, he finds that when he tries to get the only kind of job available, that is an usnkilled job, he is told that he is over-trained. This man is married and has six children. He was in the air force and was trained as an air controller. He was honourably discharged because of a mild case of epilepsy. He took a job with the Department of Transport for some time and was then laid off. He accepted the advice of the government of Canada and arranged to take a course in business administration at the Red River Community College. This is a man who has been fairly well trained in two skills, but he cannot get a job at the present time. He is unemployed and the city of Winnipeg is paying the necessary amount of welfare to keep the family.

I could duplicate this sort of example in respect of individuals in every city in Canada. On Saturday, January 30, there was a full page article in the Toronto Star dealing with a woman who lives in Don Mills. I am sorry that the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Kaplan) is not here, although I think he tried to ask a question about this. He does not have much personal experience in respect of unemployment problems, but he should read this newspaper article. It refers to a woman who is a trained nurse. Unfortunately, because she was trained in Scotland, she is unable to work as a nurse in Canada.

She is a highly skilled secretary. She quit work two and a half years ago in order to have an operation. After she could go back to work she got another job, but did not get along with her employer so she made another change. She was doing fine but, as a result of a severe slow down was laid off. Much to that woman's consternation, she has had to apply to metropolitan Toronto for welfare.

This is the kind of situation which exists in every town and city of this country, as a result of the deliberate policy of this government to slow down the economy. The government has completely ignored this kind of situation. Let us look at what has happened in other cities in Canada. It is interesting to note the absence from this Chamber of hon. members from the metropolitan Toronto area. I must amend that statement because I see two out of some 22 are here. They were not absent when the mayor of Toronto wanted to meet with them to discuss their problems, but they are certainly absent today.

Last year the cost of welfare in metropolitan Toronto was $50 million. It is estimated that in 1971 this cost will increase to $75 million. It is true that the city of Toronto only pays 20 per cent of the cost, but even that means that the taxpayers of metropolitan Toronto paid $10 million in welfare costs last year and will pay $15 million this year. This will have a bearing on their tax rate. In metropolitan Toronto there were 14,800 welfare cases up to December of 1969. This figure for December, 1970 was up to 24,200. Is it any wonder that the people in Toronto, including the mayor and the members of the council, are concerned about what is happening in that city?

In the city of Winnipeg, the cost of welfare in 1969 was $3,900,000. In 1970, the cost was $5 million, and the estimated cost for 1971 is $6 million. In Halifax, the cost of welfare has increased from $833,000 in 1969 to an estimated $1,265,000 in 1971. In Hamilton, this cost has increased from $1,265,000 in 1969 to an estimate of almost $2,500,000 in 1971. In Windsor, the cost has gone up from $1,600,000 in 1969 to $2,270,000 in 1970. In Vancouver, it has increased from $3,500,000 in 1968 to $6,115,000 in 1970. So it goes, Mr. Speaker, from city to city and from province to province. The cost to the federal government under the provisions of the various social allowance acts is increasing at an astronomical rate.

In 1970 the federal government paid the province of Quebec $146 million; the province of Ontario, $158 million and according to estimates made by the federal government, in 1971 payments to the province of Ontario will increase from $158 million to $198 million and the payments to Quebec will increase from $146 million to $238 million. I wish the minister were here in order that he might correct these figures if I am wrong. This is what is happening in the provinces and in the cities as a result of the economic policies adopted coldbloodedly and deliberately by this government. It is no wonder the provinces and cities are calling on the federal government to take action. After all, it was not the provinces or the cities that created this unemployment, but the federal government. Therefore, it is the federal government which ought to accept the responsibility of providing the necessary money to meet the increased cost of welfare created by the rapidly rising unemployment rate.

Alleged Non-Support of Employment Programs

Very shortly we will be dealing with major amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. The white paper prepared by the government proposes certain amendments on the basis that when unemployment rises above 4 per cent the unemployment insurance fund will not be required to meet the claims of those who are unemployed and are entitled to unemployment insurance. The federal government makes it clear that this country should not have more than 4 per cent unemployment. The white paper suggests that the federal government will pay out of its general revenues the unemployment insurance benefits required in relation to those people unemployed when unemployment is over the 4 per cent figure. I reject this 4 per cent figure. I recognize the fact that in this country we have cold weather which brings tremendous problems in some areas. We have problems in Ottawa because of the inordinate amount of snow. We cannot expect full employment such as is enjoyed in some European countries. In my opinion, full employment in Canada means not more than 3 per cent unemployed. Let us accept the 4 per cent figure suggested by the government as being a fair proposal in respect of unemployment insurance benefits.

Let us assume for the moment that when unemployment is at 4 per cent, it can be considered to be a period of full employment. I suggest to the government that if, for the purpose of discussing a sensible financing and funding of unemployment insurance, the government of Canada said that 4 per cent unemployment is full employment and that over and above that it will carry the burden, then the government could well, and in fact should, adopt the the same principle in connection with the costs of welfare. The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Ryan) puts the figure at 3 per cent, and I agree with him. I know it is unlikely that the government will listen to my plea that they use the 4 per cent figure, so I am certain they would not listen to my plea that they use the 3 per cent figure. But certainly, there is no reason why the government should not adopt the principle that when unemployment is more than 4 per cent the government will carry the major burden or even the entire burden of the welfare costs which result from this inordinately large amount of unemployment.

I believe that to be a fair proposal. I believe that the cities of Canada cannot continue to carry the burden of the tremendous increase in welfare costs which we have seen in every city in Canada in the past two or three years. I believe that unemployment has been created to a large extent by the government of Canada, and I think the government should act now. Therefore, I want to move an amendment to the motion moved by the hon. member for Spadina.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert):

That the motion be amended by inserting therein, immediately after the words "emergency financial support," the words "including an increase in the federal government's share of costs under the Canada Assistance Plan from 50 to 65 per cent".

Alleged Non-Support of Employment Programs

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): I often wonder what has turned the fortunes of this government that they depend upon me to defend their policies.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You may have to take over yet.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): This is an act of desperation.

Mr. Otto: I do not think it is as much desperation as an acknowledgement of my seniority. I have lasted here for eight, almost nine years. I do not have so much difficulty with the amendment to the motion as with the motion itself. I wonder if the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) could put us straight. Is it that the Progressive Conservative party believes that under the old constitution there could be direct dealings between the federal government and the municipalities? I have no objection to this, but I think the Tories should stand up and say so if that is what they believe. They should say so to Quebec, to the Maritimes, to British Columbia and to all the other provinces. Then, they should tell us which municipalities will be included in this entente between the federal government and the municipalities, and which ones will be excluded.

It seems to me that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) dealt with this suggestion quite some time ago and the provincial premiers discussed it at some length. I was under the impression that this entente, this position of the municipalities, would not be appreciated by the provinces. I understand the provinces insist, even under the amended constitution, that the federal government deal with the provinces which will, in turn, deal with the municipalities. It was not too long ago that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) announced that $150 million would go to the provinces for new projects which will employ people.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): As loans.

Mr. Otto: The hon. member seems to indicate that if it is a loan it comes from a different pocket, from a strange Martian pocket. Taxes come from the same pocket. It does not matter whether it is a loan to be repaid or a grant to be repaid.

Mr. Orlikow: Tell that to the people of Toronto.

Mr. Otto: I am saying it to the people of Toronto and to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) as well. Of the $150 million allocated, $17 million or so went to Ontario of which not one penny, as of noon today, has been requested. Do not blame the federal government for not forcing this money upon them; that just does not make sense. I have here one news comment to the effect that the city of Toronto is very anxious to employ its people and that it has accepted bids for manhole covers. It is not much of a contract, only $51,000. A Hamilton firm's bid was $54 lower than that of a Toronto firm, one tenth of one per cent less. The city of Toronto accepted the Hamilton bid, and as a result 36 people were laid off from the Toronto company.

If municipalities are going to make pleas to the federal government for support, these pleas should make some sense and should be explained to the people. I have no objection to them asking for $1,700,000, but when that money will only create 111 jobs for 30 weeks then I should point out that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) is doing a better job. He is offering $2,000 to $5,000 per job. This government would be expected to offer $17,000 per job. Again, I am not exonerating the federal government. In fact, I blame this government for its acceptance of conventional thinking. The government said, we are against inflation and therefore we are for restriction. If anyone said that he did not want restriction and why did the government not try expansion, the government would immediately say he was for inflation. I do not agree with that type of thinking, and many of us do not. However, Mr. Young does, and unfortunately there is some talk of Mr. Young continuing. I hope he does not because his mind is fixed on restriction. That is conventional thinking and that is what has led us to this position. The least we can do for this country is examine what happened a year ago.

I regret very much that the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Ryan) did not introduce a motion asking this House for new ideas. Never mind what happened yesterday or the year before, that will not put people back to work. Here is the city of Toronto and other municipalities going back to conventional thinking and producing winter works projects. Anyone who assesses the contracts—and I have been in this business long enough to know—would find that at least half of that money, probably 60 per cent of the money which is spent on public works, goes into the purchase and manufacture of machinery. On an $800,000 job, for instance, the total number of men employed might be eight, four on the front job and four on the back. The project might require two $120,000 machines which are made in the United States. All heavy construction equipment is made in the United States. This type of project, therefore, indicates the conventional type of thinking that municipalities still have. When conventional thinking got us into trouble, believe me conventional thinking is not going to get us out of trouble.

The municipalities could be doing a great deal by planning ahead. It is all too easy for the municipalities to carry on year after year with their projects, making no differentiation between programs with a high labour content and programs using machinery. By doing this, they land themselves into trouble. But many municipalities in British Columbia have overcome this problem by a little forward planning. They had planned certain projects which had a high labour content and did not depend on the federal government to make plans in the event of a cyclical downturn in the economy. They knew this was coming so they planned their projects, and the minute a loan scheme such as this came out they were ready. So was Quebec; but not Ontario, and not Toronto. They had no special projects planned.

Mr. Ryan: Metro has a $5 million one.

Mr. Otto: Yes, but the only other one I have a record of is this $1,700,000 project, most of which will be spent on equipment. It will put only 111 people to work.

There are other ways in which cities could do a great deal. They could overlook the restrictions they have imposed on employment. I am speaking of the requirements they have imposed whereby for the past four or five years a job must be done by a licensed repairman or a licensed fence mender. All these groups have managed to get themselves into a nice little corner. Only one person can build a fence around a house; only one group of people can put up an addition to a house; only one person can paint. That person has to be a member of the Metropolitan Home Repair Association and he must have a licence. There are many people who could undertake jobs now if the cities would only relax some of these restrictions.

Most important of all, Mr. Speaker, a municipality can be very influential in exuding confidence throughout industry. Let us say we are talking about winter works projects. The city of Toronto knows it is going to put in the Gardiner extension, as well as other highways. It could immediately ask for tenders for the material only. Inside two or three days it could get the tender prices and then say to the manufacturers of the pipes, the conduits, the manhole covers and the light standards, "You have yourself a job; start building up inventory." The only person who is going to solve this immediate problem of unemployment is the manufacturer. He is the one who must be given confidence to build up inventory. As soon as he is confident that he will sell his inventory he will rehire 15 or 20 people, or he will not lay-off the workers he planned to lay-off. The manufacturers are the ones who can solve the immediate problem, and it is the municipalities which can contact the manufacturers. This is the type of thing I would have liked to have seen recommended in this motion.

If we spend the rest of the day hashing over what has happened, crucifying the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), making him beat his chest and say "I am sorry", we will achieve nothing. We want ideas on how to get people back to work, and on how the municipalities can assist.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, there is no better description of the lack of regard for the disadvantaged citizens of our nation than the wording of this motion. I should like to quote that part:

> —the government's failure to foresee and take steps to provide for the escalating effects of its unemployment policy upon the social assistance funds of the provinces and municipalities and its failure to consult and co-operate with the provinces and municipalites in providing emergency financal support and employment programs.

The tragedy is that the people affected are those who cannot do anything about it, the poor. There are over 4 million of our citizens, out of a population of 21½ million, who continue to suffer more and more each day because the government, which is supposed to be concerned, took a deliberate line of attack against inflation in order to achieve an objective which it thinks is in the best interests of the country. It is awfully difficult for me to understand how any group of individuals, whether they be government or any other interested group of Canadians can, by design, treat individuals in such a cold-blooded fashion. The state must provide the opportunity for these human beings to earn a decent livelihood, not only because it is the duty of the state but because it is the responsibility of an elected body to govern to the best advantage of all citizens.

I have tried, during the short time I have been here as a Member of Parliament, to be reasonable in recognizing the difficulties which any government must encounter in facing the problems of a growing nation. But sooner or later, one must also recognize that even though all decisions cannot satisfy the majority, and at times must be unpopular to many, those in power have a duty to every citizen, not only to those who can provide for themselves but also to those who cannot. Let us forget politics for a few moments. Let us just consider the facts, even without going into the DBS figures which seem to be the basis of debate in the House of Commons.

This great Canadian nation, with natural resources which are the envy of the world, with wealth in minerals, in oil, in our forests and in our seas, elected a government charged with the responsibility of governing 21½ million people. Our population is not even big enough to take advantage of our wealth in resources, and yet this government, which has had the help of the greatest experts in science and technology, allows almost a quarter of our population to remain living below the poverty line. This government of ours governs by words. It governs by Speeches from the Throne. It governs by promises of things to come, and it has grandiose proclamations.

Members of the government have said, and I quote:

> We must ensure that every Canadian regardless of where he lives must have equality of opportunity... It is our duty to look after the poor and the disadvantaged... We will never succeed in our aims unless everyone—even those at the grass roots level become involved and participate in government—

What has happened since 1968? The cost of living keeps increasing; more people become unemployed; the weak get weaker, and with the policies of the government even the strong deteriorate in strength.

If I can mention my short experience here in this House and go back to 1968, it is not too difficult to recall the promises that were made by the government to help the disadvantaged. But here we are in 1971, and all the government has done has been to appoint study committees and royal commissions to find out what is wrong in Canada. In 1968 the Economic Council published a mountainous report on poverty in Canada and came up with the startling conclusion that poverty was real. What has happened since then? After three years, the government has come up with a white paper on social security. The other day one professor said it was a white paper on the insecurity of income security. Now, with a big kind heart, the government has agreed to increase old age pensions by 42 cents. It is true the guaranteed income supplement will be more generous, but even then if two old age pensioners happen to be living together to enjoy their remaining years with a little comfort, $15 will be taken away from them because the masterminds looked into a computer and discovered that two can live more cheaply than one. All people in this country, including the poor, are now aware of the proper nourishment a body needs in order to exist. Yet, this government continues to have studies and establish commissions.

The Senate Committee on Poverty travelled across this country finding out about the poor. Where is its report? Now, a nutritional study is being carried out across the nation. The government even paid some $70,000 to allow the poor to hold a conference. I ask, what purpose is this serving? We know what the poverty line figure is. We know the cost of proper food and nourishment. We should know that those who are sick and disabled require a little more help. We know we must help the blind and the retarded. We are aware that our poorer children require dental care and proper vitamins. We know the deaf need hearing aids. We know that the poor people of our country live in deteriorated housing. Yet, we continue to study more. It is not too difficult to see the reasoning. These are nothing but delaying tactics. The government hopes that one day it will wake up and find that the problem has disappeared. This problem will not go away; it will remain with us. It is becoming worse every hour of the day just as surely as the cost of living is increasing every day. Strangely enough this government has all the answers to the problems of other countries.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) tours the foreign countries and tells them what is wrong and how to solve their problems. We must help feed the hungry of the world. We do, thank God, and we should. We must help develop the poorer nations of the world. We do. We pour millions of dollars into the developing countries. We teach and help other nations to grow wheat and then we pay our farmers in the west not to grow wheat. When it comes to helping the poverty stricken of our own country, the stock answer is that if we are to provide more help for the disadvantaged taxes must be increased. This is a lot of hogwash.

What are the latest developments? The government held a conference with the provincial ministers who presented briefs outlining their problems. What will happen now? The government will consider the proposals of the provinces and then have new consultations. Another meeting is planned for June. What then? There will be more consultations and they will have to await a further study to study the previous studies. Around the circle they will go.

Just a few days ago the minister advised that there are inequities in the cutoff point for family allowances. This will mean further delays. The government has found a new phrase, "the tapering mechanism" which will reduce injustices in respect of those having large families and an income of over $10,000. How is it that this injustice was discovered only after the white paper had been produced? Where were the experts when these consultations were taking place?

Again, those to whom our masterful programs are directed will continue to suffer and their children will remain undeveloped as a fourth generation on welfare. What about our programs to produce employment opportunities in Canada? We sit here and legislate loan programs to help regional disparity in the provinces. These are some of the programs: There is the fisheries improvement loans legislation, the farm improvement loans legislation and the farm credit corporations of the provinces. Then, we have the small business loans and the industrial development banks. What affect have these programs had on the employment situation in Canada? Now, we have the regional development incentive grants and every day we hear reports concerning how many jobs are to be created. This great program has been in effect for almost two years. What is the result? In the Atlantic provinces, especially in Newfoundland, there is a study to see why this program is not working. It is not working because it is directed to the wrong people.

If the government wishes to conduct a proper survey to find out why these programs are failing, why does it not interview the people who have tried to obtain some of these loans, such as small businessmen who have initiative and knowledge concerning the natural resources in their areas? The government does not do this because it has no faith in the initiative and capability of its people. What is required is a little faith in Canadians. Why should we not invest some risk capital in Canadians who could start small industries related to natural resources. This would create employment opportunities across this country which would benefit the country. All that results is frustration, disillusionment and unemployment, which keeps rising day by day. A tragedy exists today in Canada in that one-fifth of our population requires help. I do not refer to help in the sense of words and fancy phrases, but rather help in the form of human consideration and immediate action to find the moneys required to overcome this tragedy.

I can only repeat, and remind everyone in this House, that thousands of human beings across this nation, both young and old, are suffering from undernourishment, lack of medical services and in a large number of cases, hunger. It is our duty to prevent this tragedy continuing. This will not be done while present conditions exist. I know the minister is concerned, and I know he has had difficulty in persuading the members of his cabinet to accept some of his recommendations. I urge him to continue his efforts in order to help the poverty stricken people in our country.

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I regret that the House has chosen a motion such as this on which to spend an afternoon and evening because it is the type of motion that really cannot get us anywhere. If the government has done all the nasty things the motion claims, then surely to God we should hear what it should do so that we can get on with our business. If the government has not done all the nasty things, we will not get any further ahead in any event. So, I suggest it is kind of a nothing motion. I do not want anyone to pick me up and suggest I am heartless about unemployment and do not give a damn. That is not the type of approach I am taking. The point is there is a real problem and people must search for real answers. If we are to receive help from members of the House, surely when there is an opportunity to present a motion which would bring about a really substantial debate on a really substantial and tough issue, opposition members could come up with something a little more promising than this.

I completely sympathize with the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall). When I get a little further along in my remarks I believe he will see that he and I have a little in common. I wish, however, there was some evidence that the recognition of a common problem would start to bring forward some common solutions. It is a funny thing that the government is condemned for lack of foresight here when it seems to me a year ago when inflation was the so-called enemy, we were telling the provinces and the municipalities that if they did not co-operate with us inflation would be prolonged and the fight would become more difficult. Yet, the provinces and the municipalities went along their merry way and kept the fires stoked, so here we are.

An hon. Member: People were starving.

Mr. Osler: No one was starving then any more than now. There is a difference between starving and being out of work. Very few people are starving, thanks to things such as the welfare schemes and so on.

An hon. Member: Who is to pay the welfare costs?

Mr. Osler: Listen awhile and you might learn something. Anyway, a year ago the government tried, without very sound results, to get the provinces and the municipalities to co-operate. I seem to recall that one member on this side spoke of a province that has failed, for its own reasons, to co-operate with the federal government, which is trying to help in the unemployment situation. Nevertheless, I say that when the premier of my province, whom I admire personally, stepped off an aircraft after returning from the Federal-Provincial Conference a little while ago and said that the federal government is doing absolutely nothing to help Manitoba to fight unemployment, there is only one word that can describe his attitude. With all respect to the Premier of Manitoba, his statement is absolute "balls".

• (4:40 p.m.)

An hon. Member: What is that?

Mr. Osler: Balls; absolute balls.

Mr. Gilbert: That is another four letter word.

Mr. Osler: As long ago as June, the federal government stepped up the transfer of tax revenues to the provinces. Manitoba got $12.5 million. Later, an extra $23.4 million was made available for vocational and training schools. The province does not have to spend that money on schools until 1975; in the meantime, it can spend it on any damn thing it likes in the fight against unemployment. In addition, the province obtained $8 million out of a $160 million loan set aside for the creation of projects to fight unemployment. How our Premier of Manitoba can argue in Winnipeg that we are doing nothing to help my province in the fight against unemployment, I do not know. When he says that the federal government has done nothing to help the people of Manitoba, that is, just as I said before, "balls".

Mr. Gilbert: There it is again.

Mr. Osler: Yes. I hope the hon. member can spell the word.

Mr. Gilbert: There seems to be a great shortage of vocabulary around here.

An hon. Member: That vocabulary is being expanded.

Mr. Osler: Perhaps the hon. member's vocabulary is being expanded these days. In any event, it is nice to see the hon. member's education being furthered. It has been suggested that the government is doing nothing in the field of social assistance. It is my understanding that the federal government pays approximately half of almost all social assistance costs, and it certainly pays all of the unemployment insurance costs. The benefits of these have been raised by 10 per cent and will be raised considerably more as soon as the House will let us get on with the job. In any case, the federal government has made available loans and grants for provincial and municipal use, as everybody knows, including the Premier of Manitoba. It does not help when the premier of my province goes around saying that nobody is doing anything to help his province, when in fact the reverse is true. All indications show that our present situation is improving. On the other hand, it will not improve much more quickly, no matter what anyone does in a panicky way in trying to accelerate the improvement.

The thing that disturbs me is this. This is an allotted day for the opposition. The opposition has sufficient money with which, presumably, to employ competent research assistants. Surely, it could really examine the situation and come up with something worth while. We do not need to know the details of any opposition proposals; that would be against the game. It is the opposition's privilege to wait until it goes to the people to say how it would go about solving this problem. All we want are the broad brush strokes of suggestions; we want to know how they think some of these problems ought to be solved. In this country there is a long term problem; yet nobody on the opposition side of the House seems even to have recognized the fact.

An hon. Member: I see only eight opposition members present.

Mr. Osler: Only eight of them are here, and these are more intelligent looking than some of the others.

An hon. Member: That doesn't say much for the opposition.

Alleged Non-Support of Employment Programs

Mr. Osler: On an afternoon like this, when the opposition is given time to discuss these problems in this House, could it not spend some of its time proposing some long term solutions? Could it not tell the House what it thinks the long term solutions are to our problems? What do opposition members think ought to be done to alleviate this unemployment situation? After all, this is the opposition's day. They talk about policy by castigating the government for failing to foresee the escalating effects of its unemployment policies. I say to the opposition, this is your day; why not do a little foreseeing yourselves. Why do you not make some suggestions so that we can prevent this situation in the future?

Mr. Orlikow: We did last year and you ignored them.

Mr. Osler: It is a damn good thing that we did.

Mr. Ricard: We told you what to do.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. May I respectfully suggest to hon. members that they continue their very interesting discussion through the Chair.

Mr. Osler: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate your point. It seems to me that it is the long term questions that are outstanding. I should like to hear several questions asked by the opposition. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) came close to asking one of them. For instance, I would ask, is a ten-year average of an unemployment rate that is close to 5 per cent in Canada good enough? No, I say; it is not good enough. The hon. member for Winnipeg North suggested that 3 or 4 per cent would be acceptable, perhaps. I agree with him; but we might not be able to bring it down to 3 or 4 per cent. Let us consider what would happen in our federal structure. If there were 3 or 4 per cent as an average in the whole country, there would probably be less than 1 per cent in Ontario, and the place would boil over.

Mr. Orlikow: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Osler: You would get a great inflationary boom starting in Ontario, and the people in the Maritimes as well as people everywhere else would consequently suffer.

Mr. Gilbert: Tell us about the FLQ; was that not brought about because of unemployment?

Mr. Osler: It would be useless telling the hon. member about the FLQ; he did not recognize them as a problem last October.

Mr. Gilbert: Please tell us.

Mr. Osler: The point I am trying to make is this. We have a federal system in this country. If you want to see an "ideal" national unemployment rate of 3 per cent, 4 per cent or any other rate and not see a 10 per cent unemployment rate in Newfoundland, or a 15 per cent rate in parts of Quebec, what will you do? How will you get employment spread across the country properly? Will you do as Walter Gordon suggested, dump the whole thing on Ontario and to hell with the rest of the country? Will you be a federalist or a centralist? Do you want everyone to live around Toronto, where the money is? Frankly, I should like to know, Mr. Speaker, what the members of the opposition feel? How do they think we can get our unemployment rate down to 3 or 4 per cent and keep it there? That is what I should like them to tell us.

Another question I should like answered is this: how can we improve on this situation, without heating up the centre or cooling off the extremeties to the point of freezing? Can we keep the centre reasonably cool without freezing the rest of Canada? Do we need wage and price controls?

Mr. Skoberg: What about profits?

Mr. Osler: The hon. member would not understand profits and there is no use whatsoever in our discussing them with him. Members of the NDP do not understand profits. We should not waste our time explaining this subject to them.

An hon. Member: The hon. member wants to keep wages down.

Mr. Osler: In New Zealand, a wage stabilization policy, intended to limit wage increases sought by New Zealand trade unions to 7 per cent for the coming year, will be endorsed by the New Zealand parliament. That statement is carried in the Globe and Mail of February 25. I am not saying whether that is a good or a bad policy; I am merely saying that that is the kind of question that ought to be asked. It touches on our problem much more directly than does this wish-washy motion. It would be awfully good if the opposition would discuss our problems and give us ideas, so that we might know how the opposition would deal with the problems and solve them in the long term.

Should trade be "free"? Are those hon. members for free trade or against it? Can we afford to have imports worth $700 per Canadian, when the United States imports only $180 per capita and Japan only $150? It is important to remember that we import a great deal; on the other hand, perhaps we must import when we export so much per capita. Those are the sorts of problems I want to hear about from the opposition. They touch on our long term welfare as a nation.

How can we get a higher labour co-efficient into the dollar value of our manufactures? We have many people saying that we should not give our raw materials away. Let us hear concrete proposals to show how we are to inject more Canadian labour content into the products of our industries. How will you attract capital? How will you force industry to do more processing here? Let us hear from hon. members of the opposition. These are the problems which must be solved. Should we rationalize more of our production effort, to increase our volume? In other words, should our anti-trust laws be changed or not? Are these laws good enough? Are tariff policies relevant in light of the activities of multi national corporations throughout the world? Do some hon. members feel that tariff policies in the present day are out of date? What is their approach to this? We want to hear from these up-and-coming fellows. We want to know what they think about these matters, and what effect they think they will have on the long term picture of unemployment.

How are we to improve conditions in this country unless we find some way of fitting into the developments in Europe? I am talking about the European economic community and Great Britain, which wishes to join. Should we have a continental energy policy?

An hon. Member: What do you think?

Mr. Osler: Should we try to get into the "Pacific rim"?

An hon. Member: What do you think?

Mr. Osler: I did not propose this motion. I am just saying that I wish the motion had been amplified in this way. I am doing some thinking on this subject. I am trying as hard as I can. However, I am not going to throw it away on an opposition day. I am going to talk about it in caucus and other places where intelligent people might listen. But these are the sorts of things that should be brought up during debate if hon. members are intelligently concerned about the over-all problem.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Instead of saying "gloom, doom and things have to get worse, and we hope to hell they do get worse, for if not we will be wrong," we must tackle this problem at three levels. There is an immediate level, a mid-term level and a long-term level. I have heard very few suggestions about any of these levels. Perhaps we could attract some of the provinces that are reluctant to deal with unemployment by suggesting a "forgiveness" clause of all the labour contained in the federal loan if they will get on with the job. It would be a little more imaginative than the loan which the government has made available and of which some have not taken advantage. But there can be very little additional figuring than what is being done at present to get out of the present situation.

The mid-term is going to be upon us very shortly. Municipal and provincial bodies should be encouraged to assemble an inventory of public works so that next time they will be ready when public works are again required. Instead of having a three, four or six month lead-in time—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, this government has often been compared, and rightly so, with that character made famous by Stephen Leacock, who jumped on his horse and galloped off in all directions at once. How many times have we heard contradictory statements issuing from different ministers? I need only refer to the most recent one, the bumbling and fumbling over the Francophone decision, to illustrate what I mean by the mixed up attitudes this government adopts toward a national policy.

Alleged Non-Support of Employment Programs

Unfortunately for the country, there is one area in which the government has been consistent. It has been consistent in its stubborn insistence in carrying out economic policies which have been recognized as outmoded and ineffective by everyone but their own befuddled experts. It has been consistent in demonstrating to the country the true meaning of the phrase "participatory democracy". The greatest number of Canadians in history are now actively participating in the hopelessness and despair of—unemployment—deliberately created by the policies of this government.

The government has been consistent in its blind refusal to consult with provincial and municipal authorities before embarking on projects which can only add to the tax load and welfare burden of these municipalities. These policies have placed staggering financial burdens on the municipalities. Because of the desperate plight of these local governments and the necessity for federal action to alleviate the results of federal policy, I am pleased to support the motion of my colleague, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Ryan).

When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made the statement a year ago that if his policies created 6 per cent unemployment, it was too bad and the unemployed were a regrettable side-effect, I wonder if he actually realized how many of these "regrettable side-effects" there would be in February, 1971. Is the Prime Minister so cruel and heartless that he can look on some 700,000 to 800,000 Canadians as side-effects or is he just all fuddled up? While he and his colleagues play the numbers game, close to a million Canadians are broke, disillusioned, and in many cases hungry. The municipalities are desparately looking for new funds to take care of the ever increasing relief rolls.

Let us look at what the government's programs have done to the provinces and municipalities. Just this week Premier Bourassa of Quebec placed a great share of the blame for the problems his province is having with unemployment on federal policies. He flatly stated that there should be more co-operation between provincial and federal authorities, as suggested in this motion. The hon. member for Spadina spoke about the burgeoning welfare costs in metro Toronto which may reach close to $100 million in 1971. This estimate was recently made by North York controller Paul Godfrey. This problem of how to handle ever increasing welfare costs is not confined to the cities.

One thing emerged from the recent welfare ministers conference in Ottawa, overshadowing all else. That was the fact that the heavy unemployment resulting from a national anti-inflation policy had placed a tremendous burden on the tax revenues on the municipalities. The provinces and municipalities are carrying an undue share of the cost. Also emerging was the clear duty of the federal government to take two immediate steps. They should increase unemployment insurance benefits immediately, as well as their share of welfare payments under the Canada Assistance Plan.

The Hon. Brenda Robertson, minister of youth and welfare for New Brunswick, spoke out for her colleagues in the economically depressed Atlantic provinces. She called for a direct infusion of funds to combat the effects of hight unemployment of their welfare systems. Mrs. Robertson suggested a novel approach to provide extra funds to any province where unemployment rises above the national average. While Mrs. Robertson said that the minister had not turned her down, she expressed concern about the delay in acting because the province's needs were immediate, and when national unemployment is high, regional unemployment is much higher.

When addressing the constitutional conference a few days later, the premier of New Brunswick amplified the remarks that Mrs. Robertson had made. In pointing out the difficulties that a province with high tax resources has in combating exceptional costs, he stated that in a reasonably depressed area, the unemployment problem has two dimensions. There is the chronic long-term problem at home the current problem of high unemployment which exists because of national policies. He said:

> In New Brunswick, unemployment rates have been too high for too long. Not since 1953 has our annual average rate fallen below 6.5 per cent.

He then went on to talk about the current situation. As he said, we find ourselves in an unusual position. A program intended to combat inflation is at the same time causing serious unemployment. As the premier said, we did not cause inflation. This is true of regionally depressed areas. These areas do not contribute to national inflation. Yet now, in the premier's words, we are paying a disproportionate price in combatting it in Canada; the cost of the trade-off between inflation and unemployment has been too high. The premier went on to emphasize once again, as we are seeking to do in this debate, that unemployment has been deliberately created by this government in the pursuit of a policy which has in some cases doubled welfare costs. It is, therefore, up to the federal government to reimburse the provinces in respect of these expenditures.

If anyone had been in my province in the month of January, he would have read almost daily reports from a provincial task force on social development. The hearings held by this task force demonstrated more clearly than I can the plight of the poor in New Brunswick. For example, it received testimony that 53 per cent of the residents of Laviolette and Allainville in Gloucester County were on the social assistance rolls in one way or another. How on earth can a municipality with a very limited tax base handle welfare costs when 53 per cent of its residents are on welfare?

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Osler) told the House that we on this side do nothing but complain all the time without offering any constructive advice. I was surprised to hear him make such a statement. As I observed in an aside, who would listen? To me, the greatest tragedy is the fact that the government considers itself omnipotent and will not accept suggestions made to it. The government has consistently refused to accept advice. I can understand its reluctance to accept advice from the opposition, but what about the opinions expressed by large numbers of leading bankers, businessmen and economists who have consistently told the government that it was committing economic overkill and that it should try to put more people to work by adopting realistic tax policies which would encourage the private sector to expand.

Here we are in the midst of a whole new set of economic indicators—high interest rates along with high savings and high exports. Yet we are also faced with the highest unemployment figures in history. In the face of this changing economic picture the government has clung to outdated theories and consistently refused to accept advice. Is it any wonder that we on this side are inclined to criticize rather than offer advice, since we know that our advice would be ignored just as the advice of all thinking Canadians is ignored?

How different is the approach of President Nixon in the United States to this dilemma. I am no apologist for President Nixon and I do not say his theories are necessarily right, but I do want to draw attention to the difference in approach. At least, President Nixon sees that the old economic theories are not working and is prepared to try something new. I should like to quote a few excerpts from the State of the Union address. The president said he wanted Congress to take action on more than 35 pieces of proposed legislation which were still waiting to be passed and that there were six areas which he felt were critical to the nation. The most important of these, he said, was welfare reform.

> The present welfare system has become a monstrous, consuming outrage—an outrage against the community, against the taxpayer, and particularly against the children it is supposed to help. Now we can honestly disagree, as we do, on what to do about it. But we can all agree that we must meet the challenge not by pouring more money into a bad program but by abolishing the present welfare system and adopting a new one.

A little later on in the speech comes what, to me, is the "meat" of the president's approach:

> Let us also establish an effective work incentive, an effective work requirement. Let us provide the means by which more can help themselves. This should be our goal—
> The second great goal is to achieve what Americans have not enjoyed since 1957—full prosperity in peacetime.

Here, President Nixon is opening new fields of economic activity.

> The tide of inflation has turned. The rise in the cost of living which had been gathering dangerous momentum in the late sixties was reduced last year. Inflation will be further reduced this year. But as we have moved from runaway inflation toward reasonable price stability, and at the same time, as we have been moving from a wartime economy to a peacetime economy, we have paid a price in increased unemployment.

And here are words of advice for the government, which excuses itself on the ground that at one time or another the situation was even worse:

> We should take no comfort from the fact that the level of unemployment in this transition from a wartime to a peacetime economy is lower than in any peacetime year of the sixties. This is not good enough for the man who is unemployed in the seventies. We must do better for workers in peacetime and we will do better.

To achieve this I will submit an expansionary budget this year —one which will help stimulate the economy and thereby open up new job opportunities for millions of Americans.

This is an approach which the government cannot understand.

It will be a full employment budget, a budget designed to be in balance if the economy were operating at its peak potential. By spending as if we were at full employment we would help to bring about full employment.

I reject the accusation that we on this side have done nothing but criticize, that we have failed to offer workable alternatives. Through our leader, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), we were suggesting as long as a year ago that the government should immediately extend unemployment insurance benefits to bring temporary relief to Canadians out of jobs. We said there was immediate need to put more money into the hands of Canadian consumers, a course which would considerably stimulate the economy generally. As part of this suggestion, we advocated the removal of the 3 per cent surtax and proposed a selective reduction of personal and corporate income tax to get the economy moving again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the great Galilean carpenter once said that some have ears and cannot hear and some have eyes and cannot perceive. After listening to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Osler), I think those remarks are directly applicable to him. For him to say that the opposition has not put forward ideas for solving the unemployment problem shows that he has neither ears to hear with nor eyes to perceive with. Had he been listening, he would have heard all quarters of the opposition recommending tax changes, increased exemptions for single and married persons which would mean a tax saving for the people and rejuvenate the economy. If he had heard some of our members, more particularly our financial critic, he would have heard some of our ideas with regard to depreciation allowances and tax holidays. I am really surprised that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre would make such a speech. It seems to me he should straighten out his thinking and also clean up his language in the speeches he does make.

The question of unemployment, and the tremendous impact it has had on municipalities across the country, is one of the most important matters that could be debated during the session. It is easy to say that there are 668,000 unemployed as of the month of January, that there are 100,000 on a retraining program, bringing the total up to roughly three-quarters of a million unemployed, but one has to be unemployed really to appreciate what it means.

It is those in the cities who are the hardest hit. Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, a company like Massey-Harris almost jokingly saying: "We are laying-off men because it does not fit within our profit picture to keep them on"; or: "It does not fit within the financial scheme the government has regarding valuing our dollar"? A few months ago 600 men in my own riding employed by Dunlop were "turfed out" practically overnight as a result of a change in policy by its foreign parent company. This is what unemployment means.

Why is it that Canada has the highest unemployment rate—6.6 per cent seasonally adjusted—and the lowest productive growth rate in the western world? Great Britain is worrying about an unemployment rate of 3.2 per cent, yet we have 6.6 per cent. There are probably many other reasons for this, but two reasons are, first, the constitutional attitude of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and, second, the fiscal and monetary policies of the government.

If I may deal with the second reason first, the fiscal and monetary policies of the government, the Prime Minister and his cabinet deemed it wise, if we were to check inflation, to create unemployment. Did they not realize that they were making human sacrifices in order to solve financial problems? What a price to pay! People are put out of work while the government attempts to solve the problem of inflation. Not only does a worker lose his income, his dignity and his respect; his wife and children are placed in jeopardy and the whole family suffers psychological damage. These are some of the facts of unemployment.

I have been asked by young students why they should continue at school if there is no work available for them when they leave. I read in the newspaper that the University of Toronto has indicated that there has been a 30 per cent drop in the number of jobs for graduates and has recommended that they seek work in other countries, such as Germany, France, Sweden. So, we have arrived at this situation: no employment opportunities for our graduates, and the recommendation that they seek work in other countries. Is it any wonder that the youth of today are banding together and questioning the value of the system under which we live?

The first reason I gave was the constitutional hang-ups of the Prime Minister. His constitutional views are crucifying Canadians. Since he regards the municipalities as creatures of the province, he tells them: "Don't look to me, look to the province". Such an attitude is legalistic, cold, callous, indifferent and disgusting. Is the Prime Minister trying to balkanize the cities of this country? What has happened to his great election phrase "the just society"? What about national unity? Is the Prime Minister going to permit the constitution to deprive us of a united country? Is he going to deprive us of a just society by treating the main centres of Canada as though they do not exist, by treating them merely as creatures of the provinces instead of as a part, and an important part, of the general whole?

The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Ryan), in introducing the motion, outlined the picture prevailing in Toronto, which is both dark and gloomy. The same could be said with regard to Montreal, or Victoria, B.C., or Winnipeg, or Peterborough—any of the large cities of this country. I would say that Mayor Dennison and his council should be given credit for bringing forward and into the open the question of unemployment in the cities. I also add that probably Mayor Dennison and his council should consider themselves very naïve if they think that Members of Parliament have a pipeline into the cabinet, especially to the Prime Minister.

Liberal members from Toronto are afraid of the Prime Minister, and I ask why this is so. They recall the treatment received by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) when he attempted to put forward a suggestion arising out of the task force report on housing with regard to giving aid to municipalities to form land banks so that the cost of land would be cheaper and as a result so would housing. The hon. member for Trinity was given the Siberian treatment, and he now sits in the corner like a sulking boy while the Prime Minister sits there like a gloating... What shall I say?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Orang-outang.

Mr. Gilbert: Yes, orang-outang. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), who represents the constituency of Eglinton, is also afraid of the Prime Minister. He says: "Why should I speak on behalf of the city of Toronto? I have been a civil servant for many years and had a rough time as Minister of Finance. I had a terrible time lifting the 6 per cent ceiling on the bank interest rate, and what an impact that made". Certainly, the minister has had a very difficult time as minister of External affairs. So, he says: "Why should I become involved in the problems of the people of Toronto? Why should I speak out on behalf of the people on the unemployment problem? Here am I, at my last turn, so why should I annoy the Prime Minister?"

Mr. Sharp: What a speech! Deal with the facts.

Mr. Gilbert: Let me talk about another Liberal member from Toronto, the hon. member for York West (Mr. Givens). The Prime Minister treats him as a professor would treat a grade one schoolchild. He is a former mayor of Toronto, yet he is ignored and snubbed. Is it any wonder that he is not here today to participate in this very important debate? We of the opposition are trying our best to point out to the government the shortcomings of their policies, and the Prime Minister treats us as he treated the Lapalme workers.

I want to deal with an organization set up by the Liberal party to deal with problems in Toronto. This body was given a very fancy name, METPAC, which stands for Metro Planning Action Committee. At the first meeting of this group, they had a great number of books containing a large amount of information. They met with the mayor and the councillors and said there must be liaison between the federal and municipal governments. There was a meeting a week ago in Toronto at which the hon. member for York West (Mr. Givens) revealed what METPAC is all about. He said it is only a consultative body set up for the purposes of discussion. There is no power, there is no input and there is no pipeline to the government. This is what we have.

Let me deal very quickly with the situation in Toronto. It has been said there are between 50,000 and 60,000 unemployed in Toronto. There is a tremendous number of people on the welfare rolls in that city. As has been pointed out, if we do not extent the date for the unemployment seasonally adjusted benefits from May 15 to an undetermined date, 10,000 more will be on the welfare rolls. This was one of the two main points referred to at that meeting in the city of Toronto. The meeting requested an extension of the seasonal unemployment benefits from May 15 because of the so-called time lag factor relating to the policy the government has introduced to solve this unemployment problem. Surely, that is not an unreasonable request. I hope the Toronto members, especially the Secretary of State for External Affairs, will persuade the Prime Minister that this is a reasonable request. If anyone has any influence on the great one, it may be the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gilbert: That was the first point set forth. The second point set forth was that some work programs should be initiated. It was said that between $3 million and $3,500,000 was required to solve the unemployment problem. The suggestion was that this would not resolve all unemployment in Toronto but would at least be a start, would give the unemployed some confidence and perhaps would have a multiplier effect.

It was then suggested at the meeting that if the government cannot give a direct grant, for goodness sakes, it should get into a cost-shared program in respect of these works. I should hope that the minister will forget some of the problems he faces in respect of other parts of the world and pay more attention to those problems that prevail in the city of Toronto. He has done a very poor job in respect to some world problems. Surely, he can regain some of this reputation if he considers some of those problems that prevail in the city of Toronto.

Let me have one moment more, Mr. Speaker, and I will be finished. I hope all cities across the country can be cities of which we are proud. They should have beautiful buildings, factories with people who work and have homes. This is what I would really like. What have we got? We have many cities, including Toronto and Montreal, which are known as human zoos with improperly planned buildings, unemployed people, pollution and dirt. It behooves me and all members of the House, more especially the Toronto members and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to exert some influence in order to get ministers, such as the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald), to do something in order that we might have better cities and a better country in which to live.

Mr. Hu Harries (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I know it is very inviting to try to lay the total blame in respect to unemployment at the doorstep of government policy; more particularly the anti-inflationary measures that were adopted about a year ago. In my opinion, to do so is to ignore some of the facts the evidence so clearly points out.

Unemployment in Canada today can be attributed in part not to government policy in Canada but to the very direct connection our economy has with the economy of the United States, and to the economic problems faced by that country today. It has been shown on numerous occasions that the direction of the Canadian economy is strongly influenced by what happens south of the border. It is virtually impossible to have a relatively high unemployment rate in the United States without having a similarly high unemployment rate in Canada.

With the greatest respect, I suggest that the opposition attempt to attribute the present unemployment situation to the anti-inflationary measures adopted by this government around a year ago ignores the parallel situation in the United States. We must make Canada more independent of the United States' economic influence. What can we do to make the Canadian economy more independent? What can we do to make employment, and unemployment, in Canada more directly controllable by the Canadian government, whether it be at the federal, provincial or municipal level?

First of all, I suggest that the white paper on taxation contains suggestions which provide for the development of a measure of independence for Canada. I am hopeful that when the minister brings down his legislation for a revised tax program it will very clearly place Canada and Canadians in a preferred tax position. That is not the situation today. There is a growing opportunity for Canada to stand on its own feet, but we cannot stand on our own feet if we insist on being hired men, or overseers, for investors across the border. One way to insure independence is to have major fiscal and financial independence. This can be done by developing an appropriate tax system. Sometimes I am amused by the suggestions of members of the NDP. They seem to think we can have an independent Canada by legislation, in spite of the consequences of the restrictive economic policies they advocate. This is just not possible.

I am particularly pleased to see the Canada Development Corporation legislation before this House. This is one way in which Canada can gain more control of her own destiny. Also, I think it is appropriate to mention that the greater control of Canadian financial institutions by Canadians is vitally important to a more complete control of the Canadian economy. Here again, this government has taken some impressive steps.

It has been suggested that in a period of relatively high unemployment it is not appropriate to encourage students to continue their education. It is very easy to discourage them and we must not do that. A number of studies have been carried out—I refer particularly to one done recently by the Economic Council of Canada—which show that one of the things lacking in Canada is a well-trained management group.

It seems to me that this government has gone further than any other government in this country to ensure that the benefits of education are made available to our young people to the greatest possible extent, particularly in management training, so that we can provide the talent necessary to operate the economy at a full-employment level. Also, the retraining programs that have been instituted—and there have been many references to them—are not substitutes for productive employment but rather, I suggest, equivalent to productive employment. I think it is quite wrong to add to the unemployment figure the number of people who are on retraining programs, and thus to imply that this is a substitute for productive employment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harries: Surely that cannot be the case. What we are attempting in Canada—and I think the government deserves full credit for its efforts in this direction—is to upgrade the talents and techniques that we employ, so that people will have an opportunity not simply to be employed but to be employed at a level that is the highest they can attain.

It seems to me that instead of thinking in terms of reducing retraining at any time, we should step up this program. Tax arrangements should be made which will encourage the individual and make it economically attractive to him to seek retraining, not just when his present work opportunity diminishes or disappears but as a matter of standard practice in exactly the same way as with capital equipment. There is much to be gained for Canada generally by this sort of program.

If the observations made today are not to be restricted to the urban area of the city of Toronto, I suggest to hon. members that the problems of the urban areas have been recognized and the government has made some excellent efforts to deal with them. I refer particularly to the fact that at a time when even in western Canada there is a strong trend toward the urban cluster, we succeeded in meeting some of the social and economic problems which arise from concentrating many people without employment into relatively few urban areas. I am referring, for example, to grants made for studies. One of these studies was completed in the city of Edmonton a month ago. I am referring to studies directed at trying to establish the type of socio-economic programs that can be effected to reduce the hard core of unemployment which results from the aggregation of unemployed in urban areas.

In other words, we may well be playing a game with statistics—this is shown in part in this study—where we find there is a higher level of unemployment than previously only because unemployment in an urban area is clearly visible. Unemployment is not so clearly visible in areas such as north central Alberta. So what you do is bring these people into urban areas where unemployment becomes visible. Fortunately, however, at the same time as it becomes visible it is also possible to take steps to give these people an opportunity for employment. I believe that here again this government has followed intelligent programs, some of them experimental in nature.

Another aspect that commends itself with regard to the urban problem is the development of a more satisfactory environment. I believe we will have to recognize that simply talking about environmental improvement is not sufficient. We will have to recognize that people previously employed in production will more properly now be employed in solving problems associated with improvement of the environment. As such they can be considered as part of the labour force, and indeed a most active and useful part of that force.

I conclude that one has to reject the harping with respect to unemployment and recognize that it is in part a spillover from the United States which we will be subject to it until we achieve more complete control of our economy. I am happy to say this government is actively pursuing that goal.

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to congratulate the previous speaker. I think my party's whip will agree to give the hon. member ample notice before the next opposition day so that he can be here to make another fine speech.

I am proud to support the motion so ably presented by my colleague, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Ryan), in which he condemns the government for its failure to foresee and take steps to provide for the escalating effects of its unemployment policy upon the social assistance funds of the provinces and municipalities, and its failure to consult and co-operate with the provinces and municipalities in providing emergency financial support and employment programs.

It is an old story: the unfortunate aspect of this government's blundering is that the poor people of Canada suffer the most. Poor people always seem to end up on the other end of the stick. When there is a mild economic recession it is the poor people who are most severely hurt and find it most difficult to recover, both socially and economically. Paradoxically, it is the poor who as consumers naturally have less money to spend but are paying more. Their inability to earn a decent living is only one side of their economic plight. Also important is how they spend what little income they have. If they are paying more for the goods they buy, they are being denied the benefits of their earning power.

There are two ways in which the poor are paying more for goods and services than more prosperous Canadians. First, they are using a larger percentage of their disposable dollars; second, they are often paying higher prices for goods and services. With cash resources inadequate for even immediate necessities, the poor person cannot time his purchases to take advantage of special sales. He cannot buy in bulk, although this would keep regular, basic costs down. He cannot buy quality with resultant long-term savings because he cannot afford the immediate larger cost. He cannot do effective comparison shopping because of the additional transportation, baby-sitting and other costs involved.

The poor person's lack of ready cash may limit him to buying at stores which will supply credit, usually neighbourhood stores which cater to the low-income consumer market. The low-income consumer is rarely eligible for the standard credit arrangements of larger department stores and has to buy his credit at high-risk interest rates. He then faces increasing and overwhelming credit costs in debt consolidation arrangements.

The last two points raise the most important aspect, and that is the institution of credit so far as low-income

Canadians are concerned. The poor people of this country, as indeed poor people of all countries, entered the mass consumption society through the use of instalment credit and they have been victimized by fraud and deception which have accompanied this method of selling. One of the major problems of persons buying on credit involves merchants and credit companies which fail to live up to their ethical and legal obligations. Many such practices by merchants are illegal but nonetheless they continue.

When a merchant fails to respect a guarantee, the consumer is more likely to lose his initial investment than to obtain justice. In part this is due to his ignorance of the laws which protect him and of the agencies which can help him. But the inequality also stems from the merchant's superior resources. He can turn the job of collecting overdue accounts over to lawyers, collection agencies and the courts. On the other hand, the consumer, especially if he is poor, lacks the resources and the professional advice necessary to defend himself properly.

Poor people are unable to contest claims in court and in most cases they lose financially by not contesting them. I have been told by court officials that the overwhelming majority of consumer credit claims are uncontested. In such cases the creditor is entitled to judgment for the amount of his claim, together with his taxable costs. As a rule he is not required to prove the claim, the theory being that the debtor by failing to contest it has in fact admitted its validity. Consequently, even if laws exist to help the overcommitted consumer, the costs to him may be equally high whether or not he uses those laws.

The best shopping skills, the most exhaustive consumer education program and a fair, open and protected market place can alleviate only some of the discomforts of poverty. The essential problem is lack of income. Until poverty itself is eradicated, only limited solutions can be found for the consumer problems of low-income Canadians. This, of course, takes us to the problem of unemployment and the subject of the motion we are debating this afternoon. I think that most Canadians have pretty well received the message that the government's anti-inflation policies have created a high level of unemployment, probably the highest within the past ten years or more. This high level of unemployment, encouraged and indeed brought about by the government, has had a disastrous effect on a large segment of our population. It has also imposed an unbearable burden on provincial and municipal budgets.

It is a well known fact that a country can never hope to achieve its potential prosperity or a high level of economic maturity so long as a major segment of its population remains non-productive. I can speak with some authority concerning the province I represent. When you have 20 per cent of the population in any part of Canada forced by economic circumstances and legislative restrictions to live off the fat of an already flabby economy, then that society is indeed in trouble. Add to that another 7 per cent, 8 per cent or 9 per cent of the population who through no fault of their own are forced to accept unemployment insurance and I think, Mr. Speaker, you have to agree that we really have a problem.

I suppose we are experiencing something entirely new in the history of our nation. Our people have been forced to endure a major economic recession and its resultant misery and poverty, deliberately caused by their government. As the Toronto Telegram so appropriately captioned a story in its February 24 edition, "It's Your Recession, Mr. Trudeau." Of course, we must not forget the Prime Minister's ally, the modern-day Robin Hood in reverse, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). I think that most people who sit in this House and most people who fill the galleries know the contemptible arrogance displayed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his cabinet, particularly the Minister of Finance, toward the problems facing Canadians, especially those who are unemployed and are forced to accept welfare.

I brought with me into the chamber some files containing letters I have received from constituents during the past three or four weeks. They are from people who have very serious problems. I will read one of them. It is from a woman who says:

> My house is falling down. The room where my boy has to sleep isn't fit to live in. The walls are full of holes. The mattress on the bed is falling apart from dampness. We don't have enough bed clothes. I am getting $120 a month to support my family.

I am sure other hon. members are getting letters like that. Here is another letter from a widow who is living with a mentally retarded daughter. She writes that she does not have a bed fit to sleep in, that the springs are popping up and that she has to put boards on the mattress. They do not have adequate clothing and their house is leaking.

These are gut issues, Mr. Speaker. My riding is not different from most ridings in Newfoundland. We have poverty in it and too much unemployment. Close to 100,000 people in my province are on some kind of welfare, whether short or long-term. These are the people at whom the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister shrug their shoulders in total indifference and say, "Fuddle-duddle." They act as if everything were going well. In fact, in his budget speech the Minister of Finance said we are on the move again and the economy is on the upswing.

I should like the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance to take time out and try to convince the people referred to in these files that things in Canada are on the upswing and are rosy, because I do not think that is the case. The Prime Minister and his ministers are not fooling the Canadian people; they are only fooling themselves. They are not being honest with the Canadian people when they try to put across the idea that things in Canada are rosy and that the economy is on the upswing.

I do not know how far people can be pushed or how much patience they can exercise. This government, I believe, has tried the patience of the Canadian people to the breaking point. I believe this is obvious, because it is not too difficult to sense that the government is running scared. Suddenly the Minister of Finance realizes his policy to curb inflation was illogical, stupid and senseless. Now the government is attempting to make amends by coming in with programs to offset some of the damage caused to the economy of this country by its senseless and illogical policies to fight the so-called war on inflation.

I do not know how much longer the Canadian people can endure this blundering in so far as the misery and poverty associated with unemployment is concerned, but I am convinced the day is not very far off when they will have their say. I think they will let it be known in no uncertain terms that they are not prepared to accept this hanky-panky of illogical policies on the part of their government. They will be heard, and there will be a change.

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I came to the House this afternoon to speak on a subject which is of interest to me. I came here to listen to urban members speak on this subject and am surprised to see that members from the city of Montreal and the city of Quebec are not here to participate in this debate.

Mr. Boulanger: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, The hon. member is rising on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member took the trouble to check up, he would realize that there are here a member from Montreal and one from Quebec. So he should weigh his words.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): The point of order is not justified. In any case, each member can establish his own figures. I recognize the hon. member for South Western Nova.

Mr. Comeau: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like a government member to take part in the debate in order to tell us exactly what is going on in Montreal as this is of interest to us. And the Quebec member who, as minister, is sitting in the front row, could also outline the situation and propose some solution, as there are certainly problems in Montreal since the minister moved shortly before Christmas a bill to settle certain problems of the City of Montreal. There are therefore problems in that city.

[English]

We should hear from these people. Where is the former mayor of Toronto? He is not here.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Comeau: Mr. Speaker, a member from Toronto proposed the motion this afternoon, and it is a very valid one. Some government members have wondered why he proposed such a motion and questioned its necessity. It is necessary because the government has not been taking any action. Therefore, we must spend our time today discussing matters which are of concern not only to the people in the cities but to the people in Canada as a whole.

I should like to simply stand here and holler, for the four minutes I have at my disposal until six o'clock, "incentive, incentive, and more of it." We must provide some incentive for the Canadian people and some hope that they will be able to get back to work. They need hope that work will be found for them in this supposedly great and fantastic nation called Canada.

This is a great nation. There are opportunities, and so on—but they are not being developed by this government. This is the terrible thing about it.

The answer is not welfare costs on a long-term basis. Welfare costs are important on an immediate, short-term basis so long as our citizens do not have the means with which to eat and pay their rent. This is the situation all over the country. There are no other means but welfare, and welfare costs of the municipal and provincial governments are increasing constantly.

One of the Liberal members from Winnipeg said there is no problem, that everybody is eating and everybody is happy. The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Carter), however, referred to specific cases. In Winnipeg, particularly in the constituency of the hon. member who spoke, apparently they do not have this situation because they have a glorified and sophisticated society. But in other areas there are serious problems and solutions must be found. The hon. member opposite and his colleagues asked why we do not offer suggestions. Suggestions have been brought forward every day, not only by the opposition but even by government members, as well as by the Economic Council of Canada and our financial people who wish something done about this situation. But the government does not listen—no, sir! They do not care at all because they are eating, they are happy and everything is fine.

Mr. Ricard: They created unemployment.

Mr. Comeau: They created unemployment, as the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard) said. All kinds of suggestions have been made. I hope this motion is approved tonight, because the government deserves to be condemned for some of the things it is doing to this country. The leader of my party has suggested all kinds of things to get the country moving both on a long-term and on a short-term basis. We should look at the tax proposals and at what is happening to our tax system. It is all wrong. I am not an economist but I know something is definitely wrong. For example, yesterday we had a debate on the CDC and a lot of enthusiasm was expressed about economic nationalism, and so on. Yet we offer a better tax proposition to foreign companies than to Canadian companies. These are the things that are wrong with the present system. But the Minister of Finance wants to increase our taxes still further.

I believe you are becoming impatient, Mr. Speaker, so I shall call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Robert P. Kaplan (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I very much regret that the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Ryan) is not in the House at the moment because I have risen partly as a result of the challenge that he hurled across the floor this afternoon. He challenged hon. members representing Toronto ridings to explain how they could look after the interests of their city and still support the government.

Mr. Alexander: That is right.

Mr. Kaplan: I am not answering for other members from Toronto; I am only answering for myself. It is to that particular challenge that I should like to address myself. We have passed the point in this House of talking about the evil of unemployment and the importance of doing something about it quickly. For the same reason I do not propose to take much time in talking about the causes of unemployment, its relationship to inflation and what the underlying policies of the government are. A few days ago I spoke in the House on that subject.

What I should like to do this evening is respond to the motion which has been put forward by the opposition, in which it is alleged that the government could be doing more in certain areas and that it has wilfully and arrogantly refused to do certain things. I should like to look at the list of those things and see what it amounts to. Let us turn to the suggestions of the hon. member for Spadina. If I could suggest ways in which unemployment could be reduced more quickly, I would suggest them; and if I could propose schemes that the government has not proposed, I would do so. But I cannot do that, Mr. Speaker.

If I believed that our economy could be fired more quickly without danger, or that our expansionary policies could be accelerated more than they are, I would say so. But I do not think that, Mr. Speaker. I think that the government is responding to the problem. As I say, I will not go into the origin of the problem, its causes or its depth. I think nevertheless that, given the problem, the government has responded to it in the only way in which it could respond.

What are we going to do, we are asked, about unemployment in Toronto and in other Canadian cities?

• (8:10 p.m.)

I come first to the principal suggestion of the hon. member for Spadina. He turned southward to the United States and said, "Look at what President Nixon is doing." He stated it is proposed that millions of dollars of massive aid be pumped into the cities of the United States by the federal government. He said there are to be massive tax-sharing agreements with the states and cities, pursuant to which President Nixon has proposed that a fixed proportion of all federal revenues be turned over to the states and cities.

With regard to the situation in Canada, the hon. member stated that all our cities and provinces are being offered is loans, and that loans are not as good as grants and tax sharing. I will not say much about the probability of President Nixon delivering that package; I think there may be some difficulties. I have read that Wilbur Mills, the chairman of the House committee which has to approve these proposals, is opposed to them. He informed the press that he intends to kill these proposals.

Let us look through the difficulties and see what would happen if President Nixon were successful and these tax-sharing proposals were implemented in the United States. How much worse off are we in Canada? The hon. member for Spadina has forgotten, if he ever knew it, that in this country we already have precisely the same program that President Nixon is proposing. A sharing program is already in existence. It has been in existence in this form since World War II. The plan is called the Income Tax Act. I am surprised that the member has not heard of it.

The Income Tax Act of Canada provides that a fixed share of all the revenue collected by the federal government is automatically turned over to the provincial governments. This is what President Nixon is proposing in the United States. We have had it in this country for over 20 years. In fact, what we have in this country is very much better because it is an amount fixed by the provinces. The provincial governments can decide what share of that revenue they shall receive. They have the right to pass provincial laws, which the federal government undertook many years ago to recognize, by which they can raise as much money through the Income Tax Act as they like. If they want to raise the same amount of money as the federal government, all they have to do is pass legislation. The federal government has already agreed to collect that money. This is very different from the position of the United States. In the United States there is no tax-sharing agreement. The states are limited in their powers and tax resources. They are pale and puny counterparts, at best, to the mighty provincial governments of this country.

The provincial governments of this country have virtually every taxing resource that is available to the federal government. There is only one way the federal government can raise money that the provincial governments cannot; that is through customs and excise, which is not a major source of revenue for the federal government. The federal government and provincial governments can raise money through death duties, income tax, sales tax, licence fees and royalty charges. This fantastic American idea, which is put forward as the main, concrete proposal of the Conservative Party in this debate is a measure which has been in force in this country since the last war. So much for idea No. 1.

Idea No. 2, Mr. Speaker, puts a Toronto member in a bit of dilemma: I confess that. I want to confront the dilemma and indicate the alternatives as I see them and the reasons why, after all is said and done, I am also with the government on this one. Proposal No. 2 is that the Canada Assistance Plan be altered so that the federal government contributes more than 50 per cent to the cost of welfare. That is very tempting. By having the federal government contribute more than 50 per cent, it sounds as though the burden on the people of Toronto will be reduced. That appears to be the case. However, when you look behind that apparently simple proposal, you find it is not the case at all.

I wish to deal with the argument put forward by the hon. member for Spadina, who stated that the city government cannot raise additional resources to provide extra jobs or to increase welfare payments. He stated that taxes at the municipal level are already too high. I agree with that. Without wanting to digress very far, I note that the provincial government determines the manner in which municipalities raise their revenue. Queen's Park could allow the city of Toronto to have an income tax or sales tax if they so wish. However, what have they done? They have required the city of Toronto to depend on a most unfair and regressive land tax plan.

The hon. member had no hesitation in condemning that tax. But that is not a condemnation of the federal government; it is a condemnation of Queen's Park. They should smarten up at Queen's Park and revise the method by which revenues are raised by the city of Toronto.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kaplan: The hon. member then stated that we cannot ask the provincial government to raise more money. His reason is that the provincial government is in exactly the same position as the municipal government. He stated they are strapped for the same reason as the cities. I do not think that is valid; however, I accept the point that the provincial government is strapped. If the provincial government is strapped by the present downturn of the economy and other pressing problems, the federal government is just as strapped. As I stated a moment ago, the federal government gets its money from exactly the same place as the provincial government—our pockets. It has the same alternatives for raising revenue as the provincial government. There is no mountain of gold in Ottawa. Its resources come substantially from Toronto pockets.

I could accept the argument of the hon. member for Spadina if he were from Newfoundland, Quebec or one of the hard pressed Prairie provinces. However, coming from Toronto, his proposal is entirely illusory and against the interests of our city. The effect is that the revenue which the federal government would require if welfare payments were increased would affect our city in a disproportionate manner. A federal government program of this kind would benefit Newfoundland, Quebec and the Prairie provinces, but from the point of view from my constituents, the people of Toronto, it would cost them more than they would get out of it. I challenge the hon. member to demonstrate that the people of Toronto would be better off if the federal contribution under the Canada Assistance Plan were increased. I take the opposite view; I feel they would be substantially worse off.

The depressed areas of this country would benefit from such a proposal. That may not be an objection to the hon. member's proposal, but I think it should be weighed. I am prepared on occasion to recommend proposals that operate against the people of Toronto but are in the national interest. However, let us call a spade a spade. The suggestion that increasing the welfare ratio would somehow benefit the people of my city is entirely misdirected.

I now turn to argument No. 3, that the federal government should give more than the $160 million that it offered to the municipalities of this country. I can deal with this argument very quickly. The hon. member states that there should be grants rather than loans. Whether there are grants or loans, the fact is that the very day these proposals were introduced offering $160 million, British Columbia applied for its full share. A few days later Quebec applied for its share. Two or three days ago, months after the offer was made to the province and municipalities of this country, New Brunswick applied for its share.

What about the government of Ontario and the $17 million that was promised to us? In our city we are faced with maximum unemployment and other terrible problems. Instead of accepting the offer which was made by the federal government, an offer which was good for British Columbia, good enough for Quebec and good enough in the maritime provinces, the government of Ontario has sat back without responding.

I was told by an alderman of the city of Toronto that the share which was to go to Toronto was not determined until February 4. The period between November, when this offer was made, and February was the period of maximum unemployment in our city, on a seasonally-adjusted basis. It was during that period, when other provinces were taking up the offer of the federal govenment, that Queen's Park was sitting back doing nothing. The hon. member for Spadina claimed that the city of Toronto itself was not offered anything, that it just went to metro.

I should like to point out that the $17 million was offered to Ontario; the distribution was left to the provincial government. I do not know whether $5 million eventually will go to Toronto, or $3 million. As far as Toronto is concerned, the $5 million offer has waited for three months. I know they have yet to come up with a scheme to use the $3 million or $5 million or, indeed, the $17 million. In other provinces, where there is also unemployment, these funds are already at work. This is proposal No. 3 which the official opposition put forward —the only substantial proposal.

The hon. member for Spadina concluded by warning the Toronto members that a delegation was coming here from Toronto with a good idea and that we had better listen. We had some advance news of this idea because we went to Toronto, at the invitation of the mayor, a few weeks ago and were told of this proposal. I do not intend to "knock" the proposal but I want to put it into perspective. Toronto has come up with a proposal, in a city where 20,000 are unemployed, for putting 120 municipal workers back to work at a cost to the federal government of a grant of $5 million. I am not saying we should not do something for these 120 workers but—

[Mr. Kaplan.]

Mr. Deputy Spaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member may continue with unanimous consent. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Ricard: No.

Mr. Bell: He could go on for a sentence or two, like the rest.

Mr. Ricard: I did not give consent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is no agreement.

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I am thankful for the opportunity to rise in my place tonight to speak on this motion of non-confidence for the period ending March 26.

I congratulate my hon. friend from Spadina (Mr. Ryan) on advancing this non-confidence motion because of the serious, high incidence of unemployment which is now at a record high of almost 700,000, and because of the adverse situation into which the government has allowed the country to fall. The blame for this arises directly from the government policy, directly from the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) declared and often-quoted intention of last year when he stated that the amount of unemployment he invited or would tolerate in order, as he said, to combat inflation was 6 per cent, perhaps more.

The motion condemns the government for failing to foresee and provide for the escalating effects of this unemployment policy. That is true enough. The government has sown the wind and now it is reaping the whirlwind. The escalating effects of the Prime Minister's unemployment policy have had a degrading effect upon the responsible manhood and womanhood of the country. In the confusion and melée, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) declares: Oh, yes, we have a slightly embarrassing degree of unemployment, but we point out that we have raised unemployment benefits by a considerable degree. Mr. Speaker, it is not unemployment benefits that responsible, unemployed fathers and mothers and the unemployed youth of this country want when they are laid off their jobs. They want work, steady work.

Liberalism, in its constant deception of the Canadian people, is playing its nefarious game of region against region, province against province, race against race and, yes, sometimes capital against labour, and definitely government against labour. It is now reaching out unjustly to try to put some categories and professions into its unemployment insurance fund when they should not be there, and I refer directly to the teachers of this country.

Hon. members on all sides of this House are receiving hundreds of letters protesting attempts by the Trudeau government to grab millions of dollars a year from teachers who never have been unemployed and who never will be unemployed. Yet the Prime Minister and his labour minister have convinced the cabinet that this should be done and are now trying to convince the Commons and the country that we should perpetrate this new injustice, taxation without representation, which is uncomfortably close to fraud.

We shall have more to say in the near future in the House against this measure. I tell the Prime Minister that he had better take a leaf out of British and American history and study the career of George IV who witnessed a revolution because of unjust taxation—taxation without representation or benefit to those taxed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Wasn't that George III?

Mr. Alkenbrack: I hear a remark on the point I have just made. It still stands. This is the same thing, a close parallel to events leading to 1776.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Does the hon. member not realize that we are just trying to get the right king for him. It was George III, not George IV.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Yes, I have "George III" in my notes. I must have misread my own notes. I have George III here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alkenbrack: This non-confidence motion deplores and condemns the Trudeau government's lack of rapport with the provinces and the municipalities; its failure to consult and co-operate with these bodies in providing emergency financial support and employment programs. I know that employment programs generated in an emergency are not always a permanent answer, palliative or cure for the problem, but they help. They helped Franklin D. Roosevelt and his government in the New Deal during the great depression. They gave unemployed men and women a little pride and a renewal of confidence, particularly self-confidence. Employment programs helped Canadians in the depression of the 1930s.

A number of people in Canada and an increasing number of members of this House have no confidence in this government's methods of handling this serious problem. At the same time, Canadian personal self-confidence, although faced with adversity is still buoyant, thank God. The government's lack of imagination and appalling lack of interest in the great social problem of unemployment is tragic. Despite the declarations of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and the deceptive answers they are giving the press and the people, I contend we are experiencing a serious recession. Many members of this House are old enough to remember the depression of the thirties.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. MacGuigan: It is obvious you did not study economics.

Alleged Non-Support of Employment Programs

Mr. Alkenbrack: I will be talking later about economics. The problem with this government is that their economics are all awry. I wish to draw an analogy here, hopping that it will halt the Prime Minister's headlong and headstrong thirst for personal power—particularly as demonstrated in the omnibus bill, C-207—and bring him back to reality as voiced by the protest of today's non-confidence motion. We hope that this will point up to him the prime importance of the present unemployment situation, which means the collapse of the personal economies and hopes of at least one million Canadians, comprising those who are unemployed and their dependants.

I recall a Prime Minister in my younger days, the much-maligned R. B. Bennett, a man who headed the Canadian government in the worst days ever to befall Canada or any other country. He served the Canadian people in the days of the great depression, a catastrophe that struck with equal force at all countries on earth. Some of the members of the government who are laughing tonight at my words do not even remember the depression because they were not even born at that time. They do not remember the seriousness of the situation of that day.

At a time when the economy of the world was sick, when there were no markets for products, when there were not the means to preserve jobs or to generate new ones, Mr. Bennett none the less set out to create jobs for his people. He set men to work on the roads and in the forests. He co-operated with the provinces and municipalities. He dreamed up projects that resulted in national parks across the country that are enjoyed by our people and by tourists to this day. At a time when any Prime Minister might have been forgiven for throwing up his hands in the face of an impossible task, Mr. Bennett searched his mind and the minds of his colleagues, trying to dream up jobs.

He tried because he cared, because he considered his mandate to govern as a sacred trust, not as something to be thrown away or treated as lightly as it is today. Because he cared, the Canadian people suffered less than they might have. Needless to say, Mr. Bennett's record was judged on the basis of events that were played on the world stage rather than on the record of what he did for Canada.

On the other hand, we now have a Prime Minister who has at his disposal the wealth of a great nation, a nation with a much larger population and many times the wealth it had in the thirties. Today the economy of the world has never been more dynamic or stable. If the present Prime Minister cared even a fraction as much as some of his predecessors for the plight of his fellow Canadians, he would not be tempted to joke about the fact that almost 700,000 Canadians are looking for jobs.

Would a Prime Minister who cared about his people even consider creating massive and crippling unemployment in order to cure inflation, or for any reason? The Prime Minister says that inflation has been licked and that things are looking up. Even as he says that, the Dominion Bureau of Statistics reports 130,000 more unemployed than in the preceding month. The Prime Minister says that inflation has been licked, and then steadfastly refuses to adopt measures to stimulate the economy so that new jobs can be created. Jobs do not occur by chance or by whim; they have to be created by industries and by business. But industries and businesses can only survive and grow in a healthy economy. There is a strange contradiction between the statements of the government and the facts.

I doubt that there is a record in the long history of Canada of a Prime Minister telling his people that if they do not like the way he is running the country, they can lump it. But our present Prime Minister has said just that. Is there any wonder, then, that he can find millions of dollars per year for aid programs for Ceylon, Indonesia, Pakistan, India, and countless millions for other countries, but cannot or will not attempt to find solutions to fundamental social and economic problems in his own country?

A couple of weeks ago it was brought to the attention of the House of Commons that a secret memo had been circulated in public service offices in Ottawa calling upon department heads to create jobs for 250 French Canadian college graduates who could not find work. The jobs were to be at senior levels, but there would not be the screening and testing procedures for these positions that are part of the laws governing the appointment and promotion of federal employees. At the bottom of the memo there was a notation that this order would not be made public.

When faced with this, the government's ministers at first denied that such a memo existed. When a copy was produced, the Prime Minister then admitted there was a document but said the program was actually only a feasibility study. When pressed further, he admitted that the government was planning to bring in these French Canadians in such a manner and said he was entitled to do so in the interest of creating better balance between English and French Canadians in the federal service.

Such a practice violates the principles of fair employment in that it discriminates in favour of a language or ethnic group. It is in violation of the government's own Public Service Employment Act, and it is in contravention of the merit system in the public service that is designed to ensure that appointments and promotions are made throughout the service on the basis of merit. It is a sad commentary on the conduct of the present government that 250 people from a specific language group are brought into choice federal jobs through the back door, when there are hundreds of thousands of unemployed Canadians of other ethnic and language groups looking to their government for leadership and employment.

It is being said that the government is doing so much damage to our traditional institutions and to our system of government that there can never be any recovery from its effects, especially since this government has about two more years to rule. I do not believe that. The Canadian people can and will return our government to the people, and they will impartially restore our traditional institutions to their former greatness. Whatever the present government does to concentrate power in the few at the top can and will be undone. It has been done before—in the voting booths.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I see an hon. member rising, but I must point out that the time of the hon. member who has just resumed his seat has expired and he would not be able to answer a question unless there was unanimous consent. Is it agreed that the hon. member's time be extended to answer a question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is no agreement.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the party sitting in this section of the House I welcome a debate on social welfare as proposed by the official opposition. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) told us during the budget debate, 23 per cent of the nation's unemployed live in British Columbia, and this number is therefore bound to be reflected in the social welfare figures in my province. We of the NDP are often labelled the welfare party. This I categorically deny. Our whole purpose and philosophy is oriented to do everything we possibly can to remove people from social welfare rolls and, if possible, place them back into productive society.

Our programs and policies have always been oriented in this way, but because we are concerned with the casualties of the system, this current system, perhaps we have not paid enough attention to the rehabilitative role of social welfare and have concentrated too much on the maintenance role. In any event, as President Johnson once said rather crudely, we want to turn people into taxpayers, not tax eaters.

Much has been said about the government's anti-inflation policy and its relationship to the mounting unemployment roles. Because of mounting unemployment the municipalities I represent are faced with a tremendous increase in terms of their own budgets a direct result of increasing unemployment. I should like to quote a few figures which I think will indicate the magnitude of the problem faced by some of them. Let me refer to the welfare costs of the municipality of Surrey for the years 1968, 1969 and 1970. The total municipal expenditure in 1968 was $866,000. In 1969 it was $1,040,000, and in 1970 it was approximately $1,500,000.

Let me give the House the figures in respect of one or two other municipalities which I represent. In the rural municipality of Langley the cost in 1969 was $59,000. In 1970 the cost was $67,000, and in 1971 the estimated cost is $92,000. The population involved in social welfare in these municipalities during the same years increased from 8.06 per cent to 8.09 per cent, and this year to an incredible 10.12 per cent. In the suburban municipality of Port Moody, which is highly industrialized, the cost to the municipality in 1969 was $17,500, in 1970 it was $19,000, and in 1971 it is estimated to be $45,000.

These social welfare statistics represent abstract points and very often hide the human suffering and bitterness which results from cold and hard figures. For a moment let us look, instead, at the human interests of the people in my riding. Let me read from a letter I received from one of my constituents. It reads in part:

> After the tugboat strike I am blacklisted and am unable to get a job. What with the strike and unemployment I have no unemployment benefits left. I had to get a job at $1.65 per hour or go on welfare. That I don't want. But, however, I can quite see why people go on the welfare and stay there. It would not pay them to take a job at $1.65 an hour and pay into the pension fund and unemployment stamps. They make more in a month than I do working, plus they get free hospital, dentist, doctor, etc., etc. I can quite see their point of view, why work? They could not afford to live on $1.65 per hour and keep a family, so going on welfare they receive more. It seems that there are many thousands of people only making $1.65 per hour, mostly workers who don't belong to a trade union.

He goes on to say how difficult it is for him to manage after being a highly paid and, presumably, highly skilled industrial worker. He concludes by saying:

> I am only writing this so that you can see, from a working man's point of view, the way things are under this Liberal government. This tough year of unemployment might teach the working man which way to vote the next time.

I am sure this man has a great deal of faith. I hope it will not be necessary for the workingman to take the punitive political action suggested by this constituent. I hope the government will read the signs and see the way things are. Let us consider suggestions which have been made in respect of this difficult problem of continuing and increasing unemployment. As a result of a study by the Vancouver United Community Services, a booklet was issued under the title "Guaranteed income or guaranteed employment?» On the first page of the summary and conclusions it is stated:

> A more basic reason for the support of the guaranteed income concept by all political parties is our changing technology and changing labour needs. Private industry no longer needs the pool of low-skilled labour which once provided an important cushion for the ups and downs of the labour market.

The booklet goes on to say other things. For instance, at page iii it states:

> If benefits for the unemployed are set at adequate levels, what of the 'work incentive'? Will the result be to create a nation of loafers? And with increasing automation, should we stress the need for work—or train for leisure?

But they answer their own question in paragraph 1 by observing:

> Several factors suggest that "man cannot live by bread alone", that opportunity for constructive work should be our primary goal.
> People want and need to work. They develop their identity, their meaning in life, through working in an occupation. Contrary to popular belief, mounting evidence shows that when job opportunities with adequate incomes are available, even the "hard-core unemployed" choose to work rather than loaf.

These UCS people have some other very interesting things to say, but I see that I am not getting through to many members by quoting from these scholarly sources so I will return to my notes. Time is limited.

What is needed instead of a piecemeal approach is a comprehensive social security policy. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) is well aware of the different, competing and overlapping plans which now exist, including old age security, family allowances, unemployment insurance and others. We can no longer accept such a patchwork type of system to meet the needs of the people in our society. We need, instead, some kind of comprehensive social security package in the form of a guaranteed income plan. If we cannot supply guaranteed employment we will have to move toward an income maintenance program.

In spite of all the mutterings to the contrary, in the municipalities I represent there are few malingerers on welfare. Some politicians get a great deal of mileage out of the myth or the misconception that much of our welfare tax dollar is going to this type of person. They get a lot of mileage out of the suggestion that welfare payments go to people who basically are lazy bums. This is not the situation in my area, although there may be some there. I think it might be worth while to examine the situation and find out what type of person is on welfare.

First of all there are the aged. A person who is by one day under 65 can receive $95 per month from social welfare. If that person were 65 he might receive $130 or $135 per month. In this example alone we can see that there is a cruel anomaly. Let us consider the abandoned wife with children. She is tied up in the home. Very often she worked before she was married but, having been deserted or abandoned, she is stuck with the children and cannot get out to work. Therefore, few have any alternative but to abandon the children or go on social welfare, and in most cases they choose the latter.

Further, there are the physically disabled people who are unable to work because of physical disability or illness. There are the people with psychological problems. They may be alcoholics, people who fight with their bosses or cannot get along with their wives and as a result cannot go to work the next day. Unless they receive much counselling they will probably never be able to hold steady jobs.

There are the dropouts who do not have the education or skill to compete for employment in this highly technological age. Our society demands a higher and higher level of skill all the time. In spite of this we have another group of unemployed who require an increasing proportion of our welfare funds: these people are overeducated for the development of our country.

What kind of solution can we propose to assist in solving these problems in our society? Certainly day-care centres would be very useful for wives with some saleable skill who would like to go out to work. I think that for a number of the psychologically and physically handicapped we will have to look for these kinds of things that we have for people who have mental deficiencies, such as sheltered shops. For many people who cannot "hack it" on the treadmill from eight to five o'clock every day, communities must set up sheltered workshops with auxiliary counseling services, probably padre services, and nursing and medical services so that these people contribute what they can, because they will never be able to compete under the normal demands of a workaday world.

We should be looking seriously to earlier retirement of people. I was impressed by the concept of the United Auto Workers whose slogan was "Out at Thirty". After 30 years of service it should be possible for anyone who has worked all his life and contributed to be able to retire without sacrificing too much of his income. Many people would retire much earlier if it were not for the shellacking they would have to take on their income. For those people who are concerned about retiring too early and who find that to be an upsetting emotional concept, my view is that it is far worse to be retired permanently at the age of 25 than at the age of 55, and that is what faces many of today's young people.

I think, also, we should be looking at some of our agricultural surpluses and beginning to investigate what other countries have done in this area. We have many agricultural surpluses, such as in apples, butter and broilers. Just this week we will be shipping three million pounds of broilers worth almost $400,000, subsidized by the Canadian people, to help the people of Japan. If we had a free food stamp program in this country, perhaps we could subsidize those people who need that food right here in Canada—and there are many people who do.

We talk about the demand for meat products but we seldom talk about the need, because these are two different concepts. I think we should be investigating a school lunch program as well. The point is not the give-away. The point is that the government has refused to provide enough funds except for marginal existence for many people. A food stamp program or a school lunch program would at least liberate some of the funds that we give to people for other purposes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I must do so to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to take part in this debate on unemployment. For the past few days I have been listening to the speeches of opposition members and I wonder if people are justified in thinking that unemployment is something new in Canada. It seems as if that plague, unemployment, has just been discovered, but to my knowledge no solution was brought forward in order to eliminate unemployment.

As everybody knows, unemployment is due to several causes. Within a thirty-year period, we lived through the first industrial revolution, which brought the difficulties of the twenties, and I believe the experience we, Canadians as well as Americans, are living through now, could be called the second industrial revolution, a revolution brought about by intensive automation and a concern for efficiency that makes employment more and more scarce.

Moreover, the Canadian climate is one of the great causes of unemployment during winter months. The same can be said of the difficulties encountered by the American economy and, whether we like it or not, as soon as the Americans face difficulties in employment, we feel the after-effects.

One must not forget either that it is in the Canadian government's interest to fight inflation. People with fixed salaries, people who are not represented by powerful unions, people receiving pensions they paid with 1925, 1930 and 1940 dollars are in the throes of inflation. Now the Canadian government has taken that problem in hand. Ours is one of the industrialized countries that were most successful in their fight against inflation.

Let us see now if the unemployment we deplore so much is something new in Canada. I have here statistics that I should like to recall to the opposition members. In 1959, the unemployment rate was 6 per cent; in 1961, 7.1 per cent; in 1963, 5.5 per cent; in 1965, 3.9 per cent, in 1966, 3.6 per cent, in 1969 and in 1970, 4.7 and 5.9 per cent respectively.

Obviously, the unemployment problem is not new to us since we were already faced with it in 1957, 1958 and 1959. What steps did the government take to fight unemployment? It did manage in spite of everything to create 212,000 jobs in 1970. Some will say that it was not enough—and I agree with this—to give jobs to all the unemployed and to all the young people entering the labour market. However, for a year such as 1970, during which we successfully fought inflation, it is our opinion that 212,000 jobs is nevertheless a significant figure.

There are all kinds of programs to alleviate unemployment. Among others the government has initiated an urban renewal program which was launched in 1965 and which is helping municipalities, both Toronto and Saint-Jérôme where I live. In fact, this program which will be in force for several more years, is giving work to many seasonal workers.

Over the twelve months which preceded December 1, 1970, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) and the officials of his department had been able to create 20,033 new jobs representing an aggregate investment of $546 million. This expansion program will be stepped up in 1971 and it is hoped that the number of jobs created will be much higher in 1971.

The government recently introduced a bill setting up the Canada Development Corporation in order to allow Canadians to invest their savings in Canadian industries, in industries which belong to them.

The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation's budget has recently been increased, a measure which will bring about a vigourous upswing in the building of low rent housing in Canada.

All sorts of actions have been taken to check unemployment. As every other country, we are faced with difficulties and the Europeans, keep saying that Canada is faced with the kind of problems everybody would like to have. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has been told recently that the performance of the Canadian economy has been breaking all records for years.

If members of the opposition wish to contribute to the fight against unemployment, they could make fewer speeches and stop blocking legislation. I refer particularly to Bill C-207, the omnibus bill which among other things would setup a Department of the Environment responsible for pollution control. This department will see to the construction of several sewage treatment plants and the implementation of a good number of projects and programs likely to create many jobs.

On the other hand, knocking our national policy surely does not help to create confidence among investors who might be considering investments in Canada.

We hear hon. members of the opposition day after day criticizing the government policy and the methods used to fight unemployment. I have not yet heard a single suggestion likely to alleviate the problem.

If I were to point out a shortcoming among the Canadian people, I should say that they do not care enough to buy products manufactured in Canada. According to recent figures, each Canadian citizen imported goods worth $700 in 1970, whereas in the United States imports per capita amounted to $180, and in Japan, to $150. It might be advisable to do some promotion for the products manufactured in this country and to encourage Canadians to buy more of them.

Mr. Speaker, I know that some opposition members are anxious to be heard, and I think I should now close my remarks.

[English]

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I am very concerned about having to take part in this debate, primarily because it was not too long ago that we had an opportunity of expressing our feelings in no uncertain terms with respect to the attitude of the government. But once again we find that as a result of the government's callousness and its direct lack of concern, as shown in the policy it is attempting to implement, it is necessary that we continue to drive home the fact that the country is facing a national crisis. This crisis is brought about by the government's fiscal and monetary policies. These are not my words; they are the words of the mayors of several Canadian municipalities.

My own city of Hamilton, which is similar to many other cities in terms of the hardships it is encountering because of the government's policies, is facing an increase in welfare expenditures totalling more than $3 million over last year's expenditures. This is a frightening situation, considering the tax base upon which cities operate. I am at a loss to know where cities will get the extra money they need for welfare unless tax reforms are brought about as a result of federal and provincial concern. It is time for such concern when a city like Hamilton, with a population of 300,000 people, is budgeting for welfare costs of some $10.5 million, about $3 million more than last year.

I would like to quote from a document prepared by R. J. Protti, research officer for the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities, entitled "Welfare Expenditures and Local Government", issued January 22, 1971. In it he reports on the results of a questionnaire submitted to members of the federation concerning the welfare implications of current high rates of unemployment. One of the questions asked of municipalities was: "What is the rate of unemployment in your municipality?" He reports as follows:

> Answers to question (a) ranged from minimal to over 13 per cent. Some respondents indicated that they expected the unemployment situation to worsen in the first three or four months of 1971.
> What was most notable about responses to question (a) was the number of approximations and "guess-estimates" of unemployment rates that had to be made for particular municipal units. Neither the Dominion Bureau of Statistics nor Canada Manpower offices could provide accurate unemployment statistics for a specific municipality. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics only supplies unemployment rates monthly on a provincial basis. Canada Manpower offices generally cover areas which can and most often do include more than two municipal units.

I take it from this that even the municipalities do not know exactly how many people are unemployed in their own communities. If the city of Hamilton thinks it has something like 20,000 unemployed, Lord knows what the actual figure is. Also, in replying to the questionnaire the municipalities indicated that they were concerned about the cost-sharing arrangements among all levels of government in respect of welfare expenditures. Notwithstanding what the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Kaplan) has said, Mr. Speaker, this is an important matter to the cities.

In British Columbia the federal share is 50 per cent, the provincial share 30 per cent and the municipalities pay 20 per cent. It is the same ratio in Alberta. In Saskatchewan provincial government pays 45 per cent and the municipalities 5 per cent. In Ontario the ratio again is 50 per cent federal, 30 per cent provincial and 20 per cent municipal. The municipalities are very concerned about the reluctance of the federal government to help further. I respectfully submit that we are facing a national crisis, notwithstanding the speech of the hon. member for Don Valley. It is time for federal action before it is too late.

We cannot continually hide behind the Constitution, Mr. Speaker, because in the long run this means we are not credible. In order to be credible we must recognize that we are experiencing a national crisis when 668,000 members of our labour force are unemployed, acknowledging that this is primarily due to the fiscal and monetary policies of the government. When the mayors were asked what measures they believed could and should be taken by the federal government to alleviate the situation, they replied:

Alleged Non-Support of Employment Programs

The vast majority of the 47 respondents to this question offered more than one suggestion for alleviating the current situation. The suggestions are divided into short-term (immediate) and longer-term measures.

By far the most popular measure advocated (mentioned by approximately 45 per cent of the respondents) was the immediate introduction by either the federal or provincial governments of a winter works program similar to the program which existed in the 1960s. Also of a short-term nature is the suggestion that there be an immediate increase in the level of unemployment insurance benefits.

Let me pose a few questions with respect to that last statement, Mr. Speaker. I am at a loss to understand why the government has not attempted to provide some relief under the Unemployment Insurance Act at this time. Surely there should be easier access to benefits and they should be increased. Is it necessary to wait until April, 1971? We continually hear members on the government benches stating that they are working on it and will be bringing it in shortly, but they want to bring in the whole act. This attitude is irresponsible because at present there are many people whose benefits have run out, and unless there is an extension of seasonal benefits it appears to me that the government is asking people to go on the welfare rolls. That is greasing the skids of economic chaos, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: It shows an irresponsible approach to a very serious problem.

An hon. Member: There are only eight government members present.

Mr. Alexander: I am very concerned about what unemployment means, Mr. Speaker. The following has been stated by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development:

Long-term unemployment signifies lost productivity and life wasted, both national and individual misfortune.

In 1970, the annual average number of persons experiencing unemployment for four months and longer was 164,000. This is higher than every other year in the preceding decade except 1961. The Liberal government, with its rhetoric about participatory democracy, has distributed unemployment impartially among all classes in our society. But there is little doubt that the poor suffer most. Close to 100,000 of the approximately 500,000 unemployed Canadians in the third quarter of 1970 are listed as people who have never had a full-time civilian job lasting two weeks or more. Unskilled labourers, semi-skilled craftsmen and production workers, farm and mine workers, account for almost half of all Canadians without jobs.

When Ottawa puts price stability at a higher priority level than high unemployment, the poor are trapped between fewer job opportunities on the one hand and rising taxes and restricted credit on the other. While some of the poor may be seriously hurt by inflation, more of them are hurt by high unemployment. I do not need to elaborate further, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. W. Cheeseman, president of Westinghouse, made a speech in Kitchener recently and voiced his concern about the path being taken by this government. In the course of his remarks he said:

Are we going to demand that government planning, government policies and government actions should be aimed at making Canada viable industrially through hard-headed business decisions? Through realistic, not naïve, trading arrangements and through a determination to upgrade more of Canada's raw materials here in Canada and gain the advantages of solidly based secondary industries.

In what other country of the industrial world will you find corporation income tax at the 52 per cent level? Not to mention the so-called temporary 3 per cent surtax! In the United Kingdom the tax rate was 45 per cent but is due soon to be reduced to 42.5 per cent. In the U.S. it is 48 per cent. In Japan the rates are from 26 to 35 per cent. In France it is 50 per cent, and in Italy 49.5 per cent (if they catch you!) The difference doesn't sound like much but an additional 2 to 4 per cent corporate income tax is another cost burden of real significance to Canadian producers in fiercely competitive world markets.

If a greater proportion of the growing work force is to be employed, the new jobs cannot be provided by an increased rate of public spending.

He went on to say:

There are a number of efficient, labour intensive, industries in Canada where growth has slackened or levelled off in the last few years. As a result, capital will not be put into industries until there is some assurance of a growth environment. And there can be none, unless government adopts policies which strengthen existing efficient industries in both their own domestic markets and in export markets.

To make matters worse, Mr. Speaker, Canada has dropped to No. 4 in the most prosperous nations category as indicated by the World Bank. The sequence is as follows: the United States, Sweden, Switzerland, Canada. I have often heard the member for Don Valley refer to the goals of full employment, a high and sustained rate of economic growth, reasonable price stability, a viable balance of payments position and an equitable sharing of rising incomes. The government needs an economic policy which is devoted to growth and full employment for all Canadians. It would seem to me, therefore, that our role should be to articulate the need for full economic growth so that the Canadian economic potential can be completely realized.

I know that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) will be interested in the remarks of Senator David Croll as reported in the Toronto Daily Star of Wednesday, November 11, 1970. The Senator said:

Anti-poverty programs will be ineffective unless the government takes steps to end economic uncertainty and curb rising unemployment.

I know that the minister is very concerned about the poor, as I am, but when I look at the attitude of this government I wonder how credible it really is. The Senate committee is working on a four-year plan to lift four million people out of poverty. Therefore, a high and sustained economic growth must be assured in order to provide programs to overcome shortcomings in existing welfare measures, education and retraining programs, legal and medical aid, and housing. Notwithstanding that, issues have been raised as a result of the five goals set up.

The first point at issue is that on the one hand the government feels that not all the economic goals are of equal importance, while on the other hand the Economic Council feels that all goals are of equal importance. Moreover, the government is prepared to tackle one goal at a time, whereas the council claims that an effort must be made to achieve all goals simultaneously.

The second point at issue is that implicitly the government believes that high unemployment and low growth are temporary costs which have to be paid in order to achieve price stability. The council warns that if these temporary costs are forced upon the economy for too long, they will do permanent harm. Some exploration of this second point is needed. When the economy runs at reduced capacity, the actual rate of growth is less than the potential rate of growth. In the short run—less than two years—the initial costs in such a situation are unemployment, economic hardships on the individual business and consumer, and reduced tax revenue for governments at the same time as their expenditures are increasing.

The government is apparently willing to pay these short-run costs in the name of price stability. But what about the long-term, hidden costs? Is the government prepared to ask Canadians to pay these costs? These long-term costs are the irreplaceable losses in potential caused by running the economy at below capacity. The council feels that——such losses (i.e., no growth and high unemployment) are cumulative for every year in which such a gap exists between actual and potential output. Nor is the loss ever made up, even when the gap is closed—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret very much to interrupt the hon. member, but I do so to tell him that his time has expired.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it has been nice to listen to some of the speeches made by hon. members who support the motion moved by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Ryan). I must say that I never heard so many contradictory statements in terms of what should be done in Canada in this situation.

My hon. friend from Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) seemed to be talking about increasing unemployment insurance benefits and increasing our expenditure in the social assistance area, which would add greatly to our expenditures. Then he started to quote some paragraphs from a speech made by the president of the Westinghouse Corporation who indicated that our problems would not be solved by increased public expenditures. These statements are somewhat contradictory. Then he talked in general terms about easing the government's fiscal and monetary policies. Having listened to some of the opposition speeches, I assume that what he means by that is easing the money supply and an expansionary policy in terms of expenditures that would stimulate economic growth.

Alleged Non-Support of Employment Programs

All this, as the hon. member must be aware, this government has been doing for the last six months. So if one talks in terms of expansionary policies, these indeed add to public expenditures. I do not know how you can ride two horses in two different directions at the same time; it is a nice feat if you can do it. I think the hon. member for Hamilton West is to be congratulated for endeavouring to ride two horses. I think that the whole debate has been along that line. There have been very few constructive suggestions as to how we can cope with this situation.

Mr. Munro: The motion moved by the hon. member for Spadina reads:

That this House condemns the government's failure to foresee and take steps to provide for the escalating effects of its unemployment policy upon the social assistance funds of the provinces and municipalities and its failure to consult and co-operate with the provinces and municipalities in providing emergency financial support and employment programs.

This shows really a desperate dearth of anything constructive in terms of policies that we might implement now.

Mr. Stanfield: Come now!

Mr. Munro: There is no suggestion of any guarantee. If we should adopt a policy such as set out here, and if we gave relief to the municipalities to help along the line of social assistance there is, according to this motion, no guarantee that the money would go to those who are unemployed and on social assistance. I take from the wording of the motion that the opposition does not think this important. The money could go to a municipality and they could use it for any purpose at all; it could be totally unrelated to the problem that the hon. member and other hon. members opposite are so concerned about. If that is the best that the opposition can offer—

An hon. Member: The minister has not been listening.

Mr. Munro: —with respect to positive policies for coping with this situation, if the opposition suggests that we should just hand out money without any guarantee that it will do anything realistic in terms of serving the situation that the country is facing, then I cannot help feeling a certain sense of satisfaction.

An hon. Member: How stupid do you think the mayors are?

Mr. Munro: The opposition's thinking is so sterile that it surely cannot pretend to be a reasonable alternative to the present government.

The Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) rising on a point of order?

Mr. Alexander: No, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister would be kind enough to allow me to ask a question. The minister berated me in a charitable way because I had indicated that Mr. Cheeseman did not think that pumping money into the economy was the solution. Does the minister not agree with the alternative proposed by Mr. Cheeseman, namely, a reduction in taxes? In other words, does he not agree that the policy of tax incentives is a proper policy for the government to pursue?

Mr. Munro: My answer to that question is that it shows a further contradiction in the hon. member's argument. In view of the deficits that we are now running into, is he saying that we should increase social assistance and unemployment insurance, which is a further burden on the taxpayers in terms of contributions? Is he espousing further expansionary policies to stimulate economic development, which would mean more taxes and more expenditures and, at the same time, is he saying that we should reduce taxes?

Mr. Korchinski: It sounds as if the minister has trouble from all sides.

Mr. Munro: It seems to me that the hon. member's position is loaded with contradictions. Surely what we are talking about, Mr. Speaker, is an easing of the money supply. Surely what we are talking about is expansionary policies, about increased expenditures to get the economy going. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has documented precisely how we are going to do this.

In the meantime, let us look at a more positive way than that of increasing the amount of money to municipalities. Let us look at a way that might help them with their social assistance problems and yet carry with it the guarantee that the assistance will help the people who are receiving social assistance as well as the unemployed. One might ask, how am I to do this on more positive lines? I suggest that you look at the white paper on income security for a few pointers. What we talk about there is redistribution within our present social security system, within our income security system, to put money into the hands of lower-income groups. That way you could ensure that the people living in poverty that so many hon. members seem to be concerned about will receive the benefit.

An hon. Member: When?

Mr. Munro: If we adopted the policy set out in the motion, there would be no guarantee that those people would receive anything. There is no guarantee whatsoever. But if we redefine our policies—

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question.

Mr. Munro: When I have finished, if the hon. member does not mind. If hon. members want to adopt constructive policies of direct payments to persons, payments that will have a redistributing effect in favour of the lower-income groups, they should look at several of the schemes we have now and at suggestions as to how they should be changed. There has been some discussion of the guaranteed annual income.

Mr. Woolliams: I do not think so.

[Mr. Alexander.]

Mr. Munro: Is the opposition suggesting that we must put all the emphasis on social assistance and that this is the only answer? If so, what is their position on the guaranteed annual income which some of them have espoused? The two concepts do not work very well together. Social assistance, it seems to me, has been acknowledged by everyone as being the least attractive way of helping the lower-income groups. It is the least attractive of all. It is the measure of last resort. To attack the government, while at the same time proposing what I think everyone is prepared to acknowledge as the least attractive of all the income security measures with which to prime the pump, seems to show a complete abdication in terms of trying to find constructive solutions for what is facing the people today.

An hon. Member: The minister did not listen.

Mr. Munro: The only member of the opposition whom I thought had constructive policies to suggest was the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose). He suggested that since social assistance is one of the least attractive of our income security measures, and since a stigma is attached to it, that we who are in public life should combat this increasing stigma which attaches to people who must rely upon such assistance. He pointed out something that should be reiterated, that tremendous numbers of people on social assistance are people who are permanently out of the work force. The majority of them are cripples, widows or deserted wives and children. He also pointed out a solution that I think is worth repeating. He said that one solution for this problem, and we point this out in the white paper, is early retirement.

Ahead of us in the 1970s we shall probably reach the situation in which the nation will be affluent, in which there will be a favourable balance of trade, in which the business community will experience a favourable profit picture and in which, because of cybernation and automation, people will still be unemployed. Perhaps we ought to redefine our thinking in terms of what is employment. Perhaps there are constructive areas that should be considered as employment that have not heretofore been considered as employment. Perhaps we should start thinking in terms of having many of these people put their endeavours into social activities, recreational activities and constructive leisure activities.

Not one of these novel suggestions that could be positive in terms of rehabilitation for those on social assistance, or in terms of putting those suffering from low incomes into constructive and creative work, has emanated all day long from the official opposition.

In terms of the vertical distribution of income suggested in the White Paper, I should point out the effect this will have in terms of a generator of economic stimulation. As of April 1 we will commence to put into the economy an additional $200 million a year through the guaranteed income supplement. This will bring the total of the funds in the guaranteed income supplement and old age security to $2 billion a year. By directing this money toward the guaranteed income supplement it will go to those people who need it most, those in the lower-income groups. It will find its way into consumer purchases immediately and afford a stimulation to the economy. This is far more positive than talking about sending cheques to the municipalities to relieve their costs of social assistance, with no guarantee that the money will go to those who need help.

It might also be pointed out that relative to what we are suggesting in the FISP program, the alternative to the family allowance, we are now talking about redirecting at least $250 million in that system toward the lower-income group. The income supplementation that the families in the lower levels receive will be tripled. I am talking in terms of people who earn under $4,500 a year receiving $16 a month. When the additional expenditure of $200 million going to the guaranteed income supplement is combined with the approximately $200 million to $300 million that will be distributed through an alteration in FISP, there is the potentiality of half a billion dollars going to the lower-income group, the people who desperately need it. They will immediately spend it on consumer goods, which will result in a positive stimulation to the economy.

Mr. McCutcheon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order on behalf of my colleague, the hon. member from Essex, who is most anxious that a clipping he has be delivered to the minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is hardly a point of order. Perhaps I should indicate to the House that I understand there is an informal agreement that the minister will not take all his time, in order to allow a representative of the Créditiste party to speak.

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I acknowledge that the agreement exists. Having said what I have already said, which has obviously passed the attention of the opposition, I hope that during the course of the next few days we might hear more constructive suggestions on how to cope with the problem.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis) would like to ask a question. He can ask a question and the minister can reply, but I bring to the attention of the hon. member and the minister that there is agreement that the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) should be given an opportunity to speak in the last ten minutes.

Mr. MacInnis: The minister indicated he will accept the question. I guarantee it will be short; however, the length of the answer is something else. Will the minister give the House the government's definition of the word "guaranteed"?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to rise and protect the interests of the minority who has been trying to get the floor for a while.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank you very much and very sincerely for the protection you give minority groups in the House. At the end of a debate on a question that affects us so deeply, when only one member of our party has had the opportunity to express our viewpoint, obviously we feel rather neglected and rightly so. Happily, your intervention allows us to close on a Créditiste note a debate that has dragged on interminably because of negativism.

Considering I have not much time left and since the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Dupras) have said that the opposition did not propose any positive solution to check unemployment, I want to set the record straight.

Not only is that not true, but those who heard the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste (Mr. Caouette) know full well that he made several suggestions that could remedy the situation. But it seems his words fell on dry, rocky terrain, in short, on deaf ears, for the government members have done their utmost to say that we have proposed no solution.

In fact, I should like to bring up one of them again. In so doing, I shall use the same language and the same material the liberal members have used.

Recently, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) published a liberal brochure, with the taxpayers' money, entitled, "How your Tax Dollar is Spent", and this to encourage people to pay more taxes, under the pretext that this money is supposedly well managed! In this brochure, it is stated that for each tax dollar that is drawn from the pockets of the taxpayer, 14 cents are affected to the payment of public debts. Why? So as to pay interests to our creditors. On page 23, one can read the following:

> Canada's public debt amounted to $38 billion in October, 1970, and the Minister of Finance has forecast new government borrowings of $1.9 billion in 1971-72—

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) will get down on his knees before foreign financiers to borrow two billion, without the agreement of this House, without consulting us. He will go, on his own, and contribute to selling another part of Canada for another $2 billion, in short, for a pittance. On what terms? For an excessive rate of interest. Why? To develop our country? As the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste said this afternoon, we do have manpower, resources, unemployed workers—by the way, this government does not know what to do with them anymore—in short we have all that we need in Canada, but no money. So, we will go "on all fours" before Big Business and fetch $2 billion for 1971-72.

• (9:40 p.m.)

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is even more shameful, not only is it bad management but it is obviously a raw deal.

So that the people will swallow the pill, they are told at page 24 of the same booklet that, this year, $2 billion will be borrowed at an interest rate of 8 or 9 per cent from foreign bankers. This is what is said:

> This interest payment is almost wholly a return on investments in Canada by Canadians.

Alleged Non-Support of Employment Programs

Mr. Speaker, can a bigger lie than that one be told? Canadians will not be receiving $600 in dividends because they have invested in Canada. That is false! The Canadian government will take $600 in the Canadian taxpayers' pockets to pay interest to foreigners.

This means, Mr. Speaker, that we could not do anything in Canada without foreign capital. Canadian people are deluded and to publish these lies, public money is used.

But here is the most shameful of all. This is where I arrive at a positive solution. At page 28 of the booklet, under the heading "Foreign Affairs", the following may be read:

In addition to grants for international development, CIDA has also been given $172 million to lend to developing countries on generous terms.

What does that mean, interest-free loans?

Mr. Speaker, what we of the opposition are asking for—and this is a constructive proposal—is that the government obtain from the Bank of Canada an amount of credit based on the actual credit of the nation, that they then grant soft loans to the provincial governments, and to the municipalities which are now facing stagnation, to increase our economic growth.

Mr. Speaker, we fail to develop our resources and to satisfy the needs of the Canadian people but we tell them: "Tighten your belts, do not ask for wage increases in excess of 6 per cent". Meanwhile, however, the government gives the chartered banks authority to raise their profits by 22 per cent in the course of just one year, lets them exploit our people and all the while gives any foreigner the green light to make fat profits.

Our proposal is as follows: Let the government once and for all use the Bank of Canada to put our economy in order.

Unemployment, Mr. Speaker, is an abscess that is bursting today in the economic system. It id not grow like a mushroom. It could have been expected. It was in fact expected. We had announced it on many occasions, but the government, by tightening the money supply, by controlling it and reducing it by $560 million, increased poverty, discouraged Canadians from investing and helped increase unemployment.

This is why we say that unless the government takes the necessary fiscal and monetary measures at once to encourage Canadian investments in Canada, to develop our natural resources and provide jobs for Canadians, we shall have to go on putting up with a policy of poultices on wooden legs. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion, for instance, has become another Welfare department.

Indeed, not only individuals are on welfare, but also companies. They go bankrupt, and the government does nothing. Again, I have here statistics which could prove it eloquently.

For instance, I will mention that in 1968, there were 1.248 business bankruptcies in the province of Quebec. In 1969, that figure went up to 1,424, for a loss to creditors of nearly $120 million.

Now according to recent studies, each new job requires an average investment of $1,550. That is to say that the equivalent of 80,000 jobs would not have been created due to the sole fact of business bankruptcies.

Judging from the present state of the economy, losses due to bankruptcies will certainly exceed $150 million in 1971. This is therefore 100,000 times the amount required for creating one job.

Mr. Speaker, instead of continuing to put private companies on welfare and thus increase the indebtedness of Canadians and the rate of unemployment, let us put the economy in order, encourage private enterprise, respect the human person, put our money at the service of the people, rather than have the population and the government "on all fours" before foreigners trying to borrow millions for developing our resources. Since we do not have enough money, let us master what has not yet been subdued in Canada, namely, money, so that we may really be at home here and develop our country.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: It being 9.45 p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 58 (9), to interrupt the proceedings and forthwith put, without further debate or amendment, every question necessary to dispose of the said proceeding.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Orlikow) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

At 10.15 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, February 26, 1971

The House met at 11 a.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BALDWIN—ALLEGED REFLECTION BY PRIME MINISTER ON MANNER IN WHICH OPPOSITION DEALS WITH HOUSE BUSINESS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I rise on a question of privilege in respect of which I have given notice to Your Honour. It deals with the immoderate and intemperate charges levied by the Prime Minister against the opposition parties yesterday, charges which were quite improper and untrue. Your Honour will have noted that there has been filed with you under the pertinent rule a notice from each of the House Leaders of the opposition parties. When necessary we can disagree with each other, but when this institution is threatened by the kind of statements which were made yesterday our approach is that of people who are concerned about what happens to Parliament.

My question of privilege deals with statements made by the Prime Minister in French to French students. I have only a rough translation of a rough statement. I propose to read some of them to Your Honour and then, before I conclude, to cite authorities which indicate that these are in fact infringements upon this House. These are some of the statements he made:

They—

Referring to the opposition.

—try to stop the government programs by following the clock. They say—

I do not know whether or not the Prime Minister adopts this statement.

—parliament is rotten because they sit for weeks and don't pass any bills, preventing the government from passing all the laws and measures that are important—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin:

—gabbing for two weeks on government reorganization. They are blocking other things. The tactic of the opposition is to stop the government from doing anything.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: These statements are slanderous per se.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: No, they are truthful.

Mr. Baldwin: Certainly they contain a strong innuendo, which no one can mistake, that the opposition parties and their members are guilty of abusing their parliamentary functions and acting with impropriety in the discharge of their duties.

• (11:10 a.m.)

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, no member of this House, not even a Prime Minister who is suffering from unfounded delusions of grandeur, can make these charges and not expect to be called to account for them. I think the right hon. gentleman must school himself to accept the discipline of the rules of this House, as other hon. members do.

These statements are scurrilous and slanderous. In any event, they are riddled with distortions, half truths and perversions of the facts. Bills are passed and have been passed in this House, and any examination of the record will show that. Let us examine the record. Today's order paper contains only nine government measures; as a result of arrangements made, two of them will probably be passed today, leaving seven measures outstanding on the order paper. That is a fact which the Prime Minister ought to have known before he made these statements.

A statement was made yesterday about the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act. Shortly before the final passage of that Act, some of us conducted an examination of the time spent on it. Examination of the record indicated that government members had taken more time on that bill than any other party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: The Prime Minister has seen fit to level his charges primarily in respect of the government organization bill. I will not go back into the history of that bill and Your Honour's decision with respect to its omnibus nature. But let it be known that less than four hours were taken on second reading. Approximately 20 hours, or four days, were spent on the environmental aspect of the bill, which could be brought to a conclusion at any minute, as the government knows, by a certain procedure. Less than six hours were spent in dealing with the question of ministers of state. One hour was spent in dealing with the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, one hour was spent in dealing with the Department of the Postmaster General, and so on. When one examines clearly and honestly the time that has been spent on this bill which has been improperly brought before the House—when I say "improperly" I am not reflecting on Your Honour's decision but on the decision made by the government to bring it in—one will see that not that much time has been spent on it by the House.

Mr. Woolliams: It is just a salary raise for the Liberals.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, the House Leaders attempt as best they can to deal with difficult problems and operate through the usual channels to try to facilitate the business of the House. I will not go into the details of the meetings of House Leaders. Nevertheless, discussions took place not so long ago, and I will be corroborated in this statement by the House Leaders of the other parties, with regard to ways and means of working out a time-table and schedule and, if necessary, a possible House order with regard to the government organization bill. In light of the statements made by the right hon. gentleman, how can meetings of this type possibly continue to function? In view of the Prime Minister's statements, how can it be reasonably expected that members of the opposition parties will try to work out a form of timetable and a reasonable schedule for dealing with an important matter of this kind?

If the Prime Minister spent more time here he would realize that when legislation is introduced which in part or in whole is obnoxious and repugnant to the opposition parties, those parties would be derelict in their duty if they did not oppose that legislation vigorously, actively and, if necessary, to the point of arousing public opinion. If the representations of public opinion which I see, hear and read about in respect of the government organization bill are accurate, then I submit that the Prime Minister is very much in error if he thinks that there is a great demand on the part of the people of this country for passage of the government organization bill.

Mr. Woolliams: The Liberals want to increase their own salaries.

Mr. Baldwin: I do not intend to say any more. I simply want to quote to Your Honour from Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, Seventeenth Edition, pages 118 and 119:

> —breach of privilege by speaking words defamatory of either House or its proceedings,—
> Anagolous to the publication of libels upon either House is the publication of false or perverted, or of partial and injurious reports of debates or proceedings of either House or committees of either House—

At page 119, there is a list of cases, which are well-known to Your Honour, in proof of this comment. There is a repetition at page 124:

> Analogous to molestation of members on account of their behaviour in Parliament are speeches and writings reflecting upon their conduct as members.

Anything which constitutes a contempt in a court of law must be considered as a breach of the privileges of the House. I am not going to make a motion, Mr. Speaker. I think Your Honour has ruled in the past that while matters of this kind raise a proper point of privilege, they are not points of privilege which can be the subject of a motion. However, I submit to Your Honour and to hon. members that the kind of conduct of the Prime Minister yesterday, whether committed on bad advice, in ignorance or bad temper, is not the kind of conduct which is conducive to the passage of legislation in this House and to the good conduct of the proceedings of this institution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: As indicated by the hon. member for Peace River, similar notices were filed with the Chair by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Lotbinière. Rather than having three separate and extended debates on the same subject, it might be more appropriate if we heard as briefly as possible from the hon. members who have filed similar notices, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As already indicated by Your Honour, I gave you notice this morning under Standing Order 17(2) that I wished to raise a question of privilege. I do so in concert with the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin). I indicated in my notice to Your Honour that the point of privilege that prompts me to rise to my feet is the fact that statements made outside the House of Commons by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) have the effect of interfering with my role as one of the House Leaders and of interfering with the role of the four House Leaders collectively, and therefore these statements are damaging to the progress of business in the House of Commons.

I do not rise in anger, or with any thought of trying to return blow for blow or to castigate the other side, but to make an earnest plea. I make this plea on behalf of Parliament. I believe that this is a tremendous institution and that it can continue to do a job for the people of Canada. My plea is that it be permitted to do so without remarks of contempt and derision that destroy the good will necessary for the work of this House of Commons. As I have already said, and I shall endeavour to stick to my statement, I do not wish to return blow for blow or to castigate the Prime Minister, but I do make a plea to him to make a real effort to understand this place and to give it an opportunity to function as I believe it can.

I have said that the nub of my question of privilege is that statements such as were made outside the House yesterday constitute an interference with the work of the House which has been entrusted to the four House Leaders. I point out that this very morning, when we get past the question period, the report stage and third reading of two separate bills will be called. One has to do with the Canada-Jamaica tax agreement and the other has to do with crop insurance. In both these cases we reached agreement yesterday that there would be no debate at these final stages. I hope and believe that hon. members behind us on this side of the House will stay with this agreement. It has not been made an order of the House; it is one of those gentlemen's agreements which has been made on the basis of good will. But it is extremely difficult for the House Leaders to go among their backbenchers and get agreement on this sort of thing when statements about the opposition are made such as were made yesterday by the Prime Minister.

Not only did we reach agreement about what we should do this morning, but two days ago we reached agreement that the report stage and third reading of the CNR financing bill would be put through without debate. Again, last Friday we reached an agreement on the floor of the House that even though a point of order had been raised in connection with the ambient air bill upon which a ruling had to be made, the debate should nevertheless be concluded and when Your Honour had given your ruling, as you did on Wednesday, there would be no further debate.

The fact is that the four House Leaders are getting along well. We have good relations. We exercise good will. It just so happens that the Government House Leader is not here today, but if he were here and felt free to speak I believe he would agree with us that what has taken place constitutes an interference with the job which has been assigned to us.

My plea to the Prime Minister is that he cease and desist from making remarks, such as those he made yesterday and has made a number of times, showing contempt and derision, for such remarks destroy good will and slow down the work of Parliament. May I say in passing that when the Prime Minister talks about delay and obstructionism he does not know the meaning of those words—he has not been here long enough. The kind of delay and obstruction which took place in the past just does not take place today. In fact, under today's rules it cannot take place.

When the Prime Minister says that the government must do something about the rules, I remind him that four times since the Liberals came back into power in 1963 they have changed the rules on the basis of government majorities. The rules are the way they want them, so why this talk about further changes in the rules, further streamlining of Parliament? Hon. members opposite have got the rules they want. Indeed, they said they had tricked us into passing some they did not really care about. But my point is, that the charge of obstructionism comes from one who, I am afraid, does not sense the spirit of this institution and does not understand it. I say that this institution has served the country well for over a hundred years and it can and will continue to do so. But it becomes very difficult when the gentleman who happens to be the Prime Minister of Canada treats this place with contempt and derision as he does far too often. I did not think of those words; they are the words he himself used when describing what happened in a certain incident a while ago. What is hard on this Parliament is not delay, not obstruction, not debate, not critical examination of government proposals; what is hard on this Parliament is treating it with contempt.

I recognize that there are no precise Standing Orders or citations that deal with this kind of situation and I realize why there are not. This sort of thing is not expected from hon. members. But there are citations on pages 98 and 99 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition which say, as the hon. member for Peace River pointed out, that anything that would be a contempt of court has to be so treated in the House of Commons as well. There should not be disorderly, contemptuous or insolent language or behaviour, or other disturbing conduct. I think these propositions are axiomatic. But if this Parliament is to get along there has to be good will, and I believe we can have it and go forward on that basis.

I hope the House will agree that I have kept to the mood in which I said I rose. I am not standing here to return blows. I am standing here on behalf of the Parliament of Canada, the people's Parliament, pleading that there be a cessation of contempt and derision, that Parliament be allowed to do its job. If it is allowed to do so, I believe we shall continue to serve the best interests of the people of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: As I suggested a moment ago, I should recognize the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) who has given the Chair the same notice as the hon. members who have just spoken. The hon. member for Lotbinière has the floor.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have taken cognizance of statements made yesterday by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to a group of students from the universities of Montreal and Quebec. I subsequently met these students myself and was able to see the results of the Prime Minister's shattering and insidious statements about Parliament. I felt it was my duty to joint our efforts with those of the leaders of the two other opposition parties in order to show "the other side of the coin" in an attempt to restore Parliament's prestige in the eyes of the Canadian people.

In his speech to a group of students yesterday, the Prime Minister seized the opportunity not only to minimize the part played by the opposition, but also to launch a regular attack on the latter's position with regard to legislative measures. That could be considered as a political manoeuvre, but, and this is more serious, he stated that the opposition had no valid part to play and that it hindered good government.

To support his contentions, the Prime Minister quoted doubtful Parliamentary statistics, as is shown by those mentioned by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). He quoted those figures which gave only one side of the picture, stating that, if Parliament's work is not progressing more rapidly, the fault lies with the opposition whose only purpose is to create obstacles and to "get" the government through attrition.

He went further still, stating that the opposition should not study legislative proposals with such care, but should do its best to have them adopted as quickly as possible; in short that the opposition should be content to speak without saying anything.

Mr. Speaker, that is really too much. The present government is looking for a scapegoat because of its failure. It is looking for excuses for its lack of success and, by attacking dishonestly and insidiously the members of the opposition, it is achieving two definite goals. And that is serious and it is for that basic reason that I am in agreement with the other House leaders.

First, the government blames the opposition for its own failure so that the Canadian people will forget what goes on here.

Then, it tries to subdue Parliament, as that is the ultimate result it wants to achieve under the pretext of efficiency, and says so itself.

Mr. Speaker, as regards efficiency, one may recall a long debate which took place in the House. The government has devised a new type of bill: the omnibus bill, the package deal, in which dozens of proposals are included. And always for the sake of efficiency, the opposition is requested to adopt the whole bill in one shot.

Well, the opposition's role is precisely to keep an eye on legislation and to co-operate with the government in defending the interests of the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, if, sometimes, it may seem to the Prime Minister that the passing of legislations is delayed in the House, this is in direct consequence of the attitude of the government regarding Standing Orders, of its way of operating at the parliamentary level, which puts the opposition in an impossible situation.

If, furthermore, Parliament cannot be protected by Standing Orders after having been placed in an impossible situation as was said by the other House leaders, then, Parliament is downgraded. It loses its meaning, and the role of the member of Parliament is minimized to such an extent that he becomes a mere number, an individual who draws his pay cheque at the end of the month.

Mr. Speaker, we have an important role to play in this House and if the Prime Minister is irked by certain delays, he is to blame for that situation which compels us sometimes not to delay consideration of a bill, but to study it thoroughly, because it is too complex.

By his irresponsible statements which probably he does not mean really, the Prime Minister tramples down—this is serious and this is why we are protesting today—the essential and vital role of the opposition in every parliamentary system and especially in ours. In doing so, he finds an excuse to increase his control on the supreme institution of Parliament. He wilfully attempts to depreciate the Canadian parliamentary institutions.

Mr. Speaker, we are convinced that the present Prime Minister sets us back twenty years at the parliamentary level. That is the most serious matter and the basis of my question of privilege. The Prime Minister is undertaking a drive to run down the Canadian Parliament. This is a much too serious matter to let it go without protest.

I conclude now by endorsing the comments of the hon. members for Winnipeg North Centre an Peace River (Messrs. Knowles and Baldwin). The Prime Minister may think that Parliament is at his service, but he is wrong. The Canadian government is serving all Canadians without exception and I would like to point something before resuming my seat: the opposition is the conscience of the government. The Prime Minister's statements, unfortunate and big with consequences, indicate that he would like to be rid of his conscience but we shall not be overcome. We are here to defend the Canadian population, in spite of the Prime Minister!

[English]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have little inclination to deal with the accusations which have just been made. I would say though, if it lightens your task, that I stand by the substance of everything I have been reported as having said.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I say that I stand by the substance because there may be some points of detail which would bear correction. I think it would be easier for you, Sir, to judge whether I did hold Parliament in contempt if you knew the circumstances in which this exchange took place.

When I left the House of Commons I was asked to meet a group of students from the province of Quebec, and I gladly did so. I think it is fair to say that I was met at the outset with a slight amount of hostility.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: As soon as I began to talk about our parliamentary system I was met with laughs of derision, Mr. Speaker, by people who apparently do not hold this institution in very high regard. The first question they asked me had to do with the use of the question period. They could not get over how stupid the opposition was—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —in its use of the question period. My answer to them was a defence of the institution. It was to indicate that even though the question period may not have been used all that successfully in their presence, it was an extraordinarily important institution because every day it permitted the opposition in the name of the country to question the government about its acts and sometimes to discover injustices or disorders in governmental conduct. The whole tenor of my exchange with them was one of defending this institution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I do not mind admitting that I agreed with them that the opposition was not using the period very skilfully and intelligently, and I did not mind agreeing with them that I could understand that they thought this place was falling into decadence because we spend days and weeks debating points rather than bringing debates to a conclusion by a vote, as the democratic system wants.

In this sense, Sir, I was pleading the excellence of the institution to them while conceding that it was not always well used. Perhaps I was biased in not saying that the government itself is perhaps also guilty of some misuse. The point I am making is borne out, I believe, by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin), who met with them later and who said, in his words, that he was able to see the results of our exchange. I do not think he would believe that I convinced them in a very few minutes that Parliament was a place of nonsense. He must assume that they came here with a lot of these prejudices in mind, and that I did not take these prejudices out of their minds in the few minutes I met with them surely cannot be ascribed to me. I think his own testimony, on which he seems to be accusing me, was on the contrary—

An hon. Member: He is breaking the rules now.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the right hon. Prime Minister for interrupting, but it seems to me that the right hon. gentleman should be allowed to make a statement as other hon. members were allowed to do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: That is about what I wanted to say, Mr. Speaker. I certainly can understand why the opposition was misled because apparently they read reports of the exchange but of course they missed the beginning of the exchange and they missed the context in which it took place.

I might say that I read the report in Le Devoir by a French reporter who was there. There was a slight bit more of the context, but I am quite sure he missed the beginning too.

This being said, I am a little bit surprised that all the opposition parties went to the extent of giving you notice, Sir, that I had treated this place with contempt and derision, without even having looked at the complete circumstances in which the exchange happened. If I were that touchy there might be a question of privilege I might raise. Indeed, there might be one in respect of something I understand the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) said about me, that I never open my mouth here except to mouth obscenities, or something to that effect. My comment, Sir, is that this may be a point of debate, but I do not want to raise a question of privilege on this kind of matter and I am really surprised that the opposition is wasting the time of the House doing so.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think hon. members would want to pursue the matter further. The hon. members who raised this question by way of privilege indicated that they did not wish to propose or submit a motion for further consideration by the House. The hon. members who spoke in the course of this brief debate know the rules as well as I do and realize that in the absence of grounds for putting a motion there is no ruling required by the Chair. I would suggest only that perhaps the speeches made by the hon. members of the opposition and the reply made by the Prime Minister might help somewhat to clarify the situation and clear the air.

I should like to suggest one thought. To my way of thinking, Parliament is the kind of institution that can function only with good will between individuals and between parliamentary groups. It seems to me there has been good will among individuals in this House and between House Leaders; that has been pointed out by one or two of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken. To the extent that there has been co-operation, understanding and good will among the parliamentary representatives of the House, we have made progress during this and previous sessions. I should think that if an effort were made by all of us there will be an even greater measure of good will and even greater progress for the benefit of the institution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order in order to receive from you, Sir, a clarification of the rules of the House. Is it permissible for members in the future to refer to other hon. members as "he" and so on as the Prime Minister has just done?

Mr. Trudeau: Let us have a ruling on that.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

TABLING OF DOCUMENT ON BILINGUALISM IN CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2) I should like to lay on the table of the House in both official languages a document with regard to the plan to increase bilingualism in the Canadian Armed Forces.

Canadian National Railways

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1971-72

REFERENCE OF VOTE L10 AND VOTE 5 TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 59 I should like to move, seconded by the Minister without Portfolio from Longueuil (Mr. Côté):

That the following items in the estimates of sums required for the service of Canada for the year ending March 31, 1972, be referred to the following standing committees:

To the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs vote L10 relating to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

To the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works vote 5 relating to the Department of Public Works.

I should explain that it is my understanding that this now completes reference of the estimates to the committees in accordance with discussions which I believe have taken place.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

REFERENCE OF QUESTION OF FINANCIAL STRUCTURE OF CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS TO STANDING COMMITTEE

On the order: Government Notices of Motions:

February 24, 1971—The President of the Privy Council:

That the question of the financial structure of the Canadian National Railways be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Section 2 of Standing Order 21 this Government Notice of Motion is transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders at the next sitting of the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I believe there would be unanimous agreement to pass this motion now without debate.

Mr. Speaker: Is this the wish of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (for the President of the Privy Council) moved:

That the question of the financial structure of the Canadian National Railways be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

BILINGUALISM

APPLICATION OF ARMED FORCES POLICY TO OTHER FEDERAL DEPARTMENTS AND CROWN CORPORATIONS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the document just tabled by the Minister of National Defence setting out the directions in respect of bilingualism in the Department of National Defence, now that government policy has been defined in the military services are the same levels of bilingualism to be attempted for civilian employees in other federal departments and Crown corporations?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, the idea of bilingual units or unilingual units in various sections of the government service has been explained to the House on previous occasions. I believe that all the Department of National Defence is doing is applying this idea to its own department but in a way, of course, which is particular to it and cannot be transposed identically to other parts of the government.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, from the Prime Minister's answer are we then to understand that there will be different degrees of bilingualism within different departments of the federal service?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of what the member is referring to when he talks of different degrees of bilingualism. Some people can speak better than others, yes.

Mr. Nowlan: I quite appreciate that some people can speak better than others and that some are better at pantomine than others. That really was not the question. The document which has been tabled sets out different levels of bilingualism for the services and I am attempting to find out if the levels of 40 per cent and 35 per cent for the different ranks within the services in 1976 and 60 per cent and 55 per cent in 1980 are to be the levels that are to be attempted in other federal departments and Crown corporations. That was what I was trying to say.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this document refers to the Department of National Defence and it has particular application, as I just answered. There is no indication that these percentages will be applied elsewhere. If some system of percentages is to apply it will be announced in due course. On the application of these it would be preferable if the hon. member would ask the Minister of National Defence who is better briefed than I am on what goes on in his department.

ARMED FORCES POLICY—METHOD OF ATTAINING PERCENTAGE LEVELS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, without debating with the Prime Minister whether there will be a special status within federal departments and different levels of bilingualism within departments, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence this question. In view of the present complement of 10 per cent bilingual personnel in the officer class and approximately 20 per cent in the non-commissioned class, will the attainment of percentages of bilingualism of 40 per cent and 35 per cent by 1976 in those classes and 60 per cent and 55 per cent by 1980 be achieved by freezing recruitment in the Anglophone area and stimulating recruitment in the Francophone area?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had read the document in full he would have noted there is a very extensive section devoted to the acceleration of language training for both language groups. Perhaps I might indicate to him that the dates set forth are in effect target dates, that the principle still applies that no one not qualified will be promoted, and that, indeed, the overriding factor of importance is the effectiveness of the force. If it should be found that effectiveness would be impaired by these target dates, of course they would have to be moved along. Having said that, I emphasize that we will make every effort to give effective language training to every member of the department who wishes to take it.

ARMED FORCES POLICY—EFFECT ON PROMOTION OF ENGLISH-SPEAKING PERSONNEL

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence if this policy is part of a move to reduce the numbers in the forces by discriminating against promotion so far as English-speaking personnel are concerned, officers and NCO's who have not been brought up to speak French, do not find it possible to do so, and therefore in effect will be forced to retire or stay at the same ranks they have now for the rest of their service?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would think no one approaching this question of bilingualism either in the forces or elsewhere could regard the proposals set out as representing any form of discrimination whatsoever. They apply to both language groups.

APPLICATION OF ARMED FORCES POLICY TO FRANCOPHONE PERSONNEL THROUGHOUT CANADA

Mr. Louis Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence.

I have not read the document in question. Do those changes apply to all French-speaking Canadians, that is to those who do not necessarily live in the province of Quebec?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker, they apply to all the Armed forces, throughout Canada. We intend to make certain changes with regard to the Francophones in Edmonton, for instance, to give them the opportunity to speak their mother tongue in Edmonton and elsewhere.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Joliette wish to ask a supplementary question?

Mr. La Salle: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

I would like to ask the hon. minister whether this new policy will from now on enable the whole population of Quebec to hear command given in French in the army?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, allow me to assure the hon. member and this House that there really is nothing new with this policy. It had been suggested by my predecessor. The idea is to make sure that in and outside the province of Quebec, where French-speaking divisions are concerned, all commands will be given in French and all the business of the units will be conducted in this language.

[English]

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I would like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether the aims and objectives of the Canadian defence forces are to protect the security of the nation or to become a cultural pool for Canadians?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, may I point out to the hon. member that certain French-speaking units, particularly those based at Valcartier, protected the security of Canada very well last October and November—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): —and the policy of bilingualism put forward here is to assure that that same loyalty and opportunity will exist in the forces in the future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. Woolliams: I would think the hon. member for Calgary South would have something to say about that. He has to fight the next election.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if we might change the subject now. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. Woolliams: Go and say that in Calgary.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Inquiries of the Ministry

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REMARKS BY PRIME MINISTER OUTSIDE HOUSE CONCERNING OPPOSITION—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, since the Prime Minister has been critical of the way in which the business of the House has been conducted, particularly the role of the opposition, and since this criticism has been made outside the House, would the Prime Minister be prepared on motions on Monday to lay before the House any criticisms he has regarding the conduct of the business of the House in order that they may be answered, rather than being made outside the House where they cannot be replied to?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is my impression that the answers were given this morning even though the criticisms have never been made.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Since the main reason for the Prime Minister's criticism is the alleged delay in the passage of the government organization bill which is in his name, would the Prime Minister be prepared to facilitate the passage of that legislation by being present in Committee of the Whole, particularly when we are dealing with those sections of that legislation which have to do with his office particularly? I am referring to the appointment of ministers of state and additional parliamentary secretaries.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if some agreement could be reached whereby an arrangement on the use of time could be agreed to by the whole House and if my presence here would permit that to happen, I would gladly be present to explain why we think it is the business of the executive to reorganize itself in a way in which it could deal more expeditiously with the affairs of the nation.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I thank the Prime Minister for agreeing to attend the House.

INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS TO UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Since the House can only deal with legislation that is placed before it, how soon can we expect the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, which the Prime Minister said a few days ago would be presented in a matter of days? We are still waiting for that legislation. How soon can we expect that legislation so that we can get on with this very important matter?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the leader of the NDP is prepared to work out an arrangement whereby all legislation, including the bill he asks about, could be passed in a normal amount of time between now and the end of this part of the session, I would gladly give him that indication. We have a lot of matters to deal with, including the bill he suggests, but there is no point in putting it on the order paper if the opposition is going to continue, as it has given us notice, to stall on the government organization bill forever.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite apparent from the rules of the House that the government can put any legislation it wants on the order paper so that members have adequate time to examine and study it. What is happening in the House at the moment does not preclude the government in any way, shape or form from bringing down legislation.

Mr. Trudeau: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I suggest to the Prime Minister, and to the hon. member who just rose on a point of order, that it seems to me we are reviving the question of privilege upon which we spent some time at the opening of proceedings. I doubt whether we should take more time on that subject, at the moment in any event. It might be revived on some other occasion, but I suggest not during the question period this morning.

CRIMINAL CODE

ABORTION—CONFERENCE OF ROMAN CATHOLIC BISHOPS OF CANADA

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. Minister of Justice a question concerning the special day of April 25, organized by the Canadian Catholic Conference of Bishops.

Will the government co-operate with the religious authorities to ensure the success of this day organized to fight abortion, which was legalized by this Parliament?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I read last night the announcement from the Catholic bishops of Canada in this connection and I have nothing to say about it for the time being.

[English]

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Justice inform us when we are to have the two-day debate on abortion in the House?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I have been in consultation with the House Leader about that, Mr. Speaker, and he will bring the matter forward in the House at an appropriate time. I think that the hon. lady may be going farther than we have in suggesting how many days we ought to debate it. I hope that will be a matter for the Government House Leader and the House Leaders of the other parties to decide.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

HIJACKING OF WESTERN AIRLINES PLANE TO VANCOUVER —DEPARTMENTAL ACTION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice; I gave him notice. It has reference to the American hijacker who, by means of threatening violence, diverted a Western Airlines Boeing 737 to Vancouver, which was flying from San Francisco to Seattle. What course of action is the Department of Justice planning and, if the American authorities seek extradition of the accused, will the minister and his department co-operate in this regard? Further, is the person in question in custody?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have the impression that the question has hypothetical overtones, but perhaps the minister might find some way to give some information that might be helpful to the hon. member and to the House.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I would be glad to deal with the question so far as the rules permit, Mr. Speaker. I received a preliminary report concerning the hijacking yesterday of a Northwest Airlines Boeing 737 while on a flight from San Francisco to Seattle. The flight terminated at Vancouver International Airport, and an individual is now in custody. A number of questions arise which may have to be determined as soon as I have an opportunity for a full examination of the facts and the opportunity to consult my appropriate colleagues in the cabinet.

The hon. gentleman mentioned the possibility of extradition. At the moment there has been no request for extradition by the United States government. I might say that the other alternatives I will have to consider are whether or not to consent to prosecution under section 5A of the Criminal Code. The government will also have to consider the possibility of deportation. But I think I can assure the hon. member and members of the House that this matter will be given immediate and careful consideration by the government.

Mr. Woolliams: Since this is a serious international problem and as there is a tremendous amount of commercial air travel between the United States and Canada, could the minister advise us whether he has had a chance to look into whether this crime of hijacking, to use a colloquialism, is covered by the extradition agreement between Canada and the United States?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is one of the factors that will have to be taken into consideration. I hope the hon. member will not ask me for a legal opinion.

POLLUTION

SUGGESTED MEETING WITH NOVA SCOTIA MINISTER ON ACTION TO EXTINGUISH SPRINGHILL MINE DUMP FIRE

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Yesterday in the Nova Scotia legislature the report prepared by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources on the Springhill mine dump fire was tabled, outlining ways and means of extinguishing that fire. Would the minister be willing to meet with the Nova Scotia Minister of Mines, who is also the minister responsible for pollution control, to determine what action might be taken by both the federal and provincial governments which would result in extinguishing the mine dump fire at the earliest possible date in view of the statement made in the report that the fire "is becoming an increasing hazard to the town environment"?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I believe the hon. member asked a similar question yesterday and I had my officials check into the matter. I am instructed that they received a copy of the proposal by Home Town Construction Ltd. only yesterday, Thursday, and they are currently studying its contents in relation to the technical report they have already prepared on the fire at Springhill. As yet they are not aware whether the Nova Scotia government has received a copy of this proposal. We would give an opinion on its merits to the provincial government based on our findings, but so far we have received no such request from the government of Nova Scotia. May I add that in all matters dealing with the Springhill dump fire my officers are in contact with the Department of Mines of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Coates: May I say for the minister's information that I am referring to a report that was forwarded to the Deputy Minister of Mines of Nova Scotia by T. E. Tibbetts of the coal and peat resources evaluation section of his department which relates to the examination of the mine dump fire conducted by his department for the Department of Mines of Nova Scotia. What I am now asking the minister is whether, on the basis of this report, he would be willing to meet with the Minister of Mines for Nova Scotia to determine how action can best be taken to extinguish the mine dump fire.

Mr. Greene: I am not sure how our report relates to the Home Town Construction Limited report.

Mr. Coates: It does not.

Mr. Greene: But I would be very pleased, as the hon. member suggests, to meet the mines minister from Nova Scotia if this would be of help.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE BREAK-UP OF COMMONWEALTH COMMITTEE ON SECURITY IN INDIAN OCEAN

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): My question is for the Prime Minister. I would like to preface it by saying that there appears to be intense diplomatic activity within the Commonwealth with regard to the future of the study group on security in the Indian Ocean arising out of the proposed British arms sales to South Africa—

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that he should put his question.

Mr. Brewin: I was just coming to it, Mr. Speaker. What action or leadership is the Canadian government taking in this crisis which may affect the future existence of the Commonwealth?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): We are pursuing the action which we began in Singapore and which did not meet with the approval of the opposition. None the less, it is the action we are pursuing.

Mr. Brewin: I wonder if the Prime Minister could tell us what action he was pursuing that was not approved by the opposition.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member might read the statement that the leader of his party made when I returned from Singapore.

INDUSTRY

MAINTENANCE OF OPERATION OF McBEAN COAL MINE

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): My question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the serious unemployment problem in Nova Scotia, will the minister advise the House what reply has been given to the request of that province's mines minister for a $2 million grant over a two-year period to continue the operation of the McBean mine in Pictou county?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I have had meetings with both the mines minister and the premier in regard to the McBean mine. The subsidy program is, of course, expiring. The coffers of the subsidy program are empty. We are considering their suggestion at present but as yet have no answer for them.

While I am on my feet—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if the minister might allow the hon. member a supplementary question. Perhaps after that he will be given the floor for the purpose of answering a prior question.

Mr. Muir: May I ask the minister how long it will take, how many weeks or months, before a decision has been reached by the cabinet with regard to this request for a grant by the Nova Scotia mines minister, Mr. Sullivan?

Mr. Greene: I cannot put a definite date on it but I can assure my hon. friend that my department is working on it very actively, and we will have a recommendation one way or another as soon as possible.

[Mr. Brewin.]

OIL

SUGGESTED FEASIBILITY STUDY OF ECONOMICS OF BUILDING PIPELINE FROM WEST TO SERVE EASTERN CANADA

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer a question put by the hon. member for Calgary North. He has been most patient in waiting for an answer, for which I thank him.

In response to his question may I say that the government does not envisage embarking, either alone or with outside help, on any special study of the economic feasibility of a pipeline from western Canada to markets east of Ontario. The National Energy Board is, however, keeping itself fully informed as to the factors bearing on such a project. I expect the board to be able to advise the government as to security factors bearing on oil supply to eastern Canada and on the relative competitive position of western Canadian oil in these eastern markets. The board will be in a position to give prompt consideration to any application from the private sector for the construction of such a line.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I thank the minister for his full answer, but it was not quite an answer to my question. I wonder whether he would reconsider it in these terms. I appreciate the function of the National Energy Board, but I am asking whether, in order to get an economic feasibility study of the building of a pipeline, he would set up a task force rather than leave it to free enterprise or the importers of crude petroleum who are also the ones who would bring it from the Prairies and the Arctic? What I want is an independent study, separate and apart from free enterprise.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Come over here, Eldon.

Mr. Greene: I am shocked and dismayed to find that my hon. friend has joined his colleagues in the New Democratic Party in this view.

Mr. Woolliams: Answer the question.

Mr. Greene: To date we are satisfied that the present system is in the best interests both of the producers in the west and of the eastern consumers. We are going to abide by the present procedures as we think they are more satisfactory than those of the New Democratic Party.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Since we have had conflicting answers about whether or not there has been a feasibility study on extending the pipeline to Montreal, who is conducting such a study and whether it is completed, can the minister now give us a definitive answer? Has a feasibility study been made and, if so, by whom? Has it been made by the National Energy Board, is it completed, and would the government be prepared to make it available?

Mr. Greene: I do not believe a feasibility study as such has been made in recent years or since the Borden report, but certainly the National Energy Board has the economic facts and figures under constant review. This gives them a very adequate idea from time to time of the economics of such a pipeline, so that if an application is made, they can give an informed decision in respect of such an application. But there is no total, complete and recent feasibility study as such.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I ask the minister if these studies which have been conducted by the National Energy Board indicate that the extension of the pipeline to Montreal would be economic and in the best interests of Canada?

Mr. Greene: The information I have is that even with the recent increase in world prices of oil it does not appear that a pipeline could be built to bring western oil into the Montreal market without increasing consumer prices for the Montreal consumers.

Mr. Woolliams: May I ask a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona. I should bring to the attention of hon. members the fact that once again we are nearing the end of the question period, and if we have seven or eight supplementary questions to three or four questions it will be almost impossible to take care of the entire question period. For the moment, the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

Mr. Hu Harries (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, could the minister tell us whether there has been any specific reference to the Energy Board to examine alternative ways of serving the Montreal market and, more specifically, has the Energy Board provided any figures? If so, could he say what those figures are which indicate that there would at this time be a price increase if western oil were serving the Montreal market?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, this is a very difficult question to answer during the question period since it requires a very comprehensive economic study. To the best of my knowledge and information, from the very comprehensive day to day information gathered and studied by the National Energy Board it appears that, of the various ways that are possible, the present system whereby the eastern market is served by offshore oil is the most economic for Canada. The eastern consumer has a good break and we are replacing our own oil resources with offshore oil, which is more economical than our own oil.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that the debate might be terminated at this stage, and that we might move to another part of the country.

[Later:]

Mr. Harries: Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources table a summary of the figures which have resulted from the continuing study by the National Energy Board of the Montreal supplied market.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to consider that question and give the hon. member an answer at a later date.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SUGGESTED REMOVAL OF MINISTERIAL ROSTER ATTENDANCE SYSTEM

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and is really supplementary to a previous question. Inasmuch as criticism has been levelled at Parliament, and especially at the conduct of the opposition during the question period, and since we are being hindered in the question period by the roster system, would the Prime Minister agree to allow ministers to attend the House and to dispense with the roster system?

FISHERIES

DESTRUCTION OF FISHING GEAR BY FOREIGN DRAGGERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Is he in a position to tell the House what action he took yesterday with respect to the imposition of a 12-mile limit off the south coast of Newfoundland to deal with the minor incident, to use his words, that occurred? Also, is he prepared to revise the answer he gave yesterday with respect to this alleged minor incident?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, there is no revision. We made sure that the foreign vessels would not be coming within 12 miles of the coast.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether the minister took steps yesterday, by way of an announcement through the press, to state that the government has now defined our 12-mile limit within the sinuosity of the coast, as opposed to the straight baseline system, on the south coast of Newfoundland?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, there was no announcement to the press. However, we have communicated with all the skippers of all the trawlers in the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

Inquiries of the Ministry

VETERANS AFFAIRS

LACK OF PROVISION IN ESTIMATES FOR DISABILITY PENSION AND ALLOWANCE INCREASES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the President of the Treasury Board. On February 17, the day on which he tabled the 1971-72 estimates, he took notice of my question regarding the means by which increases in veterans disability pensions and veterans allowances are to be put into effect. Can he now say whether this will be by legislation, by estimates, by $1 items, or how this will be done?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the provision for the variety of measures to which the hon. gentleman has referred arises by legislation. This is achieved in some instances through the appropriation process and in others through statutes which provide for the payments being made without the necessity of any appropriation bill. It is partly the one and partly the other.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, can the minister not tell us in what precise way those two things are being dealt with? It makes all the difference in the world whether we bring in measures to deal with them or whether they are just there as estimates that do not come before the House.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman will have an opportunity in the standing committee, when the estimates of the Minister of Veterans Affairs come before it, to deal with, as he puts it, or to inquire into these particular aspects.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But we shall not have that opportunity on the floor of the House.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO REFORM OF RULES

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting House Leader. In view of the action by the hon. member for Joliette, who withdrew from the agricultural committee in disgust yesterday because of the filibuster and unmerited obstruction of the opposition—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. McBride: —does the government plan to recommend a reform of the rules of the House to prevent such obstruction?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking a question about proceedings in a committee. I think he knows very well, and I think that most hon. members know, that such questions are not in order.

[Mr. Davis.]

THE CENSUS

INQUIRY AS TO ORGANIZATION, APPOINTMENT OF CHIEF COMMISSIONER

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Since this is census year, and since I believe he is in charge of the taking of the census, can he inform the House when he expects to announce the composition of the census organization and the appointment of a chief census commissioner?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think it is generally known that there will be a census in Canada in 1971. If more information is needed, I will obtain it and satisfy my hon. friend.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, am I to gather that there is no intention of taking a census this year?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I thought it was generally known in Canada that there would be a census in 1971. If there are further announcements to make, we shall make them. If my hon. friend wants more information, as usual I will do my best to please him.

Mr. Harkness: The census must be taken, according to the law.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, a great many Canadians are concerned about this because they look forward to supplementing their incomes by participating in the taking of the census. Many questions in this regard have been coming to me and I think that some announcement should be forthcoming.

INCOME TAX

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF AMENDING LEGISLATION

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister in the absence of the Prime Minister who has just left the House. In view of some of the concerns that have been expressed about the business of the House, and since the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance has indicated that the income tax legislation to be submitted this spring will be considerably different from the white paper, could the Acting Prime Minister, whoever he now is, inform the House when this legislation will be brought before the House and if every step will be taken to ensure that it is introduced as soon as possible?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister of Finance has made it quite clear that the legislation will be brought forward as soon as practicable and, further, that the House will have ample opportunity to consider it.

DRUGS

NON-MEDICAL USE—POLICY STATEMENT—APPLICATION OF CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the latest report put out this week by the Department of National Health and Welfare on transient youth and the very wide disparity between the law and the official and unofficial policies of the government regarding drugs—and I am not being critical—may I ask when we can expect a policy statement by the Minister of Justice on this issue?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the government is reviewing the entire question of the non-medical use of soft drugs and is of course awaiting the final report of the Le Dain Commission.

Mr. Comeau: Mr. Speaker, has the minister consulted with provincial and municipal authorities, especially with the provincial Attorneys General, to discuss how they are to apply the drug sections of the Criminal Code, particularly in view of the latest report published by the Department of National Health and Welfare?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that question was brought to my attention by the hon. member for Simcoe East yesterday, and I am looking at it.

HOUSING

SUGGESTED TREATMENT AS SOCIAL PROBLEM—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the hardworking minister in charge of housing. In view of the report yesterday from the Canadian Council on Social Development which indicates that housing ought to be considered as a social problem rather than as a business or an industry, and that the government should accept an over-all responsibility for both the production and distribution of housing throughout Canada, will the government accept this philosophy and its responsibility with regard to the production and distribution of homes throughout the country?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, as always, I am very much in favour of motherhood too.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister is also in favour of housing.

AIR TRANSPORT

PROPOSED FARE INCREASES BY AIR CANADA AND CANADIAN PACIFIC AIRLINES

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Inquiries of the Ministry

With regard to the proposed fare increase by Air Canada and Canadian Pacific Airlines on March 6, will the government ask the Canadian Transport Commission to intervene directly and immediately in this proposed fare increase?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it is necessary for the government to direct the Canadian Transport Commission. The arrangement is that such tariffs are filed with the CTC. There is then provision for anyone who objects to file such objection. I think the procedure is well established.

Mr. Bell: Since, according to today's paper, there is some indefiniteness about whether they will intervene and since they have never intervened on previous increases, would the minister or any member of the government who may run into Mr. Pickersgill at the Rideau Club over the weekend ask him to get going on this matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

POWER

PROPOSED FLOODING OF SKAGIT RIVER VALLEY—APPROVAL BY INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION OF AGREEMENT FOR COMPENSATION OF CANADIAN INTERESTS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): In the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I will direct my question with regard to the Skagit valley flooding to either the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry or the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It is alleged at the present time that the applicant, Seattle Power and Light, does not have any right on Canadian soil because no agreement for compensation of Canadian interests has been approved by the International Joint Commission. Can the minister advise whether there has been IJC approval? If he cannot, will he investigate this matter and reply later?

Mr. Speaker: While the matter is being considered by the ministers, the hon. member for Hillsborough might ask his question.

[Later:]

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): With respect to the question of the hon. member for Fraser Valley West, I will take it as notice and make inquiries of the International Joint Commission to see if there is any answer.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATIONALIZATION OF ALCAN PLANT BY GOVERNMENT OF GUYANA

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce with regard to the nationalization of the Alcan property by the government of Guyana, a matter in which he has shown a great deal of insouciance. Can the minister advise what the government is currently doing with regard to this discriminatory action on the part of the Guyanese government?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I am surprised at the use of the word "enthusiasm". I do not know exactly on which side he puts one on in this matter. I have shown great "interest". That is the proper word. Discussions are now going on between Alcan and the Guyanese government as to what would be adequate compensation for the nationalization which was announced last week.

Mr. Macquarrie: The word was insouciance, Mr. Speaker, not enthusiasm. What is the government of Canada doing with reference to the government of Guyana in connection with this takeover of property which is important to many Canadians?

Mr. Pepin: The representations I talked about last week which have been made to the Guyanese government with respect to nationalization itself still apply.

ENERGY

EAST COAST OIL AND GAS RESERVES—TYPE OF DRILLING RIG, COMPANY THAT WILL PERFORM WORK

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer the question asked by the hon. member for South Shore with respect to offshore drilling rigs. My information is that the rig is similar to others already in use. The new Sedco I drilling rig has been built by South Eastern Commonwealth Drilling Company of Calgary and Dallas, to be contracted to Amoco Canada Petroleum Company and Imperial Oil Limited. The rig was built at Halifax shipyards. A third unit of this type is currently under construction for later operation by Mobil Oil Canada Limited.

PROGRESS ON AGREEMENT WITH ATLANTIC PROVINCES ON OFFSHORE RESOURCES

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can the minister advise what progress he has made in negotiations with the four Atlantic provinces with regard to offshore resources and whether he expects an agreement to be reached shortly?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate asked a similar question which I undertook to answer. Meetings are being held on a continuing basis with the provinces on this matter. The latest of these occurred earlier this month with the premier of Nova Scotia. These are difficult negotiations, but I believe that favourable progress is being made. I am hopeful that we can achieve a resolution of this long-standing and difficult problem.

ATOMIC ENERGY

POSSIBLE SALE OF PLANT TO AUSTRALIA

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the starting up of the atomic energy plant at Pickering, does the minister have anything new to report on the possible sale of an atomic energy plant to Australia?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I believe this matter falls under my jurisdiction. I have nothing to report at the present time. I believe there is no official position on the part of Australia as to what it will do. As soon as there is anything official, I will undertake to report the matter to the House.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. Perhaps with the consent of the House the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond might be given the opportunity to ask supplementaries.

ENERGY

NEGOTIATIONS WITH BRITISH COLUMBIA RESPECTING OFFSHORE RESOURCES

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources arising out of the negotiations with the provinces with regard to drilling rights. Are there any current negotiations going on with the province of British Columbia on this subject?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): There are no current negotiations going on at the ministerial level with British Columbia. I believe officials are still discussing the matter. However, in all fairness, I think that the position of the government of British Columbia on this subject has been made rather firm. Of course, there is a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada on a reference specifically with regard to British Columbia.

ATOMIC ENERGY

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON REACTOR SALES AND PROFITS

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. When reporting on the possible sale to Australia, will the minister also report to the House on the success of any other sales of atomic reactors and what the profit picture is as far as the Canadian government is concerned?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, that is a more abstruse and lengthy question. We will certainly be glad to answer such questions when the estimates of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited are before the committee, at which time I think I might be able to go into the entire subject more usefully.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA-JAMAICA INCOME TAX AGREEMENT ACT, 1971

IMPLEMENTATION OF AGREEMENT FOR AVOIDANCE OF DOUBLE TAXATION

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-217, to implement an agreement for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax between Canada and Jamaica, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-217, to implement an agreement for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax between Canada and Jamaica, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee of Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) (for Mr. Benson) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CROP INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE EXTENDED COVERAGE

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-185, to amend the Crop Insurance Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill C-185, to amend the Crop Insurance Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) (for Mr. Olson) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Bell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I just say that this demonstrates what can be done by friendliness, co-operation and good will. It does not mean that we are scared of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I wish to thank the hon. member and his colleagues for their change of heart.

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT, OBJECTS, POWERS, CAPITALIZATION, ETC.

The House resumed, from Wednesday, February 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Benson that Bill C-219 to establish the Canada Development Corporation, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Saltsman (p. 3648).

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House, Bill C-219, purports to be an important initiative on the part of the government to deal with some of our basic economic difficulties. During the past few weeks there has been growing concern in all parts of Canada about the economic trends which seem to be taking us away from the objectives set out by the Economic Council and by spokesmen for a government which just over two years ago, during the 1968 election campaign, suggested they would produce an administration which would deal with some of the fundamental economic problems in Canada.

I have read the bill carefully, and followed the debate thus far. I have listened to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and to spokesmen on the other side of the House but I can find no hope at all in terms of the bill that it will deal with the fundamental economic ills which are causing such concern at the moment. As a matter of fact, the minister himself, in his explanation inside and outside the House, went to great pains to indicate that the legislation will not deal, for example, with the one great question under discussion at the moment in the media and elsewhere, the question of Canadian economic nationalism. He claims it will have nothing to do with "buying back Canada" and ensuring greater control by Canadians over their own economic destiny. Then again, the minister took great pains to point out that it will have no immediate effect on the incidence of unemployment, underdevelopment and the lack of adequate productivity which are major issues before Parliament and the nation at the present time. It is only possible to conclude in the light of this analysis that the Canada Development Corporation, as outlined in this bill, was designed more as a political gesture than as a measure likely to have a real economic impact.

Having made this assertion, I should proceed to back it up with concrete evidence. In the first instance, far too many of the legislative initiatives of the government are put forward on the basis of their political impact rather than on the basis of their potential benefit to the economy.

Mr. Pepin: Perish the thought!

Mr. Dinsdale: Because the issue of Canadian economic nationalism is of great concern at the moment, suddenly, after eight years of equivocation, delay and hesitancy, this bill is brought before the House and is being pushed to the completion of the second reading stage. There are many other matters of much greater concern which Parliament would be delighted to deal with if the government would only place the items on the Order Paper and bring them forward for debate. Instead, we are presented with a phony bill which has been talked about by the last two Liberal governments and which, on the admission of the Minister of Finance himself, will do nothing to end the continuing takeover by foreign interests of the Canadian economy.

Spokesmen for the government have pointed out that there is a difference of opinion among various opposition groups as to the effect and significance of Bill C-219. Members of the NDP have criticized the bill because it does not go far enough in meeting the objectives which spokesmen for that party have often put forward. I believe it was the NDP, or its predecessor the CCF party, which first put forward the notion of a development corporation which would give the government sufficient economic power to enable it to operate with considerable effect in the business and industrial world. The criticism offered by the NDP is that the bill would have no significance in this regard. In other words, they are saying it is a shame, full of sound and fury but signifying nothing. On the other hand, spokesmen for the official opposition have been saying that the CDC, instead of assisting in industrial and economic development, will actually have a negative effect. This has been the main concern of spokesmen from the group to which I belong.

It was the Liberal party which first put the notion of a development corporation specifically into the Speech from the Throne back in 1963. At that time the Honourable Walter Gordon was minister of finance. He came to Parliament full of hope and optimism about the brave new world which would be established by his budget proposals, and particularly by the economic enterprise which he described as the Canada Development Corporation. We all know what happened to his budget proposals. This was the ill-starred budget which paved the way for some of the major economic troubles which have beset us to an increasing extent all through the latter part of the decade of the sixties. Indeed, it was the budget chiefly responsible for the runaway inflation, the control of which is still the keynote of the present government's economic policy.

Though the proposition was first put forward formally in 1963 by the former minister of finance, it had been talked about by other Canadian politicians. The Honourable Alvin Hamilton was a leading proponent of the Canada Development Corporation. This was when he was minister of northern affairs and national resources. His idea was to make it possible for Canadians to become involved in the real process of economic development in Canada. Our rich Canadian resources in the underdeveloped parts of this country, which include a large segment of northern Canada, should be developed in the best interests of Canadians in all parts of the country.

It is interesting to note that the government has almost stumbled into an acknowledgement that the role of the CDC is northern oriented, that this is where the action should be. In bringing together the Canada Development Corporation, the organization is largely going to be based, in the early stages of its operations, on three Crown corporations whose activities are largely carried on in northern Canada. I refer to the Northern Transportation Company, Eldorado and Panarctic. The only other major corporation that will become involved in the early stages of the CDC is the Polymer Corporation. Perhaps it is not quite appropriate to describe this corporation as exclusively concerned with the processing and manufacturing of synthetic rubber, because it has now diversified its operations and is reaching out to many other enterprises both inside and outside Canada.

I think it is significant that there is an implicit recognition on the part of government of the necessity for having Canadians more closely involved in developing our resource-based industries in as much as it has based the CDC on these three northern enterprises. Unfortunately, however, there is nothing in the bill to make it possible for Canadians to participate. Indeed, the Canadian participation regulations which were forthcoming in the sixties, before the Liberals returned to office in 1963, were more effective in bringing about real involvement in resource development at the grass roots level than the present proposals in this legislation. These regulations recognized that exploration is of the utmost importance in any potential development of our northern resources, and as a result there was no restriction at the exploration level. In fact, foreign sources of capital were encouraged. Exploration is a rugged task and a highly risky financial operation, and companies were encouraged to explore wherever interest could be found.

However, after discovery of resources it did become necessary under the Canadian participation regulations for these companies immediately to Canadianize their operations, primarily by making at least 51 per cent of their shares available on Canadian stock exchanges. This is a more realistic approach to the basic necessity for resource development in Canada than any of the provisions in Bill C-219. The very fact that the government has included this northern orientation in the Crown corporations brought under the umbrella of the CDC, is, as I say, implicit recognition of this fact.

Actually, if we are going to deal with the fundamental economic problems that a corporation of this kind is supposed to become concerned with, we have to move in quite radically different directions. Some of these fundamental problems relate to underdevelopment in western Canada and the Maritime provinces. I see nothing in the proposed legislation that will encourage Canadian resource and manufacturing development in areas where this is urgently needed. As a matter of fact, as far as the north is concerned, instead of continuing the initiatives that were taken in the early 1960's the government has tended to discourage this sort of activity by cancelling roads to resources programs. One area where governments can play a useful role in encouraging initiative on the part of private enterprise is in providing the infrastructure—the roads, railways and all facilities necessary—to enable private enterprise to develop Canada's resource potential. But instead of this we find the government tending to back away from its fundamental responsibilities. When the CDC is established it will be highly profit oriented. It will only develop areas where the profit potential is extremely high, and therefore the question of dealing with risk ventures will not be assisted by any manner or means.

This leads me to the discussion that took place in the House earlier today. There has been some criticism that the opposition is less than co-operative with the government in its legislative proposals and initiatives. This criticism has come from the Member of Parliament who holds the highest office in the land, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Queen's first minister. I think our discussion of the CDC at this stage makes it possible to put the record in perspective.

Why are we concerning ourselves at this time with a bill which offers absolutely no chance of dealing with the fundamental economic issues facing Canada? Why are we dealing with this issue when we should be debating, for example, amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act? This is a matter of vital importance in view of the critical and growing unemployment situation in Canada. Why is a bill of this kind taking precedence over the implementation of the recommendations contained in the white paper on tax reform? Parliament has been waiting for many months now for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) to bring down his proposed legislation based on the long and extensive discussion of his white paper proposals. Why is priority given to this bill, which is window dressing, political posturing, a bill designed to create the impression that the government is doing something to cope with fundamental economic problems when actually it does nothing significant at all?

I am sure if the government put amendments before us—

Mr. McBride: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? Does he also consider the marketing bill, which has been held up for about a year now, to be window dressing?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It seems to the Chair that the question asked by the hon. member can only lead us further away from the bill now under consideration.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has asked a question and I am very pleased to reply to it. If the agricultural products marketing bill goes through—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has indicated that the question as asked is irrelevant to the bill now under discussion. If the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) answers the question, he will lead this debate away from the subject matter of the measure now before the House. With all respect, I would ask him to bear that in mind.

Mr. Dinsdale: With great respect, Mr. Speaker, I was just making the point that there were other legislative items which should be given greater priority than the Canada Development Corporation. Obviously, the hon. member thinks the agricultural marketing bill is one item of government legislation which should have greater priority.

Mr. McBride: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Again, the Chair must say that the question asked by the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. McBride) is irrelevant to the subject matter now being debated I suggest that the hon. member for Brandon-Souris should continue his remarks.

Mr. Dinsdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall follow your directions and carry on with the theme of my remarks. I presume the hon. member was merely trying to introduce a red herring to the discussion.

Mr. McBride: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I understand the hon. member is rising on a point of order.

Mr. McBride: Mr. Speaker, in no sense did I introduce a red herring. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris suggested there were other more important bills before the House.

An hon. Member: Leave it until Sunday.

Mr. McBride: I suggest that the opposition has prevented many of these bills from coming before the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has been carefully following the remarks of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris and feels they have been related to the bill now before us. I suggest to the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. McBride) that his initial question could only lead the House to a renewed debate on legislation which is now pending. I feel the remarks of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris were in order.

Mr. Dinsdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. After this diversionary tactic on the part of the hon. member, I should like to again refer to legislative issues that are fundamental to this House of Commons. The Prime Minister has complained about the way the opposition handles the business of the House. Perhaps members opposite do not understand our practices and procedures, or how Parliament works. Fairly recently we—

Mr. McBride: Mr. Speaker, surely the hon. member is lecturing the House, with some knowledge of its procedures, in an arrogant fashion, hardly befitting a distinguished parliamentarian like himself.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I did not ask the hon. member to interrupt. I did have the floor and I yielded to the hon. member. Perhaps we should get on with the debate because time is at a premium today.

Mr. Mahoney: That is an interesting observation.

Mr. Pepin: I wish I had said that.

Mr. Dinsdale: Let me come back to the point I was endeavouring to make. We would be delighted if this government would come to grips with the problem instead of shadow boxing. It should tackle the real issues of concern in Canada. We must do something on an emergency basis to stimulate the economy of Canada. The unemployment situation has been discussed in season and out of season, but this government has continually treated the matter with marked disdain. We must deal with unemployment problems as they exist today. We have some 700,000 people unemployed. There are a great number of companies going into bankruptcy. The DREE program of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is not having the desired effect because it is being used for political purposes. There is a lack of co-ordination in that we have several departments of government working at odds with each other.

Just before one o'clock I should like to give the House an illustration of what is happening at this time. In 1969 the government adopted, as one of its major initiatives, the concept of bringing down the high cost of drugs in Canada. This is a basic financial issue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There has been some discussion among hon. members about relevancy. I think the hon. member who now has the floor is beginning to wander a bit too far.

Mr. Dinsdale: With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, we are at the second reading stage of this bill. During all my experience in this House hon. members have never been restricted in their attempts to deal with the implications of government legislation, or in their efforts to place these measures in proper perspective. If we are to be confined to very narrow limits of debate at this stage, this will amount to a further infringement of the rights of private members. It is my understanding that at the second reading stage our discussions can range—

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair was in no way attempting to restrict the hon. member. His rights are the same as those enjoyed by all other members of the House. During the second reading consideration of a measure, the Chair suggests that hon. members must relate their remarks to the subject matter of the bill before the House. I have listened carefully to the hon. member's remarks and it seemed to me the hon. member was beginning to deal with other aspects of government policy, specifically government's policy in attempting to reduce the price of drugs. That seems to me to be irrelevant to the bill under consideration.

An hon. Member: Let's call it one o'clock.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, my time has almost expired. I was referring to the fact that the Canada Development Corporation—

Mr. Mahoney: Tell us about Red River Valley.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Calgary, whatever he is, ought to be a spokesman for western Canada.

An hon. Member: He is.

Mr. Dinsdale: He carries on like a trained seal, going along with everything this government does.

Mr. Deachman: You don't see any trained seals on the Prairies.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Dinsdale: He will not give the slightest—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being one o'clock I do now leave the Chair.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at one o'clock, I was just concluding my remarks. I was interrupted quite often, so I trust the Chair will be lenient and allow me to bring my observations to a conclusion. As a matter of fact, I was in full flight when the recess was called by the Chair.

• (2:10 p.m.)

The main point I wish to bring out, as we pursue this important subject of ways and means to stimulate the Canadian economy, to get it out of the doldrums into which it has descended because of the maladministration of this government is that we should not dabble in window dressing tactics such as those employed in the bill which is before us but rather should get to the root of our economic problems. The time has long past for the government to abandon its ad hoc approach to our economic problems. Now, when an issue comes up it is widely discussed because of the impact of the media. It is possible to get public involvement in an issue within a relatively short space of time because of the instantaneous impact of the electronic means of communication. The government, as a result, instead of pursuing the even tenor of its way, mapping out its economic development program on a long-term, rational basis, is lured off the track in pursuit of will-o'-the wisps. I feel that is the best description that can be appied to the present proposals of the government to establish the Canada Development Corporation.

It is an old idea. It is an idea that has broad support from the Canadian financial community, and from many members of the House of Commons. It appeals to Canadians because it is anticipated that through government initiative of this kind the ordinary man in the street can become directly involved, even if only on a limited financial scale, in the development of his country's rich resources. But this measure does nothing to make that possible. Instead, it runs at cross purposes to some programs already initiated by the government. This is characteristic of the government's approach to economic matters.

This bill is a political sham. It is window dressing, designed to remove the pressure caused by the concern widely felt in favour of Canadian economic nationalism. It is a diversionary tactic which the government hopes will conceal its responsibility for our critical unemployment situation, and for the declining economy in the underdeveloped areas of the country. The reaction of some government backbenchers to the remarks I was making before one o'clock would indicate that they are sensitive in this regard. I strongly suggest that they quit playing politics at this time and deal with the real problems of Canada.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, having examined the inadequacies of this bill respecting the establishment of the Canada Development Corporation, it was ironic to read a report in this morning's press, referred to earlier today, telling of the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) criticisms of the operations of the House of Commons. He was very critical of the work done by the opposition, and in one of his statements said that nine times out of ten during the daily question period the opposition missed their mark. I think the Prime Minister would perform a much better service for the people of Canada if he ensured that more of the legislation presented by the government was on the mark and dealt with the problems of the people. Certainly, the government has fanned badly, and indeed fanned totally by attempting to deal with some of our economic problems through the provisions of this bill.

When we are discussing this proposal to establish a Canada Development Corporation we are, in effect, considering Canada's future. At present we have a combination of social, cultural, political and economic problems, the resolution of which will have an impact on Canada's future. The fact is that many of us want to see a national identity established in Canada based on moral and ethical standards that take account of social concerns and sensitivities, as well as national aspirations and international considerations. In establishing such a national identity, it is necessary that we instal a sense of the principle of equity in our affairs and that we reject the manner in which the economic system has operated, as evidenced by present disparities and inequities. It seems to me that the Liberal party has a record in this connection of which it should not be proud.

For a long time the Liberal party has been committed to the principle of continentalism, of tying Canada closer to the United States, and of merging our economies together. We have no objection to normal economic relations with the United States. We want to have friendly relations with the United States. Very often the economic relations we have make good sense for the people of both nations, and when that is the case we want to promote the activities in question. But we must consider the direction in which our economy is moving now.

While the immediate implications of this bill will be primarily economic, it has wider implications in the national sense. Canada was established as a nation through the hard work of its people, despite formidable obstacles, but in recent years there has been abdication of responsibility by the government to maintain our Canadian nationhood or identity in such a way that we can develop our resources in the best interests of all Canadians.

It has also to be said that Canadian business has failed. For a long time it had operated under an umbrella of protection, behind various trade and tariff barriers. A rational case could be made for that type of development during the infancy stages of our nation, but we have left those stages behind us. Some time during the past 20 or 30 years Canadian businessmen made a basic decision which has had profound implications for all of us. Many of them, not all, decided to cast their lot in with larger American business concerns. They no longer considered the national interest. They did not think that their prosperity and power derived from political decisions taken by Canadian leaders and by the Canadian people in earlier times. They were no longer willing to pay their debt to Canadian society. They were only interested in the almighty buck, and they sold out the interests of the Canadian people and of the Canadian nation. What we have before us in the Canada Development Corporation will be another mark of failure. I suggest that there are inconsistencies and conflicts in the manner in which it has been set up which will make it impossible for the corporation to further the interests of the Canadian people.

I found the remarks of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) of particular interest when he introduced this bill at second reading. First, he indicated his own confusion and then said that all of the opposition parties seemed to be in favour of the Canada Development Corporation yet against it at the same time. He completely missed the point, Mr. Speaker. Some of us are talking about a Canada Development Corporation different from that presented to us at this session, namely the one which was first proposed by Walter Gordon when he was a member of this House.

The minister also stated that the government believes there is a role for the new institution. He suggested that one of its purposes is to help make possible fuller participation in the growth and development of Canada. This is typical of the wishy-washy statements made by Liberal spokesmen from time to time. The minister then took note of some of the new developments on the international economic scene by stating:

> Business and industry have entered a new period of internationalism which makes it desirable that there be a number of Canadian controlled corporations with headquarters in Canada and with the kind of institutional strength and management capabilities to compete successfully in Canadian and international markets.

I think we need to examine the implications of this statement, Mr. Speaker. The minister has correctly noted the growth of a new phenomenon, the multinational corporation. We know that this type of institution is playing an ever-increasing role on the economic scene but the minister seems to suggest that Canada should get into the action by doing the same type of thing. I am not at all sure that this would serve our own best interests in the long run, as I doubt whether we could compete in that sort of elite market given our comparative geographic and economic conditions.

Mr. Pepin: That remains to be demonstrated.

Mr. Burton: The minister acknowledged that Canadians are asking why they cannot participate more fully in their own resource and industrial development and in the growth of strong Canadian based corporations with extensive international operations. He correctly pointed to the concern of the Canadian people on this score, but I feel he has totally missed the mark in the bill that he is now asking us to pass.

An hon. Member: What is the mark?

Mr. Burton: Be patient and you will find out.

Mr. Orlikow: It is not obscene language, that is for sure.

An hon. Member: You don't want multinational corporations and you don't want—

Mr. Burton: All we hear are loud noises from people who are not prepared to listen, who are not prepared to learn, but simply—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The hon. member for Regina East has the floor. Although we are not very numerous hon. members are making much more noise than a full House. The Chair suggests that hon. members should listen attentively unless they have sufficient cause to interrupt the hon. member for Regina East.

Mr. Burton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Osler: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The problem is that we have been listening attentively and we cannot understand what the hon. member says. All we are asking—

Mr. Crouse: That is not a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. I will deal with one point of order at a time. I think this is a continuation of the same kind of argument we have had sotto voce but louder this time.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure there is any hope that some hon. members opposite will be able to understand, but I am sure that the Canadian people will understand.

Mr. Dinsdale: Trained seals!

Mr. Burton: The Minister of Finance outlined what he considered to be some of the purposes of the Canada Development Corporation. The first was to help develop and maintain strong Canadian controlled and Canadian managed corporations in the private sector of the economy and, second, to give Canadians greater opportunity to invest and participate in the economic development of Canada. It is quite clear that the Canada Development Corporation is going to assist the private sector of the economy. I have always acknowledged that there is a role to be played by the private sector in economic development and activity, but what we have here is a public agency apparently designed to serve the interests of the people of Canada but which instead will encourage and help the private sector. These conflicts may be beyond the understanding of some Liberal members, but I suggest that the Canadian people will see them very clearly.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Anderson: Waffle on.

Mr. Burton: —that there are other problems in connection with the Canada Development Corporation which should be examined. The minister stated that the first objective would be to make investment in the equity of existing enterprises and also assistance in the expansion of existing ones. It remains to be seen how this can be done; much of it will be dependent upon policy to be developed after the corporation is formed. The minister stated it is expected that CDC investment in a corporation would normally be large enough, either alone or in combination with other Canadian investors, to ensure Canadian control. I would like to see more evidence of this than has been forthcoming. The minister indicated something of the approach to be used by the Canada Development Corporation when he said:

> Ideally, many of its actions and investments will be in response to proposals made to it by others.

What that sentence really means, Mr. Speaker, is that the CDC is simply to react to plans and proposals placed before it, presumably by the private sector or by others. On the basis of the minister's statement, the CDC is not going to take the initiative in terms of influencing the course of economic development in this country. It seems to me this sentence indicates quite clearly that the corporation is simply going to react to proposals and plans presented by others, to say "This is a good idea and that is not such a good idea." This leaves a great deal to be desired and I shall elaborate on it in a few moments if some hon. members opposite will just have patience.

We have to take account of the fact that the Canada Development Corporation will only have a very small percentage of public equity. The figure of 10 per cent has been mentioned. I see this as one of the problems for this corporation, Mr. Speaker, the small percentage of public participation. By "public" I mean through the hands of the government which, after all, has final responsibility for the over-all direction and development of the economy.

The minister stated that the management of the corporation will at all times be fully aware of the need to earn a competitive rate of return on invested capital fully commensurate with the risks involved. He also stated:

> The CDC cannot and must not be expected to make investments which do not meet its criteria for profitability. The national interest and the profit motive are not always compatible, but there is a broad area over which they are or can be in harmony.

With the latter statement I have no quarrel. There can be times, and there will be times, when those two objectives and those two interests can be harmonized. It seems to me, however, that at other times there will be some very difficult and serious conflicts of interest. Mr. Speaker, what is the situation with respect to one of the corporations which it is proposed to have taken over by Canada Development Corporation, namely, Panarctic Oils. A considerable amount of federal money has been placed into the Panarctic Oils operation, and for good reason. I think it is a wise, public investment. However, for the present and for some considerable time in the future, I suggest that it will not be a profitable venture. Actually, in terms of the profit considerations which will apply to this corporation, it would be impossible to establish a Canada Development Corporation which had a major interest in Panarctic Oils and, thereby, give to the latter the type of protection that is needed in the best long run interests of Canada.

It seems to me we must recognize that there is a very real problem when we look at Canada Development Corporation from the viewpoint of profit on the one hand, while, on the other hand, we are concerned about the public interest. At times these interests are compatible. But I am sure it will be recognized by all concerned that there may be times when a Canada Development Corporation, properly structured in the form of a Crown corporation as is proposed in the amendment moved by my colleague the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman), would consider working either by itself or in conjunction with other agencies, which might be provincial governments, local community organizations, local governments or, in some cases, even private interests, on projects which might be in the best interest of the corporation or in the best interests of Canada, to develop an enterprise which would not produce a return in the form of dividends to shareholders but which, from the viewpoint of the benefits to the Canadian people, would certainly be a worthwhile venture. It seems to me it is recognized in many quarters that we must go beyond the old profit and loss approach, which is really what is involved when one looks at the balance sheet of any corporation. One must look at it from the wider standpoint of the total costs involved and of the total benefits involved, if we are to see wise decision making in future. As well, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we must keep in mind the very great difficulties which are involved in terms of the constitutional structure that we have in Canada. We, after all, are a federal state and there are difficulties in carrying on any type of central, co-ordinating planning of the economy at the federal level, because of the divided jurisdiction which exists in Canada.

After all, Mr. Speaker, the provinces, and very rightly so, have their own interests to consider. They have their own responsibilities. This is the structure which has been laid down for us in the constitution, a great portion of which will remain, despite any amendments which may eventually be made to the constitution. It seems to me that a properly constructed Canada Development Corporation could play a very important role in terms of giving the federal government the type of tool that it needs to direct the course of the development of the economy, and to ensure that this will be of benefit to the Canadian people.

It seems to me that other problems must be taken into account as well. I have already noted that the Canada Development Corporation, as it is proposed, is based on the profit motive; that is a prime goal, as admitted and stated by the Minister of Finance. It seems to me that it is structured on this basis and, certainly, that will be a very great impediment from the start. Second, the Corporation will not be responsible to the government or to Parliament. Third, we shall have a sell-out of certain corporations to private investors. That, really, is what will be involved. This will create some very real problems. Some of these Crown corporations, such as Polymer, Eldorado, and the Northern Transportation Company, have been very profitable. Actually, they have produced a good rate of return on the original investment, and I am very happy that they have done so. Possibly, they will continue to do so in future, but that may not necessarily be the case. It may be that at some time in the future one or other of these corporations will need, for the sake of the public interest to carry on their operations in a way which may be designed to meet their costs, but no more than that. Such a corporation may even have to be subsidized because of certain considerations affecting the public interest. The fact that Canada Development Corporation is to be controlled as a private corporation, with the government retaining only about a 10 per cent interest, will pose a very great problem, especially if the corporation is to do the job conceived for it.

It seems to me that there is one other aspect of the considerations involving Canada Development Corporation that hon. members ought to consider today. For some time now we have had a regional development program in Canada which the government has been touting as its great weapon in the attempt to promote some greater degree of equity in terms of economic wealth and power as between one region and another in Canada. The federal government has been spending a great deal of money on this program. It was revealed last fall in the House that some three quarters of a billion dollars, I believe, had been spent by the federal government over a period of years through a number of programs involving incentive grants and assistance to private industry, in an attempt to bolster the economy of the various regions of Canada. Of course, there have been numerous problems in administering these programs effectively and in ensuring that they would reach the objectives set out for them.

The federal government has, over the last couple of years, introduced its latest regional development program. The government claimed, actually, that they had looked at some of the mistakes made in some of the earlier programs that had been introduced. A great deal of money is being spent on the program now. I notice, for example, that the program of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion for the year 1971-72 will involve something over $400 million. Another $37 million, or $40 million, is to be voted to the Cape Breton Development Corporation. Some of these expenditures are very worthwhile and I think that they can be justified, Mr. Speaker. Nevertheless, this is a very large program. I think it might also be noted that a large amount of this program consists of incentive grants to private industry and to private entrepreneurs.

I am interested to note that even some of the Liberal backbenchers are becoming concerned about this matter. It was with a great deal of interest that I noted a report in the Edmonton Journal of February 19, concerning the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Harries). The report reads in part:

> The federal government should stop immediately its industrial incentive grant program except in very special areas, says Liberal MP Hu Harries.

Mr. Orlikow: The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona is not in the chamber.

Mr. Burton: The report went on to state that the grants should be available only to areas where there is "clearly a technological opportunity accompanied by a high and continuing rate of unemployment." As well, the hon. member is reported to have said that the current incentive program is turning out to be the same as the last federal incentive program which, when completed, was "roundly criticized". Then, the hon. member went on to say this:

> The incentive grant represented 'a windfall profit to the shareholders' of Imperial Oil, which is more than 70 per cent owned by Standard Oil of New Jersey,—

That is what a Liberal member is reported to have said. I commend the hon. member for his frankness and honesty in expressing his doubts about this program, the manner in which it is being operated and its effectiveness. We need to examine the inadequacies of the program of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

On another occasion, I outlined what I considered to be some of the weaknesses of the government's program; that is the give-away nature of the grants and the subsidization, of industry. As the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona stated, in many cases the decision to give an incentive grant did not change the basic decision about whether to set up an industry. In fact, in many cases the decision had already been made. It is difficult to define in any precise way, but I think many people suspect that many of the grants were given to firms which, in fact, intended to go ahead with the project in any case and the provision of an incentive grant did not affect that basic decision. I am not suggesting that there is not a need for a great deal of expenditure on a regional development program to remove the regional disparities in Canada. I think it is recognized in all parts of the House that there is a very great need.

We need a recasting and redirection of the regional development program in order to ensure that the public interest is met. Here again, we run into conflict with the manner in which the government regards the profit motive. They consider that the profit motive is still the prime thing to take into account. However, there are many cases today where investments are justified in terms of the services provided, facilities established, products provided at a reasonable cost and where the profit consideration should not be the prime consideration.

The relevance of what I have been saying concerning the need for a recasting of the regional development program is that we have a golden opportunity through the Canada Development Corporation to provide the necessary redirection for the program. In fact, if the Canada Development Corporation were constituted as a Crown or public corporation, it could be made the instrument through which a large part of economic development program in various regions could be carried out.

There are other programs that still need to be carried on in terms of developing the infrastructure of many communities and areas of Canada which are not directly related to the establishment of new facilities for the production of goods or services. Nevertheless, I think the Canada Development Corporation, if properly constituted as a Crown corporation, could in fact do the job that all would like to see done, namely ensuring that we have a sound regional development program which will remove regional disparities in Canada, result in a greater degree of equity of wealth and economic power in the various regions of Canada and provide a better balance for the Canadian nation. I suggest that this could be much more adequately accomplished through a Crown or public corporation whose primary concern would be the public interest rather than the profit motive.

As the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) and others in this party have pointed out, there will be occasions when it will be desirable for the Canada Development Corporation, as a Crown corporation, to work in concert with private or public concerns. They would establish an undertaking, concern or operation which would produce a profit, and it should be designed on that basis. That should certainly be one of the approaches used whenever it is considered to be the best one for a particular problem. However, it seems that the government is locking itself in the present structure which it is proposing for the Canada Development Corporation. As the corporation is to be constituted, the first, second and last objective will be to produce a profit.

One of the concerns that has resulted in this legislation being placed before the House is that we have a very real problem in Canada today in terms of the high degree of foreign ownership that exists in the Canadian economy. I do not need to quote figures this afternoon indicating the percentages of various sectors of the Canadian economy which are controlled by foreign interests, whether American or others. This process has gone so far down the road that we now have United States economists and other officials admitting that Canada is now being bought out with its own money. This is demonstrated in a recent study published by the United States department of commerce. It shows that 94 per cent of the capital generated by United States corporations in Canada in 1968 was generated through profits, retained earnings, depreciation or the raising of loan capital within Canada. It is quite likely that today the figure is closer to 100 per cent. This indicates how far we have gone.

This situation has developed because of the absence of a government policy on this question. We have been promised such a policy for weeks and months. There is increasing concern about this matter. The rate of takeover of Canadian concerns by foreign controlled companies is increasing. On a number of occasions in this House I, and other members, have asked whether we would have an interim policy until the government decides on a final policy. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) shrugs it off. I see no reason why we cannot have a moratorium on any further takeovers until such time as the government is able to decide on a policy which it can present to this House and the people of Canada. Instead, we find the Prime Minister engaged in some rather devious attempts to lead the Canadian people off the trail of the power issue.

When speaking in Regina recently the Prime Minister attempted to suggest it was just those fellows from Toronto, Watkins, Gordon and others, who are concerned about this matter. He stated there is a problem in some of the lesser developed regions in Canada, such as the Atlantic provinces, Quebec and parts of western Canada, but we would not have as high a rate of development if we were to place restrictions on foreign ownership. Perhaps that would happen; I acknowledge there is a problem. This could possibly happen with a Liberal government and its typical lack of policies for dealing with some of these problems.

Mr. Osler: What would your answer be?

Mr. Burton: I have been attempting to suggest it. The Canada Development Corporation, as a Crown corporation, would be one of the major instruments to be used in a sound regional developmental policy in Canada. It would safeguard the public interest in developing the lesser developed regions of Canada.

• (2:50 p.m.)

I find that even a few Liberals are becoming concerned about what is happening. I note an article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of February 17. In substance, it is a report of an interview with Mr. Walter Gordon, a former minister of finance. Since parts of it are relevant to the debate today, I should like to quote from it. The article is by Duart Farquharson, and reads:

> Former Liberal finance minister Walter Gordon is having second thoughts about the Trudeau government's evolving position on economic nationalism following an attack on him by the Prime Minister in Regina.
> "I think I know where he stands," Mr. Gordon told Southam News Services in an interview Tuesday. "Either he has changed his mind, or I'm a very surprised person."

An hon. Member: I hope he changed his mind.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Gordon then goes on to refer to some of the remarks made by the Prime Minister when he spoke in Regina. According to the writer of this article, a tape of Mr. Trudeau's remarks in Regina has him saying this about economic nationalism, in part:

> There is this constant tradeoff between those parts of Canada which are already fairly developed like the central provinces, and particularly Ontario.
> And that's where you find the Melville Watkins and the Walter Gordons who think that enough is enough and they don't want any more foreign capital to develop their province, but they don't always realize that other parts of Canada have not developed that far and therefore they would not mind a little bit of foreign capital if it means there is more technological progress and higher standards of living and so on.

Mr. Pepin: And what's wrong with that?

Mr. Burton: The fact is the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is attempting to play one part of the country off against the others.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Burton: The first question which should be asked of the Prime Minister, this man who has made such a pitch concerning Canadian unity, is: what has been the result to date of the faith he places in private enterprise to do a job which has led to the type of inequity which exists in the Canadian economy today? If the Prime Minister were to rely on the absence of policy we have known in the past, there would be problems. He has totally failed to recognize the basic point that the Canada Development Corporation could be used as a major instrument for ensuring an adequate degree of development in all regions of Canada.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, on an important issue such as this, it is a tragedy that the sole representative of the financial side of the government present today should be the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin).

An hon. Member: What's wrong with him?

Mr. Thompson: There is nothing wrong with him at all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Thompson: Except that he is supporting a piece of legislation which I do not think is characteristic of him at all. I recall back in the early days, before he or I were members of this House, we did on occasion discuss some of the things this country needs. I wish we could go back to the old days because I think we might have better legislation than we have now.

Mr. Pepin: But you have changed so much since then.

Mr. Thompson: If you listen carefully to what I have to say, you will find I have not changed at all.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. Will the hon. member please address the Chair.

Mr. Thompson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I was merely reminiscing over days in the past, and on a beautiful Friday afternoon when spring seems to be heavy in the air, there is a great temptation to get into a personal digression.

This proposal to establish a Canada Development Corporation has appeared in practically every Speech from the Throne I have heard. It has been the subject of debate in every session during which I have been a member of this House. It now appears to me it would have been far better had the government resorted to one of the contraceptive devices well known to governments and forgotten about the idea altogether. I say this because I do not believe the CDC as proposed here will meet the needs of Canada. I recognize there probably is a legitimate place in the economy for a Canadian development corporation, provided it is geared to sound principles, provided it could do for the private sector of the economy some of the things which the private sector finds difficult, and provided it would really assist in the expansion of our industrial development while at the same time helping retain a larger percentage of ownership in Canadian hands.

I go back to 1965. The Hon. Walter Gordon was at that time minister of finance and he was the one who first enunciated the basic concept of a Canadian Development Corporation in any detail. In a speech on June 3 to the Canadian Textile Institute in St. Adele, he had this to say:

> The purpose of the Canada Development Corporation will be:
> 1) To initiate the development or expansion of large-scale new enterprises in Canada. If the Canada Development Corporation had been in existence some years ago, it might have participated in such things as the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, the development of the Canadian oil and gas industry, the tar sands of Alberta, Saskatchewan potash. Labrador iron, the integration of certain sections of our forest industries, and so on.
> 2) To acquire a controlling or a substantial minority interest in existing Canadian enterprises which otherwise might have to be sold to outsiders.
> 3) Where suitable opportunities occur, to purchase Canadian businesses or resources now held by non-residents and to provide an additional source of funds where non-resident owners want to bring in substantial Canadian partnership in their enterprises here.

I wish the piece of legislation before us would bring about these objectives which were enunciated six years ago by the former minister of finance. If this bill were doing these very things, I would support it because I believe all three of the issues which Mr. Gordon defined are critical issues as far as the development of our industry is concerned. But I do not see this legislation having such an effect. It is a much paler, watered down version of Mr. Gordon's vision at that time and as far as I can see it will not attain the objectives he had in mind. This is not only my belief. As far as I can see, those who are experts in this field share this view.

During its entire economic history, Canada has not been able to provide sufficient capital to meet all its demands for growth capital. Canada has therefore relied, and continues to rely, heavily upon the financial resources of other countries, chiefly the United States. Yet it is not the lack of capital alone which has brought about this situation; it has been the investment climate in Canada, or the lack of a climate which has not been attractive to Canadian capital. As a result, capital has been attracted from the countries where the laws governing the investment of that capital offer more encouragement to investment and incentive than we have been able to provide for our own investors in Canada.

The idea of such a government-sponsored catalyst to sustain Canadian-owned enterprise and to encourage Canadian investment in Canadian enterprise is certainly not new, but the terms of reference and the basis on which the government is proposing to do this are, I think, completely inadequate on the one hand and wrong on the other.

If a Canada Development Corporation is to accomplish a worth-while purpose, it would not just have the objective of buying back Canada; it would also encourage the investment of Canadian capital in Canadian enterprise. Apart from the money being held today in funds belonging to insurance companies, mutual funds and other types of corporate financial institutions, there is more than $12 billion in the savings accounts of Canadians. In addition to that, an increasing amount of Canadian savings is being invested in the United States, very often in the type of speculative stock that does not, in the long run, bring about the return that people expect. The tragedy of the situation is that we are not using this source of capital which we have at our disposal: this is where the problem lies.

Look at the situation in Japan. Japan has not only developed a viable economy where the growth of the gross national product has been nearly double ours during the last 20 years; it has also put vast amounts of money into development in Canada and elsewhere. Where has this money come from? It has not come from the United States, from Switzerland or from France. This money has been generated inside Japan. The Japanese have effectively used their own capital, the banking system and the Bank of Japan to generate this capital.

I should like to know why we cannot do something like this. Why does not the government bring in legislation to encourage the generation of capital from Canadian sources both from the point of view of national pride and sound investment? I suggest that as presently constituted, the CDC could lead to disaster. Certainly I do not see it reaching any of the objectives that are so important. In fact, the whole concept as presented is just a shadow of what was once talked about five, six, seven or eight years ago by the government. Tragically, this version of the CDC will practise economic nationalism only when it is profitable to do so. Tragically, also, it will not increase in any appreciable way the amount of capital that Canada's development needs. It is said that initially the government will be the sole shareholder of the Canada Development Corporation. If the CDC is to be the kind of organization in which the Canadian people have confidence, why does it not encourage investment by individual Canadians right from the beginning? Why is it necessary that all the directors of the CDC be, initially, government appointees even though the bill stipulates that the government will eventually appoint only four of the 18 to 21 directors? If that proposition is sound later, why is it not sound at the beginning?

I note that the legislation provides that until the government's share in the CDC drops below 50 per cent—which is not going to happen in a hurry—the Deputy Minister of Finance, and Industry, Trade and Commerce will sit in on the deliberations of the board as ex-offico members. The government is continually complaining that the opposition does nothing but criticize.

Mr. Whicher: That is right.

Mr. Thompson: Well, my hon. friend, listen for a little while and I will give you some humble suggestions about how the Canada Development Corporation might have been brought into being on a more satisfactory basis.

If the government believes that such a corporation is necessary—and six years ago Mr. Gordon defined its objectives—I contend that right from the beginning it should have made the corporation one in which individual Canadians could share. Let it be a corporation in which not only those who have amassed wealth can invest; let the Canadian people at large buy a $10 share, 10 $10 shares, or 100 $10 shares, and buy them for their own good. While immediate returns might not be as profitable as investing their money in a dead type of investment such as Canada bonds, nevertheless within a short time the investment could produce returns directly to the investors as well as to the benefit of the nation.

If the government is convinced that this is a sound proposition, why does it not hold a competition and recruit 20 of the best men in industry who know and are experienced in development investment and finance? There are tremendous talents available. Men from private industry should head this organization, since it is supposed to be a private corporation. Why does the government not get out of its way and let it function as a private corporation, if it is meant to be such? Instead of that, even before the bill has passed the House a civil servant is mooted as the one who will head the corporation. I am not in any way criticizing the individual concerned, but the civil service is the wrong place to recruit the head of this corporation. He should be taken straight out of the industry.

Mr. Pepin: That is where he came from.

Mr. Thompson: If that is so, he should be supported by men who are not in the government service at the present time.

Mr. Pepin: What is wrong with having both?

Mr. Thompson: Somehow or another I cannot trust government appointments made in this way. Either government pork-barrelling or Liberal party patronizing will be the criterion behind such appointments. I think we should try to convince the Canadian people that this is a genuine private organization; that the government does not exercise patronage by appointing the directors of the board. If one thing is certain, it is that the holders of perpetual bonds who invested their money in good faith, with government encouragement, will not be investing in the CDC. These people have been denied the right to redeem those bonds at par and have lost not only their capital investment but the benefits accruing therefrom, benefits that have gone to someone else down through the years since these perpetual bonds were put on the market just prior to the beginning of the last war.

I also think that this corporation should move its base of operations as far away from Ottawa as possible. I would not mind if the government established it in Calgary South. The hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney) has had a lot to say about tax reform. He needs a little support in the next election if he is going to be here to assist in developing the tax reform policies that the government is talking about. I would be even happier if the CDC were based in Vancouver—but at least get it away from Ottawa. Let private investment, initiative and enterprise get behind it, if it is to be what the government says it will be. But I submit the government has no intention of letting this come about.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? I wonder whether I hear him aright. Did he say the headquarters should be in Vancouver? I just want him to confirm that that is what is in his mind.

Mr. Thompson: I think that would be a very good idea, Mr. Speaker. I should like better to see it based in Alberta, but you could put another 500 or 600 miles between it and Ottawa by basing it in Vancouver, and that would be good.

• (3:10 p.m.)

I believe the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson), that great ecologist and gentleman who is the authority on how to transport oil from the northland, is suggesting that we should establish the headquarters in Esquimalt or Victoria.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say, for the record, that this was not my proposal. I did not suggest that the headquarters should be situated in Esquimalt. I suggested that if the Canada Development Corporation is to be effective, it should be located closer to some of the larger financial centres of this country.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, that remark shows the illiteracy of the hon. gentleman so far as the financial situation in Canada is concerned. My province and your province would get along a great deal better if they did not have to depend on the sort of financial backing given the west by Bay Street—

An hon. Member: Oh, sit down!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is obvious that the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) does not want to accept a question.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, I am not rising to ask a question but to raise a point of order. I should like it clarified whether Vancouver is primarily an acceptable financial centre and Esquimalt is not. If the hon. member has reason to suggest that the headquarters of the CDC should be located in Esquimalt, I would be happy to go along with it because, after all, that is my home area.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the hon. member's point of order is not legitimate. If he wants to know the reason for my suggestion, let me say that it is not really because Esquimalt might be the most appropriate area for locating these headquarters but I had in mind that we should move the headquarters as far away from Ottawa and the central government as possible. Vancouver would be a very good location. The further away from Ottawa we can establish the headquarters, the better off it will be.

These points involve some of the proposals which have been made in respect of the establishment of the Canada Development Corporation, many of which have received the complete support of members in this part of the House. We do not have this kind of policy. In fact, the whole concept of the government in respect of this measure is abortive. I think the measure has value in that it would bring about a denationalization of some corporations. Some of these corporations have operated reasonably well during the years, but others are in difficulty, particularly those concerned with development of the north. I have in mind the development of northern power and transportation. Perhaps in this respect the government does have a role to play in making sure that funds are available for the development of industries and resources in the north. If we do not make these funds available, perhaps we should not be entitled to the potential of the north.

I am convinced, from the pattern indicated in legislation and speeches, that the government will try to convince Canadians that they control the CDC. It has been suggested that the government will encourage insurance companies and the holders of large sources of capital to invest in this corporation. I think it would be far better to let individual Canadians participate.

If there is a surplus in the Canada Pension Plan, such funds could be used for the development and expansion of our economy. In this way we could create many more jobs and provide Canadians with a greater share in the development of Canada. More and more we must understand that the right to a living through one's work is a diminishing thing. We must recognize that the right of involvement or ownership on the part of individuals is diminishing. Yet man can only earn his living as a result of the fruits of his labour, the fruits of his capital or through a combination of both. I think a combination of these two principles could very well be the key to private investment as far as the individual Canadian is concerned. We should encourage the widest possible investment and ownership and participation, particularly in common or equity shares, on the part of Canadians in Canadian companies. This can be done not only through a viable form of the Canada Development Corporation but in many other ways.

Throughout the world Canada is noted for its great natural resource potential, only partially developed at the present time. Little is made of the fact that Canadians own very little of this great potential. If a country which claims to be maintaining the second highest standard of living in the world drifts into a situation such as we have in Canada, this is difficult to explain. There are causes for this national problem, and these causes are basically of our own making; we cannot blame somebody else for them. Canadian tax laws are contrary to the development by Canadians of these resources. These tax laws could be remedied very quickly, yet we have gone on for years ignoring this vital problem. When we do discuss it, the outcome is the type of recommendation that will further discourage Canadians from investing in their own resource development.

The advantage of United States companies often makes it impossible for a Canadian company to exist or to take over another Canadian company. This is a result of the difference between our tax laws and those of the United States. If a United States company borrows $10 million from a United States bank to purchase a company in Canada, the interest on the loan is not taxable. This tax concession alone is such a deterrent to a Canadian company that often it will not entertain a project which the United States company considers to be a good investment.

In many areas of our resource industries there would be very little difference in the amount of tax collected if the advantage were given to companies to operate in these remote places. Therefore, tax concessions should be given to this type of development in order to encourage Canadian investors.

Another tragic development which has taken place in Canada during the past 20 years has been the changing structure of our financial machinery. Our decentralized financial organizations have now assembled in the central parts of Canada and are under the kind of control which is not really interested in the investment of money for the development of our natural resources. This has made it impossible for the private Canadian entrepreneur to carry on exploration and development. This leaves them open to only one recourse—that is, to sell to larger, often foreign—companies, or give up the project altogether.

If the history of Canadian development could be recorded from the aspect of what the private entrepreneur has done in finding resources and the ingenuity used in developing various types of industries, it would be most impressive. However, not having the capital available for completion, the private entrepreneur has had to sell out. This is indeed a very sad chapter in Canadian history.

This is why most of our industrial development is controlled by people outside of Canada. Far better than developing a Canada Development Corporation, the government should amend its tax restrictions and inhibitions. In this way there would be a far more desirable climate for development. Canada's economy does not need just a little alleviation, $1 billion or $2 billion—it needs a complete change. We should buy up companies now in existence. Canada does not need silk gloves or punitive legislation; it needs a tax structure that will create a climate to encourage the investment of our money and savings in our country.

I recall the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), when he first was elected, talking about his objectives. He spoke about creating an economic climate in which Canadian companies could gain strength and vision in respect of new development and competition with multinational companies. Unfortunately, the suggested tax reform measures are still a matter for debate. We were told last night by the parliamentary secretary that these reforms will be brought in by the end of next month.

The policies of the government have accomplished the reverse of what should have been the goal. I do not think we will ever know the extent of the negative reaction the white paper on tax reform has had in the development of this country, or even in respect of the income from taxation which the government received last year. Certainly we have not gone forward with expansion in proportion to our potential. The government talks about the opposition not making suggestions. Rather than creating a Canada Development Corporation, about which I have made several suggestions, the government would have been better advised to reform the tax laws and produce more incentives.

The government would have been better advised had it reformed its tax laws to produce more incentives and eliminated the idea of a capital gains tax. I do not disagree with the principle of a capital gains tax in an industrialized nation. One day it will be necessary in Canada, but all it would do today is take more money out of circulation which should be going back into development investment. We are not yet prepared for such a luxury, we should know that because of the economic situation we face today.

There is another area which should be a very important part of tax reform policy and with which we should be dealing rather than the Canada Development Corporation. I refer to the elimination of the inheritance tax. We do not believe in double taxation. We believe that once a dollar has been taxed, what remains belongs to the individual. Every dollar on which a tax has been paid should be left free for investment. It is said that this money falls to the generations who have not earned it; but a person can only eat and consume so much. The balance should go back to the individual Canadian investor to build up this country. This is what made Canada strong in the first instance. But now we are waffling!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Howard) is rising to ask whether the hon. member will permit a question.

Mr. Thompson: I have been very generous about questions and I will be pleased to receive a question from the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Howard).

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said they are opposed to the inheritance tax. Is he stating the position of the Conservative party—that it is opposed to an inheritance tax in Canada?

Mr. Thompson: I was careful to say that tax should be eliminated in respect of all forms of money on which tax has already been paid. Some forms of earnings have not been taxed in the course of normal taxation. I think that type of money should be taxed. But the inheritance tax, as it is now, in many instances is a form of double taxation because it is a tax on money that has already been taxed. I think that form of inheritance tax should be eliminated.

There is another point on which I should like to make a positive suggestion. Instead of having the Canada Development Corporation, it would be much better if the government would provide the framework for a consortium of finance companies, whether they be insurance companies, investment funds or whatever, to come together in order to make available individual and company loans to Canadians through existing financial institutions, to make it possible for them to buy newly-issued common stocks of publicly-listed Canadian companies. There is a precedent for this: we have insured house mortgages to assist home ownership, and farm improvement loans to help farmers. There is no reason why the government should not provide this type of security for much less money than will be involved in the Canada Development Corporation, leaving the incentive where it should be.

Another sound policy in respect of correcting the problem the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) said the Canada Development Corporation is supposed to correct would be to amend the Income Tax Act and exempt from corporation income tax the new common stocks that companies issue to finance their corporate expansions, provided that all earnings, less depreciation and other approved allowances—pro rata to the new common stocks—were paid out to the new stockholders. This would enable the new stockholders who have borrowed money to buy stocks to repay their loans and the interest thereon from the earnings of the stocks rather than from their own pockets. This is basically what is done in the United States and it is what makes it possible for the Japanese economy to generate the capital that it has.

Do not let anyone say this is impossible. The Japanese economy—now the most dynamic in the world—has been expanding for the last 20 years or more at an average rate of more than 9 per cent per year and, a year ago, at 13 per cent. Every bit of this has been financed by credit internally and through a government policy which has encouraged incentive and used the banking system in the proper way. This could be done in Canada. The objective of such a policy is that our people, hopefully, would be able to buy back what already has slipped out of our hands. The objective of such a policy is to develop our resources so that Canadians will be the ones involved and so that their money is being used.

The economic situation is not very wholesome at the present time. The unemployment situation is tragic. As one economist said the other day, we probably have lost 200,000 jobs because of the wrong policy to deal with inflation. The policy the government is following will in my opinion continue to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. This will mean that those of us in between will continue to support both segments of the economy. That is the tragedy of the Canadian economic situation at the present time. The concept of a Canada Development Corporation, while it may have some legitimacy, should be very different in pattern and form than it is, for reasons which I have already mentioned. More important than a Canada Development Corporation, even on that basis, is the necessity to correct some of our national inequities and to amend our Income Tax Act in such a way that more incentive is given to Canadians not only as individuals but as Canadian corporations.

If such a policy were being followed, there would be no need for a Canada Development Corporation. I do not think the Canada Development Corporation will be able to "buy back" Canada. The best it will be able to do is denationalize some companies that have been Crown corporations. It will not provide the capital to bring about the expansion and new development that is needed. The Canada Development Corporation might help some companies to find a way to survive, but the basic policy will not be conducive to encouraging companies to take the risk necessary to provide the economy with the type of basic growth that is necessary.

Therefore I believe we now have a situation in which the government, perhaps with good intentions, is missing the boat and is really not providing the legislation we need to meet the objectives which it says the Canada Development Corporation is supposed to meet. That is why I find it very difficult to support this type of legislation. I do not say this happily. I would support any sound proposition that would help our economy go forward and improve the economic situation.

Again, the responsibility must fall on the government, which for some reason has lost its vision, has been confused and has been silent in respect of the daring that is necessary if we are to adopt new and better policies than we have in the past.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, we are today debating a proposal which the Liberal party first suggested eight years ago. Yet in the eight years in which we have had Liberal governments this concept has never been brought forward until now. It would be interesting for the Canadian people and hon. members to ask themselves why this bill was put in cold storage for eight years. The reasons are obvious. The Liberal party has been, and continues to be, the major exponent of economic continentalism. Then why has it taken this bill out of cold storage? It is because the government realizes that a large number of the Canadian people are concerned about the increasing domination by foreign corporations, mainly American corporations, of the most important sectors of the Canadian economy.

[Mr. Thompson.]

• (3:30 p.m.)

This is not a matter which was brought forward only by members of the New Democratic Party. After all, it was a Liberal government which hired Professor Watkins to make a study and put forward recommendations about what ought to be done.

An hon. Member: But turned them down.

Mr. Orlikow: And, of course, turned them down until now. In fact, the Liberal government has ignored this question until now. The reason it is bringing the bill forward at this time is that the Liberal party recognizes, as I said, that the Canadian people are becoming increasingly concerned about foreign domination and control; about the fact that the oil industry, the natural gas industry, the auto industry and the mining industry are almost wholly dominated by United States corporations.

Why are Liberal members so touchy about this question? Why does the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Osler), who comes from one of the foremost and most respected families in Winnipeg, heckle the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) when he is making his speech? Why is he feeling so touchy about this question?

Mr. Osler: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I would like to impress upon the hon. member that the heckling did not deal with the principle of foreign ownership. It was because in my interpretation the hon. member misquoted the Prime Minister's thrust. The Prime Minister's thrust was for controls on capital, controls that might or might not be necessary, and not whether capital as such was a good or a bad thing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This is a point of debate; it is hardly a question of privilege.

Mr. Orlikow: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre rises on a spurious question of privilege. But it is good to see him rise to his feet because he did not have the courtesy to rise while the hon. member for Regina East was speaking. He skulked in his seat and interjected.

Mr. Osler: On a further question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, it will probably take until Monday to prove who is right but I think Hansard will prove that I did rise on a question of privilege at some stage during the speech by the hon. member's colleague.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I was here and I saw what happened. The hon. member may have risen on one occasion, but he interjected eight or ten times. While I am on my feet may I say to the hon. member that I was surprised at some of his language. I represent a working class, ethnic constituency. We know something about rough language in my constituency, but I would not, in this House or in public, use the kind of language which the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre used yesterday—the kind of language which the CBC reported but refused, I suppose for reasons of delicacy, to quote.

Mr. Osler: You will find that CTV quoted it verbatim.

Mr. Anderson: I am sure all the little old ladies will like your speech.

Mr. Orlikow: The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson) can rise whenever he wants to speak, instead of interjecting from his seat. What the government is proposing in this bill is nothing more than the establishment of another mutual fund, and Canada already has more than enough mutual funds. We already have Power Corporation, CP Investments, Investors Syndicate and Argus Corporation. People who have money to invest can invest it in those corporations.

The way that the minister proposes to establish the CDC will make it something that we do not really need. It will serve no useful function. But even that is not enough for the minister. I quote from the press release he put out on January 25, which states in part:

—the bill specifically directs CDC to invest for profit in the best interest of the shareholders.—

If its major purpose is to make a profit, the corporation is doomed to failure in fulfilling its most important functions before it comes into existence. It will be a failure because it will serve no useful purpose in meeting the needs of the Canadian people to slow down and prevent further takeovers of Canadian companies by foreign corporations. As proposed by the government, the CDC will be a failure because it completely avoids governmental responsibility in the field of industrial development. This is because the government is committed to a corporation which must make a profit. It is the desire for profit, a legitimate desire on the part of private companies, which has encouraged company after company owned by Canadians to sell out to foreign investors. The need for private profit has not provided an answer to the needs of Canadian national development or to the need of the survival of a Canadian identity.

Since the minister has ruled out the CDC buying back foreign owned corporations, since he has ruled out using the CDC as a method of preventing further takeovers, and since he will not use the corporation as a prime tool to control foreign ownership, what useful purpose will the corporation fulfil? I suggest it will perform no useful purpose except the political purpose of making Canadians believe something is being done which will meet their needs, when in fact nothing of importance will be done.

I have already indicated that what the government is proposing is the establishment of another holding company, another mutual fund like the many which we already have. There is nothing here that will help further Canadian independence. If profit is the primary purpose of the CDC, the corporation will not be prepared to buy a Canadian company which is being taken over by foreign interests. If profit is the sole or major criterion, the CDC cannot take over a company which is not making money. A good example of this is the steel mill at Sydney, formerly owned by Dosco.

Under Dosco the steel mill was losing money. Each year it was becoming more obsolete and less able to compete with Stelco at Hamilton, or with Algoma at the Sault. It was losing so much money that there was no alternative to closing it, with the consequent loss of several thousand jobs, except for the government to take it over. What has happened since then? Lo and behold, under government management—which according to so many hon. members and so many newspapers is inefficient and does not know how to operate business enterprises—suddenly the steel mill at Sydney is doing more business than it ever did before. Suddenly workers are fully employed. Suddenly there is enough money and enough business.

The steel corporation, now publicly owned, can look forward to getting money to modernize so that it can produce steel even cheaper and more efficiently than before. When privately owned, the corporation was in poor shape and had Dosco wanted to dispose of the steel mill the Canada Development Corporation could not have taken it over. But that is the kind of thing that will happen as a result of the blind faith of the Minister of Finance that the major role of CDC is to make a profit. According to the minister, three-quarters of a million dollars will be invested in the Canada Development Corporation in a period of three years. That money will belong to the people of Canada as a whole, but the profits will go to only 7 or 10 per cent of the Canadian people who can afford to invest in it. For the other 90 to 93 per cent of Canadian people who cannot afford to invest except through the $750 million of their tax money which the government will plow into it, there will be no profit.

The minister proposes that existing Crown corporations such as Polymer Corporation Limited, Panarctic Oils Limited, Eldorado Nuclear Limited and Northern Transportation Company Limited be sold to the Canada Development Corporation. This means that these companies, which have been performing an extremely useful social and economic function for all the people of Canada, will be transferred to the few who can afford to invest in the Canada Development Corporation. That corporation will use as its nucleus the tax revenue of $750 million to be given to it over the next three years. This money will come from all Canadians, but only those who have invested in the corporation will benefit.

This situation might be tolerated if the purpose of the corporation were to fulfil social needs and to bring economic benefits to the people of Canada as a whole. If the corporation is being established to help create jobs or industries for which there is a social need, if it is aimed at helping to provide work in fields where private enterprise has been reluctant to enter because of low profit margins, or if its aim is to prevent the takeover of Canadian industry by foreign companies, then I could see the reason for the Canada Development Corporation. As envisioned by the government and outlined by the Minister of Finance, the Canada Development Corporation will serve none of these purposes.

The government's plan to mix public and private funds means that profit will become the main purpose of the corporation. Indeed, unless it makes a profit private capital will not be interested. Why should a private investor put money in a company which is not going to maximize the return on that money? Why not invest in Canadian Pacific Investments, Argus Corporation, Investors Syndicate or Power Corporation? I am not being critical of these companies, because the aim of free enterprise is to make as much money as possible for its shareholders, but if an investor is faced with a choice, why should he invest in something like the Canada Development Corporation which has the purpose of helping develop a slow-growth region of the Maritimes, eastern Quebec or Manitoba?

There will be constant pressure on those who run the Canada Development Corporation to ensure maximum profit, Mr. Speaker. I suggest that maximum profit is not necessarily the same thing as serving the best interests of the Canadian people. Indeed, these two things are often in conflict. Despite a massive input of public funds, the need to make profit means that the corporation will not be able to invest where companies sell out or close because of losses.

Just a few months ago Dunlop closed a plant in Toronto, with the loss of about 500 jobs. Could the Canada Development Corporation, which must think about profit, have taken over that plant? Of course not. Could it take over some of the textile plants in the province of Quebec which already have abnormally high unemployment? Of course not. They were not making money, so the Canada Development Corporation could not enter into the picture. Because in the view of the government the corporation has to make a profit, and the way to do that is to give it control of successful, publicly-owned companies, the government proposes that it take over some companies which have been successful.

Polymer Corporation Limited has been mentioned. This is one of the most successful public or private corporations in Canada and has consistently made a profit. The government also proposes to sell enough of Panarctic Oils Limited so that the people of Canada will lose control of it. Panarctic Oils is a company with tremendous oil reserves which could be used for the benefit of all the Canadian people.

It is proposed that Eldorado Nuclear Corporation, which has a glowing future, will be sold to the Canada Development Corporation. It is also proposed that Northern Transportation Corporation is to be sold to the Canada Development Corporation. Mr. Speaker, Northern Transportation Corporation plays a tremendously important role for Canadians who live in the north country. The cost of living in the north country is formidable. The difficulties of moving about in the north country are forbidding: they are tremendous.

I suggest that in the interests of the people of the north and of the Canadian people as a whole, at times the Northern Transportation Corporation ought not to show a profit. Indeed, there may well be times when Northern Transportation Corporation ought to be run at a loss, to meet the needs of the people of the north. Yet it is proposed that this corporation, which is so vital to the people of northern Canada and to those of the Arctic region, is to be transferred to Canada Development Corporation, the prime purpose of which is the making of profit. How stupid a proposal that is! The proposal will make the lives of the people of the north country even more difficult than they are at present.

According to the minister, Canada Development Corporation will be restricted to dealing with companies with an equity of at least $1 million. That will effectively freeze-out those people who most need the assistance of such a corporation. It will freeze out small Canadian companies and those Canadians with a good idea but who need capital to develop it. It will freeze out those kinds of free enterprises that members on the government side supposedly are so much concerned about. It will freeze out people who play such an important role in the life of this country and in developing this country according to the free enterprise tenets of the Liberal government.

The Minister of Finance says that this important, new government corporation will be prohibited from investing money in precisely those companies and those individuals who need its help the most. What is proposed is exactly the opposite. The company will be prepared to invest money in large corporations. Mr. Speaker, we are already doing too much for large corporations. In the past five years we have turned over to large corporations, mainly through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, $750 million in the form of outright grants, loans, incentive grants and research grants. Now the government proposes that those who have shall obtain more.

These large, and usually foreign-owned, corporations are already getting from Canadian sources over 90 per cent of the money which they need for expansion, through retained earnings, capital cost allowances and borrowings in the Canadian market. Now the government proposes to subsidize these giants of industry further through Canada Development Corporation. Studies have demonstrated pretty conclusively that many Canadian industries, and certainly large Canadian industries, do not lack finances. The studies show that there is a lack of knowledge of modern and sophisticated management, business techniques and leadership. What is needed is not more money but more government leadership, direction and co-ordination.

We of the New Democratic Party have been critical of this bill as it is proposed by the Minister of Finance. We have been critical for the reasons I have indicated. We are critical because the bill will do nothing to meet the needs of the Canadian people. We propose that all financing for Canada Development Corporation should be out of public funds and that there should be no mix of public and private investment, as proposed in this bill. We say that, Mr. Speaker, because we believe that all Canadians ought to benefit from investment in Canada Development Corporation, not just the 10 per cent who have the money to invest in it.

We propose that all financial institutions should be required to invest a percentage of the Canadian savings which they control in Canada Development Corporation. The banks, insurance companies, mutual funds and pension funds control money obtained in various and legitimate ways from the Canadian people. It seems to us logical and equitable that they should be directed by the Canadian people, through the government, to invest a substantial part of the money which they control in Canada Development Corporation, which ought to be a 100 per cent publicly-owned and publicly-financed corporation.

Also, Mr. Speaker, we suggest that mass government handouts of money to private industry should be stopped. The labyrinth of agencies which has grown up in recent years, whose purpose is the handing out of money to private industry, should be done away with. The funding of industry by government—and I would include provincial governments, although we have no direct control over them—should be rationalized. The funds should be allocated for incentive purposes through Canada Development Corporation. As I said a few minutes ago, during the past five years the government has given to the private industrial sector of Canada in the form of government grants, subsidies and incentive grants, over $750 million. About 60 per cent of this money has gone to foreign-owned corporations which already control the most important functions of Canadian industry and commerce. We suggest that one way of stopping that kind of handout would be in consolidating all the giving and borrowing through the Canada Development Corporation.

The corporation ought to be controlled completely by the Canadian people, so that all the profits would go back to the Canadian people and the corporation could help in developing the industries of Canada and provide jobs for Canadians. In that way the corporation would help to bring industry and jobs to the slow-growth areas of Canada and it would not concentrate—as the government obviously, directly and clearly wishes in this bill—on the making of profits which would go, not to all the Canadian people but to the small percentage who already have most of all that Canadians own.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Four o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, I understand that if a vote is to be taken, it will be taken when this item of business is called on Monday. I believe there is agreement to that effect.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the understanding was that if this debate ended before four o'clock and a vote were called, the vote would be deferred until Monday. But the debate did not end before four o'clock.

An hon. Member: You have another week.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motions.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Speaker, I believe there is unanimous disposition to proceed immediately to item No. 17, in the name of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz), and to permit the preceding items to stand and retain their place on the Order Paper.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Does the House agree unanimously to the hon. member's suggestion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

INCOME TAX

SUGGESTED DEDUCTION FOR RESIDENTIAL TAX ON OWNER-OCCUPIED HOMES AND RENTAL ACCOMMODATION

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should give consideration to the feasibility of allowing residential taxes on owner-occupied homes and rental payments of accommodation by tenants to be deductible from federal personal income tax up to a maximum allowable of $500 each year.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to again introduce in the House a motion designed to relieve the overburdened Canadian taxpayer. In reintroducing this motion I hope to bring to the attention of the federal government, and especially to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), the urgent need to ease the great burden of the Canadian taxpayer who is not only heavily taxed but is in some cases the victim of double taxation. It is my opinion, which I believe is shared by many people, that those who dwell in owner-occupied homes and tenants in rooming-houses and apartment buildings deserve favourable consideration by the Minister of Finance.

The federal government has a stake in the provision of adequate housing for its citizens, the creation of incentives to increase employment and lending money to municipalities which must provide many services to their residents. Since the federal government involvement in our cities is limited by the Constitution, provincial governments are mostly responsible for land use planning, regional economic planning and education.

Unfortunately, the provincial governments have not yet produced adequate policies and programs to relieve the financial burden of our municipalities. These services and other problems have been left mostly to the local municipalities, which are limited in their power to raise money in order to keep abreast of the demand for more services brought about by increased industrialization and growing population. Therefore, we are subjected to increased municipal taxes every year. Cities especially are very pressed to provide more services for their residents and find it most difficult to finance their projects.

In his inaugural address to the city of Toronto in January, 1970, the mayor of Toronto stated as follows:

> If there was one message which came through loud and clear during the last municipal election in Toronto, it was the appeal from home owners of this city that they cannot afford to pay higher taxes.

Among other things, he also stated he was most disappointed to see no mention in the governments' white paper on tax reform dealing with the resolution that was considered by the Federation of Mayors and Municipalities which called for a provision to allow municipality taxes to be deducted from individual taxable income. Such a provision is allowed in the United States and it prevents the present injustice forcing a home owner to pay tax on a tax. A person paying property tax is in effect paying a double tax. The hard earned money with which Canadians pay their property taxes has already been taxed to death by the provincial governments of the federal government.

Many tax experts have described the municipal residential taxes as inequitable and regressive, bearing heavily upon those who can least afford them. At the present time, property taxes paid by businessmen are deductible. Property taxes paid by apartment owners are also deductible. Property taxes on single family-owned homes rented to tenants are also deductible for the owners. Furthermore, an apartment building owner can take advantage of the corporate tax law and deduct his operating expenses, mortgage interest costs and municipal taxes, whereas dwellers of owner-occupied homes and tenants in boarding houses and apartment buildings do not get any such relief in computing their federal income tax. Not only are cities plagued with rising costs to meet the demands for more services, increased welfare payments and public works to provide jobs, but the ordinary citizen has been hard pressed with rising taxes at the federal, provincial and especially the municipal level.

Property owners will be faced in 1971 with higher real estate taxes due to the increased cost of education and welfare programs. The heavy load placed on property and business taxpayers, which amounts to approximately 77 per cent of all municipal revenue, produces many unhappy results. Observers point, for example, to the case of older people with limited retirement income who denied themselves in earlier years in order to pay for mortgaged homes. Now they find themselves faced with heavier and heavier tax bills. We often hear government spokesmen say that older people would be better off in apartments. However, I maintain that they have not much choice: many have to stay in their own homes and struggle with increasing taxes and maintenance costs. Moreover, a rise in taxes often brings an even larger increase in apartment rents. As costs soar, renters feel an increasing pinch. For every $5 rise in taxes, they dole out approximately $7 to $10 more for rent.

Whether the answer to the municipalities' dilemma is tax sharing, a shift of responsibilities, or both, is still a very hazy question. Many progressive provincial and federal leaders agree that the municipality, and thus hard-pressed property owner, should be in line for a new and fairer deal. I think it is a well known fact that real estate taxes in Canada are probably higher in proportion to income than in other advanced countries. Even the Carter Commission on Taxation described the municipal real estate tax as regressive and bearing heavily upon those who can afford it least.

Reading the resolutions of the convention of mayors and councillors of Canadian municipalities, it is obvious there is growing concern for and great dissatisfaction with the senior levels of government for not giving municipal taxation the attention it deserves. The rumblings of discontent are also growing louder each day in all sectors of Canadian society. I therefore believe it is imperative that the Minister of Finance, along with his provincial counterparts, give this matter serious and, I hope, favourable consideration.

By supporting this motion hon. members will make it possible not only for residents of owner-occupied homes but also for people who live in boarding houses and apartments to claim an exemption in their personal income tax. This will ease the intolerable load of taxation which is now a crushing burden on the taxpayers of Canada. Today, Mr. Speaker, is an opportunity for all members of the House to rally behind this motion so that the government will be forced to reduce federal income taxes. That is why I have brought this motion to the attention of the House, and once again I urge all hon. members to support it wholeheartedly.

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation whatever in rising to support the motion of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz). I compliment him on bringing it forward and I agree with virtually everything he has said. In my humble opinion, this is a most worth-while and humanitarian move.

Even at this late date I welcome the hon. member's conversion. It has taken a little while for him to be converted. Speaking of conversions, Paul on the road to Tarsus—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Damascus.

Mr. McCutcheon: I am sorry; I stand to be corrected.

Mr. McBride: The Tories are all on the wrong road.

An hon. Member: Naturally. He was blind.

Mr. McCutcheon: Mr. Speaker, you will have to protect me from the interjections of some of these people. He was blind for three days, but he saw the light instantaneously.

Let us get back to something which some members of this House will understand better. A kitten gets to see after three days, but for the hon. member who moved the motion it has taken six years to progress this far. I have here a piece of paper dated October, 1965, which reads:

> Home Owners and Municipal Taxes: Up to $500 will be allowable as a deduction for income tax purposes. This will give the federal government an immediate share in the cost of education by easing the burden of property taxes. It will also encourage home ownership, an important part of Progressive Conservative policy for the 1965 general election. Diefenbaker.

I point out to hon. members that this program was not a howling success, as history will attest. I throw this out as a word of caution to the hon. member for Parkdale. However, I am personally encouraged because, who knows, after the progress the hon. member has made he may even join his former colleague from Toronto who saw the light a little earlier. Seriously, though, this concept is an excellent one and I think it should be followed through. Increased savings could be generated and these could be used to help our country in some way. How much ought to go into such a development fund, I do not know. But the government could encourage the program by appropriate incentive tax moves. Like the hon. member for Parkdale, I urge the government to accept this worth-while suggestion. Let us pass the motion forthwith.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, like those who have already spoken, I want to express general support for the intent of the motion because I think the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) has been picking away for quite a few years trying to solve through this motion the problems of the hard pressed city taxpayer.

We know in this House that over the years the problems of the cities have been increasing by geometric progression. They have been piling up higher and higher and, as the hon. member for Parkdale said, the kind of services and the number of services now required of city administrations is very great indeed. It is only a very short time since in its fullness the whole idea of pollution control and the ramifications of that were added to the other matters which our cities have to consider and, of course, the last few months have been a terrific increase in the welfare burden due to the large degree of unemployment we have been experiencing.

I take issue with the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. McCutcheon) to some extent. I want to point out that whether or not the conversion of the hon. member for Parkdale took place on the road to Damascus, Tarsus or any other place, he did not see the light in three days or even in six years in one flash. It has taken a long time.

An hon. Member: He is a slow growth type.

Mrs. MacInnis: Yes, it is very slow growth. This bill is improving. I do not know whether, like wine, it is improving with age or whether it is improving with the age of the hon. member or what, but it is improving. I remember speaking on this bill when the hon. member had it directed completely to owner-occupied homes. This afternoon we see, and this is greatly in his favour, that he does not have a closed mind. When he began considering it, he realized that people were paying rent as tenants. I do not know whether he would include boarding houses in his measure. Yes, he would: he certainly mentioned it in one of the papers he read from. However, these people also are paying taxes very heavily. So this is the first change the hon. member has made, and I think this change is a very good one and the resolution is improving when he speaks of the feasibility of allowing residential taxes not only on owner-occupied homes but on rental payment for accommodation by tenants to be deducted from personal income tax.

Then he adds the ceiling of a maximum allowable, for income tax purposes, of $500 each year. I believe the idea of a ceiling is all right, but I think he has the ceiling in the wrong place. This is why I am hoping that the conversion by next year, unless the government accepts the motion this time, will have that ceiling in another place. You see, the ceiling of the $500 would be deductible by anybody who owned a home and lived in it, or a renter-occupied home, or any kind of rented accommodation.

I think we have to provide a ceiling having reference to the income of the people living there, instead of a ceiling in reference to the kind of accommodation wherein they live. This kind of ceiling would give equal protection to the owner of a $50,000 home and to the tenant who pays $150 a month in rent. It would give equal protection to the owner of a $50,000 home and to people in my riding who perhaps paid $5,000 years ago for their home and are now elderly people with very little to go on in the way of resources. They would not get nearly as much benefit relatively by being able to deduct from their income tax up to the $500 ceiling as some other people would.

I urge the hon. member, if the motion he has moved is not adopted today, to look at its terms and consider placing a ceiling on people according to the income they have. I think it would be better to afford protection to people in direct proportion to the extent of their burden of taxation. Like the two other hon. members who have spoken, I do not think one can overemphasize the need for this sort of measure at the present time. Our cities are finding the going very tough financially. I do not think this proposal would in itself provide a new and fair deal for the hard pressed home owners and tenants, but I think it would be very useful if the hon. member considered the ceiling I have suggested.

What is really required is a reallocation of the tax revenues among federal, provincial and municipal authorities. It is a fact that today the municipalities have a much greater responsibility in meeting the needs of people than they had a few years ago. Consequently, the federal and provincial governments must apportion greater revenue according to greater responsibility. The federal government cannot escape coming to a new revenue-sharing agreement with the provincial governments, who in turn, if they are to be fair to the municipalities, must come to better tax-sharing arrangements with the municipalities. In the province of British Columbia, and I believe in the province of Ontario, the provincial authorities, in lieu of making a new tax-sharing agreement, have been giving home owners a grant. That is good as far as it goes, and certainly no one would care to tamper with any arrangement that helps home owners. But it is open to the same objection I have to the motion proposed by the hon. member for Parkdale, namely, that it helps everyone on a flat-rate basis regardless of income. This is why I consider it an emergency measure only.

I noted that the hon. member for Parkdale quoted the resolution of the Federation of Mayors and Municipalities which proposed that city and municipal taxes be deducted from taxable income. If this proposal were adopted, then a sliding scale would be in effect that would be in accord with people's income and ability to pay. The last point I wish to make is that I do not think the federal government can escape taking another look at its white paper on tax reform and deciding to implement, to a far greater degree than I suspect is the government's intention, the principles of the Carter report, which state that a dollar of income is a dollar of income, no matter where it comes from or how it was earned; that people ought to be taxed all the way up the scale without regard to the way in which they earn their living or obtain their income.

With these reservations, and particularly the one I have expressed with regard to the ceiling, we would wholeheartedly support this measure so long as it gave relief to people according to need. Certainly this change would improve the proposal greatly. If the hon. member for Parkdale gets a shot at this another year, then I have no doubt that with these modifications the motion would have the blessing of every member of the House.

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is a delight to take part in this debate for at least two main reasons. The first is because of, I believe it is accurate to say, the universal admiration of the House for the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) and our awareness that he is an individual with a very deep humanitarian concern, something that this notice of motion bears out. I draw the attention of the House once more to the wording of the motion, which reads as follows:

> —the government should give consideration to the feasibility of allowing residential taxes on owner-occupied homes and rental payments of accommodation by tenants to be deductible from federal personal income tax up to a maximum allowable of $500 each year.

The second reason that I am delighted to speak on this important notice of motion was also articulated very well by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) as well as the hon. member for Parkdale, namely, that the motion deals with the tax burden that falls upon the municipalities in this country. A study of the statistics relating to the tax load assumed by municipalities makes this increasing burden obvious.

I am delighted to see the hon. member for Coast-Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre) in the chamber. With great respect, I should like to draw the attention of the members of the House interested in this subject to a speech that he made some months ago wherein he demonstrated very capably with facts, research and statistics that the area of government among the three levels, federal, provincial and municipal, which was expanding the most was the provincial level and the one locked in a corner on this question was municipal government. I am not going to go into this because it is all in Hansard, but it is a speech that I would highly recommend to anybody interested in this motion; indeed, in the whole question of how better to help the municipalities.

The motion recommends to the House a kind of direct tax deduction up to a maximum of $500 a year. The directness is admirable in some ways, but it also has weaknesses. One of the attractions to me is that it means those on lowest income will, in a sense, get the most help. It may well be that a $500 diminution of taxable income—no, it is not taxable income, and that is an important point. What it is is an actual reduction of payable tax, at least as I read the hon. member's notice of motion. It is an actual reduction in the amount of tax that is in fact paid, not a reduction in taxable income. This, in particular, would help those who had only a small amount of tax to pay and might indeed remove them from the tax roll altogether. To an extent, I suppose it presumes that all of us are hoping that when the tax reform legislation is brought before the House very shortly in the life of this Parliament, it will accomplish something like this.

Since I realize others wish to speak I shall come straight to my main point, and it is this. How do we relieve the tax burden that falls on the elderly and on the poor? We relieve the tax burden on the elderly and the poor by revising our tax system to give them a smaller share of the tax burden. I should like to bear upon the good graces of the House for a few moments this afternoon to quote but a few sentences from a letter I received dealing exactly with the topic now before us. It is from a constituent of mine. I am sure many members, especially those who have been members for many years, will have thicker files than I have on this subject, though my own file is quite thick. Let me just put on Hansard a sentence or two of this letter:

> As you know I am a widow over 80 years old, living alone, own a small property and find it very difficult right now with price of living going higher, to manage on my bond interest and pension. I hesitate to cash in on the savings which my husband and I had laid aside for our old age which if I have much medical or nursing care wouldn't last long. My school tax alone in 1970 was $134.95. It just doesn't seem fair to be paying so much, when you have no one connected with school. We had to pay ourselves when our family went; no buses picking them up.

You mentioned in one report that a couple should have $255 supplement to live on. Did you not take into consideration the many things that a couple can have with the same outlay as one.

This widow goes on to talk about other things concerning the old age pension plan which do not bear directly on this motion. I certainly intend to leave the impression with the House that the education tax load, and the manner in which it is imposed in respect of owners of residential property, is unfair to elderly people; it creates an extremely hard burden. These are considerations we should take very seriously. How do we help to adjust the tax load on people like this widow and poor people in our communities? The hon. member for Parkdale suggests a direct gift, a donation or a reduction of $500 from the tax which has to be paid. I suggest this would be a stopgap measure.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway recommended this temporary stopgap measure. I assume that the hon. member for Parkdale was putting this suggestion forth in some measure out of disparity. The statistics which have been pointed out this afternoon indicate that these difficulties existed some six years ago. The point is that if this matter was urgent six years ago, it is urgent now. Tax reform is something we have been fiddling around with in this country for roughly a decade. This is something I hope we can deal with in the House very soon. The House should send this matter to committee for consideration. I hope this will take place shortly and that we will have a tax reform bill before us in the near future.

I confess I have some doubt that the proposed method of taxation is completely fair. Many people invest money in homes. Many people are tenants. Everyone has to live somewhere. We all benefit in some way or another from tax reforms. If we take the example of an apartment building housing 100 tenants, with the suggested rebate of $500 we would have $50,000 going to these people who may or may not need it.

The main reason I rose this afternoon was not to quibble over minor points. I wanted to commend hon. members who are concerned about this difficulty. I hope that some way can be found for municipalities such as Carleton Place, in my own constituency, to establish a stronger tax base for the purpose of building necessary things such as new sewer systems. Areas like Carleton Place are inhabited to a great extent by elderly people. They have, as the hon. member from Toronto has said, already paid their taxes for the purpose of educating their children. They require some relief. I appeal to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), through his very capable parliamentary secretary who is in the House this afternoon, to take some action to revive the property-oriented tax load on Canadians. For this reason I support the motion.

Mr. Allen B. Sulatycky (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) has made a very interesting proposal. It is a proposal in respect of which I find some difficulty because I represent a group of citizens in this country who are in a unique position in so far as their municipal government is concerned. Their municipal government happens to be the federal government. I am speaking of the citizens who live in the towns of Banff and Jasper.

The hon. member for Parkdale I know is very well aware of the problems which exist in so far as municipal matters are concerned in these town sites. He was the parliamentary secretary to the minister responsible for the department which administers the affairs of these areas. The difficulty I find is in the wording of this notice of motion. It provides for the reduction of residential taxes on owner-occupied homes or rental payments for accommodation by tenants.

I am interested in the people who live in the towns of Banff and Jasper. All the land in these areas is owned by the federal government and leased to the people who live there. At one time the rental in these areas was very nominal but recently it has increased by a very substantial amount. Some rentals in respect of very modest residences, of a value of about $15,000, run as high as $2,800. I am referring to the taxes on the land only, rather than on improvements.

In addition to this, the occupants of this land have to pay the usual school taxes. If this notice of motion is accepted, these people will be allowed to deduct a proportion of this amount. Nevertheless, they would not be able to deduct about half the taxes that people living in other parts of Canada are allowed to deduct. It is in this sense that I suggest the 7,000 or 8,000 people who live in these areas, many of them not by choice, will be put into an iniquitous position.

At the present time the people who live in these areas lack many of the ordinary rights and privileges enjoyed by other people in this democracy. These people cannot elect municipal councils. They do not have any say about the disposal of the moneys they pay in land rental. This money is equivalent to a tax by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. That department refuses to consider this as real property tax and defines it as land rental. Because of this, I submit that if this notice of motion were adopted the Department of National Revenue would have to rule that the money received from these residents is not, in effect, rental payment for accommodation of tenants but another form of rental, by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Therefore, these people would be further prejudiced and not placed in a position of greater equality in respect of other citizens of Canada.

On the other hand, it may well be that the adoption of the notice of motion, or the adoption of at least some semblance of it, by the government would bring this matter to a head and would result in the people in these townsites being treated in a way more akin to the way in which the ordinary citizens of Canada are treated, in that if the government would recognize that the money being demanded from the residents of Banff and Jasper are in fact taxes on their homes, they would have a claim to representative government at a local level. They would have a claim to municipal government, which is now denied them because they are told there are no taxes involved and therefore they are not faced with the obligations faced by citizens in other municipalities.

Mr. Speaker, I hope I have pointed out why, even if this were a government bill, I would be inclined to oppose it notwithstanding the fact that it would benefit many people in Canada. I believe that unless special provision is made it would increase the inequality and the unfair treatment that is meted out to citizens of Canada who live in the townsites of Banff and Jasper.

[Translation]

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) for introducing a second time the motion under study.

[English]

I certainly agree with the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, to the extent that I would support any relief given to a property owner at the local level. I believe consideration should be given to a change in taxation policy so that everyone would be treated equally and there would be no discrimination. One of the greatest problems the municipalities face in respect of financing is that they are the collectors with regard to the annual costs of school boards. I had also hoped that provincial governments, at least the government of my province of Manitoba, would eliminate the responsibility the municipalities have of being collectors for school boards. In so doing I would also hope that they would show the people who are paying the taxes where the real costs are, so that they would have a better idea where their money goes.

The municipalities must provide services. They require money to meet their budgets and at the same time they must collect taxes for school purposes. To that end, the province of Manitoba made an attempt to relieve property owners. This means that the provincial government of Manitoba realized the position in which the property owners are placed and that there is a problem. A few years ago they thought that by placing a 4 per cent utility tax on telephones, gas, heating, electricity, and so on, they could solve the problem in greater part. However, when they imposed this 4 per cent tax on utilities they found it gave them enough money to give a $50 rebate to every property owner in the province of Manitoba. Then the municipalities in turn made representations to the provincial government and said that this was not enough. The provincial government realized the municipalities were right and decided to implement something else. They thought a 5 per cent sales tax, which we did not have previously in Manitoba, would solve the problem.

While the 5 per cent sales tax was implemented to solve the education problem, something funny happened down our way. The 4 per cent tax on utilities remained there, the $50 rebate was eliminated and we were faced with a 5 per cent sales tax over and above that. The property owners really do not benefit because the school costs and everything else are still climbing. At the same time, the provincial government felt it should change the name of the 5 per cent sales tax so that instead of being the 5 per cent sales tax for educational purposes it would be a multipurpose tax. So I presume, like many others in the municipal field, that this money is really not being used for the benefit of the property owners.

I should like to refer to the submission made to the Royal Commission on Taxation by the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities in 1964. I believe it is just as good today as it was then. I shall only quote a portion of it, as follows:

> One of the most severe limitations on municipal use of the property tax arises from a feature of our federal income tax law. In effect, Canadian property owners are subject to double taxation on that portion of their income, used to pay municipal taxes. By contrast, in the United States, all payments made on municipal taxes may be deducted from personal income in computing taxable income. The Canadian taxpayer is subject to double taxation on the amount which he pays in property taxes as well as on amounts paid in other municipal taxes.
> It is only by allowing such an exemption that municipalities can be given full use of the property tax field. Quantitatively, this restriction on the use of the property tax is a severe one. A simple calculation will show that, by allowing deduction of municipal taxes from income, the federal government would enable municipalities to have access to substantially greater revenue from the property tax.

I for one would certainly support this to the end that it would relieve the municipalities in respect of education costs and place the responsibility on the provincial governments.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Tom H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) for bringing this important and interesting issue before the House once more. It seems that this motion has two objects. One is to help the citizen with his problems in financing his dwelling and the second is to bring about a more equitable Income Tax Act or a reformed tax act. While I am sympathetic to both goals, I am not positive that this motion is the best way of accomplishing these ends.

I agree fully that many Canadians are having difficulty in financing their housing. They are having difficulty with their mortgage payments and their residential and school taxes. But, as I said, I doubt whether this type of motion will best help these people. It would appear that the most just solution to the financial problems of persons on limited income is income tax reform and, as many hon. members opposite may have heard, legislation will be presented in the House to that end as early as May. I take for granted that opposition members will co-operate to the fullest to see that the reform legislation passes all stages of the Commons process at maximum speed.

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion there is one outstanding omission in the hon. member's motion. No reference has been made to deduction of mortgage interest from income tax payments. It would appear to me that interest costs are even more of a burden to the home owner than property taxes. Even for the most modest home, interest rates in recent years have skyrocketed to take a major percentage of the workingman's income. Consequently, I suggest that this additional question be discussed by hon. members.

May I discuss one of the major items in this motion, and that is the limitation to $500 of the amount of municipal tax to be deducted. First may I suggest that this figure may no longer be adequate. Municipal taxes have increased to the point that in 1971 a figure of $1,000 would be more in tune with present-day costs, although I agree that there must be a limit to the amount to be deducted in order to assist those in our society who need help the most. For example, those who have $100,000 and $75,000 homes would receive much larger deductions than those who have $20,000 and $25,000 homes. I would not think it fair to have a measure to help people with their housing costs based on individual value, as is the case with residential taxes.

I feel that if we want to help people with housing there are better methods than merely allowing income tax deduction for property taxes. Indeed, the present program of placing federal housing funds into low and medium-cost rental projects is placing the funds in an area where they are most needed. Builders and developers are responding as they never did before to the government's program of priorities for middle and low-income families. In my own riding of Burnaby-Richmond-Delta, over $40 million was invested in 1970 by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in developments as prompted by such well known builders as Westsea Construction, Burger Construction, Inter-Continental Holdings, Ed Sully Development and Dawson Housing. These men, in conjunction with CMHC, have built excellent complete developments to serve my community.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker I compliment the hon. member for Parkdale, but I must add that although the intent of the motion is an excellent one, nevertheless I would encourage the minister responsible for housing to increase and expand the present policy with respect to low and middle-income housing.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it had not been my intention to intervene in this debate. However, it seems to me that in his very admirable presentation of the motion the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) overlooked one item that should be of considerable concern to this House in deciding whether or not to vote in favour of the motion and to make the recommendation to the government that a tax rebate be given to both home owner taxpayers and renter taxpayers. I refer to revenues so far as the federal treasury is concerned.

No statistics have been advanced to indicate the number of householders in Canada. I am sure they are available, but I do not have them here. However, in the 1968 income tax year, as disclosed by the 1970 edition of "Taxation Statistics", slightly under seven million persons in Canada paid personal income tax. The average tax paid by those taxpayers was $727. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that half of those taxpayers were householders, either tenants or owners, the loss of revenue to the treasury would be something in the order of $2.5 billion. If a third of these taxpayers were householders the loss to the treasury would be something in the order of $1.5 billion.

The federal government, through transfer payments to the provinces, shares many of the costs of municipal governments through hospitalization, education grants and so on, and has to have revenues that filter down to the municipal level and benefit municipal governments. I think that the proponents of this suggestion should be prepared to come forward and indicate to the federal government just where they would expect taxes to be increased, or new taxes to be levied, in order to make up the $1.5 billion to $2.5 billion that would be rebated to taxpayers.

Home owners at present have an important tax concession in that they do not have to include in income the benefit they receive in the form of living accommodation. For example, if a taxpayer invests $20,000, $25,000 or $30,000 in bonds he has to account for the interest on those bonds as income and pay tax upon it. But if he invests $20,000, $25,000 or $30,000 in a home he does not have to pay any income tax at all on the benefit he gains from that type of investment.

The proposal to allow home owners to deduct property taxes from their income tax—and again I think the distinction is very important—which the hon. member is proposing is a tax credit. It is not a deduction from taxable income but a deduction from tax, or a tax credit or rebate. This would give the home owner taxpayer a further benefit that taxpayers who do not enjoy that status do not receive. The proposal to allow those who rent living accommodation to deduct a similar amount would help prevent this group falling still further behind the positon of taxpayers who are home owners—

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, I realize this question may not be answered definitely, but can someone on the government side advise what the business will be for Monday, so we can have the weekend to think about it?

Business of the House

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, I believe the business of the House for next week will be as announced by the President of the Privy Council, recorded at page 3742 of Hansard.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): It being five o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order. I wish all patient and loyal hon. members an enjoyable week-end, and in line with the thoughts expressed by some hon. members during the recent debate and in the spirit of the Lenten season, perhaps we should count our blessings and resolve to share a little more with those who are less fortunate than we are.

At five o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, March 1, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

SPRING!

Mr. Tom H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring before the House an especially fragrant example of regional disparity. For weeks now the people of British Columbia have had the advantage of certain favourable conditions that have been denied to Canadians in other parts of this land. However, I assure the House that such inequity has not gone unnoticed. Members of Parliament from British Columbia have decided that the time has come to put an end to this injustice. In short, Mr. Speaker, we have decided to share a bit of spring with the rest of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Goode: Aided in our task by the Greater Vancouver Visitors and Convention Bureau, we have provided every member of the House with a tangible example of the glorious harvest of spring in that most beautiful of all provinces, British Columbia. It would be my hope that every representative here would cherish this bloom and, cradling it in his arms against the snows of eastern Canada—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's flowery speech is somewhat irregular. I suppose he could go on, with the unanimous assent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Goode: —carry it forth to make known to his constituents in flowery phrases the glad news that spring is on its way to the other regions of Canada as well. If I have one regret, Mr. Speaker, it is that these sunny daffodils are not from the gardens of my riding. Alas, the season for daffodils has passed there. Instead, roses of every description now reach toward the cloudless skies. Just as British Columbia leads Canada into spring, so Burnaby-Richmond-Delta leads British Columbia into summer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Yewchuk: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that these daffodils merely indicate that spring is only one month away in Alberta.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

DRUGS

TABLING OF CONVENTION ON PSYCHOTROPIC SUBSTANCES—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 41(2) may I lay on the table of the House, in both official languages, copies of the Convention on Psychotropic Substances which was adopted by the United Nations Conference at the conclusion of its work a few days ago in Vienna.

In view of the pending final report of the Commission of Inquiry into the Non-Medical Use of Drugs, Canada did not sign the convention. However, it is hoped that at some future date hon. members will have the opportunity to discuss the advisability of signing and ratifying this important document.

As hon. members are aware, the conference was called to provide the international community with a legal instrument for the effective control of psychotropic substances, including hallucinogens, stimulants and depressants, which are being increasingly used and abused in many parts of the world. Hon. members will be pleased to hear that the Canadian delegation took an active part in the development of the convention.

I will not attempt to summarize the document in detail. However, I wish to point out that the main thrust of the convention is toward international recognition of the need for rigorous measures to restrict the use of psychotropic substances to legitimate purposes. The convention, however, recognizes that the use of these substances is indispensable for medical and scientific purposes, and that their availability for legitimate use should not be unduly restricted.

In general, the convention envisages levels of control similar to those already in effect in Canada. It was for this reason that the Canadian delegation was able to make such an effective contribution to the work of the conference which led to the development of this important international legal instrument.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I agree it would hardly be appropriate for Canada to sign the convention at this stage in view of the commission now inquiring into the use and regulation of the use of drugs in this country.

The minister indicated that the regulations set forth in the protocol are very similar to those in effect in Canada.

However, I express the hope that the Canadian authorities will make as certain as possible that we in this country co-operate fully in regulating the international traffic in drugs because we have a great interest in this matter. There must be many measures that the government of Canada can take, if it is not already taking them, in line with the protocol to reduce the traffic without in any way prejudicing the decision that this Parliament may ultimately make with regard to any recommendations of the Le Dain commission.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I join with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfieldl) lin commending the government for taking the position of not signing this convention until we receive the final report of the Le Dain commission and are able to act on its recommendations. From a quick glance I am glad to see that marijuana is not included in the list of drugs which are to be restricted. It is pretty obvious that marijuana is not a drug like the others.

If and when we extend the program to restrict the use of psychotropic substances, I hope we will recognize the fact that attempts by Canada and other countries to restrict their use have been marked by almost complete failure in this field. We should pay a good deal more attention to developing educational programs so that people who have been using these drugs will recognize the real dangers and difficulties that can arise.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I must congratulate the minister for having had the wisdom not to sign too soon the international agreement on which he has just given us a report.

He acted very wisely, at a time when Canada is about the legislate in that field, and has already started to grant subsidies to hospitals for the treatment of those who are physically and mentally affected by the use of drugs in Canada.

It was important for the minister to take his time and give the house a chance to study all the harmful effects of drugs.

I trust the government will legislate in a few months with a view to controlling the abuse of drugs and preventing drug trafficking.

We hope the government will soon offer our young people some solutions for the future that will not force them to resort to false remedies, if they must use drugs.

Unfortunately, there is no time today to talk in the House of all the detrimental effects of drugs. On the other hand, if the government realizes how much harmful drugs threaten the future of our young people, we believe that it will quickly take the means at its disposal to offer them false hopes other than drugs.

GRAIN

ANNOUNCEMENT OF INITIAL PAYMENTS FOR WHEAT, BARLEY AND OATS FOR 1971-72 CROP YEAR

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I wish to inform the House of the level of initial payments for wheat, barley and oats which will become effective for purchases by the Canadian Wheat Board for the crop year beginning August 1, 1971. For wheat, the basic grade for the new crop year will be the new grade, No. 1 Canada Western Red Spring Wheat, which will replace the present grades of No. 1 Hard and No.1 and No. 2 Northern. The initial payment for No. 1 Canada Western Red Spring Wheat for the 1971-72 crop year will be $1.46 per bushel. This is the same as the initial payment for No. 2 Northern in the present crop year.

The initial payment for No. 2 Canada Western Six Row Barley will be 91 cents per bushel, the same level as in effect from August 1 to March 1 of the present crop year.

The initial payment for No. 2 Canada Western Oats will be 60 cents per bushel, the same as the initial payment for the present crop year.

All initial payments are basis in store, Thunder Bay. This early announcement is part of our effort to give the maximum amount of information to producers prior to seeding time.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, western Canada will of course welcome any type of announcement with regard to at least the initial payments on the three major grains which are under the jurisdiction of the Wheat Board.

The other day, however, in releasing the quota arrangements which will go into effect, the department stated that each farmer would have to assign certain fixed acreages for the coming crop year. I note that in the statement released today certain total volumes of wheat, barley and oats are shown and the Wheat Board has indicated it will take in approximately 388 million bushels of wheat, 230 million bushels of barley and 45 million bushels of oats. It is difficult for a farmer to assign any particular acreage if he does not know what the delivery quota will be on a bushel per acre basis. We have a situation in which we have two unknowns and only one known up until now. We cannot figure out an algebraic formula in which there are two unknowns and only one known and come up with a correct answer.

Unless the government is ready at this particular time to indicate what it means in terms of bushels per acre the announcements to date do not make too much sense. Farmers may feel that they have sufficient grain for a six-bushel delivery quota, but if more farmers take advantage of the 388 million bushels of wheat that will be taken in they may find themselves in the position of facing a four-bushel quota and as a result will lose some of their assignable acreage.

The 388 million bushels that the Wheat Board has indicated will be taken in does not fulfil the initial promise made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that the government would set its sights on a total of approximately 1,200 million bushels of wheat to be sold over a three-year period. In addition to the price of wheat being lowered, reflecting a comparison with No. 2 wheat last year, the price of barley is again lowered to the level it was prior to March 1. Even although from March 1 to the end of the current crop year the government seems to be providing some incentive to farmers to make deliveries, I suggest the lowering of the price offers no inducement to them to do so next year.

The announcement also indicates that the government is somewhat reluctant to provide incentives to farmers to produce feed grain, a commodity that we sadly lack in terms of the export market. There was also one other indication—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I realize how important is the matter to which the hon. member is referring at the present time, but the hon. member knows, as the House knows, that the rule requires that a brief statement be made in reply to a statement made by a minister. It is never easy for the Chair to determine what "brief" is; all this is so relative. However, I would think that the hon. member should try to bring his statement to a close.

Mr. Korchinski: In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I say that statement also indicates how hard it is for our farmers to reach a high income position. Having once suffered a slump in world markets and lost some of these markets, a long, hard road faces the farmers on the journey back to the position they were in three or four years ago.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, what the minister's statement means to the western grain farmer is that not only will the initial price of wheat not be increased but it will in fact drop some four cents a bushel, and barley will be at the same level. I think this assessment is a fair reflection of the questions that have been put to the minister repeatedly during the last week or two about the International Grains Arrangement. As a result of the failure of the price negotiations, I think the government's announcement is an indication of what our farmers can look forward to in the international market in terms of price.

What the lowering of the initial price of wheat by four cents a bushel and the restoration of the initial price of barley to its previous level, with the exception of a small increase of ten cents in the current crop year, means to the farmers is that a really tough competitive position is facing them in the export market in the coming crop year. We should have liked the minister to state clearly in the extra information he gave just how competitive we can expect the export market to be. Certain volumes of wheat and barley have been mentioned, but we do not know just how tough we will have to be in competing with the United States, which according to United States Department of Agriculture reports is increasing acreages of corn, sorghum, barley and spring wheat this year. For example, they are projecting an increase of some 17 per cent for spring wheat. This means we have not received any co-operation in cutting down on acreage and that we are going to be in a tough, competitive market. The real question the farmers are asking is, are they going to get volume.

We still do not know what will be the outcome of the minister's proposed stabilization program. Perhaps he is still negotiating with the farm organizations to see whether they will accept all or part of what he has put before them. Does this delay in any announcement regarding the stabilization program indicate a lack of acceptance by farmers and farm organizations in western Canada? These are questions which are left unanswered by the minister's statement today. We still have to await the outcome of the talks he is having to find out what the government's price stabilization program is really going to be.

I welcome his announcement today on initial prices as it will at least give the farmers a clear indication of where they are going.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the Prairie farmers will have been especially encouraged—if I can use that word—during the last week in February, because for the second time, a minister has announced amendments to the initial prices to be paid for grain, provided of course that it is stored in Thunder Bay.

Previously, it had been announced that an amount of $40 million would be allotted to a program aimed at encouraging western farmers to devote themselves to fodder growing.

I must say that in eastern Canada, there is an exceedingly serious problem. During the weekend, farmers and agricultural organizations have again made to me representations to the effect that they are still encountering difficulties in obtaining feed grain and that prices are constantly increasing.

Even though prices might be somewhat higher in the East, I hope the western farmers will benefit by it, although it seems from the statements I have just heard that it will not be so.

In any event, I would again ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) to see to it that the eastern farmers are able to get feed grain at better conditions, by increasing grants to transportation if necessary, because at the present time many hog, broiler and even egg producers are on the verge of bankruptcy. We seem to be heading towards utter confusion.

Over the weekend I heard that the Quebec Minister of Agriculture wanted to built a slaughter-house in the Quebec area so as to encourage the farmers who had to give up dairy production to switch to hog production; grants would be paid to them, so that the land that was used for the production of fodder could now serve for the production of grain, thus enabling them to feed their pigs at lower cost.

In the West, farmers are told to stop growing grain and to grow fodder. In the East, they are told to do the opposite. And that, in the same country.

Mr. Speaker, it will be necessary to come to an agreement, to sit down and seriously discuss, in one and the same country, the best programs to be carried out, in order to ensure to both the eastern and the western farmers, better conditions and their fair share of the national revenue.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR HOUSEWIVES' CONTRIBUTIONS AND BENEFITS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-226, to amend the Canada Pension Plan (Housewives' contributions and benefits).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to enable housewives to make contributions and collect benefits from the Canada Pension Plan. Since many housewives spend part of their careers working in industry as well as working at home, they should be permitted to continue their contributions to the Canada Pension Plan while at home to ensure them a full pension at retiring age. The bill recognizes the equal importance of work performed at home with the work performed in industry and provides housewives with the same pension opportunities.

Mr. Speaker: Before the Chair puts the question, I think I should bring to the attention of the House the explanatory note attached to the bill. I am informed this has not been looked at by the law branch and there might be some procedural difficulties in connection with the bill in respect of the extent that it is in conformity with the explanatory note. However, this might be a bit unfair to the hon. member since the motion has already been put to some extent to the House. The Chair will look at the matter and confer later with the hon. member for Waterloo.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker: I insist again that this bill, which has now been read the first time, will appear on the order paper subject to the caution to which I have just referred.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

COMMERCIAL RELATIONS WITH SOUTH AFRICA—ASSISTANCE TO OTHER AFRICAN COUNTRIES

Question No. 191—Mr. Brewin:

1. Is it the intention of the government to ensure that the Crown corporation, Polymer, withdraw all its investments and cease any technological or other agreements which it has with South African companies or concerns?

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

2. Is it the intention of the Government of Canada to give consideration to abrogate the 1932 Trade Agreement embodying the exchange of preferential tariff entries between Canada and South Africa?

3. Is it the intention of the Government of Canada that it cease the expenditure of public funds to promote trade and investment in Southern Africa, by the withdrawal of Canadian Trade Commissioners in South Africa and the cessation of a variety of other government services which presently promote commercial relationship with Southern Africa?

4. Is it the intention of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to continue to make appeals to Canadian investors and traders to take advantage of the opportunities in South Africa in their publication Foreign Trade?

5. Is it the intention of the Government of Canada to indicate to Canadian companies investing in South Africa that such investments are made without the support of the federal government?

6. Is it the intention of the Government of Canada not to participate whatsoever in the building or equipping of the Cabora Bassa Dam in Mozambique?

7. Is it the intention of the Government of Canada to discourage investment and deny export credit guarantees to Canadian firms wishing to invest in Namibia?

8. Is it the intention of the Government of Canada to provide financial, technical and medical assistance to the various African liberation movements to the United Nations or to the Organization of African Unity?

9. Is it the intention of the Government of Canada to extend the ban on military sales to Portugal and to South Africa, to include the sale of spare and replacement parts for military equipment and for piston and jet engines?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed as follows: 1. See answer to Question No. 59, Hansard, January 11, 1971, page 2250.

2. There is no intention at present on the part of the Government of Canada to give consideration to the abrogation of the 1932 Canada-South Africa Trade Agreement which provides for the exchange of tariff preferences between our two countries.

3. The Government's recent announcement in the House on November 2nd stating our support for the July 1970 U.N. Resolution extending the arms embargo against South Africa included the statement quote in complying with the recent U.N. Resolution on this subject, the Government does not intend that normal trade with South Africa in goods for civilian use should be affected unquote. There is no intention therefore that normal trade promotional activity vis-à-vis South Africa should be discontinued.

4. See answer (3) above.

5. Under the guidelines established by the Government for investment outside of Canada and the U.S.A. by Canadian incorporated companies, other than financial institutions, South Africa is included in a group of countries in respect to which companies are asked to exercise restraint in embarking on new investment undertakings which involve capital transfers or other forms of financing from Canada or the United States, and to give priority to investment which will contribute importantly to improvement in Canadian trade and payments. Within the terms of these guidelines Canadian non-financial companies are free to invest in South Africa on the basis of normal commercial considerations.

6. The Government of Canada is not participating in the building or equipping of the Cabora Bassa Dam in Mozambique.

7. Canada supports the U.N. position that South Africa has no legal jurisdiction over Namibia. No approaches have been made to the Government requesting financial assistance for potential investments in Namibia.

8. In the past, the Canadian Government has made contributions to the United Nations Education and Training Programme for Southern Africa and to the United Nations Trust Fund. The Government has also provided scholarships for study in Canada for a number of students from Namibia, and has supported the Commonwealth program to provide education for refugees from Rhodesia. Continued support to efforts to provide educational facilities for refugees from southern Africa is planned. The Government has no plans to provide assistance to the various African liberation movements or to the Organization of African Unity.

9. The Secretary of State for External Affairs announced in the House on November 2nd the Government's decision to terminate the sale of spare and replacement parts for piston and jet engines for use by military or paramilitary organizations in South Africa. The Canadian Government has not permitted the export to Portugal or the territories under Portuguese administration, of any aircraft, aircraft engines, and parts, etc., which in the Canadian Government's judgment would be used for military purposes in the Portuguese overseas territories.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Question No. 451—Mr. Korchinski:

1. In the years 1967, 1968, 1969, how many clerks and other staff were employed by the Wheat Board for the purpose of issuing permit books?

2. In the present crop year, how many clerks and other staff were employed for the purpose of issuing permit books?

3. How much was charged to the Lift program for the additional cost of issuing permit books?

4. From 1967, to the present, how many permit books have been issued?

5. What was the total cultivated acreage in each year to the present since 1967?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. 1967, 80; 1968, 90; 1969, 82. These figures indicate the maximum staff employed during the peak period for issuance of permit books, approximately June-September of each year. In other months of the year the number is about 30 per month.

2. For 1970 the number of personnel employed during the peak period as follows: June, 80; July, 150; August, 144; September, 79.

3. Nil as at November 24th, 1970.

4. 1967, 192,057; 1968, 190,606; 1969, 190,004; 1970, 181,-778 (as at November 24th, 1970).

5. 1967, 80,053,225; 1968, 87,699,796; 1969, 89,346,321; 1970, 87,923,710.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE—MAN-HOURS SAVED AS A RESULT OF USE OF COMPUTERS

Question No. 607—Mr. Robinson:

How many man-hours have been saved as a result of the utilization of computers by the Department of Justice during each year since computers have been used?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): 1968, 13,000; 1969, 26,000; 1970, 26,000.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE—CHANGES IN PERSONNEL AS A RESULT OF USE OF COMPUTERS

Question No. 608—Mr. Robinson:

As a result of the use of computers by the Department of Justice, how many employees have been (a) laid off (b) hired?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): (a) None; (b) six.

TELESAT CANADA—COMMON CARRIERS

Question No. 713—Mr. Robinson:

1. (a) What are the names of the government approved telecommunications common carriers involved in Telesat Canada (b) where is each located (c) who are the directors of each company (d) how many shares are held by individuals, directors and/or officers of each company?

2. Of the 2,000,000 common shares in Telesat Canada Corporation, what proportion of shares will be open to the public and will the public be allowed to purchase such at the preferred rate of issue to the companies of $10.00 per share?

3. What are the conditions, if any, attached to the common shares without nominal or par value?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Minister of Communications): 1. By way of a general remark, it should be noted that Telesat Canada is a private commercial firm in which the Government is a shareholder; it is not a Crown corporation. Consequently, some of the information here is supplied voluntarily by the management of the corporation. Other items, it will be noted, come from the Act of Parliament which created the corporation. Here is the information requested:

(a), (b) The approved telecommunications common carriers involved in the corporation are those listed in Annex A of the Telesat Canada Act: Alberta Government Telephone, Edmonton, Alberta, Bell Canada, Montreal, Quebec, British Columbia Telephone Company, Vancouver 2, British Columbia, Canadian National Railways Company, Montreal, Quebec, Canadian Pacific Railway Company, Montreal, Quebec, The Island Telephone Co. Ltd., Halifax, Nova Scotia, Maritime Telegraph and Telephone Co. Ltd.; Manitoba Telephone System, Winnipeg 10, Manitoba, New Brunswick Telephone Co. Ltd., Saint John, New Brunswick; The Newfoundland Telephone Company, (formerly the Avalon) St. John's, Newfoundland; Ontario Northland Transpotration Commission, North Bay, Ontario, Quebec-Telephone, Rimouski, Quebec, Saskatchewan Telecommunications, Regina, Saskatchewan. (c) Up-to-date list of directors available from organizations listed above. (d) None. The shares are held in the names of the telecommunication common carriers.

2. No. None of the two million shares subscribed for by the approved telecommunications carriers and the Government of Canada on December 17, 1970, was available to the public. This issue represented the first one third of the total allotment of shares to the Government and the approved telecommunications common carriers. (a) The president of Telesat informs me that the board of directors intends to recommend issuing shares representing approximately one-third equity in the corporation. These are to be offered to the public. No decision as to the timing of this offering has yet been made and the whole question is under constant review with the corporation's financial advisers. Approval by the Governor-in-Council will be required for such an issue. (b) The value of the shares offered to the public will be set in the normal manner at the time of offering.

3. The conditions pertaining to the ownership of common shares in Telesat Canada are set out in the Telesat Canada Act, of 1969.

TELESAT CANADA—DEVELOPMENT OF LAND STATIONS

Question No. 768—Mr. Blouin:

During the first stage of the development of land facilities for the domestic communications system through Telesat Canada, does the government plan to build 35 land stations and, if so (a) where will they be located (b) how much will each cost (c) when are operations expected to begin?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Minister of Communications): The government does not plan to build any part of the domestic satellite communications system to be owned and operated by Telesat Canada, which is a private commercial corporation and not a Crown corporation. Such decisions are the prerogative of the management of the corporation. For this reason I would urge Members to address such questions, in the future, to the corporation. The president will be glad to provide the information. In this instance Telesat Canada has informed me that it has invited proposals for the construction of an initial baseline system of 35 earth stations. Ten companies have responded to this request and their proposals are currently being evaluated by Telesat Canada. (a) The baseline system currently calls for two Heavy Route (HR) stations at Allan Park, north of Toronto, and Lake Cowichan, north of Victoria, (B.C.); one Telemetry, Tracking and Command (TT&C) station, at Allan Park; six Network Television stations (NTV) near Edmonton, Regina, Winnipeg, Montreal, Halifax and St. John's, Newfoundland; two Northern Telecommunications stations (NTS) at Frobisher and Resolute, and 25 Remote Television stations at 25 Northern communities. The number and location of the stations in this baseline system were developed in conjunction with the corporation's present customers. This baseline will be reviewed as customers' requirements are finalized and is subject to change. (b) Telesat is currently evaluating the proposals submitted by the competing potential contractors, and is not at this time prepared to make public the anticipated costs of the initial earth station complex. (c) Assuming a successful launch of the first satellite late in 1972, commercial operations are expected to begin early in 1973.

CRIMINAL CODE—BREATHALIZER AMENDMENTS

Question No. 787—Mr. Robinson:

With regard to the Criminal Code amendments concerning the breathalizer, will the government advise if an approved container has been developed and, if not (a) is research continuing for such a container (b) will the government consider the advisability of removing Section 223 of the Criminal Code until such time as a satisfactory container is developed?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): (a) Research on the development of such a container is being carried out by the National Research Council at the request of the Minister of Justice. (b) No useful purpose would be served by introducing legislation for the purpose of removing section 223 from the Criminal Code until a satisfactory container is developed. Section 223 is essential to the practical operation of the provisions of the Criminal Code relating to drinking and driving.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—NUMBER OF CLAIMANTS

Question No. 864—Mr. MacRae:

How many Canadian citizens were drawing unemployment insurance on January 29, 1971 and approximately how many of those people are now employed?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Statistics on the number of Canadian citizens drawing unemployment insurance benefit at the end of January 1971 will be published by DBS in their "Statistical Report on the Operation of the Unemployment Insurance Act" near the end of March.

POST OFFICE—CHRISTMAS STAMPS, 1970

Question No. 888—Mr. Hales:

1. How many Christmas stamps were printed in 1970 in (a) 5-cent denominations (b) 6-cent denominations?

2. How many of each denomination have been sold?

3. What will be the disposition of the remainder of the stamps?

4. What was the total cost of production of the 1970 Christmas stamps?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister without Portfolio): 1. (a) 232,800,000; (b) 141,900,000.

2. Exact quantities cannot be provided without a costly survey of all Post Offices. However, it is estimated that the following percentages were sold prior to January 1, 1971: 5 cents, 91 per cent; 6 cents, 99 per cent.

3. Broken lots are to be sold until depleted. Any remaining surplus stocks are to be introduced for sale prior to Christmas 1971.

4. $161,500 including the 10 cent and 15 cent Christmas stamps.

BIRD SANCTUARIES

Question No. 897—Mr. Robinson:

How many bird sanctuaries are there in Canada (a) where is each located (b) what is the size of each (c) what species of birds are protected in each (d) how much is the cost to the federal government to maintain each sanctuary?

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): (a) and (b) There are 96 areas which have been declared bird sanctuaries under the Migratory Birds Sanctuary Regulations. A list of these can be found in the Migratory Birds Sanctuary Regulations which also show the location and area of each sanctuary. Copies of these regulations can be obtained from the Canadian Wildlife Service. (c) Several species of birds are protected in each sanctuary depending on location. In general, ducks, geese, swans and shore birds are protected in the sanctuaries in the Northwest Territories. Colony nesting sea birds such as gannets, puffins, murres and auks are protected in sanctuaries in coastal areas. (d) With the exception of the sanctuaries in the Northwest Territories which are Crown-owned most of the sanctuaries are privately-owned. It does not cost the federal government anything to maintain each sanctuary.

PUBLIC WORKS—BUILD LEASE POST OFFICES

Return tabled.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

USE OF VOLUNTARY RESTRAINTS TO COMBAT INFLATION DISCUSSION WITH CANADIAN LABOUR CONGRESS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance in connection with the presentation this morning by the Canadian Labour Congress and the discussion which must have been very wide-ranging. In view of the contents of the brief of the CLC, did the government discuss with the representatives of the Candian Labour Congress the possibility of a program of voluntary restraints in the future as part of an anti-inflationary program and, if so, under what conditions the CLC would be prepared to consider or discuss such a program of voluntary restraints?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I merely raised the question that we may have another cycle, and undoubtedly will, in the future where inflation becomes a serious problem, and I said the government would be interested in having their views with regard to policies to be adopted by government, business and labour in such conditions.

[Mr. Robinson.]

Mr. Stanfield: I take it that the minister did not press the subject this morning. I should like to ask the minister whether he intends to pursue the matter of achieving a voluntary incomes or voluntary restraints policy in view of the experience in other countries that this sometimes can be achieved when inflationary pressures are not severe whereas it may fail when inflationary pressures are severe. Does the minister intend to pursue this or can we assume that it is a dead issue?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I would expect the Canadian Labour Congress would pay the same attention to our request to them as we would to their submission to us.

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to ask the minister, now that the policy of the government is to expand the economy, whether he now intends to mount defences against inflation, or is it the intention of the government to rely upon compulsory controls in the event of new inflationary pressures in the future, or does the government intend to rely once more on the policy it used last year of deliberately creating unemployment in order to eliminate inflation?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, the government did not follow a policy of deliberately creating unemployment last year.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: The Prime Minister said it did. Six per cent is what he said would be acceptable.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

POLLUTION

CONTAMINATION OF WEST COAST OF VANCOUVER ISLAND BY OIL

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question on a matter of emergency which is causing widespread concern on the Pacific coast. Normally I would address it to the Minister of Transport but in his absence perhaps I might direct it to the Prime Minister. I may say I was in touch with the office of the Minister of Transport on Friday after news of this event reached Ottawa. Can the Prime Minister report to the House on the nature and extent of the mass of heavy oil moving onto the shore of Vancouver Island's west coast in the vicinity of our new national park, and can he advise what steps are being taken by the Department of Transport or by any other agency to effect a clean-up?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I have no report on this. I will direct the attention of the Minister of Transport to the situation.

CRIMINAL CODE

RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice concerning abolition of capital punishment.

As is well-known, the suspension of capital punishment is to expire during the course of 1972, and Parliament will have to decide whether the suspension is to be extended or whether capital punishment is to be re-introduced. Does the Minister of Justice intend to consider the re-introduction of capital punishment in 1972?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking a question concerning 1972. There are still ten months to go before we are in 1972.

I am under the impression that the question has already been put. If the hon. member could rephrase his question, I would gladly allow the minister to reply.

GRAIN

INITIAL PRICES FOR 1971-72 CROP YEAR—TAKING UP OF POSSIBLE POOL LOSSES BY GOVERNMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It has to do with the statement he made this afternoon concerning grain prices. In view of the possibility of international competition of a fire-sale nature in wheat and possibly other grain products, if the intial prices that have been set out by him result in a loss in the pools will the government of Canada take up that loss or is it the plan to pass it on to the farmer in the ensuing year?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, while I should like to say again that we do not share the gloom and doom of the right hon. gentleman, I would add that the whole question of the initial payments in the pools is one which is part of our other proposals, to which hon. members have referred, on which discussions are coming to a conclusion and upon which I hope to be able to make a statement to the House or present the necessary legislation before long.

Mr. Diefenbaker: So far as gloom is concerned, it is all over western Canada because of the failure of the minister to act.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the right hon. gentleman kindly ask the supplementary question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, ministers should not have the right to make these gratuitous statements and then the opposition be denied the right to reply.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. gentleman has the floor for the purpose of asking a supplementary question. I invite him to ask the question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I now ask the minister whether or not it is the intention of the government to pass on any losses that take place in the pools to the farmers in the ensuing year. Is he prepared to answer that or must we stay in gloom throughout western Canada?

Mr. Lang: I think I answered that exact question earlier by saying that it was a part of our proposals which deal with the question of losses on any pools, and that this has been a matter which has been undergoing discussion and upon which we will make a further statement in due course.

Mr. Diefenbaker: So the farmers will be taken in again.

WHEAT—INITIAL PRICE FOR 1971-72 CROP YEAR AND INTERNATIONAL COMPETITION—PROPOSED STABILIZATION PROGRAM

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): May I ask the minister whether the decrease in the initial price of wheat announced a few minutes ago indicates the government's assessment of the competition and the price cutting they are going to meet in the international market?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member no doubt refers to the initial price proposed from August 1, for wheat. He will have noted that the $1.46 proposed is exactly the same price as the initial price for the No. 2 grade at present, and the No. 2 grade as it is now known will constitute the greatest quantity of wheat in the ordinary course entering into the stream under the new grade of No. 1 Canada western. It is true, of course, that the Wheat Board will be in a position with the new grading system to sell wheat on the basis of some protein differentiations. This is the tremendous advantage from the new grades, but it is not yet possible at this time to distinguish between the protein gradings at the producers' level, and it is for this reason—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Gleave: I take it that the minister does not really choose to answer the question I asked.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member kindly ask his supplementary question.

Mr. Gleave: All right, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister whether the announcement today on initial prices for the coming year and the announcement a few days ago of the new quota provision indicate that the minister has not been able to obtain agreement on the proposed stabilization program and that all or part of it has been or is about to be abandoned?

Mr. Lang: It certainly does not indicate either of those things. What we are doing is moving forward with various parts of the proposals which we made initially, and particularly with those parts which we had hoped to have in place by March 1. Further statements, proposals and legislation in regard to the stabilization plan will be forthcoming before long.

INITIAL PRICES FOR 1971-72 CROP YEAR—INDICATION OF QUOTAS PRIOR TO SEEDING

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): May I ask the minister whether he has any intention of indicating what the number of bushels per specified acre might be prior to the commencement of seeding of each particular grain?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): In the newsletter which is being mailed beginning today to all the permitholders within the region we have indicated the amounts of the various grains which we expect to be taken in on a minimum basis from producers during the course of the next year, and accordingly certain minimum figure calculations for the quota which will be available on these various grains in the crop year 1971-72.

Mr. Korchinski: We have had similar situations in other years when all the amounts indicated have not been taken in. Would this be cumulative for another year in order that the quotas delivered may be levelled off?

Mr. Lang: Not only is that question hypothetical but I do not expect—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

LACK OF INTERNATIONAL PRICE AGREEMENT—SUGGESTED BILATERAL ARRANGEMENT WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): This is a related question to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Since no floor or ceiling prices were established at the recent IGA conference held at Geneva and in view of the serious position in which this places the Canadian grain industry, would the minister, in company with one or two other cabinet ministers, arrange a meeting with their United States counterparts at the earliest date possible with a view to arriving at some form of bilateral agreement not to commence a price war on grain, a matter of very grave concern to Canadian grain farmers generally at the present time?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I am not sure that that particular form of meeting would be desirable at present. Of course we are attempting to maintain the maximum amount of co-operation in regard to orderly pricing in the world, and I may say that some of our producer organizations, in order to pursue the same objective, have some contract with producer organizations in other countries, and that may indeed be a fruitful technique.

WHEAT—REASSIGNMENT OF QUOTA ACREAGES IF CONDITIONS WARRANT

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): My question is for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. With regard to the new quota system announced by the Canadian Wheat Board last week, can the minister assure the House and the farmers that provision will be made for reassignment of quota acreages if conditions on individual farms warrant such changes? May I add that I was pleased at the earlier response to me—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot add that he is pleased.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I understand it is the hope of the Canadian Wheat Board to take a look at specific cases where some supervening difficulty arises with the original assignment in order to cope with special cases.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A number of hon. members are seeking to ask supplementary questions. We will have to go on to another subject in a moment. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Moose Jaw followed by the hon. member for Athabasca and then try to return to the hon. member for Regina East in a moment.

REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON PLANS TO CONSOLIDATE FARM UNITS PRIOR TO INTRODUCTION OF STABILIZATION PROPOSALS

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): My question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the minister's concern that farmers have the most precise information possible in deciding what they should seed, will the minister now provide information to producers as to what the plans are in so far as the consolidation of farm units to a more efficient size is concerned before he brings in his stabilization plan?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The question with regard to appropriate procedures for assisting farmers in particularly difficult situations will require a lot of discussion with the provinces and producers before the plan can go forward. From the point of view of the individual producers, one thing they can be assured of is that it will basically depend on their choice as to what particular form of assistance they want, and there will be no imposition upon them from the government.

WHEAT—INITIATIVES TO REACH INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT ON PRICES

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): My question is for the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. Will the minister, by way of a statement on motions, indicate what new initiatives Canada is taking in an attempt to reach an agreement on international wheat prices to ensure that a price war does not follow the present failure to reach an agreement?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member and to the minister that this kind of information should not be given at this time. The minister might want to indicate whether or not he proposes to make a statement on motions.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

MONTREAL—REPAIR OF ALLEGEDLY DEFECTIVE COMPUTER

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour.

Whereas some unemployed workers who have been entitled to withdraw unemployment insurance benefit for the past two months have not been paid this benefit and whereas the Commission's staff in Quebec City and Trois-Rivières are doing a great job, is the hon. minister thinking about having the Montreal computer repaired since it appears to be responsible for all the errors that occur?

IMMIGRATION

ADVICE TO APPLICANTS THAT HIRING OF PRIVATE CONSULTANTS NOT NECESSARY

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Is it the intention of the department to take steps to inform prospective Canadian immigrants who are temporarily resident in Canada that they have no need to employ or pay private immigration consultants to assist them in making an application to the department, and to make it clear that such services are available free of charge from the department and, I dare say, also from Members of Parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot dare say anything.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the department does attempt to make it clear to immigrants that advice is available from the department and also from Members of Parliament. I will look at the question of whether this is adequate in view of all the current circumstances to see if I can give the hon. member an assurance of further steps on our part.

NATIONAL SECURITY

WAR MEASURES ACT—PAYMENT BY QUEBEC FOR SERVICES OF ARMED FORCES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday I asked the Minister of Justice a question of which his parliamentary secretary took notice, and I also gave verbal notice today. Have he or his officials been asked to consider any ways and means of reducing or limiting the liability of the province of Quebec for payment for the services of the armed forces which were sent in and stationed there during the crisis last fall, in spite of the clear and strict provision of the National Defence Act which applies, as indicated by the Minister of National Defence last Thursday?

Hon. John. N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member knows that I will do my best to ensure that the legal interests of the government of Canada are upheld. The Chair has always taken the position that there is a privilege in this House for legal advice given by the office of the Attorney General to the Crown and, although I stand to be corrected, I believe that privilege not only goes to the substance of the legal advice but also to the legal advice sought.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the minister is wrong. This may be a reason for the government to refuse information, but that has nothing to do with procedure.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order raised by the minister, I would not dream of asking him for legal advice.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: I merely want to know if he or his officials are considering this issue.

INCOME TAX

INQUIRY AS TO METHOD OF PRESENTING AMENDMENTS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. I wonder if he could confirm to the House that he intends to introduce the tax changes the government has in mind by way of an amending bill? If so, does he intend to proceed under Rule 61, or does he intend to present a budget first to explain the changes?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not know yet.

UNEMPLOYMENT—ACCEPTABLE NATIONAL AVERAGE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Was the Prime Minister stating a matter of government policy this morning in the session with the Canadian Labour Congress when he rejected 3 per cent unemployment as a national average as too low a level at which to aim?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, hardly government policy, Mr. Speaker. It would be desirable if there were no unemployment at all in Canada. When we talk of 3 per cent, and I believe the CLC talked about considerably less—they said 1 per cent or 1.5 per cent—these are goals, but I imagine they too would rather see zero unemployment than 1.2 per cent unemployment. I do not think it is their policy to hope for 1.5 per cent unemployment. In discussing this matter we were simply trying to point out the difficulties of having an average across Canada say of 3 per cent, which would mean very high inflationary pressure in some areas of Canada which might have something less than 1 per cent or 1.5 per cent unemployment.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Can we gather from his answer that the government is prepared to tolerate or define full employment in the Atlantic provinces and in Quebec as 5 per cent or 6 per cent unemployment?

Mr. Trudeau: One would have to be very misguided to gather that, Mr. Speaker.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

NUMBER OF PERSONS WHOSE BENEFITS HAVE EXPIRED—NUMBER ALSO RECEIVING WELFARE PAYMENTS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. A week or two ago I asked him a couple of questions with respect to the number of people whose unemployment insurance had run out, and also the number of people who were collecting unemployment insurance and welfare simultaneously. Has he those replies today?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I mentioned at the time that these were very statistical matters. We are gathering the statistics and as soon as they are available they will be tabled.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

INCENTIVE GRANTS—SAFEGUARDING OF GOVERNMENT INVESTMENT—POSSIBILITY OF LATER ABANDONMENT OF VENTURES

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the millions of dollars that are being directed toward the establishment of new or expanded industry in specific areas of Canada, can the minister indicate today if there are restrictions imposed to safeguard the government's financial involvement, and if many of these new ventures will not be abandoned directly after the government's financial concessions no longer apply?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that the hon. member's question is of very wide scope. I wonder if it can be asked or whether the Chair should allow the minister to reply to a question which is so general in its terms. If the hon. member were to make it more specific it would be easier for the Chair to allow the question to be asked.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, in view of the expressed interest in this matter perhaps in rephrasing my question I might ask the minister whether at an early date he would attempt to make a statement on motions outlining the government's position in screening companies that have expressed an interest in taking advantage of these grants, and indicating the safeguards that the government proposes in order to assure that the investment will be of a somewhat permanent nature?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I will try to find an opportunity to answer this question properly.

MANPOWER

PLANS FOR PROVISION OF SUMMER EMPLOYMENT FOR STUDENTS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. It relates to a question I have asked the right hon. gentleman in the past, and also relates to remarks reportedly made by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration last weekend. Is the Prime Minister now in a position to announce what plans the government has for student employment during the summer months? I draw his attention to the fact that in six weeks time students will be on the labour market, and I ask the question particularly in view of the remarks reportedly made by the Minister of Manpower in the west last weekend—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has asked the question. He has invited the Prime Minister or someone on behalf of the government to make a statement of a general nature. Someone on behalf of the government might indicate whether such a statement is going to be made at the time such statements can be made.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we do plan to make such a statement. I hope it will be fairly soon. But the House will realize that much of this action will at least partly involve provincial action, and it is necessary in some instances to get the response of the provinces to some of the programs we propose before actually announcing them.

Mr. Nesbitt: In view of the remarks reportedly made by the Minister of Manpower that only resourceful students would be able to get employment during the summer, is the government planning a more extensive program than has been indicated by the minister?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to consider making such a statement.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

AMENDMENT OF CRIMINAL CODE TO DEAL WITH AIR PIRACY—EXTRADITION TREATY—GROUNDS FOR HOLDING HIJACKER

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. It concerns a subject with which we dealt on Friday. In view of the international increase in the crime of hijacking commercial passenger aircraft, and in view of the Vancouver incident, is it the minister's idea to bring in an amendment to the Criminal Code to deal with the crime of air piracy?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I think that would be a very useful idea, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the minister consider discussing with the United States authorities whether the extradition agreement between Canada and the United States covers this situation, and would he indicate whether the American now held in custody in Vancouver is being held for the crime of air piracy or for breaking the regulations of the Immigration Act?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I suppose that in the current circumstances that remains to be tested by any application that is made under the extradition treaty between the United States and Canada but, as the hon. member knows, there have been recent discussions internationally to the effect of attempting to incorporate air piracy, or unlawful interference with an aircraft in flight, within international treaties on extradition.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the minister advise the House under what law or on what grounds this particular American is held in custody in Vancouver? Is it a charge under the Criminal Code, or a charge under the regulations in reference to immigration?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that what is technically called a "further examination" under the Immigration Act is now being conducted.

Could the minister tell the House whether this organization is recognized as a bona fide and worthy international organization?

HEALTH

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION RESPECTING CIGARETTES

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Since leading medical experts throughout the world continue to emphasize the health hazards of cigarette smoking, and as it is almost two years since a committee report suggested legislation with regard to this matter, to which priority was given in the last Speech from the Throne, when will the government bring forward the legislation suggested in the report of the committee which made such a thorough study of this whole question?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, we hope to do so shortly. It is also our hope that we shall have the co-operation of the opposition parties in dealing with the matter with speed and facility.

Mr. Howe: Since recent surveys continue to indicate a great variation in the amount of deleterious material in different brands of cigarettes, will the legislation contain powers to regulate the quantities of tar and nicotine allowed in all cigarettes?

[Mr. Brewin.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that the hon. member's statement is in the form of a representation for consideration by the government.

Hon. J. A. WAR MEASURES ACT

INTRODUCTION ON REQUEST OF PROVINCIAL AND MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENTS—AMENDMENT OF ACT ACCORDINGLY

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It relates to the appearance of the Canadian Labour Congress before the cabinet and the Prime Minister's reiteration of his position that the proclamation of the War Measures Act related basically to the requests of provincial and municipal governments. In view of this oft-stated position of the Prime Minister, can we expect him or the Minister of Justice to introduce an amendment which will alter the terms under which the present War Measures Act is normally instituted so that this will in effect become the precedent for future use of the Act?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wishes to move such an amendment, when we come to discuss the issue I will see whether I will support it.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister prefers to play games with my question rather than answering.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister would indicate whether this is actually the position of the government. Will this precedent be established in law or simply regarded as an effective precedent for other provincial or municipal governments which in future circumstances may wish to make a similar request?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I was not suggesting any amendment of that kind. It is the hon. member who suggested such an amendment. Therefore I was not playing games with him. I might add—

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, may I indicate to the hon. member that owing to his representations and those of others, representations are being made to the Canada Games Committee in New Westminster in this connection, but that I have not heard the result yet.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR HOUSEWIVES' CONTRIBUTIONS AND BENEFITS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the minister considering enlarging the scope of the Canada Pension Plan to enable housewives to continue making contributions toward a full pension?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the white paper put forward many constructive suggestions for improving the Canada Pension Plan. We are discussing these with the provinces and interested parties, and are prepared to consider the representations of the National Council of Women, as well as representations made by the royal commission. We have not come to any conclusions with respect to them yet.

REPRESENTATIONS BY MENNONITES

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare is supplementary to that of the hon. member for Waterloo. Since the question of the Canada Pension Plan has been opened up, may I ask if the Mennonites were given the chance to make representations to any bodies with a view to further discussing the Canada Pension Plan, as they have asked so many times?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the Mennonites have asked many times to make representations and have been given the right to make representations. They have been listened to most carefully. I do not think they agreed with the result, but that is a different matter. It is now open to them, as it is to other groups in our society, to make representations now that the question has been opened up for discussions with the provinces. The government has decided that constructive changes are to be made and has invited groups such as the Mennonites and other interested parties to make representations.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State of External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the opening of a mission in Barbados is on my list; I hope it is on that of Treasury Board, too.

Mr. McCleave: I will drink to that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, when the minister settles down, I will ask him a supplementary question. During the minister's tour, will he be announcing the date for the opening of a mission in Zambia in view of the strategic location of that country in Southern Africa?

CYCLAMATES—COMPENSATION TO FOOD PROCESSORS FOR LOSSES CAUSED BY BAN

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is part of a series dealing with cyclamates and is prompted by questions by the hon. member for Simcoe North over the past few weeks. The banning of cyclamates in diet foods last April has caused severe financial hardship for some of the processors. Since other additives may be banned at any time on the ground they are dangerous or adulterative, is the government giving consideration to compensation for such losses to processors who previous to last April acted in accordance with the food and drug regulations?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the government has given consideration to representations of this kind. However, upon analysis one can see the tremendous cost that might be involved in such a program. It is a virtual impossibility to undertake such a program. The firms involved should be aware that if new technology shows something is harmful that is a risk they have to incur.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are running short of time. The Chair should recognize the hon. member for Matane.

[Mr. McCleave.]

[Later:]

Mr. Rose: I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Since the current food and drug regulations continue to allow cyclamate sweeteners to be sold over the counter with inadequate content labelling and without warning but ban the identical substance from being incorporated in food, has the minister any plans to end this discrimination or else ban cyclamate completely from public sale?

Mr. Munro: Without at all agreeing with the conclusions to which the hon. member has referred, a few days ago I indicated I will be making a statement on this matter. I shall do so.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DISCHARGE OF POLLUTANTS BY SHIPS

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-2, to amend the Canada Shipping Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Special Committee on Environmental Pollution.

Mr. Barnett: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Before Your Honour puts the amendment, I wish Your Honour's advice. There is an error in the English text at page 25 of the bill. This clause was amended in committee. Standing Order 75(7) provides that an amendment in form may be made by a minister of the Crown to a government bill. I am wondering whether something should be done by a minister of the Crown with respect to line 11 becoming line 10 of this government bill, or can the error be corrected some other way?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member this is essentially a clerical error which can be easily corrected. We will take the hon. member's suggestion into account and the correction will be made accordingly.

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova) moved:

That Bill C-2, to amend the Canada Shipping Act, be amended by inserting the following in Clause 2 immediately after line 18 at page 1:

"(d) "discharge" includes, but not so as to limit its meaning, any spilling, leaking, pumping, pouring, emitting, emptying, sifting or dumping."

and by relettering subsequent paragraphs accordingly.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the amendment is very simple, and I do not intend to speak on it at great length. This amendment merely defines the word "discharge".

The side note to clause 7 of the bill, as reprinted and reported from the committee, simply reads "Discharges of Pollutants". The word "discharge" appears five times in that clause. I move this amendment because the word "discharge" is not defined in the definition section or anywhere else in the bill. I intended to move this amendment in committee because several people were interested in this definition. We know what happened. The bill went through clause by clause on a day when I was not present in committee.

As I mentioned, the word "discharge" is not defined in section 736, the definition section of the Act. I realize that the oil pollution prevention regulations in Canada define the word "discharge", but it is not a very accurate definition for our purposes. In the oil pollution prevention regulations, the word "discharge" is defined as:

"discharge" in relation to a pollutant means any discharge or escape howsoever caused or occurring.

My amendment follows the wording of the United States water quality improvement act passed April 3, 1970. According to the act, "discharge" includes but is not limited to, any spilling, leaking, pumping, pouring, emitting, emptying or dumping. This definition is better than the one proposed in our oil pollution prevention regulations. On that basis, with some alterations, I move this amendment. Although this is a very minor amendment, the word "discharge" should be clearly defined so that we will know exactly what is meant. If the government does not like my definition, or prefers its own definition of the word "discharge', I submit an amendment should be brought in so Canadian ship owners or cargo owners may know exactly what is meant. Many of the witnesses who appeared before the committee expressed the desire that a definition be included in the bill. I am glad to see the minister here this afternoon. The bulk of the department's evidence before the committee was given by Mr. Macgillivray, Director of Marine Regulations Branch. For a while he was unwilling to accept many changes in the minister's absence; this was probably the reason the definition for which I am asking has not been included.

I realize the measure has to be a strong one. The minister has indicated time and time again that the department is taking a tough line. In these circumstances, it is only fair we should let the companies know exactly what is in store for them. The bill is of great concern to international interests as well as to purely Canadian concerns. Certain countries, particularly Scandinavian countries and Britain, have, I understand, expressed some concern about the terms of the bill. It is important, therefore, that the standards set must be clearly set out before the legislation becomes operative.

I am sure that had I been present on the day the committee discussed this particular clause the government would have accepted the amendment I have put forward. I trust the government will do so now, or, if not, at least insert some definition of the word "discharge".

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I have no quarrel with the case put forward by the hon. member. Indeed, even his definition is quite acceptable as far as I can see, with the possible exception of the word "sifting". We found it difficult to know how one could identify this action in terms of a shipping operation; perhaps the word "throwing" might be more appropriate. Apart from that, the amendment is acceptable.

I am not sure how we should proceed. If the hon. member is willing to substitute "throwing" for "sifting" there is no objection to the amendment on my part.

Mr. Comeau: I am so amazed, I will accept anything.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the amendment should be put in the terms suggested by the hon. member for Southwestern Nova (Mr. Comeau)?

Mr. McCleave: No, Mr. Speaker, it should be changed to conform with the wishes of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) who has objected to one word in it and suggested another. This change is acceptable to us. I presume my hon. friend will now ask for unanimous consent to amend his amendment. It could then be put in the altered form.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the minister would indicate whether this is correct, and in which way he suggests amending the motion proposed by the hon. member.

Mr. Jamieson: It is merely a matter of substituting the word "throwing" for the word "sifting".

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous agreement to amending the hon. member's motion as suggested by the Minister of Transport?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The motion will be put to the House as amended.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Since the minister has been so ready to accept the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Southwestern Nova (Mr. Comeau), I shall not belabour the point. I had read the proposed amendment carefully. I thought it was a good proposal and one which would likely have been agreed to had it been put forward during the committee stage. I am happy the hon. member for Southwestern Nova has put it forward. We can all agree to incorporate it into the bill.

Motion (Mr. Comeau) agreed to.

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the unanimous consent of the House to withdraw Motion No. 2 standing in my name for a reason which I intend to give. It is quite simple. The motion was put down a week or so ago when I believed there would be a minister of the environment. Up to this point, there is no minister of the environment. There is, however, consideration being given to an amendment affecting the reorganization bill which would change the title of the minister of the environment to "Minister of Fisheries and the Environment". If this amendment were accepted, this motion in my name would be redundant, and I should therefore like to ask that it be withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may withdraw his amendment with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Mr. Barnett: I say at once that I had intended to propose an amendment to the proposed amendment. Frankly, I consider the argument which the hon. member has advanced in favour of withdrawing his amendment to be ill-founded. Because I think there is some element of value in what I assume to be the idea behind the hon. member's amendment, and since I do wish to propose a subamendment, I feel I should not give unanimous consent at this point.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member a seconder for his motion? Seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose).

Mr. Rose: It is what you might call a bi-partisan amendment.

[Mr. McCleave.]

Mr. Comeau: I move:

That Bill C-2, An Act to amend the Canada Shipping Act, be amended by inserting the following in Clause 2 immediately after line 20 at page 2:

"(g) "Minister", notwithstanding anything in any other Part, means the Minister of the Environment;"

and by relettering subsequent paragraphs accordingly.

As stated by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose), this is a bi-partisan amendment. I suggest we consider the amendment in light of what took place in the committee of the whole the other day during the debate on the clean air bill. In response to a point of order raised at that time, Your Honour ruled that we were not prevented from including the expression "minister of the environment" in that bill by what had happened during debate on the government organization bill. I assume that the government is going ahead with its proposal, and if this amendment is accepted as well as the amendment of the hon. member for St. John's East to the government organization bill, then I suspect a new amendment can be brought in at a later date.

We have been saying for some time that all matters relating to pollution control should be brought under the one roof. The minister who will be responsible for anti-pollution measures is the minister of the environment, whoever he may be. This amendment simply gives the new minister of the environment control over all legislation—excepting the Arctic waters bill—dealing with pollution control.

In this respect, it is consistent with what we have been arguing for some time. For over a year now we have been arguing that this be done. We made the point when we debated the Canada Water Act last year; we repeated it this year when studying various anti-pollution measures. However, the government, in the actions it has taken this year, has reversed its stand from the position it took when we discussed the Canada Water Act.

We do not dislike the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson); let me say that at the outset. We like the minister and think he will do a good job. On the other hand, we do think it essential that one minister be made responsible for all anti-pollution measures. At the present time there is a multiplicity of jurisdictions with regard to pollution control, and for this reason one minister should look after the interests of the environment.

The new minister should be responsible for controlling oil pollution, which is one of the greatest threats at the present time to the environment, especially the fishery. Since the new minister of the environment will have jurisdiction over the fishery and will be relieving the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources of its jurisdiction over certain sections of water, it seems to me the prevention of oil pollution should also be made the responsibility of the minister of the environment. This is the reason for the amendment I have now proposed.

The new regulations pursuant to this new Canada Shipping Act will be made to apply to any fishing zones in Canada prescribed pursuant to the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act. This underlines my contention that the pollution control to which I referred should be brought under one roof. Many of the departmental officials who will apply the legislation will be from the Department of Transport, but at the same time over-all jurisdiction over oil pollution in this context should, it seems to me, be within the department of the minister who protects the environment, and particularly the fisheries. Of greatest interests in this regard is the fishery. This bill makes provision respecting both the Atlantic and west coast fisheries, which are our greatest fishing resources, though it also applies to the Great Lakes as well. Since there must be very close liaison between the department of fisheries and the administrators of this new act, it seems to me that the minister of the environment should be responsible for both aspects.

Last year's throne speech was heralded with great fanfare as the anti-pollution throne speech because the government was proposing to set up a new department to protect the environment. For once, the government was going to start to tackle the pollution problem and to place responsibility upon one minister. I should like to know why the government does not wish the new minister of the environment to have complete control of all anti-pollution measures. I do not understand why the government excepts the Arctic waters anti-pollution bill that Parliament passed last year, because that measure also relates to pollution control. Although the government may have some explanation, it does seem to me that responsibility for controlling pollution should be with this new department. The interests of the fisheries are very much at stake here. The movement of oil, as well as the movement of other pollutants, must be very much in the mind of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis). If the movement of pollutants, other than oil, is to be authorized this has to be a matter of concern. Last year the movement of phosphorus through Canadian waters was of great concern to the minister.

To be consistent with what our party has been trying to do, and what the government has been trying to do, it seems to me that all parties in the House should accept this amendment.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, the argument advanced by the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) in support of his amendment was very much along the lines I expected. I find myself basically in agreement with the argument he has presented. I am sure Your Honour has heard my colleague, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding), pursue the same theme in his speeches. The amendment I intend to propose will add additional words to the motion presented by the hon. member. Inasmuch as the amendment ends with the word "environment" I find myself very much tempted to add the words "and fisheries". This would be in line with what the hon. member had in mind when he suggested withdrawing his amendment. However, I thought I might be anticipating another debate, so should refrain from inserting these words at this point.

As the hon. member has suggested, the consequential changes arising from this proposed change of name might be dealt with at a later date. I do not intend to repeat the arguments which have been advanced in support of this basic idea, but I do want to say at once that I am concerned with some of the implications of this amendment. If one examines the terms of the bill, which sets out the responsibilities of the new ministry of environment, he will agree that this amendment is a step in the direction some of us have been advocating. The minister of environment should have general jurisdiction or supervision over activities of the government which directly affect the environment, that is the taking of appropriate steps to prevent further pollution of that environment.

In most respects, the bill we have before us is primarily concerned with the matter of shipping and the construction of ships. It is concerned with the type of navigational equipment they will carry and the rules under which they will operate. For this reason, it does seem to me that any addition to the Canada Shipping Act most appropriately rests in the hands of our Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), who generally has responsibility for administering this act. The fact that the thrust and purport of this bill is directed toward the prevention of pollution indicates the minister of environment should also have some authority at least to designate what levels of pollution will be acceptable for the purposes of this act and how pollutants will be defined. There are certain clauses of the bill which relate specifically to this aspect of the matter. They have to do with the carrying of oil and other pollutants in bulk cargoes.

It seems to me there is a happy point of compromise between the position set out in the bill, which would put the new part of the shipping act entirely under the minister's jurisdiction, and the position outlined by the member for South Western Nova in his amendment. If one were to follow through with the hon. member's argument, he would revert to the days when we had a department of marine and fisheries. In those days what is now the Department of Transport looked after shipping as well as fisheries. Surely, the hon. member does not want to revert to that situation. In this day and age I would not advocate this move, and I doubt very much if the minister, in view of his responsibilities regarding air transport, railways and a few other minor things like that, would welcome the idea of again having within his jurisdiction the department of fisheries.

I have sought to come up with something which separates the basically sound idea of the hon. member for South Western Nova and what to me seems to be the logic of having the Minister of Transport responsible for those things referred to in the bill. Therefore, I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather):

That the amendment be amended by deleting therefrom the semicolon following the word "Environment", and by inserting the words,

"for the purposes of Section 737, subsection (1) and Section 739, subsection (1), paragraphs (a) and (m), and the Minister shall recommend to the Governor in Council any regulations proposed to be made pursuant thereto;"

The amendment would then read:

That Bill C-2, an Act to amend the Canada Shipping Act, be amended by inserting the following in Clause 2 immediately after line 20 at page 2:

"(g) 'Minister', notwithstanding anything in any other Part, means the Minister of the Environment for purposes of Section 737, subsection (1) and Section 739, subsection (1), paragraphs (a) and (m), and the Minister shall recommend to the Governor in Council any regulations proposed to be made pursuant thereto;" and by relettering subsequent paragraphs accordingly.

Let me take a moment to draw attention to the particular subsections I have in mind. Proposed section 737 is headed "Discharges of Pollutants". Proposed subsection (1) reads:

The Governor in Council may make regulations prohibiting the discharge from ships of any one or more pollutants specified in the regulations, except as thereby authorized, in any waters to which this Part applies and with respect to which those regulations are made applicable.

Proposed section 739(1) is fairly lengthy. It sets out the authorization for a number of regulations, most of which have entirely to do with the question of regulating of ships, that is the type of navigational equipment and so on they are required to carry. But paragraph (a) of subsection 1 provides that regulations may be made prescribing substances and classes of substances that are, for the purposes of this part, pollutants. It would seem to me that this part deals very specifically with an area of the responsibility of the proposed department of the environment. In practice under my proposal as I see it, if regulations are to be drafted the minister of the environment would have to say, before the draft is presented to the governor in council for enactment, that the regulations are in conformity with the general type of regulations we are developing to control pollutants. This department will have to decide what are pollutants under the terms of other acts whether the Fisheries Act, the Water Act or any of perhaps a number of other acts.

When we come to paragraph (m) of subsection (1), we find it provides that regulations are to be made for regulating and preventing the pollution of air by ships. Here, it would seem to me we are moving directly into an area of responsibility that is within the ambit of the proposed clean air bill. If the minister of the environment, as is proposed, is to be the responsible minister in respect of the administration of the clean air act, then here again is an area of responsibility which this legislation should properly allocate to the minister of the environment so that he will have a voice at some point prior to any administrative responsibility being turned over to the Minister of Transport.

It would seem to me that the proposal I have put forward represents a logical step in the legislative process to ensure that the will of Parliament, which has been referred to in many speeches made in this House, is emphasized at the present time. I believe there has been general support so far for the basic concept of the clean air bill, and indeed for the establishment of a department of the environment no matter what the particular name might be. Therefore, I believe these proposals would be consistent with the wish expressed generally in Parliament as to the approach we should be taking and the concept which, in principle, now is obviously accepted by both sides of the House. It seems to me we should start tying in very specifically the responsibility of the minister of the environment, as it has been outlined in the proposals for the department, with the various acts which are to be under his administration. One of those acts should be this one which, while generally speaking is within the ambit of the administration of ships and the rules of navigation, ties in closely with the general question of helping to preserve an environment which is fit for us to live in.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, as a point of academic interest which may come up later, I am wondering about the extent to which it is possible to amend a motion made at the report stage which involves the importation of what might be a completely new and foreign—and I use the word "foreign" advisedly—area of discussion. The motion moved by the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) was designed to name the minister of the environment as the minister who would have jurisdiction under this particular part of the amended act. However, the amendment would extend this principle to provide that the minister of the environment, rather than the governor in council, may set regulations. I know we are in a very limited area in respect of which some time ago Your Honour did rule that the right to make an amendment to a motion at the report stage was there, but I believe it had to be exercised in such a way as to bring the amendment squarely within the four corners of the original motion. I raise this point because I think it might be of some interest in the future. I do not know whether Your Honour proposes to deal with it, but I thought I would bring my views to your attention.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The point raised by the hon. member, of course, is of interest. As he said, some time ago, after the new rules were accepted by the House, a point was raised as to whether it was possible to amend a motion at the report stage. At that time, the Chair ruled it was possible to make such an amendment, but that amendments at this stage are subject to the same rules and limitations as amendments at other stages. I am not sure I can interpret the amendment proposed now by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) in the same way the hon. member does. My interpretation of the motion proposed by the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) is that the minister, for the purposes of the Canada Shipping Act, would be the minister of the environment. The hon. member suggested this applied only to part IX. There could be an interesting legal question concerning what the minister of the environment, or whatever he may be called, should have jurisdiction over under the Canada Shipping Act.

It seems to me the amendment of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett), from a procedural standpoint, is very helpful because it indicates exactly what was in the motion presented by the hon. member for South Western Nova. I would think the point raised by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), as he says, perhaps is academic to some extent. There will always be some difficulty in determining what is acceptable by way of a proposed amendment to a motion moved at the report stage. It will never be easy to make such a decision. My colleagues at the table and I, during the months in which this rule has been in force, have tried to be as lenient as possible in respect of amendments proposed at the report stage. I believe we have accepted, debated and voted on some which were, I would think, even much more removed from the principle of the motion than this one would be.

I recognize the importance of the point raised by the hon. member for Peace River, but I do not think the matter should be pressed further. I have the impression that if the motion proposed by the hon. member for South Western Nova is in order, the one now proposed by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is also in order. By way of academic consideration, it might be argued perhaps that the hon. member for South Western Nova was trying to go behind the bill and seeking to amend the original statute itself by modifying a clause which was not before us in this particular bill. But the amendment was accepted and procedurally was put to the House. I do not think at this stage the Chair should use this argument to throw out the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I think procedurally the amendment is properly before the House.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if you would allow me to say just a word on the point that has just been under discussion. I realize I am a bit irregular in doing so because in fact the Chair has ruled, but I wonder if I could point out in defence of the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) that the amendment he sought to make was to the new section 736 which is in a group of sections under part XIX, pollution, and that the interpretation section which he is seeking to amend applies only to part XIX. I think, in all fairness to the hon. member, that his attempt to define the minister was only for the purpose of part XIX, not for the purpose of the whole act. However, Your Honour has accepted this as in order, so we might go on to what my colleague, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) wishes to do, that is to narrow it still more, to make the minister of the environment the minister with respect only to certain sections that are in part XIX. But at any rate we all seem to be agreed that both amendments are in order, and I am sure that it is fortunate that the amendment of the hon. member for South Western Nova was put before the House so that we could have this valuable subamendment to it.

Mr. Baldwin: May I say, for purposes of clarification, that I did not intend to suggest that the amendment of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni had the effect of substituting the minister of the environment for the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) in the act. What I was trying to point out was that I, personally, would like to see this motion widened. However, I wanted to have a ruling from Your Honour along those lines because the effect of the amendment now is to provide that the minister of the environment rather than the Governor in Council may make regulations. That is the point I wanted to make clear.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): It has been a most interesting discussion and a very enlightening one in view of your ruling, Mr. Speaker. Since we have spent so much time arguing about the legality or propriety of both the motion and the amendment, now that the matter has been resolved it pains me somewhat to say that, personally, I cannot accept either one of them. I understand fully and sympathize with the principle that has been espoused by the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau), that is the concept of having all pollution matters within some form of centralized control. I take it that the other hon. member who moved the amendment to the motion had something of the same nature in mind. However, it does seem to me that we do not do any offence to the basic concept of a centralized form of control if in a sense we separate it into two parts, that is those parts of the control which are exercised through legislative authority such as is contained in the various environmental bills, and second, the kind of co-ordinating authority which undoubtedly will be present in so far as this measure is concerned, as well as a great many more.

The proposal as put forward by the hon. member for South Western Nova is one we examined in great detail, that is the department under which this part of the act would be most appropriate. I can assure the hon. member—and indeed this was discussed at some length in committee—that the judgment we made was not one which reflected any proprietary interest on my part or any feeling that once having acquired some form of responsibility it would be sinful to dispose of it in any other way. It was a very practical judgment and one that I think is entirely defensible. This is a small but important part of the total responsibility for the administration and control of shipping, both in Canadian waters and as it applies to the hundreds of aspects of the Canada Shipping Act. It is perfectly clear that in terms of the sections with regard to pollution matters and the like, the expertise and the capability repose in the Department of Transport. It is also evident, I think, from events of the past year or so that we have quite the best capability that exists at the present time for dealing with pollution incidents of this kind. I would not want to argue that our capability is by any means 100 per cent, far from it. I have indicated on several occasions that there is a great deal more to be learned about this subject. Nevertheless, it is my judgment, supported I believe by the evidence, that this measure and the responsibility for carrying it out, rests best at this moment within the Department of Transport.

One or two other illustrations may help to reinforce my contention. For example, it is clear that the coast-guard will have to play a major role in terms of carrying out these responsibilities. If there were to be divided jurisdiction in the manner which the hon. member suggests, then it is conceivable that valuable time would be lost in the event of a pollution spill or something of that nature with which we had to cope.

I think the essential argument is that, comparatively speaking, this is a small part of the total Canada Shipping Act. This is not by any means a precedent, and indeed hon. members on all sides of the House agreed with proposals which I put forward some months ago and which were supported unanimously with regard, for example, to the emission of exhaust fumes from automobiles. The judgment of hon. members at that time was that even though this had major pollution overtones, nevertheless, because the Department of Transport was the principal agency with regard to the inspection of newly manufactured automobiles and the like, it was most appropriate that this particular provision with regard to the emission levels of exhaust from automobiles should remain within the Department of Transport. This was done, I repeat, with the unanimous agreement of members of the House who saw the logic of that situation.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Jamieson: Would the hon. member wait until I have concluded? I will be happy to answer any questions he has at that time.

It seems to me there is a parallel within the present proposal. The new minister of the environment and I have consulted extensively already with regard to his role when it comes to the controlling of pollution as envisaged in this bill, and we have no doubt that it would be far more advisable to keep it within a single ministry, to make a single minister responsible in terms of the legal responsibilities as opposed to the co-ordinating role. That refers to the original motion.

As for the amendment to the motion, it is my sincere conviction that at this point in time it would complicate matters unduly. I am not altogether certain what would be achieved by it. I would assume that before any identification of pollution substances and the like is made, there would be consultation. In fact, I am quite sure that this would be so, but it would be just as reasonable to suggest that before the proposed minister of the environment, or whatever name hon. members wish to apply to that department, did anything, it should be a requirement that he consult with me. Of course, I think that this would be done in any event. I do not believe that the confining strictures which would be applied through this amendment would serve the purpose any better, and indeed would not serve it as well as the arrangement that we have in this bill.

So on this count, as well as many others that I could evoke, I fear that I have to reject both of the proposals. I will be glad to answer the question of the hon. member if he wishes to put it now.

Mr. Barnett: I will not seek to debate my amendment again with the minister, although his last remarks were pertinent to it. What I would like to ask the minister is whether he could check his memory, as I have checked mine, with reference to the question of emissions from motor vehicles to which he referred when we enacted that legislation. Is it not correct that when the House gave unanimous consent, as he said, to the idea enunciated there, we did not know we were going to have a proposal from the government for the establishment of a department of the environment with general responsibility in the pollution area?

Mr. Jamieson: If the hon. member means, did the House know the form of the measure, I suppose he is correct. But of course, it has been indicated for some considerable time that such a measure was coming forward in some form. But even if this were not so, my argument was not that, given those circumstances, there would have been a proposal that it go to the department of the environment. My point and contention are that the weight of the evidence presented at that time made it thoroughly logical that in terms of that particular measure, the responsibility more properly resided in the Department of Transport. I say that, regardless of whether there was a department of the environment in existence at that time or not, my point is that if, in fact, we have inspectors who are examining an automobile—to use a nautical expression more appropriate to this bill—from stem to stern, it makes a good deal of sense for the examination of the exhaust system to rest within a single department. I maintain the same is true in the present case.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: The question is on the amendment to the motion. All those in favour of the proposed amendment to the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 75 (11) the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I move:

That Bill C-2, An Act to amend the Canada Shipping Act, be amended in Clause 2 thereof by deleting lines 15 to 31 inclusive at page 3 and substituting therefor:

"(2) Except where otherwise provided in this Part or in any regulation made thereunder, this Part and any regulations made thereunder apply

(a) to all Canadian waters south of the sixtieth parallel of north latitude;

(b) to any fishing zones of Canada prescribed pursuant to the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act;

(c) to such additional waters south of the sixtieth parallel of north latitude and adjacent to the sea coasts of Canada as lie within a distance of one hundred nautical miles measured seaward from baselines or the outer limits of fishing zones prescribed pursuant to the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act, or from the nearest Canadian land where no such baselines or fishing zones have been prescribed, provided that this paragraph shall not apply where the Governor in Council has issued a list of co-ordinates pursuant to the provisions of subsection (4) of Section 5 of the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act; and

(d) to all ships in waters described in paragraphs (a) to (c)".

This amendment, Mr. Speaker, is designed to deal with a very basic inadequacy in what generally speaking is a very good bill. It proposes that instead of administering the provisions of the bill for a distance 12 miles seaward from our coastlines, the jurisdiction of the administration be extended 100 miles seaward from our coastlines in all of the waters lying south of the sixtieth parallel. In other words, this measure would apply to those waters adjacent to the coasts of Canada that do not lie within the ambit of the Arctic Waters Pollution Control bill which we dealt with in the last session of Parliament.

I said generally speaking this is a very good bill. I think its passage through the standing committee would bear out my contention because there were quite a number of amendments that were generally agreed to in the committee and which were brought forward to this House at the report stage. This proposal of mine did not receive the endorsation of the majority of the committee members and, therefore, I bring it forward for the consideration of the House today.

I have in my hand a clipping from the Victoria Colonist of August 9, 1970 which has reference to the aftermath of a situation which developed in Active Pass. This is on the shipping route generally used by many of the vessels travelling between the port of Victoria, our capital city in British Columbia, and the Vancouver area. There was a collision in Active Pass between a Russian freighter and a vessel of the B.C. Ferry service, which resulted in very severe damage to the ferry. The ferry was out of service for quite some time for major repairs, and there was also loss of life. It was a serious accident, although I might say not as serious in the context of the bill which we have before us as it would have been if either one or both of the ships had been tankers carrying oil. The U.S.S.R. vessel was a general cargo one, and so no major question of pollution was involved.

I mention this clipping because it reports Federal Transport Minister Don Jamieson as saying that changes in navigation law would have to come before alterations in coastal routes and Vancouver Harbour approaches could be determined.

"We can't instruct a ship or tell a ship where to go under the present law", he said.

The lack in the law referred to by the minister at that time, in my view is the basic gap that the bill with which we are dealing is designed to close. While this bill is one of the more complicated bills that I have studied in committee, I think the essence of it is sound and the general principle is one which the House should support.

So, the area of debate raised by my amendment does not deal with the basic principle of the bill but with the question of the area of its jurisdiction.

I would suggest that in view of a couple of events, this proposal of mine is rather appropriately being discussed today. One is that this is about the time that our proclaimed fishing zones become operative. At least, the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) issued a statement a little while ago that they would become operative as of the end of February. So, we are starting in somewhat of a new era so far as the area over which Canadian jurisdiction for pollution purposes, among other things, applies.

Mr. McGrath: It does not apply to the south coast of Newfoundland.

Mr. Barnett: I will leave it up to the hon. member to discuss that aspect of the matter, which he does very capably and about which he knows a great deal more than I do.

The second event which I suggest makes this discussion appropriate is that this is D-day in the province of British Columbia for the launching of a petition which it is hoped will secure one million signatures from residents of British Columbia and of the State of Washington in the U.S., protesting the proposed establishment of an oil tanker route from the State of Alaska through the Strait of Juan de Fuca to an oil refinery on the mainland of the continental U.S. This event, Mr. Speaker, fits in very well with the suggestion that has been made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) that Canadians should speak out and express their concern about proposals of this kind. I suggest that I am providing the House with an opportunity to speak out on this sort of thing through the amendment that I am proposing.

Much has happened in this fast moving world of ours since the previous session of this House when we passed certain bills that impinge upon some areas of our concern respecting the future of the environment of the country. In the previous session we passed the first Arctic Waters Pollution Control bill and a bill amending the Territorial Seas and Fishing Zones Act which extended our territorial sea to 12 miles from three miles and made possible the application of the fishing zones now in effect on our Atlantic and Pacific coasts. Some of the things which have happened have highlighted the need for the kind of bill with which we are dealing. I am referring to certain events on the Atlantic coast at Chedabucto Bay. Much of the time of the committee was devoted to considering the implications arising from that disaster involving an oil tanker.

More recently there was a double tanker collision in the entrance to San Francisco Harbour under the Golden Gate. Large quantities of oil were poured into the waters of that particular part of the west coast. Even more recently, Mr. Speaker, and closer to home, there was an occurrence in my constituency. At the end of last week a large body of heavy oil was moving inshore at the edge of Long Beach, adjacent to where we have just established our new west coast national marine park. Anyone who wants an idea of how Long Beach appears need only look at the picture on the cover of this year's British Columbia telephone directory. Although that is the most extensive individual beach in the area, there are many other beautiful beaches that could be affected by this oil. So, we have had fair warning. I hope that the minister, who was not here for the question period, can give us some more detailed information of the size of this body of oil, where it has come from, and any other information of that kind on this point. As I say, we have had fair warning of what may be impending for the Pacific Coast, at least if this route for large tankers carrying oil from the north slope of Alaska down the west coast of Canada is inaugurated.

If anticipated pollution as a result of shipping developing in the Arctic warranted Canada taking action last year to place the 100-mile pollution and territorial seas zone around the Arctic islands, then I suggest the very real and pressing dangers on our Atlantic and Pacific coasts that have been so dramatically demonstrated since the time we passed the Arctic Waters bill warrant and justify, for the sake of our own national survival and safety as a people, the same kind of control with regard to the same kind of use of our waters out to 100 miles. My amendment proposes that. As somebody has said, there is no magic in that particular figure.

I should like to suggest that it ought to be considered a minimum more than a maximum. Anyone who thinks that we are trying to take over control of the oceans of the world should look, I suggest, at a map of the Pacific Ocean and see what a small portion of the Pacific Ocean is encompassed by that area extending 100 miles from our coastline. One can realize this is a very modest suggestion, indeed.

I know that arguments will be advanced that we are going beyond accepted international law, and perhaps we are. Perhaps we are developing what is sometimes called the customary law of states. Yet I suggest to the House that if, in keeping with Canada's place in the world, we proclaimed that 100-mile zone around our Arctic islands, it would be even more in keeping with our place in the world if we were to seek to develop the international law by saying that the same principle applies to our Pacific and to our Atlantic coasts.

We are not completely without grounds in taking this sort of action. Speaking on the second reading of the bill to amend the Territorial Seas and Fishing Zones Act, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, as reported at page 6013 of Hansard for April 17, 1970:

> We cannot, however, accept the notion that a coastal state's fisheries conservation and protection jurisdiction must cease at 12 miles from shore.
> The developments since 1960 have proved that there is no magic in the 12-mile limit. Unlike the deer and bears in national parks, who become aware after a period that they are safe when they enter the sanctuary of the park, the fish do not seem to know that they are safe—except of course from Canadian fishermen—when they enter the 12-mile limit.

A little later in the same paragraph, the minister said:

> Once again, Canada, after long and serious deliberations, has decided to go it alone.

[Mr. Barnett.]

The suggestion, if my amendment means that we are to go it alone, is not without precedent, even if one were to consider actions proposed and taken by the present administration. It is becoming more and more apparent to me every day that, in some respects, we cannot wait for international treaties to come into being.

A good deal of discussion has arisen about the Brussels Conference of late 1969. It was referred to in a statement by professors of international law at the Faculty of Law, University of Toronto, presented at the Annual Conference of the American Society of International Law meeting in New York City on April 24, 1970. The heading of this document is "The Canadian Initiative to Establish a Maritime Zone for Environmental Protection: its Significance for Multilateral Development of International Law". Page 3 of the document, as I have it in typewritten manuscript form, reads:

> At the Brussels Conference late in 1969 IMCO drafted a more far-reaching convention.

This is more far-reaching than the original convention on the matter of pollution of the sea by oil.

> Even if it is ratified by most of the shipping and coastal nations concerned, it contains the same basic defect of not providing for meaningful preventive regulation. The Canadian delegation at that conference argued in vain for the adoption of an effective regime of environmental protection.

As I understand it, this is what the proposed amendment to the Canada Shipping Act is all about. It is a matter of trying to create an effective regime of environmental protection and meaningful preventive regulation.

I was happy when the committee accepted my suggestion that the reference to pollution control officers in the bill be changed to "pollution prevention officers". As far as I am concerned, the essence of the bill is to seek to develop preventive regulations against the dangers of possible massive oil spills. No matter how effective the measures may be that we may develop in the future under the coastguard, or what kind of materials we stockpile, in some respects they are going to be ineffective once the oil is in the water and moving toward our shore line. I was glad to see the minister make a reference to the emphasis that should be placed upon the coastguard in this role. My constituents on the west coast are getting a sample of the heavy, massive goo that can come ashore on some of the most beautiful sand beaches in the world. What destruction will occur on a large scale if we do not take measures to create effective preventive regulations?

The International Convention Relating to Intervention on the High Seas in Cases of Oil Pollution Casualties is limited in its effect to action that is taken after the event, rather than before. Article I reads:

> Parties to the present Convention may take such measures on the high seas as may be necessary to prevent, mitigate or eliminate grave and imminent danger to their coastline or related interests from pollution or threat of pollution of the sea by oil,—

Then, comes the real crux of it:

> —following upon a maritime casualty or acts related to such a casualty,—

A maritime casualty is defined as meaning a collision, running aground on a reef or other events of that character. The related interests which are included are interesting and relevant. The definition section of Article II reads:

"Related interests" means the interests of a coastal State directly affected or threatened by the maritime casualty, such as:

(a) maritime coastal, port or estuarine activities, including fisheries activities, constituting an essential means of livelihood of the persons concerned;

(b) tourist attractions of the area concerned;

(c) the health of the coastal population and the well-being of the area concerned, including conservation of living marine resources and of wildlife;

This is what we are really concerned with in this bill. Basically, we are trying to take steps to prevent the danger of any oil spill on the water, rather than merely dealing with it as a right on the high seas after a marine casualty has occurred. This is an obvious gap in the international agreements. This matter is becoming so pressing that we are at least compelled to make an attempt to take preventive action a reasonable distance from our shores. This point is being driven home to thousands of people on the Pacific coast now that there is a discussion about tankers travelling down our coastline from the state of Alaska.

No one can logically argue that 100 miles is an unreasonable distance from our shores to seek to take preventive action. We are not being unfair with regard to the activities of other nations if we simply say that if they come within a short distance of our shores,—their ships must meet certain standards and have certain navigational aids, obey certain navigational rules and in specific areas follow traffic regulations.

When I spoke on second reading of the bill, I said that 12 miles off our shore was nothing more than spitting distance. I shrink inside when I think of the possibility of the glorious stretch of ocean shore in our new national park, Long Beach, being contaminated in the same way as some areas on the Atlantic coast of Canada were affected by the spill of the Arrow. Those who know about these things have told me that when considering the kind of tanker proposed for service down the coast from Alaska, we must bear in mind that after their engines have been put full speed astern they travel five miles before coming to a stop. In that context, how effective is a 12-mile zone off our coasts? It is obviously not realistic that the jurisdiction of this bill should be limited to such a short distance off our coasts.

The principle of this amendment is exactly the same as the one proposed last year to the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin). It was turned down in the committee, as a matter of fact, and ruled out of order in the House. However, it is certainly within the ambit of the bill before us today.

During the debate on the Territorial Seas and Fishing Zones Act last year I proposed an amendment which would have extended our fishing zones. During that discussion, as may be found in Hansard of June 4, 1970, at page 7747, I set out the action which had been taken unilaterally by the United States under President Truman in 1945. I have here a copy of the Presidential Proclamation number 2668 of September 28, 1945 with respect to coastal fisheries in certain parts of the high seas. This reflects President Truman's conviction that there was need for action to preserve fishing resources. In this case, the need was so great that the United States had to make this move on its own initiative in the absence of existing international law or agreement. In other words, the United States was making new law. It was subsequent to this declaration that certain of the South American countries took steps to extend their own fishing zones.

An hon. Member: Like Peru.

Mr. Barnett: Peru, Ecuador, Chile and now, I understand, Brazil. So, there is an important section of the coastline of South America in respect of which jurisdiction extending 200 miles is claimed and where steps are taken to enforce this jurisdiction. At any rate, since a declaration such as this has been made by our friendly neighbour to the south, on its own initiative, I submit that should this amendment be agreed to the United States could not, with any logic, take objection in these circumstances. They might, of course, say: we can do it because we are big, but you cannot do it, because you are little. I do not believe they are prepared to take such a position; I do not believe the United States is prepared to develop a thesis of that kind, justifying its own actions while condemning ours. I have more faith in the people of the United States than that.

As I have mentioned, the action proposed in the amendment does not conflict with accepted international practice in certain circumstances, that is what some of our constitutional experts have described in the committee as a development of the customary law of states, something which we, according to certain of these experts, did last year in relation to the Arctic. I suggest we ought to do a little more of it this year with respect to the Atlantic and the Pacific. If the concern felt by the United States in 1945 about the conservation of the fisheries and the protection of marine life was real enough to require unilateral action to be taken, how much more pressing is the need today?

My amendment is a fairly long one and I shall not go into all its details. I should like to point out, though, that it has been carefully drafted in order that its provisions should not conflict with the rights of other nations whose waters adjoin our own. This is dealt with in that part of the amendment which refers to the provisions of subsection (4) of Section 5 of the Territorial Seas and Fishing Zones Act which gives the Governor in Council the right to issue the list of geographic co-ordinates in areas where the territorial sea or fishing zones of another country come close to our coasts. In other words, we are not seeking to assert any wider jurisdiction over waters which properly and normally belong to other nations.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, in answer to questions in the House in recent days concerning the proposed establishment of a tanker route from Alaska, has on one or two occasions referred to the value of speaking out. On February 18 he said:

> I think it is most important that during the period while hearings are being held, Canadians and Americans should realize the potential risks involved and speak out, and speak out clearly.

Again, on February 22, he said:

> I do believe it is important that all of those concerned, particularly the people affected in the State of Washington and in the Province of British Columbia, should make their views about this question known so that at least this decision is made in the full knowledge of the very serious danger of pollution which exists. I have no hesitation in saying on behalf of the Canadian government that we believe there are serious dangers of pollution.

I agree with the Secretary of State for External Affairs that it would not be appropriate for the Canadian government to appear officially before a board holding hearings in the United States. Nevertheless, the danger of pollution is real and serious and I suggest the time has come not only for the Canadian people as private citizens to speak out, but for this Parliament to take some positive action to recognize the danger which the Secretary of State mentioned in his reply to the questions about the proposed tanker route on the Pacific coast. It is all very well for us to make pious exhortations to citizens; when it comes right down to it, we who sit in this chamber are the only ones who can make the voice of the people effective. It is time to make that voice effective at least to the extent of the amendment I propose, one which would add to the protective jurisdiction of the bill before us.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett). I spoke on Bill C-2 when it was introduced on October 26 of last year.

The bill before us deals, in my view, with one of the most important problems facing Canadians, namely, the pollution of our environment. The motion proposed by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is a lengthy one and I shall not burden the House by reading it. I shall refer only to parts of it. Part III deals with fishing zones. I question the value of using the fishing zones in Canada, as the basis of this amendment. I question the value of the wording of this particular amendment, which provides that regulations shall apply to any fishing zones of Canada described pursuant to the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act, because in some cases fishing zones as defined are inoperative.

As the House is well aware, the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act was passed unilaterally with great fanfare in 1964. If the terms of that legislation had been implemented and enforced in that year, or even in 1965, then our fishermen, especially those on the east coast, would not today be facing a serious decline in their fisheries resources due to over-fishing by other countries. However, the legislation was not enforced in 1964, nor in 1965, 1966, 1967, 1968, 1969 or 1970. As a result of the government's procrastinating attitude haddock have become almost extinct, our herring resources are diminishing, while stocks of redfish, flounder and cod have declined to dangerous levels. The legislation is not enforced to this day on the south coast of Newfoundland.

This amendment is based on fishing zones that are not truly operative, which of course poses the question for the members of this party whether we can support an amendment of this type. Recently the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) made an announcement outside the House with regard to fishing zones, but these, as I said a moment ago, do not apply to the south coast of Newfoundland. Neither do they apply to the area surrounding St. Pierre and Miquelon. As a matter of fact, the minister's announcement only accentuated the problem of defining territorial seas and fishing zones in the area of St. Pierre and Miquelon.

Paragraph (c) of the amendment provides the interesting proposition that the regulations would apply to waters adjacent to the sea coasts of Canada as measured up to 100 miles from the base lines. We believe that this particular Bill should come under the authority of the Minister of Transport, and we express that view because he, in the final analysis, has the right to determine the types of ships that are constructed at the present time. It is for the Minister of Transport to define what should be the strength of oil tanks and water tanks, or the thickness of wood or steel used in the construction of ships in Canada. It is for the minister to make certain that his officials are aware that all ships employ proper navigational aids as required by law.

This is why we believe the Minister of Transport should have jurisdiction over the regulation of pollution control on the high seas. While we agree that steps must be taken not only to see that pollution is controlled up to 100 miles off our coasts, but throughout the entire environment, it seems to me that all nations and all peoples must be alerted to the danger of polluting our environment. In other words, while pollution abatement some 100 miles out to sea may be desirable, the truth is that such a law is unenforceable. To be effective, all nations must be alerted to the need to minimize the waste that they put into the sea. This can only be accomplished by holding an international conference in which all shipping nations participate.

This fact was pointed out by the minister himself when he was asked about the ability of the government to enforce this particular legislation. In response to a question from the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) about enforcing the legislation as it relates to the St. Pierre and Miquelon area, the minister replied that in the case of St. Pierre and Miquelon there is undoubtedly a problem because we would not be able to enforce Canadian law against a foreign owned vessel going to a foreign port. That was one of the unfortunate accidents of geography. The minister went on to say that he hoped that perhaps we could make some kind of practical arrangements with the authorities of St. Pierre and Miquelon because he was sure they did not want to have a major oil spill off their coastline any more than we did. In fact, said the minister, in the one case where this did come up one year we did co-operate with them effectively and in a practical way. In other words, we would be able to enforce the legislation on ships on the high seas destined for a Canadian port, but we could not enforce it on a ship docking at St. Pierre or Miquelon. If that be the case, and I presume the minister had all the facts at this command when he made that statement, it is obvious that the provisions of an amendment of this type giving control over pollution to the Canadian government up to some 100 miles off our shores would be unenforceable.

May I come back to my original suggestion, which is that I believe all nations must be made aware of their responsibilities with regard to pollution. It is for an international conference to alert each and every nation that has ships on the high seas to their responsibility to make certain they do not pollute the high seas.

In closing, and since I see it is almost five o'clock, may I put on the record the facts as stated in a Time magazine article on December 28, 1970 which gives an indication of the sense of responsibility that is now evident among the nations of the world:

In Rome last week, the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization tackled the problem—

That is, the problem of pollution.

—by inviting 400 scientists from 40 maritime nations to discuss man's abuse of the seas. The biggest and most important such conference to date produced more than 140 papers describing the danger. For example, two French scientists, Georges Bellan and Jean-Marie Peres, expressed alarm about the Mediterranean. Not only is human waste soiling beaches from Tel Aviv to Trieste, they said, but the "self-cleansing" power of the sea itself can no longer cope with the volume of untreated excrement and industrial waste now pouring into it. As a result, the scientists told their colleagues, "The Mediterranean is rushing toward complete pollution."

Bruce McDuffie, a bearded chemist of the State University of New York at Binghamton, is the man who recently discovered mercury in U.S. canned tuna. In Rome, he reported also finding high mercury levels in commercial swordfish. Reason: according to an American paper presented at the Rome conference, industry is now dumping 5,000 tons of mercury into the oceans each year. Because fish hold mercury in their systems for as long as 500 days, the contamination can travel over vast areas.

Dr. Max Blumer of Woods Hole Oceanographic Institution told the conference that "major catastrophes in production and at sea, unburned fuel, spent lubricants, and a significant hydrocarbon contribution from the land (Municipal wastes) contribute about 10 million tons of oil to the world's oceans each year". According to Blumer, the immediate effects of oil spills—dead fish and birds— are followed by long-term damage to marine ecology. "Compared to the size of the accidents," he said grimly, "the present countermeasures against oil in the oceans are inadequate."

The scientists underlined Blumer's hard-hitting report, and scores of others, by recommending an immediate international survey to measure the extent and degree of marine pollution. They also urged establishment of a global monitoring system.

Such a system would involve a fleet of ships and a chain of automatic sensing buoys, plus aerial photography and satellite observation. The system would be used to spot the source of pollutants like oil, mercury and lead. It would also monitor oxygen levels in the seas and "red tides", the abnormal growth of phytoplankton that can choke out other forms of marine life. Obviously, such a system would need the political support of nations that now exploit and degrade the seas.

That is the best indication I can give that other nations are aware of the problem and are doing something about it. I hope the Canadian government will pursue this matter at the international level, because I believe that only at the international level can we hope to clean up pollution on the high seas. For these reasons, we cannot support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett).

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—Finance—bankruptcy—measures to forestall further business failures; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Veterans Affairs—requirement that war veterans allowance recipients apply for guaranteed income supplement; the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Carter)—Fisheries—convening of international conference on conservation of marine resources.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES ACT

DESIGNATION OF ELECTORAL DISTRICTS OF BATTLE RIVER AND VEGREVILLE

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should immediately amend paragraph (q) of the Schedule to Regional Development Incentives Designated Region Order, 1969-1 to provide that the area comprised by the federal electoral districts of Battle River and Vegreville be designated as a designated region for the purposes of the Regional Development Incentives Act.

He said: In moving this motion to designate the areas of Battle River and Vegreville under the federal regional economic expansion program I am expressing a pressing necessity and, in a formal way, I hope to bring to the minister's attention the deep and urgent need for incentives and supportive industry in these rural areas. Every weekend I go home I find the situation has further deteriorated. Hundreds of farmers and businessmen have already been forced into bankruptcy. Many people who were formerly considered to be well established farmers and businessmen now come to me and say it will be only a matter of time until they will be out of business. They can only live on depreciation and credit for so long because the day of reckoning comes. That day is fast approaching for the majority, and a percentage have already gone under.

Last October I made an informal visit to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to discuss this whole matter. I was informed that there would positively be no redesignation until sometime in 1972. Since that time, however, we have seen an area in southeastern Ontario, and from Montreal to Hull, designated. I am wondering if their situation is really worse than that of certain regions in western Canada. I doubt that this is so. We should always remember that, as agriculture goes, so goes the nation. This has been proven throughout history. There is nothing in our present economic situation which would indicate that this situation will not repeat itself.

Last week some 2,700 employees of Massey-Ferguson were laid off, or there was an indication that they will be laid off. Many thousands more have been laid off in other industries in Canada's industrial heartland. There is nothing we can do for the industrial heartland of Canada which will improve the situation of the employees of Massey-Ferguson. However, if the agricultural industry were functioning as it should be, this situation would not occur. We must give top priority to the agricultural industry and other industries which support it if we are going to get the economy of this country on its feet.

My area of Battle River lies in the heart of the rapeseed area. A crushing and refining plant here, besides employing many people, would enable many more farm families to stay on the farm. Further diversification in respect of a readily saleable crop might be the key, because Canada was a net importer of oil seeds during the past year. If these rural people cannot get the degree of help which might be afforded them by being included as federally designated areas, they cannot help themselves. They are too far run down economically to generate the type of cash which would make it possible to establish plants of this size and description.

We have two designated areas in Alberta. One area exists in the riding of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), the Medicine Hat area. This area, as most Prairie rural areas, should be designated. But I must ask myself why it was chosen over other areas. I have some comparisons of various centres in Alberta. I should like to present them to show the situation which exists in respect of the designated area of Medicine Hat and some of the towns in my riding including Camrose, Stettler, Wainwright, and another area which is not designated, Red Deer. Let us look at the population growth in these areas of my riding. At the outset I must say that they are dwindling. The 1968 figures are the latest I have for five centres including the designated area of Medicine Hat. These figures relate to the capital debt. Medicine Hat had a capital debt of $154 per person. Red Deer had a capital debt of $330 per person, almost double. The town of Wainwright in 1968 had a per capita debt of $195, with Stettler at $172. The latest figures I have for Camrose are for 1970. These figures indicate a capital debt of $270. Certainly, these figures would substantiate the necessity for designating these areas, particularly if there is justification for designating the Medicine Hat area.

Let us look at the taxable assessment per capita of these areas. In Lethbridge this assessment was, as of 1968, $2,115; in Medicine Hat it was $2,169. These are both designated areas. The taxable assessment in Red Deer for the same period was $1,811; in Wainwright it was $1,471 and in Camrose it was $2,044. For the same period of time the assessment in Stettler was $1,650. There is very little in these statistics which would indicate that these areas should not be designated as well as the area of Medicine Hat which, by the way, is also in my province.

I might refer to the number of building permits issued in order to give a further example of how this area is depressed, in the city of Camrose, in 1967 approximately $4½ million worth of building permits were issued and in 1970 the figure was just a shade over $1 million. In the past two years the amount of tax arrears in the county of Camrose has increased by approximately $120,000 to $546,603 as of December 31, 1970. This gives some indication of the number of people who are behind in their taxes. I suggest that unless something is done this property eventually will be taken over by the local governments.

Perhaps we might review the situation by provinces in respect of industrial incentives offered and accepted to illustrate the situation I have just outlined which exists in this western region. I will compare the situations in Alberta and Quebec because I believe this would be as good a comparison as any. Five per cent of the offers under the regional incentives program were accepted for Alberta and 36.5 per cent were accepted for the Province of Quebec. In the time period covered by this graph, 764 new jobs were created in the Province of Alberta and about 7,000 new jobs were created in the Province of Quebec. In respect of the Province of Alberta, 4 per cent of the offers under the regional incentives program were accepted and in respect of the Province of Quebec 35.4 per cent were accepted. If this is truly one nation and all sections are to be dealt with equitably, I fail to see the equity in this situation.

When we consider incentives, we must also consider the matter of freight rates. I mentioned the rapeseed plant and what it would do for our area. Such a plant, however, would be under a handicap from the start. There would be something like a 75 cent a hundred weight handicap on produce coming from this plant, and yet the people of the west pay the full shot of the freight on products produced in the east. I say we must have a review of the freight rate structure in this country if it is truly to be called one nation.

I had occasion to speak to a kindergarten teacher in the city of Camrose who reported that a survey of 25 students in her class shows that 19 of the families were on welfare. There is a terrific reduction of railway employees in this area because of branch line abandonments, stations taken out of operation and consolidation of railway facilities. Coal mines for the most part are gone. There has also been a consolidation of the oil production which had developed in some of these smaller areas. Fifteen years ago in the city of Camrose I believe 350 families were engaged in the oil industry, whereas today the number of families is something in the order of ten. This is another indication of what is happening here. People are leaving the area. Where do they go? They merely go on the welfare rolls of the city. If the minister would consider increasing the regional incentives it might be possible for us to attract industry. After all, decentralization is something we must aim for in the future if we are to overcome the pollution problem.

There are predictions that in the cities of the future a third of the population will be engaged in eliminating pollution and looking after the services. I suggest that instead of designating areas which are already industrialized, such as the Montreal area, we would do well to take a look at these rural areas which probably are more in need than many of the areas from which there is a hue and cry. Sometimes it is possible in the agriculture business to hang on a little longer because of government credit programs and so on, but this does not cure the problem.

I draw these things to the attention of the minister. I appeal to the humanity in his soul and ask him to consider these people. Surely, he does not really want to depopulate these areas and have a nation of unemployed people and welfare recipients wandering aimlessly in our urban centres.

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to be able to make a few comments on this resolution that would be more interesting than the actual resolution. I sympathize greatly with the hon. member's reasons for presenting this motion. I wish I could support him completely, but it strikes me that the core of the criteria laid down in the act with regard to giving aid to areas would make it unlikely that the areas of Battle River and Vegreville referred to by the hon. member could be considered as designated areas especially in respect of Bill C-205. Even Bill C-205 probably is a little out of order. However, I do understand that designated areas have, by law, to be reviewed before June 30, 1972 which is only 16 months away.

An hon. Member: Let them starve for another 16 months.

Mr. Osler: I believe we should address ourselves to the question of whether we should be expanding the patchwork quilt of designated areas without taking another look at things.

Mr. McGrath: Why not designate the whole country?

Mr. Osler: If you would listen a little you might get a gleam of an idea. One of the gentlemen who intervened is a member from the east coast. I would think that he and I would be in complete agreement on the way to attack this problem. It would seem to me that he, the hon. member who introduced the motion, myself and many other hon. members from areas that are not in the very centre of the country have a great deal in common. If we are going to shout across the House at each other, we will never get anywhere. But if we sit down and try to discuss our points of view and how we might approach the problem, it may be possible that several of us together may get an idea that is good enough so that we can sell it to whatever government happens to be in power.

My point is that originally there were two provinces which got a great national idea about 100 years ago. They carried forward that idea, and out of it came Canada. But we have not had a great national idea since. The present government is pledged to the idea of regional equality of opportunity, and I think that what they are doing is great but it is not great enough. It will not give us regional equality of opportunity so long as the criteria on which we work are tied to unemployment figures. The hon. member who introduced this bill knows that the prime problem in both our areas is not unemployment but the movement of people. They move because there are better opportunities elsewhere. Certainly, there are the unemployed and I am not saying there are not, but there are not unemployed in the same sense that there are in other places. The problem on the east coast may again be a different thing. There is chronic unemployment there as well as in some parts of Quebec. We cannot use an omnibus bill based on the criterion of unemployment to solve these different problems. Supposedly, we are all pledged to giving people regional equality of opportunity. I resent the fact that in our province there has to be an exodus of people every year in order for them to have opportunities of employment. It is crazy that they should have to go to Toronto or British Columbia in order to get a job under ordinary circumstances. I am not talking about the time when there is more unemployment everywhere, but under ordinary circumstances this has to be and this does not help federalism.

We are supposed to have regional equality of opportunity. So, I hope that between now and the time when this review takes place we will all address ourselves to the idea of redefining our national dream and how we will achieve a regional equality of opportunity. We cannot come up with an answer indicating that Walter Gordon was right. I do not believe he was right. His idea was to close everything down and move everyone to Ontario because that is where the action is and not to waste our time with the Maritimes, the Prairies and other outlying regions.

Mr. McGrath: Who will pay their way back?

Mr. Osler: They might get back to these regions for a holiday. The answer must lie in a rededication to the national dream of our country for regional equality of opportunity. The CPR would never have been built if Sir John A. Macdonald had used his criterion for solving unemployment in the Prairies. There was no unemployment in the Prairies for the simple reason that nobody lived there, or only 15,000 people. If we do not reverse the present trend, we will be back to the same position in the next few years.

People leave the Prairies because there is no equality of opportunity. The idea would be to close down the railway as well as all other transportation, and thus save money so that those who live in the centre can enjoy themselves better and be burdened with less taxes. I still say that if we are to have a federal country we must have federal policies which will allow these areas to grow. So, the hon. member who introduced this motion is dead on the mark. I disagree with him because I do not think his motion can work within the criteria of the legislation that exists. I say that we had better change those criteria. If the criteria rests on unemployment alone, every time there is unemployment there will be more unemployment at the centre than at the fringes because more people live there. So, more money will be put in there, and bigger unemployment will follow. I think it is a self-defeating exercise. We have to get the money out into the outlying areas so that the people living there have a fit place in which to live instead of being crowded into the centre and one little valley on the west coast.

This is why I have to admit reluctantly that I cannot support the motion. I think that we should all think of one other aspect, that is that when the time comes for the discussions with the provinces about the revision of this program, which I repeat is only 16 months away, let us do our best to make sure that these talks take place in the open, frankly and freely and that the federal government's policy is made known to everyone. If that takes place, those provinces which are reluctant to make difficult provincial decisions as to where aid is really needed, and where this policy should apply, will not be able to hide any longer behind the excuse that the federal government is reluctant to help them in this or that area. I know of one province—and I am not referring to my own province at present—which said they would just as soon duck the whole business of obtaining any kind of federal aid to improve areas because they did not want to make the difficult political decision as to what areas were or were not to have aid.

I suggest that the federal government should find parameters that are clearly defined so that the next time round the provinces cannot duck these responsibilities and the people will know what we are trying to do. It is up to us as politicians to make sure that the provinces agree with what we are trying to do. I suggest that what we will be trying to do will be to redefine our national purpose and achieve a real equality of opportunity in all areas and regions of Canada.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): I welcome the opportunity of seconding the motion proposed by my colleague, the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Downey) and I welcome the opportunity of participating in the debate. I am sure the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) and for that matter his parliamentary secretary (Mr. O'Connell), will not find it surprising that I wholeheartedly support this motion. I believe they are both very much aware of the continued efforts and representations which I have made to them regarding the very urgent and pressing need for this kind of program in my area of Alberta.

I do not want to go into detail to reiterate the critical need for supplementing the declining agricultural industry. My colleague, the hon. member for Battle River, has touched on that. I only want to say that in the past three years we have seen net farm income dwindle to an all time low, a figure of $1,325 per farmer in the province, a decrease of more than 50 per cent in the past three years. This comes at a time when the cost of living components are at an all time high. Therefore, it becomes abundantly clear that our economic welfare is seriously impaired to the extent that not only those engaged in agriculture are hurt but those who are engaged in supplying goods and services to the agricultural industry are affected disastrously as well.

It can be said that this government has displayed very capably a lack of dedication and determination to promote and maintain a strong and viable agricultural industry in this country. I submit that it has fallen victim to international pressures, to consumer pressures, and to political pressures, all at the expense of the farmer and of the rural Canadian community. Unless this government rededicates itself to the rural lifestyle based on agriculture, there is very little hope for the survival of many of our smaller, and for that matter larger, rural centres.

Assuming that the government is not determined to look on agriculture as a national asset and hence develop appropriate programs aimed at promoting and maintaining the industry and its people, we are faced with the task of looking for alternatives which must be geared to preserving our rural communities.

Employment opportunities must be provided. A program of diversification is needed. A decentralizing process must take place, and people must be discouraged from flocking to our cities and compounding the problems which exist there. I say that in order to do this we must attract industry to the rural centres and, in Alberta, for example, to centres other than the cities of Calgary and Edmonton. We have a population of over 1½ million people in Alberta, over half of them located in those two cities. It is ludicrous to allow this trend to carry on. It is in this tone that I endorse the motion and join in the appeal for serious consideration to be given to the submissions contained in it.

What should be the role of the Department of Rural Economic Expansion in dealing with present developments in rural Canada? Many studies have been made. I refer particularly to the Canadian Council on Rural Development which made some very specific recommendations to deal with the question and put the whole matter of the rural problems of Canada into proper perspective. But we have heard nothing of the minister's reaction to those recommendations, nothing that would lead us to believe that rural development is a priority of the department.

I believe that officials of the department have illustrated, both in the past and in the present, that they are dedicated to a program of urban industrialization, without sufficient consideration being given to developing a balanced degree of urban-rural growth. If the department were to consider seriously overcoming the imbalance of rural-urban growth, there is justification for providing industrial incentives to all rural areas of Alberta. I suggest that until the growth and development of rural areas becomes a matter of top priority within the department, the increasing gap between rural and urban dwellers will continue to develop, compounding our social and economic problems. May I simply recall the words of President Nixon when he spoke to Congress early in 1970:

> We will carry our concern with the quality of life in America to the farm as well as the suburb, to the village as well as the city.
> What rural America most needs is a new kind of assistance. It needs to be dealt with, not as a separate nation, but as part of an over-all growth policy for all America. We must create a new rural environment that will not only stem the migration to urban centres but reverse it.

I think those were well chosen words. They certainly do apply to problems of rural Canada. The purpose of legislation administered under the Department of Regional Economic Expansion was adequately spelled out: to assist in the development of Canada, to provide equal opportunity for all Canadians, to overcome slow-growth areas, to provide industrial expansion and to provide jobs.

Time and time again the minister has reiterated the need for a large degree of flexibility to develop the kind of program suited to the specific need. He also stated that common sense and human needs were matters that would be considered as well as statistics and figures when adopting the designated regions; and because he was given large discretionary powers he also stated that he had authority to extend aid to any kind of commercial operation when it was required for the successful development of a special area. It was with this kind of spirit that we as members, and as Canadians, looked forward with anticipation to the implementation of the bill. But what has happened? We have seen the plight of agriculture. The minister has looked upon this as a social problem rather than an industrial problem, suggesting in somewhat evasive terms that a logical solution cannot emanate from the ambit of this act.

The minister cannot understand that agriculture is a basic industry and that when it is adversely affected, correspondingly it affects the welfare and livelihood of practically every citizen living in an area, because their degree of success or failure is commensurate with the success or failure of agriculture. When we consider that every $1 worth of agricultural production has a mulitiplier effect of $7, it becomes abundantly clear that the vast majority of Albertans are vitally concerned and connected with agriculture. It is with this rationale, I suggest, that the minister should review his position again, particularly in view of the fact that agriculture is not a priority item with the government.

In reply to a letter which I directed to the minister on October 10, 1969, raising objection to the exclusion of the area which I represent, the minister stated that in his opinion a program of incentives to secondary industry would not solve the problems of the rural regions to which I referred. He also said he conceded that there were difficulties facing Prairie agriculture and that appropriate measures would have to be adopted to overcome those difficulties. He said:

> This is a matter which we have under discussion with the provincial governments. We are talking about the kind of programs that my department can best employ to ease the necessary adjustment process and cushion its effects on the people of the Prairies.

I am sure I need not remind you, Mr. Speaker, that these discussions have been going on for more than a year and a half, and we are still waiting for such a program. I quote the minister again:

> Naturally, there must be increased industrialization on the Prairies if people leaving the farm are to find alternative employment. However, we must face the fact that incentive programs of this kind, no matter how good, cannot attract new plants to every small community.

I do not believe that anyone in this House expects each small community in rural Canada to attract industry. But I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that my area has the kind of communities that could, without difficulty, absorb secondary industry, such as Lloydminster, Vegreville, Vermilion, St. Paul, Smoky Lake, Vilna, Two Hills, Lamont, Mundare Mannville, Tofield and others. These could to good advantage accommodate industries which presently locate in Calgary or Edmonton. These communities have the basic infrastructure, the necessary service facilities, adequate educational, social and cultural facilities tailor-made for medium sized secondary industry. That is what is desperately needed if these communities are to survive and be able to maintain their schools, their roads, their required facilities, their hospitals and all the other things which are necessary components of an adequate standard of living and quality of life, such as cultural, social and recreational institutions.

To the Prairies, and especially to the rural areas, the program of regional economic incentives has been largely a political tool, with the spokesmen of the government paying mere lip service to the real rural problems. The minister gives the impression that his department is not dedicated to the solution of the problems of Prairie rural Canada. However, on the platform he masterfully turns his department into a very useful political selling tool. Here I refer to a speech that the minister made in Meadow Lake, Saskatchewan, early in February when he acknowledged the fact that there are serious problems in the west. However, his speech was full of pious platitudes and consisted basically of political jargon. I submit that if the minister is sincere about coping with the problems, he has within the ambit of the act the necessary framework within which to provide adequate programs to compensate for the problems with which we are now faced.

Adding to the present aggravations is the economic climate which has been developed during the past year because of a policy of tight money and deliberate recession. This has taken its toll in a number of centres. I would like to deal with one such centre which has been dealt a very severe blow, originally because of the department's disregard for much needed assistance to an industry which was an integral part of the community and currently because of the economic climate and the uncertainties which have developed from it. I refer to the community of Two Hills and the phasing-out of the operations of Chemcell Ltd. which provided employment opportunities for some 100 people. The plant there commenced operations in the early fifties. It grew and developed and became a fully integrated part of the community.

In February, 1970, Chemcell announced cutbacks in its operations because of economic circumstances. Also, because new technological methods were discovered, the company would have had to undertake a huge expansion and modernization project in its chlor-alkali operation involving the expenditure of millions of dollars. Because the plan was located on the south bank of the North Saskatchewan River it was ineligible for assistance under ADA. In assessing the situation the company found it could not undertake this massive expansion without some form of assistance and, as a result, decided to phase out that operation, which resulted in the loss of some 30 jobs.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if at this point of time consideration had been given by the government to the matter, it is conceivable that the operation would not only have survived but would have become larger, because there was potential for the manufacture of two other products which would have had the effect of providing more jobs. This in itself has been a serious blow to the people. We now see one year later, on February 23, 1971, that Chemcell announced its intention to close down the plant completely as well as part of its Edmonton operation, causing the loss of some 300 jobs and leaving all those who had been employed in the Two Hills plant jobless. The reasons for the closure were set out in the Edmonton Journal of February 23, 1971, as follows:

> The company placed the blame for its decline in earnings in 1970 on the federal government's anti-inflation measures, continued intense import competition in the chemical fibre and fabric product line, chemical plant problems, escalating costs, the General Motors strike, the unpegging of the Canadian dollar and higher interest costs.

In addition, we were faced with the closing down of the Highland Produce processing plant last summer which employed some 40 native people. That added further to the economic plight of the community. The Highland Produce processing plant was forced to close for economic reasons which were largely prompted by the actions of a vertically integrated co-operative conglomerate. The impact on this community was widespread. The result was some 140 people without jobs in a community of 1,200. If such a rate of unemployment had prevailed in a city like Edmonton, it would have meant that perhaps something like 47,000 people would have been out of work in a community of some 400,000. Surely this is sufficient evidence to establish the need for a positive course of action to alleviate the hardships of communities such as this. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that under the programs of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and, specifically, of the Regional Incentives Development Act, appropriate measures could be introduced. My hon. friend from Battle River has proposed but one.

I believe that my submissions subscribe to the criteria which the minister said would be paramount in establishing designated regions. These include the human factor, the common sense factor and the statistical factor. I submit that the government ought to take positive action to assist these areas. The present legislation under the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has the required flexibility. It has been demonstrated that the program can meet certain needs. My colleague has mentioned the Montreal and Cornwall areas. The hon. member from the Winnipeg area has suggested that if we adopted this measure, it would water the program down too much. Perhaps the program already has been watered down too much. Nevertheless, certain areas of central Canada still need assistance. The government could act if it wanted to and it should: it has the finances; it has the legislative framework. I suppose its only reservation is what political benefit will accrue to the present administration.

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the speeches of the mover and seconder of this private members' notice of motion because I have been involved in similar concerns within my own riding. My riding contains areas which are quite prosperous by Canadian standards and other areas which are far below that standard. I listened very carefully to the speech of the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Downey) and that of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). It seems to me that neither member addressed himself to the fact that in these matters two governments must make a bargain. They should feel fortunate that there is in Alberta a government which seems interested in making a bargain on these matters.

From my observations—I shall deal with this later; and to some extent I fault the department for this—there has been a serious and damaging lack of information concerning the operations of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and this concerns particularly my home province of British Columbia. I must say that judging from what I hear being said at home from time to time, I find it extremely hard to understand some spokesmen of the British Columbia provincial govenment who are criticizing the federal government for inaction in the field or special area designation. I am not, of course, referring to the regional incentives program, Mr. Speaker, which was set up for all provinces, British Columbia included. In our case, the Kootenay regions were established by the federal government as designated areas. This has been very, very helpful to these areas from the point of view of unemployment. But I refer to special area designations.

It seems to me that the spokesman of the provincial government ought to know how this legislation applies.

The other nine provinces do not seem to have any difficulty in understanding the legislation; they seem to understand it well enough. All the other provinces have taken initiatives to bring federal incentive grants into their provinces in order to assist development in the specially designated areas. The most recent province so to benefit was Alberta, the home province of both the hon. member for Battle River and the hon. member for Vegreville, where federal grants are aiding in the establishment of a huge pulp development in the Great Slave Lake region, an area designated by provincial government initiative—I stress this—by provincial government initiative.

So everybody seems to be in step except British Columbia. One wonders why. One also wonders how some British Columbia government spokesmen can bring themselves to suggest to the people of B.C. that it is the federal government which is refusing to establish special areas when they know—and I suggest they must know—that these initiatives everywhere else in Canada begin at the provincial government level.

May I give the House an example of what I mean from my own experience. In my riding of Coast Chilcotin there is a disadvantaged area centering in the community of Lillooet and extending into the riding of the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle). The residents of this area, Indians and non-Indians, spent money from their own slender supply of cash on an economic survey of their area. They were seeking some form of special assistance. They received a letter from the minister of the British Columbia government having responsibility in these matters. He congratulated them on their brief. Then what happened, Mr. Speaker? After the congratulations, nothing happened. There was not one move from the provincial government to inaugurate talks with the federal government in order to get federal aid for that community.

Last summer the provincial government brought to B.C. some federal officials and a tour was made of several areas of B.C. It was suggested that federal assistance of a slightly different nature from that provided in the special areas designation program be supplied to those areas. This resulted, indirectly, in the recent program of special loans to the provinces, in which it will be recalled that the province of B.C. received one of the highest per capita allotments of any province in Canada—roughly speaking, $19 per person, compared with approximately $12 per person in the province of Quebec, another area hard hit by unemployment. In this tour, what attention did the provincial representatives direct toward the Lillooet area? The answer is simple, Mr. Speaker—none! The federal representatives were left to make their own way into the Lillooet area if they wished. There was no provincial initiative.

I do not know if special area designation is the most appropriate form of aid for this region. Possibly there are provisions in the ARDA agreements which could be better applied. However, if the B.C. government's past record of performance in ARDA sets any example, citizens in the Lillooet region had better not hold their breath while waiting for Victoria to act. Practically every cent of federal ARDA funds ever sent into B.C. has gone into a comparatively small part of the province, the dry lands of the Okanagan and the Similkameen area. For the Indian communities there has been nothing as far as I know.

How does this record compare with that of other provinces? I turn to Saskatchewan. That province, Mr. Speaker, far less affluent than B.C. and far smaller in population, has nevertheless undertaken major projects to assist Indian communities under the terms of the ARDA agreement. May I refer to two of them. One is the Cut Bank training scheme, where $1.5 million of federal funds will join local money in providing technical training to Indians. The other is the Last Oak Park project where, with $3 million of federal aid added to Indian band funds and provincial aid, it is proposed to establish a huge and, we hope, profitable recreational area. There was obtained for the assistance of Saskatchewan Indians $4½ million of federal aid, thanks to the energy and initiative of the provincial government.

For the B.C. Indians, nothing has been obtained. Mr. Speaker, British Columbia, under the terms of ARDA, could have taken up $2 million in federal aid by the end of this month. Up until today, I am informed, there have been applications from B.C. for only about $1,200,000 of those funds. There is $800,000 worth of assistance available for which B.C. has not yet even had the energy or the initiative to ask. I am very concerned about the position of the government of British Columbia, particularly when it is related to the attitude of the nine other provinces of Canada, in these matters. I do not hold the Department of Regional Economic Expansion blameless. It is up to this federal department to put the truth of the matter squarely before the people of British Columbia.

In this respect, I am informed that the British Columbia government recently asked the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) to release certain selected correspondence between the two governments on the subject of regional aid. This is not good enough. All the correspondence on this wide subject should be released. All lack of correspondence in relation to any area should thus be revealed to the public. Let there be full disclosure in this matter, Mr. Speaker, because until there is, misinformation and lack of information will dominate the public's attention. The public, particularly the public of British Columbia in this case, deserve to know the facts.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few remarks in response to the mover and seconder of this motion. I think all hon. members, including those like myself who represent major metropolitan centres, have a natural interest in the economic and social development of their areas. It would be very normal to expect many members to seek the inclusion of their constituencies in the designated regions. The mandate laid on the department by Parliament is to look at the highest priority areas in a broad national perspective in order to reduce broad regional disparities across Canada.

In the Atlantic provinces over long periods of time personal incomes persistently run 30 per cent or more below the national average. Persisting over long periods of time, there is unemployment running more than 50 percent above the national average. It is necessary to look at these broad regions and put the scarce resources which are available to this government to work in these and other parts of the country where the highest priorities lie.

The criteria for designation relates to regions where existing productive opportunities are exceptionally inadequate. I do not want to be throwing cold water on the areas that the two members represent, but the economy of the province of Alberta is outrunning the national average. In all fairness to other parts of Canada, and under the mandate of this department, we ought to expect provinces in that kind of economic and financial position to do something about regional disparities within their jurisdiction.

Also, without trying to raise invidious comparisons, in the province of Ontario there is a very major regional development program paralleling the efforts that the federal government is making and filling in where the federal government is not active. There is the same kind of provincial activity in the province of Manitoba where there is a development agency. In Ontario, regional governments are emerging to cope with the development problems of slower growth areas within a rapidly growing provincial economy. Thus, some of the areas that need stimulation require provincial as well as federal action.

What is happening in the province of Alberta? I must disagree with the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) that the department or the government neglects the problems of agriculture. I think we all appreciate the strains on the agricultural economy. Hon. members from urban areas appreciate that a great deal of agricultural legislation is being presented to this House; grain, marketing and dairy legislation, the Farm Credit Corporation Act, the Farm Syndicates Credit Act, and so forth. National efforts are being made to help the agricultural economy to adjust.

Mr. Downey: Will the parliamentary secretary permit a question?

Mr. O'Connell: Not just now. I will accept the question later. Within the Department of Regional Economic Expansion there is concern for a major rural area in the southern part of Alberta, not just Medicine Hat but the whole band across the southern part of Alberta—Brooks, Drumheller, Medicine Hat and Lethbridge. This is an opportunity to help in rural adjustment and to attract industry to diversify, as suggested by the hon. member for Vegreville, and form growth poles other than Calgary and Edmonton. There is, therefore, a special concept of assistance to those rural towns in Alberta and it has been paying off, not only in Lethbridge but in other centres. Hon. members will recognize the truth of this if they look at the industrial incentive offers that have been made in Alberta. Many of the industries are based on local resources, meat packing, potato growing and other resources which are of considerable interest to the rural economy.

The hon. member would like to ask a question. I would like to hear it before we close.

Mr. Downey: Is the parliamentary secretary aware that the industrial grants only amount to 10 per cent, whereas there is the possibility of a 50 per cent grant under the federal dual incentives? There is a rundown condition in the rural areas, even though the oil business in Alberta may have stimulated the general economy to some extent. The rural areas are just as depressed as anywhere else. In view of this, does the parliamentary secretary not think there is a pressing necessity—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has expired, and I now leave the Chair.

[English]

Those of us who have endured the recent hardships of a long, white winter were quickly turned to dreaming of the joys of spring when charming young ladies presented us earlier with yellow daffodils from Victoria. I was reminded of some lines I had read as a schoolboy; they are by William Wordsworth:

I wandered lonely as a cloud
That floats on high o'er vale and hill
When all at once I saw a crowd,
A host, of golden daffodils.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DISCHARGE OF POLLUTANTS BY SHIPS

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-2, to amend the Canada Shipping Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Special Committee on Environmental Pollution.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Boulanger: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) is disappearing. Where are all the Socialists this evening?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I believe we are on Bill C-2.

Mr. Bell: Explain.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is entitled "An act to amend the Canada Shipping Act". I also believe that we are at the report stage and considering an amendment proposed by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett), amendment No. 3 at the back of today's Order Paper.

Mr. Boulanger: You don't say! Tell us something really new.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If my hon. friends opposite would be a little more helpful with their interjections, it would be appreciated; or if one or two hon. members opposite would volunteer to assist us in asking for a recorded vote on this amendment, then of course my speech could go down the drain. This is a day of much activity in Ottawa and on Parliament Hill. As hon. members are aware, the Canadian Labour Congress is entertaining members of all parties at the Civic Centre, so the ranks are pretty thin on the government side of the House, as well as over here. However, in a few minutes we shall have the required number—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps I should help the hon. gentleman by interrupting him for a moment to suggest that at this point he might address himself to the bill before the House, and move from the Chateau Laurier to the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am very happy to do that, Mr. Speaker, and if you have any further interjections they will help me out, too. I might say that you are really asking me to move from the Civic Centre to the House of Commons, because it is at the Civic Centre that the CLC reception is taking place.

Seriously, Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the amendment is to extend the area of the waters of our oceans over which Canada will take responsibility for the prevention of pollution. As hon. members are aware, the bill that is before us, in the form it came back from the committee, provides in subclause 2 on page 3 four areas wherein the regulations would apply.

• (8:10 p.m.)

Mr. McGrath: Would you read them for us?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, I would be very happy to do that. It provides:

> Except where otherwise provided in this part or in any regulation made thereunder, this part and any regulation made thereunder apply
> (a) to all Canadian waters south of the sixtieth parallel of north latitude—

Mr. Boulanger: Where is that?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) in his proposed amendment does not change that. Paragraph (a) of subclause 2 would be the same under the proposed amendment as it is under the bill as it stands. Having said that, I should say a little more in order for these remarks to make sense. Paragraph (a) stays as it is and the present paragraph (c), regarding the fishing zones of Canada, becomes paragraph (b). The present paragraph (d) stays as it was. My friend from Comox-Alberni writes in a new paragraph which takes the place of the present paragraph (b), but it becomes (c). It is that paragraph that calls for us to extend our control and concern over the waters surrounding this country to the extent of 100 miles. That is what this amendment is all about.

Obviously, there is much more involved than I could say but it is obvious that at this point it is not necessary for me to do so. I hope the amendment of my hon. friend will receive the support of the House so that this effort of mine will have been worth while.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks in respect of the amendment of my colleague.

An hon. Member: You are not even prepared.

Mr. Rose: I am sorry that I did not hear the comment from across the House. It appears to me that at least one hon. heckler over there is a boy soprano, and the next time I form a choir I will get in touch with him right away.

In any event, I should like to support the amendment of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett). I referred to this matter during my speech on second reading of this bill back in October of last year. This is particularly pertinent for a number of reasons which my hon. friend covered at great length this afternoon. I am not prepared to repeat his arguments because I feel he covered the subject comprehensively. He dealt with every possible facet of the bill and I think the House will forgive me if tonight I do not repeat all those arguments.

What concerned us last October, and this concerns us now, is the problem of tremendous ecological violation that might be caused by the spillage of oil through negligence or accident because of the increasing concentration of oil tankers off our shores. I think it might be important to remind the House that the probability of oil tanker spillage is not isolated. Let me document the facts. I am quoting from a publication of the Canadian Scientific Society for Pollution and Environmental Control. It was founded in Vancouver but is now moving toward being a national organization. This publication maintains that while the Torrey Canyon grounding off the British coast, and the Arrow off the Nova Scotia coast, represent tremendous pollution problems, they were not the only ones of importance in the last two years. They were disasters to ecology, but there have been many others.

The brief points out that on February 13, the Delian Apollon struck the side of the ship channel approaching

St. Petersburg, Florida, gashed its hull and released large quantities of bunker C fuel. That was on February 13. On March 3, the 58,000 ton Liberian tanker Oceanic Grandeur was holed in Torres Strait. The report of this Liberian tanker amazed me somewhat because I was not sure they had a marine navy, or whether this involved another matter of international flags of convenience such as the ship off Chedabucto Bay. On May 5, the oil tanker Polycommander caught fire off the coast of Spain and its cargo of 150,000 tons escaped into the sea. The Spanish motorship Monte Ulia rammed a jetty of Mobil's Coryton refinery in the Thames estuary, fracturing a pipeline and releasing 400,000 kilograms of oil into the sea. On October 23, the tankers Pacific Glory and Allegro collided near the Isle of Wight. The Pacific Glory was left stranded, and burned for two days. Also in October, the tanker Manhattan, which is the tanker that attempted to prove the Northwest Passage was usable by tankers, ran aground with a full cargo of 108,000 tons in the Persian Gulf.

The figures I have mentioned document the severity of this problem. We can envisage now the situation we will face with the development of the transshipment of oil by tankers. Obviously it is increasing. More and more people are becoming concerned about this fact. There is a greater army of environmentalists being mobilized to protect what they regard as our ecological future, future life on this planet. This threat has become of greater concern because of public hearings about the proposed Alaskan pipeline from Prudhoe Bay to Valdez. If this is authorized by the Department of the Interior, we will have not just one or two tankers coming down the west coast of Canada but a tremendous concentration.

In supporting the motion of my hon. friend, let me say that the motion implies that if we can keep these tankers far enough off our shores we will have some hope of averting a serious ecological disaster on the west coast. I am sure some hon. members on the other side of the House will say that 100 miles is extending the distance too far out in respect of Canadian sovereignty. Let me point out that this is not an isolated recommendation. Many other spokesmen have suggested that this problem should be viewed in consideration of the danger of disaster to the ecology of our Arctic area. I feel it would be of great service to the world if we moved unilaterally in declaring this kind of standard for our whole coastline as we have for the Arctic. I am convinced that a more moderate ecological zone would be no less sensitive in marine disasters than the Arctic.

In supporting this amendment, I think we are implying the knowledge that there will be disasters as long as oil is transshipped through pipelines to tankers and from tankers to oil refineries. Surely we can maintain sufficient safety standards to ensure that the kind of disaster which will ultimately happen is minimized and delayed as long as possible. We can delay this through rigourous safety standards. Certainly we can ensure that any ship whose cargo is bunker oil is equipped with the proper navigational aids and the kind of internal construction that will minimize the risk to our environment involved in an oil spill occurring not through an act of God but through negligence or accident.

As Dr. McTaggart-Cowan, who was in charge of the Arrow clean-up pointed out, if we can establish corridors for the transportation of our air traffic, certainly it would be easier to establish similar fixed corridors for the transportation of oil. We should ensure that pilots who are familiar with the region are required, as a matter of course, to make certain that any carrier of this potentially serious kind of pollutant does not take shortcuts and thus incur risks.

Dr. McTaggart-Cowan has a very interesting set of figures which he revealed to this House on November 5, 1970, in his report. Of the need for traffic control, Dr. McTaggart-Cowan says:

> The world record is appalling. I have firm figures for the last six months of 1969. Six hundred thousand tons of tanker went to the bottom. That is the equivalent of roughly 33 Arrows—

Mr. Speaker, we are really only beginning to transport oil by tanker. There are some tankers now of 50,000 tons and up to 100,000 tons. There are tankers on the drawing boards which will run as high as 500,000 and 600,000 tons. When we consider the possible devastation, it is no wonder my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni suggests we keep these tankers as far as possible off the Canadian west coast. Someone will say that you can keep them 100 miles off the Canadian west coast, but what will you do when they come into international waters around Puget Sound adjacent to the estuaries of important rivers, notably the Fraser, and probably enter what are the only Mediterranean-type climate seas in Canada? My reply is that we would like to ensure the minimal possibility of damage.

If we have stringent enough regulations in respect of the construction of tankers which travel from Valdez, Alaska, to Cherry Point—if that is where the tankers are to be used—at least we can be reasonably certain that when they get into the international waters of Puget Sound, where devastation could be, to coin a phrase, devastating, at least from that point of view we would have done all in our power to maintain the kind of safety standards which I believe are demanded by this growing threat to marine environment.

We know the minister went to Brussels last year. He was rebuked. The companies which dominate IMCO told him they would not agree to the kind of international convention the minister put forward. The minister came home and said in effect, "We will go it alone". The minister has gone it alone at least out to 12 miles. We would like to see the minister at sea more than 12 miles. We have seen the minister at sea a number of times in this House. We would like to see him much further out, for the reasons I have mentioned.

Mr. Jamieson: It is only you people who can walk on the water.

Mr. Rose: I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that some of us whom the minister regards as lightweights could walk on the water, but there is no possible chance for the minister to walk on the water. His feet are too small, Mr. Speaker.

We know IMCO is dominated by the shipping companies, and we know IMCO will not voluntarily improve the safety standards of the ships of its members. What we need here is a really tough bill. The lobby will come to the committee, as it did, and tell us that if we do this or that we will not get the number of tankers, in the quantities we need for offshore oil, even coming to Canada.

We know perfectly well that if there is a profit to be made, these ships will be here. They will come into Dartmouth, the Burrard Inlet and anywhere they can make a buck. I am quite sure Canada can take a substantial world lead as it did in respect of Arctic sovereignty and the Arctic pollution bill. It can take a tremendous lead in this respect to improve the kind of safety standards available in order to make shipping all over the world more safe. I am not going into the matter of flags of convenience and people hiding behind the same, preventing us from finding out who owns a ship such as the Arrow. I will say, however, in respect of unlimited liability, that shipping companies and insurance companies will not assume the liability. It will be assumed by the general public. If there should be an oil spill off Vancouver Island, guess who will assume the liability?

An hon. Member: Canada.

Mr. Rose: Certainly. I am glad to hear from the senator on the other side: he has answered my question. Why should the people of Canada assume that liability? There is no reason for it. Not very many people realize that the world's sea life regenerates on the tide flats and river estuaries and these are precisely the areas which are being most threatened now by the Prudhoe Bay deal. We need a good, tough bill and a good, tough minister who will say he agrees that we need to extend our jurisdiction for pollution control purposes beyond the 12-mile spit that was described earlier today to a reasonable distance so that Canadians can rest assured that their minister, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), of whom they are so proud, will take a leading role in this very important problem.

Mr. Speaker, I know the minister has been convinced, because I saw him attempt to rise a moment ago. I am looking forward to his remarks as soon as I sit down.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to ask some questions of the minister regarding the recent announcement of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) concerning the 12-mile limit. I will not detain the House long. I want to know from the minister exactly what new government policy has been invoked by the announcement of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry last Thursday in the House when he said the following in reply to a question. I quote from page 3741 of Hansard:

> A ruling has been made that all Canadian trawlers must stay outside 12 miles from shore, and this applies particularly off the west coast of Newfoundland. These rules applying to our own trawlers will automatically apply to all foreign vessels as well.

There is a certain amount of misunderstanding in Newfoundland with respect to this question. I am sure the minister has read the Newfoundland weekend papers, as I have, and he will readily admit that the misunderstanding is there. Perhaps this might be a good opportunity to clear up that misunderstanding, because the 12-mile limit issue is relevant to the amendment now before the House; indeed, it is relevant to the whole act since the operative clauses of the act apply within the areas defined as the 12-mile limit.

The question I would put to the minister is: What arrangement has been made with the French authorities with respect to their jurisdiction over the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon? Can we hope there has been agreement with the government of France in this regard? Perhaps, also, he can define what the agreement is and how we get around the fact that the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon are within 12 miles of the coast of Newfoundland at one point, making the drawing of the 12-mile limit following the sinuosity of the coastline almost impossible without some arrangement with the government of France.

There is no question, of course, about the west coast of Newfoundland, and nobody questions it at all; it is a very simple matter. But when you get to the south coast of Newfoundland, taking in most of the minister's own constituency, this is where the problem arises and this is where a great deal of foreign fishing activities take place. This is where the great winter fishery takes place, and this is the area of great difficulty, the one area which poses a real dilemma to the government of Canada with respect to the 1964 statute.

To clear up the misunderstanding that is in my mind at present and which appears to be prevalent in Newfoundland also, perhaps the minister might want to take this opportunity to clarify what seems to be a rather ambiguous situation. My question very simply is: Do we have a 12-mile limit off the south coast of Newfoundland and, if so, what arrangements have been made with the government of France?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in so far as the question of the hon. member relates to fisheries lines and to the whole question of the limit relating to fisheries, it would be more appropriate for the hon. member to put the question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, who has responsibility in the matter and who is in day to day touch with it. I have a special and direct concern in so far as the pollution issue is concerned. However, I will try to elaborate and to enlighten the hon. member, with the qualification that I hope he will understand that it is purely and simply a layman's interpretation and that I am merely giving him my understanding of the situation. If it happens that the legal position is somewhat different, I am sure he and all hon. members will understand.

As to whether or not there is a 12-mile limit off the south coast of Newfoundland, the short answer is yes, for the majority of the distance from, let us say, Cape Ray or Port aux Basques, generally speaking, along the south coast eastward. There is, of course, as the hon. member knows, the geographic problem that roughly speaking off Placentia Bay there are the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon which are the property of France. So that in terms of the area between what might be described as the northern coast of St. Pierre, that is, the coast of St. Pierre nearest to Newfoundland and the southern part of the Newfoundland coast—if my hon. friend can visualize what I mean—according to the conventional way of drawing any sort of national lines or fisheries lines, the distance is equidistant between the two territories which in the event belong to different countries, that is, on the inside part.

So if you can still visualize the map, it would mean that as one approached from the west, coming east along the south coast of Newfoundland at the point where St. Pierre occurs from a geographic point of view, the line would be equidistant between St. Pierre and Newfoundland. This leaves a region on the southern part of the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, and here I would assume—I have to remind hon. members, again, that I am not a legal authority in these matters—that whatever the French government's position is with regard to territorial waters, presumably they would assert that as being their territorial waters in any part of their coastline which did not have a relationship to the coastline of Newfoundland, that is, where the Atlantic Ocean is beyond that. That, as I understand it, is the position, although I do emphasize again that this is purely a laymen's judgment.

On the question of the application of this act in the area relating to St. Pierre, neither I nor, to my knowledge, the government of Canada had any direct negotiations with the government of France with regard to pollution matters. The hon. member may recall that he asked me a somewhat similar question during the second reading of this bill and I replied that we had a more or less ad hoc arrangement with the government of St. Pierre, in the local sense, that we would assist them in the event that there was a pollution problem around their coastline.

I believe basically that is the position as it exists at present. With regard to this measure, I would certainly be prepared, in so far as my own responsibilities extend, to determine whether or not the government of France acting through its representatives on the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon would be interested in making some sort of arrangement with us from a pollution standpoint which would have the effect of closing what is at least a theoretical gap in the lines, although in practical terms it is not my opinion that this would be a serious problem for us in the event of an oil spill in that region.

I say this because I believe common sense would prevail over other considerations and that under the normal rules, if none other than those of decency, we would assist each other in the event of an oil spill or the threat of an oil spill in that area. But in an effort to formalize such an arrangement I would be quite prepared to explore, through the usual channels of the Department of External Affairs and the government of France, the willingness of that government to work with us jointly on this matter.

I regret that I cannot be more explicit in terms of marine law for the benefit of hon. members, but I hope that what I have said clarifies the matter to some extent. To the best of my knowledge, it does constitute the correct situation.

While I am on my feet, I believe, with regard to the amendment that is before the House, that I cannot do better than reflect the views expressed this afternoon by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse), that is, to say that at present a unilateral decision on the part of Canada to extend its jurisdiction below the sixtieth parallel to 100 miles would be totally unacceptable to the international community. It would not in fact be observed, in our opinion. The wisest course, we believe, is to continue on the way we have been going up to now, and that is to attempt to negotiate with the international community some sort of agreement that will in fact solve the problem which has been quite properly defined by the hon. member who proposed this amendment and by those who have supported it.

There is no question about the fact that it would be advisable and useful to have some form of international agreement to cope with the potential situation to which they have referred. I recall that one hon. member said this afternoon that there is no magic in 100 miles. That is quite true. If we were to have a major oil spill 200, 300 or even 500 miles off our coast, it is by no means inconceivable that the oil could end up right on the coast, ours probably being the longest coastline in the world.

Whilst there may be a certain degree of satisfaction in asserting this form a nationalistic point of view, it is my opinion that it would serve no useful purpose at the present time. Indeed, quite the contrary; I suspect it would slow down significantly the sizeable progress made in the last few months on the matter of international agreements.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Jamieson: By all means.

Mr. Baldwin: Before the minister concludes his remarks, would it be possible for him to fill us in as far as possible—I realize that there are impediments to so doing—on what is happening in the international field and the extent to which we in this country might look ahead? We are all vitally interested.

Mr. Jamieson: Well, Mr. Speaker, this is probably as good a time as any. As the hon. member will know from following the news for the last six months, there has been a marked softening in the attitude of the shipping nations. Some of it was not reflected in the representations made before our committee, but nevertheless I am quite satisfied that the action taken by the House in giving unanimous first and second reading to this bill has been effective.

There was a clear determination in committee that something must be done in this field. As a result, we have seen initiatives taken by the international oil companies in the form of much larger insurance funds than they held previously. In fact, they have increased their contributions to this pool of money quite significantly and are now prepared to do much more than they were when we went to Brussels in the fall of 1969. In addition, there has been greatly increased activity in the United States in regard to anti-pollution measures. Not only the federal government but several individual states have taken action against this type of threat to the ecology and the shorelines.

For obvious reasons I cannot give particulars, but I can assure the House of a definite movement toward more international co-operation. We have indicated our anxiety to go along with this by establishing bases in this bill which will put us on all fours with the Brussels convention. We are remaining within the international community rather than taking unilateral action. I do not suggest that it is possible or even likely that we will get everything we want within a year or two, but I have not the slightest doubt that the weight of public opinion is with us. I may say that our information indicates some commendation among concerned people in the governments of many countries for the actions we have taken.

I might point out to the hon. member who moved the amendment that his party was dubious about the Arctic sovereignty bill and about the extent to which Canada ought to move unilaterally outside the general framework of international law. At that particular moment it was felt that it was suitable and proper to do so. In a situation such as this I can assure the House that there would be no acceptance. Furthermore, we would be asserting something which would be virtually beyond our power to control.

During second reading in this House and before the committee I pointed out that to extend our territorial waters by 100 miles would be to bisect some of the major shipping lines of the world. Thus we would be asserting our authority over what for many centuries have been established sea lanes. I am not suggesting that there should not be this kind of authority; I am suggesting that we must continue to take the lead to get international agreements to police these sea lanes and to identify routes along which ships such as tankers should be permitted to travel. I believe we will have far more success in this way than if we seek to "do it" alone.

Finally, let me point out that historically the greatest threat is within the territorial waters of a country. There is always the danger of collision at sea, of course, but if one looks at the history of the events to which the hon. member referred, all of them occurred within a comparatively short distance of the shore. In the San Francisco incident the two ships were coming into harbour. We believe that the major threat of accident at the present time lies within the 12-mile limit, so I do not feel there is any impediment to effective action in establishing what we have in this bill. I believe this to be entirely defensible in the international community, and I think we should move for the kind of safeguards which I feel are essential but which I feel can only be achieved through international co-operation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising for the purpose of asking a question?

Mr. Rose: Yes, Mr. Speaker; I should like to ask the minister a question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member can do this only if the minister allows the question, because the minister has the floor.

Mr. Rose: I understand from the minister that he agrees to the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will realize that we are not in committee. He has the right to ask a question if the minister is prepared to reply to it as part of his speech. The hon. member cannot rise and continue debate in committee style when the Speaker is in the chair.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I have no wish to deny the hon. member a question, but I suggest that he make it brief so that we can get on with the measure before the House.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, the minister suggested that members of this party were dubious about the Arctic sovereignty bill. I should like to ask the minister to look at the record and to—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is not a question. The hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) is making a statement: he would like the minister to look up the record. Obviously, that is not a question and it seems to me that the hon. member is now looking for a way to make a statement. He has already spoken on the subject.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the minister, if he would allow it.

Mr. Jamieson: Fine, Mr. Speaker, but I would suggest to the hon. member that Your Honour has already indicated that we are not in committee of the whole. The hon. member has had his 40 minutes. However, I will accept the question if he wishes.

Mr. Barnett: I ask the minister whether the United States have accepted Canada's jurisdiction so far as the 12-mile limit on the territorial sea is concerned, inasmuch as he said that the actions we are taking under this bill are acceptable to the international community.

Mr. Jamieson: To answer briefly, Mr. Speaker, I think there is a difference between acceptance in the wholly formal sense of the word and agreement in the informal sense of the word. What I said was that there is adequate precedent in terms of the 12-mile limit for us to be quite sure it will not be challenged, and that generally speaking it will be accepted without question.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question? The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I did not hear all of the minister's statement. I rise for the purpose of saying that I do not think the people on the Pacific Coast will feel too reassured by the statements which have been made by the minister. It is all very well for him to talk about the possibilities of international agreement and of being able to get some satisfactory arrangements made at a conference of the sea. The fact remains that British Columbia faces a very real prospect of a pollution threat if plans are carried out for building the pipeline from the north shore of Alaska to Valdez and transshipping oil from Valdez to Cherry Point, down the west coast of Vancouver island and through the Straits of Juan de Fuca.

The minister may not be satisfied with the amendment. I would have hoped that the minister would himself have asked Parliament to give him and his department adequate powers to deal with this situation. The situation, to some extent, is on a par with the action which the government took one year ago with respect to the Arctic. I refer to the speech which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made in the House of Commons on October 24, 1969. He said, as reported at page 39 of Hansard:

> We do not doubt for a moment that the rest of the world would find us at fault, and hold us liable, should we fail to ensure adequate protection of that environment from pollution or artificial deterioration. Canada will not permit this to happen either in the name of freedom of the seas, or in the interests of economic development. We have viewed with dismay the abuse elsewhere of both these laudable principles and are determined not to bow in the Arctic to the pressures of any state. In saying this, we are aware of the difficulties faced in the past by other countries in controlling water pollution and marine destruction within their own jurisdiction.

If the minister has any doubts about the position that this party took with respect to that legislation, he need only look at the record. Our criticism of the government was that it did not immediately concur in the report of the standing committee that had recommended to the House that the government should declare sovereignty not only over the Arctic Islands but the Arctic waters. That was our criticism. We thought the government should have gone further than merely declaring its jurisdiction with respect to pollution control. There can be no doubt about our support for the action which the government took in going as far as it did. We wished it had gone further. Nevertheless, in so far as the government declared that it reserved the right to take the necessary action to control shipping in so far as that shipping might pollute the waters of the Arctic, we supported the government fully.

We think that the same principle ought to apply here. We are not suggesting that the government should have the right to interfere with the west coast sea lanes. What we are saying is that if oil tankers are to ply the waters between Alaska and the United States, and if they are to pass through Canadian coastal waters and come close to Canadian territory, then the Canadian government should declare, through regulations passed under the Canada Shipping Act, under what conditions those ships will ply those sea routes and what must be the state and condition of the ships as related to the type of cargo.

Ships ought to be required to file the routes which they propose to take, so that in case of fog other ships could be warned as to their location. All the precautions that are possible and need to be taken should be taken to protect the waters off the Pacific coast. Everyone knows, of course, that notwithstanding all the precautions taken, accidents can still occur. The fact remains, nevertheless, that a great many precautions could be taken. Regulations should be enforced. If there are no regulations in this field, conditions imposed will not have any effect.

I do not need to tell the minister about this matter because he knows from experience what happened in Chedabucto Bay. The grounding or sinking of a large tanker anywhere off the west coast of Vancouver Island or in the Straits of Juan de Fuca would pollute that entire area, could destroy one of the most valuable fishing zones in the world and could pollute some of the finest beaches and recreational centres to be found on the North American continent. Surely, therefore, we do not ask too much when we ask that in this legislation there be the necessary powers by which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) can lay down the terms and conditions under which ships carrying pollutants can operate if they are to come within 100 miles of the Canadian western shoreline or if they are destined for ports close to Canada.

The minister says that we will work this out through international law. Yet the fact remains that there is no clearcut international law in this field. The Americans have a three-mile limit; other countries impose limits running all the way from four miles to 200 miles offshore. A wide variety of areas have been established over which coastal states have jurisdiction. As I pointed out in a speech I made last year on the question of sovereignty over the Arctic area, nations in the past who wished to protect their own interests have faced this problem and acted unilaterally. As a result of their acting unilaterally, other nations have followed suit. Then a Conference of the Sea has taken place and a convention has been established. That has happened again and again.

The United States, which might be one of the countries to complain, has again and again taken unilateral action. I think reference has already been made to the Truman declaration of 1945 in which the United States unilaterally declared exclusive control of resources of the continental shelf, which in such cases as the Bering Sea extends for several hundred miles. This proclamation of course did not prohibit ships from sailing in these waters or fishing in them; but it did reserve the resources of the sea bed for the United States for some 250 miles off the east coast and some 60 miles off the west coast of that country. As a result of this action which the United States took on its own initiative, the continental shelf doctrine was accepted by the other nations of the world.

In the same year, the Truman administration in the United States declared that if the United States of its own initiative decided to exercise the right to regulate and control the fishing industry for purposes of conservation, then it had that right even on certain areas of the high seas where other nationals were fishing. It maintained and exercised that right. As a matter of fact, before the United States became a great oil shipping nation, as far back as 1926 that country proposed at a Conference of the Sea a convention which would prohibit the discharge of oil into the sea. Later, the United States began to ship oil. It objected when other nations wanted to impose this type of prohibition. I point these things out merely to suggest to the minister that if he is going to be timid and wait until there is international agreement, until somebody else takes the initiative and until there is finally a Conference of the Sea, he may wait for a long time.

In the meantime, the people of British Columbia may be the victims of the government's hesitancy. We are appealing to the minister to assume these necessary powers now. We have sufficient confidence in the minister that he will not exercise these powers in an arbitrary manner and upset shipping on the high seas. The minister should seek the necessary authority in Parliament to declare that Canada will impose conditions by regulation to which ships carrying oil or other pollutants coming close to the Canadian coastline must abide. That is all. Surely the minister needs some kind of powers to do that.

Mr. Jamieson: Do you consider 100 miles to be close?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I consider that 100 miles is a reasonable area. Possibly the minister thinks that 50 miles is more reasonable and wants to suggest that. Ships will come down from Alaska, go out past the west coast of Vancouver Island and then have to swing in around Canadian territory to get to Cherry Point. The minister ought to have some power to exercise control over those ships.

It is no secret that some oil tankers operated under the flags of various nations are not the most seaworthy vessels. I have seen some come into the harbours in my constituency where it was possible to knock out part of the bulkhead with a hammer because they were so rusty, old and decrepit. How seaworthy are they? How safe are they to be sailing our waters, when if they begin to leak they could pollute the entire coastline and destroy the livelihood of the fishermen on the west coast of British Columbia?

If the minister is not prepared to accept this amendment, I hope he will be prepared to suggest the kind of powers which he thinks he requires in order to keep the danger of polluting the west coast of Canada to a minimum. No one can guarantee we will not have any pollution as a result of an accident at sea, but there could be regulations regarding the seaworthiness and condition of ships, navigational aids, filing of the route they are going to follow and a series of provisions that would at least reduce the hazard and thereby lessen the risk.

I think the minister ought to be prepared to at least do that. If he is not going to do it, he must accept the responsibility if in one, two or three years there is a major wreck of an oil tanker or some other catastrophe on the west coast of British Columbia. That is a responsibility which I, personally, would not want to assume. I do not think the minister is going to be burdened by asking Parliament for this authority. He can then sit down with his officials and with those who are knowledgeable on this subject to work out the kind of regulations which would be necessary to keep to the absolute minimum the danger of pollution from a wreck.

I hope the minister will be prepared to reconsider his decision, be bold and take the initiative in declaring Canada's right to exercise jurisdiction and control in so far as controlling pollution is concerned. I am convinced that if the minister takes that bold action, not only Canadians but other coastal states will support him. In time we will have a Convention of the Sea which will endorse the position the minister should be taking. Surely it would be better for the minister to take the initiative than to placidly wait until somebody else manages to persuade the other coastal states to agree to such a measure.

The government had the courage to declare its authority with respect to pollution control in the Arctic. Surely it is equally important, if not more important, that it exercise the same jurisdiction with respect to the much more settled areas of Canada, namely, the Atlantic and Pacific coastlines.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question? The question is on the amendment of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11), the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Canada Shipping Act

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova) moved:

That Bill C-2, to amend the Canada Shipping Act, be amended in clause 2 by striking out the word "oil" on line 36 at page 23, lines 1, 12, 14, 16, 19, 26, 29, 30, 33 and 38 at page 24, and lines 11, 30 and 33 at page 25 and substituting therefor the word "pollutant".

He said: Mr. Speaker, this amendment is quite simple. It merely changes the word "oil" to "pollutant". Hon. members who have not followed the committee's reports will, I am sure, agree that it sounds quite simple. Frankly, it is simple. The amendment I moved this afternoon was accepted by the minister. I hope this amendment receives the same treatment.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that money is required to fight pollution. The amendment deals specifically with the clause which relates to the maritime claims fund. While I was absent from the proceedings in the committee on February 11 the chairman introduced a couple of amendments and described them as a joint effort of myself and another member. This is one of them. It was moved in the committee but the committee chose to accept one which provided that the Governor in Council might make regulations prescribing pollutants other than oil. This is well and good.

We have had experience of certain pollutants which are, or could be, detrimental to our waters. Nevertheless, the regulations have not yet been brought forward. At least, this was the situation on February 11. But the whole bill depends upon regulations of some sort, regulations with respect to ship construction, the security of tanks used to transport liquids, and so on. In consequence, we do not yet know what substances the government considers to be pollutants and what it does not.

As I say, money is needed to fight pollution. The government therefore proposes to set up a fund which could be used to clean up whatever mess is caused should there be an accident or incident. Most of the witnesses who appeared before the committee expressed concern about this clause, about the proposed levy and about the claims fund. They feared that if the levy were set too high, the companies concerned would simply pass the costs over to the consumers.

I am surprised that more attention has not been paid to this bill, since it is a measure which affects international interests. It is proposed to place a levy upon oil or other pollutants and, as we know, our imports and exports are carried almost entirely by foreign vessels in the absence of what might be called a viable Canadian shipping industry. Sections of the oil industry have expressed their concern about the provisions dealing with the claims fund and it may be the levy will be detrimental to Canadian industry. In these circumstances we should take a close look at the clause before us.

I do not believe the blame for pollution should be laid entirely on the oil industry. In the last year or so there have been cases of pollution by phosphorous, for example. Phosphorous is being transported in Canadian waters. Insecticides and pesticides are being transported through Canadian waters, not only in the Pacific and the Atlantic but the Great Lakes. Thus, there are other pollutants which should be required to bear a portion of this charge; the levy should not be limited to oil. I refer to an incident on the St. Lawrence close to Montreal last year which caused some alarm.

The argument used in committee against this amendment was a simple one. Hon. members will find it stated on page 1563 of the committee report for February 11. Mr. Macgillivray was answering for the department; he was really the only departmental witness, because the minister only attended once and the parliamentary secretary did not become a witness. When we asked whether pollutants other than oil should not also be the subject of a levy in connection with the fund, Mr. Macgillivray suggested it was not very practicable because the amount of the levy could not exceed 15 cents per ton. The committee eventually accepted a compromise of sorts to the extent that pollutants could be prescribed by regulation.

As the bill is presently written, it seems to me there is no limit to the size of the fund which could be built up, nor do we know how large a sum the government will require. When, if ever, will it cease collecting this levy of 15 cents per ton? Would it be suspended if, for example, it were found that sufficient funds had been accumulated to take care of any spill which might reasonably be expected? I should like to know whether this is being kept in mind, because in these hard times there is no need to tax industry too heavily simply for the sake of doing so, especially if there is to be a detrimental effect upon the Canadian economy.

I find it hard to argue this amendment. If I argue too strongly in favour of it, hon. members will think I am not really interested in protecting the environment but am more interested in protecting the interests of industry. But it seems to me there must be a reasonable balance somewhere; we cannot always kick industry around. In other words, we must take some responsibility.

Let me look at some of the funds presently in existence. Other funds have been set up for the same purpose as the maritime claims fund; for example, there is the CRISTAL fund, and there is also TOVALOP. On January 14, 1971, the Oil Companies Institute for Marine Pollution Compensation Limited issued a press release dealing with this problem. Perhaps Your Honour will permit me to read a couple of paragraphs so that the House knows what these funds involve:

A number of leading oil companies of the world signed a voluntary agreement in New York today—

That was on January 14, one month ago.

—as a further step by the industry to help fight pollution of the oceans from oil spills from tankers and at the same time announced formation of an institute to administer it. The agreement supplements ship owners' liability by providing for compensation up to $30 million per incident involving participating companies and is expected to become effective April 1st.

The newly formed Oil Companies Institute for Marine Pollution Compensation Limited would administer the funds contributed by participating oil companies. These funds would be used to compensate claimants for oil pollution damage beyond the liability of tanker owners, including reimbursement of the cost of cleaning up such oil spills.

Today's agreement, known as CRISTAL (Contract Regarding an Interim Supplement to Tanker Liability for Oil Pollution), supplements a previous anti-pollution insurance program in which tanker owners participate. The earlier agreement, known as TOVALOP (Tanker Owners Voluntary Agreement Concerning Liability for Oil Pollution), was signed in 1969 and imposed responsibility upon participating tanker owners for reimbursing governments to a maximum of $10 million per incident for cleaning up of oil spills. TOVALOP covers over 80 per cent of the world's tanker tonnage.

Thus, in the case of an oil spill from a TOVALOP tanker, CRISTAL will supplement the tanker owner's responsibility to an over-all total of $30 million provided the cargo belongs to a participating company.

So there are funds in existence at the moment and most oil companies participate in them. The problem is that the compensation comes from one source only; you cannot claim compensation from several sources. The CRISTAL agreement to which I referred a moment ago provides that where national funds are established—for example, the maritime claims fund—compensation is available only to the extent that the national fund is unable to cover the cost.

Thus, if the proposed maritime pollution claims fund were established in Canada, financed by Canadian oil companies and hence indirectly by Canadian consumers, Canada would be denying herself the full benefits of the other funds, CRISTAL and TOVALOP, the financing of which will be contributed to on a worldwide basis, not only by Canadian industry. Therefore, it seems to me that under these circumstances it becomes highly questionable whether the establishment of this fund is in Canada's best interests. I am not saying that a fund should not be set up; I am just pointing out some of the matters, that give me concern, without taxing industry to the extent that it cannot cope. There was some evidence in the committee that industry cannot cope. I know one company in New England has been talking about levying a charge of 3 per cent, whereas others have thought of levying a charge of 15 cents per ton of oil carried. If a Canadian company is called upon to pay 15 cents a ton as well as three cents at a U.S. port, then quite frankly I do not know how the industry will manage.

The word "pollutant" as a general term is well defined in the definition clause of this bill. I suggest that if the amendment were accepted we would be able to increase the fund. However, after it reaches a certain limit I would hope contributions would cease or, failing that, at least the levy would be reduced to ease the burden on industry. I realize that this fund needs to be built up quickly in case a spill occurs next year, for example. As far as the famous Arrow incident on the east coast is concerned, the minister has mentioned that Canada was billed for something like $2 million to $3 million and I presume we are going to be taxed for that bill. I wonder why this is necessary since TOVALOP was in existence at that time and now there is CRISTAL. Why did the government not ask the company involved, which I am sure belongs to this fund, to pay for the cost of cleaning up this oil spill, rather than asking Canadian taxpayers to foot the bill?

The argument that we will not be tagged again with this type of bill does not stand alone; the great majority of oil companies belong to one of the two funds to which I have referred. I hope that the minister will consider this amendment and accept it. Failing that, I trust he will assure the House that the consumers of this country will not again have to bear such an expense. If the cost of cleaning up a spill is too high, this is what will happen.

As I mentioned, the amendment would have the effect of increasing the fund at an accelerated rate. This fund should be reviewed, as suggested before the committee by Mr. Macgillivray, after a certain length of time. Once the fund reaches a certain limit I would hope that the levies would be suspended or at least reduced. If there is no accident for 20 years and we keep collecting this money, the government will put it into the consolidated revenue fund and it will be used for something else. We have seen this happen too often in respect of other funds and pension schemes. The government has used such money for other purposes.

In this case we should not allow the government to use this fund for any reason other than that for which it was designed. I hope the government will look favourably on this amendment in view of the fact that it touches upon the whole topic of maritime trends. Once this measure becomes effective and the fund begins to grow, I hope the government will realize that there are pollutants other than oil which may be as dangerous to our environment. We all know what happened last year in respect of phosphorous. There was a big fuss in this House a year and a half ago about the danger of this pollutant. It seems to me that cargoes of this kind of pollutant should be taxed in the same way in which we propose to tax oil cargoes.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the amendment of the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) and the arguments he has advanced have the virtue of making at least one point clear. After this bill is passed and becomes operative, members of the House will have a continuing responsibility to observe and examine the administration of the regulations this government enacts, in order to satisfy themselves that they are being applied in such a way as to avoid seriously and unnecessarily interfering with the operation of trade and commerce in Canada while at the same time preventing pollution.

This is particularly true because of the authority placed in the Governor in Council to adopt regulations as it sees fit. The hon. member has related his amendment to the question of revenues and has suggested that in some way his amemdment would make the operation and maintenance of the fund relevant to an appropriate level.

Quite frankly, I fail to follow his argument in this connection.

There were suggestions made by members of the committee, including myself, that provision should be made in the bill for the inclusion of substances other than oil to be classed as pollutants and considered liable for charges and payment to the fund. It seems to me that the basic point of the hon. member's amendment is covered by the amendment of the committee now before the House. This amendment to proposed section 758 is to be found at page 25 of the bill returned from the committee. It seems to me that the hon. member's amendment is unnecessary and irrelevant, and for that reason I would argue against it. If his amendment were to pass, it would mean there might be a levy of 15 cents per ton, or some lesser rate if the government saw fit to set it at a lesser level, in resepct of every kind and class of substance that might be declared to be a pollutant.

This matter was discussed in the committee and it was suggested that under certain circumstances this would be quite inappropriate. After listening to the evidence presented to the committee, I was convinced that there may be some pollutants declared under the legislation in respect of which the appropriate charge to the fund could well amount to $15 per ton rather than 15 cents. I have in mind highly toxic substances, much more pollutant than oil, which may be carried in smaller quantities at a higher level of taxation. They might be taxed at a higher level in order to cover the greater risk to our ecological resources.

The member suggests that the regulations are not enacted as yet and we do not know what they will be. I should like to have seen the regulations before we considered this bill. We often run into this old argument which is akin to the chicken and the egg dispute. We request details of regulations before we give approval to a bill. Had there not been an agreement in the committee in respect of provisions to levy charges on the transportation of other pollutants, I could see some point in the hon. members' amendment or some modification of it. As the matter stands, it seems that this amendment is unnecessary and would only confuse the issue. Therefore, I feel I cannot support it. I suggest to the House that it should not accept the amendment.

The hon. member has suggested that as a result of the assessment of charges under this measure there would be an accumulation of a great deal of funds. As far as I was able to ascertain, no one with knowledge of these matters, either from the department or other experts, was able to suggest what should in fact be the maximum. I am satisfied, under the circumstances, to allow a certain amount of accumulation and let experience be the guide as to the permissible level of this fund, before any reduction in the levy is considered. I do not think the hon. member's argument in respect of this proposed section is relevant to the practical situation. If his amendment were adopted, I do not think it would contribute to making the administration of the legislation easier than it will be as the bill stands.

[Mr. Barnett.]

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on motion No. 4, moved by the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion? All those in favour of the said motion please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Mr. Comeau: On division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost on division.

Motion No. 4 (Mr. Comeau) negatived.

Mr. Speaker: The House will now revert to a deferred division on motion No. 2, the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau), and the amendment thereto of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett).

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Barnett) which was negatived on the following division:

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport) moved that Bill C-2, to amend the Canada Shipping Act as reported (with amendments) from the Special Committee on Environmental Pollution, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time? Now?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Now, by leave.

Mr. Jamieson moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, since a number of labour representatives are in town, I think we would be setting a bad example if we were to work overtime tonight since we do not get overtime pay. Therefore, I move we forgo the adjournment debate, if that should be agreeable to the House.

Mr. Macquarrie: I am usually the most agreeable of people, but I hope my party's whip will no longer insist on taking it out of private members' time. Tonight, though, I shall be agreeable to the course he has suggested.

At 10.20 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

POLLUTION

POSSIBLE THREAT TO BRITISH COLUMBIA COAST—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of the House under Standing Order 43 to present a motion of urgent and pressing necessity arising out of the pending conclusion to a hearing which may reach a decision on the establishment of an oil tanker route on the Pacific coast of Canada. In light of the recent suggestions by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) that Canadians should speak out, and in light of the fact that Canadians in British Columbia are speaking out in the form of a petition, I ask leave of the House to move the following motion, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard):

• (2:10 p.m.)

The House of Commons express its appreciation that the Legislative Assembly of the province of British Columbia unanimously passed the undermentioned resolution namely:

"That this House expresses to the federal government their deep misgivings over the ecological disaster which will engulf the coast of British Columbia following the construction of a trans-Alaska pipeline and attendant super tanker transport of oil off the coast of British Columbia.

We ask the federal government to use every available resource at their disposal to persuade the American government to use alternate methods of transporting crude oil from Alaska to the United States."

And further this House of Commons urges the government to carry out the wishes of the legislature of the province of British Columbia forthwith.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. Under the terms of Standing Order 43 unanimous consent is required. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The hon. member's motion cannot be put.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Some days ago the leader of the House on the government side drew attention to the difficulty which arises in our proceedings under Standing Order 43 in that an explanation by the member who seeks to move such a motion is permitted but no opportunity is provided for anyone who may object to the motion to indicate his reason for doing so. I suggest it might be appropriate at this time to seek the consent of the House in order that the government, which has indicated its opposition to this motion, might explain its reasons for taking this position.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows the terms of the Standing Order. They are very simple. The Chair has to determine whether there is unanimity. As I pointed out the other day, and I think I should reiterate it, it is not the consent of the government which is sought in accordance with the Standing Order but the consent of the House. Any one member, even from the party of the hon. member who is proposing the motion, can object and the motion cannot be put. When there is not unanimity, the moment an hon. member on one side or another of the House calls "no" or indicates he is not prepared to give his consent, the motion cannot be put. It is as simple as that. I would not think it would be in order to invite anyone to indicate, on his own behalf, why he is withholding consent.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DOCKYARD EMPLOYEES WAGE DISPUTE—MEASURES TO EFFECT SETTLEMENT—MAINTENANCE OF SEARCH AND RESCUE OPERATIONS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the President of the Treasury Board whether he has anything to report on the dispute among the ship repair groups in the dockyards at Halifax and Esquimalt? Can the minister tell us if he intends to take any measures with a view to achieving a solution to this dispute which could disrupt naval operations if it resulted in a walkout?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): The House is probably aware that a ballot has taken place on the question whether or not there is to be a strike. As yet, the result of this ballot has not been communicated to us. Subsequently, I would expect that further discussions would take place between the bargaining unit and the Treasury Board.

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to ask the President of the Treasury Board whether he or his associates have in mind any method of ensuring the continuity of the search and rescue operations which would be prejudiced should a walkout take place?

Mr. Drury: To some extent, this is a hypothetical question. However, we have been holding discussions with the Minister of National Defence with the object of ensuring the provision of essential services.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Will the negotiating team, when it meets the dockyard spokesmen again, adopt a more flexible approach or will it be tied to the original formula?

Mr. Drury: I believe the hon. gentleman is aware of my constitutional unwillingness to negotiate across the floor of the House, but I cannot, with grace, accept the notion that the Treasury Board is not flexible and reasonable.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether it is flexible but it is darned unfair. May I ask the President of the Treasury Board whether or not he can indicate if an arbitral award has been made with respect to the general trades and labour group? If not, when can these people, who have had a contract with the government for only three days in the last five or six years, expect some kind of settlement so that we will not have a complete walkout of the civilian support staff employed by national defence on both coasts? If the minister is interested, the balloting was pretty positive.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, along with the hon. member I deplore the slowness with which bargaining generally takes place in this area and also the delays that have arisen in connection with arbitral awards. However, I think the hon. gentleman knows that the arbitrators are in no wise either appointed by or under the control of the government.

Mr. Forrestall: I wonder whether the hon. gentleman can indicate to the House what the position of the general trades and labour group will be—this is not a hypothetical proposition; it is something that will have to be faced within the next day or two—vis-à-vis picket lines at Esquimalt and Halifax?

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I understand the question. Is it: What would be the position of the bargaining unit in relation to picket lines?

Mr. Forrestall: The general trades and labour group.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that the question is hypothetical. I suggest that the hon. member rephrase his question.

Mr. Forrestall: Would the minister indicate whether or not the general trades and labour group will be permitted to cross the picket lines of the ship repair group at Halifax and Dartmouth?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, this is something that is not dictated by the employer. They will neither grant permission nor withhold it. The crossing of picket lines is a matter to be determined by the bargaining unit themselves.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, can the President of the Treasury Board say whether or not he is contemplating a lockout in this particular situation, and does he consider that there may be a speed-up in the bargaining process if the regional disparity recommendation is taken into consideration?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that a public taking into consideration of the factor mentioned would help speed up or hinder a walkout, if one is to take place, but the fact of the matter is that the regional disparities have been discussed during the course of these negotiations.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, my question is whether or not the President of the Treasury Board was considering a lockout, not a walkout. I presume he understands that terminology.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will consult the law I think he will find that under the Public Service Staff Relations Act the government is not in a position to declare a lockout.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I wonder whether the minister would consider consulting the Minister of Labour so that he will get a clear indication of who decides as to who crosses the picket line, instead of what he himself said?

FINANCE

CONTINUATION OF EXEMPTION FROM UNITED STATES INTEREST EQUALIZATION TAX—CANADIAN CONCESSIONS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Have there been discussions between the Canadian government and the government of the United States regarding the intention of the United States government to cancel the exemption that Canada has had with regard to the interest equalization tax and, if so, what was the result of those discussions?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe there have been no such discussions. According to my information the matter has still to be brought before the United States Congress, and we are not anticipating any representations in advance of that event.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. May I ask if—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would like to continue his supplementary question. I appreciate that he is taking into account the consultations that are going on, but while they are taking place we might go on to the next question.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I was just waiting while the Prime Minister was being briefed. Am I to take it from his statement that reports from Washington are correct that as a result of the Canadian government's representations the government of the United States has decided to continue Canada's exemption with regard to the interest equalization tax?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member noticed, my briefing on this is not up to date.

An hon. Member: That is obvious.

Mr. Trudeau: We had decided, as I implied in my previous answer, not to do anything until the matter reached Congress. I understand it has reached Congress by now and that there have been representations made by the Canadian government.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister did not really answer my question. He did answer the first part of it by saying that there have been discussions, but I wanted to know what the results were and if the reports in the press are correct that the United States government has decided to continue the exemption? The purport of my question to the Prime Minister is this: When this previous exemption was granted there was a quid pro quo under which Canada agreed to keep a ceiling on its reserves of United States currency. Has the United States agreed to continue that exemption and what concessions has the Canadian government agreed to make in return?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I answer this under reservations because, I repeat, I am not aware of the latest developments.

Mr. Horner: There are reservations in respect of any of your answers.

Mr. Woolliams: Don't get petulant.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I think the Prime Minister was about to make a reply, and I hope he will do so because it is an extremely important matter. If the Canadian government—

An hon. Member: Take your bat and ball home.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): —has made some concession, reservation or agreement in return for an exemption under the interest equalization tax, the House is entitled to know what that reservation or concession is. If the Prime Minister was about to give that information I hope he will not refrain now simply because someone interrupted him while he was speaking.

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, the interruption was to indicate that I did not seem to be too much aware of the answer, and that is the case. I think the hon. member might obtain a more informed answer if he would direct the question to either the Minister of Finance or the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—ANNOUNCEMENT OF MORE EFFECTIVE PROGRAMS TO ALLEVIATE PROBLEM

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister.

A radio commentator launched yesterday a fairly violent verbal attack against all members of Parliament, saying that they are ignoring the unemployed and that they do not put forward any viable solution, a statement with which my party and myself disagree.

I would nevertheless ask the government whether, in addition to the measures which have been announced, it will announce shortly in the House more effective programs in order to solve unemployment.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): If other measures are considered, Mr. Speaker, they will be announced in due course.

SUMMER JOBS FOR STUDENTS—INCREASE IN SCHOOL ALLOWANCES

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

Since a majority of students will not be able to find a job next summer to enable them to pursue their studies, would the Prime Minister recommend increasing their school allowances and extending payments to the end of their studies?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have indicated that a policy would soon be announced to the House with regard to youth.

UNEMPLOYMENT—ACCEPTABLE NATIONAL AVERAGE

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. As he indicated yesterday that an average level of unemployment of 3 per cent across the country was unacceptable to the government because of the likelihood that it would reintroduce inflationary pressures in some parts of the country, would he indicate to the House what general or average level of unemployment across the country the government is aiming at in order to maintain a stable and satisfactory economy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have the impression this question was asked yesterday and gave rise to a lively debate—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But there was no answer.

Mr. Speaker: —but perhaps the Prime Minister might be allowed to reply to the hon. member's question.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): You are quite right, Mr. Speaker. There was no indication on my part or on the part of any minister that this was government policy. What happened in the exchange was that I asked the executive of the Canadian Labour Congress if they had any thought about the problem of the consequences of a 3 per cent average meaning something considerably less than 3 per cent in some provinces and something more in other provinces. It was just a question discussed with them. There was no enunciation of government policy or, for that matter of CLC policy. They themselves rejected a 3 per cent unemployment average.

Mr. Hees: As I was at the meeting and heard the Prime Minister speak when he said that 3 per cent, in so many words, was unacceptable because in Ontario it would cause inflation, would the Prime Minister advise the House what average percentage of unemployment across the country the government considers to be an acceptable one to promote a stable and satisfactory economy?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes. The lowest percentage possible consistent with a stable economic growth.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister for once give an honest, straightforward answer to a serious question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

UNEMPLOYMENT—APPLICATION OF FISCAL AND MONETARY POLICIES ON REGIONAL BASIS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary to the original question. May I ask the Prime Minister if it is now the policy of the government to apply monetary and fiscal policies on a regional basis in this country?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The member knows that in recent budgets we did in effect apply fiscal policies on a regional basis, and we intend to continue to apply these tools in the future in one form or another.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—ASSURANCE OF NO FURTHER REDUCTION IN ASSISTANCE TO PRODUCERS UNDER NEW POLICY

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister give us any assurance that when he announces the new dairy policy for the coming fiscal year there will be no further reduction in the assistance to milk producers?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the program for the year beginning April 1, 1971 will be announced some time prior to that date. The hon. member knows, of course, that we have had a number of discussions with representatives of the dairy industry who are aware of the many considerations that have to be taken into account with regard to the entire year so that, hopefully, there will be no changes necessary during the course of that year. Whether there will be any increase or decrease will of course be announced at that time.

Mr. McKinley: How soon will the minister be able to announce that policy?

Mr. Olson: Some time before April 1.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

SUGGESTED PENSION INCREASES FOR RETIRED EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the assurance the minister gave me on February 5 that he would make known to the Canadian Pacific Railway the desire of this House of Commons that Canadian Pacific pensions be increased in line with the increases announced by the Canadian National, can he tell the House what progress he is making in persuading the Canadian Pacific Railway to follow that course?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I met yesterday afternoon at approximately five o'clock with the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Among a lot of other matters we discussed was the matter raised by the hon. member. I conveyed to him the wishes of the hon. member and the House in this regard and he noted same. I cannot really indicate beyond that what they intend to do about it.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether in his discussions with the president of the CPR the request of the CPR to the government that it be permitted to extend to 60 years the time within which it may qualify its pension plan under the Pension Benefits Standards Act was raised in connection with the question of pensions?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes. This was one of the matters discussed, as I suspect the hon. member knows. I understand that some of the workers concerned have also endorsed this proposal. Questions with regard to government policy on this request should properly be directed to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Did the minister make clear to the president of the CPR that it might be easier to meet that request if something were done about the pensions of those now retired?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

FILLING OF POSITION OF PRESIDENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): My question is directed to the Prime Minister. While the Canada Development Corporation bill is before the House one is unable to secure any information because it will not be debated in Committee of the Whole. Therefore I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether there is any basis for the contention that the head of the corporation is to be, after the bill has been passed, the Hon. Louis Robichaud, P.C.?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Similar questions have been asked in the past, but as the question has been asked perhaps the right hon. gentleman may want to reply.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must confess that we have not thought of it, but I will consider it with care since the hon. member has proposed it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister says he has not thought of it. I take that to be a loose statement.

AGRICULTURE

SUGGESTED FEED GRAIN TRANSPORT SUBSIDY

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Has the minister seriously considered the brief which the Montreal Board of Trade addressed to him in February, and does he intend to implement the recommendation of that association to the effect that a subsidy of $10 per ton be granted for all western feed grain used in eastern Canada since November 1?

NATIONAL PARKS

ELK ISLAND—PROVISION OF FOOD FOR ELK AND OTHER WILDLIFE

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Can he advise the House if he has issued a directive ordering an investigation into the findings of the Vegreville Fish and Wildlife Association which revealed that elk and other wildlife in Elk Island National Park in Alberta are suffering and dying because of an inadequate food supply and also that there is little evidence to indicate that any attempts are being made to feed these animals by park attendants?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of that situation. Of course the problem is due to the early winter, heavy snow-falls and the hardening of the top layer. In fact, a certain number of animals have died.

However, I must say that the officials of my department have arranged for the conveyance of six tons of feed daily in the park, in order to help the animals to survive throughout this winter which has been as hard for them as for us.

YOUNG OFFENDERS BILL

SUGGESTED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE PRIOR TO SECOND READING

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): My question is directed to the Solicitor General. Since the young offenders bill appears to be ready to come back for debate, is the Solicitor General now prepared to have this bill go before a committee or study group prior to second reading in view of the opposition from academic groups and also practical groups involved with young offenders?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have taken advantage of the delay to check with various associations and with the representatives of the provinces about the truth of certain charges made against the bill and I finally realized that there is widespread confusion and that many questions are not well understood. I suggest that the bill could very well be debated in the House and referred to the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: In view of the minister's admission that there has been misunderstanding and as the Prime Minister has been complaining about getting legislation through, would the minister be prepared, as requested and suggested by members of his party and this party, to have this matter considered, because the bill has been opposed not only by the academic world but also by those who are involved in a practical way with young offenders?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, we have been waiting for 42 years for a new act respecting young delinquents. If the hon. member is proposing that—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. minister but it seems to me that the debate could be resumed when the bill is once again under study.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: I understand it is 42 years old, and that is why everybody is against it.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): May I ask the Solicitor General a supplementary question. Inasmuch as he seems determined to proceed with the bill, could he give the House any indication when it might be called again?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: I have had no such indication, Mr. Speaker. That question should be put to the government house leader. I want to say that hon. members will certainly have the opportunity to improve the bill. It is not an act—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

URBAN AFFAIRS

PROPOSED NATIONAL COUNCIL—PROVINCIAL POSITIONS

Mr. Perry S. Ryan (Spadina): My question is for the Minister without Portfolio responsible for urban affairs. Would the minister tell the House which two provinces have not yet indicated support for a national urban council and why not?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): I have no formal indication that any provinces have rejected or failed to support a national urban council in the sense that this means tri-level consultation.

Mr. Ryan: I understand that the minister does have indications of interest and support from eight provincial ministers of urban affairs. Is this the case, and does the minister consider it necessary to have all ten provinces in agreement before proceeding or is he prepared to proceed with the support of only eight?

Mr. Andras: My indications from the actual letters received and verbal conversations that are taking place is that there is no resistance from any province. If such is not the case, then I have not been so informed.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

TYPE OF QUESTIONS ON FORM TO BE FILLED IN BY EMPLOYEES

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. A few days ago, in answer to a question by myself, the minister undertook to check the wording of a federal employment questionnaire being circulated among employees of the National Harbours Board in Vancouver, to which some of them have objected on the ground that it infringes on their civil rights. Is the minister in a position today to state what the situation is?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): The form in question is a standard one that has been used for some considerable time. The first impression that legal counsel within the department have is that probably it should be altered in view of the Act to which the hon. member referred, and I have now referred it to the Department of Justice. I suspect that alterations will take place virtually right away.

DAIRYING—REVISION OF CANADIAN DAIRY COMMISSION POLICY

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

In view of a statement by Mr. Philippe Parizeau, president of the Granby Agricultural Cooperative, which is the largest in our country, that there is now a shortage of milk in Canada and particularly in Quebec, is it the intention of the Minister of Agriculture to increase, as from April 1, 1971, the total figure of dairy production quotas of the Dairy Commission for the year 1971-72, and also to put an end to the penalizing of dairy producers?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, under the new market sharing quota arrangements that have been agreed to by Ontario, Quebec and the Canadian Dairy Commission, the amount of milk that will be brought in under those quota arrangements to fill domestic requirements is set by these provincial boards.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture.

As the Canadian Dairy Commission is answerable to his department, does he intend to increase the quotas authorized by the Commission in order to allow the organizations he has just mentioned to set their market quotas too?

[English]

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will not allow me to go into the details of how these market quotas are set, but in one sentence I can advise the hon. member that the market sharing quotas are substantially higher than the old subsidy eligibility quotas, and I do not believe there will be an over-all shortage for any type of manufacturing requirements.

FINANCE

PROPOSED NATIONAL SECURITIES COMMISSION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether he still plans to proceed with the idea of a national securities regulatory commission or whether he has now abandoned this concept and is settling for a more uniform approach among the provinces?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, a uniform approach among the provinces is of course of great value to Canada, and I think considerable progress was made both last week and this week in this regard. However, I think there is a useful role to be played by some other form of organization in addition to what has already been done—and a great deal has already been done—and therefore we are continuing to pursue that route.

Mr. Stanfield: Is it the intention of the minister to provide another level, another tier of regulatory commissions, namely, a national commission in addition to the provincial regulatory bodies, and is it his intention to proceed with this regardless of the declared and vigorous opposition of at least one province?

Mr. Basford: Well, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman would read my important speeches on this subject—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Basford: —he would know that I said—

Mr. Hees: There is just so much we can stand.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Basford: Obviously hon. members are not interested in an answer at all.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister simply whether he intends to establish a national level of regulation in addition to the provincial levels, and whether he intends to proceed with this despite the opposition of the provinces?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, in the speech to which I was referring I said it was surely desirable to avoid just another tier for the sake of having another tier, and this is why we have had discussions with the provinces and will continue to have discussions with the provinces in order that some desirable form of—

ACTION RESPECTING ALLEGED SEPARATISTS AND TERRORISTS ON STAFF

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It arises out of the minister's strong comments on separatists and terrorists in Radio Canada, made at a recent convention of the Quebec wing of the federal Liberal party.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question may arise out of a statement, but the hon. member will realize that if he wishes to allude to a statement made outside the House he has to direct the question to the Prime Minister and inquire whether such statement represents government policy.

Mr. Dinsdale: Perhaps I can put my question in this form. Has a resolution gone from that convention to the CRTC calling on the Canadian Radio-Television Commission to look into Radio Canada operations?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking a minister whether a resolution has gone from a convention. I am not sure what meeting he is referring to when he asks whether there has been a communication between the two. But in those terms, I am sure the question is out of order.

Mr. Dinsdale: May I rephrase it to put it in order. In light of the concern of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development with respect to terrorist and separatist elements in Radio Canada, what action is the government taking to deal with this matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Obviously the question cannot be asked of the minister himself. The minister may make statements outside the House about different matters which do not relate directly to his department but he cannot be asked about such statements in the House. The only questions that can be asked of the minister are questions relating to the administration of his department. I have to point out to hon. members that we are running short of time, so perhaps we should try to limit supplementaries. The hon. member for Egmont.

Mr. Dinsdale: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, this is a very urgent matter, especially because it included the words "the very existence of Canada is threatened." Perhaps I can address the question to the Prime Minister, if he will take the responsibility for it.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): What is the question?

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, apparently the Prime Minister has not heard the question or is not concerned about the question. Perhaps I could rephrase it for his benefit. Has any action been taken on the part of the government to deal with the very serious charges levelled against Radio Canada, with respect to terrorist and separatist elements in that organization, by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

Mr. Trudeau: I am not aware of such charges having been made, Mr. Speaker. I will look into them.

The minister said he would take my question as notice. Has he a reply?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister without Portfolio): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have a reply.

Mrs. MacInnis: May I hear it now?

POTATOES—NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING REDUCTION OF UNITED STATES IMPORT QUOTAS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the recent submission by the National Farmers Union to the government in which the union recommended that the government enter into negotiations with the United States government for the reduction of potato import quotas imposed by that government, can the minister inform the House whether any plans have been made for these negotiations and, if not, why not?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, more than a year ago I had discussions with senior officers in the United States government, and I might advise the hon. member that two years ago I had similar discussions respecting the quotas on potatoes. Indeed, I raise the matter with them at every opportunity.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Would the minister inform the House whether there has been any indication from U.S. officials of when we may expect a favourable change in these quotas?

Mr. Olson: Not yet, Mr. Speaker.

APPLE JUICE—REQUEST FOR RESTRICTION OF IMPORTS

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of

RAPESEED—AVAILABILITY OF SEED FREE OF ERUCIC ACID

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In line with the department's recent announcement that a major effort has been made to develop and introduce new rapeseed varieties free of erucic acid, can the minister say if adequate stocks of these varieties are available for this year's planting, and whether any restrictions will be imposed on the sale of present varieties containing erucic acid?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any restriction at the moment on the sale of rapeseed with erucic acid in it. We are aware that concern has been expressed by some health authorities. Enough seed will be available for Canadian production this year so that, if it should become desirable, we can have enough seed in 1972 for a complete change-over.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, I asked whether restrictions will be imposed this fall on rapeseed containing erucic acid. May I also ask whether varieties that mature rapidly in a short growing season such as the present Polish varieties will be available?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, there are now three varieties. Some of them are the Argentine type and the others are Polish varieties.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are running short of time. There will be no further supplementaries between now and the end of the question period.

If not, when does he expect that a decision will be announced by the government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there has been no decision of which I am aware about the transaction concerning Home Oil and any other company. I cannot indicate if and when such a decision will be reached by the private sector of the economy. I can merely emphasize, as the minister has been doing, that the government has been closely following the negotiations.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT, OBJECTS, POWERS, CAPITALIZATION, ETC.

The House resumed from Friday, February 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Benson that Bill C-219, to establish the Canada Development Corporation, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs and the amendment thereto of Mr. Saltsman (page 3648).

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as a three-word phrase, "Canada Development Corporation" is a success. There is a certain ring to it that is pleasant to the ear as well as to the mind. We are all in favour of the development of Canada, and we want that development, to the fullest possible extent, to be done by and for Canadians. This is not because we are chauvinistic, but because we believe it is normal that any country make its own internal decisions in its own interests. Any country wants its own citizens to have the necessary skills to play a predominant part in its own development, and any country wants to ensure that its own priorities are respected. We believe too that, even in an economy such as ours, where decision-making is largely a private and decentralized matter, there is certainly an important place for the central government to encourage economic development.

In the past year, we have witnessed the power of the central government to harm the economy through the deliberate creation of mass unemployment. I have said time and time again that the decisions which led to the present situation were bad decisions, and I shall continue to say so. They were decisions that displayed the essential character of this government, arrogance and unconcern. But they also illustrated the power that lies with the federal government. They illustrated the importance of the decisions that are made right here in Ottawa; and they demonstrate the necessity for careful use of that power today and in the future. It is not the government that is going to develop Canada. It is the people of this country who are going to do that. But the federal government has a tremendous amount of power that it can use either to encourage that development or to hamper it. This power must be used with foresight and imagination. And it must be applied with care.

The general idea of a Canada Development Corporation is a defensible one. But we are not faced here today with a general idea. We are faced with a specific piece of legislation which we must judge as best we can. And as soon as we begin to look at this bill, difficulties begin to appear. They begin to appear, in fact, when we look at the self-proclaimed goals of this legislation.

First, we are told that the CDC is supposed to help develop and maintain Canadian presence in private industry in this country. Then, we are informed that the corporation is designed to give greater opportunities to Canadians to invest profitably in Canadian industry. In themselves, these two goals are not necessarily incompatible; but neither are they one and the same thing. There will inevitably be occasions when they do come into conflict with one another. This raises the question as to the situation of the directors who are to have the responsibility for running the corporation. In the normal course of events, the goal of a company director must be to work in the interests of the shareholders of the corporation, which is to say that his goal must be the maximization of profits. However, this corporation will be different in that it is a government-sponsored corporation and therefore, presumably, is to some extent at least responsible to the people of Canada. From that aspect, the directors must always consider the national interest. They must remember that one of the aims of the corporation is to help develop the Canadian sector of the economy.

One has only to raise the question to see that right at the very base of the Canada Development Corporation, as envisaged in the present bill, there is ambiguity and confusion. The question that poses itself immediately is the following: Will the CDC, in the form it is given under this bill, be anything more than a publicly sponsored private investment company working along the traditional lines for the interest of the people who hold shares in it? Is this what it is? Is it anything more than a publicly sponsored private investment company? If it is something more, what more precisely is it supposed to be? After all, a vague statement of goals is simply not enough. In other words, apart from the question of the maximization of profit, what else are the directors of this corporation suppose to achieve? It is all very well to say that they should work in the national interest as well as the interest of the shareholders, but what does this mean in practice? To what extent if any will the national interest justify or indeed require investments offering less than maximum profits to the shareholders of the corporation? Let us take a specific example.

We are told that the CDC, if it so desires, will be able to take over Polymer Corporation. This firm is currently making money for the government and, therefore, for the Canadian taxpayer. How will the directors of the CDC view the national interest when they are negotiating the price to pay for Polymer Corporation? In the interest of its own shareholders, CDC must, of course, pay the lowest possible price, but in the interests of the Canadian people it should pay the highest possible price for Polymer. There is an interesting conundrum, and one that points out once again the ambiguity that lies at the base of this measure.

Let us look at the more general picture. Supposing the CDC, as it is proposed, had an opportunity to participate in a development which was widely considered as one that ought to be controlled by Canadians. Supposing this was the general impression in the country. Suppose there was reason to believe that such a development could stay afloat, but it would be likely to produce only very low profits for the Canadian owners. In other words; this would be a case where you would have low profitability versus considerations of national interest as widely understood in the country. Where does the responsibility of the directors of this corporation lie? To what extent, if any, should they take lower profits to achieve Canadian participation in such a development even though it means substantially lower profits to the shareholders of the CDC? That is not an easy question to answer. It is certainly not easy to answer from reading this legislation. It will be all the more difficult, because in such a case the corporation would inevitably be subject to tremendous pressures from opposite directions, economic from the shareholders on the one hand and political, social and nationalistic from the government and organized public opinion on the other.

I feel sincerely sorry for the eventual directors of such a corporation. I hope that none of them will have any latent tendencies toward a split personality, because they wouldn't be helped any by having to work within the schizophrenic structures and goals that this present measure is setting out.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Given this schizophrenia in the bill, it is not surprising that criticism of it has also gone in different directions. Some critics on the left charge that the CDC as proposed would be nothing more nor less than a giant government-sponsored investment corporation designed to provide another profitable outlet for the money of corporations and of wealthy Canadians. On the other hand, there are those who say that this is simply another step toward socialism. In the words of the Globe and Mail, and I quote:

> The CDC will be, in the public mind, a Crown Corporation, subject in Parliament to all the political pressures of the electorate's nationalism and caution, inhibited from the boldness and ruthlessness that is essential to success.

With its usual complacency, this government through the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) says that, being criticized on both sides like that, it must be right. Things are not that simple. Things are not that simple because, in this case, both criticisms—contradictory though they might be—are at least partially valid. Each one puts the spotlight on a major weakness of the present bill. The first points up the fact that there is nothing in the proposed CDC to define exactly what the directors may properly consider other than maximum profits of the shareholders of the CDC. The second points to the fact that neither is there any assurance that the proposed body would act with any consistency in the interests of its shareholders. The question must therefore be asked: What is the relevance of this bill to the whole question of Canadian control over our own economy? And what is its relevance for that matter to the whole question of economic development in the national interest? The provisional answer must be that there is no evidence that it is relevant in either case.

The point is that there are many, many questions left unanswered both by the present bill and by the whole concept of the CDC that is contained in the present bill. For example, there are questions that have been raised by economists as to whether, even were they possible, the tasks, as laid down in the present government proposals, are realistically desirable.

This measure is based on the assumption that it is the shortage of capital which is the main reason not only for foreign take-over of Canadian firms, but also for the general lack of development ventures that are taking place under Canadian control. However, as several economists have pointed out, there may well be several reasons other than the unavailability of Canadian capital to explain the situation. There are a variety of reasons why foreign interests may be able to offer far more for control of a Canadian company than Canadian interests can offer. Similarly, there are a variety of reasons why a particular Canadian development might be far more profitable for a foreign owner than for a Canadian owner. It might be, for example, that the technological resources at the disposal of a large United States corporation would be the deciding factor in some cases. It might be, too, that the resources of a foreign corporation, as well as its requirements, would play a deciding role in many instances, making it worth while for a foreign corporation to pay considerably more, meaning that control of, or participation in, a Canadian development was much more profitable for a foreign corporation.

Then, of course there is the whole question of the comparative tax structure as between Canada and other countries. We have had occasion to raise some questions about this. Economists such as Professor Neufeld have pointed out that the availability of capital is not the only consideration. In that event, the CDC as envisaged in this bill could involve an approach which would be altogether inappropriate to our needs, especially when one considers the schizophrenic nature of the corporation to which I have already referred.

Presumably, we will be given answers to some of the questions I have raised presumably we shall be given some of the reasons why there is so much foreign take-over, why outside interests are in so many cases controlling our resources. Presumably some of these answers will be contained in the report on the whole subject of foreign investment which is supposed to be tabled in the near future—the "Gray" paper, if I may refer to it as such. Certainly, we ought to get a good many answers. Before being asked to establish the CDC we ought to have before us the government's analysis of the reasons we are losing control of the economy and the reason Canadians are not participating more fully in the development of that economy. We ought to be told the measures the government proposes to take in the light of this analysis of the situation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: After all, it is only when we have this information before us that we can determine what the proper response should be, having regard to the condition in which we find ourselves. It has been suggested by some economists, for instance, that for both capital and managerial purposes such a corporation could operate most effectively as a broker helping to bring together the need on the one hand and the money and the talent on the other. This is a possibility which has been ignored by the government in the preparation of this legislation. There may be a need and a justification for the use of government sponsored equity capital on some occasions. Once again, we come back to the inconsistency and confusion of aims embodied in the bill before us. In its present form, I have to say, this is a bill which raises more questions than it answers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: Why, for example, are we faced with a bill which talks pretentiously about the public interest without ever defining that public interest, and making no effort to show how it is to be achieved? Why are we faced with a bill which involves a modification of the tax structure in the realm of investment at precisely the time when the Canadian people are living in a climate of extreme uncertainty as to the government's intentions with regard to tax reform? We are still waiting to find out what the government intends to do about investment incentive in general. Why this piecemeal approach, now? Why are we faced now with a bill which touches on the field of foreign investment when in a few weeks, we are told, we are to receive the long awaited report of the government on foreign investment in Canada? This brings me to the general question: why has this bill been brought in now? What affected its timing? After hanging around for eight years, the concept of the CDC has suddenly been dusted off and presented as an example of the determination of the government to protect Canadian industry and help Canadians develop Canada. The question many people are asking is: why could the government not have waited until the appearance of its report on foreign control of our industry? The Minister of Finance, in his genial way, disarmingly replied that the bill was being presented now simply because it is ready.

Mr. Benson: A good reason.

Mr. Stanfield: Does this indicate that the government does not have too much ready? I ask myself seriously why the government has insisted on seeking to establish the CDC right at this time. It is not even a four-letter word, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benson: You have been drinking heavy water.

Mr. Stanfield: They are finding the going a little heavy. I suggest another reason is this. Had the government waited for the report on foreign ownership, the "Gray" paper, it would have been forced to take a comprehensive look at this whole question. It might have been obliged to take a stand on the issue of economic nationalism and its relationship to Canada's economic development and economic identity. By coming out with this flashy but irrelevant proposition, the government hopes to take the pressures off before the report comes forward in the form of the "Gray" paper.

I can tell the government that whatever happens to this empty measure before us, the pressures will not be off. The Canadian people and this Parliament want to know where the government stands, if indeed it stands anywhere. This bill is authentic in one way. It is another reflection of the uncertainty and ambiguity which characterized the government in its economic and social policies. This bill, and the so-called CDC it is supposed to spawn, takes all the emptiness, the uncertainties and the ambiguities of the government's policies and rolls them into one meaningless package.

To expose its hollowness, one has only to ask: what would have happened had the CDC been in operation at the time of the sale of Ryerson Press? From the standpoint of national interest and national concern there would have been tremendous pressure, both moral and political, for the CDC to step in and save one of the few remaining Canadian textbook publishers. But from the standpoint of profit, evidently there would have been no way in which the CDC could properly have become involved. This appears to be obvious. Either way, the response of the directors of the CDC would have been bitterly disputed.

Let us not forget there will be many occasions in the future when there will be clear conflict between national interest, or what appears to be the national interest in the eyes of many Canadians, and the profitability of a particular deal. This is why it is inevitable that any sort of publicly-sponsored development corporation of this kind would be embroiled up to the hilt in political pressures of all kinds. If it succumbs to these pressures, the shareholders will suffer, and if it does not, there will be a tremendous amount of disillusionment on the part of those who really see this organization as an instrument for preserving Canada as they see Canada. In short, Mr. Speaker, I think this measure in its present form, offered at the present time, is both futile and dangerous. It is futile because there is no evidence that it will be relevant to the national interest it is supposed to defend, and its merit is certainly unpredictable to the eventual shareholders it is supposed to benefit.

Leaving aside for the moment the question of Canadian control, let us look simply at the question of risk. If this corporation is really to serve Canadian development in a way that private investors cannot, it is going to have to take risks. It is going to have to invest money in spheres where not only is there no sure return, but there is no return available in the near future, and where such return as there may be is remote in time and relatively low in amount. That is why I really wonder just how the government plans to appeal to the potential shareholders of the CDC. Will it be an appeal in the name of patriotism, or will it be an appeal in the name of self-interest? The government has at least given itself lots of time before issuing that appeal. In fact, I have already predicted that the appeal will never come, regardless whether or not this bill is passed, and I make the same prediction today. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the government will never issue shares in the CDC, at least not in this CDC, because the whole concept is too confused, too ambiguous and too self-contradictory.

I have said that this measure is futile. It is also a dangerous piece of legislation, dangerous because of the disillusionment that would result from its failure in the sphere of national interest and development, which would be proportionate to the hopes that it would raise. I do not want to see disillusionment and cynicism among our people about the future of our country; but by falsely raising hopes, this sort of bill would certainly contribute to that result.

Full of contradictions and confusions in its goals as in its methods, what is the purpose of such a bill? The minister himself admits that it is useless to small business, as it is to regional development. Certainly it will be of no use at all to small business in this country. The one million dollar minimum investment called for in the bill is a guarantee that no help will be available to small businessmen, as we understand that expression. Certainly, it will be of no use in the fight against regional disparity. On the contrary, the criterion of maximum profitability will, if anything, act as an effective damper on any suggestion that we take a chance on a poorer region.

Mr. Mahoney: You should know.

Mr. Stanfield: That is right, I should know.

Mr. Muir: Is that the buffoon from Calgary South again?

Mr. Stanfield: So one asks again, what is the purpose of the bill? Suddenly, the answer shines through. After its PR fight against inflation, the government has now embarked on another PR effort, this time against foreign control and in favour of large scale Canadian participation in the economy. As far as I can tell, it is not going to be a very costly fight because the government does not have to do anything very much for quite a while, so it can just talk. With the usual vague words and pretentious language, the government is out to convince the Canadian people that it really cares—in fact, that it cares doubly. It cares about Canadian control over the economy, and it cares about economic development. So do we all, Mr. Speaker. But in this case, it is only the government that can act. This is why we of the opposition are so keenly disappointed that this government has once again preferred image to substance and come up with a hybrid and unworkable monstrosity that is of no use to anybody except the ever-busy image builders in the employ of the government.

In reality this is a shoddy public relations gimmick which is designed to refurbish the image of this government among those millions of Canadians who do care very deeply about what happens to this country. In terms of possible accomplishment it is not only highly questionable; it is worse than questionable because it is a betrayal of hope. It is an empty and insulting gesture unworthy of any competent government but eminently worthy of the one across the aisle from us today.

I must say that we of the official opposition cannot accept the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) because we see no evidence that the creation of yet another crown corporation would at this time do anything effective either to increase Canadian independence or to help development of regional industrialization which the amendment takes as its goals. We believe that the government bill before us and the present amendment put forward by the hon. member for Waterloo are simply leaps into the dark at a time when hopefully we look forward to acquiring in the near future the information necessary to allow us to go forward, knowing where we are going and what we are proposing. I do not want to end on a negative note, even though I believe that the government deserves the harshest kind of criticism on this measure. This whole area is too important to the Canadian people to reject out of hand any and all action that must be taken. However, I do feel that we cannot accept this hasty and ill-conceived bill as it now stands.

I, therefore, give notice that a member of the official opposition will be moving a reasoned amendment to refer the subject matter of this bill to committee to be considered when we receive the Gray report as to the real situation regarding foreign ownership, and when we receive the package of measures that the government proposes to take as well as the government's legislative proposals regarding tax reform and changes in the tax structure.

We think that the sensible course to take with regard to a measure such as this is to refer it to a committee to try to make some sense out of it in light of the general program that the government will be putting forward. But if this proposal is refused and the government does not refer the bill to committee with this sort of directive, we shall have no alternative but to vote against this particular measure on second reading. If this government has any sense of responsibility toward the Canadian people it will accept our suggestion.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I deeply regret that the legislation before the House, Bill C-219 to establish the Canada Development Corporation, is throwing away a golden opportunity to contribute to the solution of one of Canada's basic problems. I refer to the problem of regional disparities.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

At the 1969 constitutional conference the governments in Canada declared as follows:

> This constitutional conference agrees that the promotion of the full development of all parts of Canada is an essential objective of confederation.

• (3:30 p.m.)

On February 8 and 9 of this year, the third working session of the constitutional conference recalled the conclusion reached on the subject of regional disparities by the working session of the previous September. The first ministers agreed that the constitution should include a recognition of the importance of equality of opportunity for all Canadians.

This, it said, should not only be in the new preamble to the constitution but in the body of the constitution. The preamble should state that one objective of Confederation is the social, economic, and cultural opportunity for all citizens in whatever region they may live. The Constitutional Conference went on to say that in the body of the constitution there should be a statement of obligation on all governments, federal and provincial, to promote equality of opportunity and well being of all individuals, to ensure, as nearly as possible, that essential public services of reasonable quality will be available to individual citizens, and to promote economic development which will reduce disparities in the social and economic opportunities of individual Canadians in whatever region they may live. These pronouncements would enshrine in our fundamental law the obligation to deal with regional inequalities.

Nevertheless, the present legislation throws away an essential tool in implementing these basic national purposes. It fails to maintain public control by giving into the interests of individual shareholders. It stresses maximization of profit. It gives no more than impotent minority rights to those representing the public interest and it makes sure that what should be a basic purpose of the Canada Development Corporation is ignored.

A major cause of disparities in the social and economic opportunities for Canadians in the different regions has been the natural tendency of those who control private investment to channel their investments into central Canada in search of maximum profitability. It is precisely this that a properly constituted and equipped CDC would remedy. The Canada Development Corporation proposed by this legislation entirely fails for this purpose.

The hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) has pointed out in this debate and on many other occasions that the conception of a Canada Development Corporation held by this party is that it is something that can and will act as an instrument of Canadian government policy and secure Canadian objectives. He has said:

> In our view, the CDC should be involved in regional development policies with provincial bodies and agencies in order to ensure that every part of Canada capable of supporting viable development is extensively involved in the industrial future of this country.

It seems to me that the future unity of this country depends upon the federal government demonstrating that it can and will use the instruments within its control effectively for the purpose of removing these disparities. It is true, of course, that the stated objectives of the company set out in Clause 6 of the bill direct that the company will invest in shares of securities of any corporation related to the economic interests of Canada and shall invest in ventures or enterprises likely to benefit Canada. However, there is no machinery for carrying out these general statements. The direction of the company will be entrusted, in effect, to private business interests and the minister has made it clear that maximization of profit will be the major objective.

However, clause 6 provides that all the objects of the company shall be carried out in anticipation of profit and in the best interests of the shareholders as a whole. The minister has stated:

—this government has no intention of tying the CDC to specific regional problems.

Indeed, the national objective of regional development is to be entirely outside the scope of the company. Two hundred and fifty million dollars have been raised by taxing the public generally in all parts of the country and, in addition, profitable and successful Crown corporations are to be handed over to the corporation. This control is to be handed over in order that the CDC may invest in the developed and profitable areas of this country. One is reminded of the Biblical text—to him that hath shall be given and from him that hath not it shall be taken away.

It is suggested, of course, that the government being a shareholder to the extent of 10 per cent in the Canada Development Corporation will have important influence on CDC policy. I doubt this very much. Individual shareholders are restricted to a three per cent shareholding, but three per cent means an interest of $30 million if full capitalization takes place. The only sort of potential shareholders with this capital available are large corporations. A group of four or five large corporations would, therefore, have a greater degree of control than the government, and the government's minority interest is likely to be overridden whenever any conflict arises. The control of the new corporation will, therefore, quite apart from what the government says, clearly be in the hands of those who at present control our financial institutions.

What, for example, would the Canada Development Corporation do if it were a minority shareholder in a company which had several million dollars invested, was highly successful and received a highly attractive cash bid from the United States? Would it use its interest to try to veto the sale because the bidder was foreign? Could it prevent the majority shareholders selling for a profit or would it persuade the CDC to make a counter bid? Where does the priority lie, profit or national interest? It is quite clear that profit would prevail and the national interest would suffer.

The words in the bill about the economic interests of Canada, and what is likely to benefit Canada, are a meaningless façade and would in the ultimate analysis unquestionably give way to the financial interests of the shareholders. The seriousness of regional economic inequalities can hardly be exaggerated. They have been a persistent fact of Canadian life for at least the past 40 years.

According to the findings of the Economic Council of Canada, as contained in their second annual report:

Since the late twenties, when statistics were first compiled the overall economic growth of Canada has not achieved any reduction in the gap between the "have" and "have-not" regions of the country.

There is a substantial difference in per capita income between the highest and lowest provinces. There have been substantial differences in employment across the country. In particular, the Atlantic provinces have clearly suffered from much heavier unemployment than the country as a whole. Where a person lives in Canada means a great deal to his standard of living, opportunities for employment and the amount of income he can earn. The skills of many Canadians are neither developed nor used to their full extent. The over-all effect on the economy of such waste cannot be definitely stated, but it is certain that we are not making full use of our human and material resources. Our economy operates well below its full capacity and hundreds of millions of dollars worth of productivity are lost every year as a direct result.

Underdeveloped regions are caught in a vicious cycle in which low income and employment, low capital accumulation and low productivity lead to lower educational attainment, inadequate services, emigration of the skilled to areas where employment opportunities are better, and in general a standard of living well below what it is possible for all Canadians to enjoy the very purpose of confederation was to enable regions of Canada to establish equal opportunities for all our people. Nevertheless, as the Economic Council has pointed out, wide disparities continue to persist from region to region. The fabric of Canadian unity is threatened by these inequalities.

It is, of course, true that the government has instituted programs to attempt to bring about regional economic equality. Indeed there has been a proliferation of such programs, all of them well intentioned but none the less ineffective. There have been area industrial grants and incentives. There has been, in provinces such as the Maritime provinces, a great deal of research into the resources and opportunities for development. Unfortunately, all of this research, and all of the plans that may be made as a result of the research, cannot become effective without massive investment. Where are the investment resources and funds to come from? They are not likely to come from the resources of the provinces themselves. Are they to come from foreign investment or United States investment?

Assuming that this is a possibility, it can only add to the problem of foreign control of Canadian resources. I, for one, do not believe that the capital generated by the Canada Development Corporation should be used for buying back foreign controlled industries, except perhaps in certain limited cases where an opportunity presents itself.

I believe the resources of the Canada Development Corporation should be available, subject to proper research and adequate planning, for investment in the development of Canada as a whole. That is what is lacking in the present legislation. In 1968 the Economic Council of Canada pointed out that:

> Nowhere in the federal government structure is there a central focus—to ensure the allocation of funds to secure the maximum benefits for the region and the country as a whole. There is a clear need for a complete reappraisal of administration and procedural means of putting federal support of the Atlantic Regional Development on a more rational and well-integrated basis.

Has this changed with the creation of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and its new programs? The answer is no. As recently as last Wednesday in the House of Commons, as recorded at page 3709 of Hansard, the minister in reply to a question by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) said that his department could not co-ordinate its activities under the Regional Development Incentives Act with the responsibilities of other departments. Thus, the hoped for co-ordination and central focus in government has not been achieved.

In the report of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence on Canada-U.S. relations, the evidence of Mr. Claude Lemelin is quoted as follows:

> We might even ask if the new federal incentive programs for investment in the underdeveloped areas will be able to modify by themselves, the repartition of investments and employment in favour of these areas. And this is because the private investments, which result more often than not from decisions taken in the U.S., are not in agreement with the Canadian development requirements which are based on east-west axis, but are in terms of continental requirements, i.e. a north-south axis—

A publicly directed Canada development corporation such as has been proposed by this party in the nature of a Crown corporation, borrowing its funds from the Canadian public by bonds and by required investment of some part of the funds available from financial institutions in Canada, could do this essential job for Canada. The Canada Development Corporation created by this legislation will be torn between profit maximization and concern for national interests. It will be directed by those with a traditional outlook. It will not be subject to direction of the government or the interests of national policies. Its only justification is that it is a sop to economic nationalism.

It might be asked why a representative of Ontario and Toronto—by no means a disadvantaged area when it comes to regional disparity—should be raising an issue which is of more direct importance to other regions such as the Maritime provinces, perhaps Quebec, and some of the western provinces. I raise this question because I believe in the long-run it is in the enlightened self-interest of all parts of Canada, including central Canada and Ontario, that regional disparity be ironed out and that depressed areas be given special attention in the investment policies of Canada. Canadian unity requires this and in the long-run the prosperity and well-being of Canada require it. It is just too bad that a wonderful opportunity to establish an effective instrument to this end is being allowed to go down the drain.

Instead of legislation to provide for effective mobilization of Canadian resources for Canadian purposes, we are asked to accept a phony substitute. We are getting a façade in place of the real thing. The House should reject this bill or should accept the amendment.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, the House is now considering a very significant piece of legislation, that is Bill C-219. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) has voiced his objection to the overall bill. Personally, I have looked pretty closely at this bill and I think hon. members are entitled to question the advisability of introducing at this stage of the session a bill which at first sight appears to be most important.

As far as the principle of this act is concerned, I hardly believe that any member would object to it on the basis of the contents of clause 2 which reads as follows:

> The purpose of this Act is to establish a corporation that will help develop and maintain strong Canadian controlled and managed corporations in the private sector of the economy and will give Canadians greater opportunities to invest and participate in the economic development of Canada.

If we confine ourselves to clause 2 of the bill, it seems to me that all hon. members should support it. This bill purports to encourage Canadians to invest in Canadian companies instead of investing, as they did in former times, in foreign companies established in Canada which reinvest their funds outside our country. Indeed we have often seen Canadians lend money to foreign finance or insurance companies which reinvested it in foreign countries and not in Canada, and in this way channelled the savings of the Canadian people into foreign companies.

If one of the aims of this semi-public corporation is to encourage Canadian people to invest in Canadian firms so that the latter become full partners in the industrial development of this country, I will say that this is a very commendable intent indeed.

But how could we believe it without having a deeper knowledge of the direction the government is going to take with its so-called economic nationalism policy?

Briefly, this is the policy of this government respecting the operations of foreign companies in Canada. We recall that during the last electoral campaign the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) as well as the members of his cabinet and of his party, realized certain electoral benefits from this economic nationalism.

For the last three years, Mr. Speaker, this government was to provide clear-cut leadership to Canadians and policy statements made on the subject either by the Miniter of Finance (Mr. Benson) or members of the cabinet have so far been obscure, hesitant and timid.

One cannot talk about a Canadian Development Corporation without a thorough knowledge of this government's policy on foreign concerns operating in Canada. Will the CDC be strong enough, both from the management and capital standpoint, to compete equitably and viably with foreign corporations?

When the bill was introduced, the hon. Minister of Finance did not speak on that aspect. We are justified in asking the government today to take a firm, unequivocal attitude, so that Canadians who invest in this new corporation will be able to assess in advance the risk of their investment.

If I understood the objects of this corporation correctly, it should first seek to invest its equity in the establishment of new industries and in the expansion of industries which have already proved profitable and viable; in short, this corporation should be an effective incentive for the creation of new jobs. If this is a priority—and it should be a priority for the government, in view of the disastrous unemployment situation in which Canada now finds itself, when 8 per cent of the work force is idle and when Quebec has 243,000 unemployed—I say this should be a long term program to create jobs.

As stated this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition, we know that this Corporation will not immediately assist small concerns. It will again be meant to help large industries. Today, as I just said, when economic conditions in Canada are disastrous as far as employment is concerned, the government must take various means in order to help small industries.

The Department of Regional Economic Expansion is already trying to attain that objective. We know that the department was indeed trying to create new industries to promote the development of small concerns and boost employment in Canada. Perhaps the Quebec members have read in weekend newspapers that the problem exists everywhere in Quebec, especially where the doldrums are so acute that they are discouraging for some classes of society.

During the weekend Mr. Speaker—and I think that this is related to the subject of this debate—I attended a meeting in Sacré-Cœur in the Saguenay constituency. Those people have been working for 8 years at the development of a cardboard manufacture with the co-operation of the CFU. By the way, the CFU spent $200,000 solely for the industrial promotion of that plant.

Mr. Speaker, people get discouraged when they see that the government does not intervene, when circumstances warrant it, to assist more directly in establishing industries that would create employment.

At Sacré-Cœur, Mr. Speaker, we have seeked to get Quebecers and Americans interested in setting up a cardboard factory. The Catholic Farmers Union did what it could, spending $200,000 for that purpose. Now, the experts' report assures us of the viability of that factory, but $25 million would be needed to implement the project.

Could the Minister of Finance indicate whether, once Bill C-219 to establish the Canada Development Corporation is enacted, it will overlap the purposes and objectives of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion?

To come back to the example I mentioned a moment ago with regard to Sacré-Cœur, in Saguenay County, if the regulations of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion are followed, a grant of $6.5 million will be paid to this plant in order to create 500 jobs, that is $30,000 per job. I would like the minister to tell us whether this act could not be invoked to finance the balance of $17 million required to establish the cardboard factory at Sacré-Cœur.

I think that the minister should be able to answer our questions.

Once again, I want to know whether the Canadian Development Corporation will duplicate the Department of Regional Economic Expansion or whether it will merely make it disappear. To my mind, the people are worried.

One must admit that department has helped the people in some respects. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) recently stated that since his department was set up, 60,000 jobs have been created; still, the minister must tell us whether this new act is intended to complement the services of his department or merely to replace them.

Will the CDC also be authorized, as I said a while ago, to have access to the funds of the Canadian government when there will be a financial contribution from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion?

Mr. Speaker, the new corporation must be structured in such a way as to avoid the errors of the General Investment Corporation of Quebec.

First of all, we must know if the corporation will compete with organized financing companies operating in several provinces of Canada. Is there provision for investment planning in this corporation in co-operation with other companies of a semi-public or private nature operating in other provinces of Canada? Will this new corporation extend preferential rates to its shareholders so that finance corporations in Quebec and elsewhere in Canada will find themselves in a precarious situation?

We must avoid the mistakes that have been made by the Quebec General Investment Corporation whose objectives are similar to those spelt out in Bill C-219. We believe that the discomfiture of the Quebec General Investment Corporation in some areas can be attributed to the human factor. It may be that the men who set up this financial system lacked the necessary competence.

In many case, the Quebec General Investment Corporation has not been able so far to appeal to serious investors who could have turned it into a stable institution from an economic and financial point of view. This Corporation stopped paying quarterly dividends in September last.

This action did not have much impact on the stock market since the government of Quebec holds only deferred dividend shares while the Caisses populaires own two thirds of the General Investment Corporation shares.

Since its inception eight years ago, the Quebec General Investment Corporation has not been able to gain the confidence of investors because the value of its share on the Montreal Stock Exchange has never gone over the $10 mark of their face value. They are presently trading at $8.50 after considerable variations over the last eight years. If the new legislation introduced by the Minister of Finance seeks to achieve the same objectives as those aimed at by the Quebec General Investment Corporation, I believe that the minister and the cabinet must closely consider the mechanism and structures of the said Corporation: as everybody knows, it is now going through difficult times.

Although its aggregate firms are well established, the General Investment Corporation has met with unequal results. In fact, not so long ago, SOGEFOR folded. On the other hand, the SOMA almost went down many times; it was also financed by the General Investment Corporation. In 1969, before amortization, it had lost $346,000. The largest subsidiary, Marine Industries, registered a 48 per cent loss on its net profits for 1969, and its shareholders are now impatiently awaiting its financial report for the current fiscal year.

Mr. Speaker, on Saturday last, Entreprises Soucy, a Rivière-du-Loup pulp and paper industry in which the General Investment Corporation had invested funds, closed its doors. It laid off 200 people. To reopen, the firm needs over $1 million.

The Montreal newspaper La presse, under the signature of Mr. Jacques Tremblay, has published an article in which the life of the General Investment Corporation was described as follows:

> When the General Investment Corporation was created in 1963, people still entertained very optimistic ideas: "everything is possible", "we shall achieve a quiet revolution". A series of well-defined operations were to make us masters in our own home: nationalization of electricity, deposit fund, investment corporation, replacement of family enterprises by modern "industrial complexes", and so forth.
> —Every project based upon an old national economic mythology seemed like another step towards paradise. In the end, there are naturally a few downfalls. Our professorial economics proved more effective at making speeches than at controlling our economy.
> The seventies should be the decade of realism. Should the minor downfalls of the General Investment Corporation help us to become conscious of that fact, they will have proved useful. Of course, the fanfare accompanying every move of the General Investment Corporation is now likely to create some kind of defeatism in the face of its difficulties. But such defeatism is no more founded than the fanfare.

Mr. Speaker, this shows that the aims of the General Investment Corporation are apparently similar to those of the measure now before us. It should be a lesson to us before we lay the foundations of the Canada Development Corporation.

[Mr. Asselin.]

If moreover, this corporation enters into competition with existing provincial investment corporations their economic influence and power will surely be jeopardized. It is therefore logical, Mr. Speaker, to draw the following conclusions:

First, the government must make sure that the Canada Development Corporation will consult the provinces as to the operation of similar corporations having similar objectives.

Secondly, since the CDC will be wholly financed first through public funds and later on through public outlays, it is essential for Parliament to supervise and control its operation.

Thirdly, why would the law not give Parliament the right to ask this semi-public and semi-private corporation, that will use taxpayers' money, to report on its operation to the people's elected representatives?

Fourthly, how can we avoid that CDC's competition be detrimental to our existing financial institutions such as banks, trust companies, mutual funds and other similar organizations which, thanks to their structure and their operations, have already rendered valuable services to Canadians?

As the hon. Leader of the Opposition said a moment ago, some clauses of the bill are so vague that the government must absolutely accept his proposal so as to enable us to know the CDC's financial structure before creating this organization so important to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that the minister is a responsible man since he is in charge of the taxpayers' money. Doubtless he will accept the proposal which was made by the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon and which would enable us to study this bill more thoroughly and to know all its consequences.

But if the minister is so impatient to have it adopted, it is because he is looking forward to the presidency of this new corporation. He hopes to secure a new position for the future as has already been done by the former Minister of Transport who is now the President of the Canadian Transport Commission. If it is so urgent for the minister to get this position, I am prepared to vote right away in favour of this bill.

[English]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, this bill to set up a Canada Development Corporation could have been a legislative landmark heralding a new era for economic development in Canada and the maintenance of a much greater degree of Canadian economic independence. Unfortunately, the government has approached the matter both reluctantly and half-heartedly. The minister's speech the other day gave one the impression that he was introducing this measure merely to fulfil some of the political commitments that had been made by his predecessors. Let me just review briefly the history of the idea of a Canada Development Corporation.

The New Democratic Party at its founding convention in 1961 put forward the idea of a publicly owned and publicly controlled Canada Development Corporation as a means of expanding the Canadian economy and of guaranteeing a greater measure of Canadian economic independence. In the election of 1962, we fought the campaign with that as one of the major issues. In 1963, Hon. Walter Gordon, who at that time was masterminding the Liberal campaign, put the concept of a Canada Development Corporation at the masthead of the Liberal campaign. When the government came to office after the election of 1963, Mr. Gordon, who at that time was minister of finance, introduced a measure on June 20, 1965, for the setting up of a Canada Development Corporation. Of course, it caused great distress in the ranks of the corporate establishment. Apparently, tremendous pressure was brought to bear on the newly elected Liberal government and the measure was dropped.

Then, in March, 1966, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), who then was Minister of Finance, said that the Canada development proposal would be introduced, "as soon as the parliamentary timetable permits." In October, 1966, Prime Minister Pearson denied that this project had been shelved. In July, 1967, the minister of finance of the day, who now is Secretary of State for External Affairs, said that a draft of the Canada Development Corporation bill would be ready for cabinet shortly. In March, 1968, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) called the Canada Development Corporation a "valuable tool". It was promised to the people of Canada in the Speech from the Throne in September, 1968. In that month of that year the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) said, "I have the CDC bill in my hand. I expect to introduce it as soon as my fall budget is through." In April, 1969, the Minister of Finance said that he hoped to present a draft of the CDC proposal to the cabinet in the summer.

This has been long awaited legislation, Mr. Speaker, and now it is here. It is a pale version of what was first proposed by Mr. Gordon in 1965.

An hon. Member: It surely is not.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): It certainly is a completely emasculated version of what the New Democratic Party has been talking about since 1961. It is quite apparent that the opposition of the corporate elite in this country has forced the Minister of Finance to denigrate and emasculate this concept so that we have before us today a legislative monstrosity. Someone said that a camel is the picture of a horse drawn by a committee bent on compromise. Certainly, that is exactly the kind of distortion that has finally emerged from seven years of Liberal gestation. I said, Mr. Speaker, that this bill is a monstrosity. I say so for three distinct reasons.

First, Mr. Speaker, under this legislation the taxpayers of Canada will take all the financial risks, and a comparatively small group of investors will get the major part of any profits which may eventually accrue to this enterprise. Under this measure the government will embark on what the minister calls a partnership. Speaking on February 22, as reported at page 3640 of Hansard, the minister said this about the Canada Development Corporation:

> It will represent a new and significant partnership between the public and private sectors in the dynamic development of our economy.

Let us look at the Liberal party's idea of a partnership. This is a partnership in which the people of this country will put up, under this legislation, initially some $350 million, $250 million in equity capital and a loan of $100 million. In addition, the government will turn over to the corporation the assets of certain Crown corporations, valued anywhere from $300 million to $400 million. This money and these assets are being put up by all the taxpayers of this country, by the poor, the disadvantaged, the ordinary workers, the farmers and old age pensioners who pay taxes into the federal treasury. Yet, if this corporation does not operate successfully, they will lose the money which this government has invested.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question. He implied that the money invested would be tax revenue raised by the government of Canada. I am sure that he did not mean to leave that implication in his statement. It will, instead, be money raised by the government of Canada through the issuance of bonds.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Of course. Yet surely the minister is not naïve enough to think, and surely he does not think the public is naïve enough to think, that if the government puts $350 million in cash plus all the assets of some Crown corporations into Canada Development Corporation, and the corporation fails, that the Canadian taxpayer will not have to make good the loss. In the event of failure, the responsibility being assumed by the government of Canada will be met by the taxpayers of this country. It is the money of the taxpayers which is being used. If there are losses, the Canadian people as a whole will have to pay. If the corporation is a success, as I hope, then it is clear that the major part of the profits will go to that small sector of the Canadian economy which is able to invest, probably between 7 per cent and 10 per cent of the population of Canada.

When I was a boy we used to play a game called "put-and-take". You put so much into the pot, and if you got a lucky number you were able to take. This bill, too, is like a put-and-take game.

An hon. Member: It is a gamble.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The Canadian people will put in the money and take all the risks; and if the corporation is successful the investment groups in the country will take the major part of the profits. This is the liberal idea of a partnership. The government takes comfort from the fact that it will be the largest shareholder and that its share will not go below 10 per cent. It may well be the largest shareholder, but it may not necessarily be the controlling shareholder.

A combination of companies each holding, say, 3 per cent of the equity of this corporation could well form the controlling group. Of the 18 or 21 directors on the board, only four, unless the government chooses the other option, will represent the government. The other alternative would be for the board to vote according to the number of voting shares held; but the government has given no assurance whatever that it intends to seek that alternative.

It is significant that the bill itself provides that the corporation is not responsible to Parliament. The people of Canada are being asked to underwrite a corporation that is not responsible to Parliament, not responsible to the elected representatives of the people. What we are going to have is a partnership in which the Canadian people take all the chances, undergo all the risks, put up in the initial stages all the money and assets and, if this project succeeds, then eventually those who are able to buy stock in this company will own 90 per cent and the Canadian taxpayers will own 10 per cent.

The second reason why I call this bill a monstrosity is that it proposes to sell out four Crown corporations. It proposes to sell the Polymer Corporation, which produces synthetic rubber and which has been a very successful operation; the Eldorado Mining Company; the Northern Transportation and the government's 45 per cent equity in Panarctic Oil. Later, if the government decides by order in council, it will sell Northern Transportation.

The minister has never explained why the Canadian people are being asked to go from 100 per cent ownership of these public enterprises to an eventual 10 per cent ownership. The Canadian people took all the risks. The Canadian people pioneered these projects. They have been brought to a point where they are self sustaining, and in some cases, revenue producing. Why does the government now propose to turn them over to a corporation of which the Canadian people will eventually own only a 10 per cent equity? As his reason for this, the minister stated on February 22, as recorded at page 3640 of Hansard:

> Some of these enterprises are in a position where their further growth and development could be facilitated by giving them the greater flexibility to operate and better access to capital markets which would come from CDC ownership of their shares.

Do they lack flexibility now, Mr. Speaker? Polymer Corporation has branched out into a wide variety of activities, even outside this country. Do they lack access to capital? No one in this country can borrow money as cheaply and easily as the government of Canada. The government is really saying that it wants to divest itself of these public enterprises now that they have become successful.

If the government were really interested in developing the public sector of economy, the government could provide both the flexibility and access to the capital requirement to expand these industries rather than turning over 90 per cent of them to the private sector. This means that the ordinary people of this country whose tax money or credit has been used to develop these Crown corporations are now going to see their share reduced from 100 per cent to 10 per cent. I think that this is a sop which the Liberal government is offering to their friends in the corporate structure at the expense of the Canadian people. This is exactly what the Liberal government did after World War II, when they took Crown corporations which had been set up during the war to provide essential economic services and sold them at firesale prices to the corporate establishment of this country. This action by the present government betrays the Liberal party's bias toward the financial establishment and its basic dislike of public ownership. After this demonstration, let's have no more talk by the Liberal party about its belief in public ownership.

The third reason why I have described this Canada Development Corporation, as envisaged by this government, as a monstrosity is that it will not be an instrument of national policy. The sole value of setting up a Canada Development Corporation is that it should be enabled to do the things which the private sector of the economy has either been unable or unwilling to do. Some years ago when I was involved in the matter of the industrial development agency in the province of Saskatchewan, I visited a number of countries to study the question of government development corporations. Whether you go to the Scandinavian countries, West Germany, Italy, France or Israel, you will find that in each of these instances the government's industrial agency is used as an instrument of national policy to do things for the nation as a whole. This government is proposing to turn that responsibility over to a private corporation in which the maximization of profit will be the principle motivation.

In Israel, where most of the large industrial enterprises are on a tripartite basis, one third of the equity is held by the government of Israel through its industrial development corporation, one third held by the Histdruth, which is the co-operative trade union organization and one third is held by private companies, many of them foreign, which also have the management contract to operate the business. This gives to those areas the best of both worlds. They get the benefit of the technical knowhow, expertise, managerial skill and the patents of private entrepreneurs while at the same time keeping the control of the industry in the hands of the people of that country and retaining two thirds of the profits in the country where it is being earned.

The minister made a passing reference to which I want to refer. I quote from page 3639 of Hansard:

> We do not want another fiasco such as the one in Saskatchewan when the present leader of the NDP was Premier of that province.

• (4:30 p.m.)

I am not going to spend the time of the House discussing Saskatchewan. I do not mind if some Liberal backbencher out of a vast sea of ignorance makes comments about Saskatchewan, but the Minister of Finance (Mr.

Benson) has access to the records and knows much better. He has on his staff some of the people who were largely responsible for carrying out the programs and policies of that government. He knows the facts. He knows that in the 20 years in which there was a CCF government in Saskatchewan, all the public sector, that part which was monopolistic, public utilities such as telephones, the sale and distribution of electric power and natural gas, showed a return of 9 per cent. The balance of the public sector, which covered such things as insurance, sodium sulphate, bus transportation and Northern Air Lines, showed a return of 16 per cent. That is not a bad record. Reference was made to the fact that a shoe factory or a woollen mill closed down. Mr. Speaker, the total losses represented less than one per cent of capital investment in the public enterprises, which is a better record than any private consortium can show. As a matter of fact, the sodium sulphate corporation could in one year, making as it does at this time profits of between $800,000 and $900,000 a year, pay off any losses incurred in these other operations.

But profits are not the whole story; there are also the services which were provided to the public. Power rates were reduced four times consecutively. Natural gas was sold to the people of the province at 25 cents per thousand cubic feet less than any private company was prepared to charge and, in addition, communities were served which no private company was prepared to reach.

Mr. Otto: Per cubic foot?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I said 25 cents per m.c.f. less than any private company was prepared to charge.

Mr. Otto: Per thousand.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In addition, there were the jobs which were provided. Investment in the public sector in Saskatchewan provided jobs at much less per employed person than is being spent today by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion which is handing hundreds of millions of dollars to private corporations which are producing relatively few jobs. So, I want no more talk referring to a "a fiasco" in the Province of Saskatchewan.

What should be the purpose of the CDC? It should be used as an economic tool to do some of the things which must be done in this country, and which the present government and preceding governments have failed to do. It should first of all be used to stop the increasing takeover of Canadian corporations by foreign multinational corporations. I agree with my hon. friend from Greenwood; we are not asking the CDC to begin at this point to buy back foreign ownership. This may come in the future. The immediate task facing the government is to halt the rapid acceleration in the takeover of Canadian businesses. The CDC should be doing this. Will such a task be possible, having regard to the very limited control and narrow influence which the government will retain in this company?

The CDC properly constituted, should be designed to help reduce the regional disparities which are tearing this country apart. This does not mean taking industries into areas where they are bound to lose money; if we are to invest money provided by Canadian taxpayers there have to be feasibility studies, we have to make sure that industries which are established have a reasonable chance of success. But a Canadian Development Corporation, properly established, could, on the basis of the necessary studies, having decided what industries are indigenous to the area concerned, develop undertakings which private corporations have so far neglected to bring into being. A properly constituted CDC could speed up the whole process of the rationalization of industry in this country, something which is badly needed. I will not repeat the story which has been recited so often to the effect that we have developed in Canada a branch plant economy producing for a limited market. Contrast this with the achievement of a small country such as Sweden, with a population of 7 million, or Norway, with a population of 3 million. Norway and Sweden have rationalized their industry, specializing in areas which are natural to their resources and expertise, and are presently competing in the markets of the world against the industrial giants. This is what Canada must do, and it can only be done if there is an instrument of national policy which is constituted to achieve that end.

The corporation should be using the savings of the Canadian people to set up industries which will process more of our raw materials in order to provide jobs for our people and give us a better return in world markets. To my mind, this is the most important task which should face such a corporation. Everyone knows that in Canada we are shipping out our raw materials and increasingly divesting ourselves of control over our energy resources. We are shipping to the United States and to Japan the raw materials on the one hand, and the energy resources on the other, to convert our raw materials into finished products which are then sold back to us. For as long as I can remember, it has been Liberal doctrine that if only we had a favourable balance of trade Canada would be wealthy.

Well, we do have a favourable trade balance, the highest in our history. But what are we doing? We are shipping out our raw material at relatively low prices and buying back finished goods at relatively high prices. What is the result? Last year, 200,000 young people came on to the labour market and we could provide jobs for only 77,000 of them. How can we provide jobs when our whole economy is being devoted mainly to extraction industries? The government keeps saying: we need more capital. But this capital goes into the extraction industries which are capital intensive but are not labour intensive. For example, we develop a great coal industry to supply coal to Japan on the basis of automated equipment which needs relatively little manpower to run. We are shipping out iron ore, again an operation which provides relatively little employment; the employment is to be found in turning this ore into iron and into steel and, eventually, into steel products. This is the only way in which we shall develop a nation; we shall not develop a nation by sitting back selling our raw materials, selling our energy resources, and committing them for years in advance.

One has only to look at what happened last fall with respect to gas. We in this party protested the fact that the government was agreeing to the export of 6.3 trillion cubic feet of gas to the United States over the next 20 years without having given adequate consideration to our own probable needs. Now, what do we find? We find that before a hearing of the National Energy Board the President of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines says: We shall have to ask our customers in eastern Canada not to demand more gas; we are completely surprised at the increased demand in a period of only five months; it has increased by 122 billion cubic feet and we cannot meet this demand. We are mortgaging our energy resources decades in advance and shipping out our raw material. Then, we wonder why we have three-quarters of a million people unemployed.

Under this bill the Canadian economy is being sold out to the corporate elite of this country. There is no guarantee that if the Canada Development Corporation puts money into a Canadian company without having majority control, that company is not going to sell out to a foreign corporation. The Canada Development Corporation will be able to do nothing about the fact that the same company that it has helped to bankroll may decide it is good business to sell out. We might as well face the fact that Canadian business has been selling out to foreign investors, and there is nothing in the bill that prevents them from continuing to sell out.

The Minister of Finance in introducing this measure on February 22 said that it was not the only thing the government intended to do to maintain Canadian ownership. But what other things does the government intend to do? We have not heard a word as to that. Certainly, this measure will not do very much to guarantee Canadian ownership of the major part of the Canadian economy. This is a sell out, not only to the corporate establishment of this country but so far as the expectations of the Canadian people are concerned.

I think the Canadian people expected when the government was talking about a Canada Development Corporation it was going to be a tool which the government would use to make sure that the vast resources of this country were developed by Canadians and for Canadians; that it would be used to expand our economy under Canadian control, to the end that this country might once again have a measure of economic independence, something that is rapidly vanishing before our eyes. Three thousand years ago a wise man said: "Where there is no vision the people perish". If this government stands accused of anything, it stands accused of lacking the vision to do something about the economic plight of Canadians. Canada is a country with more resources per capita than any nation in the world; a country not only with natural resources but with the energy resources to convert those natural resources into consumer goods; a country with a trained labour force and managerial skill; a country which, if it were prepared to plan its economy in terms of human need, could be one of the wealthiest and happiest nations in the world.

This government had a great opportunity to forge an instrument which could be used to build a greater and finer Canada. The government has failed to seize that opportunity. Instead, it presents us with this hybrid that ensures there will be neither public ownership nor private ownership but a mixture which, though it may result in some investors making a few profits, will deprive the Canadian people of what they require, namely a government agency designed to make Canada a great nation with a great destiny, something which our forefathers envisaged but which to date we have failed to bring to fruition.

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, the act to establish the Canada Development Corporation is no doubt an indication of the desire of the government to make this country's companies more Canadian. We agree of course with this principle. Its good intent must be emphasized and recognized. We have a duty, however, to criticize as objectively as possible the conditions of government action with respect to this development corporation.

The misgivings expressed by citizens of the province of Quebec will be better understood in the light of the results arrived at by a similar corporation established in Quebec a few years ago and known as the General Investment Corporation. My colleague from Compton (Mr. Latulippe) already referred to it. I shall not repeat here the arguments that he put forward.

May I nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, give the basic reasons for which, in my opinion, this act will perhaps not achieve its stated aims. First we must remember this major concept which daily experience invariably supports: the soundness of a concern and its success are based upon the work, the energy and the leadership of its members.

Now nobody can deny the necessity of a large measure of independence in the setting up of a sound company. Shareholders must feel they are competent and fully responsible. Any arbitrary and foreign control will soon paralyse all the good will in the world. Nothing is more serious than relying upon others.

I do not intend to demonstrate the viability of private enterprise as opposed to the financial problems generally encountered in state-owned enterprises, but I shall point out the basic reason why people do not work as much or as well when they know they are working for the government. Taking life easy is in style. Nobody wants to do more than the other guy, and who needs a rat race? In other words, one is less responsible when co-managing a company with the government. From which proceeds the principle that the government must provide assistance—on this we agree, Mr. Speaker—without interfering

Therefore, if we refer to the objective set forth on February 22 by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), we certainly do agree, and I quote:

—help develop and maintain strong Canadian-controlled and Canadian-managed corporations in the private sector of the economy, and —second part of that objective—to give Canadians greater opportunities to invest and participate in the economic development of Canada.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, we all agree on this point. The question is invariably how and by what means will those purposes be achieved. And since more or less unfortunate experiences have been made, these should not be repeated.

The Minister of Finance stated in his speech on February 22nd that:

Business and industry have entered a new period of internationalism which makes it desirable that there be a number of Canadian controlled corporations with headquarters in Canada and with the kind of institutional strength and management capabilities to compete successfully in Canadian and international markets.

I say again, Mr. Speaker, that in principle we agree with this, but I owe it to myself to emphasize that this hang-up about international trade, international industry, international competition, is worth just that. Some time or other, it will be necessary to revert to a more elementary, more positive, more realistic principle, which is the following: If Canada has everything required to feed and clothe its population, to improve its comfort, in short, all the required manpower to that end, and all the primary resources required, and all we need is funds, we just have to make those funds available for the distribution of goods. And in saying this, I am not merely repeating a Creditiste fad.

When the country's economy is being paralysed under the pretense that we must join the international community of nations, often we go too far in that direction. And it was no doubt in virtue of such a principle that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said in New Zealand about a year ago, that we would import more dairy products from that country, and that the Canadian policy in that field aimed at a restriction of local production in order to purchase dairy products elsewhere.

Mr. Speaker, if this principle were implemented, if we accept to stop producing what we were able to manufacture at the same price as in the United States, Europe, Asia, Latin America and Africa, in short, if we totally applied this principle we would have only to remain idle while importing and waiting.

We do know that this is impossible. We must not be haunted by international trade. Rather we should say: We have everything needed here to make products; let us make them. People are ready to consume them, let us give them the opportunity to do so. This is a principle of balance and sound accounting that should have been implemented long ago.

It would also be necessary, before establishing any new firm, to think of laying more stress on assistance to existing industries. In fact, there seems to be very poor co-ordination in the matter. Through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, we lend haphazard assistance to some firms while we seem to ignore difficulties thus created for other existing concerns.

It seems that it is not so much a matter of bad faith as of poor co-ordination and poor leadership. If certain businesses cannot progress, or even survive, owing to the insufficient purchasing power of consumers, we will not settle the problem by helping such enterprises. We should insist, and in any case this is anticipated as on February 22 the Minister of Finance spoke as follows:

The CDC would seek to achieve its first objective by investing in the equity of existing corporations, by helping in the expansion and establishment of significant new enterprises and by assisting the expansion of existing ones.

Mr. Speaker, I wanted to point out that I agree with that. But, one must surely not forget existing undertakings, and one must surely not favour, through lack of co-ordination, some sort of dead-end in this field, protecting one at the expense of the other or creating a new industry at the expense of others already in existence. As a matter of fact, one must first of all see to what is already there, and help if necessary.

Mr. Speaker, one must always, in everything, naturally with regard to undertakings, in the sense that is meant in the establishment of the Canada Development Corporation, be wary of such direct action by the government. The powers that be may have the best of intentions, but the next year or a few years later, others may have taken their place and their intentions may not be quite the same, and then there may be very dire and disastrous consequences.

I disagree here with the too direct role the government intends to play in that Corporation, especially when we read at page 5 of the statement made by the Minister of Finance and I quote:

During any period when the government's voting shares exceed 50 per cent, of the outstanding shares issued, the Deputy Minister of Finance and the Deputy Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce will be appointed ex-officio—fortunately he added:

—non-voting members of the board.

Mr. Speaker, we always look disapprovingly upon this direct action of the political members of the government in undertakings which in a sound economy should be entirely managed by Canadians, but exclusively according to the needs of the people and the spirit of initiative of those who wish to participate in the production. And when we realize that the government is considering direct action such as the minister sets out, we feel greatly reluctant. The minister goes even further when he adds in another paragraph:

Initially the government will be the sole shareholder and it will always be the largest single shareholder. Because of the significant role the corporation has been given by its purposes and objects, the government will want to show a continuing interest in it, and it is expected that the government will always want to hold at least 10 per cent of the voting shares. Thus, it will always be in a position to exercise the degree of influence on the over-all policies of the corporation which would be appropriate to its shareholding at any particular time.

It is clear enough that the intention is to control the Corporation through politicians in government and then—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I barely need a minute to finish.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Five o'clock. Is the hon. member granted the privilege of continuing for a few moments?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Matte: I thank my hon. colleagues.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that basically I agree with the creation of this corporation. Still, with regard to the means that are to be taken and specially the control the government will exercise, I agree less because what Canada needs, what Canadian enterprises need to develop, to improve, to better serve all Canadians, is precisely assistance to enable them to do more. It is not that Canadians lack initiative, that they are not energetic or industrious, that they cannot achieve that goal; it is always for the same reason: they lack the money, the capital.

That being the case, we could do every bit as well by easing credit. With very low rates of interest, the same results could probably be achieved.

Hoping that the government can lessen the intensity of the role it intends to play, I feel the proposed corporation could be helpful.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 40 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave)—National Defence—Dockyard employees wage dispute—Intervention of industry specialist—Amendment of offer to remove disparity; the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale)—Regional Economic Expansion—Incentive grant to Micro-Max products to establish plant in Magog, Quebec—Assistance to Canadian Drug industry; the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis)—Administration of Justice—Federal intervention in action brought by teachers respecting British Columbia Order in Council.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, public bills.

[Mr. Matte.]

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

DIVORCE ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING CUSTODY AND MAINTENANCE PROCEEDINGS

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants) moved that Bill C-30, to amend the Divorce Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, one of the great accomplishments of the Parliament which preceded this Parliament was the act to amend the Divorce Act which was passed in 1967 and 1968. It brought progress in this important field to a country which for many years had suffered under archaic laws relating to divorce. I believe it is a law which has stood up remarkably well, even in changing times over the past three years. Perhaps I might give the reason, although it is not really germane to the debate. We know the British have again amended their divorce act in order to get rid of the so-called fault concept. I suggest to those in this House who might favour this approach that in a large measure we did that when we dealt with the three year breakup of marriage in addition to retaining some of the older fault grounds, such as adultery and cruelty.

There may be a disposition some day to take a look at the Divorce Act and perhaps move entirely away from the fault basis, but I do not believe there is really any burning need in that respect. I think our Act is good. If I were to make any suggestions in respect of improvement I would say we could bring down the cost of divorce to Canadians. A number of cases are uncontested. I suppose about half the cases really do not involve the rights of children or property rights of the husband or wife. In that situation, it seems to me there is a fearful waste of courtroom time and a fearful cost to the people who must go through a rather elaborate legal procedure when something better could be devised. However, I do not suggest that in this rather modest measure we are discussing in this particular hour. What I am suggesting is an area of correction in the present section 11 of the Divorce Act. I believe I have made my argument pretty well in the explanatory notes that accompany both suggested changes.

The first suggestion involves giving some flexibility to the judges when they are in the process of granting a decree nisi. As perhaps everyone is aware there are two stages of a divorce decree. There is the decree nisi in the first instance, followed in three months' time by the decree absolute. The decree nisi procedure is what I am concerned with here. I am concerned about this because, at a meeting in Toronto a few years ago, the judges decided that all the major issues really had to be dealt with at the decree nisi stage in view of the way Parliament had framed this particular provision. In framing it we said that the courts, upon granting a decree nisi of divorce, may do all sorts of things with regard to orders in respect of the custody and maintenance of children and the like. We really did not give the courts flexibility in that regard. I, and other lawyers, have been involved in cases in which we found we had to wait to get the decree nisi granted because, either we had not dealt with the matter of the custody of the children at the trial or the judge wanted to hear more evidence in respect of the custody of the children. In some cases the order was found to be defective when we tried to enforce it.

The judges have found their own cure for this defect in section 11. They make one dollar orders for maintenance and then it is quite simple under the present act to amend the one dollar order to a larger amount or cut it out altogether. This is a technicality, and sometimes technicalities are the cause of a miscarriage of justice. I am aware of cases where people have been deprived of their children just because of the lack of the two little words in my bill. I suggest that when something like this happens, it is up to Parliament to make a correction.

The other suggestion I make is an equally modest one. However, it has some relevance to those Canadians who move about. This has to do with a provision for looking into an order where a person has moved from one part of Canada to another. In this large country, it is no fun trying to chase down someone and bring him into court when an order is made in a Nova Scotia court and one of the parties has moved, say, to British Columbia. Under the law as we now have it we are left really with the court of original jurisdiction. Yet this country is over 3,000 miles wide and surely we can bring about a change that would help overcome some of the geographical distance.

What I propose here is to add about a dozen or so words, which are underlined on page 2 of my bill. This would enable the court in any province where the party for whose benefit the order is made is residing to look at the original order, confirm it or order changes or variations. One of the really motivating factors which I believe brought about a change in divorce law in Canada, although for years we were sitting around with our knees sort of knocking together when we thought about the process of changing the divorce law, was the idea that we were looking after helpless people and providing for relief to be given to children. There were social injustices, but more particularly injustices involving children of marriages that had broken up and therefore Parliament had to do something about them. Yet, sir, unless we adopt the simple variation that I am suggesting here many women who have moved from one province to another with their children will experience great difficulty if they attempt to vary an order because of changed circumstances. The person has to go back to the province where the order was obtained. I think this is an injustice which can be cured by adopting the formula I propose or by adopting some other formula.

So, it is in the spirit of bringing a new broom to reach into the few musty corners that have developed under our Divorce Act of a couple of years ago that I present Bill C-30 to the House this afternoon. I hope that it, or some measure like it can be tackled reasonably soon. I do not think we have to go into a whole new debate on divorce, but we should always have some care for good housekeeping. We should spend some time during our private member's hour to cure some of the little but griping defects that crop up in our legislation from time to time. I hope that I will not bring down the heavens or a full scale, dramatic debate on divorce by simply suggesting these two small but important areas of reform.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I have had the opportunity—and I could say the privilege—to give marriage preparation courses for 12 years and even though I do not claim to be an expert on the question, I find the subject matter of my hon. friend's proposal quite interesting.

At the outset of my remarks, I wish to deplore the ever increasing number of divorces and the regrettable situation which is thus being created.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this intolerance between spouses, between children and their parents, is one of the causes of the problems we are facing in our modern society.

In my view, divorce is a plight, a situation which in principle should not be considered as normal. All too many people tend to consider divorce and its consequences as a normal situation and I wish to take exception to the attitude of some people for whom marriage is a situation which is not necessarily to be chosen by the majority of the people living on this planet.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that marriage is indissoluble. This should not lead anyone to conclude that I am unable to comprehend particular situations and the difficulties of some people who have chosen matrimony by interest, who have chosen to spend their lives together without first weighing the consequences of their action.

I am convinced that an adequate preparation for prospective spouses and an accepted adaptation can overcome most problems. Incompatibility of temper is undoubtedly something that can be foreseen but, what often happens is that people through self-interest or for considerations other than that of living together decide to get married.

Mr. Speaker, marriage courses are an institution that should be generalized. As a matter of fact, they are becoming more and more popular. They enable an engaged couple to know each other better and prepare themselves better for their new life. They enable individuals to realize, before it is too late, the impossibility of living together and the possibility of re-examining their choice.

Mr. Speaker, I believe one must try to face the present situation with a little more realism and that is what I will endeavour to do even after pointing out that although divorce bears the stamp of law, I believe it remains a situation that I consider, as a matter of principle, abnormal, even if I may admit that some individuals have no other alternative.

Mr. Speaker, the new Divorce Act corrects a distasteful situation. Formerly obliged to plead their case in Ottawa and to prove adultery on the part of the spouse, people from Quebec especially did not easily reconcile themselves to divorce, but the marriage institution, one must admit, did not fare any better there than in other provinces.

We merely pretended to ignore it. Simplified as it is, divorce is nonetheless a serious decision that is far from amusing. A love story ending amidst the gloomy setting of a court is nothing to be envied.

An act likely to weaken the family, the basic unit in our society, and involving serious consequences for two adult people and their children, must, first of all, be scrutinized. It is worth knowing all about the divorce machinery and trying to learn what becomes of the individuals concerned, in such a case of permanent separation.

However, in divorce, the women are the losers. First, there are four times as many women as men available in this country; besides, because they look after the children, women accept heavy responsibilities, morally and materially. There is all the difference in the world between taking two children out on Sunday afternoon and looking after them each day of the year, answering all their questions, facing their emotional problems, explaining to a young daughter why her father is not always there, as her little girl-friend's father.

Mr. Speaker, in Quebec the family has been for some years submitted to tremendous pressures which are leaving it shaken to its very foundations. Social changes and new ideologies have both contributed to reduce significantly its traditional importance. The role of the family is different now. Contacts between its members are not so frequent and generally not so rewarding.

Even though these facts may be explained, it remains that the family is now undergoing a delicate period of adjustment. It should also be recognized that a couple's life, mainly in the cities, has become harder. Formerly marriage had a precise meaning for all Catholics. A man and a woman got married for better or worse without worrying too much about a possible separation if the worst was to overcome the best.

The Divorce Act no doubt reflects a weaker religious faith. This act has changed everything. In 1971, when serious difficulties are met, the spouses are very much tempted to resort to the final solution. In this context, perhaps we should not be surprised at the bishops' statement who deplore the present situation of the Quebec family.

The document issued by the Canadian and Quebec episcopate on the occasion of its quarterly meeting is quite clear. Among the events which influenced our people's way of thinking is the provincial legislation which permits marriage before a civil officer and mainly the federal legislation which multiplied the reasons for civil divorce and its implementation in Quebec courts.

To say that the bishops cannot but condemn divorce would be quite easy. The problems created by divorce for the spouses and the children are real and recent statistics are worth considering. From July 1, 1968 to September 9, 1970, 11,030 civil divorce cases were recorded in Montreal and 1,817 in Quebec.

When the law was implemented, it was believed that the number of divorces would decline after the first year. Now, after more than two years, requests for civil divorce continue to increase at an alarming rate. Each month, requests number about 500 at the Montreal record office—at the end of 1970 yet.

In their pastoral letter, bishops avoided denouncing directly the law authorizing divorce but did mention its serious consequences. Under the circumstances, they were right in asking the state to formulate and apply a policy likely to prevent family problems which prompt married couples to divorce.

The suggestion of my hon. friend comprises two points. The first is concerned with adding words which, in some way, would allow the court or the judge who will grant a decree nisi not to rule immediately on the matter of alimony or custody of the children. In the present situation, upon granting a decree nisi of divorce, the judge may, if he thinks it fit, and having regard to the circumstances, make an order requiring the husband to secure or to pay such lump sum or sums owing to the wife or the children.

I do not believe that the proposal of my hon. friend is acceptable, not because the judges have already expressed the opinion that it would not be advisable not to make such an order at the same time as the decree nisi, but simply because while hearing divorce cases, it is desirable that the debate be decided at the same time, and that the judge who must decide whether or not a divorce is advisable, may at the same time render a decision as to alimony and custody.

It seems essential to me that the judge who must decide to grant the divorce or not be empowered also to render a judgment on those important matters of alimony and custody. It would be a mistake, I think, to try and separate the two questions, since divorce invariably brings about the problem of the custody of the children. And if a judge, for some reason or other, had to decide on a divorce and not on the custody of children at the same time, truly abnormal and irregular situations could arise which would eventually be detrimental to the children. And the most important thing to be decided in these cases is not so much the divorce but the implications it bears for the children.

I suggest then that my hon. friend's proposal, although I do not deem it ridiculous—on the contrary, it makes some sense—is not at all desirable.

As far as the second proposal of my hon. friend is concerned, it seems quite justified to me at first sight. When two people get a divorce in one province and if the person in whose favour the divorce has been granted leaves that province afterwards, there might be practical difficulties involved for the person wishing to go to court again because of the distance and the different circumstances in which that person may be. The financial implications for anyone who has had a divorce in Quebec and who would be residing in British Columbia might well prevent her from obtaining justice for herself and for her children if due to the circumstances she were justified in requesting a change in alimony or new arrangements for the custody of the children.

Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to say whether from a constitutional point of view this would involve insuperable difficulties. However, I would simply like to say that at first sight, the suggestion made by my hon. friend seems fair and reasonable and it would be easy to propose some amendments to the act that would help solve this problem.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, allow me to say this: There can be no substitute for personal individual effort. It is the duty of every Christian to carry out fully the values of his marriage commitments.

Christian parents are to give their children the example of a union lived in faith and love; that is one of their responsibilities, and an irreplaceable one.

A sound preparation should reveal to future spouses that the depth of their mutual commitment will ensure their faithfulness.

Judges and lawyers, as the law requires of them, should give positive assistance to people in view of reconciliation, informing them, if necessary, of agencies and means available to help them.

All agencies involved in family problems should unite their efforts and co-operate actively in order to avoid dispersal of available resources and I am aware of the tremendous work they have already accomplished.

It is the state's duty to develop and apply policies likely to prevent the evils we have referred to. We cannot but support here what many others have already been calling for: the establishment of a "family court". The concrete terms of the organization and operation of such a court are the work of experts. They will no doubt find a source of inspiration in existing organizations.

I hope that this court will be able to solve distressing familial problems in a more simple way than presently.

Family problems in modern society are acute. I hope that, all together, we shall have the courage to face them and find efficient solutions in keeping with today's world.

[English]

Mr. Colin D. Gibson (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to follow the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) who has eloquently dealt with the bill before the House. I think that the bill presented by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) has a great deal of merit, particularly in respect of new section 11(1). As we know, the evidence in divorce cases is usually prepared thoroughly yet often the parties are ill-prepared to consider the welfare of the children; therefore the trial judge cannot easily dispose of this matter. The trial judge also faces difficulties respecting alimony and support.

New section 11(1) contains the words "or after" and the first part of it reads:

> Upon or after granting a decree nisi of divorce, the court may, if it thinks it fit and just—

And so on. If the evidence respecting the children has not been properly prepared, and if the parties have not been as careful and as frank as they ought to have been regarding that evidence, the judge in my opinion ought not to be hasty in making a custody order. In such cases he might make a serious error.

We must consider several matters if the court is to be given the power not only of deciding on divorce but also on the children of the marriage, as is proposed in this bill. In Ontario there is an office known as the official guardian. The official guardian is an officer of the court and employs welfare officers who investigate the cases of children concerned. They are supposed to do their jobs thoroughly. Sometimes they do not do so. I submit it would be wrong for us to say that the divorce ought to be delayed merely because a careful judge—and most judges are careful—considers that the report of the welfare officer is fragmentary and he is suspicious that one or more of the children is being neglected.

I say by all means let the divorce go through, but allow the court to determine the issue of custody after there has been care and preparation in bringing forward the evidence. I regret that in some provinces there is no official guardian to investigate the welfare of the children concerned. I hope that all provinces will take this great step forward which is so necessary if one is to look into the welfare of children. I firmly believe that in the matter of custody the welfare of the child is paramount. Before I deal with the second matter raised in the bill—and it raises many interesting points—I should like to read proposed new section 11(2):

> An order made pursuant to this section may be varied from time to time or rescinded by the court that made the order or by the court for any province where the party for whose benefit the order was made is residing if it thinks it fit to do so having regard to the conduct of the parties since the making of the order or any change in the condition, means or other circumstances of either of them.

Let us suppose that the husband is awarded custody of two children by an Ontario court and he and the children are living in Ontario. Then the wife moves to British Columbia and before moving, pursuant to the Ontario judge's order, obtains access to the children for two weeks. She moves to British Columbia and the children go with her. Then let us suppose that the wife becomes ill, needs assistance in supporting the children and cannot get them back to Ontario. I submit that in this case the husband would be in difficulties. Which court would have jurisdiction over the children? I maintain that in order to safeguard the welfare of the children the province in which they normally reside ought to have jurisdiction.

The circumstances I have outlined would create great difficulties for the parents. Is the wife to be permitted to go to the British Columbia Supreme Court and obtain an order for the children? She may not be a fit and proper person to have their custody. And what is to happen to the husband who is in Ontario? He might apply to the Ontario court for an order to enforce his rights provided in the original judgment. Which order is to prevail?

The hon. member's bill contains the germ of a good idea. I do not wish to throw mud on his proposal because it heads in the right direction. We recognize, in other words, that people move. When they move, their circumstances sometimes change. We must therefore find a way of dealing with conflicts created by modern times. I commend the hon. member for his thoughtfulness, yet I am afraid that his suggestion will not do in its present form. Two fighting parents could use this law to prevent the course of true justice. Supposing the original Ontario court order provided alimony for the wife of $300 a month: if the wife moved to British Columbia and obtained an order for $500 a month, which of the two court orders would prevail? This section does not make provision for that situation. Perhaps we should give paramountcy in financial matters—that is, alimony to the court where the original order was made. In matters of custody, paramountcy should be given to the court having jurisdiction where the children reside. In any event, we are plagued today with a mobile population, difficulties of communication, difficulties of finance and all the other matters that weigh on the problems of broken homes and these unfortunate people.

The rights of the children must be strictly and zealously guarded by more up to date Children's Aid Society reporting and more skilled and conscientious social workers being brought into this problem. There are signs of this being done. I think that Ontario has a reasonably good family court system; it is improving all the time. With the young offenders legislation and statutes like it which I hope will be before the House soon, we will improve our discipline of children. On the matter of reorganization of the courts, great consideration is being given to granting county court judges jurisdiction over divorce. I hope that these judges will maintain, under the surrogate court act of Ontario, jurisdiction over the custody of infants.

Perhaps the county court judge is better fitted in many ways to deal with divorce, custody, alimony and problems of broken homes. He is in some ways a little closer to the people in the sense that he lives in the community and is not a roving judge as are the trial judges of many of our supreme courts. Perhaps the criteria should be that the county wherein the parties reside should have paramount jurisdiction over custody, and the court granting the original alimony order should be the one to decide on problems of alimony and financial questions.

This is a very interesting problem. Divorce reform has moved forward rapidly. I can honestly say that the cases I have heard about in my area have not created a flood of abusive types of divorce. Many people who were unfortunately separated and whose marriages were completely sundered have been able to obtain a divorce without adultery being the only ground. From what I have heard there has not been a flood of divorces in the sense that every second or third family is rushing to get one. I think the bona fides of the situation have been well received by the community at large.

[Mr. Gibson.]

By and large we have progressed a great distance toward more humane laws. We have failed in respect of the problems raised by section 11(2) because that section presents a technical barrier to justice—conflicting jurisdictions; which court shall have power. It is our duty and responsibility to struggle with any technical problem as to which court has power. I think the only forum wherein this problem can be solved is a federal-provincial conference. Perhaps the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Premiers of the provinces should study the matter and establish throughout Canada a uniform jurisdictional system for divorce, alimony and custody. I think that would be useful and, in light of what my hon. friend indicated, I believe he would like to see it come about.

The judge should not be pressured in a situation where he has very little evidence. He should not be forced to decide divorce and custody issues as well as financial matters if the evidence is not there. We can be almost certain that evidence as to the breakdown of the marriage will be there. There are problems in the far north, the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. These areas were visited by the Committee on the Constitution. There were complaints that spouses had moved many hundreds of miles away and there was no way of obtaining speedy justice. I hope this Parliament will seek ways to improve the system of helping people in remote parts of Canada to obtain speedier and less costly relief than at present. Many people in the far north are unable to receive speedy justice. Their children are in the same boat. We should have a legal aid system which will assist, in particular, the children of broken marriages in the far north.

I commend the mover of this bill. I cannot agree with the details of section 11(2) but I think it is a very thoughtful and interesting proposal.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, once again in private members' hour we have a bill which presents a very useful suggestion, which we support. It seems there is unanimous agreement on either one of two points, either that the bill should be passed as is or at least that the first proposal should be accepted and that further consideration should be given to the second proposal. I hope the traditions of private members' hour will not be like the laws of the Medes and the Persians, namely, that hon. members have to talk everything out. On occasion, a proposition like this does move to a further stage. To give the House that opportunity, I wish to present an amendment. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather):

That Bill C-30 be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

The phrase "be not now read a second time" sounds unfriendly, but it really is not. We sometimes use this device to see that a bill which hon. members are not quite ready to pass will get further consideration in the committee. I spoke to the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) about this. He recognizes that this is a friendly gesture. I hope the House might favourably consider this amendment so that the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs can give further consideration to this bill.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House is of particular interest to the first society that ever existed on this planet—mankind.

If I correctly understand the origin of man on earth, the family is of divine institution and constitutes the foundation of our society. Even though according to what we were taught, society has been established by God, it is nonetheless made of human beings, therefore subject to imperfection. At times difficulties arise between people who were married when they were really in love but who, owing to such difficulties, have reached the point where governments have authorized the breaking up of their marriage in order to enable them to have a new start in life, if possible and if they so desire.

The bill before us provides for a change which deserves careful consideration, as we are indeed placed before an accomplished fact.

Divorce was sanctioned by civil legislation. It happens that divorces are recognized by judicial powers. Following these divorces, the family, the children, have to face problems.

I have just read an amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to the effect that the bill should be referred to the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I think that this suggestion is useful. Indeed, we cannot allow ourselves to consider lightly a bill with such a wide scope and we must take all necessary means to assure that the children issued from more or less successful marriages which are finally dissolved will see their rights recognized by society, in order that they can lead a normal life.

Mr. Speaker, I think that such a question should be duly referred to a committee for thorough consideration and report and this would allow us to lessen the effects of divorce while those infortunate families and children who have to suffer from their parents' divorce could take advantage of the protection to which they are entitled and lead a normal life in our society.

[English]

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, in my view the bill before us is a good example of the type of subject which is well brought before the House in this hour. The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave), a lawyer by profession and very well regarded in this chamber, has given us the benefit of his experience in the application of the law and has proposed two specific amendments to it.

I believe this is the first time he has presented this bill to the House, and the debate has been most interesting. I was interested in the comments of my hon. friend from Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Gibson), in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and in the comments of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert). It is clear that a number of improvements could be made to the law.

Canada Development Corporation

The second provision of the bill before us attempts to deal with the situation in which one of the parties to a marriage takes up residence in another province of Canada. As the hon. member pointed out, there is serious restriction under the present law because amending procedures can only be undertaken in the province in which the original jurisdiction lay. I am not sure I understand the full purport of the hon. member's amendment. I think he has tried to say that a remedy can be sought in the courts of the province where the party for whose benefit an order is being made is residing.

My hon. friend pointed out situations in which a possible conflict might arise in determining which of the parties was deriving benefit. The phrase might have application to both parties to the original action. This should not in itself impair the attempt the hon. member is making, because he has drawn attention to a very real grievance. I hope the result of this hour which has been spent in the House will be to provoke an examination in the press and elsewhere to determine whether the particular provisions put forward in the bill are the most appropriate.

Only a limited number of bills can go before committees of this House for examination. I agree we have to seek means by which bills are screened, to discover those of particular merit. This is as meritorious a bill as I can conceive. The problem of screening private members' bills in order to bring before the committee structure those which are attempting to deal with issues in a practical way is one which has not yet been resolved to the satisfaction of members of this House. I hope, however, that after this debate has encouraged an examination of these questions and an evaluation of public opinion on the subject the comments made by those who examine the record will assist the hon. member and others to persevere in their efforts, because I am confident that some measures will be adopted. I hope the hour's debate in which we have taken part will lead to further action.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The hour for private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair. Unlike other less fortunate people, our separation will be short. In the circumstances I will say, "parting is such sweet sorrow".

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT, OBJECTS, POWERS, CAPITALIZATION, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Benson that Bill C-219, to establish the Canada Development Corporation, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Saltsman (page 3648).

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, we have heard a great many words uttered on the subject of the Canada Development Corporation. A great many members who said they agreed with the principle of the bill nevertheless wondered how it might work in practice when it came down in realistic terms to financing and to human personalities. Many aspects of the bill that could be questioned and many of the fears people have of this type of legislation have already been outlined; indeed, my leader, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), expressed them very thoroughly this afternoon.

I do not propose to belabour the reasons why this bill will not work. I must say I have a certain amount of agreement with the principle of the bill even though in practice it will be completely impractical because of the personal conflicts that will make the legislation unworkable. But in looking at a measure such as this I do not believe you can oppose it absolutely without putting forward some reasonable alternative.

I am not going to attempt to cover the ground already traversed by other speakers in the debate during the past week or so. This afternoon the leader of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), expressed some concern over foreign ownership in Canada and contended that we should process our natural resources here in Canada, thus creating more jobs and industries which would, if not wholly, at least partially solve our unemployment problem.

To my mind the important thing is not where the ownership of corporate entities lies; it is more a matter of how the capital and the profits made by these corporations are employed once the corporations are created. I believe this boils down to the philosophy of wanting the state to go into the business of manufacturing goods, creating wealth in this country and then distributing it to each individual according to his need. I do not believe the state should be involved in this sort of thing. Rather than the state looking after all things for all men, manufacturing goods and distributing them to each according to his need, I believe an alternative solution can be worked out.

I support the philosophy that the individual is paramount and that the main role of government is, in addition to keeping the peace and maintaining national security, the development and maintenance of a social, economic and political climate in which the individual can achieve his or her fulfilment. As an alternative to the doctrine of socialism, where the state takes all and distributes to each according to his need, we must recognize that in a technological society such as ours, the capital instruments of production—the machines and devices that produce—are rapidly supplanting labour as the major producer of wealth. We should also recognize that there are only three ways in which an individual can support himself and his dependents: by his own labour power, by the earning power of his capital or by a combination of both. It should be the policy in the future to encourage and facilitate by every means possible the widest possible individual ownership of capital, particularly the ownership of common or equity shares in our many well established companies.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard).]

I support this idea, and in this vein I want to read to the House some remarks made by Mr. Frank Capon, vice-president and director of Dupont of Canada Limited in a speech he made at St. Louis, Missouri:

> We have come full circle. Originally, security was based on ownership of land, which was capital. Today, security can come only from the ownership of the machines which produce incomes, which is still capital. Unfortunately, we allowed ourselves to get trapped in a fallacy that it was labour, or the human element, that produced the goods of the industrial revolution and that job security was therefore a legitimate and, in fact, vital right of the citizen. We must now make the choice. Either we recognize that most wealth is, and always was, produced by capital and that the security which is an innate need of the human animal can be satisfied only by ensuring a broad ownership of capital amongst our households. Or we will hold stubbornly to the concept that wages are the proper basis for wealth distribution, that job security is essential, that workers have the right to stop our whole economy short as they strike to enforce demands, and that the state will finally "guarantee" to all an income above the "poverty" level.
> It is precisely because we are still on the latter course that we see the upsurge of irresponsible wage increases, the dramatic growth in strikes particularly against the community as a whole rather than against individual employers, and the inevitable destruction of our currency values by inflation. Already, interest rates have been pushed to historic highs, endangering the ability to finance government and industrial needs by bonds which are a cornerstone of our entire structure. The tolerance of all our people against hardship, poverty and unemployment was never lower, because they have been assured that we now have the ability to create affluence and that governments can be relied on to give them guaranteed incomes. In desperation youth, coloured people, unionized workers, and even school teachers turn to violence in their frustration at the absence of any effective leadership in the solution of our basic dilemma. Man must have security, even if in the final analysis it is only the security of knowing that everyone is in equally desperate straits.

We must look at the situation and recognize the fact that if we are going to perpetuate the free enterprise system as an alternative to socialism, we must design some method of increasing capital ownership and capitalists in this country. This is very basic to the direction we are heading today. I repeat, if we continue to follow the direction we are following today, we must think in terms of creating more capitalists in Canada. We must ensure that more individuals become owners of the common and preferred stock of established companies.

An alternative to socialism as proposed is the establishment of a type of insurance company or consortium of companies to ensure individual and group loans to Canadians by existing financial institutions in order to buy newly issued common stocks of publicly listed Canadian companies. I suggest that one precedent for this would be insured house mortgages under the National Housing Act, with government backing.

I suggest that it might be possible to use the ten blue chip stocks in Canada—those companies that have the best growth performance in this country—in order to ensure this type of investment. If we look to the performance of our ten top Canadian companies I suggest it would be much easier to guarantee these stocks than it would be the stocks of individual houses. One does not know the type of ownership he will get in respect of a house, in stock terms. To use the terminology of the range, it is easier to kick hell out of a house than it is to kick hell out of a house financed by ownership stock. This should be borne in mind. It would necessitate amendment to the Income Tax Act to exempt from corporate income tax the new common stock issues that companies issue to finance their corporate expansions, provided that all earnings, less depreciation and other approved allowances, were paid out to the new stockholders.

This would enable the new stockholders who have borrowed the money to buy stocks to repay their loans and the interest thereon from the earnings of the stocks rather than from their own pockets. There is some precedence for this. I refer to the rapid depreciation that is now being allowed in respect of plants being built in designated areas.

I believe when we look at the earnings of the top ten companies in Canada we will see there is a net earnings picture, before tax, of something between 16 per cent and 33 per cent. From the evidence in the United States it would seem that 90 per cent of the capital expansion of companies comes from late earnings, and 10 per cent from new share issues. I suggest that if these companies were to pay out to the shareholders the 90 per cent they now retain and finance their capital expansion through new shareholdings, it would be possible for all the basic participants in industry to get a part of the action. Obviously, loans will be insured only for the purchase of new common stocks approved by the insuring company. I think this would cover most of the new stock issues of most mature Canadian companies.

I suggest, in order to prevent what we might term the greedy taking advantage of this socially desirable situation, the purchase of such stock by individuals should be limited to perhaps $2,000 per year per adult up to a certain date each year, and that thereafter the individual's limit be progressively raised until all the new issue is purchased. The companies whose stocks are not approved by the insuring companies of course will have to be financed in the conventional way.

I hate at this time, because of the present situation, to refer to the growth trend of companies but I should like to refer to the pre-Benson days when things were running along normally in this country and the businessmen did not have the wits, as we might say, scared out of them. I could refer to the growth of the economy in Japan, as an example. The growth of Japan is probably the most dynamic in the world today. The Japanese economy has been expanding since World War II, for the last 20 or 25 years, at an average rate of more than 9 per cent per year. I think it was only last year that it reached something like 13 per cent. Practically all this growth has been financed internally in Japan.

I suggest that the situation in Japan bears looking at. I see no reason why we could not create the same type of performance here in Canada, with the type of country and people we have. I do not think what I am suggesting can be brought about overnight; I believe it would probably take a decade or more to accomplish it. However, if we could establish the policy of a second income, I believe this would automatically reduce one of the many problems we have today. I refer to such things as welfare and strikes. In this way the factory workers would participate in industry, would be shareholders in industry and would feel they were part of the situation.

There are a great many government hand-outs in the society we have today, but I say again a permanent solution cannot be found in the present method of redistributing wealth, which I suppose is based on what we might term the Robin Hood principle of plundering some to give to others. In addition to plundering some to give to others, we have the government stealing from us all through inflation. This is a continual process. No one can deny that these factors are present. We are witnessing this every day, and it is growing.

In contrast, the suggestion I have made is based upon the principle of helping our people become self-supporting by participating in the economy both as workers and owners. Under these conditions I think we would find that social strife would reduce rapidly because people would be more content to do their own thing. I do not believe they would be continually attempting to get a bigger piece of a limited economic cake by means of coercion by government, by groups and by labour unions. I am suggesting that anybody in this House who believes in the principle of free enterprise, and who believes that the government should not merely take over and distribute everything, would agree—when I say everybody, I include all parties in this House—that we should see that the workers have a piece of the action. We have to make more capitalists in this country. I sincerely believe this is the only alternative to what might ultimately become a completely socialist state.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question? The question is on the amendment. All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

[Mr. Speaker.]

• (9:00 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, it will come as no great surprise to hon. members to learn that I intend to move an amendment, the one which was telegraphed ahead today by my leader. I had been waiting in the hope that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and members on the government side would recognize the validity and usefulness of such an amendment and approach me during the supper hour to indicate that they would accept an amendment to the bill along those lines.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Their failure to do so compels me to go through the formality of moving the amendment. Many hon. members, including myself, have wondered why this bill was moved at this time. We have heard the valid and articulate reasons advanced by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) for the amendment I am going to move. Why else did the Minister of Finance choose this particular time to move this bill? I wondered about this until I read the press release which accompanied the introduction of the bill for second reading. It is magnificent document, a tremendous document.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: What happened? The Canada Development Corporation has been in the process of gestation for eight years.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: I assume that when the Liberal government first came to power, they prepared this press release and it has been lying around ever since.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if we could have peace and quiet in the chamber. It is difficult for the Chair to follow the hon. member's statement.

Mr. Baldwin: Suddenly, the Minister of Finance, having a few spare moments when he was not employed in his other activities, reached into a drawer, pulled out this press release and read it. What did it say? Let me read in part its beautiful language:

> This government believes that there is a role to be played by a new institution, backed by substantial sources of Canadian capital and managed by skilled, experienced Canadian entrepreneurs, to help make possible fuller Canadian participation in the growth and development of Canada. Such an institution will be able to work closely with other members of the Canadian business and financial community and provide Canadian entrepreneurship with the access to more substantial concentrations of Canadian capital required to ensure a greater Canadian presence in the growth of our own economy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: So it goes, Mr. Speaker, nauseating page after nauseating page. What happened? On reading this press release, the Minister of Finance said, "A press release like this demands a bill to support it." That is why we have this bill today. He felt that such a press release should not be abandoned in the arid atmosphere of the Minister of Finance's drawers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: I mean his desk drawers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (9:10 p.m.)

Mr. Baldwin: Every time the Minister of Finance gets up to propose a bill—and I told him this today—I begin to wish that this nation were wearing a chastity belt.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benson: You have been reading English newspapers.

Mr. Baldwin: There might be one area in which a bill of this kind could be useful. Many years ago I recommended something like this: there is a place, a limited place, for risk capital being supplied at the behest of the government; that is, in the case of northern development. The minister did not mention that in his press release. Many years ago I had the pleasure of attending a meeting in Edmonton in connection with northern development. At that time it was pointed out by people prominent in the business of investment capital that though the development of the north was essential, capital was not prepared to go into the north because of the high level of risk involved. At that time I proposed that a limited area of legislation of this kind might well be developed for the purpose of helping the north.

Mr. Benson: PanArctic.

Mr. Baldwin: The minister is being ludicrous, as usual. There is no connection. This bill, as my leader said today, is premature. It serves no useful purpose at this time. When we as members of the House of Commons are presented with legislation, we must ask ourselves: What evil is it intended to remedy? What difficulty is it intended to cure? Is it likely to achieve the results intended? On this occasion the answer from these benches must be a resounding no. We say the bill in its present form cannot cure the defects to which reference has been made in this debate. Nevertheless, we are prepared to consider what is proposed as far as principles are concerned. What the government now proposes is like giving aspirin to a man with a broken leg, or trying to cure pregnancy by applying vanishing cream. It just won't work.

An hon. Member: That's a good one.

Mr. Baldwin: It is for this reason we have suggested that the House, through the instrumentality of one of its committees, examine what is proposed in light of certain information. We know that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) will, shortly we hope, be bringing before the House and the country a report dealing with the whole vexed and difficult question of the national ownership of our resources. There is a real problem here. We recognize it; all the speakers from this side of the House have said so. My leader stated it categorically this afternoon. We want the remedy to be an appropriate one and applied in the light of proven, established facts. We do not yet have those facts. We want them before we continue with this bill. This is why the Leader of the Opposition suggested that an amendment at the present time could profitably be put forward.

After all, this is not only a Canadian problem; it is a world problem. It has arisen in the United Kingdom and in all the countries of Europe. The other day I was reading in the last issue of the World Federalist an interesting article entitled "The multinational corporation." Before I move the amendment I should like to read part of this article as follows:

> No scheme of world order can afford to neglect either the enormous power controlled by the multinational corporations, or the special problems created both by the artificial nationality of each corporation and by the real national citizenship of the individual members of its managerial elite.
> The first step in dealing with this problem is to recognize the reality that exists—the condition of anarchy, in which each multinational corporation is very largely a law unto itself. This reality was succinctly stated by the Barber commission (a Canadian royal commission study of prices of farm machinery):
> "These multinational corporations are independent of the national authority of individual countries. At the present time no international authority exists which can exercise control over them."

The article suggests three approaches, and I deal with this because it becomes apparent that the issue we are considering is not one which is peculiar to us; intellectuals, academics and politicians all over the world, particularly in the west, are deeply concerned about it. Here are the suggestions which are made in this article:

> A supranational organization, an agency of the United Nations might be established with three branches:
> (a) A legislative branch which would work out by negotiation between the interested parties, experts acting for the corporations themselves, other experts acting on behalf of the nations permitting the export of capital, and still others representing nations permitting foreign investment within their territories, a comprehensive set of rules. These rules would make conditions uniform and predictable for the transfer of capital and skills across international boundaries, and from one jurisdiction to another.

(b) The judicial branch, expanded from the machinery provided in the 1966 Convention for the Settlement of Investment Disputes, would provide impartial third party judgment to settle disputes and thereby establish precedents for the avoidance of similar disputes in the future

(c) An administrative and audit branch to license the operation of world corporations agreeing to conform in their operations to the rules laid down by the legislative branch, and to submit to the jurisdiction of the panels of experts set up under the judicial branch; to audit and supervise the accounts of the world corporations, to collect taxes to cover the cost of these operations and to provide revenue for the United Nations.

I do not accept this approach in its totality, but I quote the article to support my contention that this issue is one which is engaging the attention of many people in the world and that for us to rush through the kind of inadequate legislation placed before us at this time, without knowledge of the facts which will be brought before the House in the various reports mentioned in my amendment, would be absolute nonsense. While accepting the principle that something needs to be done, we say: Let us wait until we have the facts, and then act. With this as notice for the amendment, I move, seconded by my hon. friend from South Shore (Mr. Crouse):

That all the words after "That" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"Bill C-219 be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, together with the eighteenth report of that committee in the previous session on the white paper on tax reform and such report, if any, as may be tabled in this session, on the inquiry by the Minister of National Revenue into foreign investment in Canada".

Your Honour will have noted with great interest that the amendment adds somewhat to the traditional form which has been accepted in the past. We wish to make demonstrably plain the precise terms of the material we want the committee to cover. If, however, there should be some doubt in Your Honour's mind as to the acceptability of the amendment in this form, I will be prepared to omit the last words so that there will be no problem at all in connection with the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will appreciate that there are serious procedural difficulties about the form of the proposed amendment. The hon. member admitted he was aware of the difficulties. They relate to the second part of the amendment. He seeks to import into the consideration that would be given by the committee matters such as the eighteenth report of the committee dealing with the white paper on tax reform. This part of the amendment would hardly be acceptable from the point of view of relevancy.

I understood earlier today from remarks made in the course of debate that a reasoned amendment would be introduced. This is, of course, not a reasoned amendment. The hon. member himself indicated that he did not propose to move an amendment which would oppose the principle of the bill, which is the essence of a reasoned amendment. I do not want to belabour the point. The hon. member said that having made the intent of his motion clear, he would be prepared to abide by the traditional form and be satisfied if the amendment were to read as follows, and I will put it formally, subject to the assent of the hon. member:

That all the words after "That" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"Bill C-219 be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs".

The hon. member indicates that he is satisfied with the amendment being put to the House in this form.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, in the course of his remarks the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) said that this bill was serving no useful purpose. I think it is serving a useful purpose. As such, it is uniting people in the opposition against the government's bill. It must be an indication of how irrational is the government today when the Conservative and New Democratic parties alike, for their own reasons, can see little good in it.

A reading of the bill makes obvious why this is so. The bill does not make any sense. It does not make any sense in setting up a body to do something that the private sector could do well and in some cases is doing well on its own. Neither does it make sense in terms of setting up an organization that should be within the jurisdiction of the public sector as an instrument of government policy. That is why we have run into this situation. Obviously, the government has found itself in a bind as a result of a promise it made many years ago. It hoped to avoid keeping its promise but found that it could not do so because of public pressure. Therefore it brought in a "nothing" bill, a bill about which no one can be enthusiastic. All that this bill will do is unite public opinion in Canada against it.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) because the government wants the bill creating the CDC to be passed for two reasons.

Firstly, they want to help to maintain and develop strong private Canadian companies. Those are not the companies in need of assistance, but those which are on the verge of bankruptcy.

Secondly, through the establishment of the CDC, they would like to multiply the investment prospects in the field of economic development for Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, the return on investments made by the CDC will have to be competitive and proportionate to the risk, since its shares will be sold to the public at large.

The government wants the distribution of shares to be as wide as possible among Canadian citizens. Thus shares will be sold to Canadian citizens only, and nobody will be allowed to own more than 3 per cent of voting shares.

I should like to analyse this. In the beginning, the outlay of the government of Canada will be $250 million and the capitalization will be $2 billion. It is anticipated that the first sale of equity shares to the public will be at a price of approximately $5 per share. As the government will always be the major shareholder, it will keep at least 10 per cent of the voting shares. The CDC will not be a crown corporation or department, but a company which will operate basically under the Canada Corporations Act. It will be managed by a board of 18 to 21 directors and the government will have a choice between naming not more than four of them or exercizing the voting right of its shares with regard to the complete list of directors.

Speaking of the CDC, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) said in substance:

> No other Canadian corporation has as its objectives national interest and profits.

Such a premise is false and I am going to prove it. He also added the following nauseating statement:

> The national interest and the profit motive are not always compatible.

May I point out to the minister that these two objectives rarely go together. I fully agree that the companies and their control must remain Canadian and I think the government has made another blunder in trying to achieve an impossible balance between the two objectives mentioned by the Minister of Finance, by resorting to a socialization of the Canadian capital.

Mr. Speaker, if the national interest is to be truly advocated, then the best way of solving the problem would be to pass legislation with respect to the monetary system. If, on the contrary, one wishes to make a profit, the private sector is much more competent than the public sector, as evidenced by the failure of Crown corporations managed by the government.

A mixture like that proposed by the minister will not solve any problem, but it will have all the disadvantages of both the public and the private sector. So why should we establish the CDC? They say that the CDC will remain completely outside politics and that the federal government will not interfere with that organization.

The minister maintains that according to Bill C-219 the federal government will have the choice of either appointing a maximum of four administrators or having a voting right corresponding to the number of its shares.

If the number of shares held by the government gives it voting right exceeding 50 per cent of the number of all shares issued, the Deputy Minister of Finance and the Deputy Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce will be appointed to the board but without a voting right.

Mr. Speaker, these provisions are supposedly intended to establish the necessary degree of additional co-ordination between the Corporation and the government, during the initial phase of its existence. It is added, however, that the Corporation will need some degree of independence so that it may reach efficiently its objectives.

But the government will always want—as is its habit—to hold at least 10 per cent of the voting shares in order to be able to exercice on the global policy of the Corporation the influence corresponding to its shares.

• (9:30 p.m.)

However, the Minister of Finance states that he will not involve himself in politics. The control he exercises, provides him with one more device for selling his tough policy to Canadians.

Since Bill C-219 outlines the Corporation's method of financing, the government will need strong control powers, and that is what the government wants.

Mr. Speaker, it is intended to offer common stock to the public at a price of about $5 per share, in order to encourage wide distribution of shares throughout Canada. That means it is hoped that Canadians who have never invested before will now do so. Those people are not really capitalists, accustomed to risks and therefore to losses, but rather workers, labourers, who will invest not because they hope to be reimbursed by the government, or the Corporation as a financial entity, but because such shares will be guaranteed by the government.

In this way, savings will be tapped, the purchasing power of Canadians will be reduced and, consequently, the gap between the rich and the poor will be widened. For these people, it is not, as it should be, a question of investing in the future development of a great country, but of investing in a company whose shares are guaranteed by the federal government. In acting in this way, Mr. Speaker, the government discourages people, because it is tapping those savings and that capital. It is preventing Canadians from investing personally in this country in which they believe.

It is a new and disguised form of Canada savings bonds. Whatever the Minister of Finance may say, the Canada Development Corporation will always be, judging by its shareholders, similar to a Crown corporation, and the government, politically, will never allow the Canada Development Corporation to sustain a loss in order to protect the national interest. And therein lies the dilemma.

Should such a situation ever come up and it is bound to come owing to the conflict between the national interest and the profit motive, the CDC will have no function to perform. At the present time each investor seeks profits. He does not need any government enterprise to find profitable investments, and companies liable to pay dividends to their shareholders will not need any capital from the CDC.

So in trying to protect the national interest the Canadian Development Corporation will be a failure. The businesses in need of its capital will not get it because they are not profitable at the present time. They will be sold to foreign interests, financed by private capital which can sustain an initial loss in order to make future profits.

As the government will be politically involved in the CDC, it will be unable to sustain a loss at the start in order to make profits later.

Canada Development Corporation

Mr. Speaker, the avowed purpose of the government in setting up the CDC is merely a political one, of course, especially in this period of our economic history when unemployment has reached a peak. The government will have to underwrite the shares and investments of the Corporation shareholders, because if the investors lose confidence in the CDC, they will lose confidence in the government. This is another reason why it will be a political organization.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, all Canadian taxpayers will be shareholders of the Corporation, since the government will hold at least 10 per cent of the CDC shares and will levy the necessary funds from the Canadian taxpayers, so that they will be forcibly involved in a socialist scheme. And this, under the disguised form of the party now in office.

So state socialism is imposed upon us. The government is interfering in another sector of Canadian life in a disguised and dishonest manner because it does not define both sides of the issue as it should. Thus, each decrease in the price of shares will be a loss for the government and, consequently, for each Canadian and it will be put down as a national liability, that is the liability of each Canadian.

From what I have just said, it is easy to see that each consecutive government will have to impose a strict control over the activities of the CDC, a control that will go far beyond its power according to the percentage of shares it holds. It is a matter of political survival and once again we have to conclude that the hon. Minister of Finance, through the CDC, wants to throw dust in the eyes of Canadians to make them forget the fundamental problem of the present economic unbalance.

As I have just said, the Canadian industry and economy are being and will continue to be increasingly controlled by two great powers: the Americans and the central government. The private sector will hang between the two, threatened with extinction, because it will have to compete. I refer to the large and small Canadian investors who will be squeezed between foreign investments and the taxing power of the government which, in its white paper on tax reform, discourages profits and growth in that sector of our economy. Consequently, it is an underhanded but sure way of taking it over and socializing it, as was the case with the Farm Credit Corporation, the Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation and all the programs of the government which tend to "lure each citizen" into repayment plans if he wishes to become an owner.

Mr. Speaker, those control programs were always dealing with the national interest and not with profitability; naturally, this has been realized. If we really wanted to protect the Canadian industry, we would not confine ourselves strictly to that criterium of profit and we would be much more interested in national values. I am surprised to realize upon reading the speech of the Minister of Finance that all along, he thought only about his political future, the future of his party, and that he forgot the future of Canadians.

There is still a way to solve that problem, which the government has not often used. It is a program of allowances or subsidies given directly to the company in order to protect those who do not want to sell their concern but who are compelled to do so because of their financial situation.

But instead of rescuing borderline companies, the government will endeavour to take over the larger companies and let the smaller sink, with the hope that both will disappear for the benefit of foreign interests or of the government. In doing so, companies which are squeezed between these two sectors are placed in the same situation as the individual who has to rely on welfare. Indidentally, an ever increasing number of companies apply for grants to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion just as a citizen will go to the welfare office to pick up his handout.

This is the situation we are in, Mr. Speaker, and not only will the CDC not solve this problem, but it will increase it by depriving these companies of the capital they require.

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, such a system would be similar to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion's program—and this can be easily demonstrated—except that it would be managed by only one corporation and not necessarily in a specific area. This system could be designed to protect industry instead of letting it be overtaken by foreigners; but there is no government program to assist these industries indeed, they are being left aside while we are dealing with bigger and smaller corporations. The big ones we will own, and the smaller ones will be wiped off.

We could also provide that all newly established corporations should have a given percentage of Canadian ownership; we could also restrict the sale of shares to foreign interests since some foreign capital is always necessary.

In any way, in the light of this brief survey which I honestly attempted to submit, I believe that the CDC will never work out but as an instrument of the federal government's policy and I find this very sad for we are here precisely to give Canadians instruments to help them build their own country.

This legislation will also be a policy instrument serving the federal government because Canada is now more than ever in need of a concrete policy to deal with the program of Canadian control of industry since the main requirement in this field is national interest. In view of these factors, however, this bill merely amounts to a poultice on a wooden leg. After all these surveys, we shall wonder whether, by passing Bill C-219, we shall actually settle the question. If we really want to face reality, we shall realize that we are bogged down in the system, that this is just some dust in the eyes of Canadians and that the problem has not been dealt with properly.

The participation of every Canadian citizen to the economic life of this country is necessary. Each Canadian should be given a chance to really participate, of his own valition, freely and safely to the development and progress of this country or to its building.

Through the passing of bills such as this one, we go after Canadian capital, we undermine the savings of the Canadian people and we make them overlook the real problem. In fact, we merely reduce the purchasing power of the ordinary citizens, workers, laborers, farmers, parents, students, to the benefit of big companies and the government.

Thus the Minister of Finance says at the end of the year: Our budget has increased. Of course! With money coming from the pockets of the Canadian people, it is easy to increase one's pile; but one forgets that it behooves the government to make that money available to the Canadian people. That is one thing. Our taxation system must be reformed, but not by discouraging Canadian enterprise, as the white paper of the Minister of Finance is doing by saying on the one hand that it wants to help the corporations and on the other hand, by discouraging them and bringing about their disappearance.

The second reform—and the most important one—that must be brought about to put order in this country should be a monetary one, so that instead of implementing plans and still more plans and putting poultices on wooden legs, like the CDC, would do, we should give ourselves monetary tools with real effects on Canada's economic life, give each citizen the tool he needs to invest in the Canadian economy.

Let us not ask Canadians to invest in the CDC or somewhere else in Canada if they cannot even provide for themselves. And considering the fact that more than 45 per cent of the Quebec unemployed are less than 25 years old, one can easily understand that they cannot invest in the CDC and that the CDC is unable to cope with their problem. To be honest, one must recognize that more than 35 per cent of the Canadian people live out of public funds, especially federal funds. Those people are excluded from the economic life of this country and do not have a single cent to invest in the CDC or anywhere else. What is being done about those people? They are being forgotten and no bill is passed for them.

We are being presented Bill C-219 to encourage Canadians to invest. But who shall invest in this corporation? Those already well-off and well-to-do. The government will hold 10 per cent of the shares. This means that it will oblige our citizens to invest in this corporation.

Now we ask this question: What will be the profit margin? The profit of the well-to-do will be quite considerable, that of the small shareholders will be minimal.

Mr. Speaker, the taxpayer who can barely pay his taxes and cannot afford to embark freely in this sytem will get zero plus zero which is zero. The well-to-do who will freely choose to invest in this corporation and to buy shares will make a profit once again at the expense of the small savings and of each Canadian. Once more the Canadian government will have cheated Canadians by showing them the fine picture that the CDC is and not telling them that by creating the CDC the low income citizens are swindled out of their money for the benefit of the well-to-do.

The socialists will say: let us take from the big ones and give to the small ones! But in so doing the problem is not solved since our economic system will keep on producing big ones and small ones. And tomorrow morning, the same thing starts over again.

This explains why, today, several socialist countries must return to some sort of co-operation or participation, failing which they discourage freedom, security and initiative in the individual and prevent personal fulfillment.

Mr. Speaker, if the government genuinely serves the Canadian people, if it wishes the development of this country, if it wants all its citizens, young or not so young, to invest in Canada and share in its economic activity, it must give up such poultices and stop throwing dust in people's eyes. Mr. Speaker, it must take more direct, efficient and humane means and give each citizen, especially to the small wage earner, an opportunity to contribute to the economic activity of this country.

This is the heart of the matter, this is where the tragedy occurs. Those who rely for a living on welfare or veterans allowances, or on pensions, those who eke out a living, are directly dependent on society.

Our country is tremendously rich: it is an affluent nation. However, its poor are left to decay in poverty, to keep crawling. The leader of the Ralliement créditiste (Mr. Caouette) says very vividly and truthfully: Hardship exists among plenty. Though paradoxical, the remark is true.

The government, allegedly to help the humble people, the unemployed, the poor and the people on welfare, refuses to listen to their representations. Instead of really trying to solve their problems, by giving them the necessary funds to share in the economic activity of this country and also invest some money, it turns its head away and keeps providing incentives for the better off.

Not so long ago, I read an article which appeared in Le Devoir and bore the signature of Mr. Brody, a lecturer at the Industrial Relations Department of the University of Montreal.

This reporter said that an economic policy is mostly a choice between several options.

The successive governments for many years never felt free to introduce such legislation because they were under the control of high finance.

• (9:50 p.m.)

I see that the Minister of Finance is frowning. That is all he can do before high finance, because he dares not speak. Here again is a proof of it: a bill is introduced about the CDC, a corporation at the service of high finance and not of the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, governing a country means first, to make a choice, and when you cannot make that choice, then you should pull aside. We are anxious to push these people aside, Mr. Spaker, because they seem unable to make that choice.

We have to choose between taking from the rich and giving a little to the poor or putting the economic system in the service of all Canadians, whatever their language, their race, their religion, the thickness of their wallets, their goodwill or their good heart. There will come a moment when this choice will have to be made.

There is a third choice: to put everybody on an equal footing and say: Today, we run the steam-roller; we crush all Canadians and have them all fit in the same mold.

Those are the three options.

Encourage the present system, get bogged down even further, change nothing, or else introduce rash reforms through white papers and millions of dollars, without ever attempting the monetary reform. That is the first option, and precisely the one the Minister of Finance opted for.

That is the choice made by the Progressive Conservatives and that is why we say that there is no difference between the two major parties.

There is a second option, that of socializing everyone, and a third, which we support aggressively, that of giving every Canadian, while respecting his freedom and his security, the necessary monetary power, on the basis of our Canadian production, so that he might receive the dividend based on our production.

Indeed, what is the objective of the Minister of Finance? That amounts to giving to a small group of persons, to big finance, the possibility of drawing dividends from the investments of the CDC.

Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Finance says that it is good, we say that it must be good for all Canadians. If that is good for a small group of persons in Canada, he must organize a similar system, not through the CDC but through the Bank of Canada, in order to give each Canadian enough purchasing power to buy our production and allow him too to get the benefit of his work, of his investment, of Canadian production.

Such is the spirit of Social Credit, Mr. Speaker. It is not a revolutionary spirit, but a spirit of reform aimed at putting money at the disposal of the human being so that the individual will be in a position where he will be able to use the money, not only to his personal advantage but also to that of all Canadians.

Evidently, neither the unemployed, nor the recipients of welfare, nor the physically handicapped are interested. And even if they were, they do not have the means required for participation in the economic life of the country.

If the government truly wants to give those people a chance to be real Canadians, if it has faith in the future of Canada, in Canada's resources, in the human value of the Canadian people, then what is it waiting for to give the Canadian people the monetary means permitting each citizen to receive his share in Canadian investments and Canadian production?

In short, Mr. Speaker, I am strongly against the bill because it will not solve the problem, because it diverts our attention from the real issue. Besides not being real solution—and this is worse—it moves us away from the answer because it continues to patronize the financiers who already exploit Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, this bill not only does not solve anything, but it will further discourage Canadians from participating in economic activities. The gap between rich and poor will widen.

Mr. Speaker, this is a basic question. We in Canada are living in a climate of crisis and tension. Each Canadian is searching for his identity, whatever his language, his religion and his birth place. Everyone would like to do something for his country, because everyone from coast to coast has a feeling that there is something the matter.

Mr. Speaker, now is the time to bring in the only reform that this government, like those which preceded it, never dared introduce, namely a monetary reform whereby the Bank of Canada would be put at the service of the people of Canada. This would make it possible to distribute the difference between Canadian production and consumption as dividends so that every Canadian would receive his share of profit and production.

Mr. Speaker, those were the remarks I wanted to make. I hope the government will consider this proposal seriously and will agree to respect Parliament by listening to whatever the members of the opposition have to say. We are not here as members of the opposition wereby to object to legislation but mainly to submit proposals and express useful criticism. This is why I say that this bill not only will not solve the problem but that it will draw us further away from any true solution which would consist in putting money at the disposal of each and every Canadian through the Bank of Canada.

[English]

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie): I should like to participate briefly in this debate, Mr. Speaker. I understand that there is a member on the other side of the House who also wishes to speak tonight. I wonder if there is disposition by the House to agree to sit past ten o'clock so that I would not have to rush through my speech.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Horner: No.

Mr. Watson: I am one member of this House who has for a number of years impatiently awaited the creation of the Canada Development Corporation.

Mr. Saltsman: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Watson: We have talked about the CDC inside and outside the House since 1963. Initial public reaction, primarily business reaction, to the CDC proposal of several years ago was not favourable and this adverse initial reaction has undoubtedly influenced the present Bill C-219. Reassurance for the initial detractors of the concept of the bill is nowhere more clearly spelled out than in the last three lines of clause 6, the objects clause, which provide that the objects of the CDC "shall be carried out in anticipation of profit and in the best interests of the shareholders as a whole."

I approve the major objectives set out for the CDC, which are to develop strong Canadian control and manage corporations in the private sector of the economy and to provide broader opportunities for Canadians to invest and participate in the economic development of Canada. I am confident that the CDC will play a major role in future Canadian development and that it can contribute to improving Canadian competitiveness in world markets in the corporate rationalizations, amalgamations and arrangements which we expect the CDC to take.

The CDC, by stimulating and encouraging such changes in Canadian industry, will strengthen our industrial structure and consequently render this structure less vulnerable to foreign takeovers.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—DOCKYARD EMPLOYEES WAGE DISPUTE—INTERVENTION OF INDUSTRY SPECIALIST—AMENDMENT OF OFFER TO REMOVE DISPARITY

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, what brings me here this evening is the negotiation that is currently going on between Treasury Board and 1,750 east coast ship repair workers at the Halifax dockyard and about 1,200 west coast ship repair workers at the Esquimalt dockyard. As anybody who was in the House earlier today is well aware, the groups on both coasts have taken strike votes after turning down a conciliation offer, or the latest offer from the employer, the government of Canada. In both cases the vote is in favour of a strike, so that very large ramifications arise from the fact that the government is not able to make peace with its dockyard employees.

I shall not deal with the whole of this problem, Mr. Speaker, because I am rather close to the scene in the Halifax area and since 1957 I have been working on the side of the east coast employees and trying to better their lot. I am rather hesitant, as well, because as a Maritimer and the member for Halifax-East Hants I have been annoyed at the discrepancy in the salaries for essentially the same type of work on the east and west coasts. There are other things that annoy me. One is that the bargaining group for these craftsmen was certified on January 11, 1968, and—believe it or not—it is now working on the agreement to be effective from October 1, 1968, to September 30, 1970. This makes the subject under discussion rather historical. However, the men involved have not been paid a proper wage for that period of time and now we have to start with the period since September 30, 1970, and bring their wages up to date. Some hon. members may recall the remarks of my colleague from Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) who mentioned another group not involved in this dispute, unless the situation should change with the setting up of picket lines. I refer to the general workers in the dockyard, who also will be looking for an increase in salary.

Mr. Speaker, I think the shame of the matter is that when we set up bargaining legislation a couple of years ago we thought that steps would be taken to come to grips with bargaining positions and collective agreements within the public service of Canada. That has not been the case, despite the assurances given in committee. I was a member of that committee and believed those assurances. The fact is, however, that government bargaining with employees in those categories is hopelessly out of date.

What are we faced with now? A conciliation report was issued by Mr. R. Gallagher, chairman, Mr. Peter Sadlier-Brown, the union nominee, and Mr. James P. Nichol, the government nominee. Mr. Gallagher and Mr. Sadlier-Brown recommended, for the east coast, 37 cents more an hour this time around and 37 cents more an hour next time around, for a total increase of 74 cents. For the west coast they recommended 42 cents and 42 cents. This would have brought the east coast rate from $3.31 to $4.05 an hour and the west coast rate from $4.16 to $5. Mr. Nichol, the government nominee, proposed 27 cents and 29 cents for the east coast and 34 cents and 36 cents for the west coast. In its offer to the employees the government proposed a 42 and 42 cents formula for the west coast and a 28 and 28 cents formula for the east coast. In effect, this was taking the majority figure in the conciliation report for the west coast employees and the minority figure for the east coast employees.

This was so incredible that I immediately asked for leave under Standing Order 43 to have the matter debated in this House, but I was denied that opportunity. I suppose the enormity of the crime had not sunk in with hon. members because I asked for leave before anybody had learned what was going on. On subsequent days I asked questions. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) has also asked questions as have my colleagues from Dartmouth-Halifax East and Moose Jaw.

I say that this is an outrage and everyone ought to ask questions about the government's approach in dealing with these employees. The odd thing is that under the new collective bargaining agreement many side issues were resolved very nicely. When the whole business is done with and this matter is part of the collective bargaining agreement, some of the long outstanding grievances will have been cleared up. Unfortunately, however, when you get down to the bread and butter issues you get down to wages.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, may I conclude with one sentence?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

Mr. Alastair Gillespie (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to reply on this occasion to the question raised by the hon. member opposite. By way of introduction I might point out, as I think he already knows but as other hon. members of the House may not, that negotiations with the ship repair bargaining agent, Federal Government Dockyards Trades and Labour Council, commenced on August 19, 1970. After 13 meetings which occurred between that date and the middle of October, they broke down. On that occasion the council applied for conciliation and the conciliation board met in January of this year. Pay was the only real issue throughout the negotiations.

Mr. Forrestall: Then why was money never mentioned?

Mr. Gillespie: The hon. member has commented on the recommendations of the majority report and of the minority report.

Mr. Forrestall: Why was money never mentioned?

Mr. Gillespie: It seems to me that in his remarks he overlooked one of the key questions with which the government in dealing with employees must concern itself. It must concern itself with two questions. First, it must consider the fair treatment of the employee, as the hon. member emphasized in his remarks, and it must concern itself, in these approaches, with the fair treatment of the taxpayer. After all, in a situation of this kind the government, as a negotiator, represents the public purse.

The hon. member used the phrase "the proper wage". I think he will agree with me that in the process of negotiations many factors are considered, not the least of which, and perhaps the most important, is the going wage rate in the area. I am sure that he knows these figures. It might be helpful to the House if they were placed on record. When we compare the so-called disparity between east coast and west coast rates as represented by this contract, we must also bear in mind that there is a significant disparity between the east coast rates proposed by the employer in the contract and rates paid in the Halifax area by employers who are competitors of the federal government.

I am informed that in May of last year the basic rate in the Halifax shipyards was about $3.30 an hour. In May of 1971, the rate would have been $3.50, which would compare with—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The parliamentary secretary's time has expired.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—INCENTIVE GRANT TO MICRO-MAX PRODUCTS TO ESTABLISH PLANT IN MAGOG, QUEBEC—ASSISTANCE TO CANADIAN DRUG INDUSTRY

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I asked a question of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) with respect to the $3.8 million incentive grant that had been made to Micro-Max Products Limited of Kalamazoo, Michigan, to assist in establishing a drug plant in Magog, Quebec. The minister replied that the grant had been made according to the regulations of his department. When I attempted to follow up the question and inquire if grants had been made to hard pressed individual Canadian pharmaceutical manufacturers, no reply was forthcoming.

I have raised this question in the adjournment debate because there seems to be a fundamental conflict in the government's attempts to assist in the development of truly Canadian industry. I would like to know from tonight's spokesman for the government why it is blowing hot and cold on this issue, in one instance saying we must support our native industry and on the other hand providing large incentive grants to companies which are obviously foreign-owned.

The independent Canadian pharmaceutical industry is relatively small. However, it has been playing a significant role in the continuing campaign to bring down the high cost of drugs in Canada. More recently, the independent segment has been hard pressed, largely because of the passing of Bill C-102 two years ago. That bill was piloted by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford). Instead of bringing down the high cost of drugs, even with the 12 per cent relief from federal sales tax, it has tended to threaten the one segment of the industry that had been making a substantial contribution in the war against pollution.

I do not have time to go into the subject in detail but there is an excellent article in the February issue of Executive magazine headed, "High-priced drugs are still, well, high-priced". The subheading reads, "And who really expected anything different?" Before the government moved to make compulsory licences mandatory on request, these small independents were carrying out the same kind of operation. Since Bill C-102 passed in 1969, 60 compulsory licences have been granted. All of these have been for importation, none for manufacturing. This has caused several unfortunate side effects with respect to the Canadian industry. It is downgrading the research activities of the larger companies. For example, Ayerst moved their research activity across the border into New York state because of the bill.

I would like to receive answers to the following specific questions. What steps have been taken by the government to financially strengthen the independent Canadian segment of the pharmaceutical industry as promised at the time Bill C-102 was passed? If possible, I would like the reply to be in terms of a figure for the grants that have been made to companies like Micro Chemicals, Empire Laboratories and Delmar Chemicals. If it is not possible to provide the information during the course of this discussion, perhaps it could be supplied in the form of a statement on motions or in a letter to myself.

We are all concerned about the continuing high cost of drugs in Canada. The Ontario government, through its Parcost program—that is, prescriptions at reasonable cost—has made the first real break in bringing down the high cost of drugs. Another device talked about at the moment is bulk buying for hospitals, which would perhaps provide cheaper drugs through this particular outlet. I think it is quite unfair to penalize the small segment of the independent Canadian pharmaceutical industry, which pioneered in this field, by providing incentives assistance to American-based companies and on the other hand allowing existing Canadian independents to be absorbed by the larger American companies which are continually knocking at their door. I trust the government will take action to remove this anomaly.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, one of the principal purposes of Bill C-102, which involved changes in the Patent Act, was to increase competition in the Canadian pharmaceutical industry with a view to supporting the legitimate Canadian interest in keeping down drug prices. This objective may well serve to strengthen the Canadian pharmaceutical industry. Moreover, the grant offered by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion may also serve to strengthen the Canadian pharmaceutical industry although grants are offered in this case, as in others, to create new jobs in designated slow-growth regions where they are badly needed.

Mr. Dinsdale: And phase out old jobs.

Mr. O'Connell: The hon. member is laughing.

Mr. Dinsdale: I said "And phase out old jobs".

Mr. O'Connell: There are some 375 jobs connected with this grant. The products which Micro-Max Products Limited will be manufacturing are basically new to Canada. They will not duplicate what is being done by existing Canadian companies. This project in Magog, therefore, represents an expansion of the total industry rather than a new competitive factor within it. Indeed, most of its products are intended for the export market, implying a total expansion of the industry in Canada. The company will also be bringing new technology and research capacity into Canada and this, too, should help broaden the base of the industry as a whole.

The hon. member asked how the grant which has been offered compares with assistance given to the independent Canadian drug industry. I am informed that no other pharmaceutical company has applied to the department for financial assistance in locating or expanding in one of the designated regions. If such an application is received, it will certainly be considered in the same way as this one was considered.

In summary, the offered grant of $3.8 million relates to a total investment by the company of some $17.8 million. It will help to create an estimated 375 new jobs directly and it may well broaden and strengthen the total Canadian industry while serving national export goals as well.

Mr. Dinsdale: A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—FEDERAL INTERVENTION IN ACTION BROUGHT BY TEACHERS RESPECTING BRITISH COLUMBIA ORDER IN COUNCIL

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, on February 11 I questioned the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) in regard to consequences arising out of an order in council issued by the government of British Columbia on October 22, 1970. This order in council declared it as public policy that no person teaching or instructing the youth of British Columbia in educational institutions receiving government support shall continue in the employment of the institution if they advocate the policies of the Front de Liberation du Quebec or the overthrow of democratically-elected government by violent means.

Five teachers from such institutions promptly challenged the authority of the British Columbia government to issue such an order in council. In the first place, they declared there is no law passed by the legislative assembly of British Columbia delegating to the executive council or the Lieutenant-Governor in Council the power to pass such an order in council. Secondly, they declared that such an order in council is ultra vires the powers of the province, falling within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada under the British North America Act. The case was slated to come up for trial before the Supreme Court of British Columbia on February 25.

Because of the fundamental issues involved, I asked the Minister of Justice two questions. First, does the federal government plan to intervene in support of the action brought by the five teachers against the government of British Columbia? Second, will the federal government challenge the constitutionality of the order in council? To the first question the minister's answer was in substance no. To the second his answer was silence. Neither answer indicated that he is prepared, as Minister of Justice to uphold the law of this country and the civil rights of the citizen which are endangered when it is flouted.

In defence of his government's action, the Attorney General of British Columbia declared that if the said order in council were passed without legislative authority—which he specifically denies—then it is merely a declaration of government policy, without binding effect, and that therefore the teachers have no reason for their action. Further, the Attorney General disputes the right of the plaintiffs to bring his action in the courts, alleging that none of them has a legal interest which allows the bringing of the suit. But there are features about this order in council which constitute an extremely dangerous threat to the civil liberties of teachers in British Columbia and which should call forth the active interest and involvement of the Minister of Justice, who is charged with protecting the fundamental rights of Canadian citizenship, including freedom of speech and expression.

The British Columbia order in council requires the dismissal of teachers in certain circumstances, but provides no guarantee that those accused and dismissed will be dealt with in accordance with what is usually called due process. There is no mention of who is to judge whether persons accused are in fact guilty, whether they will have the right to know and face their accusers, the right to legal counsel, the right to cross-examine witnesses, the right to the other various safeguards which are essential. Apart from this backdoor attack on civil liberties, it should surely be the concern of the Minister of Justice to protect the federal jurisdiction. When a provincial government attempts to usurp powers which rightly belong to the federal government, it is extremely important that the federal Minister of Justice join in laying before the courts the reasons for striking down such attacks on federal powers.

History teaches that where civil liberties have been destroyed such destruction rarely, if ever, took place overnight; rather, there was an insidious, creeping erosion of the rights of the citizens to which those in authority turned the deaf ear and the blind eye. I appeal to the Minister of Justice to exercise his rightful authority in this case and to show the people of Canada that he is prepared to accept his full responsibility for protecting federal law and federal jurisdiction.

[Translation]

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure for me to act as spokesman for the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) with such a gracious interlocutress. Unfortunately, I am once again unable to accede to the wishes of the charming representative from Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis).

Whatever the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway may think, the Minister of Justice has given a very clear answer to the question that she asked him on February 11, 1971 when he said, and I quote in the language of Shakespeare:

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the matter that is before the court is a provincial order in council. The hon. lady says that the minister did not reply to the second question, but I would point out that he replied that we did not plan to intervene.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of administration of justice which, as far as I know, falls under provincial jurisdiction. I believe this was repeated time and again during the October crisis. It is therefore a sub judice question at the present time owing to an order in council passed by the government of British Columbia.

Consequently, as the Minister of Justice so aptly said in reply to a question by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, the federal government and Department of Justice do not intend to intervene, and they never do, in an area of provincial jurisdiction.

OIL

POSSIBLE MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I wish to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In the light of the public debate now taking place in Canada and in the United States concerning the proposal to construct an oil supply line via pipeline in Alaska and by ocean tanker to United States west coast markets, and arising out of the statement in Washington yesterday attributed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources offering the Mackenzie Valley route as a possible alternative to the Alaska TAPS pipeline route, such statement implying the feasibility of the Mackenzie Valley route and the offer as expressing government policy without public examination of the consequences and ramifications of such a plan, I move, seconded by the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau):

That this House is of the opinion that the government should make the necessary arrangements for a full debate in government time to discuss the whole question of the desirability of constructing oil and/or gas pipelines along the Mackenzie River valley from the Arctic coast to southern Canada and the effect of such an undertaking on, among other things, the ecology of the region, the rights of native peoples, the Canadian economy, the type of ownership thereof and by whom, international trade and Canada's foreign relations.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton West for consideration by the House under the terms of Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member does not have the unanimous consent of the House therefore the motion cannot be put at this time.

CANADA LABOUR (STANDARDS) CODE

PROVISION OF EMPLOYEE PENSIONS AT AGE 55 WHEN UNDERTAKINGS CLOSED

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-227, to amend the Canada Labour (Standards) Code (pension on permanent closing).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Thomson: Mr. Speaker, at the present time employees with many years of service are subject to losing their pension rights when an undertaking permanently closes. The purpose of this bill is to require the employer of such an undertaking, when it is permanently closed, to provide for the employee at age 55 a pension commensurate with the number of years he was in its employ.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

WAR MEASURES ACT—ARREST OF CBC PERSONNEL

Question No. 370—Mr. Coates:

Have any members of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation been arrested under the War Measures Act since October 16, 1970 and, if so (a) what are the names of these individuals (b) what positions did they hold with CBC (c) what was their salary in each instance (d) have charges been laid against them or have they since been released (e) in each instance, are they still employees of CBC?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of the Solicitor General and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: Yes, two as of November 5, 1970. (a) It is not in the public interest to release the names of those persons arrested and released without being charged under the War Measures Act. (b) One employed in the programming department. One employed as a TV producer. (c) It has not been customary for the CBC to disclose such details of internal management and administration. (d) No charges were laid against either person and both have been released. (e) Yes; on their release the two people returned to their employment with the Corporation.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE—CHANGES IN PERSONNEL AS A RESULT OF USE OF COMPUTERS

Question No. 515—Mr. Robinson:

As a result of the use of computers by the Department of National Health and Welfare how many employees have been (a) laid off (b) hired?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Departmental records are not maintained in a manner to reply to this question. A complete reply to this question would be too costly and the Department of National Health and Welfare does not have the staff nor the funds to undertake such a project.

BROADCASTING—RESULTS OF EFFORTS TO PROVIDE MORE POSSIBILITIES OF COLLABORATION AND EXCHANGE

Question No. 605—Mr. Nowlan:

What are the concrete results, to date, of the intensified efforts to provide more possibilities of joint collaboration and exchange, either on a dubbing basis or on a joint production basis with separate sound tracks referred to by Dr. Davidson on June 4, 1970 before the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

The CBC's Program Council, under the chairmanship of the Vice-President, Programming, has the responsibility of promoting the exchange of program material and joint collaboration in production of programs and coverage of events wherever and whenever this is considered desirable. The Program Council includes among its members the Vice-Presidents and General Managers of the French and English language divisions.

A joint program planning group, consisting of senior officers from both French and English services and working under the aegis of the Program Council meets regularly to further inter-service collaboration and to examine specific program ideas and projects which lend themselves to joint production arrangements. Film properties are reviewed with a view to the possibility of use by both language services (including the requirement of dubbing). News, sports, music, special events and documentary programs generally afford the best opportunities for effective use of the same CBC program material by the two language services.

Examples of collaboration between the two language services in the coverage of events include Expo 67 (Montreal): Canada Games (Halifax) 1969; Commonwealth Games (Edinburgh) 1970; Expo 70 (Tokyo); Saskatoon Winter Games (1971); and many others. Joint productions, or dual use by the two networks of the same program material (with adaptations) include the d'Iberville series and the ballet Carmina Burana. Imported programs such as "The Undersea World of Jacques Cousteau" and "The Forsyte Saga" have been scheduled on both CBC English and French TV networks.

Material used on the French network public affairs program "Format 60" has also been used on the English network's "Weekend". The well-known French network commentator Pierre Nadeau has been engaged to do special reporting for "Weekend". The current Canadian TV serial, "Adventures in Rainbow Country" has been converted for broadcast on the French network under the title "Au pays de l'arc-en-ciel".

Programs in the music field include a concert devoted to the music of Manuel de Falla; a concert of Canadian music; the opera "Hansel and Gretel"; a Glenn Gould program; the Canada Day program broadcast from the National Arts Centre July 1st; between 40 and 50 programs included under the series title "Son et Images" in French and "Music to See" in English.

Consideration is currently being given to the conversion of the twice repeated English play "Charbonneau and the Chef" for use on the French radio network, and plans are also being developed for future public affairs series to be scheduled by both French and English services, covering such subjects as pollution, the Arctic, science and technology. Looking further ahead plans are being developed jointly by the two networks for joint coverage of such future events as the Summer Olympics (Munich) 1972: the Winter Olympics (Sapporo, Japan) 1972 and the 1976 Summer Olympics (Montreal).

CANADA ASSISTANCE ACT—PAYMENTS TO BRITISH COLUMBIA

Question No. 668—Mrs. MacInnis:

1. With reference to claims made by British Columbia under the Canada Assistance Act for the fiscal year 1970/71, how many persons were claimed as being in receipt of social allowance, excluding supplementary allowance and child welfare allowance, in each month to date and how much was paid to British Columbia as the federal government's share of such assistance?

2. What was the total amount paid to British Columbia under the Canada Assistance Act in (a) 1969/70 (b) 1970/71?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. See following schedule for latest available data.

2. Total Federal Payments to British Columbia under the Canada Assistance Plan,

Fiscal Year	Federal Payments
1969-70 (12 months)	$43,086,262
1970-71 (9 months)	$44,631,282

Social Allowance Recipients and Federal Contributions 1970-1971

Month	Number of Recipients	Federal Share for Costs of Basic Assistance
April, 1970	109,963	$3,076,667
May, 1970	117,985	3,017,945
June, 1970	126,026	3,458,541
July, 1970	129,597	3,591,632
August, 1970	135,858	3,844,329
September, 1970	136,537	3,969,641

FISHERIES ACT REGULATIONS

Question No. 683—Mr. Barnett:

1. On what date will draft regulations with respect to the disposal of tailings from mining operations be completed?

2. Is it expected that Sections 33, 33A, 33B, 33C and 33D of the Fisheries Act will become operative in respect to such operations?

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): 1. Not known.

2. Yes.

RESEARCH INTO HARMFUL EFFECTS OF ALCOHOL

Question No. 715—Mr. Robinson:

Will the government consider the advisability of requiring the producers of alcoholic beverages to pay 1 per cent of gross earnings into research of the harmful effects of alcohol?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The government does not propose to introduce, at the present time, legislation to this effect.

RESEARCH INTO HARMFUL EFFECTS OF DRUGS

Question No. 727—Mr. Robinson:

Will the government consider the advisability of requiring the producers of drugs to pay 1 per cent of gross earnings into research of the harmful effects of drugs and drug abuse?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The government does not propose to introduce, at the present time, legislation to this effect.

CBC—SHOWING OF "SESAME STREET"

Question No. 755—Mr. Fairweather:

1. Will CBC carry Sesame Street in the 1971-72 television season?

Questions

2. Has the current series of Sesame Street been given special status as non-import content by the CRTC?

3. What consideration has the Canadian Radio Television Commission given to extending the non-import status of Sesame Street?

4. Is consideration being given to a formula which would permit the networks to show programs of international renown without being subject to the Canadian content rule?

5. By what measure can a feature such as "Civilization" be considered as offending the principles inherent in the Canadian content regulations of the CRTC?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): 1. I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that the final decision has not been taken but the Corporation certainly hopes it will be possible.

I am informed by the Canadian Radio-Television Commission as follows:

2. No. None the less, the CRTC has authorized the CBC to exceed the 30 per cent limit on U.S. programmes for the 1970-71 broadcast season providing that the excess is entirely due to Sesame Street. This authorization was given in consideration of the fact that the CBC was required by the recently revised TV Regulations to comply with increased levels of Canadian programmes two years earlier than privately-owned stations and networks.

3. The CBC has not requested the Canadian Radio-Television Commission to extend the present arrangement.

4. No. The Commission is of the opinion that networks, particularly the CBC, should endeavour to import the best foreign programs available without reducing the opportunity for Canadian programs to be shown.

5. Programmes like "Civilization" do not offend any principles of the CRTC Regulations. Provision is made under the new regulations for up to 10 per cent of television schedules to be from sources such as the BBC, which produced "Civilization". The Commission naturally recognizes the high quality of the programme "Civilization" as did the CBC in arranging to broadcast the series.

CBC—ABORTION SHOW, NOVEMBER 22, 1970

Question No. 859—Mr. Robinson:

1. How many complaints were received by CBC as a result of the abortion show on CBC Weekend, November 22, 1970?

2. Is it the intention of CBC to continue to show such abortion spectacles in the future?

3. How many requests have CBC received for a re-run of the abortion show?

4. How many letters of congratulations were received by CBC as a result of showing the abortion and from whom were they received?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. Audience reaction in terms of letters and telephone calls unfavourable to the item amounted to about 260 letters and 180 calls.

2. The program in question represented one of a series of items dealing with different aspects of this subject. At present there are no definite plans for a similar program.

3. One request for a repeat of the program was noted.

4. Information obtained through the weekly CBC TV network audience panel of about 2,000 respondents revealed that the abortion item was considered "very interesting" by close to two-thirds of those who watched it. The estimated total audience was 1,400,000. Audience reaction in terms of letters and telephone calls approving the film amounted to about 45 letters and 55 calls. They came from individual viewers, including parents, young people, physicians, clergymen and teachers.

CBC—PROGRAM CHANGES BECAUSE OF QUEBEC CRISIS

Question No. 879—Mr. Broadbent:

1. With reference to the reply to Question Number 549 at page 2264 of Hansard, January 11, 1971, what films were "judged inappropriate for this period and were cancelled"?

2. What material was originally scheduled for "Something Else" and "Encounter" on October 15, 1970?

3. What material was originally scheduled for "Cent mille chansons" on October 28, 1970?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. The reference was to films postponed. These were "Huit heures de sursis" (October 11) and "Le rayon infernal" (October 15), both about kidnapping, and "Pas de panique" (October 17) the title of which was considered in poor taste at that particular time.

2. The program originally planned for "Something Else" cancelled on October 15, was a panel discussion on press coverage of the Quebec crisis. "Encounter" on that date was to have been a discussion of the Quebec crisis with Eldon Woolliams M.P., former RCMP Superintendant William Kelly and journalist John Gray.

3. The program originally planned for "cent mille chansons" on October 28 was a repeat of a September 23 program featuring singer Pauline Julien and pianists Gaston Brisson, Gérard Hébert and Gilles Breton. In mid-October when confirmation of the scheduling and advance publicity and promotion was required, Miss Julien was among those arrested and her case was pending a hearing. Under the circumstances at that time the CBC felt it appropriate to defer the re-scheduling. Miss Julien was later released without charges being laid. While no date has been set for a repeat of the "Cent mille chansons" performance Miss Julien has since appeared on the CBC French network television program "Zoom", on February 7.

LANGUAGE TRAINING PROGRAM

Question No. 932—Mr. McCleave:

1. In the government language training program, are students receiving cassette tape recorders as training aids and, if so, are these on loan or are they given outright?

[Mr. Pelletier.]

2. How many recorders have been purchased for this program (a) what is their total cost (b) who supplies them?

3. If such recorders are returnable, what is the approximate percentage of such return and what steps are being taken against delinquent holders?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows: 1. Yes. Students are loaned cassette tape recorders, under a programmed instruction course.

2. 435. (a) $40,090. (b) The Language Bureau, Public Service Commission.

3. The initial distribution will not be returned until June 1971. A formal loan agreement is signed by each student for each machine, with serial numbers recorded.

FALLOUT SHELTERS

Question No. 937—Mr. Laprise:

1. Since 1960, how many fallout shelters were built (a) in Canada (b) in the Province of Quebec (c) in the constituency of Abitibi?

2. How many shelters may still be used and what is their use?

3. Since these shelters were built, what were the maintenance costs?

[Translation]

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): 1. Based on a 1962 survey to determine the number of fallout shelters constructed in Canada, there were about 2,000 private shelters at that time, both family and group types. It is not known how many of these were constructed since 1960, and no statistics were received from the province of Quebec. 2&3. Construction of private shelters is the responsibility of property owners and because of this no records exist as to the current usability of such shelters or their maintenance costs.

NATIONAL ARTS CENTRE—SALE OF TICKETS

Question No. 939—Mr. Coates:

Have complaints been received by the National Arts Centre regarding the present method of the sale of tickets and, if so, are arrangements under consideration that will allow a person to call in and secure seats with a definite time limit being placed on the purchaser as to when such tickets must be picked up?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the National Arts Centre as follows: Very few complaints have been received by the National Arts Centre regarding its method of sales of tickets. A telephone ticket reservation system is already in operation but is restricted to the 15,661 subscribers to the various National Arts Centre Subscription Series. It is hoped that the system will be extended in the future but it can only be acheved at a further cost of some $25,000 a year since such systems require a much higher staff level than do usual sales methods.

Student Employment

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

MANPOWER

PROVISION OF EMPLOYMENT FOR STUDENTS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Subject to your decision, Mr. Speaker, I propose to ask leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, that during the latter part of this month and during the months of April, May and June at least 1,300,000 students will leave their high schools and colleges and will be seeking either temporary or permanent employment. This massive influx on the labour market will greatly aggravate the existing problem of unemployment in the immediate future.

It is for this reason that an immediate discussion of this matter is urgently required in order to assist the government in providing appropriate plans at the earliest possible moment to meet this emergency. If you agree that this matter is proper to be discussed, Mr. Speaker, I shall ask leave of the House to move that this House adjourn.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Oxford has filed the notice required under Standing Order 26. His statement proposes a debate on the subject of unemployment, with particular reference to the fact that a considerable number of students and young people will be leaving schools or universities in the months of April, May and June of this year. While the matter is one of concern to the House and of national interest, and while the situation is urgent, I would hesitate very much before suggesting an emergency debate under Standing Order 26.

Hon. members are aware that during the past few weeks we have had a number of debates on the general subject of unemployment. There were two days of budget debate on February 10 and 11. Still more recently, on February 25 the House considered a supply motion and the debate which ensued on that motion was related primarily to the problem of unemployment.

I think it is relevant also to the decision which must be made by the Chair that the House on December 15 last considered a motion proposed by the hon. member for Lotbinière. That motion, as well as an amendment moved by the hon. member for Vegreville dealt precisely with the problem raised in the motion which would be proposed by the hon. member for Oxford. I might indicate to hon. members that the situation might be different if the motion dealt more precisely with the situation to be faced by students who are looking for summer employment. It may well be that a time will arrive when such a debate should take place within the terms of a supply motion, in connection with a statement on motions, or by way of an emergency debate.

After considering the matter very seriously and with every sympathy possible, it seems to me that the terms of the statement put forward by the hon. member are perhaps a bit too wide, and that the debate which would result under the terms of the motion as presented to the House would be very much the same as the debates we have had during the past few weeks. Although I have given the matter serious thought and have considered it with every possible sympathy, for these reasons I do not think that at this time at least, there should be a debate on the motion in the terms proposed by the hon. member for Oxford under Standing Order 26.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Prime Minister in reply to a number of questions I have asked in the last two weeks has indicated that the government is presently considering plans to deal with this matter. The fact that these plans have not been forthcoming and that time is running very short may perhaps distinguish my request for a special debate from the other debates which have taken place in respect of student unemployment.

Mr. Speaker: Of course the hon. member is not raising a point of order but rather he is debating the decision of the Chair. The Standing Order says precisely that there should not be a debate on the decision of the Chair. I can assure the hon. member that I have taken that point under serious consideration. I have suggested to him that had the motion dealt precisely with the question of summer employment for students, rather than the fact that 1,300,000 young people will come onto the labour market in a month or so, there might have been more justification for a debate at this time. At the same time, I could add that I might have thought it was a bit premature. As I have said, I have considered all aspects of the matter as sympathetically as possible and, in view of all the circumstances I did not think that an emergency debate should be held under the terms of Standing Order 26.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In view of your remarks I am wondering whether it might alleviate the situation greatly if the Government House Leader or the Acting Prime Minister would indicate when we will have the kind of useful statement on motions which might resolve much of the apprehension.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that this question might be posed during the question period.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers No. 182 is acceptable to the government.

[Mr. Speaker.]

CORRESPONDENCE REGARDING MARKETS IN RAPESEED AT VANCOUVER AND THUNDER BAY

Motion No. 182—Mr. Gleave:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of all correspondence between the Minister responsible for the Wheat Board and officials of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange in regard to the operation of the futures and cash markets in rapeseed at Vancouver and Thunder Bay.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, Notices of Motions Nos. 168 and 176 are acceptable to the government subject to the usual reservations concerning confidential documents and the authorization of the governmental authorities concerned.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations or conditions expressed by the Parliamentary Secretary, is it the pleasure of the House that the said motions shall be deemed to have been adopted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CORRESPONDENCE CONCERNING REVISIONS TO REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES ACT

Motion No. 168—Mr. Burton:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of all correspondence, reports, memoranda and other documents since July 1, 1970, between the federal government and the provinces concerning revisions to the Regional Development Incentives Act and the development of new programs by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

Motion agreed to.

CORRESPONDENCE RELATING TO DESIGNATION OF SPECIAL AREAS WITHIN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Motion No. 176—Mr. Barnett:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Government of Canada and the Government of the Province of British Columbia on the subject-matter of the designation of Special Areas within the Province of British Columbia under the terms of Section 24 of the Government Organization Act, 1969.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to call Notice of Motion No. 87.

CONSULTANT STUDY ON INDIAN SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

Motion No. 87—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant study on Indian social development undertaken for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in the fiscal year 1968-69, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the 1st Session of this Parliament.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am advised by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion that the study referred to was commissioned as a working document, intended only for internal use. As such, it is considered confidential and not for publication. Under the circumstances I wonder whether the hon. member would agree to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Skoberg: I agree, Sir.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw the attention of the parliamentary secretary to Notice of Motion No. 197 which was placed on the order paper on February 11. Since the Prime Minister at one point indicated a willingness to table such correspondence subject to the usual reservations and since this motion involves a relatively limited portion of that correspondence, I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary could arrange to have the motion dealt with as soon as possible.

Mr. Jerome: I will look into it, Mr. Speaker.

MANPOWER

SUMMER EMPLOYMENT FOR STUDENTS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON GOVERNMENT PROGRAM

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Is he prepared to give the House an assurance that he will make a statement before the end of this week with regard to the government's program to facilitate the employment of students this spring and summer. I ask this question at this time in view of the failure of the minister and the government to announce any program despite the fact that students will be seeking employment within a matter of a month?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I can only say a statement will be made on the subject as soon as that can be done.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like also to ask the minister, who seems to have a very casual attitude toward the problems of the students—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: In fact, I might ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the government, in view of the difficulties it is creating for students this summer, is prepared to convene a meeting with the provinces in order to ensure that the students who will not be able to get work this summer because of the policies of this government—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stanfield: —will have the financial resources necessary to go back to school?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is precisely because discussions are now going on with the provinces that the government is not yet in a position to make an announcement of a program that is much bigger and much better, we think, than the one last year and one which I hope will meet with the approval of the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, could the Acting Prime Minister say whether it will include the question of financial resources in general for the purpose of returning to college next autumn with a view to ensuring that young Canadians who are unable to get work this summer will have adequate financial resources to return to college and school?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the whole purpose of our plans, as the Leader of the Opposition should recognize, is to provide useful and gainful employment particularly to those who will be continuing their education. It is with that in mind that we are now having discussions with the provinces. When I referred to a bigger and better program I meant that the federal government will be spending more money.

PROVISION OF EMPLOYMENT FOR PROFESSIONAL GRADUATES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of reports that the job opportunities for professionals graduating this year are 30 per cent less than they were last year, while the increase in applications is about 13 per cent higher than last year, is the government giving consideration to programs to provide employment for these highly trained people?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, while some significant attention has been paid to these figures because of the unusualness of this particular group having any particular problem, it is our confident expectation that the upturn in the economy which is taking place and is expected to continue will soon provide jobs for them.

Mr. Orlikow: Are we to take it then that no special studies are being carried out which pay particular attention to these people for whom so much has been expended in providing them with an education?

Mr. Lang: I do not think the hon. member can take that from the remarks. There are indeed studies about every section of the work force under way at different levels. The point I was making was that some of these groups who are at present having difficulty finding jobs will indeed be in short supply again before long after the economy has got fully under way.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL TASK FORCE TO STUDY STUDENT EMPLOYMENT PROBLEM

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Since over the past few years we have been faced every spring with more young people coming on the job market in an atmosphere of uncertainty and apprehension, and as the time has now come to have an intelligent, integrated and permanent solution to the problem of student employment, would the Acting Prime Minister and his colleagues consider the constitution of a federal-provincial task force to study both long and short-range solutions to this problem so that governments may begin to meet their responsibilities to the young people of this country?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I will at least agree with my hon. friend that I do not think we can look upon this problem as one that will come on us without notice from year to year. I am satisfied, and I think members of this government are, that there will have to be a program from year to year in the future unless, of course—and this is one of the problems that is raised—we change our university year and provide for the education of students throughout the year rather than leaving a big gap in the summer time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for Egmont on a supplementary question. I take the liberty of mentioning to hon. members that a number of members would like to ask supplementary questions on this subject, but we should not have an excessive number of supplementary questions on the first subject raised because then we will run short of time. For the moment the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Egmont.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Would the Acting Prime Minister address himself to the essence of my question and suggestion that the government might consider the establishment of a federal-provincial task force in order to implement a program now for the many thousands of students who will be faced with summer unemployment?

Mr. Sharp: I thought I made it quite clear in my answer to the Leader of the Opposition that discussions are going on with the provinces. You can call them task forces or whatever you like. They are engaged in a thoroughgoing and fundamental discussion of this problem, and I can assure the hon. member that we are also discussing the longer term problem because we think it will arise from year to year.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Shefford have a supplementary question?

[Mr. Lang.]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): No, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS TO ACT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that the student employment situation this summer will more than likely aggravate the intolerable unemployment problem at this time and for the future, can the minister now state whether he is prepared to give the House a definite indication of when he will be bringing in his legislation dealing with unemployment insurance?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Being as definite as I can, I would anticipate that the legislation will be tabled very shortly.

Mr. Alexander: Since the minister and his colleagues have continually stated in the past month that this legislation would be brought in very shortly, which to me means very little, would the minister advise whether he indicated to the Canadian Labour Congress any reasons for not bringing in immediate relief by way of widening accessibility to unemployment insurance benefits and increasing the amounts in order to help alleviate this very serious situation—

Mr. Woolliams: Created by the government.

Mr. Alexander: —created by the government?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I can just say very shortly that I think the hon. member, as a member of the standing committee, knows that it is the intention of the government and of the proposed legislation to begin phasing in the new plan as of July 1, and I have no reason to believe the bill will not be tabled in sufficient time to make this possible. In so far as extending the benefit period and raising the benefits is concerned, this is another matter. It is a question of whether people who are unemployed for a long period of time should be helped through unemployment insurance or through other social policies.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I see at least six other hon. members who have supplementaries to ask. I call on hon. members to make sure that there are not too many. I suggest there should perhaps be only one from each hon. member who is recognized. The hon. member for South Western Nova.

SUMMER EMPLOYMENT FOR STUDENTS—ATTENDANCE OF OFFICIALS AT CONFERENCE SPONSORED BY SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL—PROVISION OF GRANT

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I which to direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the government will not call a federal-provincial conference on this question, can the Acting Prime Minister state whether some government officials will attend the conference sponsored by the Canadian Council on Social Development, dealing precisely with youth programs for the summer, and will a grant be made by the government as requested by that organization?

Mr. Speaker: While the matter is being pondered, the hon. member for Surrey has a supplementary question.

SUGGESTED EMPLOYMENT OF YOUTH TO COMBAT POLLUTION

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Secretary of State and I gave him notice of it earlier this week. Having in mind the high level of unemployment among our young people in Canada, and also the high level of pollution in its various forms across the country, would the minister give consideration to employing a large number of young people this summer to work on combating the various forms of pollution?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is in fact part of the summer employment program.

ESTABLISHMENT OF CIVILIAN SERVICE CORPS FOR STUDENTS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Acting Prime Minister a question.

With reference to the last Liberal convention which accepted a resolution favouring the establishment of a civil service to create employment for students, can he tell us if his government is studying the possibility of establishing such a service?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government will be bringing its plans before the House. It will be making an announcement on the establishment of machinery for this purpose.

SUMMER EMPLOYMENT FOR STUDENTS—CO-OPERATION OF INDUSTRY

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Has the government made any special formal effort to seek the co-operation of industry in resolving this problem, what type of effort has this been, and with what results?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is our intention in the program that will be brought before the House to enlist the endeavours of private industry and private individuals and institutions generally.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker—

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have suggested to hon. members that there should be but one supplementary asked by each member. I seek the hon. member's co-operation because I gather there are three or four other hon. members who wish to ask supplementaries on this subject.

[Later:]

Mr. Lundrigan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, obviously the Acting Prime Minister did not hear my question because I did not get an answer. Has there been any special formal effort to seek the co-operation of industry in trying to resolve the problem and, if so, what type of formal effort, and with what results?

Mr. Sharp: I do not think the hon. member heard my answer. I said that in the program we will be bringing before the House there will be provision for enlisting the support and the encouragement of private industry in the employment of students.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INCLUSION OF SCHOOL TEACHERS UNDER NEW LEGISLATION

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, this question is directed to the Minister of Labour and is supplementary to one previously asked with regard to unemployment insurance. In view of all the representations that have been made to members by teachers resisting the fact that they are going to be included in unemployment insurance, can the minister give us any indication whether he may have a change of heart in this regard?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is hardly a supplementary question. I think we are getting away from the original subject, but the question has been asked by the hon. member and perhaps it should be answered by the minister concerned. The Chair will then go on to the next subject.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, it is my firm intention, when the legislation comes forward, to make the plan as universal as possible, and that would include school teachers.

OIL

POSSIBLE MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—APPLICATION BY INDUSTRY TO ENERGY BOARD—ECOLOGICAL CONSEQUENCES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources arising out of reports of his visit to Washington yesterday. Has he publicly invited the oil industry to make an application to the National Energy Board to construct a pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley to the United States?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have not issued an invitation in those terms, but I have pointed out to my American counterparts the fact that the line to Valdez, which would mean tanker carriage of oil down the Pacific coast, would be ecologically very dangerous, and that it might be preferable to consider the Mackenzie Valley line and make an application to the National Energy Board in the normal course, at which time the economic and ecological considerations would be carefully considered during the determination of such application.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the minister's reported statement in Washington that the Mackenzie route would be advisable from the standpoint of ecology, may I ask the minister the basis for this statement in view of the fact that on February 23 the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development stated that the ecological studies regarding this route had not yet been completed? I am therefore asking the minister on what basis has he decided that this would be a safer route in view of the fact that the studies have not been completed?

Mr. Greene: I am, of course, not responsible for press reports even though I am responsible for many other things. My statement was to the effect that there was very great concern about the possibility of marine disaster, that there has been a three-year study by the Mackenzie Valley pipeline group in regard to pipeline safety at Inuvik, and that the question of the safety of such a pipeline would be considered at any National Energy Board hearing. Certainly I think that in that regard I am on all fours with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the statement the minister has just made that he has advised the oil industry to apply to the National Energy Board to construct such a pipeline, and in view of the fact that the National Energy Board is competent to deal with energy matters, who will make the decision with respect to the ecological matters? Is this a government decision, or is the minister now going to delegate to the National Energy Board the power to make decisions with regard to the ecology of the northern region?

Mr. Greene: I believe if my hon. friend will read the National Energy Board Act he will find that the question of the safety of the pipeline, in other words, the protection of the ecology, is very much one of the relevant issues in any application to the National Energy Board for the construction of a pipeline. Therefore in the first instance the Board does make that decision, along with other questions relevant to the application, and thereafter it must be ratified or denied by the government.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

CONTROL OF POSSIBLE MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I was going to say we did not believe there was more than one of the minister, but when he talked to his counterparts in the United States and extended his invitation to the oil industry did he give any indication as to who would have control of this pipeline going through Canada? Has the minister given any indication to the oil industry that this pipeline would have to be controlled by Canadian interests, and if he has not given such indication what is the position of the government on this matter?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I affirmed the announcement made by myself and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in August of last year, in which the conditions for the construction of such a pipeline were very clearly outlined both with respect to control by regulatory authorities on the Canadian side and with respect to ecological control, and in particular with respect to the fact that Canadian resources would have to have access to such a pipeline if it were built. That is still the government's position which was affirmed by me at my meeting in Washington yesterday.

Mr. Stanfield: Am I to assume from the minister's reply that he said nothing about ownership?

INQUIRY RESPECTING GOVERNMENT GRANT FOR PRODUCTION OF "LES MALES"

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State.

Can he tell us whether the producers of the film "Les Males", who are well-known to him, have received a direct or indirect grant from his department?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Certainly not from my department, Mr. Speaker, which does not give grants for the production of films, but perhaps from the Film Development Corporation, as a loan. I shall make inquiries in order to reply to the hon. member.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATIONS TO SOVIET UNION RESPECTING TREATMENT OF JEWS WISHING TO EMIGRATE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, in view of the recent heinous penalties handed out by Soviet courts in Lithuania and other Baltic countries against citizens of those countries who wish to leave, the refusal of the government of the U.S.S.R. to allow Jews to emigrate, and the frightening penalties being imposed on both Jews, Ukrainians and other captive peoples, has this government made representations to the embassy of the U.S.S.R. or directly to the U.S.S.R. pointing out that such actions are in direct contravention of the United Nations charter?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the right hon. gentleman knows and as has been announced in the House, we have made representations to the Soviet Union about the treatment of Jews there. We have also made representations in particular cases in relation to other national groups.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am referring to the recent persecutions. Would the minister state how long ago it was that the last representation was made by the government of Canada in this connection?

Mr. Sharp: Within the last few weeks, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And what was the reaction?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, to judge from what has happened in the Soviet Union, and I would not want to take full credit for what has happened—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: —I join with all of those countries that have made representations in saying we are relieved that at least some action has been taken by Soviet authorities to alleviate the penalties that would otherwise have been imposed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, instead of generalizing in this manner and not taking credit—it is the only thing the government has not taken credit for, including the courage to bring about unemployment—will the minister state whether or not the government of Canada will bring a resolution before the United Nations in this connection and give that leadership to the world that this government sometimes boasts about?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, certainly I would look at this as a proposition. Having been Prime Minister of Canada the right hon. gentleman knows that sometimes one can achieve greater results by less flamboyant methods.

POLLUTION

SPRINGHILL MINE DUMP FIRE—REPRESENTATIONS BY FEDERATION OF NOVA SCOTIA HOME AND SCHOOL ASSOCIATIONS

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Has the minister's attention been drawn to the representations made by the Federation of Nova Scotia Home and School Associations regarding the pollution and the dangers therefrom from the Springhill mine dump fire to the residents of that town? If so, what action is the minister undertaking to at least provide information in this regard?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, tests have been made and to date do not indicate any health hazard. Further tests will be carried out this summer with regard to carbon monoxide content. Were this to be a health hazard it would be dealt with by the Department of National Health and Welfare.

NATIONAL SECURITY

PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT—FURTHER ARRESTS IN MONTREAL

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. In view of Premier Bourassa's statement that the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act would only be applied in exceptional circumstances—I believe there was a cabinet declaration to that effect—has the Minister of Justice been informed of any exceptional circumstances which led to the arrest of seven people in Montreal on Monday under that Act?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I have no comment to make about those arrests, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, the minister says he has no comment to make. Is it the fact that he has no knowledge—and I say this nicely to him—or does he refuse to comment?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I refuse to comment because the matter will be before the courts, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Woolliams: May I put another supplementary question to the minister. Three or four of the people arrested have now been released and so are not before the courts. Would the minister look into the matter and accept his responsibility in light of that question?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

WAR MEASURES ACT—PERSONS RELEASED WITHOUT CHARGE—DESTRUCTION OF RECORDS RETURNED TO PROVINCIAL OR MUNICIPAL POLICE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): I have a question for the Minister of Justice, Mr. Speaker. Some time ago the minister was asked about the status of certain records of people who had been detained under the War Measures Act and later released without charge. The minister assured us that these records had been returned to the provincial or municipal police authorities by the RCMP. Can the minister now give the House the assurance that these records have been destroyed?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I dealt with this matter rather fully in reply to a question by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal. I stated that I had written to the Attorney General of Quebec declaring what I had done with respect to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police when I was Acting Solicitor General. I have not yet received a reply.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In the letter that was sent to the provincial Minister of Justice did the minister ask for an assurance that these documents, now held illegally, would not be used against these people at some later date?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, under our constitution this responsibility lies with the Attorney General of Quebec, and I would not presume to give him legal advice.

WITHDRAWAL OF PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): In view of the fact that the Quebec cabinet has made a declaration not to use the Act, is the Minister of Justice now prepared to withdraw the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the Act will be withdrawn when the facts of the underlying situation warrant such action.

QUEBEC—POSSIBLE APPLICATION OF PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT, TO ORGANIZED CRIME

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Justice. BOOK PUBLISHING—ASSISTANCE TO FIRMS IN PREVENTING FOREIGN TAKEOVERS—ESTABLISHMENT OF DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State and arises out of his meeting this week with Canadian book publishers. Is it the minister's intention to provide aid to Canadian book publishers to prevent future foreign takeovers? If so, what sort of aid is contemplated and when may we expect it?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, since the Canadian publishers were attending an advisory meeting, we wanted to obtain some first hand information as to their needs and receive their suggestions. We have them now and we are going to study the situation for the obvious purpose of taking measures and helping this industry which is in a precarious position and is very important to Canadian culture.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

[English]

Mr. Rowland: Is the minister contemplating legislation to deal with the situation such as that suggested by the publishers themselves for the creation of a Canadian book development corporation or some such device?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, since the meeting only ended last night, the study of the suggestions which were made has not been thorough enough to enable me to tell the hon. member whether potential solution will necessitate new legislation or whether we will be in a position to work effectively under existing legislation.

[Later:]

[English]

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): My question is supplementary to one asked earlier of the Secretary of State. I would like to know if the study the minister is going to make of the problems of the book publishing industry will be separate and apart from the study presently being carried on by the Minister of National Revenue who is supposed to produce a paper on foreign ownership?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): The government is still examining this touchy question, Mr. Speaker.

POSSIBLE THREAT TO BRITISH COLUMBIA COAST FROM OIL TANKER TRANSPORT—OPPORTUNITY FOR PARLIAMENTARY DEBATE

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Since he is also responsible for external affairs, it will have a double effect. In light of the enormous ecological implications of the TAPS oil tanker route, will the government consider presenting a motion in Parliament to enable the whole Parliament of Canada to express Canada's insistence of full bilateral discussions and the frank recognition of Canada's interest in an ecologically satisfactory oil transport system?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if I thought that the government of the United States would not respond to the invitation I have made to them to engage in consultations with us on this question, I would consider the suggestion that is being made by the hon. member. However, I believe there is no reason whatever to think that the United States will not be prepared to consult with us quite fully on this question.

Mr. Comeau: Is the government prepared to suggest to the United States government that the question of a continental energy policy, something they very much want, cannot be isolated from an ecologically satisfactory answer to the oil tanker issue on our west coast?

Mr. Sharp: I do not think there is the direct relationship between these two questions that the hon. member thinks there is. The United States has not bargained with us for a continental energy policy. I have never heard this suggestion made by any responsible spokesman for the United States government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

POSSIBLE THREAT TO BRITISH COLUMBIA COAST FROM OIL TANKER TRANSPORT—CONSULTATIONS WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have a supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister. Has he received a favourable response from the United States to his request for consultations so that some bilateral arrangement can be worked out in the event there are to be oil tankers operating between Valdez, Alaska and Cherry Point along the British Columbia coast?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): As the leader of the New Democratic Party knows, I wrote to the Secretary of State. I have not received a formal reply yet. There have been informal consultations, the most fruitful of which have been those engaged in by my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

LAND USE REGULATIONS FOR TERRITORIES

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It is supplementary to the line of questioning initiated by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. When will the proposed draft land use regulations for the territories be made available for consideration by the members of this House and, in particular, when does he intend to refer them to the standing committee as he indicated last session he would do?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the regulations in question have not yet been prepared in a permanent form because we are presently in consultation with the elected members of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. However, as soon as these consultations have been completed, the regulations will be published in the Canada Gazette. INTERPROVINCIAL MARKETING—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT ON VALIDITY OF SECTION 121 OF BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

Mr. Jack Horner (Crowfoot): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that the Standing Committee on Agriculture has bogged down in its study of Bill C-176—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Guess why?

Mr. Horner: —and in view of the fact that the Canadian Broiler Council has rejected the concept of supply management on a national basis, will the minister take a test to the Supreme Court of Canada to prove the validity or strength of section 121 of the British North America Act?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I do not think a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada is necessary to substantiate that section of the British North America Act. If the hon. member can suggest some way in which we can agree on the facts to provide a stated case to the Supreme Court of Canada, that might be useful. As I have said, the various statutes across the country and the regulations under those statutes do not provide enough agreement, particularly as they are being administered, to present a case to the Supreme Court of Canada by way of a reference.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

PROVISION OF BENEFITS FOR WOMEN DURING MATERNITY LEAVE IN FORTHCOMING AMENDMENTS TO ACT

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): My question is for the Minister of Labour. Is it proposed to include in the forthcoming bill amending the Unemployment Insurance Act provision for unemployment insurance benefits for women contributors during maternity leave, as recommended by the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in its seventeenth recommendation?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): I cannot be specific about what is in the legislation until it is tabled, which will be fairly soon, but this was one of the strong features in the white paper and one of the recommendations endorsed by the standing committee.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the minister assure the House that the government will stand by the commitment made in the white paper and endorsed by the committee?

Mr. Mackasey: I am afraid the hon. member will have to wait and see.

PROVISION OF SUPPLEMENTARY BENEFITS PENDING LEGISLATION TO AMEND ACT

Mr. James A. FEDERAL RESPONSE TO UNEMPLOYMENT AND WELFARE PROBLEMS—SUGGESTED MEETING WITH REPRESENTATIVES OF PROVINCES AND CITIES

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): My question is for the Minister of Finance. If not, will the government agree to meet the cities and the provinces so as to undertake an objective inventory of mutual resources and responsibilities in connection with these matters?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): The $160 million loan fund is one of a great many measures which have been taken since last March by the government in order to speed up the economy.

Mr. Ryan: A supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before we get into a debate I wonder whether the hon. member for Spadina would recognize that perhaps we might go on to a number of other questions before we reach the end of the question period.

Mr. Ryan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Will the government consider adopting a flexible policy with regard to grants and loans directed to the provinces and cities this winter?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's question is in the form of a representation to the minister. The hon. member for South Shore.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the Canadian government or, more specifically, the Secretary of State for External Affairs taken any initiative in notifying the treaty countries of our intention to prohibit trawlers of more than 65 feet in length from operating inside the 12-mile limit of the coast of Newfoundland and, if so, what was the response to his request?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): There have been some discussions but I should like to take the question as notice so that I can give a precise answer.

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): A supplementary to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the misunderstanding and confusion which exists concerning the recent announcement of the minister that these areas will be closed to draggers, will the minister, in a statement on motions or at some appropriate time, try to specify exactly what areas are covered by his recent announcement?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I do not believe any clearcut decision has yet been reached with regard to the transaction with Australia. Can the minister tell us whether the government has taken a specific position in connection with the ownership of such a pipeline, that is, how much of it should belong to Canadians and how much to interests other than Canadian?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The guidelines issued by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and myself in August indicate that preference will be given to any entrepreneur on the basis of maximum Canadian content but no firm and unequivocal position has been taken. When amounts of capital of this kind are involved, totalling somewhere in the neighbourhood of $4 billion, we have no way of knowing what percentage of the equity could be raised in Canada.

Would he consider dispensing with the requirement that a minimum of 25 acres is needed in order to qualify for assistance? If not, would he arrange to make it possible for farmers to accumulate acreages during the three years of the program in order to qualify under the 25-acre requirement?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The program as announced does contain a 25-acre limitation per year. For a variety of administrative reasons, I think it would be desirable to consider only applications of this size as a minimum. However, I will be glad to take a further look at the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question period expired a few minutes ago. With the consent of the House the hon. member for Mackenzie might be allowed to ask a supplementary question. I gather that the Minister of National Revenue is also anxious to reply to a question asked yesterday.

Mr. Korchinski: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask whether there will be on the spot inspections only in connection with this scheme or whether there will be spies in the sky taking aerial photographs as was done last year?

Mr. Lang: While the aerial surveys carried out last year were undoubtedly successful in giving us better information about acreages, it is anticipated that the inspection of the forage acreage under this plan will be carried out by individuals.

DELAY IN ISSUING T-4 SLIPS TO GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Red Deer asked me a question concerning the distribution of T-4 slips to government employees. While this is a matter which comes primarily within the jurisdiction of the Department of Supply and Services rather than the Department of National Revenue, I think I can inform the hon. member that all of the T-4 slips in respect of salaries and wages paid during 1970 were sent between February 12 and February 23 from the paying offices of the services administration of the Department of Supply and Services to all government departments for distribution to their employees. I am sure my colleague the Minister of Supply and Services will be happy to supply any additional information required.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): My question related to the fact that these T-4 slips had not reached the employees. Perhaps it is a problem involving the Post Office rather than the department.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Nesbitt: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask permission to seek the unanimous consent of the House to revert to motions in order that I may propose a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43, requesting a discussion of student unemployment.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I gather there is not unanimity. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT, OBJECTS, POWERS, CAPITALIZATION, ETC.

The House resumed, from Tuesday, March 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Benson that Bill C-219, to establish the Canada Development Corporation, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs and the amendment thereto of Mr. Baldwin (P. 3894).

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, when I called it ten o'clock last night, I indicated that I approved the major objectives set out for the Canada Development Corporation which are to develop strong Canadian controlled and managed corporations in the private sector of the economy and to provide broader opportunities for Canadians to invest and participate in the economic development of Canada.

I also said I was confident that the CDC would play an important role in future Canadian development and that it could contribute to improving Canadian competitiveness in world markets and in the arrangements for corporation rationalization and amalgamations in which we expect it to take part. By stimulating and encouraging such changes in Canadian industry, the Canada Development Corporation will strengthen our industrial structure and consequently render it less vulnerable to foreign take-overs.

Having said that, I wish to express reservations about the lack of specifics in this bill with regard to natural resource development. I realize that northern development and resource development are part of the bill's objects, but several features of the bill convince me that it was drafted by people who were manufacturing industry-oriented rather than resource-oriented. Certainly, mineral and hydrocarbon resource development experience appears to have been lacking among those who drafted Bill C-219. This has resulted in certain contradictions being built into the bill. As a prime example, the bill specifically directs the CDC to invest for profit in the best interests of the shareholders. I have no quarrel with that objective when it is applied to the broad spectrum of industrial investment opportunities, which the drafters of the bill presumably had in mind when drafting it. But the government, in my view, must make a clearer distinction than it has between general industrial investment and high risk, natural resource development investment.

If this distinction is not made, difficulties will eventually become inevitable. The specific directive contained in clause 6 stressing investments made both in anticipation of profit and in the best interests of the shareholders, while essential for general industrial investment, I am convinced will have an inhibiting effect on investment in risky, long-term mineral and hydrocarbon resource development. Once shares in the Canada Development Corporation are sold to the general public, it becomes inevitable that the directors will be concerned with the generation of revenue for the payment of dividends; and concentration upon investment areas of relatively low risk and certain ultimate yield to support dividend payments will occur. Mining and oil investment in particular are normally high risk. When this normally high risk is combined with the fact that Canada's major undiscovered and undeveloped hydrocarbon and mineral resources are in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, it is obvious that the risk is hardly compatible with regular dividend payments to shareholders.

Another section of the bill which I feel indicates the inattention of the drafters to mineral resource development is the one million dollar minimum which we find in clause 6 (2)(b). This provision reads:

> —invest in the shares of corporations in each of which, in the opinion of the Board of Directors of the company, the real value of the shareholders' equity after investment by the company will be, or is likely to become, one million dollars or more.

In the mining field especially, it is quite likely that a number of extremely valuable investment opportunities will crop up from time to time, not necessarily restricted to the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. However, let me concentrate attention upon these two areas. If the $1 million minimum remains it will rule out, or at least inhibit, management of the Canada Development Corporation taking steps to invest in some situations which in all probability, over a long period of time, will end up being an extremely good investment. I feel that this one million dollar minimum does not make very much sense, particularly as far as mining investment is concerned, though it may and probably does make sense when applied to the industrial and manufacturing spectrum.

While on the subject of resource development in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, may I say that it is in these regions that a development corporation is needed most and can contribute most to increasing the percentage of Canadian control over our mineral and hydrocarbon resources. In addition to the obvious economic advantages to Canada of CDC activity in the Yukon and Northwest Territories, such activity would give Canadians a more important sense of participation in national development and has the potential to be an important factor in this country's unity.

After all, 35 per cent of the Canadian land mass lies in the territories. Because its natural resources are under direct federal control, they are the common heritage of all Canadians and should be developed to the benefit of all Canadians, priority, of course, being given to ensuring that the needs of the residents of the northern territories are first met. Nevertheless, all Canadians have a direct stake in the resource development of the Yukon and Northwest Territories. For the CDC to give Canadians a sense of direct participation in the action in the northern territories would be an important contribution to national unity. This bill, with minor changes, combined with a wise selection of leadership for the CDC, has the potential of fulfilling the role I should like to see it play; but as it stands now, and with the emphasis of the bill where it is, I just do not think it will be able to play this role.

Another criticism that I have of this bill relates to the proposal to turn over Panarctic Oils Limited to the corporation at this time. Panarctic may take several more years and perhaps require hundreds of millions of dollars of additional investment before returns begin to flow back to its investors. Even with the tremendous capitalization proposed for the Canada Development Corporation, I doubt very much that the CDC would be prepared to continue to put in funds ranging conceivably to $100 million or more to protect the government's present 45 per cent interest in Panarctic. I, for one, would be extremely unhappy with, and totally opposed to, any reduction in the present 45 per cent interest of the federal government in Panarctic. I am convinced that in the long run this will turn out to be the best investment in Canada that the federal government has ever made. The Panarctic concept is one that I should like to see expanded into other areas, such as, conceivably, offshore hydrocarbon development and mineral development. I doubt very much whether even with its proposed capitalization the CDC would have the funds necessary to maintain a strong federal position in such possible investments.

I mentioned earlier that I thought the selection of the administrators of the CDC would be of prime importance. Certainly, if its chief officer has some mining and oil experience, or experience of resource development, then there will not be too much difficulty in convincing the CDC about resource development investment. But if we end up with a man at the top who has general manufacturing experience, it is inevitable that the CDC management will not put prime stress on resource development, which is where I feel it should be. I suggest to the minister a possible amendment which perhaps he will look at and discuss when the bill is referred to the committee. If we added powers under clause 7, by the addition of a subparagraph, permitting the establishment of a natural resources development company with all the powers of the Canada Development Corporation as outlined in clause 7, we would allow more flexibility.

I should like to see a subsidiary company set up by the Canada Development Corporation specifically designed to develop resources, with shares available to the public. It is absolutely essential that we distinguish between investment in general manufacturing and industrial enterprise across the country and investment in resource development. If shareholders require regular returns and dividends on their investment, we cannot combine this requirement with a daring and aggressive resources policy. Such a policy is essential if we are going to change the percentage of Canadian ownership and control in the resource industry.

We have a great natural resource potential. The CDC has the potential for ensuring a high degree of Canadian participation in the development of these natural resources, including the hydrocarbon industry. This is a painless way to accomplish a higher degree of Canadian control and ownership. We can do this without expropriating anything, and without nationalization. This can be accomplished by an aggressive pursuit of mineral and hydrocarbon investment by Canadians. Investment possibilities in this regard are now available in the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

Finally, I should like to draw the minister's attention, and I am sure this has been done before, to the proposed take-over objective by Canada Development Corporation of the Northern Canada Power Corporation. How this matter got into the bill in the first place is difficult to understand. The Canada Development Corporation's expressed objective is to provide a profit for its shareholders. The objective of the Northern Canada Power Company is to provide electricity at cost to northern consumers. There is just no way these two objectives can exist side by side. The objective of the Northern Canada Power Company is not to make a profit for shareholders of the Canada Development Corporation at the expense of the users of electricity in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon.

If the minister has not already considered this, I urge him to take whatever steps are necessary to eliminate the reference to the NCPC. The two objectives are clearly irreconcilable. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary has something to say in this regard. In terminating what I have to say on this subject, I again urge the minister to make a clear distinction, when the bill comes before the Committee, between general industrial development investment and natural resources investment.

[Mr. Watson.]

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to take part in this debate in reference to Bill C-219. First of all, I should like to say that I concur with the amendment moved by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). It is important that this bill be sent to the committee as quickly as possible in order that a number of matters which are of concern to a number of members in this House can be answered. While I am on my feet this afternoon, I should like to raise several questions and express my opinion. I hope the minister has made note of the various suggestions and will, at the appropriate time, make the appropriate reply.

Is there anyone in this House on the government side who can state the specific purpose of the proposed Canada Development Corporation? I ask that question with all sincerity in an endeavour to obtain a reasonable response. I have asked this question of members on the government side and members on this side. It appears that no one can clearly spell out the precise reason behind this legislation. It was my understanding that the Canada Development Corporation was being proposed to guarantee that certain Canadian interests which might be in danger of being taken over by foreign investors would be protected. I understand that this is not what the Canada Development Corporation is supposed to do.

I noted with some interest the press release of January 25 issued by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) in which he attempted to spell out two or three reasons this legislation is necessary. It suggests that the bill provides for the establishment of a large corporation to do certain things, specifically to help develop and maintain Canadian control and Canadian management in the private sector. How can this be done? If one of the well established industries in the city of Toronto felt that its margin of profit over a given period of time did not warrant the continuation of its marginal operations and wanted to sell these operations to anyone who wished to purchase them, what could be done to keep these operations within the control of Canadians? If I managed such a company and I received a minimal offer, I would look elsewhere. I would run newspaper ads in the United States, and indeed in Europe, if I were interested in selling that company.

Then, if the CDC decided the retention of that company by Canadian interests was in the interests of Canada, it would have to be prepared to buy that company from the seller. Is it not conceivable that Canadians might feel that this company was worth, let us say, half a million dollars. An offer, indeed it could be a phony offer, might be made by United States interests in the amount of $750,000. Then, since the CDC had decided the retention of this industry in Canada was in the Canadian interest, it would have to pay that higher price in order to retain it in Canada. I should like to know the type of companies the CDC will be interested in, how it intends to procure them and how it intends to convince the Canadian people that investment in these companies is a good idea. It is said that the CDC will provide greater opportunity for Canadians to invest and participate in the economic development of Canada. How will that be done? Will it be through the acquisition of companies, through the acquisition of shares or through the provision of risk capital to risk ventures?

I should like to have answers to some of these questions. For instance, we noted in the newspaper the other day the case of a plywood manufacturing company in Quebec which, after having been purchased by, I believe, the Quebec Development Corporation for something like $1,500,000 not too long ago, found it could not operate economically and is now being offered for sale for something like $500,000. Will the CDC pick up this plywood plant? If the CDC is indeed a profit-oriented corporation what right would it have to pick up that company? What I am a little suspicious about is it appears to me, so far as the Minister of Finance is concerned, that the CDC measure would seem to be a diversionary tactic to get the minds of the people off the more serious problem of unemployment. There seems to be an implied assurance to the people of Canada that they do not need to worry about being out of work because they will be given an opportunity to buy shares in a Canada development corporation, and in that way one day, will be rich.

I find it very difficult to conceive that the government would ask us to vote in favour of a measure which is so vague. Of course, vagueness is nothing new to this government, Mr. Speaker. We know from the hearings of the various committees that this is probably the most inept government in the history of Canada so far as the drafting of legislation is concerned. Thank God there is an opposition around to keep it on the straight and narrow. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance, who surely has some knowledge of business, who will determine the fair value of the four corporations that are to be purchased. I refer to Polymer Corporation Limited, Eldorado Nuclear Limited, Panarctic Oils Limited and Northern Transportation Company Limited. Are these conglomerates to become one entity when the CDC is in being? Who will sell these companies? I presume the government will sell them to the CDC. Who will determine the fair value of these companies and on what will the fair value be based? Will it be based on the performance record? Will it be based on earnings or potential earnings? What criteria is to be used when these companies are sold to the CDC? Will the price be so low that it will be embarrassing or will it be so high that profit will be impossible?

The minister says he is delighted to introduce this kind of a measure because, after all, it will give the Canadian people an opportunity to own shares in the CDC and in these companies. Does the minister not realize that now, although the people of Canada do not actually own the shares in these companies, they actually own the companies through their government. If the minister is right in saying the CDC is profit-oriented, I wish him the best of luck in this endeavour. He says the CDC will not be a Crown corporation responsible to Parliament but will be a private corporation operating basically within the provisions of the Canada Corporations Act; but, because it is created by an act of Parliament any change in the capital structure, objects and powers of the corporation passed by the directors and shareholders will require approval by a resolution passed by both Houses of Parliament. Mr. Speaker, I ask who will exercise any degree of control over this corporation? Will it be the Minister of Finance or the Deputy Minister of Finance who will exercise majority control over this corporation?

Then, it is stated that, in addition to its broad powers of direct investment and participation in joint action with other Canadian investors, the CDC will be empowered to lend to other companies, guarantee their contracts and assist them in other ways. What does this mean? Carling's Brewery in Edmonton has found that the market has suffered a severe slump, as has been the case in almost every other market in recent months. They have found that Albertans do not drink as much beer as they should and their profits are down. Could they go to the CDC to borrow money and acquire assistance? Is this what the minister envisages? I do not know. I cannot quite understand it. At a time of unemployment and at a time when inflation is rampant, the government gives the impression of being concerned about the economic development of our country through the CDC. I am not certain it is an instrument of development. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance, who is a very dear friend of mine, whether he would agree with me on this point. I do not argue that it may not be in the government's best interest to create a corporation that would be in charge of the four companies to which I alluded earlier, but when we discuss the need for the private sector to gain access to risk capital, I should like to remind the minister that on the Prairies in particular when money is required for wildcat ventures—and the parliamentary secretary knows precisely to what I am referring—Canadians participate to a lesser extent than United States investors?

• (3:40 p.m.)

In this connection I could refer specifically to the various professions. It is odd that in Canada doctors, lawyers, engineers and wealthy businessmen would rather put their money into apartment houses, and thus be able to write off certain earnings, than put that money into risk ventures for the development of our natural resources. I suggest that the answer is very simple. If the minister changed the Canadian tax structure to allow the Canadian investor taking part in risk ventures the opportunity to write off certain losses over a given period of years there would be some incentive for such investment. If an investor who happened to make a bundle on a wildcat venture were taxed appropriately, and there is nothing wrong with that, that also would encourage risk investment. But it seems strange to me that the U.S. professional and businessman is more interested in gambling his capital in the resource development of western Canada than is the Canadian himself who really has an interest in that sort of development.

I say to the Minister of Finance in all sincerity that what he envisages for the CDC will ultimately turn out to be a bad dream. I think the direction in which we should be going at this point is to overhaul the tax structure as it is today.

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): The issues raised by the proposed establishment of a Canada Development Corporation are significant. Therefore, this matter should be examined in detail by this House and by the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. In doing so, a complete survey should be made of the results of development corporations and their activities in other countries. It seems that we have a great penchant in Canada for adopting methods, procedures and policies that have proven to be not too successful in their lands of origin. We do not seem to learn from the experience of those countries.

It is important to be clear about the objectives of the suggested Canada Development Corporation. Although the absence of details makes appraisal dependent to a certain extent on inferences, it has been intimated that the CDC would primarily assist in the development of major projects in Canada and that it would seek to reduce foreign takeovers of Canadian enterprises. These objectives make all our hearts beat a little faster. Who could disapprove of the development of major projects by Canadians or the preservation of Canadian control of our industry? A development corporation can, of course, finance projects or curtail foreign ownership. An analysis of the costs involved and the consequences of this type of institution would demonstrate that this so-called solution may be self-defeating. Any projects that are economically viable would stand on their own feet, without government assistance.

I suggest that if the CDC were in evidence last fall, there would have been tremendous pressure on the government of Canada to take over Ryerson Press, pressures that probably would have proved irresistible. In considering this question I think it is well to reflect upon what the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) and Information Canada could do with such an organization as Ryerson Press if it were under their control. I suggest that there would be a measure of control by the government of Canada if such an organization formed part of the holdings of CDC or anything like it.

The function of government is to give constructive help, in co-operation with the private sector, when a decision has been taken. Claims have been made that there is a large institutional gap in our capital market. What evidence is there for this assertion? One can think of all sorts of companies that have started from scratch in Canada recently, or alternatively large companies that have made substantial distributions of equity in Canada. We can think of the examples of Oshawa Wholesale, Couvrette, Alliance and the Bell Telephone Company.

But if this is so, it must also be admitted that there are large pools of capital lying around in savings accounts and certificates. The function of the government should be to encourage the flow of these savings into active equity capital for the development of this country by Canadians. It could take positive steps such as giving a distinct tax advantage to Canadians for such investment instead of having them equal to or at a disadvantage in comparison with foreign investors. The government could also take steps to encourage provinces to reform their securities legislation for the protection of investors because, quite frankly, a great many people are frightened of the market, and I believe they are frightened with some cause. I would suggest also that if the provinces fail to co-operate in the enactment of uniform legislation, then consideration should be given to putting investor protection under federal jurisdiction.

As an answer to the problem of foreign ownership in Canada, a development corporation is a poor remedy. The free movement of capital, both across frontiers and domestically, should not be hindered by any government sponsored pool of capital. The Minister of Finance is confident that competent management would not make unrealistic bids to counter offers from foreign sources. For a foreign operating company with world wide outlets and unused plant facilities, the benefits of an amalgamation could justify a far higher price than any development corporation should pay. For instance, what would the CDC do with a national beer company?

The advantages of a Canadian outlet to a United States company are evident in that duplicate facilities are closed down and the production and sales forces are combined. Similarly, U.S. automobile manufacturers would have an incentive to acquire automobile parts companies in Canada, since parts used by the manufacturers of new cars can be moved across the borders duty free. It is difficult to see what a development corporation could do to check foreign ownership in most cases, apart from making an unrealistically high bid.

To counterbalance the objectionable consequences of foreign capital, legislation against the specific wrongs is the proper procedure. Whether it be Canadian dissatisfaction with the inadequate openings for Canadian talent, the lack of opportunity to participate in the processing of raw materials, the failure to compete in export markets, or merely inadequate adjustment to Canadian cultural patterns, it should manifest itself in specific legislation requiring foreign capital to conform to our requirements. By virtue of a favourable tax ruling, Rio Algom for example, was able to take over Atlas Steel advantageously. If the ruling had been changed either by a different interpretation or by legislation, this take over could have been thwarted.

If the Canadian Development Corporation were to develop major resources projects without outside participation, as has been suggested, in many cases sales outlets would be lacking. For example, United States or Japanese steel companies usually prefer to own their own raw material sources in order to ensure adequate supplies and also to participate in the profits of their own purchases, both being classical reasons for vertical integration. If Canada denied these opportunities to foreign steel companies, other nations would be more hospitable and as a nation we would be the losers.

In general, it is difficult to see how a Canada Development Corporation would invest its funds. Private pools of capital like the CED have not been able to invest all their available funds as it is. Even the Quebec General Investment Fund was not fully invested several years after it was started, and it is a relatively small fund, only a fraction of the size of the proposed CDC. Its dismal record augurs poorly for a Canada Development Corporation.

The Minister of Finance claims that the staff of a development corporation could be relatively immune from political intervention. There is almost no case of a government agency being able to withstand pressure from political sources. Even if the operating personnel were independent of day-to-day direction, the reality of government parentage would be an omnipresent fact. All but the most neurotic recognize and are influenced by their progenitors! A Canada Development Corporation would realize that if it incurred the displeasure of too many Members of Parliament or voters it would be abolished, something that is not true of most private enterprises. If a Canadian Development Corporation bought a large share in a foreign corporation with large operations in Canada in order to influence the Canadian operations, could one really trust the management to make decisions based on economic merit alone? It does not take a cynic to believe that the answer is a resounding no.

No reference has been made to Quebec, yet Quebec is one third of Canada and has already given notice that it wants to control new developments if possible. If the CDC performed managerial or entrepreneurial functions in addition to supplying capital the competent staff, which the Minister of Finance urges, would be spread over such a vast area of activities that supervision and detailed scrutiny could become a nightmare.

Reference has been made to our present emasculated form of equity ownership. Surely, all ownership in large corporations by outside shareholders must be at a distance unless that outside source sets itself up to be an expert and uses its position to get a seat on the board and dictate and change policy. Is this what the Canada Development Corporation will do? Will it be an expert in the mining, the pulp and paper, the utility and the oil business? Other countries, including the United Kingdom, have experimented with development corporations. We should remember the abortive groundnut scheme in Africa, which was promoted by a former British Labour government.

A few of the problems encountered by other development corporations of other countries can be summarized under a few general headings, the first of which is financing economically unsound enterprises. Social and political considerations frequently motivate development corporations. For example, the Chilean Development Corporation built steel mills that have proved to be high-cost and economically inefficient in Chile, and whose products have been unable to hurdle tariff barriers, particularly the 40 per cent Argentine surcharge on steel. In South Africa, the Industrial Corporation was established to build an iron and steel complex, as well as facilities for obtaining oil from coal for strategic and military purposes. By that government's own admission, the government project displaced private investment and therefore negated its achievements.

Secondly, there is the question of inflation. Development corporations have built-in inflationary potential. Although funds may be supplied by individuals or private institutions, additional capital is often provided by the central bank or from foreign sources. When funds from private sources have not been forthcoming all too frequently development corporations have resorted to borrowing and rediscounting at the central bank, Also, once a program is under way its termination is difficult for political reasons.

The third problem is the displacement of private initiative and private capital. By their existence, development corporations absorb funds from abroad that would normally flow to private industry. Funds obtained from private domestic sources may be absorbed by the government development corporations, whereas under normal circumstances funds might seek their own investment outlets.

Fourth is the problem of excessive government control. In various countries development corporations have appointed directors to boards of businesses where their funds are invested. The IRI in Italy and the National Financiers of Mexico appoint directors of many companies. In general there could be a tendency to ignore the free forces of business in favour of political opportunism. For example, would the government permit the closing down of an unprofitable organization if thereby many people would lose their jobs?

The scope of action of the development corporation may become very wide, as in Burma where the initial step of the government in the 1950's was to set up a joint venture corporation of government and private businessmen. Most of Burma's imports then were bought by government organizations and the choice of suppliers was dictated by national agencies. In an attempt to diversify this economy by encouraging manufacturing, the government pursued a policy of state enterprise.

The fifth problem is that large enterprises may be favoured by the establishment of the Canada Development Corporation. In general, the special problems and risks of small enterprise financing have been a restraining factor. The careful investigation and supervision which this kind of financing necessitates makes it expensive. The number and variety of staff required to sift applications has meant that the large scale enterprises have often been the main beneficiaries of these development facilities, whereas the deserving small company has been neglected. The most successful government corporations in the economically advanced countries have been limited to specific and narrow areas of economic activity such as the transportation system, mortgages, or other credit institutions. Too frequently development corporations have very broad objectives which are difficult to accomplish.

The government should provide proper fiscal and monetary conditions for sound economic growth, combined with specific legislation to correct specific abuses that undoubtedly do occur. The CDC fails to come to grips with the problem of capital formation in Canada. Capital formation and development are the result of the savings process. Development corporations should be recognized as the reactionary and unworkable solutions that they are.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on the amendment. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Negatived on division.

Amendment (Mr. Baldwin) negatived on division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is now on the main motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Adopted on division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-225, to amend the Income Tax Act and to amend an act to amend that act, be read the second time and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): As the House is aware, Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to implement two measures involving income tax changes of the several outlined in the budget that was brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) on December 3. One section of the bill will amend the Income Tax Act to make available a capital cost allowance supplement to manufacturing and processing industries. The other section of the bill will amend Chapter 38 of the Statutes of Canada 1967-68 to provide for an extension of the income surtax on individuals and corporations from the end of 1970 to the end of 1971.

To encourage increased capital investment in manufacturing and processing, which recently has been relatively weak, the bill provides that those engaged in such businesses may claim capital cost allowance for 115 per cent of the actual cost of machinery, equipment and structures acquired between December 4, 1970, and March 31, 1972. The effect of this measure is to enable a qualifying taxpayer to claim capital cost allowance over a period of years of $115 for every $100 of actual capital investment put in place, an increase of $15 over the amount that normally could be written off against earnings.

It is estimated that manufacturing and processing enterprises undertake some $3 billion worth of capital investment annually that would qualify for this special allowance. Investment of this order therefore, would enable these enterprises to claim an extra capital allowance over the depreciable lifetime of assets put in place within the period up to March, 1972, of around $450 million. While the cost to the treasury of this measure is estimated at $25 million for the 1971-72 fiscal year, the cumulative capital cost allowance benefits being provided to manufacturing and processing businesses over a period of years will provide a significant stimulus to increased investment in these two sectors over the next several months.

I might mention that the definition of a manufacturing or processing business and the description of assets qualifying for the supplementary allowance will be contained in regulations to be adopted soon after approval of the legislation. It is proposed, however, that the definition of a qualifying business would be very similar to that now found in class 19 of the Income Tax Regulations, while the property that would qualify would be buildings as described in class 3 or 6 and machinery and equipment that is normally included in class 8 of schedule B of the same regulations.

The second section of the bill before the House extends for a further year the 3 per cent surtax on personal and corporate income. Members will recall that this surtax on individuals does not apply to the first $200 of basic tax, with the result that more than 25 per cent of Canadian taxpayers will continue to be exempted from payment of the additional levy. No surtax is paid by a single person whose income is below $2,743, nor by a married man with two children whose income is below $4,343.

I would be less than frank, Mr. Speaker, if I did not acknowledge that the decision reluctantly reached by the government to extend the surtax to the end of 1971 was a source of disappointment to many taxpayers. It was also a source of some criticism, frequently from those who were unaware of or did not understand the considerations which led the government to the conclusion that this was the best course to follow in the long term interests of the nation as a whole.

In his budget speech, the Minister of Finance made it clear that the government reached the conclusion late last year that it was appropriate to provide an additional stimulus to the economy in order to reinforce the series of expansionary fiscal and monetary measures adopted since the early months of 1970.

Having reached that conclusion, the government was faced with the need to reach a decision on two important questions. It had to decide how much additional stimulus could safely be injected into the economy without running an excessive risk of creating new inflationary pressures in the months ahead. Then it had to decide what form this additional stimulus should take in order to provide the maximum possible assistance in the shortest possible time to individuals, regions and industries in Canada most adversely affected by slow growth of the economy.

In reaching a judgment on the first question, the government had to consider how far it could go in creating additional fiscal stimulus by adding to its cash requirements without imposing dangerous pressures on Canada's monetary system. As the Minister of Finance noted in his budget speech:

> There are limits to the extent to which the banks can be encouraged to increase their holdings of government securities without running the very serious risk that the expansion and increased liquidity of the banking system will trigger inflation and expectations of inflation.

This very fundamental point was also underlined by the Economic Council of Canada in its most recent review of the economy. "Monetary policy (together with fiscal policy with which it is closely interrelated)," the council emphasized, "should evolve in a way that seeks to avoid large destabilizing swings in the growth of the money supply." Even the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) appeared to recognize that there are some very real limits on the extent to which the government can reasonably expand fiscal policy when he noted during the budget debate that the government faced "a substantial and increasing budgetary deficit" as a result of the expansionary policies which it has adopted. That recognition, however, has not deterred either the Conservative leader or other members opposite from advocating measures that would enlarge the budgetary deficit and the government's cash requirements in a massive way.

In his budget speech, the Minister of Finance estimated the government would have cash requirements during the current fiscal year of around $1.57 billion, excluding those for foreign exchange reserves. This represents a massive swing of more than $1.7 billion from the position in 1969-70 and is a measure of the very large stimulus injected into the economy in the current fiscal year by the government. For 1971-72, the minister estimated the government's cash requirements would rise to $1.9 billion, matching the record peacetime level of 1968-69 and representing a swing of more than $2.1 billion from the level in the last fiscal year.

The second question facing the government was whether additional stimulus of this degree should be provided through increased spending and lending, through a decrease in taxes, or a combination of the two. There have been suggestions from some quarters that the government decided against allowing the surtax to expire and perhaps further reducing taxes as well because of a mistaken belief that reducing taxes would be inflationary. Nothing could be further from the truth, Mr. Speaker.

The fact is, as the Minister of Finance indicated in his budget, that the government concluded it would be considerably more appropriate in the economic circumstances facing the nation to adopt increased spending and lending programs aimed at providing early and direct assistance and support to individuals, regions and industries most in need of it, rather than to provide additional stimulus by means of a tax cut that would provide greatest benefit to the more prosperous sectors of the economy.

It should be pointed out, however, that while these selective measures will have their most immediate and direct impact on the economically weaker sector of the economy, they will also provide a stimulus to the economy as a whole by reinforcing the upward thrust being provided by the parallel expansion of monetary policy that has been under way since early in 1970.

The special capital cost allowance supplement being provided in the bill now before the House for capital investment undertaken by manufacturing and processing industries is one of those selective measures adopted by the government to provide a significant boost to a sector of the economy that has been particularly slack recently.

The decision to propose extension of the income surtax to the end of the current year, which is provided for in the second section of the bill, was reached by the government with considerable reluctance but with the strong conviction that such action was necessary in the best interests of the nation as a whole.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, this particular part of the extended budget debate appears to be anticlimatic in that it is almost three months since the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) delivered his budget message and indicated that there would be these two tax changes. I find it rather strange, looking at the continuation of the surtax which, of course, had a very dubious parentage. It was a misconception to start with and eventually a miscarriage.

It was finally brought in at the three per cent level. We have seen it extended, although we find singularly regrettable the words of the parliamentary secretary and the Minister of Finance that they were beginning their monetary expansion policy early in 1970. It is true that in the June or late May budget, they dropped the idea of a three per cent sales tax. I suppose it was anticipated at that time that the changes in the white paper on taxation would have been reported upon and brought into this House, allowing the government to bring in the tax changes and incorporate the three per cent surcharge into the ordinary tax rate. This was fully the intention of the government.

In June the Minister of Finance indicated that he was going to allow the surcharge to die as of December 31, as it was not being renewed in the June budget. We also know it had been the intention not to present a budget, until the very last moment, for other than fiscal and monetary reasons, a budget was presented in order to sweeten the pot. It was a very feeble gesture because it was all promises for the future, not for this winter, arising out of the troubles of last autumn. That is what it was. Let's call a spade a spade.

The budget was one of the government's ways of reacting to the October crisis in the province of Quebec. It was also its belated recognition of the problem of unemployment, particularly in the Atlantic region and the province of Quebec. After all, the budget did not do anything for the other provinces. The parliamentary secretary shakes his head and purses his lips. The loan fund of $150 million or $160 million is supposed to be the anchor of this budget. It provides precisely $1.6 million for the entire province of Alberta for the end of fiscal 1970-71. Why, a spit in the ocean would do more than that to deal with the problem.

Many of the other things that are going to happen will only happen in the spring or after March 31. They may happen during May or June. If this was supposed to be a budget to alleviate winter unemployment across Canada, I say it was a complete and utter hoax. That is why it was so empty. The Minister of Finance can always use an extra couple of hundred million dollars. This government operates on the basis that you have to raise the money because you have the expenditures. Expenditures are already going up to approximately $15 billion. The government always taxes up to its expenditures.

If the government wanted to be careful in their expenditures in many sectors, there would not be this necessity for ever increasing demands upon the economy, far in excess of what the economy can stand. The sins are not entirely those of this particular administration, although the ministry must share the responsibility because most of them were members of the previous ministry which embarked upon programs which went beyond any rhyme or reason when measured against the economy.

If one had to put a cost benefit analysis on the economy and the spending programs, the programs would have been out the window long before this. But, no, it seemed to be politically expedient to establish certain programs and to blazes with the expense and damn the torpedoes. There they are. We are now receiving the bills. These are getting higher and higher all the time.

I wish to deal with the two particular items of this bill. They epitomize, in actual fact, the schizophrenia of the government when it comes to its monetary and fiscal policies. On the monetary side, we are told that the government is increasing the pace of the relaxation of restrictions to get the economy moving again. There were certain changes with regard to monetary policy starting in the spring. But of all the stupid things, that had to be the one. Even more paradoxical, in the June budget there were to be some retail sales credit restrictions which, of course, were never implemented because somebody finally saw the light. I do not know who it was, but they were proven to be extremely obtuse about these matters and insisted even into July that the regulations were being formulated. Then, of course, came the dawn. Unemployment was very serious. The government decided to drop the retail sales credit restrictions. This was one of the gestures given to the country. It would never have worked, and would only have increased unemployment.

It is remarkable as to how this surtax has changed over the past three years. It was imposed at the time of the monetary crisis in 1967-68. It was to be a dampener on the economy. It was renewed in 1969 because inflation was very pressing. The surtax had to be continued and extended to the end of 1970. In December, 1970, when employment was the number one problem and, to use the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), inflation had been licked, we were asked to continue the three per cent surtax. What is it now? Is it anti-inflationary? Inflation was supposed to have been beaten and controlled. Now, it is incorporated into the normal tax framework and will continue to be part of the anticipated revenues to be raised by the government. In other words, it is no longer a surtax; it becomes part and parcel of the normal tax structure. Moreover, the fact is that it is inflationary rather than anti-inflationary. The imposition of a surtax of this kind in a day and age when tax is deducted at source from the majority of working people means simply that in the next round of wage increases the cost of the surcharge is passed on to the employer. It is the take-home pay that counts. As far as the three per cent surcharge on corporate incomes is concerned, it is soon fed through the price structure back to the consumer. I would have thought this was so apparent to everyone that the government would have refused to resort to such a device. As a matter of fact, the government has been fighting inflation with the wrong weapons for far too long. As a result, we find ourselves in a serious depression.

By what means does the government intend to combat the recession? Not with a really expansionary budget. The one feature which the minister produced with regard to income tax changes involved a 15 per cent premium or bonus in connection with capital cost allowances. This looks very well on paper but it is difficult to foretell the result or the cost to the economy. Actually, this concession will cost the government nothing. As a result of the expansion which will be made in anticipation of this 15 per cent allowance, there will be increases in receipts from sales tax and additional benefits accruing to the treasury. So, on a net basis any loss will be more than made up by additional tax revenue from various sources. As I say, it is difficult to estimate what the total cost will be. Nevertheless, this is the type of tax incentive of which I tend to approve. All I can say is that on the basis of what we know today it is difficult to understand precisely the type of expenditure to which this concession will apply. Some elaboration will be required on the part of the parliamentary secretary when he replies.

What will the regulations specify? If the definition of prescribed property is too restricted, the benefits to taxpayers will obviously be extremely narrow. On the other hand, if reasonable latitude is allowed, greater benefit will result. I am interested in the case of a man who invests in a new factory, or establishes a new business, and in doing so takes over a new building which has been used for another purpose at one time. Very often buildings acquired in this way are not considered to be old buildings; they have been acquired to facilitate business expansion or the establishment of a new business. Unfortunately, the amendment reads: "acquire prescribed property which has not been used for any purpose whatsoever before it was acquired by him". Surely, property, whether buildings or land, may have been used for some purpose before its acquisition? I want an explanation of this. The answer might change my opinion as to the value of this provision in the budget. If the wording is interpreted in a narrow sense the concession would be of much lesser value, but if it is interpreted generously some real benefit might follow. It is conceivable the minister will come to us in his next budget to extend the benefit of this provision for a further year.

With respect to the three per cent surcharge, let us consider just what it is likely to cost the economy. As the parliamentary secretary said, the surtax is three per cent of an individual's basic tax in excess of $200. The tax falls on about 75 per cent of Canada's taxpayers. Specifically, single persons without dependants pay this surtax only if their income exceeds $2,740. This works out to $225 a month or, maybe, $228 a month, and there are not too many people in this country, except part-time workers, who earn less than $228 a month.

As far as the economy is concerned, it is estimated that in the calendar year 1971, provided the minister has made the right calculation with regard to the number of people employed in this country, the revenue from the surtax will amount to $178 million, which includes $23 million for the last three months of the fiscal year 1970-71, in other words, the three months ended March 31, next, and $155 million for the balance of the year. I suspect, though, that the minister has overestimated the yield of this surtax because, according to my book, there will be more unemployment during the next six months than he has bargained for, and we know that corporate profits will amount to even less than was anticipated. However, perhaps when addressing us in the House the hon. gentleman has been engaging in a colossal bluff in his enthusiasm for what he considers to be the recovery of the economy.

With respect to revenue from corporations, this is estimated to be $67 million in the calendar year 1971, including $12 million for the last three months of the fiscal year 1970-71. We have from the beginning, right from 1968, objected to this surtax. Every time it has appeared in a budget we have opposed it and made specific reference to it in our motions of non-confidence, as we did last summer and, again, in December, 1970. One of the things that the Leader of the Opposition indicated the government should have done, and even should do now, is to drop the 3 per cent surcharge. As a result of the tax change proposals made by the Leader of the Opposition, by myself and by other members of this party to stimulate the economy, the ordinary tax structure would make up any loss or deficit incurred by the government, or would certainly minimize that loss to a greater extent than the government admits. In other words, if the economy were promptly regeared to a higher level of activity, and with the present level of consumption taxes and other taxes that the government has within its tax framework, we would be better off all round.

Having said that, I must say the budget does very little to restore confidence in the economy. What the public sector offers in the budget in the way of leading the economy back on the road to recovery is minimal; all there is is the bonus on capital cost allowance to give the private sectors some encouragement. The budget should really have restored economic confidence. The problem today is that there is a crisis of confidence in our economy. I am not going to speak about the unsettled state of certain industries, particularly export industries, as a result of the unpegged value of the dollar. Although I will not say that certain industries are bleeding, they are down on their knees and almost out as a result of the inconsiderate anti-inflationary measures taken by the government in the past, such as the acceleration of the Kennedy round cuts and the way the heavy chemical industry has been affected.

Although the minister was warned at the beginning that this would cause him and the country some problems, the Minister of Finance and his officials blindly went ahead and hit industry after industry. People in major industries in this country who have been working for the same concern for 15 or 20 years, concerns that were established at the cost of hundreds of millions of dollars, are being laid off by the hundreds. Firms are closing whole divisions. Plants are barely geared up for full-fledged production, and we are being told that they are going to be phased out. In view of the present economic conditions in this country, the state of present markets, the unpegged Canadian dollar abroad, uncertainty caused by the government white paper on taxation, the expenditure of even one more dollar of capital investment in these sectors cannot be justified.

Are we going to tell these investors that this sort of thing is good for them; that they should have sharpened their pencils? I remember that phraseology used by the minister, by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) and departmental officials in regard to the accelerated competition that was supposed to bring benefits to Canada. These industries were going to have to sharpen their pencils. But what has happened? The pencils have been sharpened so much they have become worn out; industries are closing and people are being put out of work.

What is the government going to do with the Ph.D. level researchers, people with university degrees who are the backbone of the university work force of this country in many sectors? If they are not on the street, they are facing that prospect. Our industry is not big enough to transfer 300 people working in heavy chemicals in Edmonton and at Two Hills, Alberta, to Beauharnois or Shawinigan, because they are facing the same problems as well. The answer given by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) the other day that the retraining programs, and so forth, of the manpower minister might provide a solution to the problem of these people was a fatuous one.

Mr. Greene: Shame.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It was purely and utterly fatuous. Having said that the negative aspects of the surcharge far outweigh the potential benefits of the capital cost allowance bonuses that this particular bill following upon the budget is incorporating into the income tax structure, I conclude my remarks at this stage of the bill by saying that we intend to oppose second reading.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, as I understand the provisions of the bill now before the House, the loss of revenue to the government as a result of provisions in one portion of the bill will be roughly equal to the gain in revenue achieved by the application of provisions in another portion of the bill. This brings to my mind the Biblical quotation: "The Lord giveth and the Lord taketh away. Blessed be the name of the Lord". I suppose the 1971 version of this Biblical quotation might be: "The minister giveth and the minister taketh away. Blessed be the name of the Prime Minister".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Burton: If hon. members are happy with that, that is fine.

This bill extends the application of the 3 per cent surcharge on income tax. The relevant section of the act will now read as follows:

> This section is applicable to taxation years commencing or ending in or coinciding with 1968, 1969, 1970 or 1971—

It is almost beginning to read like a litany. This is now the third time we have had this surtax extended or reintroduced in the House of Commons.

To my mind, nothing can better illustrate the Liberal record of fiscal bungling and mismanagement than the story involved in this bill and the history of this particular tax measure. It seems that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) is a man who can use an argument to suit every occasion. When I was preparing for this debate I had occasion to take a look at what the minister said in 1969, at which time he made it very clear that the government was not introducing the bill for purposes of revenue. At that time, the bill extended this particular surtax into 1969 and 1970, the measure having first been announced in the budget speech on June 3. The minister, however, did not get around to introducing the measure until some time late in the fall, and it was debated in December 1969. When the minister announced the extension of this surtax on June 3, he said it would be clear to everybody that an extension of the surtax at that time was required for the purpose of economic stabilization and not for budgetary revenues.

By the time the minister got around to introducing the bill in the House of Commons the situation had changed. In June of 1969 when the minister first announced the institution of the surtax he pointed out that there were a number of factors which led the government to make this decision. He said the economy had demonstrated a strong performance at that time and that prices were continuing to climb. He said there were strong international pressures. By the time the minister introduced the bill, that situation no longer prevailed. In any event he barrelled straight ahead with the institution of a surtax, regardless of the fact that he was dealing with a different situation, and applied the measure announced in the middle of 1969.

This time the minister has a different reason for continuing the surtax. He made it quite clear in his budget address of December 3, 1970, that cash requirements represented the basic reason for extending the surtax. He said that in adopting this policy the government had decided that this would add greatly to its cash position. He went on to deal with a number of factors, one of which was the pressure for extra cash, which led the government to decide to extend the surtax into 1971. Who pays for this? Of course, the Canadian taxpayer must pay.

We have heard the Minister of Finance make other statements in the House dealing with this particular matter which are contrary and conflicting. I think for a moment we should refer again to the budget speech delivered on the night of December 3 last. At that time, the Minister of Finance was presenting a financial statement to the House of Commons. There were expectations that he would provide some stimulus to the Canadian economy. Unfortunately, there was nothing of the sort. I suggest that the best stimulus the minister could have provided to the economy at that time was a tax cut. This should have included a provision whereby this surtax would have been allowed to lapse at the end of 1970 rather than, as envisaged by the present legislation, being extended throughout 1971.

I want to make it clear that we in the NDP feel that further relief is needed through a tax credit system. This would assist our economy. I find it very difficult to understand why the minister did not respond to the situation that existed in December. It was perfectly clear then, to anyone who was prepared to analyze the situation and see what was ahead of us, that we were approaching a period of depression or recession, whatever you like to call it. Our unemployment rate was increasing at a terrible pace. Every indication was that the recovery of our economy would be very slow in 1971, and that in the meantime there would be no appreciable pick-up in economic activity. It was apparent from the early part of 1971 that there would be a relatively slow increase in he economic activity. This was the projection at that time.

There has been nothing to indicate there has been any change in the situation.

The minister stated in his remarks that anyone with an income of less than $2,743 would not be affected by the extension of this surtax. Of course, this is correct. I am sure there will be a greater number of people than in previous years who will not be affected by this extension of the surtax because of the unemployment situation. I am sure that a great many of the 668,000 people, who were reported to be out of work in the middle of January, will not have any worry about the extension of this surtax, because their incomes will be reduced as a result of the slowdown of economic activity.

It is difficult to understand why the government, which is responsible for the over-all direction and management of the economy of this nation, did not provide greater stimulus. The answer can only be found when we consider the points raised on a number of occasions by many members of this House regarding the government's policy in respect of taxation. The government is looking at a different sort of schedule, one which does not involve merely an improvement in the rate of economic activity in 1971. There is something else involved. I suggest that "something else" is an election schedule, and the events leading up to the government's plan for an election.

There is no doubt that the government is planning for an election in mid-1972. I am sure there are many who feel that if we allow the economy to pick up too quickly in 1971,—by the time we reach the middle of 1972, people will not remember this unemployment situation. Thus, it is much better to stall off for a good portion of 1971, allowing the economic pick-up to take place toward the end of this year. According to this sort of reasoning, by the middle of 1972 the Canadian economy will be rolling fine, and things will be in good shape for the Liberal party to call a federal election. I suggest that a tax cut announced in the budget of December 3 would have been a real stimulus to the Canadian economy. It would have been of great help and might have had some beneficial effect on the rate of unemployment we are experiencing at this present moment. The government chose to do otherwise.

I should like to turn back for a few minutes to review some of the sordid history of this surtax, which really is very strange and unusual. As the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) pointed out, it was on November 30, 1967 that the then Minister of Finance, who is now the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) announced this tax in his budget statement:

> I come now to my tax proposals. My first proposal relates to the personal income tax. I am asking the house to approve a special surtax of 5 per cent of the amount of the basic tax assessed on an individual in excess of $100. This surtax will take effect January 1st and would remain I expect until we have completed the transition to a slower rate of growth of expenditures or until economic and financial conditions call for a change in our fiscal policy.

That was the statement in which the then Minister of Finance announced this particular measure. The resolution was introduced in the House of Commons on December 14, 1967, and the bill was introduced on February 6, 1968. It came up for second reading, at which time the then Minister of Finance made certain remarks. Then, something happened. I am sure this must still make hon. members on the government side of the House shudder. On February 19, 1968, the government bill was defeated by a vote of 84 to 82. This was a clear indication of a lack of confidence in the government. Nevertheless, the government managed to survive this situation.

They must have had some second thoughts because it was announced that the then Prime Minister, Mr. Pearson, was to retire and that a Liberal Leadership Convention would be held. I am sure at that time the Liberals must have thought that after the leadership convention they would want to hold an election, and that it would be much better to have a different type of tax measure before the House of Commons than that which had been first proposed and defeated in the House. So, finally a new bill was presented on March 7, 1968 which was not quite as bad as the original measure. However, it ran into some procedural difficulty and another bill was introduced on March 12, 1968. At that time the Prime Minister, Mr. Pearson, made a very lengthy speech in which he defended the government's record and pointed to the necessity for fiscal restraint. He used this as a defence in respect of introducing the surtax at that time. He went on to quote various authorities to back up his statement that this measure was needed in the interests of fiscal restraint and because of the necessity to slow down the economy.

What is the situation now? I think this was pointed out by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Skoreyko). Are we dealing with an inflationary situation? Is there no need to stimulate the economy and encourage economic activity? Are the government's policies adequate to deal with the present level of unemployment? I suggest the government's economic policies have been found to be totally lacking. This was pointed out to the government this week when the Canadian Labour Congress presented its brief to the federal cabinet. There were some pretty strong words used by the Canadian Labour Congress in its brief, and rightly so. I notice the parliamentary secretary smiles when I refer to this particular brief. I do not think some of the government's ministers were smiling when they listened to the words used by the Canadian Labour Congress, because that organization was speaking on behalf of many of the 668,000 people who are out of work, according to the January statistics. That figure probably is higher now.

In its brief, the CLC stated:

> What disturbs us, and many others, is that our current unemployment problem has been artificially created. It is not the result of natural business recessionary conditions. It is the direct result of coldly-calculated policies whose sole object was to induce unemployment in order to combat inflation. Your government's anti-inflationary program, based for a long time on very tight fiscal and monetary policies, has been primarily responsible for the fact that we have hundreds of thousands of unemployed Canadians. Your government's strict adherence to "conventional economic wisdom" in attempting to deal with an inflationary situation which was largely external in its origins, is perhaps the most incredible phenomenon we have yet seen on the economic front in Canada.

Then, the brief stated further:

Never before in the history of this country did a Prime Minister state before a national audience that it was his government's intent to allow unemployment to rise "if necessary to 6 per cent", to combat inflation. Never before did any federal government knowingly, consciously, and with a cool detached deliberation sentence hundreds of thousands of Canadian workers and their families to the hardships of unemployment. The brutality, the callousness, the studied indifference to the human consequences of this anti-inflationary approach were matched only by its ineptitude.

Certainly, those are very strong words. I suppose there might be a few members on the government side who would suggest that this is what might be expected from the Canadian Labour Congress because it is bound to be critical. I wish to point out to members on the government side that there have been other occasions when the Canadian Labour Congress has taken a much different approach in its presentations to the government. It has been very mild on some occasions and even complimentary in some of its presentations to the government. Not this year, and I suggest the government take careful note on this particular fact.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the other section of this bill, of course, deals with capital cost allowances. This matter has already been referred to in the introductory remarks of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney), as well as by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). Of course, we know that in the manufacturing and processing industries owners of depreciable assets put in place between December 4, 1970 and March 31, 1972 will be able to write-off 115 per cent of the original cost according to the government's proposal.

The government, through this measure, intends to stimulate private investment and the economy. There are three different approaches to illustrate the stimulating effect these proposals which have been advanced are planned to have on private investment. The first suggestion is that 7.5 per cent of the cost of the asset will be added to earnings over the depreciable life of the asset. Second, it could be viewed as a 6 per cent reduction in the effective cost of the machinery according to calculations by Clarkson Gordon. Third, it could be viewed as having the same effect as about a 3 per cent reduction in interest rates the first year. There are really two important consequences which arise out of this which should be noted. The first is that businessmen could accelerate their investment plans or proceed with investment plans that had previously been marginal, both in order to take advantage of the more generous allowance being proposed. Secondly, businessmen who had already made investment plans will receive a windfall gain.

When we attempt to evaluate the government's proposal to increase capital cost allowances, I think one must ask what economic goals the proposal is intended to achieve and how effective the proposal will be in achieving them. The budget address of the Minister of Finance on December 3 last purported to set down in a concise manner the economic strategy of the government for achieving our first economic objective, a steady and sustainable improvement in the real income of Canadians everywhere. Then, later on in the budget speech, the minister stated that a steady and sustainable improvement in the standard of living of all Canadians requires the fullest possible utilization of the nation's human and material resources. This really means full employment. In addition to full employment the speech indicates that economic stability, a good price and cost performance and a satisfactory balance of payments are necessary pre-conditions to the economic goals.

In his budget speech the Minister of Finance also stated that the latest figures on capital investment, apart from housing, are also stronger and that the recent preliminary survey of capital investment intentions indicates growing strength in this area of activity next year. Activity in this sector this year has been one of the weaker elements in the economy. Later on in the budget address the Minister of Finance noted that private capital investment has been one of the weaker elements in the investment picture, particularly investment in secondary industries. He went on to describe this measure as an example of selective fiscal policy since it applies only to the manufacturing and processing industry. The result, he predicts, will be new capital projects, a speed up in the outlays planned for the future, all leading to new jobs for a variety of skilled people in the labour force.

The DBS survey of capital spending intentions for the 200 largest companies in Canada indicates an 11 per cent increase in 1971. This survey of course was taken before the Minister of Finance presented his budget statement. However, the increases in the manufacturing sector are expected to be more moderate. The Economic Council of Canada, in its medium term capital investment survey, projects about a 9 per cent increase in 1971 for all industries, and some 6.2 per cent in the manufacturing sector. However, the subsectors of manufacturing show a wide diversity of intentions. For food and beverages, it is an increase of 1.2 per cent; for pulp and paper, a drop of 11.9 per cent; for primary metals, an increase of 40.8 per cent; for chemicals, an increase of only 11.4 per cent; for transportation equipment, a drop of 36.6 per cent; and for others, an increase of 15.7 per cent.

The figures for the subsectors of the manufacturing industry indicate that perhaps the capital cost allowance proposal was not selective enough. The primary metal industry, which already had planned a 40 per cent increase in capital expenditures, will receive a substantial windfall gain. The pulp and paper industry on the other hand, which has excess capacity and which brings the average investment intentions for manufacturing down, will probably not be taking advantage of the proposal. Where, on the one hand, the application of the increased capital cost allowance proposal may be too broad, the restriction on the type of expenditures that are eligible may be too narrow. Research and development expenditures, and expenditures on pollution abatement, are examples of the type of capital investment that are not eligible in many respects. Since 11 per cent of the capital investment intentions of the pulp and paper firms surveyed were directed toward pollution abatement expenditures, how much of this would be new plant equipment which would qualify under this proposal?

A Financial Post survey of December 12, 1970 suggests that the immediate reaction of companies surveyed was not one of enthusiasm for the proposal. I would like to draw to the attention of hon. members an excerpt from an article in the Financial Post of December 12 which reads:

> Ottawa's policy makers are counting heavily on the budget's extra write off to spark new capital investment in 1971—but so far industry is reacting coolly to the incentive.
> Finance Department officials told Financial Post they expect that the rise in capital cost allowances to 115 per cent will have the biggest economic impact of the various measures proposed.
> Industry—to judge by an FP roundup of opinion this week—thinks the incentive will provide "only minor stimulus" to industrial expansion.
> That is the view of most makers of pulp and paper, food equipment, plastics, steel, computers and other products canvassed by FP. Only a few companies said Benson's proposal might have any effect on their expansion plans.

The Financial Post went on to note the regional implications of this proposal, which leave something to be desired. The article then continues:

> Those skeptical of the scheme's pull point out that Benson's proposal is not likely to be as powerful a stimulus as other measures in the 1960s, such as the U.S. 7 per cent investment tax credit or various fast write-offs made available by the 1962-64 budgets of Walter Gordon.
> What's more, it's claimed by critics, the value of the extra capital cost allowance will be obscured by continuation of the 3 per cent tax surcharge.

Later on the article points out some of the reasons this particular measure would not have the desired effect for those sectors of the economy in which it was desired to bring about expansion. The article reads:

> But design, land, purchase, and other preliminary activity would take about a year and a half. Construction could probably only be started when Benson's program was ending.
> Ironically, companies that had already made expansion decisions but had not yet received machinery or equipment, or taken possession of new buildings, will receive an unexpected windfall.
> Conversely, companies that make the decision to expand during the 16 months of the program, but leave it too late to take delivery before March 31, 1972, will lose out.
> This should mean, for most practical purposes, that management expansion decisions will have to be taken during the first half of 1971 in most cases in order to qualify. And that is exactly what Ottawa wants to see happen.

But of course, it was pointed out in the article that this is not likely to take place to nearly the extent that is anticipated by the Department of Finance. Thus we see that this measure will not have nearly the stimulating effect on the Canadian economy that the government has anticipated and that it had hoped for in making the announcement that it did on December 3.

I could call once again to the attention of the Minister of Finance an article in the Monetary Times of September 1968, which was referred to by my colleague, the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman), when he was speaking in the budget debate last September. It is recorded at page 1809 of Hansard. I will not take the time of the House to read the entire excerpt, but at that time the Minister of Finance did state, in an interview for the Monetary Times:

> Big business may soon have reason to examine a further dimension of the Just Society: The Federal Government, with ample cause to do so, is almost assuredly taking a hard long look at capital cost allowances—the rates of depreciation allowed for tax purposes.
> Projections made on the strength of a study done for the Carter Report suggest that since 1949 tax deferrals, arising from capital cost allowances, are now close to $6 billion. That is $6 billion which Ottawa never got and which had to be made up in other ways, notably by increasing taxes paid by individuals—hardly tolerable for a government which has been so chronically strapped for cash.

The report went on to point out:

> The report to the tax authorities can understate actual earnings to a degree that is totally misleading of their value. DBS, for example, uses the returns made to tax authorities in calculating profit trends. Would the trend have declined so vigorously (if at all) last year if corporations hadn't been writing off new investment of the preceding years at the maximum rates?

Later, the article continues:

> This is one major cause for another look at capital cost allowances. Another is the consequences for the company that makes maximum use of them.

The article goes on to deal further with the subject. This shows that the minister himself, has, on various occasions in the past, expressed a great deal of doubt about the value of this particular mechanism in stimulating the economy. It can have inevitable and undesirable consequences for the economy as a whole. Thus, I feel that this is the worst possible kind of bill. It demonstrates Liberal incompetence and their callousness toward the needs of Canadian people. Consequently, we in this party will oppose the bill to amend the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker. I am happy to say a few words about Bill C-225 extending for another year the so-called 3 per cent social development tax.

When the government levied that surtax, it was just to offset an apparent deficit and for one year only. It is now in its third year and this will be the third extension of its duration.

The last budget reveals that in Canada debt service has increased by some $2 billion within the last few decades, and the population of Canada is increasingly living in poverty.

Indeed, Canadians are living in abject poverty and this fact is recognized by all. There is no end to the expenses involved in setting up commissions which are instructed to determine whether there are poor people in Canada, how many of them there are, and how to deal with the problem.

But with an increase in taxes and the continuation of the 3 per cent surtax, Canadian citizens will have to pay these taxes and thus our taxpayers will lose the purchasing power which they had of could have had.

Then why is the government continuing this tax while we of the Ralliement Créditiste are advocating the introduction of a federal measure to establish an integrated credit for the whole of Canada. Accordingly, we tell the government that this economic monetary dictatorship is at the root of all our evils, of all our economic and social problems. We want a provincial and a federal legislation to wage war against poverty.

Will the extension of this 3 per cent surtax enable the government to achieve the stated aims? Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with an unpleasant and unfair situation just as we are pressing for a just legislation in a united Canada.

So, there is something the matter. What is preventing discussion and knowing the reason for the extension of this tax? To know it, you have to examine the meanders of the financial system.

According to the increase in taxes we have, or to the extension of this tax, our fiscal system is unfair. I will say that those who proclaim it, as well as those who accept it, are accessories to injustice and social disorder, accessories to anarchy, responsible for the present unbalance, responsible for taxes and surtaxes of all kinds, responsible for debts, for public and collective debts, since the extension of this tax will increase further collective debts and public debts, and even private debts. They are therefore responsible for poverty in families, responsible for dread, fear and all unnecessary privations.

The economy as advocated by the government is responsible and unfair, and is part of the injustice suffered by many Canadians. Our whole taxation system is the result of a financial system built on injustices. Our system is the aggregate of finance companies that control the financial system. It is a para-international system. Banks issue currencies that we call credit based on the real wealth of the country. Very well. Without that, credit would be valueless, because it constitutes the real wealth. Then, the credit money is only a symbol of real wealth. The true wealth is the thing; money is the symbol based on the thing. Therefore, it is recognized that credit given by various institutions is based on the true wealth of the country, that belongs to the country, that is is inhabitants.

As a matter of fact, there is individual wealth and collective wealth. Our financial associations or bodies are only individuals amongst other individuals; they are responsible for the money of the country, and now they proclaim themselves the owners of the money issued by them, as soon as it is issued; the owners of credit in order to cancel it when they decide to do so; the absolute owners of all the circulating currency, since they appoint themselves masters of the birth and death of money.

The extension of this tax, Mr. Speaker, is necessarily a reflection of wealth. The banks claim for themselves the ownership of money. Wealth is owned by citizens, but money, the symbol of wealth, is unjustly recognized as the property of bankers. With money, bankers have in their hands the tool necessary to take over all the wealth; they have taken over a good part of it. This is one of the reasons why the government was obliged to extend these taxes.

The financial institutions hold a mortgage on all real wealth, both public and private. The total debt of the country which comprises both private and public debts outweighs considerably the value of such wealth. The total debt of the country is the credit of the financiers. Banks own indirectly all the wealth of Canada and of Canadians; they claim an interest on these riches, and they may at any time demand the repayment of the capital. They can seize the capital whenever they like. The debts of the country to the financiers prove that this system is unfair and antisocial.

We find ourselves again in a tragic situation: either taxes are increased or the 3 per cent surtax continues to be in effect.

The present taxes are not necessary for the common good because they are levied only to pay interests to a few privileged institutions, to a few individuals who have the right of life or death over the institutions, the companies, the citizens, the government, and who thus become deprived, frustrated of their first and vital necessity. Those taxes merely and simply become a theft. They are part of a strategy organized by the powerful to strengthen their own power and, at the same time, weaken the power of individuals, of governments, who are right in claiming the ownership of the actual wealth which they create by their work.

Thus theft goes with tyranny. We must at all costs change this financial system, since the riches of the world were created for all men. It is the duty of Parliament to put them at the service of men, under the control of this government. All citizens must be able to enjoy a fair share of those riches made available to them by nature and industry and the extension of this tax does exactly the opposite.

Workers in this country create wealth and our financial institutions do the accounting so as to enable the citizens to exchange that wealth. That accounting is money. The Canadian people are by right the owners of that wealth and our institutions are constituting themselves owners of the money they make. Therefore our institutions, through a simple accounting process, register to their own credit what should be the assets of this country and at the same time they wish to register as national liabilities all the riches of this country. That last operation is practised when banks or financial institutions enter as the borrowers' liabilities, who are individuals and governments, that credit based upon riches. Financiers can steal that way because the money they create is created in the form of loans to individuals and of bonds. All the money that is made and thus created by the banks, as debts, is debt money.

The more people are taxed, the more taxes are increased and the more the people are buried in misery and austerity.

Financial institutions lend money but do not lend interest. They demand the repayment of those loans plus the interest they did not create. Such is the nonsense of that system that is becoming the greatest fraud in history.

The national debt means the national resources that were stolen by those institutions. It would be logical for the national debts to be converted into national capital, into equity, into social credit. The interest paid on the national debt should be converted into social dividends. Through this means, debts would vanish.

Such is the solution that we have been advocating for a long time, but to which the government never agreed. However, it never found another reasonable solution to offer. If this government were really serious, democratic and responsible to the Canadian people, it would surely bring about some amendment to our legislation, within the framework of our present system. We need not change the framework of our present system, for we could, by means of simple amendments to our legislation, return to the public what it is entitled to, and, in that respect, convert the national debt into a national dividend. This is what we would do if we opened our eyes and ears.

At the present time, we keep increasing the nation's debt and pushing our people deeper into economic stagnation, for 25 per cent of our budget goes for social welfare, whereas 14 per cent of it is used for economic support and expansion. This means that social welfare institutions gobble up almost three quarters of our budget. When a country has reached the point where it devotes that much of its budget to keep people from starving to death, to pay unemployment benefits and social welfare allowances to the poor, an increase in taxes is surely untimely. This is no time to extend the application of taxes.

We must, as members of Parliament, vote against this tax and abolish it as soon as possible and reduce the debenture rate. When government bonds are sold instead of buying them back at the new interest rate of 7, 8 or 9 per cent, we should at least keep the rate at its previous level. This would be doing something for the people. As long as we fail to do that, we shall keep on increasing debts, taxes, unemployment and public welfare costs.

This leads us to blame severely the government and the opposition for not opening their eyes in time to bring the necessary changes that would allow Canada to progress and live in affluence. Instead of distributing scarcity, of increasing taxes and of giving piecemeal to our citizens what they are entitled to have, we could give them directly everything they need and we would still be able to administer within our system, because the capitalist system is the best in the world.

We are faced with two ideologies: the communist ideology and the capitalist ideology.

If we are unable to come up with a better and more humane ideology, I wonder where we will end up.

Mr. Speaker, we shall therefore vote against this tax. We cannot support any longer the extension of this tax as we have other solutions. We could do something else.

[English]

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on Bill C-225, which is a small measure introduced to change the tax law, I must first say that I think it is small in scope but large in result. It indicates the way in which the government is carrying out its course of action for the economic and fiscal well-being of Canada.

The state of the Canadian economy is not all that good. We have one of the highest unemployment rates in the western world. Dr. O. J. Firestone, who was one of Ottawa's most powerful bureaucrats of a decade ago, recently wrote an article for the Canadian Tax Journal. He had a lot to say, nearly all bad, about this administration's anti-inflationary policy.

He writes:

> The question is not whether the Canadian government should have pursued anti-inflationary policies. Rather the question is whether it was necessary to go so far out of line with the economic performance of most of the industrialized countries of the world.

Compared with the other 18 so-called OECD countries, we have created in Canada the highest level of unemployment among the industrialized nations. Consumer prices are lower admittedly than in most of the OECD countries, but in terms of industrial production we have the fourth worst record of OECD countries. Dr. Firestone estimates that a more lenient application of policies to control inflation could have increased the gross national product by $2 billion and found 200,000 new jobs.

Dr. Firestone goes on to say:

> Did Canada pay too high a price in becoming the world's leading nation in fighting inflation?

He predicts there will be "continuing under-utilization of the nation's production capacity" for 1972 as well as this year. It is indeed a grim assessment of a government which has hired all sorts of experts to help it with the management of the nation's business.

Canada may have had the greatest measure of price stability in the western world, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has stated, but it also has had the highest level of unemployment with a consequent loss of close to $2 billion in gross national product. Nor have there been any indications of material changes this year in spite of the government's effort at pump priming, in the main through regional development incentives. Indeed, it is unlikely to show any improvement on last year's 3 per cent. A large part of the reason for this is that the government has drained the well of private productivity. Inflation has taken its toll of private productivity and high taxes and labour costs have also lowered the well.

The profitability of business—still the largest source of employment—has been declining since 1965-66 in spite of the physical growth that has been attained. Attempts by the government to take up the slack have not been too successful. The cost of job creation in the government section is considerably greater than in the private sector. And in this manner, Mr. Speaker, I think that a tax reduction would be indicated and it is for this reason that I oppose the retention of the three per cent surtax.

The white paper proposal for tax reforms based on 1969 income would extract an estimated $205 million in its first year and $560 million in its fifth year. We cannot forecast what effect the white paper on taxation will have on the flow into financing growth. I do not think that anyone seriously questions that savings will be diverted.

Then, there is the high unemployment benefits, higher pensions and related measures. All are very desirable, but all pre-empt funds from business growth. In the past some of these funds came from outside the country. However, these will likely be reduced in the future. They are being repelled by high taxation and uncertainty. It seems that the government is basically in contradiction with itself. It is increasing its demand on domestic funds when it should be reducing them. I oppose the retention of the 3 per cent surtax at this time, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, there is now before the House a government motion designed to extend the so-called social development tax of 3 per cent which had been imposed on a temporary basis in the spring of 1968.

In fact, at that time, the then Minister of Finance, who is now Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), said that this surtax would only be levied in 1968 and 1969.

Ottawa finances are now in a bad way, and what is worse, they are inadequately and inefficiently managed. They are so far from achieving the anticipated results that what is adopted temporarily becomes a sort of habit—unfortunate and unexplainable we must admit—because the government does not plan either on a short term or a long term basis.

We have evidence of it today in this measure designed to extend the social development tax of 3 per cent which had been imposed on a temporary basis. It is a clear indication of the failure of the Liberal administration which is more proficient in the art of provoking and muzzling than in management matters.

Mr. Speaker, a high level of taxation and government revenue per capita is naturally associated with a high level of public expenses per capita, and this would lead us to believe that Canadians should expect more government services.

So today the federal government must justify not only the principle of this 3 per cent increase in taxation but also the use it is being put to.

• (5:40 p.m.)

Having heard the presentations of previous speakers, with the exception of the speech of the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe) who showed the other side of the coin, as is seldom done in this House, I say straight out that this government is unable to justify this 3 per cent surcharge.

Mr. Speaker, when this 3 per cent surtax was enacted in the spring of 1968, it was specifically designed to increase governmental revenues so as to enable the government to ensure a marked social development for the community as well as for the individual.

I refer to the speech delivered then by the Minister of Finance who said that without this surtax, the government would not be in a position to ensure social development and that with it, Canadians would be a lot better off.

The result of such a policy is apparent today. Such is truly not the case. This tax, a so-called social development tax, not only has not ensured social development in Canada but, furthermore, it has not provided anything worthwhile to those whose income places them on the threshold of poverty.

The principle of ensuring social development through taxes is, in my humble opinion, basically wrong and, as conclusive evidence, I would say the same thing of any social welfare or guaranteed income legislation which we now hear more and more about and which would only result in increased social welfare expenditures and finally, would not eliminate poverty in Canada, because it gives rise to an unfair increase in taxes based on unfair tax rates. The Finance Minister of King Philip once said: "Give me sound policies and I will give you sound finance."

Not only our financial situation is poor, but our policies are out of focus. It is a basic truth and this is why I feel that a country cannot at the same time indulge in every political trend and fancy, while forgetting the individual needs and its duties, and still believe that the economy will continue to progress.

If the government does not accept its financial and monetary responsibilities, it must not expect that the economy will be prosperous. When we sow poverty we reap poverty. When we pass legislation creating social injustices we create social injustice. When legislation that favors the big man at the expense of the little man is initiated, the result is oppression of the weak by the strong.

Mr. Speaker, naturally I want to oppose strongly the 3 per cent surtax because it advantages the big man, the large companies that crush the small people, regardless of their income.

I will go even further. The philosophy of the central government is unfair, not only to individuals at the benefit of large companies, but also to the provinces whose revenues are limited by the federal government. The policy is also unfair to municipalities that are deprived of that much taxing power.

Today, provincial and municipal governments, instead of trying to meet the needs of the individual by giving him more purchasing power, must fight with the federal government to know who will tax the individual more.

Mr. Speaker, the three levels of government all operate on the same fundamentally erroneous policy. Let us take a few minutes to analyze the phenomenon.

Mr. Speaker, when the economy is in full swing, what is the fiscal or monetary policy of governments under the present financial system? The only policy which they advocate is a policy of expansion of investments. As they cannot implement that policy of investments by their sole resources, what do they do? They go to foreign countries to borrow money at high interest rates in order to reinvest in Canada.

But when the economy is recessing, when social progress is not assured, what do those same governments do? Which principles guide them to lead the economy? They do the contrary, by adopting positions of restraint on credit. The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was telling to the leaders of the CLC this week: If inflation has caused unemployment, it is because workers have shown unwillingness to tighten their belt. A restraint policy, this is what it means.

When the economy is expanding, instead of financing such development with the tools available to them, government borrow from foreign sources. In so doing, they plunge individuals into debt.

As a matter of fact, if one refers to statistics, he will see that the per capita debt in Canada has been continuously on the increase for 25 years, and this because governments never stopped borrowing at exorbitant interest rates.

Such a policy contributes to individuals getting into debt. And while we go through a recession period, governments as I said propose measures of restricted credit, telling everybody: Tighten your belts! Starve to death! We have to prevent galloping inflation! Stop there! Sit quietly, we must avoid galloping inflation! And they adopt measures aimed at restricting credit.

Now, this second item of the government's fiscal policy brings about the same result as the first—indebtedness for individuals. In fact, over a period of economic recession, the individual, while seeing the various governments tighten credit, finds himself obliged to get into debt, for he lacks money. Then the unemployment rate is bound to increase. The individual lacks a stable income. His security is challenged, his freedom of choice lessened. And in such a case, as in the first, again it is the individual who becomes deprived of purchasing power, and his indebtedness persists. This explains why the Canadian people have $12 billion worth of debts, entered into with the help of private finance companies which are quite happy when economic crises occur for they can handsomely benefit from them while they provide loans at interest rates ranging from 15 to 25 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, the government therefore has only two means as its disposal to control, administer and guide the economy. Those two means, one of which serves in times of expansion, the other in times of recession, have the same effect, that is to deprive the individual of the purchasing power he needs, fundamentally and vitally, and secondly, to increase his debts.

That 3 per cent tax lies at the very heart of the problem. It is the logical result of an administration basically distorted that fits, it must be said, into the context of a poor administration.

Mr. Speaker, as recorded on page 7394 of Hansard of March 7, 1968 the then Minister of Finance said, at the time the 3 per cent surtax was implemented, that this tax would only apply to 1968-69 to solve an immediate problem.

The mere fact that the government is extending this tax proves that its policy is no good.

The Minister of Finance of the central government made a mistake and this is why today the government must impose again this tax with a new "song".

In 1968, the 3 per cent surtax for individuals was expected to yield $105 million during fiscal year 1968-69, but it was not necessarily applied to corporations since this was to produce only $45 million.

These figures are supplied by the ministers of Finance themselves and they prove that this 3 per cent surtax did not apply to those able to pay it but rather to those who had no choice and whose income was inadequate.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the premises I have just stated, the government's policies during expansion or slowdown periods inevitably contribute to increase the debts of the individual. In fact, this tax applies to the individual and not to the big companies. With this tax, the government is once again adding to the burden of the individual, the family man, the worker and the farmer.

Mr. Speaker, the 3 per cent surtax is not quite fair in our present system. Let us suppose—what I will never admit—that the present tax table is fair, this tax is still more unjust than the present tax table. At least the latter takes into account a certain income scale, while the 3 per cent tax equally applies to all individuals, regardless of their income, the number of their children or their responsibilities and needs.

Mr. Speaker, this tax is disgusting. Moreover, the surtax levied in 1968 was levied in an allegedly inflationary period, but according to the Prime Minister, we are not going through such a period at the present time. The Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister boast of having checked inflation and when this 3 per cent tax was established, they both said that surtax was to be levied at all costs, since it would help to check inflation.

Mr. Speaker, if we are to believe the Prime Minister's words, inflation today has been checked. Therefore, why a 3 per cent tax? Either the Minister of Finance lied in the spring of 1968 or today's minister is also a liar. But a decision has to be taken. If inflation was really checked, has he any reason today for keeping that 3 per cent tax? If it has not been checked, it means a 3 per cent tax was levied upon us in 1968 under false representations and the government should therefore give back to every taxpayer the money thus wrongly collected.

Those are but idle dreams really, for the government is using that to beguile people, so as to make them forget the real problem.

Mr. Speaker, whenever there is an economic recession, this government like its predecessors adopts measures to restrict credit. We say that it is precisely at such a time that the government should do something, through the use of two monetary and fiscal instruments, easily controllable, respecting individual freedom and security, namely the compensated discount on prices.

• (5:50 p.m.)

When the economy is expanding, the government should resort to what we call the national dividend.

The national dividend and compensated discount are the only two tools which, while respecting the liberty and security of individuals and adapting to their needs, allow them to really take part in the economy, to get their share of production, while avoiding economic recessions or the notorious economic cycle we know constantly, namely inflation or recession.

For these reasons, I am totally opposed to this so-called 3 per cent social development tax which has not really produced social progress but rather the recession of our economy, especially of individuals.

Mr. Speaker, in a twelve month period of application, according to the present Minister of Finance, it is expected that this tax will bring in $245 million. Experience has shown repeatedly that the present legislation is not strict enough with respect to companies and firms and to capital costs.

The present legislation on capital costs favours industry too much rather than the individual, and the bill before us today will result in a direct improvement of a situation which is already too beneficial to the big ones, that is, to those who already have a strong position in the economy, against those who are destitute. The bill introduced today by the Minister of Finance is aimed at encouraging new investments, and the tax paid by companies concerned will be reduced for a certain number of years by something like $250 million. Next year for instance, the reduction will amount to $25 million.

This bill has been introduced for the benefit of major companies and at the expense of individual citizens, householders and all those who now need government help to live.

In 1968, some 36 per cent of all individual citizens who had paid income tax were not concerned with the 3 per cent surtax. In 1971, because of these new principles of the Minister of Finance, only 25 per cent of Canadian taxpayers will be exempt.

Therefore, the 3 per cent surtax imposed by the government today is not exactly the same it has levied in the spring of 1968. Thus it modifies the aims set up in 1968; this is another indirect way, not to levy 3 per cent, but in fact 6 per cent on income because, owing to the renewal of the former 3 per cent tax, more individuals will be touched and fewer companies will be affected.

The government's need for money has obviously increased today. Before this bill is passed, we might wonder, whether the result of government policy, financed with millions of dollars, is really what was expected.

[Mr. Fortin.]

Mr. Speaker, when we look at the social, economic and fiscal situation of Canadians we soon realize that the results in the field of the socail policy of the liberal government have fallen short of the results which had been anticipated, and that poverty and misery have worsened in a country glutted with riches.

The wealth of a country, or its sound economic productivity should not be assessed according to its resources, since a country may have great resources and great poverty.

The value of the economy should be assessed according to the brains used to administer it. If there is still some gray matter left on the other side of the House, let them use it to make the economy serve Canadians and stop levying taxes and surtaxes. Heavens knows what kind of tax they can dream up to increase revenues. Let them stop crushing the small Canadian taxpayers and at last give them the opportunity to participate in the economy.

We are making today another attempt to protest against the levying of the so-called social development tax of 3 per cent because it was levied on false pretenses, and did not produce the results anticipated. Since this tax is not warranted, the government should save us from it.

Mr. Speaker, we are taking this opportunity to show our colleagues we are floundering in this financial system, that all these measures mean nothing and only aggravate the economic situation of the country.

Mr. Speaker, we urge our colleagues seriously to consider the Social Credit theory and the solutions it proposes, namely, use the Bank of Canada to advance the necessary credit to all levels of government, federal, provincial and municipal, in order to really finance social progress at the public sector level without putting the Canadian taxpayers into debt.

Today, to finance their investments, the governments have to get the Canadians into debt, depriving them of the minimum purchasing power. We suggest that they use the Bank of Canada to finance social development, to support the policy of the federal, provincial and municipal governments, in order to pay for only one school, only one bridge. We must no longer have to pay for three schools: two for finance, and one for us.

That is what makes the taxes go up. Interest mars the loans of the government, and by borrowing it does not use the tools at its disposal. All it has to do is to decide, but it continues to get the Canadians deeper into debt. We urge the government to use the Bank of Canada to finance the public sector on the basis of the true value of the goods produced, the real credit, so that our country might achieve a decent, progressive growth, without getting the Canadians into debt.

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I cannot let this seemingly insignificant bill, as it hardly covers one page, pass. Once more in the House, there seems to be an agreement on the government side as well as on the Conservatives and the New Democratic party's side, to allow the passage of this monstrosity.

Well, no. I just want to say that we refuse to let the government tax and "retax" the population. It always proposes little insignificant and temporary taxes, which are finally retained. The Canadian people always wonder why parliamentarians do not even dare protest against this abominable—

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, might I ask the House leader whether he will confirm the business for tomorrow, and whether or not we will continue with this debate.

Business of the House

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we propose to continue with this measure tomorrow. It may be that when we have completed this measure the order that I announced last Thursday will be changed, but I will confer with the house leaders tomorrow morning about that possibility.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): I must say that this House today reminds me of my family motto, "Sat seto si sat bene"—which roughly translated means "let us proceed slowly but surely".

It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow afternoon at two o'clock.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, March 4, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

OIL

PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—CONSULTATIONS WITH UNITED STATES—NORTHERN TRANSPORTATION POLICY

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In light of the minister's answer yesterday to the question put by the hon. member for South Western Nova, has the government now received a formal response from the United States government to the request for formal consultations on the TAPS route and, if not, can the minister reveal any concrete information to allay fears that the decision has already been made without consultation?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can certainly answer the second part of the question. Obviously no decision has been made since the hearings of the committee that has been established to examine into the ecology and the economics of this pipeline; the matter is still under way.

Mr. Aiken: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, arising out of statements made on a two-hour television program last night by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development indicating that they are taking a rather casual attitude to the transportation of northern oil. Can we expect a statement soon on government policy regarding the transportation of oil from the northern parts of Canada?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, a number of answers were given yesterday to these questions and there is really very little I can add to what was said on that occasion. I believe it is most important that a decision about the building of the trans-Alaska pipeline system be made in light of the great risks and dangers that exist to the Pacific coast. This is a matter of supreme importance not only to the people of Canada but to the people of the United States. From our point of view, a decision adverse to the building of that pipeline would leave us in the position of looking at the problems of alternative routes free of any prejudice.

Mr. Aiken: Can the minister give any indication as to when the government intends to make a decision on its stand in connection with the transportation of oil?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, what we are talking about now is the transportation of Alaska oil. The United States has the problem of finding some safe and economic way of transporting this oil from the state of Alaska to other states of the union. The question as to which is the better route is, first of all, one to be considered in the United States. I have expressed the view of the Canadian government that it would be very risky to transport that oil down the Pacific coast to Bellingham. I have urged the people of Canada and the United States to express their views quite clearly on that question so that a decision can be made with a clear understanding of the great risks that are involved. That is the question at the moment. The question of whether United States companies want to apply to transport their oil through Canada is a separate question. They have not yet applied.

POSSIBLE MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—HOUSE DEBATE BEFORE FINAL DECISION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister this question. If serious discussions about the movement of oil or gas through Canada down the Mackenzie Valley are undertaken, will the government give the assurance that before any final decision is made there will be adequate time set aside for discussion of the whole question in the House in view of the very great possibility of serious damage to the ecology of Canada as a result of such a decision?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): There are a great many preliminaries that would have to be satisfied before any such decision could be made. There would have to be an application to the National Energy Board for permission. At such a hearing there would be a complete examination before the board in public of all the considerations involved. At that time Members of Parliament could express their views on this matter. There could be debates in the House of Commons at that time. So far this is a hypothetical question because no application has yet been made.

Mr. Orlikow: Will the minister look into the question of whether the National Energy Board has the technical staff required to make an in-depth study of the possible dangers to the ecology of Canada if such an application were approved?

ENERGY POLICY AND ECOLOGICAL PROBLEMS OF OIL TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, for the Acting Prime Minister. In the government's present efforts to formulate an over-all energy policy for Canada, is it considering the ecological problems of transporting energy such as oil, and will a policy statement be made along these lines?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is now in the process of developing an energy policy for presentation to the government which eventually will be the subject of a public release. I am not certain in what form that will be made—perhaps a white paper or in the form of statement of another kind. Certainly the government is working on the problem now.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize one additional supplementary question by the hon. member for Athabasca and I suggest we might then go to the next subject.

POSSIBLE MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—DISCUSSIONS WITH NATIVES

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister or the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, whichever wants to answer. Have sufficient consultations been held with the native people of the Mackenzie Valley, since this is the route the government is favouring, and has any agreement been obtained from the local residents that this is in fact the best route?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I expect the minister will be here tomorrow and I will see that this question is brought to his attention. Perhaps he will give an answer at that time.

FINANCE

CONTINUATION OF EXEMPTION FROM UNITED STATES INTEREST EQUALIZATION TAX—CANADIAN U.S. DOLLAR RESERVES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance arising out of press reports from Washington. Has the Canadian government made representations to the government of the United States requesting that the exemption under the interest equalization provision which has been enjoyed by Canada up until now shall be continued?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I understand the situation, the President of the United States has requested an extension of the interest equalization tax, including a continuation of the exemption for Canada. I believe this has been approved by the house committee and is presently before the senate committee in the United States and will be considered by it. The question of Canada's exemption was not raised in the house committee. In respect of representations, official representations have not been made because the intention indicated was to seek the continuation of the legislation and the exemption. There have been, of course, discussions between officials of Canada and the United States in which we indicated our interest in an extension.

[Whereupon there was an interruption from the gallery.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am used to being —

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member kindly ask his question. The Chair is able to hear him.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am used to being interrupted. I have been married a long time. In view of the fact that when Canada was granted this exemption originally it was on condition that we maintain a certain ceiling on our reserves of United States currency, may I ask whether there has been any condition attached in this case? Is there a ceiling on the reserves of United States currency or has Canada agreed to maintain the Canadian dollar below parity with the United States dollar?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in the House several times in the past, almost ever since I have been Minister of Finance, there was no such undertaking by the Canadian government. In order to reinforce this statement there was an exchange of letters between myself and the former Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Kennedy, indicating there was no such ceiling, and there is none.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the minister probably did not catch the second part of my question. Is there any understanding that Canada will maintain the Canadian dollar at or below parity? If not, why did the Canadian government or the governor of the Bank of Canada acquire, as he did, over $50 million of United States currency in the month of February?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister might reply briefly, but I think we are getting into the sphere of debate at this point.

Mr. Benson: There is no such requirement or agreement. The reason for acquiring relatively small amounts of exchange by the Bank of Canada from time to time is to smooth out changes in the Canadian exchange rate.

MANPOWER

ALLEGED INACCURACY OF STATISTICS RESPECTING UNIVERSITY GRADUATES—REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF CO-ORDINATED POLICY

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Given the very high level of unemployment among university graduates and the inaccuracy of statistics established by the Department of Manpower and Immigration in relation to the problem, alleged by the Globe and Mail of March 3, 1971, is the minister considering the establishment of a bureau to collect statistics in this field in order to co-ordinate demand and offer of highly qualified personnel?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): We do have examinations of the problem of people seeking employment in every range. We are at all times trying to improve our facilities, and the case of those with university degrees or other significant amount of training are no exception. We will continue to look at our facilities and attempt to improve them in every way.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Considering what the minister has just said and considering also that, according to the Canadian Association of Universities and Colleges, there is no co-operation between the federal and provincial governments for the purpose of providing university graduates with jobs compatible with their education, does the minister intend to convene a conference of education ministers in order to establish the basis of a co-ordination policy?

[English]

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, there are a number of fronts on which co-ordination can certainly be improved, not only between the provinces and the federal government but perhaps, in addition, with the universities themselves. I think, as some of my colleagues have recently mentioned, there are some problems in this regard, not only with regard to the length of the term but perhaps also with regard to the direction in which that training goes. This will receive increasing attention from the government, perhaps from one or two of my colleagues rather than from myself, but also from all of us jointly.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

As a result of the minister's statement and the scope of the problem, could he tell us whether he intends to call a meeting with provincial representatives, in order to consider this problem and solve it?

[English]

Mr. Lang: I am not sure that a conference immediately would be the best way to deal with the problem, but certainly consultations would be useful and these are going on with regard to different aspects of the problem. When it is appropriate to have a meeting, we will have one, of course.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have allowed the hon. member to ask a third supplementary question, but I feel that four questions in a row is going a bit too far. We could perhaps now change the subject.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, do the minister's statements mean that the federal government wants to be the only one to be blamed for that problem—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Charlevoix.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGED INFILTRATION OF PARTI QUÉBÉCOIS

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, last Tuesday, as will be seen on page 3869 of Hansard, I asked the Solicitor General a question relating to the possible infiltration of the Parti Québécois by federal agents, and he replied that members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were free to join the party.

Now, since he felt it desirable to correct his statement outside the House, could he tell us why he did so?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think it is in order for the hon. member to ask the minister why he made a correction. Should the hon. member want information, he could well ask the minister directly, and I think that in putting this question the hon. member would like to initiate a debate.

I suggest to the hon. member that he might rephrase his question.

Mr. Asselin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

In accordance with your advice, I ask the minister if it is true that members of the RCMP are free to belong to any political party.

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, Canadian political parties cannot be infiltrated by members of the RCMP, because an internal administrative rule forbids its members to belong to a political party. However, if anything, it seems that a political party has begun police activities as mention is made of spies, informers—

Mr. Speaker: Order please.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister.

The minister always makes long statements, but he should obviously be given a chance to state his argument. Therefore, I repeat my question: Can the hon. minister tell us if the Royal Canadian Mounted Police regulations allow for membership in a political party?

Mr. Goyer: Regulations forbid it, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL SECURITY

COMPENSATION OF PERSONS UNJUSTLY DETAINED

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): I wish to ask a supplementary question of the hon. minister, Mr. Speaker.

Lately, I asked the hon. minister to inquire from the Quebec Attorney General whether monetary compensation had been provided for persons arrested without justification, under the War Measures Act.

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): I am informed, Mr. Speaker, that the Quebec Minister of Justice is awaiting a report from the ombudsman in this regard.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

COST OF NEW BOEING 707 AIRCRAFT—REFUELING CAPACITY

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence with regard to the announcement three or four days ago of the purchase of an additional 707 aircraft. Was this aircraft purchased at the same relative cost and on the same basis as the previous four? Also, does it have the capacity to be used as a refueling tanker or will it be equipped with that capability?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the final purchase price of the aircraft is being negotiated between the Department of Supply and Services and the Boeing Aircraft Company. I think I would be correct in saying it is in the same general area of cost as the four acquired last year. Two of the four aircraft now have in-flight refueling capability. Subject to examination, I do not believe this one will have.

Mr. MacLean: Is it expected that this fifth aircraft will be in service by the end of next month when the Yukon aircraft are due to be taken out of service?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): We would hope to have it in service perhaps a little later in the spring. I doubt whether we can make it by the end of next month.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister advise the House why the five were not ordered at one time?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Actually the requirement, as identified in the defence department, was for six, but in view of the limitations on the department budget it was not possible within the confines of the last fiscal year to obtain more than the four, nor within the confines of the present fiscal year to obtain more than this fifth one.

[Mr. Goyer.]

Mr. MacLean: Is it the intention of the department to purchase the sixth aircraft in the next fiscal year?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, if the funds are there we will certainly give it very earnest consideration.

REPLACEMENT FOR ARGUS MARITIME PATROL AIRCRAFT

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Defence. Is the government considering the purchase of a derivative of the Boeing 707 as a replacement for the Argus maritime patrol aircraft, as reported in the press?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): We have had a very interesting submission along those lines, but there are a number of technical difficulties on which we would have to be satisfied before we take that into direct consideration.

ACCESS TO CONSTITUENTS AT BMEWS SITES BY NORTHWEST TERRITORIES COUNCILLORS

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Is it the policy of the government to deny access to constituents at BMEWS sites in the Arctic to the duly elected councillors of the Northwest Territories?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Subject to correction, Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding there are no BMEWS sites in Canada.

THE CENSUS

SUGGESTED EMPLOYMENT OF STUDENTS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): My question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the 1971 census which will commence on June 1 of this year and the high level of student unemployment, is the minister giving consideration to employing students in the taking of the census this year?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I have already looked into that idea, Mr. Speaker, at the request, among others, of the hon. member for Davenport. Canada-Statistics found that it would be extremely difficult to use students for the census because they would have to be trained prior to June 1 and apparently they would not be free at that time being still in school.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: So you get political hacks.

Mr. Pepin: I am giving an honest answer. If anyone has a better one I will listen to it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pepin: I was going to add, before being so rudely interrupted, that a number of students will be needed for work here in Ottawa on the census results during the summer months, and special attention will be given to students for these particular jobs.

Mr. Saltsman: In view of the fact that many students will be leaving school in April, or shortly after that, and could start making preparations even at this time for training to take the census, will the minister give serious consideration to using students rather than political hacks such as have often been used in the past?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question, asked in those terms, is out of order.

ADVICE TO PEOPLE CONCERNING THEIR RIGHTS

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who is in charge of the census. In view of the fact that there are 80 questions for urban residents and 200-odd questions for rural residents, since the two basic laws of census-taking are that the census-taker must be seen and identified before questions are answered, and as only about five of the questions are compulsory, that is, name, address, occupation and ethnic origin, does the minister plan to advise the Canadian people of their rights, and is the minister aware that the Dominion Bureau of Statistics has decided to do this census by telephone rather than in the regular door to door fashion?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I will need the advice of Canada-Statistics in order to understand the question.

Mr. Paproski: Then would the minister check with his deputy minister who is head of the Bureau of Statistics as Dominion Statistician—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Paproski: —and advise the House that there will be no partisan hiring of people—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are running short of time and I must bring to the attention of hon. members the fact that we have covered only two or three subjects. I suggest we should try to get on to another subject.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF AMBASSADOR TO PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs is about to depart for Africa I am sure the House will wish him well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there was not as much applause as I had expected the minister to get.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has any determination been made yet as to the identity of our ambassador to Communist China, or will there be an announcement of that appointment during the minister's absence?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the cabinet has made a decision as to the ambassador that we would like to have accepted by the People's Republic of China. We are now seeking the agreement of that government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask the minister whether Professor Paul Lin—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: —whose name is a dirty word to the Prime Minister and who is now in Communist China has any authority from the Department of External Affairs to visit and discuss matters of international importance with those who today occupy a locum tenens position on behalf of Canada in the Canadian embassy there?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. member for Prince Albert has an advantage over me. He apparently knows Professor Lin. I do not know him and I do not know what he is doing. However, I can assure the right hon. member that he has nothing to do with the Department of External Affairs.

YOUTH

USE OF ARMOURIES AS HOSTELS FOR TRANSIENT YOUNG PEOPLE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the defence department's opposition to the use of armouries as hostels for transient young people this summer, can the minister indicate whether or not the government has made a decision regarding the use of these armouries and, if so, what is that decision?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am slightly curious as to why the question was directed to me. I am sure there are others in the House who might be able to confirm or deny that story. I personally do not know anything about it.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, may I direct the question to the Acting Prime Minister. Can he say whether or not a decision has been made respecting the use of armouries this summer as hostels for transient youth?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this matter has been under discussion in the government. I think the hon. member will have to wait until the statement of policy that I referred to yesterday is made.

FINANCE

USE BY PROVINCES OF CAPITAL WORKS LOAN FUND TO COMBAT UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Robert P. Kaplan (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. As four months have passed since the budget of last November, has the province of Ontario yet taken up any part of the $160 million offered to provinces and municipalities to assist in capital works projects to combat unemployment?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, not to my knowledge.

Mr. Kaplan: Have any provinces taken up any part of that fund?

Mr. Benson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, but I would have to look up the details as to which provinces have taken part of it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ISRAELI-ARAB CONFLICT—SUGGESTED REPRESENTATIONS TO ISRAEL RESPECTING PEACE NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I crave the indulgence of Your Honour and of the House to wish him, on behalf of my party, infinite wisdom and unaccustomed success as he goes abroad.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You mean unaccustomed wisdom.

Mr. Macquarrie: In reference to the Middle East situation, potentially terribly explosive, and in particular in reference to the statement of the British Secretary of State yesterday regarding the Egyptian commitment and the non-commitment on the part of Israel, can the minister advise whether he and the government are taking advantage of the great friendship they have with the state of Israel to urge that country and that government to do everything possible to enlarge and continue the scope and the period of the negotiations, and diminish the areas of confrontation and conflict in this terribly explosive situation?

Mr. Peters: Amen!

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, to the sentiments expressed so eloquently by the hon. member I too say amen.

[Mr. Sharp.]

INDUSTRY

CHEMCELL LIMITED—ASSISTANCE TO OFFSET UNPEGGING OF DOLLAR AND AVOID LAY-OFFS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which I would like to direct to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In light of the minister's assurance as recorded at page 1315 of Hansard of November 19, 1970, that companies severely affected by the unpegging of the dollar may receive "assistance on a very practical basis", is the government considering or is it going to provide such assistance to Chemcell Ltd., which is forced to lay off approximately 320 people at its Edmonton and Two Hills plants largely because of the unpegging of the dollar? If so, when will such an announcement be made?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The unpegging of the dollar has indeed been a cause of that. But if one looks at the reasons given by the company itself unpegging is only one of them. The most important one the company gives is the lack of size of this plant and the limited possibilities in Canada in comparison with what is possible elsewhere.

Mr. MacInnis: Is that an honest answer?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the minister has indicated that the government has not accepted the position of Chemcell that these lay-offs have been necessitated to a large degree by the unpegging of the dollar and the current financial condition of this country, would the minister indicate whether officials of his department are consulting with officials of the company with a view to averting this wide-scale lay-off?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, my officials have been consulting with the company. I have here a statement by the company giving all the reasons for closing part of this plant. There are about ten of them. The most important one, however is "the size of chemical production capacities throughout the world".

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this question was raised yesterday. It is applicable to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and I referred it to that minister.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

MONTREAL—ALLEGED ARRESTS UNDER PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Justice if he is any more knowledgeable today than he was yesterday in reference to the seven people arrested under the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act which replaced the War Measures Act? There were no court proceedings, and that seemed to be his excuse for not answering whether he would give a detailed statement of the reasons for this Act being used, which the government of the province of Quebec said would not be used except under very exceptional circumstances.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have been advised today, after looking into the matter, that the arrests had nothing to do with the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice said yesterday, and I should like some clarification, that the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act would be withdrawn when it was acceptable to do so, or when the atmosphere was such that it would be safe to do so. May I ask what shadows are now lurking in Quebec society that require this Act to be kept in force?

[Later:]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. It is in connection with the detention of seven people in Montreal on Monday, when the police stated that they were acting under the provisions of the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act and, even though they had warrants, did not use them. Could the minister clear up this matter in view of the conflicting statements of the Quebec government, the Prime Minister of that province, and of the minister himself?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I thought I was fairly specific when replying to the hon. member for Calgary North. I was advised by our people in Montreal that the Montreal police obtained an ordinary search warrant and went to an apartment where some documents were found and that several persons were arrested. Those persons were subsequently released a few hours later after it was decided that there was not sufficient evidence to charge them. I am advised also that the arrests had nothing to do with the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act, as I have just told the hon. member for Calgary North and the House, although the newspaper Le Devoir apparently quoted a Montreal policeman who said that the raid took place under the provisions of the Act.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I think that we should have this point cleared up. Could the Minister of Justice tell us where he got his information, since more than one police officer, and they were the ones doing the job, said that they were searching for documents under the authority of the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I got my information from the director of the office of the federal Department of Justice in Montreal, who inquired of the Montreal police.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I think this is something that has to be cleared up. May I ask the Solicitor General whether he will communicate with the RCMP and ascertain what the facts are and what was the nature of the allegations contained in the search warrant, because this leaves a shadow on the RCMP that ought not to be permitted? This Act under no circumstances should be used today.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, not once did I mention the RCMP. The RCMP had nothing to do with that situation. The implication in the right hon. gentleman's statement that I in any way misled the House or tried to confuse it should not remain unchallenged on the record.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman would not be so touchy unless there were some reason to be.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, these prospective appointees as parliamentary secretaries apparently are trying to make themselves known.

In view of the report that the mounted police had stated that what had taken place was under the provisions of this Act, would the Solicitor General, who is responsible for the RCMP, look into this matter and report to the House?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the arm of justice cannot go against justice.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understand that only a few minutes remain before the end of the question period. I realize that this is an important matter.

OIL

POSSIBLE MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—PROTECTION AGAINST TRANS-SHIPMENT OF OIL DOWN WEST COAST

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister on the subject of the licensing of an oil pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley. Does the government intend, if this pipeline is substantially in the interests of the United States, to make any approval of the licensing contingent upon an agreement that no trans-shipment of oil will take place down our west coast in order that pollution and damage to the ecology will not result in two areas?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question put by the hon. gentleman illustrates the great complexities of this situation. I think it is highly desirable, and I am sure the hon. member thinks so as well, that each decision should be made separately and that we should not bargain the one against the other. I am sure that the national interests of Canada and of the United States would be best served if a decision were made not to build the trans-Alaska pipeline system and then go down the Pacific coast to Bellingham.

REPORTED BRITISH OFFER OF ALTERNATIVE AGRICULTURAL CONCESSIONS IN LIEU OF FREE MARKET FOR WHEAT

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of recent reports of negotiations between Canada and Britain in regard to future exports of wheat to that country under Britain's new grain import policy and in view of the fact that Britain is reported to have offered to Canada alternative agricultural concessions in lieu of a free market for wheat, can the minister inform the House what is the nature of the British offer?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I cannot do so. I can only say that this subject has been discussed with the British for a number of weeks now. I can also state that Mr. Rippon, the British negotiator on the EEC enlargement, will be here this evening and we will be meeting him tomorrow and this will be one of the points on the agenda.

[Mr. Goyer.]

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, can the minister indicate to the House the probable extent by which the import levies on grain going into the United Kingdom market will affect our exports to that market?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to do so without knowing what will be the final amounts that the British will decide upon. I do not think this has been announced and consequently I do not think I can comment.

DOCKYARD EMPLOYEES WAGE DISPUTE—WIDENING OF DISPARITY BETWEEN EAST AND WEST COAST BY GOVERNMENT OFFER

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question arises from the fact that the conciliation board recommended an increase of 42 cents on the Pacific coast and 37 cents on the Atlantic coast, which would have still retained the disparity but would not have increased it. Why is the government offering only 27 cents to the ship repair workers on the east coast, thereby widening the disparity from 85 cents an hour to a dollar an hour?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): It has been the policy in approaching these collective labour agreements, as I think the hon. member knows, to achieve the closest possible relativity between workers in the Public Service and those in the private sectors in each region of Canada. The offer in the minority report of the conciliation board came much closer to achieving this degree of relativity than did the proposal in the majority report.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Does this mean that the government has decided on a policy of not paying men equal pay for equal work by taking advantage of a depressed area to pay a dollar an hour less?

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I suggest to the hon. member that he is putting forward an argument rather than a question.

Inquiries of the Ministry

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. MacLean: I should like to ask the President of the Privy Council to make a statement concerning the business of the House for a period as far into the future as he can predict.

Mr. MacEachen: Today we shall continue with the debate on the budget bill which was before the House last evening. If it is completed before the end of the day we shall consider the legislation dealing with statutory instruments until the House rises. In any events, we shall begin tomorrow with the Yukon minerals bill, followed by the textile legislation and the packaging and labelling measure, if we reach that point. I should like to mention that Tuesday and Friday of next week will be opposition days. I cannot go further than that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Since the minister has been good enough to give us this forecast and announce that Tuesday will be an opposition day, may I say that on that day we shall be moving a motion concerning the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We suspect that our caucus room was bugged yesterday morning.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wonder whether the minister will take up with the Prime Minister the possibility of his designating a minister to be responsible for legislation respecting the status of women before our motion is called on Tuesday.

Mr. Speaker: I believe the President of the Treasury Board is attempting to catch the Speaker's eye to request that we revert to motions, and I also believe the hon. member for Joliette has an urgent supplementary question.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

POSSIBLE INCREASE IN MEMBERS' INDEMNITIES—INCREASE IN JUDGES' SALARIES

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): I think my question is urgent, Mr. Speaker, all the more since it concerns all members of Parliament.

Since some questions dealt with legislation that will eventually be adopted, I would like to put a question to the President of the Privy Council.

Considering the possibility that a bill will be introduced in the House to raise the salary of federal judges, is he in a position to assure the House that no such raise will be granted before the government has taken a decision regarding the increase of allowances of the representatives of the people?

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): I will bear in mind the representations made by the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Order! Is it agreed that we revert to motions for the purpose of hearing a statement from the President of the Treasury Board?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

And the House having reverted to motions:

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C), 1970-71

A Message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting Supplementary Estimates (C) for the financial year ending March 31, 1971 was presented by Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board) and read by Mr. Speaker to the House.

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE ON MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Pursuant to Standing Order 59 I should like to move, seconded by my colleague the President of the Treasury Board:

That Supplementary Estimates (C) tabled this day be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As a matter of fact, I have two points of order with regard to this proposed motion. I should like to suggest that the motion be allowed to stand until tomorrow morning and brought up under Motions at that time. If not, I am prepared to proceed with my points of order.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the motion stand, or does the House prefer to hear the hon. member's point of order at this time?

Mr. MacEachen: I am quite agreeable to having the motion stand until tomorrow. We can deal with it then.

FISHERIES

PREVENTION OF FISHING BY FOREIGN DRAGGERS WITHIN 12-MILE LIMIT

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, in view of the urgent situation which has arisen off the southwest coast of Newfoundland because of the presence of foreign draggers, would this not be a good opportunity for the minister to give us the latest information in order to clear up this situation?

[Mr. La Salle.]

Mr. Speaker: I, of course, have no objection to the question being asked but, as hon. members realize, the question period expired a full ten minutes ago. I appreciate that the matter is important and that the House might well feel that the minister should be given an opportunity to reply. I also appreciate that perhaps the hon. member should have been allowed an opportunity to ask his question earlier, but I did caution hon. members throughout the question period that we were probably spending too much time on the original questions. When there are too many supplementaries, important questions such as the one raised by the hon. member, questions which should normally be considered during the question period, fall by the wayside. My suggestion is that the question be allowed and that the minister be allowed to reply. Perhaps the hon. member might repeat his question.

Mr. Marshall: Since we are on motions—

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are not on motions. I distinctly asked whether there was unanimous consent of the House for the purpose of hearing the minister. This was done, and now we are not on motions. However, the hon. member might seek the unanimous consent of the House to revert to motions for the purpose of hearing a statement along the lines he has just suggested.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Marshall: If that is agreed, I would ask the minister to take this opportunity on motions—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let us try to be clear. There was not consent to return to motions. What the hon. member is now asking is whether the minister would consider making a statement on motions.

Mr. Marshall: I will ask the question. In view of the fact that at least four draggers are still fishing off the southern coast of Newfoundland within the twelve-mile limit and even within three-mile limit—I was there yesterday and saw it—would the minister clarify the situation with regard to the limits and what action is being taken to make these restrictions stick?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): My answer is the same as it was yesterday. The answer is yes.

Some hon. Members: Yes what?

Mr. Marshall: A supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to hon. members that we are now going beyond the terms of reference given to the Chair a few moments ago. Is the House prepared to hear a supplementary from the hon. member?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no agreement. I will make it a point to recognize the hon. member early in the question period tomorrow, perhaps at the opening of the question period to give him an opportunity to ask the question.

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order, I realize that a minister is not required to answer a question, but surely if a minister takes it upon himself to say "yes" in answer to a question he ought to tell the House what the "yes" refers to. Does he intend to take the action requested by my hon. friend?

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. Is the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate rising on a point of order?

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, before the Secretary of State for External Affairs leaves the House—I have no point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I recognize the importance of the matter raised by the hon. member but it seems to me we would serve the purpose intended by both hon. members if tomorrow, when there is good feeling in the House, we allowed them to ask their questions immediately at the beginning of the question period so they can get the information they require. At the same time I see the minister is here. Perhaps the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate might be allowed a supplementary.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I want to be very responsible and indicate the urgency of the problem, which is amplified by the fact that 40 draggers were reported yesterday within five miles of our coast in our territorial waters. So, this problem is serious and urgent. I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he would be prepared to seek the unanimous consent of the House, in view of the fact that unanimous consent was not granted my colleague, to return to motions in order to make some kind of clarifying statement on what Canada has done, which countries have been alerted to the declaration of the Minister of Fisheries, what has been the response, and how soon we can get application of the fisheries declaration made two days ago before we run into a serious international incident?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can say on behalf of the minister of Fisheries and Forestry and myself that we will both be in the House tomorrow, that we both have notice of the questions we have to answer and we undertake to do so.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, a point of order, since both ministers will be in the House, would they ask the Minister of National Defence to give an indication of what air surveillance—

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order. I suggest that both hon. members have been given quite a bit of leeway to make statements and to ask questions. I have co-operated with them far beyond the requirements of the usual practice of the House. I will now call orders of the day.

• (3:00 p.m.)

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Wednesday, March 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen (for Mr. Benson) that Bill C-225, to amend the Income Tax Act and to amend an act to amend that act, be read the second time and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, last night during my speech I witnessed a spectacle unique in its way when I rose a few minutes before six to express my opinion on the matter before the House, namely Bill C-225, to extend the application of the 3 per cent surtax. I felt a tide of protests rise from every corner of the House as if I did not have the right to oppose strange agreements, to say the least, whereby the bill would be put to the vote before six o'clock in order to have it referred to the committee of the whole.

I wish to be believed, Mr. Speaker. I was not aware of those tacit agreements, if indeed there were any, and even if I had been aware of them I would not have approved of them because—and I said so yesterday evening before the adjournment—we cannot accept to extend for another year a surtax which we have always denounced as unfair and against which we had decided in 1968. We do not even want the bill to reach the stage of the committee of the House.

That is why we object right from second reading, not for the sole purpose of uselessly extending the debate but to let the people of Canada know not only where their taxes go but also how they are taxed.

Here, Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the House quite especially on a remark, unkind to say the least, made last night by the Acting Speaker while he probably commented on my speech.

Mr. Speaker, I wanted to make this the subject of a question of privilege but in order not to delay the proceedings of the House, I thought it would be better to call your attention on that during my speech because I knew that I would have the floor as soon as the debate resumes.

Hon. members may read on page 3937 of yesterday's Hansard what was said by the Chair. I cannot let such odd go unnoticed. When the House adjourned, here is what the Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard) said, and I quote:

> I must say that this House today reminds me of my family motto, "Sat seto si sat bene"—which roughly translated means "let us proceed slowly, but surely".

Mr. Speaker, I strongly protest because if it had been a member of the Liberal Party who had been speaking at that moment, the member for Ottawa East would probably not have made this comment. This is why—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe that the remarks of the hon. member probably go beyond his thoughts. I am aware of the incident he mentions and I can assure him that the hon. member who sat in the Chair certainly had no ill intentions and I am certain that the motto he quoted was in no way directed at the hon. member for Roberval.

I believe that in quoting his family's motto, the hon. member for Ottawa East wanted to refer to the business of the House in general rather than the contribution of the hon. member. As a matter of fact, I am convinced that he did not intend in any way to say anything of an offensive nature to the hon. member for Roberval.

Moreover, the hon. member for Roberval knows that the hon. member for Ottawa East who is one of the most respected parliamentarians, would be the last to say unkind things to any of his colleagues. I want to assure him that the hon. member for Ottawa East had no such intentions, and if the hon. member for Roberval has construed his words in such way, I would like to apologize on behalf of the Chair.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. Gauthier: Thank you ever so much, Mr. Speaker, for your kind words and you may be assured that I have always had the greatest respect for the Chair. I would not want to be forced to entertain a regrettable opinion contrary to the one I have always had regarding the Chair. Let us say that the matter is now closed but I definitely had to raise this point which was on the record. It is said that the spoken word is forgotten but that the written one stays. Then, that being written I could not read the innermost thoughts of he who was the Chair. However, I wish to thank you most sincerely and you may rest assured that I shall continue as always to have faith in the Chair.

When this so-called social development surtax was applied, the government promised it would be in effect for only two years, just long enough to fight inflation, as we were told then. And now a continuation of its application is being sought for another year, that is until 1972.

Just for another year, and another year, and another year. The population just have to swallow those increasing taxes, mouthful after mouthful. We know the old party line and what an Indian would so aptly call their forked tongue.

The most striking demonstration of this fraud was given us during the Second World War. As everyone remembers, the government seized this golden opportunity to borrow from the provinces three of their fields of taxation, thus robbing them of all revenues, of course, formally promising to return it all at the end of the war.

The Liberal government, like the one we now have, committed a breach of trust against the provinces. More than 30 years have elapsed since that momentous promise, and the provinces are still waiting for the government to return their tax fields. Not only that, but they continue repeating every five years what is being asked of us today, an extension designed to bring the false promises, making the provinces even more dependent on the federal government.

What is most alarming and most unexplainable, is the practically approving silence of the Progressive Conservatives and of members of the New Democratic Party. That is why I hope they will take the floor today and explain their attitude. When it comes to levying a new tax or extending its application, I wonder what keeps them in their seats. They probably think about the government. They have been told so many times that there were only two ways in which to govern a country, that is to say through taxes and loans, that they feel powerless in front of this myth, entirely invented by financiers in order to get us under better control.

As for us, Créditistes, we do know that this should be the last recourse for a sound and logical government. Consequently, we understand the existence of taxes and loans for a poor country like India; but we cannot do so for a rich one like Canada. There is no accounting for it, unless it should be a patent robbery of our heritage, with the complicity of the government.

Indeed, we can compare a country to a family farm, to simplify things. If the family farm yields fair profits, its owner and the whole family take advantage of it, provided that a thief should not find its way inside and take off with the whole production. Canada is the third most productive country in the world and it has the lowest population in relation to its size. Its owners which should be the people of Canada, must benefit from those resources. But it happens that a burglar, that is high finance, gains entry into the country and takes over the best sources of income. The people must therefore resort to taxes and loans to carry on their administration. That results in deprivation for our people, indebtedness, unemployment, and all its consequences.

We pay $2 billion per year for interest alone on a fictional national debt because the Bank of Canada has never fulfilled its function. We pay social development taxes, unemployment taxes, social insurance taxes, national administration taxes, and we continue to let ourselves be robbed by a "supergovernment", which is antisocial and which will bring about our social and economic ruin.

I wonder if our good old parties will finally realize the monstrous character of our false financial system, which allows those who control the economy to loan more and more at unlimited rates, as the government has removed cealings in the last few years, thus authorizing colossal interest rates affecting mostly low-income people. In fact, I had discussions with important financial institutions in order to find out the reason for the difference in rates, as each of these companies has a separate rate scale. I was told that the greater the risk, the higher the interest rate, which means that the borrower who is least able to pay has to be charged the highest interest rate. And I was stupefied to see that the low-income worker unable to supply much collateral had to pay 10, 15 or 20 per cent more than people highly rated by big financiers.

• (3:20 p.m.)

And when it comes to taxes, such as the one it is intended to extend, the average wage-earner is once again the most hard hit. When will the government be humane enough to recognize that the average citizen is unfairly treated? When will it decide to withdraw once and for all those taxes which take away the required purchasing power from our Canadian families?

The government should refrain from taxing the necessities of life and to this end, it should raise the tax exemption for married people to $6,000 and for single persons to $3,500. It should abolish the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials, to enable low income families to own their home too. In addition, it should not extend its temporary taxes.

I ask the government and the other opposition parties to put a stop to this constant extension from year to year of a tax which is permanent, even if it is referred to as being temporary.

At this condition only will we give the population justice and this is the only way to allow the average Canadian to participate also in the economic recovery so desired by the government by investing in our Canadian companies instead of having to sell them to Americans because the people are too much in debt.

There is evidence that we hold the world record for indebtedness for the simple reason that our financial system is based upon indebtedness and our so-called money is debt money. The more we develop, the more debts we create and as evidence of this, I shall quote an article published in La Presse on June 29, 1969 under the title: "Les Canadiens sont deux fois plus endettés qu'en 1960". The same thing could be said for each year. Here is a part of that article:

> Some $9,200,000,000. That is the total indebtedness of Canadians as at the end of 1968, excluding mortgages.
> It is an increase of almost $700,000,000 over the preceding year and double that of 1960.
> Neither bankers, nor finance companies, nor economists can yet see a limit to the Canadian credit upsurge. They do not even discern any sign of it levelling off.

Far from it, Mr. Speaker.

I was reading in a financial publication yesterday that banks had made unprecedented profits in 1970. I think this success is due to the protection the government has extended to them through removal of the ceiling on interest rates. In fact, the money these banks are lending is altogether created since they are entitled to lend 14 times the equivalent of their actual assets at interest rates of 10 or 11 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, is it any wonder that ours is the most indebted people in the world?

Can the economy be stimulated through new taxes slapped on the back of the workers? Or is it feared that the worker, unless he is saturated with taxes as he is today, might yet lift his head to pit himself against the giants of Canadian and American finance?

Can the government at least give us a logical reason for those taxes that the people cannot digest any longer? But no! The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), in all his arrogance, so ordained, and the people must pay. The government, strong in its absolute parliamentary majority, blinded by its victories over the people, cannot feel the tremors under its feet.

We keep giving warnings. There is a limit to everything, but our voice gets lost because they are high on power.

In olden days, serfs where whipped or men were chained. Today, they are squeezed under the steam-roller of taxes and surtaxes. It is more sophisticated, but all the more cruel because human beings are thus very often led to commit suicide.

Mr. Speaker, I need not repeat that we are against that extension, that we no longer want those ridiculous extensions, and we insist that the government simply withdraw this bill, and not refer it to the standing committee for consideration. Now what is there to consider in this bill? Nothing at all. It is at most a formality which will allow this bill to be enacted.

Yesterday, I met a member from the official opposition who told me: We are not going to speak on second reading, we are going to let the bill go to committee and are going to speak on third reading. Well, it will be too late. It is being discussed on second reading as a joke, because there is absolutely nothing to discuss in it.

And what shall we do on third reading? As always, the government will call the vote and the bill will be passed and the people will once again be the victims.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be party to these taxes and surtaxes, and I ask the government to keep for once, if it never did, its promise and to drop this legislation which was to stay in effect for only two years. Let us be assured that the people, the workers—because this legislation again affects only the average worker—have had enough of paying the surtax for two years and will not allow it to be extended.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-225 purports to extend for another year the 3 p. 100 temporary surtax imposed in 1968.

Ever since then, the government has tabled each year a similar bill, which leads me to believe that they are not acting fairly towards the Canadian taxpayer; this procedure is tantamount to making a permanent tax out of a temporary one.

In my opinion, if matters were dealt with in a like manner by municipal governments, of which I was a member for a part of my life especially at the rural level, no taxpayer would trust the administrators at all.

When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) brought down his supplementary budget in December last, he clearly stated and I quote:

> In order to meet our cash requirements for the coming year, without resorting to excessive borrowing on the market, the government proposes that the 3 per cent surtax on personal and corporate incomes be extended for another year. The receipts from this tax are estimated at $245 million for the 1971 calendar year.

This means that individuals will have $245 million less in purchasing power, as well as corporations, to further develop industries and give employment, if possible, to Canadian workers.

In order to fight unemployment effectively, the government should instead reduce taxes, which would result in leaving more purchasing power in circulation and allow an economic recovery.

Last January, the president of the Royal Bank of Canada said: Governments must make up their minds to reduce taxes. But to what level of government must we appeal for this reduction in taxes? The needs and the tax receipts of the provinces keep increasing. He added and I quote:

> But this is not the case of the federal government, whose actual financial requirements increase at a much lower rate. However, Ottawa wants to keep the lion's share.
> An example is the 3 per cent surtax which was to disappear at the end of December. Mr. Benson decided to extend it, which is no way to restore confidence among the economic representatives—
> And what about the 11 per cent tax on building materials! If Ottawa removed or at least reduced it, this would certainly spur the building trade and, by the same token, many other sectors.

Therefore, if this would give a new impetus to construction, create jobs, provide employment, all the more the repeal of the 3 per cent surtax would give the same results.

Are municipalities in a position to reduce taxes when you consider that they have to borrow at rates up to 9½ per cent?

I will cite as an example the very recent borrowings made by the city of Montmagny, in my constituency. The city borrowed at 9½ per cent on short-term bonds, from 1971 to 1980, and the loan was made for water and sewage works. This is what is happening in a Quebec municipality. I can refer to another municipality, Saint-Camille which is also in my riding, and which just borrowed for sewage works, at 8¼ per cent over 40 years.

Mr. Speaker, when one examines the proportion of our municipal budgets which is allocated to debt servicing, one can appreciate that the average debt servicing for municipalities, in Quebec at least, represents approximately 39 per cent of the budget.

This is why we, of the Ralliement Créditiste, have time and again urged the government and the House to grant interest-free loans to the provinces and municipalities in order to enable them to undertake public works without overburdening their budgets, thus promoting an economic recovery and the setting up of facilities designed to ensure a normal development.

We always get the same reply: With this system of yours, your money will no longer be accepted in other countries. But only last November, while I was attending a United Nations meeting, I went to a restaurant to have breakfast with my hon. friend from Laval (Mr. Roy). We were served a 75-cent meal, and the hon. member for Laval gave a 25-cent tip to the waitress, who, having ascertained that it was a Canadian coin, rejected it disdainfully, saying: "No good money".

The incident goes to show that we don't have to put a Creditiste administration into power in order for Canadian currency to be rejected abroad.

I shall go still further, speaking of loans without interest. On June 18, 1970, a question from my leader, Mr. Caouette, asking how much had been loaned to countries in Africa, Europe, etc. during the past five years, elicited the following reply: There have been 97 loans totalling $419 million. And for what purposes? The loans to Jamaica was for construction of a sewage system, of the type built in the province of Quebec, such as we build in Saint-Camille, Montmagny and elsewhere, but with loans at 9½ per cent interest, while over there loans are granted at ¾ per cent and repayable over 50 years, and if at that time people cannot pay they are granted a further ten year's grace.

Mr. Speaker, this is why I am against this new one-year extension of this 3 per cent surtax on individuals and corporations, because it is possible to find money otherwise. While the federal government is able to take such a step, municipalities and provinces cannot profit by these advantages since they are not allowed to do so by the central government.

For 1970-71, the total amount of taxes paid by individuals will reach some $5.5 billion, which means that the 3 per cent surtax will affect them enormously. And it will be even more for 1971-72.

For the same period of time, the state will pay $2 billion in interest on the public debt, a large part of which is due to those who control the credit of Canadians, because they have a monopoly in this field, as the government allows them this possibility.

So, in 1970-71, through taxes on personal income the government will receive $5.5 billion and through corporate taxes $2.5 billion. So the 3 per cent surtax will have fairly substantial effects on the Canadian taxpayer; this will discourage him and will also increase financing problems not only for individuals but also for corporations. And that is why the unemployment rate is rising week after week and month after month.

• (3:40 p.m.)

We should eliminate waste such as we experienced in the case of H.M.C.S. Bonaventure where Canadians paid for repairs amounting to $17 million while the estimate had only been $8 million, as recorded in Issue No. 20 of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. Well, this vessel on which $17 million were spent in the way of repairs was sent to the scrap yard and practically given away.

We could lower taxes and distribute a social dividend periodically to relieve the destitute, and this could be done with such savings without having to resort to increased taxes.

Two Canadians out of five are destitute.

How can we do otherwise than to qualify as poor the individuals who are compelled to subsist on $1,500 or $2,000 per year or widows with five children who have to live on social welfare payments amounting to $2,160 per year? In addition, in the province of Quebec, investigations are now carried out in those families. Inspectors check the wallets of welfare recipients and look if they have refrigerators. This is not going on in China, but in the province of Quebec in Canada.

The real thieves should be sought and one should leave alone the poor people who are constantly worried and wonder if they will be able to continue to pay their taxes, their insurance premiums, their school and municipal taxes. I witness such cases every day and every weekend I get more than I can handle. It is my duty to look after them and to raise the matter in order to draw the attention of the government and convince it to do something for those people.

The poor are often called underprivileged. They have been disinherited. They are denied their status of joint heirs to the national wealth we possess in Canada, a right equally shared by all citizens of the country. They should co-inherit the progress that is the main factor of modern production and be entitled to a share of the production resulting from that progress.

If the returns of production are distributed only among financial backers and employees, that means that the share of the underprivileged went to financiers and wage-earners. By taking from these through taxes to assist the underprivileged one does not reinstate these underprivileged in their rights; these allowances leave them with their status of underprivileged and welfare recipients, whereas they should be recognized as joint heirs and joint social capitalists, receiving a social dividend, not as assistance to indigents, but as money due to capitalists. This would be an "operation dignity" ensuring every member of society some degree of economic security, a standard of life proportional to the volume of production, without suppressing the remuneration of those producers who develop the community's capital.

Technical advance would no longer be detrimental if it did away with jobs. On the contrary, the social dividend, ensuring to all a certain standard of living geared to production, and not only to employment, increased mechanization and automation, would free the people and enable them to pursue activities other than the economic function of man, instead of creating new material needs and maintaining work as the sole source of revenue.

Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time that we have asked in this House for a financial reform with a view to freeing the government from the bondage of credit controllers. But the government always refuses to act.

To my knowledge, since 1968, four motions asking for the passage of legislation to guarantee all citizens a minimum income have come before the House. On four occasions, the old-line parties leagued together to vote against those motions which, some day or other, will have to be passed. And the sooner the better. The more there are delays, the worse the problem gets; the more the people are dissatisfied, and the more we witness situations which become more and more nerve-wracking.

The situation is worsening from day to day, as I said earlier. We now have 142,000 unemployed graduates, for whom the state spent considerable sums of money, and whose parents made sacrifices to keep them in school, often by working late at night.

Because of a derelict financial system that is out of line with modern activities and opportunities of 1971, our Canada is now depriving itself of the advantages brought about by the activity and know-how of those 142,000 graduates not mentioning 400,000 other healthy persons who are unable to be of service to their country.

In addition, we are informed that the situation might possibly deteriorate during summer or autumn when waves of new graduates from universities, trade schools and CEGEPs will swell the ranks of educated unemployed. And yet, in December 1970, we had tabled a motion in the House and initiated a debate on the grave subject of the unemployed in the 18-25 age bracket. What did the House do? We played around, as we are doing today, we are not interested in this fundamental matter. This is a small two page bill, but none the less a bill that involves $245 million over the next fiscal year.

Mr. Speaker, where are the people's representatives? I am convinced that the ministers are acting in good faith. But, I wonder about one thing: during the war the administrators were efficient and in spite of numerous material difficulties, lack of manpower and lack of supplies, they succeeded in administering Canada and in allowing every Canadian to pull through. We lived then through a boom period.

These same administrators, once war was over, have become incompetent. When we talk about the unemployment problem, they say: Wait, we have magic formulas on the way. Wait, we will soon have solutions!

• (3:50 p.m.)

As recently as yesterday I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) about it and he answered: When the time comes, we shall state our position.

Like serious people and sincere Canadians we should take the necessary steps right now to put finance at the service of men so that the government may stand up to credit controllers and give better service to the people. Let us not forget it is time to act. Let us not wait until somebody hits us on the head to make a decision, for as early as 1936, an eminent sociologist said in a lecture he was delivering here at the University of Ottawa: Lastly, if you do not want Communism, take to Social Credit. You will thus have a terrific arm against those enemies.

Mr. Speaker, that is truer in 1971 than in 1936. We have gone a long way since then but not far enough to free ourselves from the financial control over governments that prevents men of good will, not only in government but also in industry, business, external or internal trade, in short in all fields where men of good will give their best, from contributing to Canada's development and helping free Canada from that financial influence.

The more Canada grows, the richer it gets, the more Canadian people are told: Deprive yourselves, live like the poor. And there are more poor people all the time. That is not normal and it is for that reason that I am taking a firm stand today by opposing with all my might the extension of that 3 per cent tax that will make the problem more serious instead of solving it.

Income Tax Act

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I cannot miss this opportunity to make a few brief remarks on this bill.

We are now considering a bill respecting the 3 per cent surtax, the so-called "social development tax", which had been introduced on a temporary basis only.

When the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) was Minister of Finance, he assured the House when proposing this tax that it would be applied for a limited period of time. This is what is hateful about this tax: it is becoming more and more permanent.

If I remember well, when this measure was introduced by the Minister of Finance I suggested that this tax would become permanent. As the months and the years go by, I think the events are proving me right.

And here what is worse: this social development surtax, a designation that makes it all the more hateful, has made it possible to take about $200 million from the Quebec taxpayers.

It was argued that this was to facilitate the implementation of the medicare legislation and we know that the adherence of Quebec was delayed by one year.

This tax is the reason why they took $200 millions in Quebecers' pockets. The then provincial government, as well as ourselves in the opposition, asked the Minister of Finance to make good to the province of Quebec this amount collected I would not say in an illegal manner, but in an irregular one. But the government ignored our representations and those of the provincial government, and one may wonder whether it was not because the latter was of a political allegiance which failed to please those individuals who rule the country.

At any rate, Mr. Speaker, I say that in imposing this 3 per cent surtax, this government has been far from straightforward, for they stressed the temporary nature of what is now considered to be a permanent surtax. With this kind of action on the government's part, there is deception in the general public as well as a tendency to mistrust the nation's leaders.

Measures and positions like the ones now before us are largely responsible for the lack of confidence in the country's government which prevails within the population.

This legislation is also impeding the economic expansion of our country. Every once in a while the government, through the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) or some other minister tells us that there are programs being implemented to solve the unemployment problem. However, a measure like the one now before the House will only serve to increase unemployment and I think the government should drop this arrogance, this impression which it is giving to the whole population that he knows everything. Instead of that, he should follow the advice of opposition members who are somewhat closer to the people than those now running the country.

I therefore urge the government not only to postpone the tax, but to eliminate it immediately. By so doing it will have taken some concrete action toward creating real employment opportunities because, with unemployment increasing at the present rate, it can be feared that the coming months hold in store a situation even more alarming than the one we now face.

On behalf of all moderate income citizens and workers of my riding, I therefore urge the government to assume its responsibilities and stop deceiving the population, to whom the assurance had been given that this 3 per cent surtax would be temporary. Let the government find ways and means of meeting its commitments and eliminate this tax within the shortest possible delay.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Romuald Rodrigue (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-225, now before us, is to amend the Income Tax Act and, in practice, its aim is to extend for one more year the 3 per cent surtax.

Hon. members will recall that when this surtax was imposed, it had been mentioned that it would be temporary only and that it would be recalled at the end of the year. And here we have its third renewal! It is the third time that Ministers of Finance ask the House to renew this so-called temporary tax. It is to be wondered whether it is the only possible and valid step in the circumstances. A temporary legislation has been turned into a permanent one.

It will be recalled that, when he brought down his supplementary budget on December 3, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) indicated that he intended to ask for an extension of this 3 per cent surtax on individual and corporation taxes.

Although this bill is not very elaborate, it includes, in my view, two important features which are in conflict with one another. On the one hand, the Minister of Finance would like to use taxation to stimulate the economy and, on the other hand, he proposes a measure that not only has the opposite effect, but will, to some extent, reduce the purchasing power of Canadian taxpayers.

I seriously wonder whether, in making this choice, the minister was motivated by political or economic reasons. If I have doubts it is because the bill under study includes two different decisions that lead us into completely opposite directions.

On the one hand, the minister proposes tax exemptions to stimulate investment and, on the other hand, he asks for the extension of the 3 per cent surtax. Those are two completely contradictory decisions. I wonder if in taking this decision the minister did not only consider the increase in tax revenue that this measure will bring in for the current year and which may reach $245 million. Obviously it is emphasized that tax exemptions of $25 million will be granted to companies and individuals that will increase their capital investments for the manufacturing processing of goods. But who will benefit by this measure besides big companies which invest continually and do not have to postpone projects for lack of available funds? How many taxpayers will really benefit by the increase in depreciation rate proposed in this bill? Very few. Only privileged people.

Moreover, the effect of this measure will be to increase further company reserves which are already too high in my estimation. I think that I can detect in the minister's decision his true choice which has a political rather than an economic character. By this decision, he enables large corporations to deduct $25 million from their income tax.

At a time when it would have been advisable to increase the total purchasing power of the people, the minister has made the wrong choice in extending the 3 per cent surtax thus depriving the people of $245 million.

I do not think that it is necessary to quote statistics on employment conditions in order to prove that the situation has not improved since December 3 last.

Even if the hon. minister declared recently that the number of unemployed should start declining after March, he certainly meant that the return of milder weather would be more efficient than the measures taken by the government to solve the unemployment problem.

To realize the situation one has only to check newspapers every day and one will learn about numerous layoffs in all sectors of industry. Nobody knows whether he or any member of his family will be unemployed tomorrow or next week.

There is no need to compare statistics or to play with figures to be able to say that things will be better tomorrow or worse in a week. We only know that too many people have lost their jobs and that unemployment has tremendous social and economic consequences.

I feel that the solution to an economic ill must be economic in nature and not political. To my mind, the minister chose a political solution.

The 3 per cent surtax we are asked to extend would remove an amount of money that should remain in the economic circuit, to sustain the demand for consumer goods. By sustaining it, at the same time we allow industries to continue producing, and service industries to pursue their economic activities, the result of which is to maintain or increase employment.

The taxpayer who lacks purchasing power buys less. The manufacturer produces less and, as a result of lower production, he lays off workers, and the cycle continues.

Such are the effects of the legislation proposed in Bill C-255 and other simliar ones. And one wonders how it is that results different from those anticipated are brought about. The present results, that is unemployment and underemployment, are not due to chance, but to a series of unconsidered decisions like that which is now proposed.

All taxes, whatever they are called, take away purchasing power from those who are hit by them. In particular, this tax will take $245 million from the taxpayers this year. That represents $245 million, at a time when it would have been necessary to inject supplementary capital in the economy in order to get it going again and to give new confidence to the people. With one hand, the minister collects a certain amount of money under the pretext that he must meet Treasury needs, and with the other, he allows an increase in the capital cost allowances on the purchase of equipment or production assets. Once again, the citizen is forgotten to the benefit of companies. If this choice is not political, I wonder what it is!

We have been repeating for a long time, in this House, that the real problem is not at the production level, but at the consumer level. Our production system is without doubt able to supply all the goods needed for the welfare of the population, but the same cannot be said about the ability of the population to control production.

The minister still has time to withdraw Bill C-225 and to give up the extension of the 3 per cent surtax for another year.

I am sure that this decision would be well received by all Canadians. It would renew confidence in the economy of the country. We might see, during the following months, an economic recovery. Employment conditions would improve, and the minister would easily recover the $245 million, because he would not have to increase the government outlays for social welfare. Furthermore, the people returning to work would contribute to the tax receipts through income tax and various other taxes.

• (4:10 p.m.)

When the economic activity slows down, the government's tax receipts decrease also, and this is normal. The measure brought before the House by the Minister of Finance will contribute to increase taxes.

It seems to me we have had enough tax increases in Canada during the last ten years. The Canadian people are already overtaxed. From 1955 to 1965, tax increases at all government levels reached 41.4 per cent in Canada. There is no need to look far for an answer to the employment problem.

Whether we like it or not, all taxes are finally included in prices. That is why we must face constant and unreasonable price increases.

Who must pay for those price increases if not all consumers? Workers, people with a fixed income, low income groups are those who suffer the most from such increases, because every time prices go up, they have to do without some necessities.

Those who have an above average income are practically not affected by those increases, because they hold influential positions or operate at the management level. Those people often hold positions in manufacturing and trade. They can thus simply increase the price of their products or services. When they increase their prices, they improve the occasion sometimes by killing two birds with one stone, that is, by availing themselves of the latest price increases to increase their profits.

Who would not be tempted to do the same since our economical system is a jungle where the strongest makes its own law and is an absolute master? If the minister had taken some other course than to extend the 3 per cent surtax through Bill C-225, I would have been very surprised, because there is nothing he would not do to fight inflation.

For two years, the government deliberately restricted the Canadian economy and this led to a recession. Overnight the government, through the Prime Minister (Mr.

Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), asserted that inflation had disappeared. However, during January, food prices in Quebec increased by about 2 per cent.

How is it that on December 3 they said that inflation had been checked and the aim was now to have unemployment disappear? It would have been more sensible to make sure what the genuine causes were before taking steps that led us to a dead end.

What about the fight against unemployment? It would have been better for them to keep silent, because since it was referred to, the number of unemployed increased by 200,000 and a considerable number of plants have closed their doors or reduced their business operations to such a level that they lose money every day.

This bill should be withdrawn immediately. This is hardly the time to impose new taxes. I believe that measures aiming at an injection of additional purchasing power should replace Bill C-225 now before the House. The measures taken should not slow down the economy but restart business.

Repeal of the 3 per cent surtax and of the 11 per cent tax on building materials was requested by all the representatives of the labour force and the expert spokesmen for the industrial, commercial and financial quarters.

Again I ask the Minister of Finance to withdraw his bill aimed at extending the duration of the 3 per cent surtax.

[English]

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, some days the Commons chamber seems a little unreal. Outside in the country almost three quarters of a million Canadians are looking for work and experiencing the frustration of not being able to find employment. Inside this chamber, men of reason are gathered together to discuss a tax bill which is supposed to deal with this situation. Although the House can get angry and bitter on occasions, very little anger or bitterness is apparent today. In no way does the anger and bitterness felt outside the House permeate these walls.

We, as members of the opposition, appeal to the government to recognize what is happening and bring in measures which will be effective in reducing unemployment. Up to this moment, regretfully, we have not been successful. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) is in his place most of the time. Perhaps he is behind the curtain now; I saw him only a little while ago. I am sure he says to himself: Oh, the opposition always talks, and no matter what we do they always complain. Thus, he lulls himself into a sense of complacency.

We are honoured today by the presence of a former minister of finance, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp). So, in a way, there are two ministers of finance present in the House today while we debate one of the most crucial issues of our time. Yet, there is no response from across the way. They are quite convinced in their own minds that what they are doing is the best of all possible courses. They get very angry when we on the opposition benches say the government has deliberately set out to create unemployment. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and other ministers, have said to the Canadian people on various occasions: how could anyone believe that we would deliberately create unemployment? They have worked out a little drill. They say they have done what they have done in order to avoid unemployment. In other words, they are throwing people out of work so that they will not be out of work. Well, they may be able to understand this reasoning but I find it difficult to do so. They say: If we had not done these things, conditions would have been worse. Of course, we have no way of knowing whether or not this is true.

The fact of the matter is that the government has made one of the most fantastic economic errors in the history of this country. They have failed to understand what is happening, and three quarters of a million Canadians are paying the price of their folly. The other day the Prime Minister had to admit before the Canadian Labour Congress, that had he known some of the things he knew later he might have brought in somewhat different policies. Perhaps anger is out of place here. We are reasonable men who come together to debate. After all, Parliament is a substitute for anger, a way of avoiding warfare and violence. This is the place where we can discuss these questions and, hopefully, come up with reasonable answers. Despite the fact that it has admitted making a mistake, the government puts forward no proposals designed to repair the damage, to get the economy going again. Hon. members opposite cannot make up for the hardship they have caused, the loss of human dignity. But at least they ought not to perpetuate it. They could take measures to get the economy going again. They have brought in measures which, they say, will move us in the right direction. Well, there is something to be said for not moving backward. Even a small step forward has to be appreciated. But we cannot be satisfied, faced with a problem of this magnitude and the suffering which is going on.

For a moment I want to leave recrimination aside. History will pass judgment as to whether the government deliberately created unemployment or not, or whether it simply goofed. The point is, what shall we do as a Parliament for the three quarters of a million Canadians who are out of work? The government points with pride to its export position, to the fact that we are exporting more than ever before. This is true, but what good is it when so many of our people are out of work? The fact that we are exporting at the present rate has raised the value of our dollar and hurt our manufacturing industry where most employment is concentrated. We have the worst record of employment in the western world, as well as the slowest growth. As a return for having created this situation, we have somewhat reduced the threat of inflation below the level it might have been.

To combat this unemployment, the government is proposing a measure to increase depreciation allowances from 100 to 115 per cent. I want to deal with that matter in particular since it does cast a great deal of light on how the government views the situation and sees its priorities. What the government is really saying is that with an increase in depreciation allowances the road to recovery will be paved with increased profits for business, because that is really the effect of increasing depreciation allowances. There is the thought on the other side that if we are going to recover, slow though that recovery may be, the way to do so is to increase business profits and to show businessmen that more money is to be made. This, therefore, will stimulate capital expenditure, which in turn will stimulate the economy and employment will result. The point is there is no evidence that indicates that this in fact is going to happen, or that this particular kind of economic reasoning is any less disastrous than the economic policies that put us into this bind in the first place.

I should like to give the House some of my reasons for feeling as I do about this matter. First of all, if we look back to our periods of prosperity and examine the circumstances that motivated business, we will almost certainly find that the real stimulus to employment has always been increased purchasing power on the part of the consumer. Business is not going to expand even if you give business increased capital allowances. Some businesses are going to expand anyway, and it is a nice bonanza for them. We can kid ourselves later on that this expansion might not have taken place if we had not taken that step. The same can be said of the designated area program. Industry went into these areas, but we will never know whether industry went there because they were going there anyway or because of the giant hand-outs that we gave them.

As I say, there is no real evidence that these policies are effective. What we do know is that if people have needs that must be filled and have the means whereby they can pay for their needs, then businessmen will respond as they always have. After all, that is what business is all about. It is there to understand the demands made by society, and to provide the goods and services that arise as a result of those demands. Business cannot respond to those demands unless consumers have purchasing power.

It is for that reason that the members of this party, and I think this view is held also by all opposition parties, feel that it is purchasing power that has to be increased, not profits. My hon. friends to my left in the Créditistes have their own way of increasing purchasing power. I may not agree with that way, but they understand the problem, and in a way that the government does not. They know that the key to this problem lies in increasing the purchasing power of the people in one way or another. This is how you generate employment, and as business responds so you have business expansion.

Mr. Rondeau: There is no other way.

Mr. Saltsman: The other way that business responds, particularly in Canada, is in meeting needs that do not arise in our own country but in foreign lands. Unfortunately, too much business expansion has taken place in this direction. For instance, much of the mining resource expansion takes place not because it is particularly good for Canada but because other countries desperately need our raw materials. This is a rather disastrous kind of development, one that is going to be accelerated and encouraged by the increased depreciation that is being proposed.

Let us look at some figures that appeared in the newspaper a few days ago. The Iron Ore Company of Canada is trying to justify the expenditure of $2 billion to develop an iron ore mine. They have pointed with pride to the fact that something like 9,000 jobs will be directly created. By a rough and ready rapid calculation this works out to $300,000 per job. It is true that additional jobs are created at the secondary and tertiary levels, but this is true of all industries, not just the mining industry. If it costs $300,000 to create one job, then how is this country ever going to be able to create sufficient employment for the estimated 200,000 people who enter the labour force every year? There is not that much money available to this country to create those jobs. I suggest the argument that we do not have enough capital in this country to provide jobs for our people is not true; not only do we not have enough capital in this country but no country in the world has enough capital to create jobs that cost $300,000 each. This is why we have to import capital.

Then the argument is made that this two billion dollars that is brought into the country results in purchases. Although a lot of this money does result in purchases in Canada, a lot of it is used to purchase foreign machinery. Much of it is used to make payments to foreign countries. With a rate of return on capital of only 10 per cent, we are talking about a figure of $200 million that has to be paid out to foreigners on an investment of $2 billion. This is a permanent drain on our resources resulting from capital that we should not have imported in the first place.

The difficulty is that the bill before the House is going to encourage this kind of development, a development that should have been discouraged a long time ago. The chief benefit being offered in this bill is an increase in capital investment. The mining industry is investing twice as much in capital development as the manufacturing industry. If we continue to pour money at this rate into industries which export raw materials from this country, then not only are we exporting jobs but we are exporting our future wealth.

Some economists might argue that the people who work for the Iron Ore Company of Canada earn higher wages than, let us say, people who work in the manufacturing industry in the city of Toronto. I understand the average wage with the Iron Ore Company is $9,000. What these economists do not say, of course, is that it costs a great deal more to live in that kind of environment and to provide the social services required in order to maintain production of raw materials.

If you listen to the economics purists, their conclusion is that Canada would be better off if we did not have to provide jobs for these 200,000 people coming into the labour force every year. In fact, 200,000 is a low estimate because in some cases I have heard estimates of as much as 300,000 jobs a year being required. So, these people will leave the country and emigrate to somewhere else. In fact, we have seen that happen. These economists argue: What is wrong if Canada loses one-third or even one-half of its population? What is wrong if we do not have any manufacturing industry? What is wrong if we just do the thing we do best, which is to pull our wealth out of the ground and send away our lumber, iron ore, asbestos and nickel? This would leave us with a population of 8 million or 9 million living on a somewhat higher standard of living with higher wages. In my view that would be a bad choice. A country which would try to build on those policies could not survive. Iron and asbestos are not renewable resources. If we do not develop capabilities and skills by generating the infrastructure which is necessary in this technological age we cannot survive as a country. This country is very much of a hinterland now, but under those conditions would become even more so. It is very much an adjunct of that mighty power south of the border. That is a forecast of our future.

The kind of tax policies being pursued by this government through the measure we are being asked to vote on today reinforce and sustain that kind of economy. There are areas where there should be accelerated capital cost allowances. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) spoke to me about specific problems affecting the logging industry of British Columbia. He pointed out that if this industry is going to modernize and compete with the logging industry in Oregon and other areas, we require rapid write-offs for that industry. I must say that he made a very compelling argument. There should be increased capital allowance in that particular industry. I am inclined to agree with him.

What I am saying is that if that particular industry needs help then we should give that help, but why should we make this a blanket proposition? We should not, in helping one industry, give help to a lot of others that do not need it but rather need to be restrained. This is something this government refuses to recognize. This government has a bias and a blind spot. It refuses to look at the economy with the idea of managing the affairs of this nation. I suggest this government was elected to govern this nation and to make management decisions. It was not elected to pass blanket bills in the hope that things would work out all right. The party that forms the government loves to think of itself in terms of managerial talent. The members of this government like to brag about the managerial capabilities of its members. They feel they have a divine right to govern because of the amount of talent sitting on government benches. The one thing this Liberal party refuses to do is manage, govern and make decisions.

This government brings in catch-all bills. They advocate depreciation right across the board and hope that in some strange way this will work out. The only thing that really saves the government is the fact that we have a strong economy which even the Liberal government cannot kill. Members of the government party cannot push our economy down even with their best efforts, because we have a growing and developing economy. Members of the government party have been looking at the wrong end of the horse and are confused.

I do not wish to conclude my remarks without saying what we in the NDP feel should be done. It is not enough to criticize, although I must say there are a great many things done by hon. members on the other side which deserve criticism. We should be making suggestions. We think there should be a tax cut, particularly at lower income levels. There should be a massive tax cut in order to stimulate the purchasing power of the majority of people in this country. This should be done not only as a matter of justice for those at the lower end of the scale, but in order to provide an economic stimulus.

The time has come for the government to fix the prices of basic commodities in our society. I have in mind those things required in production including power, copper, nickel and iron. The time has come for the government to use this method as a signal to other people in our society that this government intends to look at price increases. Instead of creating unemployment in a vain attempt to control inflation, the government should bring in positive measures to control price increases. There should be an immediate reduction in interest rates in order to rid ourselves of the embarrassing surplus in our foreign exchange reserves. This would avoid interest rates moving even higher than they are now. We can and should lower interest rates, and we should give some thought to fixing them at certain levels. If this is not possible, then the profits should be taxed. If we intend to have full employment and reasonable control over inflationary factors, to the extent that this is possible for Canada in the context of today's world, there must be an economic policy.

When we in this party refer to an economic policy, we are not talking about wage and price controls alone. There is no way the working man will accept wage controls without some form of price control. The Canadian Labour Congress has indicated its willingness to consider a wage and incomes policy, but has insisted that such a policy must also relate to all forms of income. We must recognize the need for mobility in our society. We should support efforts toward mobility. We should also support measures to obtain security for those people who have to be mobile. This is something we are not doing at the moment. When we move people from one part of the country to another or from rural areas into cities, we tend to forget about them. Very often there is no housing for them and no appropriate retraining. That kind of mobility is disastrous. We must have mobility, but let us have it with some kind of civilized outlook.

We must also recognize that if we are going to restrict the development of certain raw materials this will have a bearing on the development of certain provinces. It is all right for someone who comes from the province of Ontario, where most of the manufacturing in Canada is concentrated, to talk about deterring resource development. Some hon. members might say it is easy for me to talk in this way because I come from Ontario where manufacturing is increasing. What about the people in the provinces of Alberta, British Columbia and Saskatchewan? The problems in those provinces are different. In many cases we have not been able to share the wealth generated in Ontario with other provinces, and this has created some resentment. If these provinces are to develop they must promote the exploitation of natural resources. There are a number of ways to change the situation. By using the Canada Development Corporation, we can increase industrial development through Crown corporations and partnerships in all parts of Canada.

We must support industry throughout Canada wherever it is possible to develop viable entities. The industrial revenues secured by Ontario should be distributed throughout the entire country in order that production is shared equally. We believe there should be an equitable distribution of the riches generated. The advantages of one province should be shared by other provinces. As long as the fruits of an industry are shared equally across the country, resentment will disappear.

My remarks have been sketchy and our time is limited during this debate. I have appreciated the opportunity to participate. Despite the calmness of our tone and the quietness of this Chamber, there is anger here and discontent. I think this Parliament should recognize that fact. It is still not too late for the government to withdraw this bill and substitute something more suitable to meet the crisis of this time.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to say a few words on Bill C-225. This afternoon I listened with interest to the speeches made both by the members of the Ralliement Créditiste and by the last speaker for the New Democratic Party. At the outset, I should say I am not really surprised at some of the statements made by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman). His party, consistently and persistently, has screamed at big, bad business. Obviously, some of the members of that party have not read Robert Tyres book which I believe is called "Douglas in Saskatchewan". This book would seem to indicate that there are none so righteous as reformed sinners.

I believe the bill before us should be referred to the committee as quickly as possible. If it can be referred to the committee this afternoon, there are a number of reasons why I believe that is exactly what should be done. I find little argument with the proposal of the minister and his parliamentary secretary that capital cost allowances should be extended into 1972. I intend to be one of those who welcomes such a proposal, particularly if it benefits business in any way.

I should like to see the bill go to committee because I believe business in this country should have an opportunity to appear before the committee to express either its objections or alternative proposals in respect of a capital cost allowance.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is to go to the committee of the whole.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): He does not know that.

Mr. Skoreyko: In extending the 115 per cent capital cost allowance into 1972, I think the government is being a little meagre. Normal industrial expansion or development takes place on a yearly basis, not merely because a particular corporation may want to take advantage of the 115 per cent capital cost allowance, so naturally this will more than offset any cost to the treasury as a result of this kind of concession. If the government really wants to assist business generally, and more particularly the construction business, it should immediately withdraw the tax on building materials. There is a chain reaction in respect of assistance to any business.

Some reference was made to the definition of businesses that will qualify under this program. Yesterday, as recorded at page 3924 of Hansard, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) said:

> I might mention that the definition of a manufacturing or processing business and the description of assets qualifying for the supplementary allowance will be contained in regulations to be adopted soon after approval of the legislation.

Over the years, Mr. Speaker, you and I have watched situations in which days and indeed weeks have been spent on debating the merits and demerits of a given piece of legislation only to find in the end that the regulations which were drafted to put the bill into effect were so far removed from what Parliament intended initially that many Members of Parliament were left in complete bewilderment.

I say again that when this bill comes before the committee, I hope the minister will give committee members an opportunity to peruse the regulations. Then, not only the merits and demerits of the bill will be analyzed by the committee but also the regulations. As I said earlier, I agree wholeheartedly with the principle of assistance to business, but it appears to me the government seems to be giving a little with one hand and, in respect of future proposals, taking something away with the other. This kind of thing hurts. I would hope that some of the extreme proposals in the white paper, in so far as they affect the business community of Canada, would be withdrawn or given very serious consideration before being put into the form of legislation. I see no justification for the removal of protective tariffs on the importation of chemicals in the Kennedy Round negotiations of two years ago. I see no justification for compounding the problems of the chemical industry by pegging the Canadian dollar.

Perhaps at this point I might say something about the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin). To use a western term, the Minister "shafted" the wheat industry real well when he had the responsibility for that department. He has done an equally good job on the petro-chemical industry in Canada through what I think might be fairly called most inept negotiations in GATT. I think the net result of those negotiations was a loss for the Government of Canada and, indeed, for some of the industries in Canada. I wonder whether businessmen in this Chamber realize, notwithstanding what may be said by our friends to the left, the penalties which have been imposed on business. In the years I have been in this Chamber, I have seen the implementation of Medicare and I have seen the implementation of the Canada Pension Plan. Unemployment insurance has been with us. The Workmen's Compensation Board is another penalty, as are unrealistic corporation taxes, local business taxes and real estate taxes on corporate property. Yet our friends to the left say the government is giving too much.

I say that I welcome the opportunity to invite the parliamentary secretary to bring this measure before a committee as quickly as possible to give the business community the opportunity to comment on the adequacy of the measure and to determine whether the business community feels this is the kind of legislation that will assist them in their growth and in the provision of jobs for which every member in this chamber is clamouring daily. No one denies that there is a serious unemployment problem, and I think all but a few of us in this chamber recognize that jobs can only be provided by the industrial community of this nation. I think this is the area on which the government must lean a little more heavily, so when the minister proposes his next budget we can see what we can do to provide a little incentive for business to grow. I suggest we give business a decent break and a chance to survive under our system, then perhaps some of those jobs that we are awaiting so anxiously from day to day will be forthcoming.

I say again that if a system provides an incentive for business to grow, business will not in any way restrict the number of people whom it will employ for the sake of greed or money. Expansion is in the mind of every manager in the country, and if the proper kind of tax incentives are given, the answer for which the minister is looking will be forthcoming. I think that one need only look at newspaper articles in the city of Edmonton to find that Chemcell has laid off 325 members of its staff this year as a result of action taken by this government no less than two years ago. I am not saying that the Kennedy round negotiations are directly responsible for cut backs in operations here or in Hardieville, Alberta, or indeed in Montreal or Brockville. There will be many more lay-offs in the petro-chemical industry in Canada unless some of the conditions negotiated some years ago are renegotiated to favour the Canadian industries, and some favourable concessions are made in the budget to come to allow these businesses to exist in Canada.

I think it is all well and good to talk about economic nationalism. May I remind members of this House that Canada would not be nearly the nation it is today if it were not for foreign investment which came into this country at the turn of the century. I can see nothing wrong with a Canadian tax structure to encourage investment from abroad. At the same time, I think that that kind of a tax structure should give Canadians an incentive to invest in Canadian natural resource development or industry along with foreign capital, provided that we as a government can allow these people to operate under acceptable controls. A former Liberal member of this House of Commons, once a finance minister and now out of politics, the Hon. Walter Gordon, made some suggestions a few years ago with reference to a withdrawal tax. I was one of those who sat on the opposite side of the House but who rather favoured that kind of an arrangement. The hon. member for Waterloo said that foreign investment should be discouraged. If that is the case, he did not tell this chamber who in Canada would make the investments. Certainly, I would remind him again that he is not asking the government to make the investments in industry because he knows full well that a government once tried that and it failed miserably.

I want to comment only briefly on the surtax. I think that my attitude toward this part of the bill will be somewhat different. I think that extending this particular aspect of the bill is a retrograde step. The parliamentary secretary was not in the chamber on one famous night in February of 1968 when the government of that day proposed such a measure and was defeated by a vote of 84 to 82. I know that he was generous when he said, as recorded in Hansard of yesterday, that no surtax is paid by a single person whose income is below $2,743. I bet that there are not very many single people within the parliamentary secretary's social circle who earn under $2,743. He went on to say that neither is the surtax paid by a married man with two children whose income is below $4,343. That is pretty generous. What the parliamentary secretary is really saying is that we are not hurting very many people in this country, only about 98 per cent of those people who pay taxes. That is not very many. On the one hand, we are trying to encourage our people to buy Canada back and to invest in Canadian shares, stocks and bonds, and at the same time impose punitive tax, initially for one year. This tax was extended for another year, and now we are extending it for a third year. We say it is difficult to impose a tax, but it is much more difficult to remove it. This still applies.

I say that this bill should indeed go to committee, not because I think there will be many questions on the first part of the measure having to do with capital cost allowance. I think that will be generally and favourably accepted. But I think it should go to committee to get an expression of feeling for or against this measure, much like the treatment accorded the white paper proposals of last spring. Those people who are penalized, and will be penalized in the future should be given the opportunity to approve or object to this measure. At a time of high unemployment, the government should be looking at increasing personal exemptions rather than extending a punitive tax for which I think there is no reasonable justification.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Veterans Affairs—Requirement that war veterans allowance recipients apply for guaranteed income supplement; the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin)—Income Tax—New assessments for 1968 and 1969; the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Kaplan)—Finance—Use by provinces of capital works loan fund to combat unemployment.

• (5:00 p.m.)

[Translation]

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, public bills, private bills and notices of motions for papers.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BILLS

LA SOCIÉTÉ DES ARTISANS

Mr. Rosaire Gendron (Témiscouata) moved that Bill S-10, An Act respecting La Société des Artisans be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the main object of this bill, as set forth in the explanatory notes of Bill S-10, is, and I quote:

—to withdraw from this Society the attributes of a fraternal benefit society and to vest it with the rights and powers of a mutual life insurance company, while maintaining its representative form of government and allowing it to retain its power to promote social and educational activities.

The present bill would change the name of La Société des Artisans. The proposed name will reflect the cooperative features of this institution.

I will recall a bit of history to help understand this bill. The Société des Artisans, as I have just said, is a fraternal society for mutual support which started operations in 1876 under a provincial charter and has operated since 1917 under a federal charter. It is nearly 100 years old, and at first it wanted to pursue fraternal activities of social assistance and welfare for its members, with insurance as an accessory.

But as the Société des Artisans now has more than 350,000 members and as its equity is in excess of $24 million, it seeks approval for this legislation now before us in order to deal effectively with the major and main activities of this corporation.

Under the terms of this request, it asks to be transformed into a mutual life insurance company while keeping its representative form of government.

This bill would also change its name. By becoming a mutual life insurance company, the Société des Artisans, while remaining the property of its members, namely, the people insured and the contractants, will be empowered however to extend its activities to the whole field of life insurance. Thus it will be possible for it to issue insurance policies on the lives of persons who are not within the family circles of its members, or still to generally re-insure life insurance contracts issued by other insurance institutions.

Furthermore, in becoming a mutual life insurance company, the Society will be subjected to the same controls as any other insurance undertaking (mutual or with capital outlay) under the authority of the Department of Insurance, and will reach the level of prestige that is common to institutions subjected to this kind of control.

On the other hand, the Society wishes to preserve the main objectives of its activities, namely mutual benefit, a co-operative nature, a specially elective formula, while modernizing its framework in line with the very great importance that the various forms of insurance have achieved within this Society.

The representative form of governing body which the Société des Artisans now has, and wants to preserve, while changing into a mutual insurance company is defined in clauses 7 to 13 of the bill before us.

Within this administrative set-up, the areas where the Society is doing business are divided into local jurisdictions which in turn are brought together into regional jurisdictions.

Each member of the Society belongs to a local jurisdiction (generally that of his residence). The member may attend the meetings of that jurisdiction, may vote, be elected officer and delegate to the regional jurisdiction to which his local jurisdiction belongs.

Each regional jurisdiction is therefore composed of delegates from its local jurisdictions, and elects its own officers and delegates at the General Meeting.

The General Meeting, composed of delegates and of each regional jurisdiction (or their alternates) as well as existing directors and former presidents of the Society, is the highest legislative authority thereof.

The General Meeting is held at least once a year.

In addition to its legislative powers, it elects, every four years, the board of directors of the Society, as well as its president and vice-presidents.

According to the by-laws of the Society, each of its directors is elected to represent a regional jurisdiction on the Board of Directors.

The Society also wishes to change its name. The Society has for a very long time been very active in the co-operative movement.

By becoming a mutual life insurance company, while keeping at the same time its representative form of administration as previously described and the right to promote social and educational activities, the Society will keep all the characteristics of a co-operative.

It is this co-operative aspect that it wishes to underline in the new name: "The Artisans, Life Insurance Co-operative Society".

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the House will see fit to adopt this bill on second reading and that it will then be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, which will be able to hear the officers of the Society as well as the Superintendant of Insurance who, by the way, has been heard by the Senate Committee and has said that he is in favour of this amendment to the Society and to the Act.

I thank the hon. members in advance for their co-operation.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I read the bill a few minutes before entering the House, before five o'clock. In any case, I should like to put a few questions to the hon. member sponsoring the bill, asking him for clarification in the general interest.

First of all, I must say, and proudly, that I am a member of the Société des Artisans and that the proposed change of name seems quite acceptable to me.

Investments are substantial enough in the Société des Artisans to warrant the House giving the amendments put forward special consideration.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Now, will changing the name of the Society as well as some clauses authorizing it to enter into contracts with its members alter the character of existing contracts? Some contracts, for instance, are on the life of its members, while others do guarantee annuities to others.

This is what I want to know: Is the project now under study likely to alter in one way or other the contracts now in force?

Mr. Speaker, I believe that my question is in order because, normally we should get explanations enabling us to know whether this bill should be referred to the committee. We must know exactly the character of the proposed changes and the sponsor of the bill should be in a position to explain.

Mr. Gendron: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member speaks now, he will close the debate. I recognize the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe.

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to delay the referring of this measure to the committee, and the hon. member who has just asked a question will have to wait until this bill is considered in committee.

I would like to take this opportunity to commend my hon. friend from Rivière-du-Loup (Mr. Gendron) for piloting this bill. This mutual insurance corporation is a clear example of the results achieved by the abnegation and co-operation of people in our province. I am glad to see that today La Société des artisans has 350,000 members and that its assets total about $80 million.

The current company's requirements are such that to expand operations improvements and changes are required. I think we should all co-operate and see to it that the officials of this insurance company are given the help they need to be able to improve their company's activities to meet the requirements of 1971.

I am heartily in favour of the views of the member from Rivière-du-Loup and I wish him the best of luck in his future negotiations.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Gendron). If the hon. member takes the floor at this time, he will close the debate.

Mr. Gendron: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) asked the following question: What are the changes this new legislation will lead to in effective contracts in the insurance company? We must not forget that whenever a company operates on a fraternal society basis, since the main objective is not to sell insurance, insurance policies, the control, on the one hand, and the requirements on the part of the Superintendent of Insurance on the other hand, are greater, but this is due to the flexibility of operations in the fraternal society and to the risks that may to a certain extent be involved.

This means that a fraternal society may in the course of its operations, although it has never been done, change the contract and ask, for instance, that an additional sum be paid because the operating costs seem greater or the death rate exceeds the estimates, etc.

Therefore, whenever the society operates as a mutual company, it is impossible then to change the contracts and to call for new payments on premiums. And this becomes firm in that way.

I think those references do not minimize the present operations of La Société des Artisans, because they have never changed the premiums during the run of a contract. But it was possible under the statute of a fraternal society while now, and because the society wants it, it is operating more on the basis of an insurance corporation and thus cannot change in any way the premium and the contracts.

It is obvious that all the policies being sold at the present time are not changed in any way and security is thus increased.

I should like to avail myself of this opportunity also to thank the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard) for his kind words and of his reference to the success of one of our companies, of which we are rightly proud.

May I be allowed, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate you on your recovery. We are happy to see you in the Chair again and we wish you a long stay among us.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Winch): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR COPIES OF CORRESPONDENCE RELATING TO OWNERSHIP OF URANIUM INDUSTRY

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo) moved:

That an order of the House do issue for a copy of all correspondence, memoranda, etc., between the government of Canada and industry in Canada since January 1, 1970, regarding regulations on the ownership and control of the uranium industry in Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, old buddy, my motion requests:

That an order of the House do issue for a copy of all correspondence, memoranda, etc., between the government of Canada and industry in Canada since January 1, 1970, regarding regulations on the ownership and control of the uranium industry in Canada.

On November 4, 1970, as recorded at page 867 of Hansard, the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council replied:

I am informed by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources that correspondence received from uranium-producing and exploration companies contains information specifically requested by the government and given with the assurance that it would be treated as confidential. In view of this, I trust the hon. member will agree to withdraw his motion.

As recorded at page 868 of Hansard, I said that was not acceptable and the motion was transferred for debate. I did not ask for this information merely because I wanted the government to reveal information which is confidential. I think all hon. members of the House recognize that some correspondence between the government and other parties must be confidential. Actually, I wanted an explanation from the government of its actions with regard to the uranium industry. The negotiations that have gone on within the industry and the decisions taken by the government still remain a deep, dark mystery. We want to know why the government thought it necessary to issue these directives regarding the uranium industry and to assume this kind of control. We must remember that this was a most unusual action. We agree with that action, and I think the country generally supported it. Since this decision is significant in the area of foreign ownership affecting other industries, I think it is vitally important for us to know the reasoning behind the government's decision. What kind of information influenced it in that decision? We have been promised on various occasions that that information would be forthcoming. It has not yet been given to us, and the mystery remains.

• (5:20 p.m.)

One might think that the uranium industry, of all Canadian industries, would be least likely to be subject to regulations concerning foreign ownership. The industry is already heavily regulated. Little takes place in the industry that does not come under government security. Its exports are regulated. The use to which those exports are to be put is looked at. For instance, in the past the government has refused the industry permission to sell uranium because there was no assurance that that uranium would be used for peaceful purposes. Since the regulations governing the industry are pretty extensive, why did the government feel it necessary, as well, to restrict the amount of foreign ownership in this industry. Perhaps the information in the government's possession should be made available to the public, so that the public could examine it. Perhaps, if we scrutinized the goverment's decision and the reasoning leading up to that decision, we could also deal with the question of foreign ownership in other areas and determine the direction that we should take regarding the question of foreign ownership in other areas.

At present the government's representatives say to us, "Trust us." I am not reluctant to trust them to a certain point. We have trusted them for a considerable time and have waited for them to give us a definitive statement which would spell out the regulations in more specific terms. We want to know what the government intends to do and how these regulations might apply to other industries. We brought this motion forward in an attempt to obtain this information. We should like to examine the kind of correspondence that has gone back and forth between the government and the industry. If the government feels that it cannot do this, the very least it owes the House is a complete explanation, as opposed to the usual, bland language the government members use when they tell us that these matters are confidential, that they cannot be revealed and that if they were revealed the government would break a trust. I feel it is most important for the government to explain its position in greater detail than it has so far. I think it owes that much to the House, and I hope that it is prepared to do so this afternoon. If the government cannot produce the papers for us and if it feels that they are too confidential, the very least it can do is explain to us the reasoning that led to the conclusion that the uranium industry of Canada ought to be limited in terms of its foreign ownership.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member who proposed this notice of motion. It is quite clear that, in terms of the wording of the motion before us, he has cast a broad net. He asks for a copy of all correspondence, memoranda, etc., between the government of Canada and industry in Canada since January 1, 1970, regarding regulations on the ownership and control of the uranium industry in Canada. The hon. member said that he and the members of the group to which he belongs approved the actions of the government in this regard. Then, in the next breath, he said he thought that it was an error that the government had started with these industries and these regulations concerning foreign ownership, because these industries were already so heavily regulated. Now, he asks in the broadest sense for all the documentation regarding this matter to be made public.

I have had certain difficulty in following the policies of the party to which the hon. member belongs, and never did I experience greater difficulty than this afternoon in trying to add up the position of that party. If the hon. member's group approves the government's policy, then they must respect the government when it says that certain information was gathered in confidence and must be treated in confidence, because otherwise there cannot be any trust between industry and government. If, on the other hand, they do not approve of that policy, then the purpose of this motion is that the government shall lay out this information so that the hon. member's group can criticize it, challenge it, oppose it, and make suggestions about it. If that is so, that information this afternoon would have been welcome.

We have raised some pretty fundamental questions, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. member has used this motion as a vehicle for raising them today. He said that what he really wants to know is, what is the government's foreign ownership policy, what are the principles underlying it and how will they apply to other industries. With the greatest respect and with no little humility, we say that it is not easy to answer these things, because the policy is evolving. The government is studying it. The government has not taken a hard and fast position. The task force is in the course of preparing the report on the principles which will guide the policies of the government with regard to foreign ownership. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) is the member of the cabinet entrusted with this responsibility.

In acting as it did, the government was fully aware that its actions to a certain extent were pragmatic. The government acted, as the hon. member conceded, in a responsible way and in response to widespread public opinion. Opinion within the hon. member's party is spread more widely than in other parties. The members of the waffle group want to go all the way in one direction, but the other members of the party are prepared to take a much broader line.

An hon. Member: Why not read the newspapers?

Mr. Francis: Actually, in taking measures to ensure Canadian ownership of industries, the government is trying hard to do what the public of Canada feels is right. At the same time the government is acutely aware that the rights of individuals are involved. The rights of industry are involved, as are the rights of individual Canadians. They have the right to deal with their own affairs logically and to look after their own interests. We assume, in our free enterprise society, that it is only fair that the parties involved in matters of this kind should have these rights.

What the government is saying today to this House very simply is this: the rules are being evolved. A full public document will be produced, and there will be a statement on policy. But, at this stage, it is premature to bring in this kind of notice of motion as a means of forcing a fuller and broader statement of policy by the government. This will take place; there is no question about it.

• (5:30 p.m.)

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, it is difficult to reconcile the series of statements that the hon. member made. The hon. member agrees with what the government is doing: in general, he thinks it is right. But he wants the government to publish confidential documents, and to this end he has put down a broad, sweeping resolution that all correspondence since January 1, 1970, between the government and the industry in Canada concerning the whole question of the ownership and regulation of the industry be tabled. There is no way in which the government can accept such a motion, and I for one believe it would be a serious mistake to do so. I hope the government will not be placed in the position of betraying confidences explicitly given, and I trust the House will reject the motion which the hon. member has placed before us.

Mr. Saltsman: Would the hon. member be prepared to answer a question?

Mr. Francis: I would be delighted to do my best.

Mr. Saltsman: The hon. member expressed some concern over the rules of the game. In this instance the rules of the game were obviously changed in midstream. When Mr. Roman became involved in the uranium industry there was no indication that the government's intention would be to prevent foreign ownership of that business. This is one of the complaints he is making. It is impossible for the public to know to what extent Mr. Roman's position is justifiable in the absence of the documents which are being sought. When the hon. member talks about changing the rules of the game with reference to the disclosure of confidential information, I say that in this instance the rules of the game have already been changed. Does he not agree that this is what has taken place? I should like to hear his opinion on this aspect of the matter.

Mr. Francis: The hon. member is perfectly right. The rules of the game were changed. We are not trying to say they were not changed. We are saying that the motion before us is not one which would achieve the purpose which the hon. member is implying it would achieve. He is asking for the disclosure of a broad range of confidential documents. The issue of whether or not individual rights are adversely affected will have to be resolved in the proper way, that is, by discussions and attempts to reach an understanding.

Discussions have taken place and will continue to take place between the department and the individual concerned. The government has to balance the public interest and the private interest. It is a very delicate matter, and large sums of money are involved. The hon. member himself knows that this is not the kind of thing which premature publicity can resolve; it has to be resolved by discussion between the parties concerned and in light of the evolution of a national policy which the government is actively engaged in developing at this point.

Mr. R. J. Orange (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, like my hon. friend from Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), I cannot help expressing some doubt as to the principle implied in the motion before us. As my hon. friend pointed out, we are asked to approve the production of private papers reflecting correspondence between the government and the uranium industry. In this case, the documents refer particularly to the position of Denison Mines and the government of Canada in light of Mr. Roman's announcement that he intended to sell his company to interests outside Canada.

The confidential nature of such documents is something which has to be established over a period of years. We cannot let it be destroyed unilaterally by one of the parties concerned simply because a motion has been put down requesting us to make those documents available. I am sure there is information contained in these documents which would benefit neither the government nor the individuals concerned. I need hardly point out that the interests of the shareholders of the company could be affected by such a disclosure.

We all remember the great excitement in the fifties when prospectors and others moved across the length and breadth of Canada searching for uranium deposits. We recall the establishment of such communities as Elliot Lake and Uranium City. Elliot Lake grew from being a spot in the bush to a modern, well equipped town. Then, as a result of a decision in the United States, the industry entered a period of decline. Mines were closed down and towns like Uranium City were seriously affected. We were unable to sell our product—though not the ore itself—in the markets of the world.

Sales by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited have been disappointing, to say the least. I remind hon. members that many years ago Canada decided that its approach to the use of atomic power was through heavy water process. Other countries took a different approach. Almost alone in the world, Canada depended on heavy water. Consequently, we found we were unable to convince other nations that this was the best way of developing nuclear energy.

Having gone through these ups and downs, the industry nevertheless looks forward to a bright future. This is what has been said for some time. Most of us wonder if that day will ever come. Nevertheless, we have kept a uranium industry in Canada by means of a combination of stockpiling on the part of the government and occasional sales of uranium ores to other countries, under certain restrictions. We have insisted on certain safeguards, specifying that whatever uranium we sold should not be used for military purposes. Canada has been a leader in the sale of uranium for peaceful purposes. On at least one occasion a major sale was not consummated simply because the other country concerned was unable or unwilling to guarantee that the product would be used for peaceful purposes and not for the manufacture of nuclear weapons.

As I say, we have retained the basis of an industry which will mean much to us in the future. There are still large deposits of uranium ore under the ground and many mining companies are anxious to get on with the work of developing their ore bodies whenever the market permits. In the meantime, the government determined that it was not in the national interest to permit the sale of a major company in this country to a foreign concern. Having taken that approach, since that time there has been a period of negotiation and discussion between the government and the company concerned, much of which has been on a confidential basis and has been, I assume, an expression of ideas and opinions on the part of both. To make this kind of information available to the public through this House would not, I think, be in the best interests of the company or of the people of Canada.

To return to my original point, which was that confidence must be established, be it in the uranium industry or in any other industry, between government and the private sector, the principle involved is similar to the case where a man files an income tax return knowing that the return will not be distributed to other government agencies but will be kept within the revenue department. Similarly, a man who fills out a census form for the decennial census knows that the information he gives will be for the use of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, and under penalty of fine or imprisonment the employees of DBS are required to ensure confidentiality of the information. The same principle applies in these particular cases as to all other cases involving such negotiations between government and the private sector.

Mr. Paproski: Tell us a little bit about your area.

Mr. Orange: The hon. member has a chance to speak if he wants, though he never says very much. Since it is obvious that the members on the other side of the House are perched, ready to launch into the parry and thrust of this exciting debate, with those few remarks and having enunciated my own personal view of the relationship that must be developed and retained between government and the private sector, I shall pass the debate on to my hon. friend on the other side.

Mr. Saltsman: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Orange: I would be delighted.

Mr. Saltsman: During the course of his remarks the hon. member made the point that he was concerned with getting the consent of all parties. I appreciate the point; it is important that we have consent. My question is: Has the government asked Mr. Roman for his consent to releasing the document or the information contained in the document?

Mr. Orange: Obviously, Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer that question. I do not know whether the government has made that approach; but it does occur to me that there are other vehicles for raising this question. I think our committee system, which has been so successful in the past, is one. Perhaps the committee on natural resources could involve itself in a study of this kind.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I will take that suggestion under advisement. But could the hon. member tell me whether someone on his side of the House can speak for the government and answer that question, which I think is of particular importance? I am quite willing to agree that consent is necessary, but I want to know whether that consent has been asked for and whether it has been refused.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments in this debate. It seems to me that with the ever-increasing involvement of government in business affairs, the public should have some right to be made aware of some of the things that are going on. The hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange) referred to the uranium policy of Canada and to dealings in uranium. While I can sympathize with the government's problem in dealing with private industry in this field, in view of the fact that Canada is in trouble in this area it seems to me some public dialogue should have been promoted sooner than it was. If we had had some advice or other people's opinions and taken the Canadian people more into our confidence, we might have found some solutions to the problem, or at least have had different reactions, than we have had up to the present time.

I think our uranium industry is locked in at the present time. As a Canadian I am hoping we will have the economic means to produce atomic energy, not only for ourselves but for sale to other countries. I cannot help but feel that any time we spend a large amount of money from the public treasury on helping the uranium industry, the grain farmers of Saskatchewan or other groups of that sort, the public who after all are paying the shot, have the right to have certain questions answered. Certainly, if I am to pay I want to know what I am to pay for and why I should pay.

There may be some instances, such as the preservation of a Canadian-owned uranium industry or the preservation of a Canadian-owned publishing company, where there is a sort of contract between the company concerned and civil service employees who are negotiating with the company. But if the Canadian people are putting up the money to preserve such undertakings, I feel they should have the right to know what is being done with their money, how much is involved and what promises have been made. It is for this reason that as a representative of the taxpayers of this country, I feel we should be entitled to this information.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) raises an important and continuing problem in this House, namely, the need for us all to get maximum information regarding government policies and intentions. To this proposition I fully subscribe. As we alter our rules of the House and build in research staffs for the various political parties in this chamber, we will have an increasing need for information. To that basic proposition I think most of us on this side of the House will agree with hon. members opposite. In this respect perhaps their need is even greater than ours; but I think we all recognize that there is a general need in this House for information.

In addition to that, the hon. member raises the point about essential information in a context now interesting all Canadians to an increasing extent, namely, the degree of foreign ownership and control of Canadian resource industries. Those of us concerned with that matter doubly need information since this matter is currently being developed within the framework of new government policies. In this sense I am sympathetic to the request that is now before the House. However, I am prepared to say to the hon. member that even if that information were available I do not think this would be the right time to bring it forward. I think he himself was coming to this view, although he skirted away from it as he approached it. He recognized there is a need to trust the government when it says the information it has at a given time has been obtained on a confidential basis. He recognized the need to protect confidentiality. He went a little further and said there are times when information can and cannot be given. That is another matter which does not necessarily involve confidentiality.

Thus, there is a question of timing, and I raise this issue with the hon. member in attempting to respond to his motion. In the case of the uranium industry there is the matter of confidentiality added to the question of new foreign investment policy in its formative stages. Most of us will agree that the uranium industry is a special case. The hon. member for Waterloo drew our attention to the fact that this is a highly regulated industry in the resource field. It is probably the most highly sensitive and regulated resource industry in our country. We are entitled to a maximum amount of information, if for no other reason than the fact that this industry is of special concern to Canada and has special sensitivity.

The hon. member also asked if information could not be given now, then what sort of reasoning could be suggested to support regulation in respect of foreign ownership in this particular sector. We all recognize that this is the only sector of the resource industry, so far as I understand, which has regulations in respect of the degree of foreign ownership. One might say that the oil industry has ownership requirements, but this requirement in uranium is an innovation of some importance. No doubt the innovating regulations are there to control foreign ownership because of the special character of the uranium industry.

The hon. member also asked whether the president, or the owner of this firm, Denison Mines—this is why the whole question arose—had been asked his views as to whether correspondence ought to be published. Where as I cannot answer that question and would not pretend to speak with any authority on it, I would none the less be prepared to say that even if he agreed, this is not the time to bring forward the information. I still want to have this information, but I think now is not the time to make it public. Why am I prepared to say that this is not the time, and why would I ask the hon. member to agree that timing is of the essence in this particular case? I think it is not the time because we are in the middle, I hope, further than the middle—let us say we are coming to the conclusion—of a study by one of the minister's of new governmental policies in respect of foreign ownership.

I for one do not think that the new policy, which has to be general, should be promoted or distorted or that influence or bias should be given to it by ad hoc regulations. Essentially, at the present time the uranium regulations are a holding operation. I do not think we should be making important general policy through ad hoc situations. I would go further and say I would be the first to recognize—and with this the hon. member will undoubtedly agree—that it is too bad the general policy is not yet in existence. The fact is that it is not yet ready. And so, on a practical basis, what is one to do when faced with this foreign ownership question of a dominant firm in a sensitive resource industry?

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. O'Connell: I will continue for just a moment. I will be glad to answer the hon. member's question in a minute or two. I should like to finish my thought, if the hon. member will indulge me in this way.

What we have here in respect of Denison is a dominant firm in an extremely sensitive industry. We also have the question of the whole strategy of Canadian participation in the science and technology of a nuclear age. This is a technology that we have not yet fully worked out. It is a technology in which Canadian policy is designed at present to move in one direction. In time we should reach the point where we have a broader policy in respect of Canadian technology taking us into the enriched uranium field for power production rather than concentrating solely on a heavy water system. If that proves to be the case, and even if it does not, we must have an assured supply of uranium, a commodity in a very sensitive area, to back up Canadian domestic and international policies. We must have an assured source of uranium supply. This supply must be located in Canada, under Canadian control and ownership.

It would be sheer folly, when faced with the prospect of going into the nuclear age, to not have control and ownership of the dominant firm in this country, particularly when other countries regulate and control the uranium industry so closely followed. There is world wide acceptance of governmental regulation. Technologies compete within this unusually comprehensive system of government influence. At this particular time we cannot permit these facts of competing technologies and government interest to escape us, particularly when we are faced with the question of foreign control of the major source of supply in Canada.

I do not think this is the time to disclose these regulations. They are therefore a holding operation, as I see it, and I repeat that I have no particular governmental knowledge. We should be prepared to alter the regulations if necessary to bring them into line with general policy when it emerges and therefore the confidentiality of the ad hoc regulations should be maintained.

I would be glad to accept the hon. member's question at this point.

Mr. Saltsman: The parliamentary secretary has today given us more information about the reason for keeping the uranium industry in Canadian hands than we have received so far. In view of what the hon. member has said, I ask whether he is stating government policy, or is he speculating like the rest of us?

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to answer that question. I am glad the hon. member raised it because I wish to make it absolutely clear that I am not stating government policy. I am not privy to the regulations, and I am only speaking as a member of this House. I thank the hon. member for raising the question and helping me to clarify the position. I do not think one should call my reasoning speculation: surely my comments are a rational deduction in view of the situation. Again I go back to the hon. member's own point, that there are times when we have to respect the confidentiality of some information. There are other times when information should be disclosed. I think it should be disclosed when the general policy is available to all of us. At that time, any ad hoc policy ought to be brought into conformity with the general nature of things.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): The hour appointed for private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair. Last Monday, if hon. members will recall, signs of spring in the form of yellow daffodils were apparent. Today the white king of winter still reigns over us.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

[Translation]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Benson that Bill C-225, to amend the Income Tax Act and to amend an act to amend that act, be read the second time and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, with the introduction of Bill C-225, I realize that in this government, it is becoming increasingly harder to find persons who can be categorical.

As a matter of fact, in introducing this bill, we are simply being asked to extend the application of a legislation introduced, a few years back, under the heading "temporary".

How can it be that the so-called enlightened people who are still holding important positions today had to beat around the bush to that extent in order to achieve their purpose?

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has succeeded in surrounding himself with first rate publicity men who try to do a good job, in other words, to show the minister as a man in the know who assumes his responsibilities.

In fact, the truth is just the opposite, since by this bill, the minister proves to us either his incompetence or his ill will.

Either he knew what would happen to the bill introduced two years ago, or he is not aware of the role he must now play at the head of the country.

The bill asking us to extend the act is, in my opinion, most unfair because, once again, it affects the poor and the average income citizen. These really bad formulas prove to us that the government always protects the strongest in the country, the big moneymen, in other words those who have countributed to the election fund in the past and who can still do it in the future. It is ridiculous to let the population believe that we intend to build a just society by such unfair methods.

The Economic Council of Canada has established that a family with an income under $5,000 lives in a state of poverty and a survey has shown that 75 per cent of families in Quebec earn less than $4,000 a year. Moreover, according to a survey conducted by one Scott Houde, of Dalhousie Institute, in Nova Scotia, it has been proven that 35 per cent of families in that province live in a state of poverty and earn salaries of less than $3,000 a year.

Why, Mr. Speaker, does the government persist in wanting to collect money from this class of workers who already lack the bare essentials since it is known that personal debts of Canadians amount to $4,000 per home, not counting mortgages? Why must it tax low-income people who are not solvent in the eyes of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

So-called geniuses quite often blame Canadians for their lack of disposition for saving, but when you already lack the essential and in addition the government picks your pockets, how can you ever save anything? Stores and shops are packed with products of all sorts because Canadians have less and less purchasing power, and the government is introducing legislation to tax them further. It is really no wonder that some areas of the country are not developing much. In fact, it is recognized that even as taxes have increased, salaries have often remained at the same level. We know the results and, frankly speaking, one should not expect anything else.

So-called government experts work up projects aimed at eliminating regional disparities and in the same areas there are people who are required to pay more taxes. Truly, one must be utterly dishonest to believe that such a course of action is normal. As I said earlier, people who are considered insolvent by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation when it comes to building a home are always considered solvent for income tax purposes by the Minister of Finance. We then realize that there is one law for the rich and another for the poor.

There are a number of public relations experts employed by the government who go around telling people that they are being taken care of, and that solutions to their problems are being investigated.

With this Bill C-225, we realize that the government is genuinely concerned with the underprivileged, not in order to assist them, but to crush them more.

The surtax applied in the Spring of 1968 was only temporary and was supposed to produce $105 million for the Canadian government, collected from individuals for the fiscal year 1968-69. I repeat it was only a temporary scheme and we can read the statement made by the present Secretary of State for External Affairs, hon. Mitchell Sharp, who was then Minister of Finance, in Hansard for March 7, 1968, on page 7394, and I quote:

> ... this surtax will apply only for the taxation years 1968 and 1969.

Today, back comes the same bill, under Her Majesty's authority, with advice and consent of the Senate.

Can the Senate tell us whether the Minister of Finance's statement in the Spring of 1968 was due to insincerity or to lack of awareness. Whatever the reply, I believe we have there an explanation for some changes in the present government.

Officials in the department of Finance, very well paid officials, prepare high-sounding statements that are then made by parrot-type ministers, and as soon as the statement is made and the act becomes operative, those ministers are transferred to another department.

As the Secretary of State for External Affairs was a witness to today's debate, I wonder if he could tell us on what he based the promise he made to us in the spring of 1968 that the 3 per cent tax would be only temporary and would be in force in 1968-69 only.

I believe that the government had foreseen the present moment, that it was already thinking of maintaining this tax and that is one of the reasons why, I think, the Minister of Finance was given another department where he can wash his hands of the whole thing.

The bill also provides for the maintenance of a certain surtax imposed on corporations and small enterprises. One does not have to be an expert to know that those corporate taxes will finall ybe included in the prices of the products and the services sold by those companies. In short, with the extension of this tax, the workers will inevitably have to pay the piper once again because the companies always end up by including the cost of such taxes in their prices.

Once more, the consumer, who already lacks the necessaries of life, will bear the brunt of it.

If the government has not enough money to operate, there are other means to get some, and the Minister of Finance knows all about them. He should use these means to try and help to some extent those who could do with more than their salaries to meet their own needs and those of their families.

With Bill C-225, he is attacking not only the individual's income but also the bare minimum. He is taxing what is necessary to life and the minimum expected by Canadian people.

The head of a family who earns $4,000 a year receives the equivalent of welfare. And if people on welfare had to pay taxes, it would be of the utmost ridicule. When somebody with an income below $5,000 is taxed, the essential needs of a family are thus taxed. And even though the government is very strong presently, owing to its majority, I feel it is not a good enough reason for it to take the last nickel away from the Canadian people.

When we compare in the 1971-72 budget the amount of $558,300,000 paid in respect of family allowances to the amount of $1,994,685,000 for servicing the debt, we find ample reason to convince us that the present government does not at all reflect the image of the democratic government which had been expected following the coming to power of the Liberal party. By its action, the present government is in the process of proving that it does not at all administer the country according to the wishes of the people.

The minister who is supposed to sponsor this bill is not alone responsible for this state of affairs, as there is above the governments an anonymous body which includes very influential people who are being waited on by the old political parties. Whatever the color of the government, blue or red, it is always the same administration dictated by senior officials whose function is to execute the will of high financiers. Crises of all kinds follow one another. There are words to categorize them, they are even given names as for hurricanes: the monetary crisis, the October crisis, the unemployment crisis, the union crisis. It is easy enough to catalogue all those crises but when it comes to finding means to prevent them, nothing is done. The government is sustaining constant publicity about the poor; the number of poor people increases but there is no mention of change of any kind.

Mr. Speaker, precisely because I did not come here to protect any trust, because I am primarily concerned about the welfare of my constituents, I take the liberty of moving the following amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau):

That the main motion be amended by deleting the word "now" and adding the words "in six months from today" at the end of the question.

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, it is easy to settle immediate problems with instant stop-gaps applicable at any time. The government, which was supposed to establish the just society, lost no time, right after taking office, in raising taxes through a 3 per cent surtax.

The new administration, under the spell of "Trudeaumania", had already raised taxes by 2 per cent, affixing to the new tax the pretentious name of social development.

Ironically enough, never has Canada known such gloomy years! Unemployment, social deterioration and anarchy seemed to be the reaction to this half-concealed arrogance. The Canadian citizen is more and more aware of the fact that constant imposition of new taxes and surtaxes will fatally lead to a point of no return, where anarchy and dictatorship are bound to take over.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Too often, and this should never have been tolerated, temporary schemes end up by being permanent. This illustrates the principle: let us create a precedent, let us enact a temporary legislation; in any case, it will become permanent.

We, particularly in Quebec, in the past, have greatly suffered the ill effects of such provisional agreements that later on became permanent. How many essential rights Quebec has lost temporarily and which are the cause of the accute constitutional conflicts we are experiencing today! How many promises of a return to normal as soon as the dangerous situation was controlled! In a word, Mr. Speaker, how many misrepresentations, at least at the intellectual level, aimed at improverishing the Canadian taxpayer to a greater extent!

Perhaps we could not talk this way if we had no other solutions to put forward than those constant tax increases. My colleagues had the opportunity to analyse scientifically and refute systematically the claims of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson).

Allow me to emphasize, in my own way, the disadvantages of this obsolete economic system which requires the whole population to follow the ups and downs of a staggering economy controlled by the whims of high finance. If at least the government, through its action, managed to restore some order within the economy, if it succeeded in improving everybody's welfare, and if finally, it succeeded in balancing once and for all the country's finances, we would not insist so much that this bill be withdrawn. But God knows that everybody is lost in this fiscal jungle. The government is groping its way day by day. Money is so scarce: it does not matter whether this is the result of bad administration or of a bad system, it keeps on levying more taxes to solve whatever problem arises.

And yet the means we are suggesting should at least be tried out. Let us stop empoverishing everybody by this dreadful bleeding from interest scattered to all winds, the North-South wind being the most efficient.

Why persist in requesting from senior bankers permission to issue social credit? Why reimburse two, three, four and even five times the capital amount? Why thus spoil the genuine power, that of the people, the monetary power that the people himself could exercise through his bank, the Bank of Canada?

Why not agree to interest-free loans? Why not reduce by all means available the tax burden and avoid all extravagance?

Mr. Speaker, we would very much like the government to succeed in making our economy healthier. We would like to help them do it. With all our heart we would like to be able to relax in this vast country of ours whose untold riches do not sufficiently contribute to the welfare of each and every one of us. We would so much like every Canadian to feel really responsible and to be able, having acquired his full development at all points of view, to contribute to international development, to international peace. But one must admit that we must first organize our own affairs.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we are always ready to co-operate closely with any government that will condescend to take a step towards the real solution which we advocate, which would spare us many hardships and which, in making financially possible what is physically achievable, would permit a better distribution of goods and give the individual the freedom necessary for his development.

Mr. Speaker, those are the reasons obliging us to insist vigorously against such government tactics of keeping on levying taxes that look most unfair to us. That in an affluent country such as ours no efforts were really made until now to solve the problems by exploiting our full potential of material riches, is unthinkable. Add to that the wealth of our labour—and again we know it is not lacking at the present, that there are at least 700,000 available and that we have the necessary talent—and we could set an example in the world by merely applying the principles inherent in an adequate economic system.

That is why the one and only solution the government always comes up with—increasing or extending taxes—constitutes the reason and the cause of the frustrations we have to go through at the present time.

We therefore have to defend the people themselves who have to cope with taxes and who want once for all to have other solutions considered instead of taxes.

They want at least that some steps be taken to study other methods which could lead to better understanding and to better living conditions for all.

One wants to eradicate poverty; we agree. One wants to improve the lot of everyone and we agree again. But we disagree when one does not use his intelligence or his imagination or any means to try to find another solution than a tax increase.

And those tax increases evidently and surely lead to a slackening of the economic development, a slackening which the small wage-earner who can hardly make ends meet, is obviously always the one who must suffer the consequences.

That is why we are here, to fight for the main interests of the weak, to fight for the main interests of the people, for it must be admitted, Mr. Speaker, the majority of Canadians are not now living absolutely freely, taken into account the great financial difficulties they encounter.

That is why—and I think that should be enough—we insist that the government revise its position and try—then we will give it all our support, all our help—to find solutions other than increasing taxes.

We hope we will at last be heard, that there will be a show of good will. In fact, we are sure, we have the support of the majority of the people.

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I will recall at the outset that the purpose of Bill C-225 which is before us this evening is to extend for a period of one year the 3 per cent surtax, which was unfortunately enacted in February 1968.

[Mr. Matte.]

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, this bill brings in no change, except the extension of a legislation, of a surtax which was to be temporary, as have just mentioned some hon. members of the Ralliement créditiste.

The amendment moved by the créditiste member has in fact the effect of deferring to six months the consideration of the proposal, which for all practical purposes would amount to eliminate the effects of that legislation.

We will unquestionably—at least in so far as I am concerned—support the créditiste amendment since it tends to repeal that surtax, that additional burden imposed on taxpayers.

Mr. Speaker, what I would have wished this evening, before pursuing my remarks, would have been that the minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), who unfortunately is not here, withdraws that 3 per cent surtax enacted three years ago.

We will remember that this bill, which in short provides for the extension of the implementation of Bill C-193, introduced in February, and which originated in November 1967, had been proposed by the then minister of Finance, now Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp).

It is intended by this bill that an amount of $300 million be collected to provide for social welfare benefits and particularly old age pensions. I would appreciate it if the Minister of Finance or one of his officials would tell us whether the manimum amount that the government was seeking to collect by means of the 3 p. 100 surtax has been exceeded. It is quite possible that this surtax may have netted the government $500 million or $600 million which would confirm one again that this surtax is unjustified in as much as it has brought in more money than was required to meet these specific needs.

Now, Mr. Speaker, since it is impossible to obtain this information, I hope the minister will make it his duty to tell the House whether or not the government is actually collecting far more money than is needed to reach the goals set out in this bill.

Mr. Speaker, if, today, the taxpayers find that the government wants to extend the surtax for another year, they will have to pay it. When we speak of a surtax, we speak of a tax on a tax. It should however be noted that the present government is not the only one responsible for this situation. As a matter of fact, Bill C-225 is really a continuation of Bill C-193 of sad memory, and which caused some disquieting moments within this Parliament. We will remember it too easily and with too much bitterness. This bill plunged Parliament into one of the worst political crisis in the history of Canada.

February 19, 1968, will be well remembered, when a bill was put to a vote, a bill affecting the life-blood of the federal administration, i.e. the budget, and the way in which the government must spend public monies. In fact, it was a bill involving expenditures needed for the federal administation.

According to the whole parliamentary tradition, to the practices followed in all countries with a system similar to ours, this law was bourd to commit the liberal government which introduced it on February 19, 1968, at the occasion of a vote in this chamber.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that on the night of February 19, the government was defeated by a vote of 84 against 82. On this first vote, all opposition parties had unanimously voted the government down, therefore condemning its proposals and rejecting a piece of legislation which aimed precisely at imposing upon Canadian taxpayers a direct tax on their income tax return.

Mr. Speaker, I was extremely surprised today to hear my good friends from the Ralliement Créditiste who time and again said that they were strongly opposed to this tax hike, state that they are the champions in this House of the laboring man, the low-earner, and that they are the true defenders of the Canadian nation.

Some hon. Members: They are.

Mr. Valade: If my hon. friend maintains that they are, I must, to be fair, truthful and simply honest, straighten out the facts.

• (8:40 p.m.)

The Ralliement Créditiste had voted with all other opposition parties against the bill proposed by the government, causing the fall of the government—

An hon. Member: This is not true.

Mr. Valade: —not of the Liberal Party in power but of the government of that time.

Before my hon. friend says this is not true, let him wait and I shall give him proof.

The liberal government had had a rebuttal on proposals to increase taxes for Canadian taxpayers in a precise legislation to this effect. When I hear our hon. friends the Créditistes today say that they hold the government responsible for this, I say this is not the whole truth, because those who are really responsible for the surtax we have had these past three years and for the extension that we shall have are the Créditistes themselves whose behaviour has given the lie to their leader's actions and statements in the House—

An hon. Member: This is not true!

Mr. Valade: —and kept in office that party which had undertaken to increase personal income tax.

An hon. Member: Tell the truth!

Mr. Valade: I appreciate the fact that my hon. friend wants me to speak the truth and this is exactly what I intend to do, Mr. Speaker. How unfortunate that in this House one should be forced to put—

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): It is a new bill.

Mr. Valade: It is not so. It is a continuation of Bill C-193. The members of the Ralliement Créditiste had said that they would vote against the government, that they had said so a thousand times in this House—

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): It was not the same bill.

Mr. Valade: It is the same bill perpetuating itself; there is no difference whatsoever.

Mr. Speaker, I am tired of hearing in the House those self-styled defenders of the working class who really bear the main responsibility for a surtax applying to all Quebec taxpayers.

Mr. Speaker, I shall quote from the official report of the House of Commons. As far our honourable friends who are trying to refute self-evident truths, I should like to invite them, since they claim to be the sole defenders of the truth, to review conscientiously what was said in this house just three years ago.

On page 6905 of Hansard for February 21, 1968, when the house had just defeated the government by a majority vote, you can read the following:

> If we believe that, in a democracy, parliament is the real sovereign of the country, we may say, in the present circumstances, that the government has been defeated by a parliamentary majority and that it should resign.

These were the very words spoken by the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste (Mr. Caouette).

Mr. Speaker, it is rather surprising that a few days later, that is to say on February 22, 1968, as recorded on page 6915 of Hansard, the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste (Mr. Caouette) had this to say, and I quote:

> There was no agreement or collusion among opposition parties. The only thing that happened Monday evening was that the motion introduced by the government with regard to Bill C-193 was defeated.

Here, the leader of the Ralliement créditiste (Mr. Caouette) said:

> —was that the motion .. was defeated—

—while one day, not 20 years later, but the day before, the leader of the Ralliement créditiste stated:

> —was that the motion ... was defeated—

And, on the following page, he goes further and says this,—and I invite the hon. members to read page 6905 carefully:

> —was that the motion... was defeated—

It was not the motion, that was defeated, it was "the government".

> —Under the circumstances,—

—says Mr. Caouette—

Mr. Speaker: Order! I would invite the hon. member to refer to his hon. colleague from Témiscamingue as the representative for the Témiscamingue constituency. The hon. member will admit that it is a sound practice in this House to refer to a member by giving the name of his riding rather than his surname.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I simply wanted to draw attention to the fact that I was quoting Mr. Caouette's words as recorded on page 6905 of Hansard. So I must mention Mr. Caouette's name. I recognize that he is member for Villeneuve, but I am quoting page 6905 of Hansard where the hon. member for Villeneuve, leader of the Ralliement créditiste, was stating as follows:

We voted and the government was defeated. Under the circumstances, there is but one way out, and that is to go to the people.

This was the statement by the leader of these honorable gentlemen to my left and I am trying to explain—

Mr. Rondeau: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I have in hand the official report of the debates of the House mentioned by the hon. member for Sainte-Marie and I would like him to tell us on what page he finds the words "Under the circumstances, I see no other way out for the government than to go to the people" ascribed to the leader of the Ralliement créditiste (Mr. Caouette).

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I have just mentioned it. My hon. friend was nervous. It is on page 6905 (6-9-0-5). It is not a phone number, but the page number in the issue of February 21, 1968 (1-9-6-8) of the official report of the debates of the House of Commons which all hon. members receive at their office and which they collect or keep.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that my friends will not deny a statement appearing in Hansard and which was made by the leader of the Ralliement créditiste. I will quote another one to enable them to understand better. Since we are considering the bill concerning the surtax, may I quote from the same page 6905 (6-9-0-5)—it is not neither a bingo game, Mr. Speaker.—I want to be very clear for our friends. In the second column of this page, we fnd the following words of the hon. member for Villeneuve:

We objected to Bill No. C-193 at the resolution stage. We are still opposed to it, and if the motion for third reading has been rejected by a vote in the House, I see no other way out for the government than to go to the people and ask for their opinion on the way in which the business of the country is to be dealt with.

This, Mr. Speaker, was the final ultimatum, the position that the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste had taken in the House before subsequent consultations.

I do not quite understand. I could quote several other statements of the hon. leader of the Railliement Créditiste which puzzle me because I am sure the members of his party are honest representatives of the people. But I cannot understand that today, when we are discussing the very substance of Bill C-225 which is in fact the repetition of Bill C-193, we find so many contradictions in it that we could believe the words of some people who must represent the population with honesty and loyalty and who say to the House: We stand absolutely alone as protectors of the little man.

We are against the government continuing to impose this surtax on the people.

Mr. Speaker, I say it is not only my right but my duty in this House, especially as a representative of the working class, to protest against this systematic, gradual and repeated tax increase, at the expense of the small wage-earner, of the worker. The steadfastness of Conservative members was put to the test but we have never indulged in petty politics and time-serving as we have seen others do since yesterday on this question.

If the Ralliement créditiste had wanted to spare the population from the effects of a surtax, they should have taken the same stand in 1968, at the time of the vote against the Liberal government, and that same government would no longer be at the head of this country to extend the surtax and taxes against which the Creditistes today seem to stand as champions.

Mr. Speaker, if at that time, the Creditistes had not reversed their position ten times, the government would not have enjoyed the reprieve they owe us and we would have taken a specific honest and clear position. If today we have to stand up again and tell the government: We refuse that tax extension you propose, if we have to do so, it is because the Ralliement créditiste maintained and helped to maintain the Liberal administration under Mr. Pearson.

Mr. Speaker, I am not participating in this debate merely to attack without cause my colleagues in the House, but in order to show the facts as they are, so that such unacceptable and unexplainable contradictions may not be made without rebuttal.

Mr. Speaker, we have only to refer to some newspaper articles. I have here—

Mr. Rondeau: Montréal-Matin.

Mr. Valade: —La Presse. My hon. friend was wrong once again. Ten mistakes so far, Mr. Speaker. There is nothing new in that. And now one more.

Mr. Speaker, I have here the front page of La Presse, dated February 24, 1968, with a big headline which, for our friends' information, reads:

Caouette Saves the Government.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Caouette saved the government against a Progressive Conservative vote, in order to maintain in office a government that had then decided to impose a surtax on the taxpayers. This is what the newspapers wrote.

In another report published not by Montréal-Matin but by La Presse, February 24, 1968, on page 47, one could read this:

The Liberal Party owes a great deal to Réal Caouette for his right-about face.

Those are not our comments, Mr. Speaker, but those of newspapermen who had examined the statement made by the leader of the Ralliement créditiste on February 21, along those lines: "The government has been defeated and must resign. It should go before the people". The day after, that is on February 22, he said: "We did not vote against the government we voted against the motion".

Mr. Speaker, this subtility of speech which becomes more and more reproachful (réprobatrice)—

Mr. Rondeau: Réprobateur.

Mr. Valade: —this interpretation which becomes more and more difficult for our people to accept now, all the more so since it comes from those who claim to speak the only truth, if the expression is not too strong—

Mr. Rondeau: It is strong.

Mr. Valade: —for my Créditiste friends.

Mr. Speaker, if we are discussing today a bill which affects all Canadian taxpayers and, as explained by the minister, which states that the government's intention is to extend for another year the 3 per cent surtax, it is because the government has enjoyed and still enjoys a majority which it has gained democratically and when it could rely on the support of the Ralliement créditiste. This is why we are still in the same situation and asking the government to consider the situation of the small wage earners and to defer its decision in the present economic situation, when unemployment has raised to levels unequalled in the past, when the economic situation becomes more and more difficult, and when companies find it difficult to "have both ends meet in their administration." After all, all those who have intelligent and technical knowledge of economics say to the government: Stop taxing, because you are in the process of strangling small industry, of strangling the low-salaried worker, of strangling the economic future, the future of Canadian citizens.

Mr. Speaker, that is why we are engaged today in another debate which does not differ at all from that of 1968, which is an exact replica of the 1968 legislation. If at that time some hon. members had shown by their unequivocal attitude that they would never had supported the federal government had it persisted then in its intention to extend the 3 per cent surtax, I am sure that the Canadian taxpayers, the Quebecers and the workers in general, would not now have to dig deeper into their pockets to pay for the exaggerated, extravagant expenditures of the present liberal administration.

Mr. Speaker, I shall spare the House some of the comments I could add to those I have made already. I could quote the many testimonies of people who write to me blaming the liberal government for its policy of economic pressure, not on those who can pay, but on the small wage earner. The Minister of Finance says that the policy advocated in the white paper will result in taxing the rich to give to the poor, but the present bill taxes the poor to make the government grow even richer than it is now.

There is only one thing for the government to do if it needs funds to pay for social legislation and for the dificit caused by the old people pensions: it can cut down on its extravagances and reduce the amounts spent uselessly in some departments.

The government has all the means at its disposal, all the powers needed to impose on the taxpayers all the taxes it deems necessary and valid. The Liberal government will have to remember that if it has all the powers once elected, it does not enjoy this power indefinitely. And if it does not consider the results of increasing taxes from day to day and thus aggravate the situation caused by this heavy burden of taxes accumulating from day to day, it will have to suffer the consequences.

Mr. Speaker, let us ask the members in good faith—as my hon. friend from Matane (Mr. DeBané), whom I want to congratulate publicly for the selfless, frank and loyal work he has done, for many months, to help the population of his constituency to go through very hard times—what they think about it. I want to congratulate the hon. member because he is the kind of public figure who makes a politician's life worth living and he is almost the only one of his kind. I believe that all the other members who represent the working class, the low-earners, must now realize that if they do not stop taxing the man who can no longer pay, one day, and that day may be soon, they will have to pay the price of their blind loyalty to a party, particularly those members who want to warp minds and act as gods, claiming to be the sole possessors of the truth and the sole defenders of the working class.

These irresponsible and unfounded attitudes and statements will only destroy public confidence in politicians and Parliament. I do not believe that this is the best way to serve the people. I therefore strongly urge the Minister of Finance to state, before we vote on Bill C-225, how much money the government has collected and is now collecting through this 3 per cent surtax and if these sums exceed the requirements of the government, let him promise to reduce taxes accordingly on low incomes.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, having heard the speech of the member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade), an insidious speech, with dishonest interpretations which reflect on our privileges as members of Parliament, I think it is my duty to set the facts in their true light. Last night again, the whip of the Conservative party asked one of my colleagues, the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe), who was the first Créditiste speaker on this tax bill, to shorten his speech to five minutes, ten minutes at the most, in the hope that this bill might pass unnoticed.

Mr. Speaker, we want to set the facts straight and what the member for Sainte-Marie said is false and reflects on our privileges. The fact that I have just disclosed can easily be substantiated by the testimony of the member for Compton who is far more honest than the member for Sainte-Marie.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Mr. Valade: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Sainte-Marie.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of raising the question of privilege in respect of the nonsense we have heard from the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin). But he has stated that I have made false, dishonest, seditious and libellous accusations or whatever. I would like to remind Your Honour that I have quoted extracts from Hansard, and the hon. member for Lotbinière has no right therefore to accuse me of false statements since I was quoting from Hansard. And if such is the case, then the hon. member for Lotbinière should withdraw his statement or else confine himself to the extracts from Hansard which I have quoted.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It seems to the Chair that the hon. member is raising a point for debate rather than a question of privilege.

Mr. Valade: Not in the language used by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin), Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-225 is another of these omnibus type bills that the government is in the habit of bringing in. It proposes an extension of the capital cost allowance to 115 per cent. I think that is all right, though I believe there are other tax concessions that could better improve the business climate and help get new industries off the ground. The fact that the surtax is being continued is, I believe, a deplorable step. It has caused untold trouble in the past, and will in the future. Taxes are creating a psychological depression in this country and are probably one of the main causes of unemployment, strikes and the general dissatisfaction that is so prevalent in the country. When I refer to taxes I refer to the oppressive taxes that are now with us and which are being proposed.

It is constantly being said that more demands are being made upon governments and that since the money to meet those demands has to come from somewhere, taxes must be increased. I suggest the solution is more a matter of priority and business judgment. I think this is no better illustrated than in an incident that occurred in the defence committee some time ago. I do not have the committee reports in front of me, but I refer to five warships for which Canada let a contract. These were dual-purpose ships playing an offensive and defensive role. I think the original estimate of cost for the five vessels was around $156 million—something like $31 million apiece.

These vessels have not yet been delivered because, since we want the latest in equipment, they have had to be upgraded and also we want them to be distinctly Canadian. For them to be distinctly Canadian entailed getting parts of the ships from about five different European countries: we got the guns from Italy, the firing-pins from Holland, and so on. Can you imagine the practicality of a situation like that in time of war? In fact, it went even further than that. Before we took delivery of the vessels we decided to change the engines. Changing the engines involved changing the hulls. The vessels still have not been delivered, and we have an open-ended contract for God knows how much money. I think the cost of these vessels today is something like $20 million each more than the original estimate. We keep talking about raising more and more taxes, Mr. Speaker; but with businessmen in this country making deals like that, there will be no end to increases in taxes.

[Mr. Valade.]

Let me say something about priorities for this country. I was never enthusiastic about the priority given to bilingualism. Although it is important, it is not as important as funnelling large expenditures into solving the unemployment situation. Our bilingualism program reminds me of the story of the lifeguard at the swimming pool who, when told someone was drowning in the pool, replied, "I know. But I can't swim". When asked why, if he was a lifeguard, he could not swim, he replied, "Because I am bilingual".

• (9:10 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Downey: I suggest that was his qualification, and priorities of this kind—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but I should remind him that the House is now considering an amendment to the main motion, that is, for a six months' hoist. The motion before the House is in respect of Bill C-225 which deals with two matters relating to the Income Tax Act. The first part provides for capital cost allowance and the other provides for a continuation of the surcharge. With respect, I ask that the hon. member confine his remarks to these areas of discussion.

Mr. Downey: Mr. Speaker, I was trying to relate my remarks to the reasons behind our tax structure. There has been a great deal of criticism of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). He is only an agent of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). He has crippled this country with fear in respect of what the future may hold as a result of tax reform.

Let me now refer to the evidence given before the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, volume 80. This evidence was heard in Edmonton, Alberta. Mr. Mannix, of the corporation of that name, was testifying. He referred to his company as a wholly-owned Canadian company which does about $85 million worth of work per year, employing some 2,700 employees. He said:

> I do not think that, at any time, Mannix or the Mannix family have to take a back seat or justify their position. I just want to make that absolutely clear. They have made a real contribution to this country, and I tell you categorically that we would still be dominated by the American organization, would still be restricted as we were being restricted from day to day then—that is why we bought our position back again—if the provisions of the white paper had been in effect then. We would not have been able to attract the talent that we needed.

In reference to talent he said:

> Talent is our main consideration because without it, this country is going to go down. There are already prospects of this country not going to have the second highest standard of living. We are going to have the sixth. This is because our productivity is going down.

We must understand that talent is not captive. Talent is going to move just like capital and it is going to go where the opportunity is. It is going to go out of this country—it is going out of this country—because of the uncertainties created first by the Carter report and, secondly, by the introduction of the white paper and the continuing reiteration of the leaders of our government today that, come hell or high water, we are going to have this act put into effect.

In relation to the high tax it is interesting to note that a brief was presented to this committee by the business class of Western University. It stated that out of 104 people in that business class at the Western University, 100 are going to the United States because after analyzing the white paper they could not see an opportunity to operate in this country in a proper manner. This is a direct result of taxation. I suggest we will be left with the drop-outs and those who cannot help themselves. Let me give some examples of this. The evidence given by Mr. Connelly to the committee, as recorded at page 38 of volume 80 of the committee's report, with regard to the city of Edmonton was as follows:

You all know in this city the case of Ron Banister—Ron Banister has said that I could mention his name. He has sold out his company to a computer organization in Pennsylvania because he is frightened of the implications of the white paper and the capital gains tax. They got into trouble like most computer organizations. He was asked if he would come back and be president of this company. He said he would if he could operate from the city of Edmonton. The employers of this company said that was all right but on examination found out that they would have to pay the key people $10,000 more a year to equate their salaries—not the living expenses, just their salaries in moving to Edmonton. The executive vice-president found out that if he moved down to Minneapolis he would have $7,000 more a year to spend after tax paid. The result was that there was no way this organization could stay in Edmonton, so it has moved to Minneapolis.

We hear a great deal of talk about nationalism today. I mentioned in the House the other day that it is very necessary that this government develop a plan to initiate a sound economic policy for our citizens. My reason was that for the most part today conservativeness is the result of the investment of capital rather than increased labour. If we are to find any solution to the problem of increased taxes and unemployment, with attendant welfare difficulties, we will have to come up with an economic plan to enable the workers of this country become shareholders in our industries.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, it is most interesting tonight to speak on the amendment introduced by one of my colleagues a short while ago to the effect that the passing of this bill be delayed another six months.

Mr. Speaker, the Créditistes who have spoken before me today have perfectly well asserted their party's point of view in this House, as again they have had the opportunity of doing it previously.

The proposed amendment tends to delay for a period of six months the passing of a bill to continue the application of the tax proposed by the government in March 1968.

Mr. Speaker, if we remember well, this so-called "social development tax" was supposed to be a temporary measure.

And today we see that the government wants to make it a permanent tax. I believe the government's policy in this regard shows very clearly that it was not able to achieve social development through this tax within the period anticipated—by December 31, 1970. The government expected to establish social development in Canada through that tax. Today, because it has not been possible to achieve that goal the government wants to re-apply the tax, extend it for another year, but we know very well the tax will become permanent.

I want to use official records to place the House within the context of events which led to these taxes.

I should like to correct the innuendoes made by the hon. member for Sainte-Maire (Mr. Valade) about the Ralliement créditiste. He took advantage only of what interested him and he did not speak the whole truth in this House.

• (9:20 p.m.)

We know very well what was said in this House by reading Hansard not only for the one day which is of interest to us but for all the days when this subject was discussed.

On February 19, 1968, the government had brought before the House Bill C-193 to establish the so-called "social development tax".

We know that the vote on that day had brought on the defeat of the government, that a majority of the hon. members in the House had voted against that tax, and we can see from the vote that, as the hon. member for Sainte-Marie has said, the Créditistes, like other members of the opposition, had contributed to the defeat of the government.

And we can continue our reading of hansard. On February 21, 1968, as shown on page 6905,—the one quoted by the hon. member for Sainte-Marie—my chief, the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) stated, and I quote:

—There is but one way out, and that is to go to the people—

And before, also on the same page, the hon. leader of the Ralliement créditiste stated, and I quote:

If we believe that in a democracy, parliament is the real sovereign of the country, we may say, in the present circumstances,—

—that is the circumstances of February 21, 1968—

—that the government has been defeated by a parliamentary majority and that it should resign.

He was saying this on February 21, 1968!

On February 23, the present right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), then Minister of Justice, promised this House to rescind this bill and repay Canadian taxpayers the money that had been illegally collected through the bill that had been defeated the night before.

I have here the text of the statement made by the then hon. Minister of Justice, as reported on page 7042, and I quote:

I will even go further, and I will say that it is not only the government's intention not to reintroduce this legislation, but that it is firmly determined to credit the taxpayers with the money they have paid under the bill.

The government recognizes that it is the will of this house not to collect taxes this way.

Therefore, it is saying clearly and plainly to the taxpayers: The money you paid legally under this legislation, that money will be credited to you. It cannot be clearer than that.

The then Minister of Justice made that statement on February 27, 1968.

On the same day, as we were discussing the same bill, the members of the Ralliement créditiste were not yet convinced by the hon. Minister of Justice's promises. They wanted more and the hon. member for Kamouraska proposed an amendment, as one can see on page 7073 of the Hansard, and I quote:

That the motion be amended by adding immediately after the word "government" the following words: And that the government will not present again the said bill in this current session, and that it will credit the Canadian taxpayers with all the sums that have been collected since January 1, 1968, in anticipation of the provisions of Bill No. C-193.

That was not only a verbal guarantee given by the government but it was in the statutes, a garantee whereby the Ralliement Créditiste members had forced the government to accept this amendment. Consequently, the Canadian taxpayers have been relieved from all the taxes referred to in the bill and its amendments.

I have with me Le Petit Journal of March 3, 1968 which stated, and I quote:

Caouette wins. It is easy to say—

—here is the parenthesis made by the member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade) tonight—

It is easy to say that Réal Caouette allowed himself to be bought by the government's ministers during the current Ottawa crisis. Only a blind partisanship, such as that of the conservative party, can inspire such statements. Mr. Caouette has always said that he was against the 5 per cent tax whatever the motion debated and whatever the party in power. In fact, this parliamentary impasse made the creditiste leader all the greater: He was the only one who thought of requiring from the government the promise that a rebate would be made on illegally collected taxes.

Mr. Speaker, I have also with me an article of Le Droit of February 28, 1968, signed by Gérard Alarie of the Canadian Press, who stated:

The 5 per cent surtax for the period from January 1, will amount by the end of March to about $25 million, and the members of the Ralliement créditiste demand that the taxpayers be reimbursed that money.

Mr. Speaker, tonight, the hon. member for Sainte-Marie misled the House when he quoted a statement from the then hon. member for Villeneuve, now the hon. member for Témiscamingue, who said that, in the circumstances, it was true. But the next day they had changed, and finally—

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker—

[Mr. Rondeau.]

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade).

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I do not want to limit my hon. friend's diatribe, but I believe that the Standing Orders do not allow him to say that I have misled the House. I quoted from Hansard, giving the page numbers and the hon. member himself is not authorized to mislead the House while accusing another hon. member of doing precisely that. If he wants to tell lies, that is his own business, but I feel that Mr. Speaker should see to it that the remarks of the hon. member are put in their proper context.

• (9:30 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair knows both hon. members well and realizes there is no intentional desire on their part to mislead the House. It is a matter of debate. Hon. members can have strong feelings on the matter of debate and the Chair respects that feeling.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I was in the process of proving my point, and not through my own statements, but through the statements of others. Moreover, the reimbursements were made effectively, as the Ralliement Créditiste because of its honest and positive attitude, intended to help the low-salaried, has saved the Canadian taxpayers $25 million, an amount that had already been collected, and also prevented the government from assessing the taxpayers for an amount of $125 million, an amount that they would have had to pay if this tax had not been abolished at the request of the Créditistes.

Mr. Speaker, when all these votes were over and the government had made promises to us as can be seen in Hansard, it should not have presented again a bill of this kind during the same session. We had faith in the word of the government, but we demanded at the time much more than promises. As a matter of fact, we had the House adopt the motion of the hon. member for Kamouraska asking for the withdrawal of the bill, but on March 15, 1968, the government introduced again in the House bill C-208 and it can be seen at page 7676 of Hansard of March 15, 1968, that the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste, the hon. member for Kamouraska, as well as the hon. members for Roberval, for Portneuf, for Lapointe, for Mégantic, for Abitibi and for Compton all voted against it. They all voted against this tax which the government wanted to continue imposing, in spite of its promises, but they were Créditistes.

I notice that tonight, the one who wants to gloat about defending the poor, the hon. member for Sainte-Marie, was not in the House at that time and did not vote against the 5 per cent tax which was imposed by the government on March 15.

I also note, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Rondeau: Shame indeed! Not only the hon. member for Sainte-Marie, but also the hon. member for Charlevoix were absent. There might be some extenuating circumstances. The hon. member for Sainte-Marie is content to denounce the Créditistes, but he has never done what the Créditistes have done for the present poor, who are overtaxed by this government and also by the previous administration.

When we want to have the truth in this House, we must use official documents, study the background of the bill and record all the votes on such taxes.

This bill, which unfortunately we must discuss again, is a continuation of the bill of March 15, 1968, which was passed while the hon. member for Sainte-Marie was not here.

Mr. Speaker, we do not have to put up with any lecture from the hon. member for Sainte-Marie. We know full well what we have to do in the House and we are doing it.

And we need not be ashamed today of what happened in 1968, because if the present government wanted to withdraw the bill now before us, we should do the same because we are not here to indulge in petty politics and empty talk but to represent our constituents who are fed up with these farces and old political gimmicks, and with taxes.

In fact, when you are in the opposition, as the Conservatives are, you keep accusing the government but you have no financial solution to propose. We of the Ralliement créditiste have solutions concerning taxation, we do not tell the government: Call an election. We were elected here supposedly for five years, and if bills introduced by the government had to be withdrawn under special circumstances, because it did not have a majority, so much the better. This goes to show once again that the minority government in 1968 was more favourable to Canadians than the present administration which relies on its majority, conscious of the fact that it will thrust on the Canadian people the bill under consideration today.

A majority government like the one we now have is imposing on the people taxes which are too heavy to bear. But in 1968, the government had to listen to the voice of the opposition, of the Ralliement créditiste, and withdraw its bill. Our constituents have congratulated us ever since then. They never blamed us; on the contrary, they understood that the Ralliement créditiste had thought of all the taxpayers, of all the workers who would have to pay those taxes, who would have had to pay out $125 million and would never have collected the $25 million illegally obtained by the Liberal government. The government of the time was so sure that its bill would be adopted that it had already started to collect the taxes. And that is why our constituents were pleased with the attitude of the Ralliement créditiste in the House, and why we are not afraid to call for a vote tonight, tomorrow or in a few days, on this amendment. We are not afraid to vote against this 5 per cent tax that the government forces us to discuss presently.

An hon. Member: 3 per cent.

Mr. Rondeau: 3 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, we are anxious to vote against this tax, because our constituents are equally anxious to vote against this majority government which knows only how to levy new taxes.

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, this evening, I would like to thank my colleague from Portneuf (Mr. Godin) for his amendment which was intended, in some way, to cancel the effects of the bill. Why? Because we consider that this bill is a continuation, as has been said many times this afternoon, of an Act which was supposed to be temporary.

As is often said, there is nothing more permanent than the temporary. Tonight, we would like to deny the truth of that saying, so that the electors, the taxpayers, the Canadians who are crushed under the tax burden may obtain some relief.

In 1942, during one of the first federal-provincial conferences held here in Ottawa, a former conservative leader made a statement which I liked very much. This statement made in 1942 by Hon. John Bracken was true then, and it is also true today. The Premier of Manitoba at the time stated as follows:

> Our present system of taxation seems to have been based on the Gospel promise: "For whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance: but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that he hath."

This is quite like our fiscal system, Mr. Speaker: taking from the Canadian workers, particularly from the taxpayers, rather than from the large companies. It is not the one who cashes in fat dividends each year that pays the highest taxes, but the workers. I call to witness the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) who, on March 3, said what follows about the bill before us, as recorded on page 3624 of Hansard:

> While the cost to the treasury of this measure is estimated at $25 million for the 1971-72 fiscal year—

This means that the bill will allow large industries more depreciation on their equipment. This way, they will save $25 million this year, while if the bill before us is passed, it will cost the small taxpayers $245 million.

This prompted Mr. Bracken to say in the 40's:

> This ill-balanced fiscal system transfers the income of those receiving a relatively low salary to those who have relatively high income. The return from indirect taxes levied by the federal government is to a large extent allocated to the payment of the interest on the national debt—

Mr. Speaker, that was the case in 1942, and that is more true still in 1971.

The premier of Manitoba went on to say:

> Thus we see in this case the income of relatively poor persons go to those who are relatively rich. We will never build up a strong fiscal system in Canada by taxing those with a low income to the benefit of those with high income.

Division

Mr. Speaker, in connection with the 1971 budget, Information Canada has published a brochure entitled "How Your Tax Dollar Is Spent". That publication explains how a good part of the income of Canadian workers is spent by the government.

Under the item "Public Debt", it is indicated that Canada's debt amounted to $38 billion in 1970.

In 1971, the national debt is going to cost $1,995 million, that is almost $2 billion in interest. I am not speaking here of provincial, municipal and school debts, but of the federal debt: $1 billion in interest. And paid to whom? Not to lumberjacks, miners, farmers, construction workers, white collars, but to the rich financiers, those who can afford to buy huge quantities of Canadian bonds. Those are the people, the sharks, who will get those $2 billion in interest which Canadian workers will have to pay through general taxes, income tax, sales tax on building materials and manufactured goods of all kinds: indirect taxes, excise tax and many others, that cannot all be named.

And I forget to mention the few taxes that corporations or some businessmen must pay. We know very well, Mr. Speaker, that these taxes are included in production costs. The consumer is the one who must pay them eventually. So it is always the underdog who pays taxes.

We are fed up with this situation and we want to relieve the Canadian taxpayer of this 3 per cent surtax that would be extended by bill C-225.

This is why my colleague from Portneuf moved this amendment, this is why I support it and this is why my other colleagues of the Ralliement Créditiste also support it, so that this surtax not be levied again for fiscal year 1971-72.

We must take a stand on this and we must take the vote on this amendment so as to know who is in favour of Canadian workers and who is against them.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Godin) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost. It being ten o'clock, a motion to adjourn the House is deemed to have been moved and seconded at this time. The question is therefore that this House do now adjourn.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I would like to bring to the attention of the House the fact that today is the Clerk Assistant's birthday. We hope he will have many more such happy occasions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—REQUIREMENT THAT WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE RECIPIENTS APPLY FOR GUARANTEED INCOME SUPPLEMENT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was hesitating for a moment in the hope that we might have a speech from the Clerk Assistant on this happy occasion.

On Tuesday, February 16, as recorded in Hansard at page 3428—

An hon. Member: We are all leaving, Stanley.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —I put the following question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Dubé):

> In view of the anxiety expressed by many veterans 65 years of age or over who are receiving war veterans allowances because of a notice to the effect that they must apply for a guaranteed income supplement or be regarded as doing so, will the minister make a statement as to why this is being done and the authority for it?

In his reply the minister referred to the increases that are to take place in disability pensions and war veterans allowances in April. He also made reference to the relationship between these payments on the one hand and old age security and the guaranteed income supplement on the other. I then put to the minister the following supplementary question:

> Will the minister check into the aspect of the notice which tells these veterans that they must so apply and that if they do not do so they will be regarded as having done so? That is the point on which we would like to have an explanation.

I thank the hon. Minister of Veterans Affairs for his attendance tonight to deal with this question. I recognize that he has been here two or three nights for this very purpose, but storms and votes and other incidents have washed out the "late show". Tonight, however, we are here—and in view of the storm we might be here all night.

Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear that when a veteran over 65 years of age is on the war veterans allowance it does not matter, in terms of the total dollars he will receive, whether or not he applies for and gets the guaranteed income supplement. It does not matter because of the means test ceiling in the War Veterans Act. Thus, if a veteran is drawing old age security and war veterans allowance, the war veterans allowance will bring his total income up to the permissible ceiling. If he applies for and obtains the guaranteed income supplement on top of the old age security, the amount of his war veterans allowance will be reduced. But the total will be the same. We all recognize that and there is no argument about it.

It is also understood that if there are no hitches, the war veterans allowance rates will increase in April of this year. When these rates increase, so will the ceilings on total permissible income. The ceilings will become $161 a month for the single war veterans allowance recipient, and $271 a month for the married recipient. I have the figures in front of me, but it is not necessary to give them all tonight. The fact to which I alluded earlier stands, namely, that either a combination of old age security and war veterans allowance, or a combination of the three, old age security, guaranteed income supplement and war veterans allowance, will come out to the same total.

We are not arguing about the number of dollars that a veteran will receive, married or single, if he is 65 or over. But a great many of these veterans feel that it is unfair for them to be told that they must apply for a guaranteed income supplement. That is the word that has been given to them. They have been told that if they do not apply they will be regarded as having done so and their war veterans allowance will be cut back accordingly. It will be readily recognized why veterans do not like this.

Money received as war veterans allowance is not subject to income tax. Money received as old age security and guaranteed income supplement is subject to income tax. Veterans, therefore, between the ages of 65 and 70 who do not get the exemption level that they would get if they were over 70, could be subject to income tax if they were on the guaranteed income supplement in a way that would not be the case if they were on the war veterans allowance.

There is also some question about fringe benefits of one kind or another that go with being on the war veterans allowance. There is also some question of what happens if a veteran goes out of the country because a friend may invite him to go down south for the winter. The fact is that continuing to draw the guaranteed income supplement is more difficult than continuing to draw war veterans allowance. On top of all this, Mr. Speaker, there is something that I hope we in this House still respect, namely, the pride of the veteran—who likes to be treated first of all as a veteran. Therefore, I share in the objection that many veterans have been expressing. We have all been getting these letters as a result of the notice that the veterans have been sent, which has not told them that they must apply for the guaranteed income supplement but it is practically that. They have been told in this notice, "If you do not apply, you will be regarded as having done so."

I hope that the minister will explain this question in a way that will be satisfactory to the veterans concerned and I hope, also, that he will tell us by what authority this has been done. Is it under the authority of the War Veterans Allowance Act? Where can we find that authority? Veterans have been told that if they do not apply for a guaranteed income supplement, they will be treated as if they have done so.

A great fuss and to-do was made when the guaranteed income supplement was brought in, and it was said that it would not be affected by moneys received by way of war veterans pension or war veterans allowance payments. Just the reverse actually happens. Once you get the guaranteed income supplement, that affects the war veterans allowance. Most of us in the House think that this is not fair treatment. The whole issue will come before us when we discuss the proposal to increase the war veterans allowance rates. I hope that tonight the minister will have for us an explanation that will be satisfactory to the veterans. They are concerned and they deserve an explanation.

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on December 2 last, when I had the pleasure of announcing a 10 per cent increase in the basic rate of veterans disability pension and a 15 per cent increase in war veterans allowance, both effective April 1 next, I also announced a change in procedure.

I pointed out that the regulations would be changed to provide that WVA recipients who are also eligible for old age security and the guaranteed income supplement would be deemed to be receiving the full amounts to which they are entitled under those programs. The allowances of these persons would then be adjusted to supplement their OAS and GIS payments to bring their incomes up to the new WVA ceilings. This use of funds available under the Old Age Security Act provides one of the means of financing the proposed increases in rates of war veterans allowances.

Accordingly, last month notices were sent to veterans affected and also to civilian war allowance recipients advising them to make application for benefits under the Old Age Security Act if they had not already done so. They were reminded of the importance of making this application in order to avoid a loss of income. The new procedure is to be effective as of April 1, the same date as the increases. Some details are still being worked out, but the change will be effected through amendments to the war veterans regulations and the civilian war allowance regulations, which will be available before the effective date.

May I add, Mr. Speaker, that the change in procedure will be handled in a humane and reasonable way and as flexibly as the circumstances permit. For example, in the case of a veteran who made application for GIS before April 1, but is not yet receiving it, the procedural change will be postponed until the Department of National Health and Welfare begins his GIS payments. These particular will be spelled out in the regulations. Furthermore, treatment rights of these veterans will be preserved through amendments to veterans treatment regulations. As to income tax, of course I cannot anticipate future government fiscal policy but past performance would indicate that this matter will be taken into account.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

It is difficult to answer in three minutes all the questions the hon. member has raised, but I have done my best in the circumstances.

INCOME TAX—NEW ASSESSMENTS FOR 1968 AND 1969

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, the question I asked on February 17, which appears on page 3482 of Hansard, was based on a request from my constituents who wanted me to make their views known about the income tax return forms which were addressed to them recently.

If some thieves are notorious on account of their craftiness or cleverness, such is not the case with this government which shows a lack of imagination on the part of its Department of National Revenue.

In point of fact, Canadians are robbed in broad daylight by the Department of National Revenue. The minister with his relatively large staff recently decided that during the department's slack periods, some files would be reviewed, and I was told the following on that subject by a departmental officer in a letter dated February 15:

> The control of claims for expenditures incurred away from home is part of our ordinary auditing. During the year, we expect to check 9,000 such claims for the whole of Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the persons mostly affected in my riding of Portneuf up to now, because of this new procedure, are truck drivers. Once more, the government is after one of the most hard-working classes. Once more, the government is after an active and alert group to which we owe a great part of the economic activity in this country.

The government is getting after people who, apart from being away from home 95 hours a week, must very often sleep in their trucks. This class is at a disadvantage because under the new rules, the government forbids them to deduct the price of a meal a day, which they were allowed to do during the years 1968-69.

Among the dozens of persons who wrote to me to tell me of their problems, I shall mention the special case of a man who drives his truck between Portneuf and Montreal and back again.

Since the worker must leave home at three a.m. to come back at 9 p.m. on the same day, it often happens that he takes three meals daily outside home. Having travelled between Portneuf and Montreal during 265 days in 1968, he had given the approximate cost of his meals that is $1.15 for breakfast, $1.65 for dinner and $1.75 for supper, the total cost figured for his meals on his income tax return amounting to $760, an amount which had then been accepted. But in November 1970, the Income Tax Branch of the Department of National Revenue sent him the following letter:

As a result of the information obtained from your employer, we intend to amend your expenses as follows: Year 1968: Former expenses $760; Amended expenses $500.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the department that had accepted the amount of $2.90 per day was simply reducing it to $1.70.

Mr. Speaker, I believe we are witnessing something very loathsome. We must not forget that at that time, a friend of the government such as Jean-Louis Gagnon who was vice-president of a commission was given a salary of $25,000 per year and $6,000 for expenses. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, members of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts have seen hotel bills for $65-a-day rooms and $12 meals paid by the Canadian government for some CBC employees. To me, this is having one law for the rich and one for the poor.

CBC employees get $12 meals and $22-a-day rooms are provided for members of commissions that, finally, are not worth much to us, while truck drivers who work 95 hours a week are being refused an income tax deduction for meals totalling $2.90 a day.

If that is not fraud, I wonder what it is.

Some civil servants of the department with whom I discussed the matter recently told me they really questioned the honesty of that type of behaviour, but civil servants have family obligations and therefore cannot express their views. And so, to protect their jobs, even if their work does not make sense, they must crawl before their bosses.

In pointing out that shameless manipulation, I wish to draw the attention of the minister concerned, who has the necessary authority and can make his intentions known in this regard.

And frankly, Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to know as well whether the truck drivers can hope to have the right to eat three times a day.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) regrets very much his inability to be in the House tonight and has asked me to respond to this question for him. I would also advise the hon. member that a detailed response to the representations that he has made tonight will be sent to him personally at a very early date.

Meanwhile, the hon. member may be assured that the 9,000 audits referred to in the question he asked originally—and presumably the instance that he cited this evening was an example of one of those—are simply desk audits in the ordinary course of the department's 1970-71 reassessment program pertaining to the returns of taxpayers who have claimed deductions from taxable income of personal living expenses while away from their ordinary place of residence. This is part of the regular departmental procedure to assure that our self-assessing tax system works properly.

Again I assure the hon. member that a detailed written answer will be delivered to him by mail in the very near future.

FINANCE—USE BY PROVINCES OF CAPITAL WORKS LOAN FUND TO COMBAT UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Robert P. Kaplan (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, tonight represents two "firsts" for me. This is the first occasion on which I have spoken in the "late show", as we call it, and it is also the first occasion on which I have attended the late show. I should like to thank all hon. members who have remained for providing me with a warm and interested audience.

I was not satisfied with the answer the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) gave when I asked a question in the House this afternoon—that he did not have at hand the information which I requested. I much regret that I was unable to give him prior notice of the question, because one would not have expected the information to be readily at hand. The real defendant, if I can put it that way, in the issue I am raising is not the federal government but in fact the government of the province of Ontario.

The matter arose when last December the government introduced a budget which was designed to stimulate the economy to provide an expansionary thrust, and in particular to provide a considerable amount of relief for unemployment across Canada. Involved was a fund, originally of $150 million, subsequently increased to $160 million, which the federal government was offering to the provinces of Canada to assist in capital works not otherwise planned to be carried out and which would immediately provide employment.

Hon. members will recall that at that time the seasonally adjusted unemployment figures were the highest of that bad period, higher than they are now. Some of the provinces of Canada responded seriously and immediately to that offer. The governments of British Columbia and Quebec have repeatedly indicated that they are interested, on behalf of the unemployed people of their provinces, in taking up the share which was made available to them.

Three months following the budget, the province of Ontario has not given any indication that it intends to use any part of the $17 million which has been made available by the federal government. In fact, it was not until February 4, two months after the budget debate, that the province of Ontario decided on the allocation to municipalities in Ontario in respect of this amount. I do not blame the municipal politicians in the city of Toronto for being discouraged: it was not their fault that the provincial government had not responded. Why did Queen's Park wait for three months to indicate the allocation of this money in so far as municipalities are concerned? Why have the people in Queen's Park waited three months, during which time this money has been working in other provinces, to do something about unemployment in the province?

I know there has been a Progressive Conservative leadership convention in Ontario which has kept all members of the Ontario provincial cabinet busy. That leadership convention is now over and I think it is time Queen's Park turned its attention again to these problems. It is time the Ontario government responded to this offer by the federal government and made an effort to use the capital offered to assist the unemployed of this province, particularly those in the city of Toronto.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will join me in welcoming the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Kaplan) to the company that we usually keep at this hour in the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Mahoney: I am happy to report briefly upon how provincial governments have developed plans to employ funds provided by the special development loan program announced in the December budget. I should advise hon. members that statistical figures now available to us have resulted in a second formula for allocation of the funds, and the provinces have been invited to choose the more favourable of the two amounts indicated by the calculations. As a result, in the supplemental estimates tabled today we propose increasing the total of the program to $160 million from $150 million. We also propose, at the provinces' request, to increase the period of repayment of the loans to 20 years from 15 years. The rate of interest charged on loans granted this month will be 6.79 per cent which is, of course, a lower rate than that at which the provinces could otherwise borrow money. In summary, agreements have been reached, or are imminent, for allocation of about $100 million of the total, and provinces have been able to proceed on this basis. We would expect approval of additional amounts soon. Any funds unused by one or more provinces will be reallocated to the others.

The province of Quebec has signed a letter of agreement for its entire $70.3 million share to construct sections of the autoroute through Montreal, part of the TransCanada Highway. Work has been under way for several weeks. Three Nova Scotia highways projects for the total allotment of $4 million are approved. Twenty-nine applications for projects, worth $7.8 million, in 13 British Columbia municipalities are being processed, and we are processing 11 Manitoba applications totalling $5.8 million. We have discussed projects with Alberta and Newfoundland and expect their formal applications within a week. We have discussed typical, but not specific projects with Ontario, whose share is $17 million. We await Ontario's applications. The Saskatchewan government has expressed doubt about its participation in the program, and we have no clear indication yet of the intentions of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 11.01 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, March 5, 1971

The House met at 11 a.m.

THE PRIME MINISTER

CONGRATULATIONS ON MARRIAGE

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the House for not having given notice yesterday of the intention of our esteemed Prime Minister to get married.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: The trouble is he did not consult the members of his Cabinet on this essentially private affair, but I am sure all members of the House will join me in wishing great happiness and long life to the happy pair.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (11:10 a.m.)

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition I join with the Secretary of State for External Affairs in extending deep and warm congratulation and good wishes to the Prime Minister and his bride. I was surprised, however, that he made an admission that the cabinet was not consulted. That apparently is not an unusual course for the Prime Minister, but in this case more understandable than usual. My suggestions are not often accepted by the members of the government, and in particular the Prime Minister, but I think the House would want to know what I said on the occasion of my 30th year in the House of Commons, on March 25, 1970 when in response to the warmth that often fills this chamber I stated:

> I do not want to mention personal matters, but on an occasion like this, filled with emotion, I do want to say that one's happiness is greatly increased by having a wife to support and to counsel one. I am not passing that on to the Prime Minister by way of a suggestion but I say to him that if he would follow my advice in that connection he would be amazed at the transition that would take place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I wish to the Prime Minister and his bride the happiness that has been that of my wife and myself. The bride is the daughter of one of the most distinguished members this House has seen in my time. He was elected for the first time in 1940 during his honeymoon. Some years thereafter I recall seeing the bride of yesterday in the gallery opposite you, Mr. Speaker. She then was about 4 or 5 years of age. It was one of those occasions when there was an interruption from the gallery, dissimilar however from that which took place yesterday. In a voice which could be heard all over the chamber she said, "There's my daddy".

All hon. members will join in wishing the couple all that is good, with the happiness of today to be theirs always.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the Acting Prime Minister need not have apologized for not having notified the House yesterday that the Prime Minister intended to embark on the sea of matrimony. We in the opposition parties are now accustomed to the Prime Minister doing things without giving us any advance notice. The fact that he did not inform the cabinet is understandable. They would probably have insisted on the matter being considered by a study session, followed by a task force, and brought to a conclusion by a white paper, after which nothing would have been done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I suggest that at the Prime Minister's age such delay is unthinkable.

It is a matter of great pleasure to those who come from British Columbia that the Prime Minister should have chosen a girl from British Columbia as his wife. This will help to cement relations between the two provinces of Quebec and British Columbia. I know that the people of B.C. will be very pleased at this event. I am sure that members of the NDP join all members in the House, and the people of Canada generally, in wishing both the Prime Minister and his wife every happiness in the years ahead.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, we were both surprised and pleased to learn that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had changed his civil status. On this important occasion, we wish to offer him and his bride our most sincere wishes for happiness and success in their new life.

Mr. Speaker, according to the Bible, it is not good for man to live alone. The Prime Minister has understood this and he has chosen as his bride a Canadian girl from a worthy and eminent family, and we are happy about this.

I would also like to recall that the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands and leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Douglas) has said that the fact that the Prime Minister has married a girl from British Columbia gives us reason to hope that the bonds that unite Canadians will no longer be broken because of the vastness of this country.

Mr. Speaker, we are both moved and happy about the decision of the Prime Minister and we hope that every time he goes off like this to meditate in hiding on his status, some change will be brought about in Canada's policies.

URBAN AFFAIRS

TABLING OF REPORT, "URBAN CANADA: PROBLEMS AND PROSPECTS"—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): I would like to table in this House and for public discussion a document entitled "Urban Canada: Problems and Prospects". It is a report commissioned by me and prepared by Dr. Lithwick of Carleton University, along with many associates. In the year since Dr. Lithwick produced his first draft, he refined the report and the government has considered its many public policy ramifications.

The document was sent recently to the premiers of the provinces with which governments a process of discussions about new ways to approach urban problems has already begun. This is Dr. Lithwick's study; the analysis and conclusions are those of a consultant, not of this government. It should not be read as representing government policy. It is the first attempt at a comprehensive overview of Canada's documentable urban problems, the separately known aspects and conditions of urban life analyzed in a total context as they affect each other.

The commissioning of the study was an important step by the federal government to explore and document the nature of urban Canada, and to understand the rather phenomenal pace at which we are speeding toward giant cities and urbanized life in this country. The author makes no claim that this is more than an exploratory study. It has, however, influenced the government's thinking about the directions of urban Canada as a matter of national concern. Perhaps I might highlight, in the most general of terms, the report's principal findings.

On Canada's urban problems the report suggests that our urban problems are serious and getting worse, but they can be handled. They are still manageable and we have brilliant opportunities in this country to shape and direct an urban future of our choice. There has generally been a basic lack of understanding of the root causes and indirect consequences of major urban problems. These major problems of high housing costs, slums, traffic congestion, pollution and social unrest are greatly interdependent, and they are in large part a consequence of untempered economic growth and urban expansion.

On Canada's urban prospects the report suggests that urban growth will continue to be very rapid, and will be increasingly concentrated in our largest and most problem prone cities. Within 30 years, without applying some shape, direction and planning to that growth, one half of Canadians will reside in the three metropolitan areas of Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver. The most severe growth pressures will occur in this current decade; they are in fact right upon us now. The complex of urban problems that flow from this growth can well reach very serious proportions, as they have in other countries.

On Canada's capacity to solve these problems, the report says that there has been great fragmentation of federal efforts in the cities, and this has led to sometimes contradictory and sometimes perverse results. However, the co-ordination of the vast federal involvement in urban Canada provides a most important starting place for guiding future patterns of urban growth. The report mentions that policy making at all levels of government has failed to prompt governments to act in concert on the many problems requiring joint action and thought. The tools for dealing with our present and future urban problems are at hand, but the current lack of policy co-ordination within and between levels of government means those are not being used.

The report and the related studies led the government to a decision to seek to put our federal house in better order and to work with the provinces and, through them, with the municipalities, to find better ways to confront what had become national problems. The government is developing a new type of institution to deal with this kind of multifaceted problem, and that is the ministry of state. The ministry of state is a flexible instrument that can bring multidisciplinary insights to bear on complex problems without grouping them into the rigidity and constraints of yet another big government bureaucracy.

In urban affairs, the ministry of state will be a source and a focus for the development of comprehensive federal policies that will let our left hand know and affect what our right hand is doing in urban matters in Canada.

People are now working to institute a real co-ordination of federal policy efforts in the cities. We are now building a strong research capability that will allow policy analysis and development to proceed systematically on the best available information. This research function will include the capacity to test—I repeat to test—specific policies before major new financial or administrative commitments are made.

One important role will be to clarify to other departments the consequences of the different federal policies being implemented now and in future. Mechanisms for determining Canada's urban objectives through intergovernmental consultations are now being explored, and the ministry will devote much of its efforts to consultation, with the objective of joint co-ordination and rationalization of efforts between the federal and other levels of government.

I want to repeat what I have said many times, that this work is going to be supportive, co-operative, usurping no jurisdictions, imposing no federal urban policy on the country. We will build techniques by which proposed policies can be tested and work with the provinces so as to determine what sort of process may be developed.

I would now like to table the report, Mr. Speaker, and to add that the research monographs, providing detailed technical and analytical documentation for the report, are being printed and will be made available shortly.

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, believe it or not, and despite the daffodils, today Ottawa has been out-snowed by Vancouver, and what a snow job that has been. It makes it difficult for us to get down to business, but I am sure there is pleasure in every heart in this House and across the entire nation as we congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on his successful daring, and extend our very best wishes to his bride, Mrs. Pierre Elliott Trudeau. Now, I think, we can understand the content of the Prime Minister's speech to the faithful at Toronto a couple of nights ago.

I thank the minister responsible for housing and urban affairs for his advice yesterday that he would finally be tabling in the House, this morning, the Lithwick study of urban problems in Canada which was commissioned by the government about one and a half years ago. I received the minister's statement and a copy of the study about one hour ago. This study or report has been in the hands of the minister and of the cabinet for about one year. Everybody in the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, as well as numerous other government officials across the land, seem to have read Mr. Lithwick's work and discussed it long before today. But there has been no opportunity, until now, for opposition members on this side of the House to read it. I assume the same holds true of backbenchers on the government side.

Although 85.4 per cent of Canada's population in 1981 will live in urban centres of over 1,000 people, neither you, Mr. Speaker, nor other members of this House will expect me to discuss Mr. Lithwick's report in detail this morning. After all, it is 236 pages long, and is extremely technical. However, I have thoroughly sampled its author's style in the symposium "Urban Studies: A Canadian Perspective" which he and Mr. Gilles Pacquet published in 1968, and which is to be found in the Library of Parliament. We are told, in that work, that we know very little about the process of urbanization in Canada or about the structure and functioning of our cities. However, much work had been done in the United States to accumulate a certain stock of knowledge about approaches to the urban phenomenon. Mr. Lithwick has criticized the Canadian bureaucracy on the ground that it feels its own expertise to exceed by far any to be found elsewhere, thus making dialogue unnecessary.

The author has also criticized the government for its miserly approach to internal research effort. Furthermore, he came down hard on the CMHC for failing to carry out the serious hard work involved in urban renewal, low rental housing, mortgage financing and so forth, accusing it of stringing most of its programs together on an ad hoc basis. So, it seems to me he was an excellent choice to carry out this study.

There is no machinery in Canada, Mr. Speaker, capable of arriving at a national urban policy. The report before us would provide the basis for designing such a policy, likely a good one. Its findings coincide with the long-standing recommendation of the Progressive Conservative party that a federal department of urban affairs and a national urban council be established. It deals with possible policy options for urban growth and also envisions a central research agency for serious urban research and a large-scale data development program.

May I suggest to the minister that the conclusions and the recommendations in this report be considered by a special joint committee of the House and of the Senate, as well as in the light of representations from all three levels of government and those of other qualified and interested parties? Time is of the essence because the complex urban phenomenon is still very poorly understood. In these circumstances, Canadians generally and the CMHC in particular, are entitled to know what their roles are to be. Is the CMHC to be our great urban planner? From its history, I hope not. But it could do some things very well.

Mr. Lithwick, we are told, has revised his report over the period of a year. The analysis, and the conclusions reached, are not to be regarded as those of the government but rather as those of a consultant. The voice of the minister, and of the cabinet which has considered these documents for so long, must, nevertheless, have exercised a great deal of impact upon the alterations which have been made. From a quick consideration of the minister's statement, it would appear that much has been accomplished by the report in influencing the government's thinking about urban Canada as a matter of federal concern. This, I sincerely hope, will prove to be the case.

• (11:30 a.m.)

The report is of great value if it does nothing more than communicate emphatically to all levels of government, and to all Canadians, the facts contained in paragraph 2 of the minister's statement, namely, that within 30 years one half of Canadians will reside in the three metro areas of Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver, and that the most severe growth pressures will occur in this current decade.

Dr. Lithwick is to be commended for pointing to the present great fragmentation of federal efforts in the cities, with perverse results on the promotion of the co-ordination of the vast federal involvement in urban Canada. We are told that the tools for dealing with our present and future urban policies are at hand. But where is the will and the skill to use them? It is in this that we in this party are primarily interested.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ryan: I deplore the government's answer, which is the ministry of state and more highly paid, flexible instruments. We have had enough reports by intellectuals and experts. What we need now is leadership and action. I find the argument of the minister for proliferation of ministries to be a specious one. Let him emulate the late C. D. Howe rather than his present leader, for too many good works are lost in contemplation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member for interrupting him. Perhaps he could give some thought to bringing his statement to an end. According to the Standing Orders, as no doubt he knows, it should be a brief statement or a brief comment. Perhaps he has exceeded the bounds of the Standing Order. I realize how important the matter is and how interesting is the statement being made by the hon. member for Spadina. I am sure that he will wish to co-operate with the Chair in this regard.

Mr. Ryan: Yes, Mr. Speaker. We have waited a long time for the report. It is lengthy and deals with an urgent situation. I hope you will forgive me for my lengthy statement; I will try to wind up in a few words.

I suggest that, although it will be good to test specific policies before major new financial or administration commitments are made, we shall expect both good and swift work to be done under the great pressure of our rapid urbanization.

I left out two or three sentences, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that will be our loss.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, a quick look at Dr. Lithwick's report, that is all that we have been able to give it, leaves a very favourable impression. It looks like a comprehensive beginning to the solution of a very important problem. I join with the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Ryan) in regretting the length of time it has taken for us to get this report. The government has had the report for a long time. Questions and notices of motions for production of papers connected with the report have been on the Order Paper probably for one year or more. Now that we have the report, I hope that supporting documents containing information about the studies which were made, about the people who worked on it, about what they did, about their qualifications and their pay will be forthcoming. That information has not been given so far.

We agree that a national urban policy is necessary. We have called for the establishment of a ministry of urban affairs for a number of years. Apparently the government, if not Dr. Lithwick, is proposing to establish a ministry that will be devoted to research and not to action. I regret that. Without detracting from the research done by Dr. Lithwick and his colleagues, may I say to the minister and to the government that over the years a tremendous amount of research has been conducted in the fields of housing, pollution and urban growth, but that very little has been done to meet problems outlined by earlier studies.

In his statement the minister talked about the major problems of high housing costs, slums, pollution, and so on, and pointed out that they are the result of untempered economic growth and urban expansion. They have also resulted from the failures of federal, provincial and municipal governments to plan comprehensively. I suggest to the minister in all seriousness that they are also to be attributed largely to the lack of money necessary to meet the problems. It is useless to tell the municipalities of Canada that they must move more quickly to clean up pollution caused by inadequate sewage disposal systems, because they will say, "We have no money for that." The statement contains no answer for them.

The minister said that within 30 years half the people of Canada will be living in the metropolitan areas of Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver. It seems, therefore, that the government has rejected the suggestions made in the study conducted by the former minister, namely, that satellite cities should be built. The minister shakes his head; nevertheless, the statement does not suggest that that may be done. The statement talks about the growth pressures which will occur in the next decade and says that we must deal with these right now. I suggest that it is time for the minister and for the government to consider something that the Toronto Star, for example, has been advocating for several years, the public ownership of land in and around the large urban areas where the next spate of urban development and growth will take place. Let us squeeze out the speculators instead of encouraging them to get into the act.

The minister said that policy making at all levels of government has failed to prompt governments to act in concert on these problems. How can the municipal and provincial governments act in concert with the federal government, or with each other, when Ottawa decides on the amount of money to be used for housing and other matters to do with urban growth on an ad hoc basis. Its decision is influenced by the amount of unemployment, as well as by other questions. Instead of carrying on long range planning, the government decides how much money will be made available on very short notice. Under those circumstances no municipal or provincial government can act in concert with the federal government. The minister said that people are now working to institute a real co-ordination of federal policy efforts in the cities. It is rumoured that the federal government had decided not to help in future in the funding and financing of community action projects. I hope that those rumours will prove to be incorrect.

Lastly, the minister said that his ministry will devote much of its efforts to consultation, co-ordination and rationalization—I presume that this includes co-operation—with other levels of government. I hope that that will be more than talk. It is very difficult for the provinces to plan their co-operation with the federal government in certain circumstances. Recently the government of Manitoba was interested in a public housing project. Officials of that government came to Ottawa, to talk with the minister and with officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, because they hoped to spend over $50 million for public housing in the next few years in Manitoba. The minister and Central Mortgage and Housing told them that they could get little more than $30 million. It is difficult for provinces to plan when they are given only 60 per cent of the money they have requested to meet their plans. I am sure that Manitoba is not the only province that has found itself in this situation recently.

We wish the minister well. We hope that the planning and co-operation he has talked about eloquently are not just words. We hope that the result will be action, as opposed to the talk we have heard for so many years.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, the minister responsible for housing has sent us, only a few moments ago, an English version of the summary report prepared by Dr. Lithwick of Carleton University, about urban problems in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I am constantly amazed to find since I have been in this House, the number of reports published by governments and the number of surveys they carry out at various intervals on Canadian problems.

What also amazes me is that after these reports are published, no policies are adopted to implement the recommendations included in these reports.

If this morning we refer to the summary report the minister circulated among us, we see that it only reminds us of the seriousness of urban problems in this country. It only serves to remind us that, and I quote from pages 1 and 3; "Our urban problems are serious and getting worse, but they can be handled."

This is nothing new to us or nothing that members of the House have not told the government in recent years. It only summarizes what hon. members have said with respect to urban grievances.

The report informs us also that if Canada has urban problems it is primarily due to the high cost of housing. The government was aware of that and we had already told them. This is also due to the lack of coordination between the federal and provincial governments in dealing with urban matters and housing.

Unfortunately and inasmuch as the summary report at hand indicates, I note that we are not given the means of solving the urgent problems regarding urban growth.

We have heard statements on the subject of high interest rates, but the report does not deal with it. Nothing is said regarding the cancellation of the tax on building materials which is a major obstacle to housing development in Canada. Neither is it stated that interest rates would be lowered. If the government wishes to have a good idea of the possible solutions, it would do well to publish a document similar to that which has been circulated to us lately, entitled: "How Your Tax Dollar Is Spent". It has only to act according to the example set out at page 28 which deals with the Canadian International Development Agency.

All we have to do is to establish in Canada a Canadian Urban Development Agency and to use it as we use the Canadian International Development Agency.

According to the report that I have in front of me, $172 million are now available for loans to international organizations for international development. We have urban development problems in Canada. This morning, we received a summary report which is a reminder, but in which no solution is proposed.

I am still appalled at the number of commissions that study Canada's problems. But, unfortunately, the government does not ensure coordination.

I think that municipal authorities fully realize what they have to contend with in the field of urban development, but the one and only authority responsible for this deplorable situation is the federal government which will not allow them to take any action because it does not put at their disposal the funds needed to fight effectively urban problems in such areas as housing, water-works and sewers; these are all very urgent problems considering the demographic explosion in Canada and the lack of interest on the part of the different governments during the past 25 or 30 years.

FISHERIES

STATEMENT ON PHASING OUT OF FOREIGN FISHING OPERATIONS ON EAST COAST

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a statement this morning about the phasing out of foreign fishing operations on Canada's east coast. The decision to promulgate our fisheries closing lines, as hon. members will recall, was announced in December. These long closing lines will apply shortly to certain large bodies of water including the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

Phasing Out Foreign Fishing Operations

We announced the decision to draw these closing lines in December, 1970. The 60-day waiting period expired on February 26, 1971. The earliest date for their publication in Part II of the Canada Gazette is March 10, 1971. They will therefore come into effect on Wednesday of next week. From that date on no nation can establish a new fishery inside Canada's exclusive fishing zones. Nor can it step up its fishing activity from that which it has conducted, traditionally, in what from now on will be our exclusive Canadian fishing waters.

So much for new entrants and new foreign fishing activities, but there is still the matter of phasing out. By phasing out I mean the phasing out of traditional fishing practices by the following countries, namely, France, Spain, Portugal, the United Kingdom, Denmark and Norway. No other countries will be able to fish in our exclusive fishing zones in the future.

It should come as no surprise to Canadians, and certainly it will come as no surprise to Newfoundlanders, that these countries have, traditionally, fished close to our shores. Many of them have been fishing close to our shores for more than 400 years!

Against this background it should not come as any surprise either to hear that it will take several years to complete the phasing out process. It will be a negotiated process. It will be a process which will be completed in the mid-1970s. Then the closest which foreign nations will be able to come to our shores is 12 miles from certain major promontories along our coasts.

In answer to a question in the House last week, Mr. Speaker, I said that we would be asking foreign fishing vessels to move out 12 miles. We have now asked Spain, Portugal, Norway, Denmark and the United Kingdom to move out 12 miles from our shore along certain sections of our coast and in certain seasons of the year. We are asking them to do this right away, wherever and whenever there is likely to be a gear conflict. France is a special case. The several hundred year old French treaty provides as follows:

Notice of any fresh laws or regulations shall be given to the government of the French Republic three months before they come into operation.

This notice will be given by March 10, the time at which the ordinance describing our fisheries closing lines are published in Part II of the Canada Gazette.

I have used the term "gear conflict", Mr. Speaker. By that I mean the danger of large foreign fishing vessels interfering seriously with the local operations of our small vessel, inshore fishing fleets. The authority to take action, Mr. Speaker, stems from an amendment which we made to the federal Fisheries Act last year. This amendment extended to Newfoundland, a provision which had applied to the Maritime provinces for some time. Now large Canadian trawlers over 65 feet in length must stay out 12 miles from shore. They must stay out 12 miles unless they are given specific permission, by the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, to fish closer to our Canadian coastline.

[Mr. Davis.]

I intend to use this discretionary power, Mr. Speaker, without discrimination as to nationality. I intend to use it in our dealings with Canadian trawlers and foreign-owned trawlers alike. Countries which have traditionally fished up to the three-mile limit off Newfoundland have been put on notice in this connection. In future, they too will have to stay out at least 12 miles from shore wherever and whenever there is any danger of a gear conflict in the area. We will map out these areas in advance and let them know where they can come into the three-mile limit and where they cannot, pending the completion of our over-all phasing out process.

Hon. members opposite say they are confused. They should not be. Those who come from Newfoundland know far better than I do that foreign fishing vessels have come close to our shores for hundreds of years. They have known all along about the necessity to give notice. They have known about the phasing out process. To tell local fishermen that they can take the law into their own hands and drive foreign fishing vessels out 12 miles is, therefore, an irresponsible act.

We are phasing them out over the next few years. We are phasing them out for all time. We are also using a recent change in the federal Fisheries Act to eliminate gear conflicts between large vessels and small inshore vessels during this relatively short phasing out period.

This is the orderly way of doing things. It is also the best way. It is the best way especially when we are counting on many of these countries to support our case at the next Law of the Sea Conference in 1973. In effect we will be asking them to join us in our attempt to cut down on big fleet operations, including that of the U.S.S.R., 50 to 100 miles from our shores.

We will need all the allies we can get in this much bigger struggle to conserve the fish stocks in the north Atlantic. An abrupt and unilateral act on our part in respect of this matter of phasing our foreign fishermen from our Canadian exclusive fishing zones would, I suggest, be very shortsighted indeed.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, firstly I should like to offer my personal congratulations to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his young bride. I look forward to seeing him back in the House relaxed and refreshed, and I also look forward to a renaissance of closer personal inter-relationships among all members of the House. I can understand some of the pangs of the recent decision-making process.

I thank the minister for his statement, a copy of which I received when I came into the House at eleven o'clock. I should like to make two brief points. First of all, the east coast fishery has two main problems. The first is the general problem of overfishing by many foreign vessels. The second is the specific problem of the infiltration of these nations up to our shores inside our territorial waters and three-mile limit, indeed, right up to our coasts and into our backyards.

This particular problem recently caused great concern when there were reports of 60, and according to the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) 40, foreign vessels fishing right up to our coast. I do not know whether the Soviet Union was one, but certainly almost every other fishing nation of the world was fishing the east coast of Canada. This development has caused great concern and has resulted in threats being made, not by politicians but by members of the public, that if no action were forthcoming from Ottawa they were willing to take matters into their own hands and try to protect their own interests. They were concerned that their property was being stolen. They felt much as if their homes had been broken into and their possessions stolen, and therefore they felt that they had the right to defend themselves.

The statement of the minister was made for the purpose of clarifying recent statements, since the impression left by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) was that, as of several days ago, following the proclamation by the Minister of Fisheries, the traditional fishing nations were to remain outside the 12-mile limit off the southwest coast of Newfoundland, which happens to be part of Canada. The fact is that the very next day 40 foreign fishing vessels were fishing within three miles of the coast; hence the obvious confusion.

The minister now tells the House that we should not be confused because these nations have been put on notice, though it will take some time for the Department of External Affairs to give the notice and to elicit the kind of response that we should receive from these nations. We understand that the officials of the Department of External Affairs were very reticent, to begin with, about accepting the proclamation of the Minister of Fisheries and have been very lax in trying to alert the various nations to the problem.

In his statement the minister said we have asked various countries to comply and he referred to certain sections of the coast. Then he went on to say that we are asking them to do this right away wherever and whenever there is any conflict. But it is only a question of "asking them" to do this. Farther on he indicated that these nations have been put on notice and said that Newfoundlanders understand about the giving of notice.

I can speak for most of the people I know in Newfoundland, this is certainly not the understanding they had. They assumed that the matter was well in hand and that a decision had been reached. I am not going to elaborate on the particular point whether or not notice has been given, but certain questions remain in the minds of Canadians. First of all, we want to know when this announcement was made. The minister will have to provide the answers to these questions, if not in a statement on motions, certainly in some kind of prepared written text. We also want to know when these nations were alerted to the problem, when they were alerted to the response of Canada through the proclamation of the Minister of Fisheries. We want to know what were their responses.

Second, we want to know what plans Canada has for making its presence felt in these areas. We had an announcement about two DND aircraft being mobilized in an effort to try to enforce the minister's proclamation. We want to know to what extent Canada is prepared to make its presence felt so that we can push these foreign vessels away from our coasts and thus allow our own people to make a living from a resource that is being depleted day by day.

Is the government of Canada willing to arrest and charge these foreign fishermen if they do infiltrate the 12-mile territorial zone declared by the Minister of Fisheries, though I understand that these zones are not yet in effect? These nations have been put on notice. Is the Canadian government willing to make these foreign nations pay compensation for loss of gear and the destruction of the fisheries resource, and therefore the way of life of our fishermen?

My third question is: Is the Canadian government willing to enforce a 12-mile territorial limit right around our coasts? It is only a matter of days before the same sort of thing is going to happen in other parts of Newfoundland and there will be a recurrence of the same problem. If it happens in Notre Dame Bay this year then the Minister of Fisheries must not expect me to act in a responsible manner if his own government cannot do likewise. I will not put any covers on the anxiety of the people of Newfoundland if they decide to try to force these vessels away from our shores.

Lastly, there is the more general question whether Canada is now prepared, in view of recent events and the danger of a great international flare-up and crisis over this issue if we do start taking the law into our own hands, to try to force these people away from our shores. I do not know whether this will mean we will not sell as much wheat or shirts made in Quebec, but in order to avoid any trouble is the Canadian government going to launch any new initiatives in the area of conservation?

The minister concluded his statement with the warning that, if we do push these nations too hard, we might kill the relationship he hopes to foster for the 1973 Law of the Sea Conference. If we go back to the 1958 Geneva conference, we recall that Canada was then given the right, one that was accepted internationally by all countries present at the conference, to ask the nations fishing on our continental shelf if they would agree to certain quotas and conservational and managerial steps to be taken by this country. If they were not so willing, then six months after any formal move made by Canada in this direction Canada could unilaterally declare and enforce certain types of conservational and managerial measures.

• (12:00 noon)

So I suggest it is not merely a question of persuading these foreign nations to honour the resources of Canada. I challenge the minister to enlighten the House as to what action we can expect the government to take, over and above the recent very specific move, to try to push these foreign vessels outside the 12-mile limit. I also say that if Canada is not willing to give greater attention to the fishing industry in British Columbia, Quebec, the Maritime provinces and Newfoundland, if the Department of External Affairs is not willing to take more action than it has recently, the present difficulties will be minor compared with the unrest we will witness in Canada in our maritime areas in years to come.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, to the extent that the announcement by the minister this morning indicates the government's intention to take certain specific action, it is welcome. But as I listened to the minister I could not help but be reminded of how, month after month, indeed, year after year following the passage of the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act in 1964, we received bland and wordy assurances from the former Secretary of State for External Affairs that action was imminent as a result of that measure. We waited in vain despite the pleadings, efforts and proddings that some of us on this side of the House engaged in.

There is a distinct contrast as far as the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) is concerned. Whether he is wise in this matter I do not know, but the impression he has successfully created in the House is that far from being wordy on this subject he is struck dumb whenever the question of action on fishing matters is raised. These questions are left to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis). We cannot accuse the present Secretary of State for External Affairs of having held out any false hopes.

There is one particular point I should like to underline in respect of the statement of the minister. As a member who comes from the opposite edge of Canada from that of the hon. member who has just spoken, I agree with the statement of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry as to the importance of this matter to a very large segment of Canadian workers. Certainly the fishermen on the west coast of Vancouver Island, who are faced with the imminent loss of their livelihood as a result of the encroachment of foreign fishing fleets, understand what this is all about. I plead with those members who come from other parts of the country to try to understand what this is all about, and to recognize that the fishermen who go out on the seas are in a rather peculiar position because they have not got the same control over the resource from which they derive their livelihood as other people have in different types of employment.

If hon. members who represent the Prairie provinces were suddenly to find their agricultural land being taken over by immigrants, without any action being taken by the immigration authorities, I suggest they would be in a situation parallel to that which has developed on the Atlantic coast of Canada and has become more and more obvious in recent years. Therefore I urge hon. members to support the action taken so far. Indeed, I urge the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry and the Secretary of State for External Affairs to expedite further necessary action.

[Mr. Lundrigan.]

The minister has talked about a phasing out period. Realistically we cannot quarrel too much with the suggestion that this approach be taken. But it does underline the inadequacies in many respects of the fishing zones concept as we have developed it for the protection of fishing resources generally which are important to the Canadian economy, and also the need to co-operate as much as possible with other countries.

I regret that the minister gave us no indication in his statement as to what the government has in mind in respect of phasing out foreign activity outside the 12-mile territorial sea in the Gulf of St. Lawrence fishing zone. I hope there will be something forthcoming on this in the not too distant future.

The encroachment of foreign fishing vessels in territories from which the larger Canadian fishing vessels have been excluded has been a knotty and aggravating problem on the Atlantic coast for many years. I welcome the fact that the minister is going to require foreign fishing vessels to observe the same regulations Canadians have to observe.

All I can say in concluding is that I recognize that the problem on the Atlantic coast is much more complicated than that on the Pacific coast because of the fact that many nations over the centuries have established claims to fishing rights close to our shores. I hope this action by the minister will serve notice that we do not want nations attempting to establish historic rights or claims off the Pacific coast of Canada.

OIL

TAPS PROJECT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I want to move a proposed motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I propose to ask the unanimous consent of the House to put this motion.

The Canadian nation is daily becoming increasingly concerned over the conflicting claims of our industries for energy and the need to protect our environment. The government, which should be providing leadership and direction to Canada on this issue, is divided. Instead we have all around us conflicting voices.

The United States has already stockpiled pipe to build the pipeline from the Alaskan slopes to the port of Valdez for the transportation of crude petroleum. There is still no government decision to implement policies to prevent the pollution of the sea and our environment. A large oil spill on the west coast, and one will occur, arising from a tanker which was involved in an accident could permanently destroy the life of our coastal regions and cause grave economic hardships to our people.

At the same time there are understandable needs by the United States to develop their oil reserves and transport energy to the great industrial centres of the mid-west.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Woolliams: Our Canadian oil industry needs the same things. If this House is concerned, I would move—

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member, but I am sure he realizes the limitations imposed on us all under Standing Order 43. The hon. member must limit his statement to the matter of urgency and not argue his case. I appreciate that this is a very important matter of concern to all members of the House. Perhaps the hon. member might soon indicate what his motion is.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I had already started to propose the motion. The reason I laid down the terms of reference is that I wanted to win the unanimous consent of the House. I move:

That this House urge the government forthwith to institute an interdepartmental study of the ecological and economic effects of the TAPS project and of alternatives to the TAPS project, and to immediately insist on joint governmental consultation with the United States on these issues before a U.S.A. decision is made.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Calgary North. As he has indicated, under the terms of Standing Order 43 this motion can be put only if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and I regret that the hon. member's motion cannot be put at this time.

POLLUTION

THREAT TO BRITISH COLUMBIA FROM PROPOSED OIL TRANSPORT AND NUCLEAR TEST—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I seek leave under Standing Order 43 to move a motion. May I say I am encouraged to do so and to hope for a warm and favourable response because of the fact the Prime Minister has wed a young woman from British Columbia. Mr. Speaker, this is my motion:

That this House, being aware of the urgent and pressing necessity for action to protect the residents of British Columbia and the waters and shores of that province from the twin threats of massive pollution and ecological destruction involved in (a) the proposed transport along our shores by tankers of Alaskan oil to a refinery in Washington State and (b) the scheduled underground U.S. nuclear explosion test on Amchitka Island in the north Pacific, an earthquake prone zone, urges the government of Canada to act immediately to protect the citizens of British Columbia.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Surrey. The motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

AGRICULTURE

TERMINATION OF APPOINTMENT OF CHIEF GRAIN COMMISSIONER—REASONS THEREFOR

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture who is in charge of the Canada Grains Commission, the former Board of Grain Commissioners. Previously I sent notice of my intention to ask the question to the Acting Prime Minister because, according to the roster system, the Minister of Agriculture was not supposed to be in the House today. I see he has received the message. My question must be of importance to the government as it is to the rest of Canada. Did the minister, who is in charge of the Canada Grains Commission, have the services of Mr. F. F. Hamilton, the Chief Grain Commissioner, terminated at the pleasure of the government and, if so, why?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, technically Mr. Hamilton is still with the Board of Grain Commissioners because the effective date of the proclamation of the new Act is April 1. I have had some discussions with Mr. Hamilton and during the course of those discussions I advised him I am not prepared to recommend his reappointment.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, the minister did not answer the second half of my question concerning why his services were terminated. My supplementary question to the minister is: Is the replacement for Mr. Hamilton to be a former Manitoba Liberal minister and former Liberal organizer on the prairies?

Mr. Olson: No, Mr. Speaker. For the third member of the Canada Grains Commission when it becomes effective on April 1 I will recommend Mr. Forest Hetland, a master farmer from Saskatchewan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have a further explanation of what appears to be political partisanship on the lowest level. Mr. Hamilton, a war hero with a D.F.C. and a D.S.M., is just being dumped out. Is it a fact that the first notice the minister gave of his disagreement with what the Chief Commissioner had been doing was on February 22?

Mr. Olson: No, Mr. Speaker. That is not true.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I then ask the minister whether he received a letter from the Chief Commissioner dated February 23 which states:

This is a hurried reply to your unexpected criticism of yesterday, that is, that my board has moved too slowly in the steps and procedures required to bring in a new grain Bill and regulations.

Did the minister reply to this letter?

Mr. Olson: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then I wish you would table it.

Mr. Olson: With Mr. Hamilton's consent I could table the letter some time in the future.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did he ask for an opportunity to discuss the matter further and did the minister deny him that right?

Mr. Olson: No, Mr. Speaker. I do not think he asked for that opportunity. While I think I should be fairly careful about what I say respecting a private conversation with Mr. Hamilton, I believe I could advise you, Mr. Speaker, and the right hon. gentleman that Mr. Hamilton and I have had a number of discussions over the past two and a half years and Mr. Hamilton has been well aware that I have not been satisfied with his performance during that period.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When the minister brought in the new bill did he let the House know of his dissatisfaction?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether his latest release in favour of partisan appointments—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has the floor for the purpose of a supplementary question and I suggest to him he should ask the question.

Mr. Korchinski: In view of the fact that the opposition members on the agricultural committee have been arguing for appointment for a fixed term of office, does the minister consider that his latest actions will be conducive to the early passage of that bill?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in view of this change may I ask the minister whether it is his intention to appoint an entirely new board with the coming into force of the new Act?

Mr. Olson: No, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

DOCKYARD EMPLOYEES WAGE DISPUTE—REMOVAL OF PAY DIFFERENTIAL BETWEEN EAST AND WEST COASTS IN GOVERNMENT OFFER

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the notice that has now been given of a strike date having been set for Sunday on the part of the dockyard workers at Esquimalt and Halifax, is the government prepared to reconsider its position and do away with the dollar an hour differential as between the east and west coast that is involved in the government's latest wage offer?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. gentleman will recognize the impropriety and indeed damage to the collective bargaining process if I were to negotiate with him across the floor of the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when this matter has been concluded, will the government be proposing to members of the armed forces that they be paid different rates of pay depending on where they are serving?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman, particularly with his long service in the House, should realize that the policy is that where employees are not expected to be highly mobile across Canada we endeavour to engage them for service in a locality at rates of emolument appropriate in that locality.

DOCKYARD EMPLOYEES WAGE DISPUTE—NEW GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS IN VIEW OF STRIKE DEADLINE

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary I wish to ask on behalf of the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants who sent notice of it to the minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows he cannot ask a question on behalf of someone else. Perhaps the House will appreciate the circumstances in which the question is asked, but the hon. member must ask the question in his own name.

Mr. Bell: I endorse the question on my own behalf, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the minister's reply to the previous member, but can he say whether the government will consider any new proposals in this matter in view of the strike deadline?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): I think, as has always been the case, the government does not wish at any time to terminate negotiations or discussions. As long as there is room for them and a willingness to discuss, we are ready, willing and able to do so.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Why not make room then?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BARBADOS—INCREASE IN CANADIAN AID

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question.

Could he tell the House whether he intends to increase substantially in the next two years Canadian aid to Barbados according to a statement made recently by Senator Richard Stanbury, chairman of the Liberal Federation?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I have not seen the statement made by the hon. member of the other House.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

Could the minister tell us if the government intends to grant additional assistance to needy Canadians through exemption of any direct taxation for low-income people?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question is very interesting, but he puts it as a suggestion. He must take it for granted that it will be considered by the government.

OIL

PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—MACKENZIE VALLEY ROUTE—CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I should like to direct my question either to the Acting Prime Minister or to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs stated that no decision had been made by the United States authorities in reference to the pipeline from the rich Alaska northern slopes to Valdez. In view of the fact that a consortium of companies in the United States has already stockpiled pipe for the building of such a pipeline, is the minister aware of that and is he now aware of the decision made by U.S. government authorities to build such a pipeline in view of the stockpile?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. It may be that there are such stockpiles; I do not disagree with that. I do know that no decision has been made. I would like to tell the House that the United States Secretary of State has indicated to me that he now agrees to enter into consultations with us on this question. I am sure he would not have done so if a decision had already been made.

Mr. Woolliams: I appreciate that answer, Mr. Speaker. In light of the answer, can the Acting Prime Minister say whether the Canadian government has made up its own mind as to which transportation route would be the best in Canada's national interest, that is, down the Mackenzie delta or to the port of Valdez and then by tanker to the United States? What is Canada's position and how did the government arrive at it?

Mr. Sharp: I thought the hon. gentleman would have learned by now from the repetitive statements I have made in the House that the Canadian government feels there is a very serious risk in the movement of oil by tanker down the Pacific coast, and it would not be in the interest of either of our two countries.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I am well aware of the minister's statements in that regard, but does the government then endorse the building of a pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley and through the Prairies to the industrial centres of the United States?

Mr. Sharp: I am sure that as a member from Alberta he would wish me to be in as strong a bargaining position as possible in relation to the United States, and to ensure that if an application is made it is one that meets our requirements and not only those of the United States.

Mr. Woolliams: What is your requirement?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member in a moment, but hon. members must realize that there has to be some limit on supplementary questions if we are going to give opportunities to other hon. members to ask their questions. I notice a number of hon. members to my left who tried to ask questions yesterday, and I am rather anxious to give them an opportunity today. So I will have to seek the co-operation of the front-benchers at the start of the question period.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I agree that probably we ask too many supplementary questions, but the minister will not answer. There are only two possible routes, either by tanker or by pipeline. Why does he not say which position the government is taking?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: I have tried to be as clear and as firm in my answer as is possible at present. I hope the hon. gentleman agrees with me that if we are going to agree to the building of a pipeline down the Mackenzie we should meet the requirements of the ecology. I hope we can meet our economic requirements and I hope we will have to give up as little as possible. If he does not agree with that, he should say so.

PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—CONSULTATIONS WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I want to ask the minister a supplementary question. Can he give any indication as to when consultations with United States authorities may be held?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I would think this would take place as soon as it is convenient to both sides. I expect it will start very soon.

Inquiries of the Ministry

YOUTH

CANCELLATION OF CONFERENCE SPONSORED BY CANADIAN COUNCIL ON SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): My question is for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the conference on services to transient youth and student summer unemployment scheduled for March 14, 15 and 16, has been cancelled because of the lack of federal government assistance, can the Acting Prime Minister say why the government has made this unexpected decision at such a late date and what alternatives the government is considering?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): As I said in reply to some questions the other day, the government has been consulting with the provinces about a program for student employment. It seemed to us that the conference that was to be held might be a very useful affair, but we did not think that it would be a good use of the taxpayers' money to finance it.

Mr. Nystrom: Can the Acting Prime Minister say whether or not this decision was made in light of the fact that the government feared there might be destructive criticism at the conference?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Can the Acting Prime Minister indicate whether or not, in consultation with the Canadian Council on Social Development earlier, the government had in fact asked that this conference be postponed for one month in order that it could actively participate and support this conference in March?

Mr. Sharp: I think this question should be directed to the minister concerned. I did not participate in the decision-making.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In light of the fact that this important conference on transient youth and student summer employment, a subject in which the government has professed interest in the past two weeks, is of major importance, there seems to be some conflict in the information that has been given the House with respect to the question, and I wonder—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member kindly ask his supplementary question?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Would the Acting Prime Minister agree to table the correspondence between the government and the Canadian Council on Social Development with respect to this conference in order that the full facts of the situation might be known?

Mr. Sharp: I can assure the hon. member that the government has nothing to hide. I will speak to the minister and see if that can be arranged.

[Mr. Sharp.]

URBAN AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED FINANCIAL AID TO MUNICIPALITIES BECAUSE OF EXTRAORDINARY SNOW REMOVAL COSTS

Mr. Raymond Rock (Lachine): I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Since snowfalls this year in many areas of Canada are at a record high, abnormal, and in many cases catastrophic, would the government consider giving financial aid to municipalities which are overspending their snow removal budgets?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I do not think that the government of Canada would consider that particular request, but let me point out that it is providing indirectly some very substantial assistance which I think will help the municipalities to meet their budgetary expenditures.

HOUSING

STATUS OF MORTGAGE ON ROCHDALE COLLEGE

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): My question is for the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing. On January 21 I asked the minister a question with respect to Rochdale College in Toronto, whether they are behind in their payments and what is the government's intention? The minister replied:

> I will be making a more elaborate statement on that situation in the not too distant future. In the meantime I can advise the House that the mortgagee met the payments in the last three months consecutively.

On February 24 the President of CMHC—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member. The question should be put as briefly as possible, and I hope that the hon. member can ask his question soon.

Mr. Scott: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am coming to the point. On February 24 the President of CMHC told the House of Commons Public Accounts Committee that Toronto Rochdale College is $289,000 in arrears, sufficiently behind for the corporation to take steps—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is not a question. The hon. member is going over the background of the matter which he wishes to bring to the attention of the minister. It seems to me that there must be some way to ask the question in a more succinct fashion.

Mr. Scott: Can the minister inform the House if any action has been taken on this matter?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): This situation involves many jurisdictions. It involves, of course, CMHC and its financial responsibilities. It involves problems of law and order in Toronto. It involves problems of the other creditors of Rochdale. It involves the provincial government. I think it is only responsible that we recognize that unilateral action may not be the wisest course, and indeed consultations with other involved people are going on right now. It is not an easy situation with which to deal. I am aware of the hon. member's concern and sympathize with it. Nobody will be happier than I when I am able to find and announce some wise solution to this problem.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): In view of the statement by the president of CMHC that the arrears on the mortgage are over $250,000 is the minister discussing this very important matter with those who he has indicated are involved with the intention of issuing a writ of foreclosure or of adopting any other legal means whereby the interests of CMHC can be protected?

Mr. Andras: All those kinds of options are being considered.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister whether the agencies involved have discounted the issuance of a writ of foreclosure, and is it the policy of the government not to issue a writ of foreclosure?

Mr. Andras: No such action has been discounted, nor has any precise decision been made along that line up to the moment.

OIL

POSSIBLE MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—DANGER TO WILDLIFE—PROBLEMS IN LAYING LINE ON PERMAFROST

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I would ask him whether the fears which have been expressed publicly by officials of the wildlife service about the dangers to the wildlife of the north if oil or gas pipelines are built down the Mackenzie Valley have been communicated, and whether steps have been taken to make available the information which his officials have to the National Energy Board, or to anybody else who will be dealing with this question if an application to build a pipeline is made?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we are giving this matter very serious consideration and at the present time there exist a couple of public servants committees representing the various departments concerned, such as the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, my own department and others to insure that there will be concerted action and that no mistake will be made in the development of the final policy.

In August, my colleague and myself have outlined the general principles which will prevail in the construction of a pipeline in the Canadian north and we are still studying this problem. There are consultations taking place at all administrative levels in this respect.

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: As a supplementary question I would like to ask the minister whether his officials are studying the problems involved in the laying of a pipeline on permafrost, because my information is that very little research has been done on that problem?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that it is exact to say that there was no research. Many people from Canada, the United States as well as Europe came to Inuvik to see the research performed in this field on permafrost, but also on the effect which the construction of a pipeline would have on the movement of wild animals in the north. All those matters are studied by department officials and the House can rest assured that they will provide all relevant information when final guidelines become available.

[English]

POSSIBLE MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—COMPENSATION TO INDIANS

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, will the Candian government be taking the same position with respect to compensation for the lands of the Indian peoples, over which a pipeline will possibly be travelling, as is being taken by the United States government?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary to proceed always according to the methods used by the Americans. In Canada, we can find original formulas and that is one of the problems that concern us. I am sure we will be able to find a solution that will satisfy Indians and Eskimos and will meet the economic needs of Canada.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Will the minister say whether the Canadian native peoples will be compensated for their lands over which any pipeline travels?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think it is possible to establish a corridor that would not be detrimental to the native population of the North.

Besides, the famous columnist of Old Crow, Josie Edith, said that at this time most of the people of Old Crow are working for the companies—

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—MEASURES TO COMPENSATE PRODUCERS FOR LOSSES

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

As the price of powdered milk and cheese was increased as of February 8, 1971, and as the powdered milk and cheese in storage at that date were sold at the former price, can he tell us whether the producers will receive some compensation or whether the processing industries or the CDC will be the only ones to benefit from the increase?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, so far as those stocks that are held by the Canadian Dairy Commission are concerned, I should advise that any gain in the value of that inventory would be used for the purposes of the Dairy Commission. However, any increase in the value of privately owned stocks would accrue to whoever holds that stock.

BUTTER IMPORTS FROM NEW ZEALAND

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question.

In view of the huge quantities of butter we import from New Zealand, and the overproduction in Canada, does the minister intend to revise the policy on imports of dairy products and by-products, in order to give Canadian products the priority on the domestic market?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, obviously the hon. member has been misinformed because we do not import any quantity of butter from New Zealand, and indeed have not placed an order with New Zealand since September, 1968.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

NORTHERN QUEBEC—TRANSFER OF ESKIMOS TO PROVINCIAL JURISDICTION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

In view of the Dorion report on the integrity of the Quebec territory, with regard to Indians and Eskimos, presented to the premier of Quebec on March 3, and recognizing that that report suggests to the Quebec government that it should exercise a jurisdiction in so far as Eskimos and their territory are concerned, and that certain treaties should be signed with the approval of the federal government, may I ask the minister whether he will urge the government to carry out the recommendations of the Dorion report respecting provincial policy?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I received no official copy of that report. However, I have read myself the newspaper reports on that matter.

We have to face two very great difficulties in this field. First of all, we must confer with the Indians who are interested, and then we must take into account the provisions of section 92 which state that legislation concerning Indians and Indian lands comes under federal jurisdiction. We will have to reckon with the Constitution and this will necessitate an amendment which may not be easy to obtain without the consent of the Indians.

Mr. La Salle: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could I ask the minister if Quebec, in the first place, has requested discussions with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and if the minister is willing to meet the provincial authorities?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we are always ready to hold discussions with the Quebec provincial government. I already had some about this and I am prepared to hold others in the future.

TRANSPORT

TRANSFER OF SHIP FROM PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND FERRY SERVICE TO SYDNEY-NEWFOUNDLAND ROUTE—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENT

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport I would direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. Were consultations held between the federal government and the government of Prince Edward Island and the agreement, or at least the acquiescence of that government obtained, before it was decided to transfer the newest, largest, and most important unit of the P.E.I. ferry service, the John Hamilton Gray, from that service to the Sydney-Newfoundland service?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will take notice of that question and bring it to the minister's attention.

Mr. MacLean: Would the Acting Prime Minister ask his colleague, the Minister of Transport, to make a full statement on motions at an early date with regard to the future rearrangement of this ferry service?

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Transport makes this statement on motions, presumably on Monday, would he indicate quite clearly that the services to be maintained between the mainland and Prince Edward Island will be no less than presently enjoyed and, in particular, that the icebreaking facilities, so important to the ferry service in the winter, will be assured?

HOUSING

REDUCTION OF INTEREST RATE ON NHA SECTION 40 LOANS

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (St. Boniface): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to assure you that the people of western Canada have a lot of patience and can stand up many times before being recognized. We are always living in anticipation that one day someone will pay attention to us and hear some of our pleas.

An hon. Member: We are all with you. Come on over.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I do not need to go over there I can stand here and be heard as well. I wish to ask the minister responsible for housing whether the CMHC intends to take any action to reduce its section 40 interest rate, since the banks have reduced their NHA rates recently?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): I certainly hasten to respond to one of the eloquent spokesmen for western Canada. The answer is yes, I expect there will be an announcement by the CMHC today to the effect that the section 40 interest rate on loans will be reduced to 8¾ per cent.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Will that reduction apply in the case of existing mortgages?

Mr. Andras: The standard practice will prevail with regard to mortgages in train. What is done will depend very much on the state of advance or the state of commitment on them.

ACCESS TO CONSTITUENTS AT MARCONI OPERATION BY NORTHWEST TERRITORIES COUNCILLOR

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Yesterday the minister cut me off at the pass, but I have the nerve to try again. Will the hon. gentleman investigate the reason a Northwest Territories elected councillor was denied access to those of his constituents who live and work on a Marconi contract site at Resolute Bay? Further, will he ensure that councillors will have the opportunity of gaining access to their constituents so that the concept of Arctic sovereignty is not restricted?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): As I recall it, the hon. member asked about access to a ballistic missile early warning site and I pointed out there are no such sites in Canada. If he would like to provide me with details of any complaint he may have, I would be glad to investigate.

URBAN AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF MINISTRY

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the minister in charge of housing.

In view of the statement he made in the House today to the effect that consultation mechanisms will be established with junior governments, could he assure us that the government will not consider creating a ministry of urban affairs shortly or in the near future?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): The intention of the government is clearly stated in the Speech from the Throne. It will be establishing a ministry of state for urban affairs. The whole problem at the moment is that opposition members are not permitting the passage of the organization bill.

FORUM FOR DISCUSSION OF LITHWICK REPORT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I should like to address a supplementary question to the minister. Earlier he expressed the hope that the Lithwick report would lead to public discussion. I would respectfully ask what machinery he intends to use to initiate such public discussion. Does he envisage such discussion will take place within the confines of a standing committee on urban affairs or will it take place in a joint committee? I would appreciate the minister telling us just what he has in mind in this regard.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): I shall be in a much better position to answer that kind of question and take that kind of action when the opposition allows me to become legitimate in this role.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder whether we might not go on to another subject. However, if the hon. member for Hamilton West feels he should ask a supplementary I will recognize him.

Mr. Alexander: I am wondering why the minister cannot be a little kinder to us in the opposition and do his best to answer a simple question. I do not think the question I asked had anything to do with the creation of a ministry of state. The minister already has ideas about what he wants to do. What machinery does he contemplate using to initiate the public discussion which he desires of this important report? Would he kindly advise the House whether he has in mind a standing committee? Just what does he have in mind? It is a simple question.

Mr. Andras: I think the first move in the creation of such machinery would be, as I suggested, the establishment of a ministry of state for urban affairs.

DIFFICULTY OF LAYING PIPELINES ON PERMAFROST—INVESTIGATION OF RUSSIAN PRACTICE

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): My question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Having regard to the difficulty involved in laying pipelines on permafrost, has the minister, in his research, contacted his opposite number in the Soviet Union with a view to finding out what is done in that country? Further, would he recommend or approve a visit by the northern affairs committee so that its members could see for themselves what methods are used?

Inquiries of the Ministry

POST OFFICE

REOPENING OF CERTAIN POST OFFICES

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): I should like to direct my question to the minister responsible for the Post Office. Having regard to the large number of complaints about rural route mail service in areas where post offices were closed in the last year, will the minister reopen such post offices when requested to do so by a large majority of the residents concerned?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister without Portfolio): I would have to consider exactly what is meant by that question. I have received many requests to reopen post offices. My immediate answer would be that we do not intend to reopen post offices. Nevertheless, we will look at cases where people are suffering hardship because of the loss of post offices in circumstances in which an alternative service is not in fact replacing the post office.

Mr. Stewart (Marquette): At the time these post offices were closed the department said it was on a one year trial basis. In these circumstances, would the minister not reconsider his decision?

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): I do not remember that, Mr. Speaker.

FISHERIES

PREVENTION OF FISHING BY FOREIGN DRAGGERS INSIDE 12-MILE LIMIT

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister say that as of today the fishing nations which have had traditional rights within the 12-mile zone mentioned by the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry are not permitted to fish inside that 12-mile limit?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The statement made by the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry speaks for itself. I think it was clear on that point. If it was not, perhaps I can take a look at this particular question, but I believe it was answered by the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry in his statement this morning.

Mr. Lundrigan: Surely to goodness, the minister can tell us whether these countries can fish inside the zone. After all, he is the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Having looked over the minister's statement, if indeed he has seen it, can he tell us whether Canada is prepared to take unilateral action to enforce the law and to exact penalties if it is broken?

Mr. Sharp: I can only make the reply which the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry himself made, which is that action of that kind might not further the over-all interests of Canada or, indeed, of the fishermen of Newfoundland.

[Mr. Thomson.]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPLACEMENT FOR ARGUS MARITIME PATROL AIRCRAFT

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. In connection with the negotiations going on with various companies concerning a replacement for the Argus maritime patrol aircraft, I should like to ask the hon. gentleman whether the interesting offer from the Boeing Aircraft Company of which he spoke yesterday consists of delivering Boeing air frames for modification in Canadian aircraft plants?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): I should point out that Boeing has made no offer as such. What we have received amounts, really, to a proposal concerning a method by which the 707 aircraft might be adapted for use as a long-range maritime patrol aircraft.

Mr. Rowland: Is it any part of such a proposal that this adaptation should take place in Canadian aircraft plants?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The preliminary question to be decided is whether this aircraft, which was constructed primarily as a long-range transport, can be modified so as to possess the hover-on-site capability possessed by the Argus. We would have to solve the technical questions involved in the use of the aircraft in this role before we could get down to any specifics as to construction.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY TO DISBANDING OF COMMONWEALTH COMMITTEE ON INDIAN OCEAN SECURITY

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): I wish to adress a question to the Acting Prime Minister. It concerns what might be called the still-born child of the Singapore conference, the standing committee on security in the Indian Ocean. Bearing in mind the growing number of resignations from this group, can the minister advise us whether a decision has been made by the remaining members to hold a meeting? Will the committee be disbanded, or is Canada waiting until all the other members drop out?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say to the hon. member that we have no intention of taking any initiative to drop out of the committee. We considered that it was a useful initiative, and we still think so. However, I am satisfied that the committee will not meet. Too many countries have now indicated their intention to drop out of this committee, and a meeting would not be in accordance with the purposes of the Singapore conference.

URBAN AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF MINISTRY—POSITION OF PROVINCES

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of the subject of my question, as well as the importance of its constitutional aspect, I will put my question in English because the minister responsible for housing may not understand my French. May I ask the minister if the government intends to set up a ministry of urban affairs without the consent of the provinces?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, this subject has been under consultation with all the provinces—I repeat, all the provinces. In the discussions about the formation of a ministry of state for urban affairs and housing, we have found no one who has suggested that this would be improper.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if he has discussed this matter with the province of Quebec, and whether the province of Quebec expressed to the minister its opposition to the setting up of such a ministry?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, their views have been communicated to us. I think the sensitivity of the situation has been recognized by the type of institution, a ministry of state for urban affairs and housing, which we are contemplating and about which I may have more to say in more detail when the government organization bill is back in the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the minister a question along the same lines.

Would he tell the House whether Quebec has given an affirmative answer and how many provinces have answered that they were in favour of this project to establish a department?

[English]

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I thought I had indicated that none of the provinces have responded in the negative.

INDUSTRY

JAME MANUFACTURING COMPANY—MEASURES TO PREVENT CLOSING

Mr. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is absent, I will direct my question to his Parliamentary Secretary.

Would he tell us if steps have been or will be taken to prevent closure of the shirt factory in Saint-Denis-sur-Richelieu, that is the Jame Manufacturing Company, which is being forced to cease operations because of the large number of imported shirts to be found on the Canadian market?

Yukon Minerals Act

[English]

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there have been difficulties, as the hon. member knows, with a number of shirt factories in Canada. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is discussing and examining each case and, where necessary, references have been made to the Textile and Clothing Board for specific examination.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, my question was direct. It does not need such an elaborate answer. I just want to know if specific measures have been taken or will be taken in this special case in order that this manufacturer will not close up shortly.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, measures under the regulations and under the legislation are taken for the industry as a whole and not for a specific factory. In this context, the remedy must be applied on an over-all basis.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I have a non-controversial question which I wish to direct to the attention of the Acting Prime Minister.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Watch out.

Mr. Mather: Could he say what consideration the government is giving at this time to selling to the United States a basic, renewable Canadian resource, snow?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

YUKON MINERALS ACT

ADMINISTRATION, ACQUISITION AND RECORDING OF CLAIMS, ETC.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that Bill C-187, respecting minerals in the Yukon Territory, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it one o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I now leave the Chair and the House will resume at two o'clock.

[English]

The House will resume its work at two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacLean: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps I might be permitted to ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council to state what the business will be on Monday.

Mr. Jerome: Yes, Mr. Speaker. On Monday we propose to call as the first order of business the report stage of Bill C-182 concerning statutory instruments. If debate on that measure is completed, the second order of government business will be the report stage of Bill C-215 respecting the Textile and Clothing Board.

YUKON MINERALS ACT

ADMINISTRATION, ACQUISITION AND RECORDING OF CLAIMS, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-187, rejecting minerals in the Yukon Territory, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, before I open my remarks on Bill C-187, I wish to indicate to the House that I had the honour and privilege of being in the Yukon for the Sour Dough Rendez-vous last week. I enjoyed once more the warm hospitality of the people of the Yukon and I must say that this annual festival re-creates this so exciting period of the Klondike gold rush for all Yukon residents.

I was fortunate to be accompanied on this trip by a symbolic personality of Quebec City, Bonhomme Carnaval, who during these activities showed the people of the Yukon that the carnival spirit of their region was indeed very good, but certainly not better than that of Quebec. In fact, I think events such as this should be mentioned in the House, for they indicate that such exchanges between East and West and between South-east and North-west are most commendable. Therefore I would like to thank the people in Whitehorse and more especially the authorities for their warm hospitality.

Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure today of introducing in this House a piece of legislation which amounts to a revision of the Yukon Quartz Mining Act which was passed by Parliament on July 23, 1924 and which governs the acquiring and managing of mining rights on Yukon hard rocks.

The act was written to a large extent along the same pattern as the regulation on franchising quartz mines on federal land in Manitoba and the Northwest Territories, including the provisional district of the Yukon, and that regulation had been adopted by order in council dated March 21, 1898.

The 1924 act has been only slightly amended since then, the last instance dating back 18 years ago.

In recent years, newly-developped processes and techniques for mining research and exploration activities have been in use. Owing to this progress, it has become increasingly obvious that the present Yukon Quartz Mining Act is obsolete and an obstacle to the potential economic expansion of the Yukon territory.

Several sections of this act are obsolete and lack clarity. I think the existing legislation does not allow for adequate management of the mining rights on quartz nor does it promote through more suitable means the exploration and development of the Yukon's large mining resources.

The concession of rights for the development and operation of mining resources by the Crown no longer brings to the latter a reasonable financial return, especially if we compare it to royalties levied in other mining areas in Canada. The existing act does not provide for the application to mining operations of existing land use regulations for the protection of nature in the Yukon.

The proposed bill is therefore a complete review and up dating of the Yukon Quartz Mining Act which will give way, if this new bill is passed, to a new text entitled the Yukon Minerals Act.

The primary objective of this bill is implementation of long-overdue changes to legislation on purchase and operation of minerals in the Yukon. The bill not only provides for more efficient local management but also for some new measures to stimulate the mining industry which is already flourishing in the Yukon.

The following are some of the main changes made in the act.

First of all, the elimination of the limit set on the number of claims which can be staked by an individual, which was formerly eight claims within a radius of 10 miles.

Second, the possibility for companies habilitated to operate in the Yukon to stake claims by proxy.

Third, the possibility of using a mound of stone instead of wooden legal posts in areas where there are no trees.

Fourth, the possibility of selling, before the staking out of a claim, metallic tags to be fastened to legal posts at the time of the staking out;

Fifth, the increase from 16 to 36 of the number of claims allowed to be grouped for the performance of representation work.

Sixth, the possibility of accepting as representation work any work other than material done at any time of the claim period.

Seventh, the possible authorization of representation work done on a claim after its staking out, but before its registration.

Eighth, the possibility for the Governor in Council to grant a lease of an initial duration of more than 21 years, if it is justified by special circumstances.

Ninth, the simplification of necessary formalities to obtain a mining lease.

Tenth, the possibility of deducting prospection and preliminary work expenses in calculating operating mines royalties, and also the possibility of receiving an allowance for the processing of the ores, as is already the case in some provinces as well as in the Northwest Territories.

In addition to the changes I have just mentioned, the text of the act was completely revised to take into account modern techniques of prospection and mining. The mention of firemen, horses and fodder, in the present act, is now obsolete and has been done away with in the new text. These changes are, on the whole, the result of a series of recommendations that were thrashed out, at meetings, by my associates and the representatives of the mining industry in the Yukon who made the proposals. The latter formed a joint commission to which participated the Chambers of Mines for the Yukon and British Columbia.

• (2:10 p.m.)

[English]

Another objective of the bill is to ensure a more realistic financial return to the Crown in exchange for minerals mined. It is proposed to increase the royalty rates applicable in the Yukon to a level comparable with those presently in force in some of the other provinces, such as Quebec. But they still will remain lower than in British Columbia or Ontario. While Quebec has a sliding scale similar to the one proposed for the Yukon, the Yukon rate would still be slightly lower than Quebec's, which imposes a 15 per cent royalty at the $4 million level as compared with the proposed Yukon maximum of 15 per cent on a net value of output of $5 million. The royalty rates proposed for the Yukon are lower, particularly with respect to small mines, than those levied in British Columbia, which are based on a flat rate of 15 per cent above $10,000, or Ontario's which are 15 per cent on everything over $50,000.

I should mention that most provinces have increased their royalty rates in recent years while the royalty rates in the Yukon have not been revised since 1928. The government has a responsibility to ensure that the people of Canada—including northerners—are paid at an economically sound rate for their nonrenewable resources. The government is very conscious of this responsibility and is fully determined to discharge it. Royalties in this instance ought not to be disproportionately below levels in other parts of Canada. The north is not the only place in Canada where mines operate in remote and isolated places and in difficult climates. British Columbia and Quebec, for example, have many mines which prosper under conditions no less difficult than those in the Yukon.

Under the existing royalty scale, returns to the public clearly are inadequate. Mining production in the Yukon in 1968 was $21 million. Royalties were only $45,000. In 1969 production had risen to $38 million and royalties paid by the six producing mines were still only $245,000. Even the new rates would still yield less than $1 million.

Another change to the act establishes that production expenses are exclusive of taxes payable or paid on the profit of a mine when calculating royalty payable under the act.

Regarding Canadian ownership and participation requirements, you will note that such provisions are being included in the new act. This will ensure that new mines in the Yukon meet reasonable requirements of Canadian ownership. Similar provisions already exist in the Canadian mining regulations which apply in the Northwest Territories and in the oil and gas regulations which apply to both territories. The provisions to which I refer stipulate that mineral leases may be issued only to Canadian citizens or companies that are incorporated in Canada. The provisions are not retroactive and will apply only to new claims or to existing claims which change ownership after the new act comes into effect. I should emphasize that the new decision at this time to include the Canadian participation provisions does not reflect or in any way anticipate the outcome of the general review of foreign ownership now being undertaken by the government.

I might add that some misunderstanding seems to have arisen concerning the Canadian participation provisions in that 50 per cent Canadian ownership would be required in all cases. This is not so. It should be remembered that the provisions would not apply during the claim stage, but only for actual production when leases must be acquired. Also the basic requirement is that all companies acquiring leases must be incorporated in Canada and must ensure that Canadians have an opportunity to participate in the financing and ownership of the company. If a company is listed on a Canadian stock exchange, this requirement is met, and the specific percentage ownership applies only to private companies, where the stock is not widely distributed or available for purchase.

Fears have also been expressed that it would be difficult to raise risk capital as a result of the introduction of these provisions. Our experience in the Northwest Territories where similar provisions were introduced in 1961 does not bear this out. For example, there have been three major staking rushes and the number of claims staked annually has risen from an average of 2,000 to an average of 20,000, with a peak of 44,000 in 1968. The value of mineral production has increased from $25 million annually to $125 million for the same period.

Another feature of this bill is to require the approval of the Governor in Council for the export of any mineral or ore from the territory. In so far as currently producing mines are concerned, we will, of course, take steps to accommodate existing sales contracts. Future export approvals will be reviewed on an individual basis; the intent being not to inhibit mineral development and the sales of minerals abroad, but to encourage additional processing within the territory where feasible and to encourage attendant secondary industries. The building of smelting facilities in the Yukon would undoubtedly help the economy by creating employment for perhaps several hundreds of people and at the same time provide additional revenue for both governments.

I would also point out, Mr. Speaker, that there are provisions in the bill for the Governor in Council to establish regulations to bring into effect the purposes and provisions of the act. Section 102 of the bill details the circumstances under which regulations may be made and you will note that these are mainly administrative or having to do with fees and rentals. While such regulations will be mainly administrative, I am aware that the industry wishes to be consulted before they are introduced and I am not opposed to this process of consultation, or indeed, to the inclusion in the bill of suitable provision for this.

I might add that it is the intention of the government when these regulations are promulgated, to raise fees associated with leases and to increase lease rentals to a level approximating those in other jurisdictions. These adjustments will not be onerous and will affect only companies. It is not intended, at this time, to increase those fees for recording claims that would affect the individual prospector.

Conservation in Canada's northern territories, Mr. Speaker, is a matter of importance to all Canadians. The government's and my own department's response to this problem is well known and has received widespread support; the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act, the Northern Inland Waters Act, the amendments to the Territorial Lands Act, the reports of the MacKenzie Delta task force on conservation, the close inspection of seismic operations and the development of land-use and wildlife research programs. To enable the government to protect and control the use of the surface of territorial lands within the Yukon, provisions have been made in the bill to make prospecting for minerals, or any work on a mining claim for which a surface lease has not yet been obtained, subject to regulations intended to preserve the delicate ecology of northern Canada. These regulations will be made available in a few weeks. Provision has also been made to facilitate the withdrawal of land from staking for various public purposes as these may be deemed advisable for the public good.

With regard to the regulations I have just outlined, these, of course, will apply to other industries and other facets of activities in the north. The mining industry has expressed concern that such regulations might inhibit development of the Yukon. I would like to assure members that discussions with industry have already taken place and I have every expectation that the regulations in their final form will protect the environment, but will not hamper mineral exploration and development unnecessarily.

Mining in the Yukon is moving ahead at an accelerated pace after stagnating for many years. The late sixties were very good years for the Yukon. The value of mineral production increased from $13 million in 1962 to nearly $38 million in 1969 and to an estimated $80 million in 1970. The decade of seventies appears to be even more promising. Mineral production has trebled in the past two years and is expected to double its present value in the next two.

I am excited by the prospects which now exist in the Yukon. I am excited at the prospects for all the north; and the Yukon especially stands at a new take-off point. This has come about as a result of favourable markets, of the incentives provided for the industry and to no small extent as a result of the government's program of providing infrastructure and special assistance in the north. Transportation facilities, townsite, hydro electric power and direct aids have all had their place in resource development in the Yukon.

The government stands ready to assist in the future as it has in the past. We are accelerating the construction of the Dempster Highway and now plan its completion in 1974. This new road will open many attractive areas of the Yukon for development. We are also studying alternative routes for connecting the Yukon to the continental railway system. Road and rail transportation mean growth of the kind so necessary in the north. They make it possible to develop resource based industries which are needed to provide the amenities of life which everyone expects today.

This newly revised act will bring the regulation of mining up to date and will modernize the legal structure on which mining claims are based. The proposed changes will materially assist mineral development in the Yukon and they will provide for a more realistic return to the public. The bill will have far reaching consequences for the Yukon. I have asked, therefore, the chairman of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development to consider holding hearings in the territory. I believe northern residents should be heard. They must have a voice in what affects their future. They must also be directly involved, and given that opportunity to be involved, in what is happening in their part of the country.

Since first reading was given to this bill on November 9, 1970, I have received several representations from the Yukon's mining industry, from territorial residents and from other concerned people. This bill is not perfect and I do not say that it must remain precisely and exactly as drafted. When representations are based on new information, when they bring a viewpoint which was not available at an earlier date, we are fully prepared to look a second time, or a third, at the proposals. The bill should be amended if there are substantive reasons for amendment. From representations that have already been made to the government, I agree there are substantive reasons for amending the royalty provisions to allow interest payments as deductions in calculating royalty and that such royalties should be computed only on ore actually sold in any given year. I would also agree there should be additional provision for appeal from the decisions of government or an official, specifically in cases of claim concellations and increased royalty assessment.

The government will give careful consideration to any further proposals for change. We want any changes to be improvements. We want any changes that are made to be based on sound and reasoned judgment, but we are not opposed to change if it can be shown that change is in the best interest of the Yukon's mining industry and of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it was a pleasure to introduce this legislation. I hope that it will show the House the progress we made these recent years.

As far as economic and social progress is concerned, I feel that the Yukon can anticipate a future perhaps better than ever, because the basis of its economy is ever more varied owing to the different minerals which have been discovered and to other possibilities like the development of the lumber industry and, a very promising factor, the ever expanding tourist industry.

The Yukon is a marvelous place to visit and I hope that Canadians who want to know a place where the air is fresh, where pollution is at a minimum will visit the Yukon and perhaps also the Northwest Territories. This will give all Canadians the opportunity to realize that Canada is a young country and that 40 per cent of its territory is hardly at the primary stage of an extraordinary development. I hope that all Canadians will be willing to work together in order to ensure that the development of the North, and especially of the Yukon, will be a considerable asset not only for ourselves but also for our children and for future generations.

[English]

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, we were very happy to have the minister with us during our celebrations in respect of the Yukon sourdough rendezvous. One thing for which we in the Yukon are noted is our hospitality, but even that invariable hospitality could not possibly have hidden from the minister the deep and bitter resentment of all Yukoners with whom he spoke about the introduction of this legislation, about the land use and other regulations made under federal statutes which he has mentioned. He knows from the previous representations he has received from the people that they do not want this legislation, with its objectionable features. He knows, by and large, the opinion of the Yukon people and of industry, not only in the Yukon but also in British Columbia, Alberta and Toronto, because he has received representations. He has been told that the good features of this bill should be retained in the form of amendments to the Yukon Quartz Mining Act, but that these good features are far outweighed by the attempt of this government to assume complete state control over the mining industry in the Yukon. I hope to prove that point as I go along. I hope to bolster it, not only with the views I express, but also with those expressed by organizations and individuals in the two western provinces, as well as in the two territories.

The minister has camouflaged his attempt to minimize the effect of these objectionable features of the bill by placing emphasis on the less important features of the bill, not less important per se but less important in relative terms. He says that new techniques make the existing Yukon Quartz Mining Act out of date. He says the present act limits the development of the mineral industry in the north. How can he, out of one side of his mouth, say with pride that there has been greatly increased mineral production in the Yukon, almost double normal production last year, and at the same time say that the Yukon Quartz Mining Act which governs that development is limiting development in the north. I suggest to him his argument is specious in that regard. He says the existing Yukon Quartz Mining Act does not allow effective management of mines. If he is speaking of effective management of mines by the private entrepreneurs who manage those mines, he is being critical of the management of private industry. But I do not think that is what he meant.

I think the minister meant that the existing Yukon Quartz Mining Act, because of its lack of facility for state control, limits effective mining in the Yukon by the government. He, therefore, attacks this in his bill by introducing the sort of stifling and suffocating provisions to allow bureaucratic control of the industry and then ties it all in with an all-embracing regulatory power. This regulatory power is not so innocuous as he would have members believe because of nine sections in the act only three relate to fees and rent. He says the existing Yukon Quartz Mining Act makes no provision for the protection of the environment. That is not in keeping with the fact. If the minister were familiar with the Yukon Quartz Mining Act, he would not make such statements. We all agree it is essential to protect the delicate ecology of the north. Large tracts of land in the Yukon do not fall within the category of what one might term a delicate ecology.

I have said the minister's statement that the existing Yukon Quartz Mining Act does not provide for the protection of the environment is not true. Now, I should like simply to point out to him that one of the sections, Section 72(1), which provides him with the power now to govern the manner in which the surface of the land over which the mineral claims are staked is used, gives him the power to direct that the surface of a mineral claim shall be used pretty well as he sees fit. There are other sub-sections of Section 72 which provide that the mining operation can only occupy the surface, and just so much of it as is essential for the purpose of its mining operations. There are other other similar sections in the act. He says the new bill will allow more effective management. Well, if one accepts my argument of a moment ago that private industry is doing a pretty efficient job of management, since otherwise there would not have been the greatly increased production we see today in the Yukon, one can only assume the minister means that the new bill will allow more effective management by the government. It will certainly do that. The clauses in the new bill provide broad and sweeping, almost limitless powers, to officials in the department and to the minister himself. As the bill now stands, there is only the rare clause that provides for any appeal to the judicial process.

The minister says that the new bill provides incentives. I have looked over that bill pretty carefully and I cannot see any provision of incentives to the mining industry. Indeed, there has not been one of the dozen or more briefs that I have read, copies of which the minister and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) have received, that has not cried out against the oppressive clauses in the bill. When the minister speaks of incentives, therefore, he is inaccurate.

Then, the minister went on to list the ten relatively minor improvements to the Yukon Quartz Mining Act, and they certainly are improvements. Nobody is going to argue that the removal of staking limits is not an improvement, nor will anyone argue that staking by proxy is not an improvement or that staking by stone cairns on top of a 7,000 or 8,000 foot mountain is not an improvement over carrying up or flying in stakes in great numbers. Nor is anyone going to argue that our taxing provisions are not out of date and that the provisions in the new bill are an improvement over the Yukon Quartz Mining Act. Similarly, the increase in grouping the remaining provisions which the minister pointed out in his remarks is also an improvement. But these are only minor improvements in relative terms.

He asked the House to believe that the new royalties provisions for the Yukon are more favourable than are those in Quebec or those in British Columbia, yet he has received submissions from the organizations in British Columbia, in the Yukon and in Toronto that this is not the case at all. He speaks of the rate of royalties which indeed, in the manner in which he has explained it to the House, appear to be more favourable in the Yukon than in existing legislation elsewhere. However, he refrained from informing the House that if one examined carefully the subsections of the royalties provisions in the new bill one would find that there were all sorts of broad discretionary powers given to the minister, and one would also find that the allowable deductions with respect to royalties are not as generous as those elsewhere.

The minister said also that the government has a responsibility to ensure that the people of Canada, including northerners, are paid at an economically sound rate for their non-renewable resources. I wonder how many times he has heard those northerners whom he would like to include as participating in this kind of revenue cry out to partake not only in the revenues that are raised in the Yukon but in the manner in which they are spent. He said also that the north is not the only place in Canada where there are remote mines, that there are places just as remote and isolated as the mining operations in the Yukon. But he neglected to point out to the House that there are none more remote from the markets of the world with which our product has to compete. He failed to point out that our transportation problems, in the Yukon are far more difficult than those in any other comparable area of Canada. He also failed to point out, and this is a big factor when one is considering royalties, that in the Yukon the costs on the average are between 25 per cent and 30 per cent higher than elsewhere. One statistic comes to my mind as a good example, and this goes back eight years. The average annual production of United Keno Hill Mines used to fluctuate between $12 million and $15 million, and what was left of this after paying the costs of production, transportation and smelting, was between $1 million and $1.5 million. There is a comparison which he can stack up against the mines of the more southerly areas of Canada.

Then I had to sit back and listen to the irony of the minister's remarks with respect to mining production in the Yukon. He said that in 1968 it amounted to $21 million, and the royalties were only $45,000. He said that in 1969 production had risen to $38 million and the royalties paid by the six producing mines were still only $245,000. Not long ago we were debating changes to the Yukon Act which, if the government had followed the importuning of this House, would have given the people of the Yukon at least the democratic right to determine how the tax money which they were required to raise would be spent. We heard the minister say that the government could not broaden these powers now because the Yukon was not making enough to pay its way. He played down the economic contribution of the Yukon to the national treasury. Now, because it suits him, because the federal treasury wants more money from the producers of the Yukon, he speaks with pride. He tells us how much money is coming out of the mineral production in the Yukon, and this justifies the federal government in taking more. It seems to me that that must be the height of hypocrisy.

He spoke also of the Canadian ownership provisions. I will have a little more to say about that in a moment. There are two very weak points in the ownership provisions in this new bill. One is that if a company is listed on the Canadian stock exchange, under the provisions in the new bill, the requirement of Canadian ownership is met. All one has to do is to list the shares of a foreign company on the Canadian stock exchange. Then, the other requirement relates to a foreign company which is a private company, and unless the stock is widely distributed or available for purchase the provision in the new foreign ownership clauses will not be met. This introduces the element of discretion. Who is going to say whether or not a private company's stock is widely distributed or available for purchase? It is going to be the minister or, at the very most, the Governor in Council. If the minister asks us to believe that this will not hamper the flow of risk capital into this country for the development of our resources, I will say, rubbish. In order to bolster this argument that the new bill is not going to scare away risk capital, because the Canada mining regulations have contained such a clause for many years, he cited the development in the Northwest Territories. He pointed out the difference in the great increase in the number of claims that have been staked and the great increase in the annual production in the Northwest Territories. But he refrained from saying what part was played in that increase in staking activity, and what part was played in that increase in production, by foreign risk capital. If one were to analyse the situation before the introduction of the Canadian mining regulations, and the situation in the years following their introduction, one might have a fairer idea whether or not the Canadian mining regulations foreign ownership clause did inhibit foreign risk capital coming into the country.

He says that another feature of the bill requires the approval of the Governor in Council for the export of any mineral ore from the territory. If that is not complete and absolute control by the state of the mining industry, I certainly do not know what is. Could the minister inform the House how many of the provinces exercise this power by Governor in Council? Could the minister tell us whether or not the province of British Columbia, or the province of Alberta, or the province of Saskatchewan, or indeed any other province even his own province of Quebec, exercises the power of export control over mineral production in the province? It would be very interesting to hear the answer to that.

And what a prospect this is for existing mines! Here are mines that in some cases, came into production in the Yukon on the basis of an investment in excess of $100 million, with plans laid over the space of three or four years and projected for 20 years. Now, the minister comes along and says that future export approvals will be reviewed on an individual basis, and if he so chooses, or the Governor in Council so chooses to disapprove of any particular mining company exporting ore, he may do so. What a prospect this is for existing producers. I wonder how many of them would have decided to go into production if they had been confronted with such a dictatorial power.

The minister speaks of a smelter improving the economic future of the Yukon. If this is such a great idea why doesn't the government do something about it? Why doesn't the government provide real incentive, and cooperate with private industry by establishing a smelter in the Yukon? The minister knows that has been the cry there for a good many years, and not only there but by organizations such as the British Columbia Chamber of Mines in Vancouver, as well as the Alberta Chamber of Mines in Edmonton. The minister says that if a smelter were constructed there would be hundreds of new jobs. He says that perhaps several hundreds of people would find new jobs. I can tell him, and he has received briefs from individuals and organizations which support this statement, that the very existence of this bill, the very disclosure of it last November when it was tabled for first reading, has caused all sorts of companies that were planning exploration activities in the Yukon this year to pull back. The general estimate of the Yukon Chamber of Mines, and of the British Columbia Chamber of Mines, is that exploration plans have been pulled back one-third, or that roughly 30 per cent of the dollars that would have gone into exploration activities in the Yukon this year are going elsewhere because of the existence of Bill C-187 and the land use regulations.

Mr. Woolliams: And the white paper on taxation.

Mr. Nielsen: The white paper on taxation is another matter, and it is the prime reason for the introduction of the amendment which I will be introducing shortly. Then, the minister speaks of the regulatory power. The Yukon Quartz Mining Act has been with us in the Yukon for almost half a century, with no regulatory power, and yet we have made the astounding progress in mineral development that we have. Now, the minister wants the House to believe that, because of the introduction of a new regulatory power, all of a sudden we are going to experience even more progress and development; that is garbage.

All the government wants by the introduction of that regulatory power is more control, more say over how the mines are going to be operated, more say over how much they are going to produce, and more say as to where their production is going to go. The minister says these are mainly administrative matters, having to do with rents and fees. Out of the nine subclauses only three have that import. The minister speaks about consultation. The minister has listened. He has listened to the members of the Yukon Chamber of Mines talking about consultation, consultation which he promised but did not initiate.

Mr. Chrétien: I met them personally last week.

Mr. Nielsen: Yes, the minister met them personally at the airport, with placards and a demonstration.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is not too familiar with the situation. He was not at the airport. There were no placards. There was a good group of Scottish pipers, and it was a welcome such as I never received anywhere else in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: All I can say is that the minister does not know a placard from a babpipe.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker. on a question of privilege—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is the minister rising on a point of order?

Mr. Chrétien: On a point of order, in travelling from Ottawa I met far more people in the Yukon last weekend than the hon. member. I do not know why he had to hide.

Mr. Nielsen: The minister does not know a point of order from an objection to the remarks I am making. Speak to Mr. Hunt. Speak to the other officials who went up there to speak to the Yukon Chamber of Mines. Look at the pictures on the front page of the Whitehorse Star, where the placards are displayed for all to see. The Yukon Chamber of Mines organized a demonstration for the specific purpose of bringing home to the minister and his officials the fact that this bill was objectionable.

The government speaks of government by the people, and the minister knows that 95 per cent of the people in the Yukon object to this bill. Yet he comes to this House and attempts to put across the idea that all is rosy.

Mr. Woolliams: Why doesn't he have a plebiscite if he thinks this is right?

Mr. Nielsen: Plebiscites are not their way of doing things. They are not the Prime Minister's way. He doesn't even consult his cabinet on important decisions.

Then, the minister speaks about licences and fees. I mention just in passing what is now happening in the Yukon under a broad and sweeping change in the licensing and fees provisions of local ordinances, with decisions made in Ottawa funnelled down to the lackey of the minister and funnelled through him to the other two lackeys that he has made of two elected representatives of the people, all under his so-called governmental reform. That is precisely what they are.

An hon. Member: Oh, fuddle duddle.

Mr. Nielsen: The minister says that these land use regulations will have a great effect in the Yukon. Let me tell hon. members that one of the sections in those land use regulations will prevent any of you from driving your automobile, if it weighs over 2,000 pounds, off a public highway and along a non-public trail in the bush. What automobile today, even if it is a little jeep—

Mr. Sulatycky: It's a damned good regulation.

Mr. Nielsen: It's a good regulation, some member in the back says. I wonder if he would identify himself.

Mr. Sulatycky: Keep talking.

Mr. Nielsen: No, he won't identify himself. I invite him to come to the Yukon, and I invite him to try to get off the public highway in a vehicle that weighs less than 2,000 pounds, unless of course he has a bicycle. Now, if the hon. member wishes to stand up and identify himself he may ask a question.

Mr. Osler: He has been here as long as you.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member may ask how I get away from the Yukon. Every day I have been receiving objections from the Yukon Chamber of Mines, from prospectors and others, giving me their complaints and urging me to come down here and lay them before the minister. I am not going to say that the minister, knowing I am back there for that purpose, decided to smuggle this bill in today. I am not going to say that; I would not make such a charge. The minister is a good friend of mine and he explained that the bill was ordinarily to come up—

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member implies that this bill was smuggled in, and he knows this is not so. Full notice was given and it was arranged that this debate would take place when he was here. There was full understanding with the House leaders that there would be no debate unless the hon. member were present. The implication is most unfair.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: I said I was not going to say it, didn't I?

Mr. Francis: I leave it to the readers of Hansard.

Mr. Nielsen: Except for the last part of the government whip's statement, I agree with him. I said I was not going to say anything like that which I did say! The minister says the regulations are intended to preserve the delicate ecology of the north. If the regulations are passed in their present form you will not be able to wear a pair of crampons up the mountain or go across the golf course wearing golf shoes, in case you damage the permafrost. The regulations are too tight. The minister would be aware of the reaction if he had listened when he was in the Yukon. Maybe he was overwhelmed by the hospitality.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is willing to let me comment on that, the regulations were discussed with the people of the Yukon when I met them. I will not apologize for trying to protect the environment of the north. The hon. member should read the other parts of the statement I made recently in Whitehouse to the effect that we should not be so preoccupied with ecological balance as to inhibit development. We can apply good Liberal judgment in this matter and we will have a policy that will not promote either extreme.

Mr. Nielsen: That is correct! I cannot find any fault with what the minister says. However, the regulations are not for the purpose of conservation, nor is this bill for the purpose of conservation. Both of these invidious pieces of legislation are for the purpose of preservation at the expense of development and progress in the mining industry. There is no reason why the two cannot live side by side and hand in hand—but not this way. Conservation yes, but preservation never!

One does not want to create, as is the feeling in the Yukon, British Columbia and Alberta, one huge national park out of the Yukon. There is too much of value, not only to Yukoners but to all Canadians, to do that. We certainly do not want the kind of situation that exists in the park that is in my hon. friend's riding in Banff.

Mr. Chrétien: We have such a good policy in the park that the Liberal member, who is a very good member, was elected in Rocky Mountain in 1968.

Mr. Woolliams: Twenty-six per cent of the vote.

Mr. Nielsen: Now the minister says that the mining industry had been stagnated for several years. I could not agree with him more. Right up to 1958 the mineral industry in the Yukon was stagnating. He speaks of new roads, new incentives, new policies. Almost without exception those policies and incentives were implemented in the years 1958 to 1960. The Dempster Highway was commenced in 1960. The minister speaks with great pride about this "new road", the new Dempster Highway that will open up all sorts of wonderful opportunities. He is right. But I say that when this government took office in 1963, it did not have to drop the road. It was going well as started by the previous government and it would have been completed now. The then Prime Minister and the then Minister of Northern Affairs knew what was going to happen in the north and what did happen at Prudhoe Bay, and now we have the question of the pipeline and all sorts of difficulties with transportation because this government did not have the foresight to carry on with that road. They were pleased to call it the famous road "from igloo to igloo". Those igloos look pretty attractive now!

Let us get the facts straight. The minister says he is excited by the prospect which now exists in the Yukon. We were excited prior to November 9, 1970, when he brought down this bill, but now we are depressed. He says he is excited at the prospects for all the north. We were excited, too, before he brought down this bill, the land use regulations and the plethora of regulations which will smother development in the Yukon. We do not share his view. He, of course, does not mind that depression, being so far away from the Yukon and the north. He says this is a new take-off point. It will be—right over the cliff of disaster—if he does not bring in substantial amendments to this bill.

The minister speaks of amenities in the north and paints a rosy picture of what this bill will achieve in the creation of new production: it will make the land of the north a Utopia for everybody there. He referred to "the amenities of life which everyone expects today". Suddenly the government has taken an interest and has decided to take over power where private capital was prepared to do the job. Private radio was there, private power was there, private TV was there—it was private investment all the way. The minister will find a very marked departure from that if he insists that this bill goes through as it stands.

The minister speaks of directly involving the people. If he wants to do this, let me tell him what the people want. A resolution was forwarded to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on February 12, over the signature of Mr. Van Tassell, president of the Yukon Chamber of Mines. A copy of the resolution was sent to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and to the chairman of the standing committee. This is the voice of the mining industry in the territory. The resolution reads:

> Whereas the heart of the economy of the Yukon depends upon the maintenance of an attractive climate for the infusion of investment capital in the mining industry;
> And whereas several government measures now in existence and pending, such as the land use regulations made under the Territorial Lands Act, the regulations made under the Northern Inland Waters Act, the forestry regulations, the Yukon Minerals Act, the white paper on taxation and others have already seriously retarded investment and exploration activity to an alarming degree;
>
> And whereas Bill C-187, the Yukon Minerals Act, is primarily responsible for a substantial degree of the investment and exploration withdrawal which has and is now taking place in the Yukon with respect to the activities of the mineral industry by reason of the many harmful provisions contained in the said Bill C-187 such as, inter alia, the power to make regulations under the act, the lack of sufficient provisions for judicial appeal, oppressive royalties provisions, the unbridled discretionary powers of the minister and government officials;
> And therefore the Yukon Chamber of Mines resolves unanimously
> That the Prime Minister of Canada be requested to have Bill C-187, the Yukon Minerals Act withdrawn from consideration by the Parliament of Canada and that the Yukon Quartz Mining Act be retained as the statutory code governing the mining and exploration activities in the Yukon.

The position of the Yukon Chamber of Mines with respect to the land use regulations is set out in a two-page document attached to the resolution. I quote the last recommendation as follows:

> We strongly and openly declare that the government has two pronounced choices:
>
> (1) Turn a deaf ear to our proposal of "land usage" in our minerals act and set the Yukon economy back possibly irreparably; or
> (2) Implement our proposal and generate a healthy economic base for the Yukon and a return to the people of faith in the government's wisdom in legislation.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Industry and the people in the Yukon want regulations to be written into statutory form, to provide some basis for long-range planning by the mineral industry. That is not too much to ask. That is the way the mining code operates in the Yukon, and it has not retarded development: in fact, development has increased; it has enjoyed very healthy growth. Let us look at some of the comments of mining companies which have been in communication with the British Columbia and Yukon chambers of mines. One company says:

> Thank you for bringing to my attention the proposed amendments to the Yukon Quartz Mining Act. The proposed section 73 (20), if enacted, will stifle much of the mineral exploration work in the Yukon Territory.
> The problem...is not whether it "would" work in the Yukon under the proposed new regulations, but whether it "could"—

The writer was speaking of the Canadian ownership clause. Another communication from a company engaged in exploration and construction, in part reads as follows:

> If the bill is passed, there could be unfortunate repercussions if Alaska or other states adopted similar legislation.

Another communication reads:

> One would think that times are bad enough with a recession on hand, the uranium closure and Mr. Benson's tax proposals in mind without adding another factor to turn people towards Australia!

Another communication concerning the letter sent by the B.C. Chamber of Mines is as follows:

Received your letter regarding Bill C-187 and after reading it over discovered that a company such as ours cannot explore in the Yukon Territory.

It is unfortunate that the government chose to restrict entry of exploration capital. Our company will be doing mineral exploration throughout Canada, excluding the Yukon Territory.

Another reads:

The developments earlier this year and an extrapolation of further indications of restrictions have led to our decisions to cut back considerably on our initial 1970 budget. The recent blow of the Bill C-187 has now just appeared while we prepare our 1971 budget involving some heavy work commitments under options with Canadian companies.

You will understand that our outlook into our future in Canada is overshadowed with deep concern, as to what restrictions we have to expect next. If there are no signs of an end of the present trend, we may have to reconsider our willingness to invest large sums in Canada, and we may even have to change our mind completely and to dispatch Canada from the list of favourable countries for investments by our large group.

Another reads as follows:

Approximately three years ago, Mr. Chrétien toured Europe in order to stimulate European investment in mineral research and exploration in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. He put special emphasis on the potential of these countries and on the general political stability of Canada. Ever since, all measures taken by the federal government tend to completely modify the climate of the mining industry in Canada: new fiscal legislation, limitation of foreign capital in the Yukon. All these measures tend to discourage foreign companies to invest in the Canadian mining industry which adopts a nationalistic policy like South American and African countries.

With regard to the Yukon, the recent increase of the royalty was already an unfavourable factor and in my opinion not justified considering the high costs of prospecting and mineral exploration in this country. The provisions of Bill C-187 would force us to create new companies to work in the Yukon in order to have Canadian shareholders right from the stage of prospecting.

And so it goes. Another communication reads:

Should this bill be passed and all other factors being equal, I would say that, given two exploration situations of comparable promise in B.C. and the Yukon, we would probably pick the B.C. project over that in the Yukon.

Another reads:

I can see no reason to recommend to my company that we do exploration in the Yukon if Bill C-187 is passed. It does not seem fair that if we take the big gamble on the exploration we should then have to give half of any success out to others who did not also participate in the earlier, high-odds gamble of exploration.

The British Columbia and Yukon chambers of mines sent excerpts of 30 letters to the minister. The last of these perhaps sums up the whole matter:

With respect to Bill C-187, under the conditions imposed by the bill it would effectively shut-out any exploration work that we would have in mind for the Yukon.

That indeed sums it up. We have heard from the industry. How about labour? Next I wish to read a telegram sent to me last January 18, by Teamsters Union, Local 31, Whitehorse, Yukon Territory. It reads:

[Mr. Nielsen.]

Teamsters Union wishes to register our objection to the proposed Yukon Minerals Act Bill C-187 because we believe it would be highly detrimental to the economy and future development of the Yukon Territory and its people. Our members are already feeling the effects of construction postponements due to the pending white paper on taxation and the passage of Bill C-187 would bring about large-scale unemployment to our members as well as economic hardship to every Yukoner connected with mining in the Yukon.

It is signed by Frank Bachmier, business representative. That opinion by labour could be repeated but I will not take up the time of the House in repeating it. I have received several such representations. I shall read one excerpt from a lengthy telegram I received from a company engaged in representation work for the mineral industry in the Yukon. The company, Archer, Cathro & Associates Ltd., is a small one. The telegram is dated February 8 and reads in part as follows:

During 1970 our firm managed mineral exploration programs in Yukon amounting to over seven hundred fifty thousand dollars in addition to a large involvement in casino project most of this money was attracted to Yukon entirely through our efforts and was spent there on goods and services this year our volume of work will likely drop by at least one third and will consist mainly of projects which were committed before first reading of Bill C-187 we now notice a strong reaction against Yukon by prospective clients and fear that we will be unable to find sufficient work in 1971 to maintain our Yukon base we have maintained our Whitehorse headquarters since 1966 and have concentrated our work in Yukon—

They go on to make critical comments about the bill. When the minister was in the Yukon, Jack Webster, the radio personality, asked him to comment on the unemployment predictions which I had made. The minister suggested in his reply that I should prove what I had said. I cite these examples and these telegrams, of which he is aware, as authentication of the statement I have made.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Once previously the Liberal government attempted to do what it is now attempting. At that time a Liberal member opposed the measure. The minister of the day was Mr. Lesage and the member in question was Aubrey Simmons. Some hon. members of the House remember the courageous stand Mr. Simmons took at that time. Although the government was stubborn in insisting on introducing amendments to the Yukon Quartz Mining Act which would have established the power with respect to making regulations for the people of the Yukon, that member was instrumental in having the bill withdrawn, or not proceeded with, after it had been read the first time and after some debate on second reading had taken place. I can do no better than refer hon. members tp Mr. Simmons' speech, to be found in Hansard of May 25, 1955. The debate commenced at page 4097. The motion was put by Mr. Simmons, that the bill be not read the second time, seconded, I believe, by Mr. Green. When Mr. Herridge spoke in support of the stand taken by Mr. Simmons—I might say he was supported by members of the NDP on that stand—he said on May 25, 1955, as recorded at page 4113 of Hansard—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We were CCF in those days.

Mr. Nielsen: And who knows what you will be tomorrow?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We'll be here.

Mr Nielsen: He said:

I can understand the hon. member objecting to any change being made, but I think his main argument on this occasion is that he is speaking for the people of the Yukon and that the government in introducing this legislation has overlooked completely or disregarded completely the wishes of the majority of the people in the Yukon.

That is exactly the situation that exists today—when I speak against these objectionable features of the bill, namely, that 95 per cent of the people in the Yukon are opposed to it. He said further, as reported at page 4114:

That is a massive weight of evidence and a massive weight of opposition against this legislation.

There is similar material in the possession of the minister; letters and telegrams that I cannot possibly read into the record of this debate. He continued:

For the life of me, I cannot understand the minister proceeding with this bill in view of the apparent opposition of the great majority of the people in the Yukon Territory.

The minister says it should be proceeded with in the interest of the mining industry and in the interest of Canada. He knows it is not in the interest of the mining industry. He says it is; the mining industry says it is not. The minister knows that it is not in the interest of the people of the Yukon. He says it is, but the people of the Yukon say it is not.

Surely, in the name of reason neither the minister nor the government would go so far as to say that regardless of what the people in the Yukon and the mining industry think, we shall proceed with this bill and enact it into law. There is an underlying need for cures in areas in which the government has dabbled or fuddle-duddled. There is need for an Arctic waters pollution prevention act, a northern inland waters act and amendments to the Territorial Lands Act. There is need for reform in these areas. However, when you add to Bill C-187 the land use regulations, all the other regulations made under various pieces of legislation, and the white paper proposals, you have a fairly definite pattern emerging. And when added to the CDC bill and other similar policies espoused by the government, one cannot help coming to the conclusion that this government has embarked upon a road which is leading directly to state control, socialism, and nowhere else.

I had to wait for some time to obtain a copy of the recent publication "Pierre Elliott Trudeau, Approaches to Politics". This book was published in 1970. There is a prefatory note to the volume, by Jacques Hébert. This series of articles is published in book form for the first time. I wish to quote an excerpt from article 16, page 76. Mr. Hébert says there is no way that the author of this book has changed his views between the time the articles were written, in and about 1958, and today. He is speaking about humane governments and where they derive their power. He is speaking of benevolent despotism. The author said:

—a benevolent despot might rule wisely, establish a just order for all his subjects, and leave them enough freedom of expression. Would such a regime not be based on the consent of the people?

Yes, this is conceivable. But such consent clearly could not be taken for granted. A mechanism would have to be provided to allow the people to express their opinions freely on the excellence of the regime and the wisdom of the despot. There would also have to be some device to ensure that the despot would abdicate if opinion went against him. And finally—

This is timely:

—a means would have to be invented to designate, peacefully, a successor whom the people would agree to obey.

I think the Prime Minister may have solved that problem.

Mr. Pepin: Don't look at me.

Mr. Nielsen: I am not looking at the minister when I say that. I draw that philosophy to the attention of the House because one must compare the actions of the government with this pattern of legislation. One can only reach the inescapable conclusion that that philosophy is being implemented.

There is no way in which we will defeat the government majority and prevent this bill receiving second reading and being sent to committee. I would like to do that: that is what the people of the Yukon want. However, it seems that the will of the people of the Yukon will be overridden by this government which is intent upon completing this great experiment in socialism in the north. None the less, I make this appeal to the House, as does the mining industry, the prospectors associations, the labour unions and, indeed, all Yukon people: Wait before giving the bill second reading. Wait before referring the bill to committee. Wait until the full impact on the industry and economic fabric of the Yukon and the north as a whole is known after the publication of the white paper, in terms of legislation, which I understand will appear some time toward the end of April.

This legislation cannot be assessed in a vacuum. There is no way in which the impact of Bill C-187 upon the economic fabric of the Yukon can be assessed until after all the combined economic factors have been brought to bear on that economy. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I move:

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"That this bill not now be read a second time, but be read a second time this day six months."

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the two preceding speakers, and I have just heard the motion presented by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). I should like to inform the House that we cannot support the motion. We feel that this bill should go to the committee of the House and that every opportunity should be given to interested groups to appear before the committee in an endeavour to change the legislation if we see fit. I frankly admit that I spent a considerable amount of time on the bill. I believe some changes should be made to the legislation, and the place to make them is in committee rather than killing the bill at this time.

The minister has indicated that even with the new royalty rates that he announced and which will come into effect if this legislation passes, the Canadian government will receive less than $1 million in revenue from all the mineral activity in the Yukon. This seems to me not an excessive amount of income for the Canadian people to expect from this mineral resource. It also seems that in view of federal expenditures on incentives in this area perhaps the royalty rates suggested in the bill are not too far out of line.

Another point I should like to make is that while this legislation applies to the Yukon in general, I feel similar legislation should apply to the whole of the Northwest Territories. I understand that this is one of the major objections causing upset in the Yukon. They feel, quite naturally, that if they are to have excessive royalty rates or royalty rates that are higher than those in surrounding areas, mining companies could well move into the neighbouring Northwest Territories and, as a result, a considerable amount of exploratory investment capital could be lost to the Yukon. I feel that the government should not hesitate to make certain that legislation similar to that which they envisage for the Yukon Territory in the form of this bill should apply to the Northwest Territories.

This bill replaces the Yukon Quartz Mining Act. I believe improvements have been made in various parts of the bill. However, any mining operation in our northern territories is difficult. Costs are always high and conditions, weather and so on, are certainly different from those found in most parts of Canada. I feel that in the committee we could improve the bill having heard the views of all groups affected by the legislation. I trust we will be able to amend those sections of the bill which the minister has indicated he is willing to have changed so long as those amendments do not kill the intent and purpose of the legislation.

My main criticism of the legislation is that once again the federal government has completely ignored Canada's policy in regard to the over-all development of our natural resources. There has been no adequate planning to determine our actual reserves or the demands of the Canadian nation in future years. I feel it is essential that something be done along these lines to ensure that the natural resources which belong to the Canadian people are not depleted to the point where the economy of the nation in years to come is affected. In this respect the federal government has had very little policy in the past and has given practically no direction in the over-all development of the north.

I suggest that one of the main purposes of developing our mineral resources in this area is to provide a base for economic development that would bring both prosperity and stability to northern areas. At present the larger part of the mineral wealth has been staked out by foreign corporations which are using it to supply their foreign-based companies with raw materials. Very little attention has been paid either by these foreign corporations or by the present government to the basic development that is required for the people who live in these areas.

One interesting and important change made by this bill is the increase in royalties over those stipulated in the Yukon Quartz Mining Act. One important point on royalty rates must be stressed. As I mentioned earlier, this royalty scale applies only to the Yukon, whereas I feel it should also apply to the Northwest Territories. These royalties are based on a sliding scale, running from 9 per cent to 15 per cent. The mining companies, particularly the mining promoters, make the usual cry that the new royalty rates will break them. However, an examination of these royalty rates, when viewed in conjunction with the large number of exemptions which the mining companies are able to deduct from their gross profit, indicates there is no doubt that they are still receiving very generous treatment at the expense of the Canadian people. Any mine producing minerals to a value of under $50,000 would pay no royalty. Under the present act the exemption is only $10,000. When we talk about the value of the output we must not forget that it has nothing to do with the gross value of the minerals involved. This is one point that many speakers very carefully neglect to mention when talking about royalty rates and taxes.

The value of the output upon which the royalty scale is based is arrived at after a considerable number of deductions have been allowed. These deductions include, first costs wholly and necessarily incurred for the purpose of operating the mine and processing and marketing the output therefrom to the extent approved by the minister; second, the cost of any research carried on in Canada for the purpose of reducing production costs at the mine, or salvaging additional minerals therefrom to the extent approved by the minister; third, the cost of any exploration work conducted on lands in the territory held or owned by the mine operator, other than at the mine site, not deducted in calculating the value of the output of any other mine. This cost is not to exceed 10 per cent of the gross value of the output of the mine for that year. Fourth, the cost of work on shafts, excavations, drifts, trenches, borings and other mineral exploration and mining development on lands at the mine site; and fifth, for a mine operator who processes ore in the territory there may be deducted an amount equal to 8 per cent of the original cost to that mine operator of the machinery, equipment and buildings in the plant used for the processing of the ore. This amount is not to exceed in any year 65 per cent of the value of the output of the mine before making such deduction. There may also be deducted an annual rate, not exceeding 15 per cent and in the aggregate 100 per cent, of the total expenses incurred by the mine operator prior to the day on which production commenced at the mine in exploring and prospecting for and developing the mine.

When all these deductions, along with the three-year tax exemption on profits which is presently in force, and a number of programs under which mining companies can obtain assistance from the government in northern development, it would appear that an increase in royalties is certainly justified. I might point out that the province of Ontario has placed a flat rate of 15 per cent royalty on all profits over $50,000. They have a total exemption if profits are less than $50,000. The province of Manitoba set the royalty rate at 6 per cent of income less than $50,000, and 15 per cent on total income over $50,000. British Columbia and Quebec have different royalty rates but they are slightly higher than in this act. I might add that the present bill only reaches the 15 per cent royalty rate when the value of the output exceeds $5 million.

Mr. Speaker, I feel the more important aspects of this question lie in what I consider are very grave omissions in the legislation. It is my intention to deal with several of these, and other speakers in our group will no doubt enlarge upon these topics. As I mentioned earlier, there has been lack of adequate research and study into Canada's mineral resources in the north and in the rest of Canada. There has been no adequate research on our future national needs for various minerals, similar to the study by the National Energy Board on oil, gas and coal. In this study, the future demand and supply reserves were estimated, based on probable reserves and projected future production. Our future needs were based on certain premises of what our economic growth, industrial development and trading patterns would be.

It seems, however, that as far as other mineral resources are concerned the Canadian government is pursuing a "head in the sand" type of policy. The government apparently assumes that we have plentiful reserves and that our economic growth and balance of payments depends upon ever-increasing development and sale of our natural resources by whoever can be enticed to exploit them. This is the situation in which we find ourselves today. Our natural resources are being shipped outside our national boundaries in ever-increasing quantities and we in turn are buying back the finished products from the countries which take this raw material.

The tragedy of this policy is that our nation, which is one of the richest in the world, always has a large float of unemployed. Much of this unemployment could be eliminated if we had the foresight to insist upon fabricating a great deal of this raw material within our own nation. This fabrication has not taken place on a large enough scale because of the lack of foresight and planning by the federal and provincial governments, which have allowed the control of our natural resources to pass mainly into the hands of foreign investors.

For every job which is created in the extraction of raw materials for shipment to another nation there are literally hundreds of jobs which the other country can create by processing and fabricating our raw material into manufactured goods. Every step in the manufacturing process is usually far more job-intensive than the initial extracting process. It is time the Canadian people realized the position into which successive governments have driven us by their continual failure to take firm action on this major problem of having far more of our raw materials processed within our own country. As I mentioned earlier, this "head in the sand" economic policy is making fortunes for a handful of promoters in our extractive industries but is creating large-scale unemployment and poverty in some sections of Canada. The present policy might suit the industrial tycoons of the world but it certainly is not the best policy for the vast majority of Canadians.

In section 81 of the bill which is before us the government is offering an 8 per cent deduction of the original cost of the machinery, equipment and buildings in any plant used to process a mineral in the Yukon Territory. I feel this is a step in the right direction. It is similar to the incentive grants which are used to help establish industry in some of the slow-growth areas of our nation. In my opinion, however, this legislation does not go far enough. The federal government should insist, just as the Ontario government has done, that in future all ores mined in the territories must be processed and treated in Canada. Any exemptions would have to be based on a very strict set of regulations. One exemption might be in the shipment of uranium ore, which I understand is safer to ship without too much processing. The requirement that all ores and minerals mined in the territories be treated and processed in Canada would help ensure the development of our north and would help guarantee that the mineral resources in that area would benefit the citizens of Canada and especially those living in the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

There is no doubt that there are a number of opportunities in the north for the building of smelters. The raw material is there, and all we need is the determination of the government to insist that this type of processing shall take place. Any increased processing in the area would be a major economic boost for the territories. It would mean more jobs for the inhabitants and a larger tax base for the territorial governments and their municipalities. The processing of ores in the territories could lead to other types of industry and the establishment of a sound economic future for the entire area. All reports from our Canadian north indicate the lack of job opportunities, particularly for the native Indian and Eskimo populations. This bill, if adequate amendments were made to it, could make a start on providing more employment in our northern areas for all the residents who live there.

There is another large area of concern in northern development and this is in the field of pollution control and protection of the over-all environment. The lack of concern in this bill for pollution problems is a glaring omission. It is a clear indication that this government has no intention of really clamping down on environmental pollution. Section 96 refers to the northern inland waters act and any regulations made under section 3 (b) of paragraph 1(a) of section 18 of the Territorial Lands Act, yet no regulations have been made under this act. Therefore, we are being asked to pass a bill with no knowledge of the regulations that will be passed. There is no doubt the economic interests have been successful in diluting the measures required to fully protect our northern provinces. This will show up eventually in the land use regulations which are still being held up in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development despite the fact that increasing oil, gas and mineral exploration has been going on for years in the territories.

This bill should contain a list of pollution regulations which should be rigidly enforced by the department. High national standards should be included in the regulations. Our Canadian north is a relatively new area so far as major development is concerned. It should be protected at all costs from the disgraceful environmental pollution which has taken place in other parts of the country due to lack of enforcement of adequate regulations. Administration in this area would be relatively simple because of the limited number of operations. New mining operations should, before production is commenced, prove that their standards are adequate and that they have met fully what I hope will be a set of strict regulations laid down by the department.

Another example of government neglect is the lack of ecological studies done in our north. Such studies are absolutely essential to the drawing up of meaningful regulations but, as usual, the federal government has blundered along with little attention being paid to this very important aspect of environmental control. The result has been unregulated economic activity in all sections of the territories, and already immense and lasting damage has been done to the ecology of that area.

Perhaps one of the major blunders of the federal government and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has been in the complete indifference and lack of concern over the building of the Bennett Dam on the Peace River. Officials were too shortsighted and indifferent to appreciate the damage which could be caused to the lower reaches and in fact the whole of the Mackenzie River and the Mackenzie delta. The enormity of the damage already done is just beginning to be realized by the parties concerned. Water levels have been dropping, the nesting of wild fowl, fish runs, muskrat life and the native population in the area have been hurt. Despite the subjective lesson in the need for ecological surveys, we find that this government has again ignored the need for such surveys in the over-all picture. Under the northern Canada power commission bill powers are given to the commission in respect of hydro development without the stipulation that adequate surveys must be made to ensure that the ecology of the area is fully protected.

There has been a great deal of discussion in the last few days in the newspapers, over the air and in this House concerning the building of a pipeline down the Mackenzie River valley to bring oil from Alaska and oil and gas from the northern section of Canada. Again this is just part of the need for ecological regulations in respect of all legislation, including that concerning minerals and processing in the Yukon and in other parts of the Canadian north.

Pollution control involves not merely prevention of destruction of the environment but concern for conservation and a judicious use of our resources. Government policy in the north shows little concern for the conservation of our non-renewable resources. It is absolutely essential that governments realize that population control, resource conservation and pollution control all play a part in the over-all plan of managing our environment. Unless we realize this at a very early date and take the necessary steps to set up a program to integrate these various features, there will be little chance of adequately solving the grave pollution problems which face us in the north. I say, Mr. Speaker, that of all places in Canada the northern area is where these three major and important factors should be included in all our environmental planning.

The demand for mineral resources is best illustrated by the increasing rate of extraction and the dwindling global supply of high-grade metallic ores. If we use available data from the United States, it would appear that the United States will need about 700 per cent more aluminum, 225 per cent more copper, 50 per cent more iron and 40 per cent more lead by the year 2000 than they now consume. At present the United States imports most of its manganese, chromium, cobalt, tin and bauxite, having used up much of its own high-grade supplies. Available mineral deposits are not inexhaustible, even in our Canadian north, and I feel that Canadian planning and conservation measures are needed.

Here is one view of mineral resources which is most interesting. If the standard of living represented by Canada's per capita gross national product were extended to all the five billion to seven billion people of the world, the human race in the year 2000 would need annually 1,300 per cent more aluminum, 900 per cent more copper, 700 per cent more iron and 1,100 per cent more lead than it now consumes. Before we could possibly reach this level of consumption the present estimated global supply of readily recoverable ores would be exhausted. The magnitude of these figures, however, is not limited in significance to the metal supply alone because as we get into bodies of ore which are less concentrated than those currently being mined in the north we will need a great increase in the energy required to extract such vast quantities of metal from these lower grade bodies of ore. In addition to the raw needs for material and energy, this rate of consumption would be accompanied by pollution and waste-disposal problems of similar magnitude.

If we are to provide for future generations we will have to learn to recycle our mineral supplies rather than depend entirely on the development of new mines. That is why it is essential that adequate and proper planning for our natural mineral resources should take place in the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories. This is one reason we should not be too anxious to turn over to foreign speculators some of the richest ore bodies to be found anywhere in the world. This is another reason we should insist on far more of our natural resources and far more of our mineral resources being processed and fabricated in our own country. The rape of natural resources is going on in many countries of the world at an unprecedented rate. Once a resource has been depleted by money-hungry promoters, these promoters pull out with their fortunes and leave behind a hole in the ground and a large number of inhabitants who have no basic economy to which they can turn in order to make a living.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

CANADIAN NATIONAL POLLUTION AWARENESS WEEK

MEASURE TO MAKE PEOPLE AWARE OF ENVIRONMENTAL POLLUTION

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-25, respecting Canadian National Pollution Awareness Week, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Tom H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta) moved:

That Bill C-25, an act respecting Canadian National Pollution Awareness Week, be amended by deleting the long title and substituting therefor:

"An act respecting Canadian National Environment Week".

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 1 (Mr. Goode) agreed to.

Mr. Goode moved:

That Bill C-25, an act respecting Canadian National Pollution Awareness Week, be amended by deleting clause 1 on page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

"1. This act may be cited as the Canadian National Environment Week".

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 2 (Mr. Goode) agreed to.

Mr. Goode moved:

That Bill C-25, an act respecting Canadian National Pollution Awareness Week, be amended by deleting line 7 on page 1 and substituting therefor:

"every year, the second week in October shall"

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Goode: Mr. Speaker, this amendment is a move toward implementation of two important changes which I promised the members of the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works I would propose at the report stage.

Hon. members may remember that during the debate on second reading of Bill C-25 the feeling was expressed by a number of hon. members that the name of the proposed week be changed from Canadian National Pollution Awareness Week to Canadian National Environment Week. I believe that the suggestion was first made by the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange). The hon. member's reasoning was to the effect that such a change would emphasize the positive good to come from a clean environment, rather than the negative image of a polluted country. As I told the committee, I find this argument a compelling one. The word "environment" seems to encompass a broader range of activities and subject matters than the words "pollution awareness". In addition, I believe that such an amendment would also meet the objections of the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) who pointed out a possible inconsistency between the French and English versions of the bill.

Several members commented during the debate on second reading on the suggested timing of the environment week. My proposal had been the second week in March, in line with the observance of pollution awareness week in my riding. In Burnaby-Richmond-Delta, in the second week of March we are well into spring and so the thought of environmental housekeeping is a very natural one. However, we have only to look outside the walls of this House to see that March is not likely to mean spring in all parts of this country, and for this reason alone it seems preferable to choose another time.

Another factor concerns National Wildlife Week which is established by statute as being the week which contains the date of April 10. There was some concern by the Canadian Wildlife Federation that the impact of each week would be lessened by virtue of their being so close together. The federation made clear that while it supported the proposed environment week, it would prefer the week to come at some time other than the spring of the year.

The members of the committee considered very carefully the two issues involved here, the change of name and the change of date. I believe it can be said that the proposed changes received the general support of all committee members. To avoid the possibility of becoming involved in certain procedural difficulties, it was decided by the committee that the bill would be reported without amendment provided that I would undertake to propose the necessary amendments at the report stage. I am fulfilling that commitment today.

Before resuming my seat I wish to express my very sincere thanks to those members from all parties who have shown that a matter as important as the preservation of our environment need not be made a partisan issue. A spirit of co-operation and selflessness has been evident during both the second reading debate and consideration of the bill in committee, and for this I am truly grateful. I hope that that spirit will reign once again this afternoon in order that we may move through the report stage and third reading within the next few minutes.

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I rise to corroborate many of the statements just made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Goode). I sat on the committee which met a day or two ago at which this amendment was discussed, and the agreement was as has been stated by the hon. member. As he said, the chief objection to the timing was that it might conflict with National Wildlife Week and, therefore, lose some of its impact.

The fact that this is a necessary and useful bill stems from the fact that much public attention now is drawn to environmental pollution and the study of the environment in all its phases. Therefore I think it serves to underline, if that is necessary, the need for public attention in respect of this very important social aspect of our society. While the bill is a rather simple one, it does not do much more than that. Perhaps it will be the forerunner of other legislation and will support other legislation affecting our environment, such as the Canada Water Act. So we on this side of the House go along with what the hon. member said and we are ready to give this bill speedy passage.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak very briefly on the bill which is before us and say that our group has no hesitation in giving full support to the legislation. I am a member of the committee which dealt with the bill. I am pleased that we are to have a change in name, not so much because the name itself is a major factor in dealing with environmental problems but the change from Canadian National Pollution Awareness Week to Canadian National Environment Week is certainly an improvement and will bring home to the youngsters in our schools, who will no doubt have this drawn to their attention in October of each year, the fact that pollution is very much concerned with every aspect of environmental policy.

There has been a tremendous change among members of this House and the public regarding environmental problems. It is good to see people in all parties and in every section of the country determined that at long last we shall clean up our environment. I believe this bill is a step toward making them aware of this problem and, as I said earlier, I have no hesitation in fully endorsing it.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments on this bill. The hon. member's idea has survived, although the title and all clauses of the bill have been amended. That is quite a mauling for a committee to give a bill but, as he said, he undertook to introduce these amendments and I think they will help in making the bill more effective.

• (4:10 p.m.)

[Mr. Goode.]

I rise merely to make one suggestion in connection with the choice of week for pollution awareness. We are aware of pollution during the whole year. We cannot help being aware of it. The public is aware of it. We who represent the public are aware of the many problems associated with it. It is not just one week of the year that we will be aware of pollution, or of the environment, as the amendment reads.

I suggest that for communities which have special water pollution problems—and there are a number of them—combined with the second week in October they might have a "soap week" in order to make people more aware of the pollution problem. This would be a good idea for communities which have special water pollution problems caused by phosphate detergents. During that week the communities could encourage their citizens to use non-phosphate cleansers, and have the local water resource commissions tabulate the results. If a special program such as this were undertaken in various parts of the country, environment week would have a much greater impact.

It is generally recognized that there is not enough phosphate-free soap in Canada to meet the needs of the people. But there should be enough phosphate-free detergent available for communities which have these special problems. Preparations for such a program could be made early in the fall after schools have reopened. I have found that high school students are keenly aware of the pollution problem and are anxious to do something about it. That is another reason why I support this proposal.

Motion No. 3 (Mr. Goode) agreed to.

Mr. Goode moved that Bill C-25, respecting Canadian National Pollution Awareness Week, as amended, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): When shall the said bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Goode moved that the bill as amended be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I wish to advise the House that we have agreed to proceed with Bill C-32 in the name of the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Chappell).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Shall items Nos. 2 and 3 stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO REPEAL SECTIONS RESPECTING ABORTION

Mr. Hyl Chappell (Peel South) moved that Bill C-32, to amend the Criminal Code (Abortion), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-32 would remove abortion from the Criminal Code and allow it to be a moral and medical decision rather than a legal one controlled by sections of our Criminal Code. Judging from the correspondence which I have received, I believe this subject has been discussed by almost every adult Canadian during the last three years. In fact, few subjects have received more consideration. Although there is extremely strong support for removal of the criminal prohibition, I am well aware of the fact that some in my riding, and indeed in every riding in Canada, are not only opposed to this extension of the individual's rights but would turn the law back and prohibit abortion completely.

Of course, abortion is an important moral and social issue and will always remain so no matter what the law says. We all hope that some day research and dissemination of information on family planning and birth control will make it unnecessary and obsolete. But our problem is here and now. Can we allow our laws to deny medical assistance to those whose moral beliefs can accept medical termination of pregnancy, and want it desperately?

In 1969, by amendment to the Criminal Code we restated the law, allowing abortion provided a committee of doctors in an approved hospital was of the opinion that the continuation of the pregnancy would or would be likely to endanger the life or health of the woman. That legislation passed with a substantial majority after lengthy debate in the committee and in the House. I believe there is a need to re-examine the basic points relevant to the first debate.

In England, as far back as 1861 a therapeutic abortion was lawful if necessary to preserve the life or health of the woman. That law remained constant for over 100 years from 1861 until codified in 1968. There was clear judicial pronouncement not only that the abortion was not unlawful if for the purpose of saving the life or health of the woman, but "health" was given a broad interpretation in that the courts recognized that continuation of a pregnancy could depress health both mentally and physically. That law was adopted in Canada and remained until, by a drafting error some years ago, the word "unlawful" was left out of the code.

After that we had uncertainty until 1969. A doctor might have found himself in the impossible situation where he could be charged criminally if he performed an abortion to save a life, and sued civilly if he failed to do so if such operation might reasonably have saved a human life. Even worse was the moral conflict in the minds of doctors. Medically and privately doctors might have felt a duty to end a pregnancy to preserve the life or health of the woman, but feared to do so because of possible criminal charges or, at best, public criticism. In 1968, England codified its law on abortion, spelling out the need for two doctors to agree that the continuation of the pregnancy would involve risk to the life or health of the pregnant woman. This included physical and mental health and also the health of her existing children.

When we were cross-examining the doctors who appeared before the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee in respect of the proposed abortion legislation, they agreed that abortions had been taking place in many Canadian hospitals for some time when the life of the mother was seriously endangered. It would seem, however, that this medical salvation of life was only sparingly used.

• (4:20 p.m.)

In 1969 we codified what had been the law in England and in Canada also for many years and had been the practice, to a limited extent, in some Canadian hospitals, namely, to allow abortion if a continuation of the pregnancy would or would be likely to endanger the life or health of the woman. But there is a limiting condition. It has to be authorized by a committee of doctors, in a hospital which has governmental approval and which has in fact set up such a committee.

Because the subject is so immensely important from both a social and individual standpoint, the entire nation and in fact the world has had to revalue its attitude toward the individual's behaviour and to rethink the basis or ground rules for legislation which interferes with an individual's rights. In Sweden, Singapore, Japan, just recently in England and Hawaii, New York state and Maryland, abortion is now at the woman's choice. In many other American states abortion is allowed in certain cases. Abortion is here both in law and fact, but does our abortion law properly respond to conditions as they exist in Canada today?

The Canadian Federation of University Women, which has a membership of 10,000 university graduates from every province and territory in Canada, at its conference in August, 1970, took the position that our present restrictive law on abortion constitutes a serious threat to the health of an alarmingly high number of Canadian women. They adopted the policy of liberalization abortion laws so that it would not be a crime for a licensed physician to perform such operation at the request of the woman. They argue that this would protect the health of many Canadian women who are forced to have illegal abortions by unqualified persons, under unsanitary conditions.

The Royal Commission on the Status of Women in Canada has recommended that the Criminal Code be amended to permit abortion by a qualified medical practitioner at the sole request of any woman who has been pregnant for 12 weeks or less, and at any period if the doctor is convinced that continuation of the pregnancy would endanger the physical or mental health of the woman.

The Globe and Mail in its editorial of May 19, 1970, pressed us to follow the abortion legislation changes just passed in England and in support of this position pointed out that there were reasonable grounds to believe that literally hundreds of illegal abortions were performed in Toronto every week, and perhaps as many illegal abortions in Canada as there are births. If this is correct or even only substantially correct, it would seem that the Canadian Federation of University Women and the royal commission have much justification for their stand.

It is generally accepted that a just law is one that applies equally to all persons. Our present abortion law does not. Whether or not a woman can obtain an abortion in Canada would be accidental, depending on the city in which she lives, whether there is an approved hospital, whether an abortion committee has been set up and the interpretation the committee members put on the meaning of "health". If refused, a wealthy woman could go to a foreign nation. It is a relatively short trip to New York state. But a woman of very little means, who may have far greater need for the abortion, could not afford to do so. Daily advertisements appear in the Toronto newspapers offering to arrange abortion services in Buffalo. This may be fine for those who can afford it, but it creates bitterness and resentment for those who cannot.

The Canadian Psychiatric Association, whose members have charge of our mental health and who will have to make the decisions as to what abortions are justified, request that the restrictions in the Criminal Code be removed and that the decision be left, like any other medical matter, to the doctor and patient. In a sampling of his riding, one hon. member found that 85 per cent favoured removal of limitations from the Criminal Code. The topic is full of questions of principle, irreconcilable differences of opinion and emotional overtones. Some hold the religious belief that a fetus from the moment of conception is a human life with a soul. Others disagree, believing it is only potential life. Who can say which view is correct or that their view should be forced upon others and that one must not or may not have an abortion? Are we not better to leave it to the individual conscience?

We all profess to believe in equal application of the law, but in this case we do not give it. Nothing could be more cumbersome and expensive than the procedure now required to get an abortion. For all practical purposes, only the very rich can benefit from the law as it stands. We profess, also, to agree with the principle of the protection of individual rights. If this is so how can we legislate away the right to a medical abortion by calling it a crime unless performed according to the ritual set out in the Criminal Code?

As the law stands today, a doctor who is a member of an abortion committee must decide in which case he will perform the abortion to save a mother's life and in which case he will take a chance and risk her life. This is a heavy and unnatural burden on him, particularly if he has to decide in his conscience whether he is taking a life. It is a cruel position for the woman who is refused the abortion and believes that her health will be permanently impaired, her life lost or she will be incapable of properly sustaining that life after birth. Would it not be better for the person whose body is involved to make the moral decision whether an abortion would be taking a life, and the physical decision whether to submit to surgery or let the pregnancy continue?

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, the mini-debate we are having this afternoon is perhaps but a preview of a longer and more intense debate which will take place presumably before the end of this session. I think it has been indicated, perhaps because of the increasing unrest across the country, that one or two days will be given to debating this important question. I am sure that all members are grateful to the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Chappell) for placing this topic before the House again in this bill taking, as he does, one of the positions espoused by a growing number of people in this country which can best be described as "abortion on demand".

I am somewhat surprised that the hon. member, who is a distinguished lawyer, as is the seconder of the motion for second reading of the bill, should in effect take the route of dealing with this difficult problem by simply suggesting that this part of the law which refers specifically to the question of abortion be wiped from the statute books. My profession is not the law, so I find it rather strange that I should be standing in this chamber telling at least two lawyers—and perhaps others—that the way to deal with a serious social problem is surely not to avoid facing it altogether by removing it from the legislative statutes of the land.

Surely the hon. member for Peel South and others realize that in trying to deal with the question of abortion we are dealing with something that has a host of social consequences. These social consequences are so fundamental that not to observe them in some way or other under the laws of the land in a sense would be to advocate some form of anarchy. For instance, I presume that the hon. member for Peel South would not advocate the removal from federal or provincial statutes of laws with respect to marriage, with respect to the responsibility that guardians have for children, with respect to inheritance, and so on. These are all very important social questions and social contracts.

It should also be stated that in moving this kind of bill the hon. member is not in fact advocating liberalization of the laws; he is advocating that there be no law. That is an entirely different question. It is important for us not to become confused, because we are not dealing with a liberalization of the law; we are erasing the law respecting an important social matter. If we are to maintain order in society, our actions must be governed by law.

The Criminal Code, in a free society, reinforces the freedom of individuals, a freedom derived from democratically prepared laws. If we remove from the present code provisions governing human life from its inception, we shall be removing from the code an area of major responsibility. If we did that, it would be like removing from the code all concerns for humanity. I admit that the code is not in any final and perfected state and that many improvements could be made to it, because it applies to conduct within our society. But that is not the question.

I have been struck increasingly by the extreme positions that have been taken on the question of abortion. There is, I suggest a "groceteria" approach to conception. That approach is known as "abortion on demand". That position is symptomatic of the condition of our society in which too many want convenience above all else. An endorsation by this House of the "store-front" approach to abortion would be a major step backward for this country. That would be questionable, especially from the standpoint of how we value human life.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): The other extreme that many of us have witnessed could be described, I suppose, as the "fetus über alles" approach. Those advocating this approach are prepared to sacrifice all for the fetus, the physical and mental health of the mother, of the family, and perhaps of the unborn child. They do not mind if the child is to live a life of discomfort and misery. The rights of the fetus are above all. I submit that this position is as tyrannical as the one advocating abortion on demand.

A strange aura surrounds this question and many suggestions introduced as arguments are irrelevant. One argument that you hear quite often from those who advocate abortion on demand is that, after all, since the fetus is in the body of a woman she should have the right to determine whether she should give life or not. My answer to that argument is that I have not known of any women who became pregnant all by themselves. Pregnancy is not the result of one person's act. It does not occur because a person suddenly says, "I think I will now become pregnant." It arises in most instances out of a social relationship.

Some hon. Members: Oh oh!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Usually, it is one that is cemented by a bond resulting in permanent union. That being so, how can someone who says that the individual has the right to determine whether or not the fetus shall live overlook certain basic responsibilities and feelings of the individual who shared in the act of conception and who has related responsibilities to other members of the family and to the community? This whole question must be looked at in some kind of balance and taken in its totality. There is a danger of our losing sight of that fact in this discussion.

The basic question which cannot be ignored is, when does life come into being? There is no agreement on this. How much easier it would be for our discussions in this House and elsewhere if we could say when the human fetus is recognized as an individual and unique human being. It is fair to say that the largest religious community in this country, the Roman Catholic church, has been most outspokenly opposed to suggestions that the abortion law be liberalized. I have in my hand a copy of the brief which the Canadian Catholic Conference submitted to the special committee of this House on abortion in 1968. They state as follows:

> —it is difficult to determine the exact moment when we can be certain that the fetus is human.

That statement is true not only from the standpoint of their ethical and religious position but also from the standpoint of medical science. The basic difficulty, as we all admit, is that we have not arrived at any commonly agreed position as to when human life begins. I would also argue that there is as much danger in our spending too much time on this question as there is in ignoring the larger question, the question that must be obvious to members who are concerned about the health of society generally. I am talking about the value of life itself. That is why as a member of the House I have become increasingly alarmed about the dogmatic positions taken by a number of people in the country.

Anyone who argues that abortion should simply be a matter of the individual's whim ignores some important questions. Think, for instance, of the difficult position in which this might place doctors. Let us say that on a certain afternoon a patient walks into a doctor's office and says, "Doctor, I am so many weeks pregnant. I believe I should not have this child and I want an abortion as quickly as possible." Being busy, the doctor probably will not spend too much time going into the reasons for her request and he will perform the abortion. Then a few days or a few weeks later we might see the same woman coming into the doctor's office and saying that she feels unhappy and disappointed now because she has decided that after all she wanted the child. That would not only be ridiculous; it would be tragic. Obviously, some reasonable mechanism must be set up for dealing with the question. It will not be dealt with if we simply ignore the question by erasing from our statute books existing laws on this subject.

A large proportion of people in this country probably agree that the present law touching abortion is unsatisfactory. But you will not get better law by having no law, and that seemed to be the argument presented in the chamber this afternoon. One of our major difficulties in this country is that we do not know accurately how many abortions take place. A number of different authorities have suggested that perhaps upward of 100,000 women in this country have recourse to illegal or completely unsafe abortion procedures which sometimes bring tragic results and often cause the unnecessary death of innocent women. That problem, surely, cannot be overlooked, no matter what position one takes on this question.

Quite frankly, I think that federal and provincial governments have displayed a major shortcoming in the past few years because they have been either unable or unwilling to gather sufficient information on this question. With such information, Members of Parliament and members of legislatures could bring forward better laws and better procedures than exist at present. I participated in an extensive series of hearings on this question almost three years ago. Time and again when we tried to make definite decisions with respect to improving the law we were faced with difficulties arising through insufficient accurate information. Without that information, of course, it will be impossible to improve our laws.

We must face this problem, Mr. Speaker. I think all hon. members have received sufficient correspondence and talked personally to enough constituents to realize that this is a growing and pressing problem, not only from the standpoint of the health of the individual but from the standpoint of the health of the entire community. If we are not prepared to face it, we must find a reasonable procedure which will allow for an acceptance of decisions with respect to the question of abortion that can in some way meet what seem to be almost extreme and unresolved positions.

I believe there are few questions with respect to modern-day family life that are more in need of thorough study, more thorough than any of the studies I have read to date, than the whole question of response of society to the question of abortion and the total health of the family.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I rise to say a few words in support of the bill before us. I hope it will be referred to the committee for further consideration. I am sure the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Chappell) is aware that there is on the Order Paper Bill C-165 in the name of my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis). Except for the number of the bill, it is identical in every way to the one we are considering. As a result of the way in which bills get on the Order Paper, the hon. member's bill is being dealt with earlier because of its lower number.

I wish to deal with one or two points raised by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald). He referred to the fact that a decision made by two people to bring a new life into the world is a matter of serious social consequence and one that should not be indulged in lightly. I agree with that portion of his remarks. However, I was astounded when he suggested that the mover and seconder of this bill, whom he referred to as distinguished members of the legal profession, were in effect taking a simplistic approach to this question from a legal point of view by simply suggesting that certain provisions be deleted from the Criminal Code.

Like the hon. member for Egmont, I am not a member of the legal profession. However, I am amazed that he would suggest that if the subject matter of abortion were removed from the Criminal Code—that is, if the various sections which make it a criminal offence were taken from the law of the country—we would be in the position where there would be no law on this subject. I suggest that the hon. member for Egmont is being simplistic in his approach, rather than the members who proposed this bill. All that is suggested is that these matters be removed from the area of what constitutes a criminal offence.

I suggest to the hon. member that all the normal laws of the land with respect to health matters, who legally can carry on the practice of medicine or surgery, are not in any way affected by what is or is not in the Criminal Code in this connection. The hon. member suggested that if this bill is passed, there will be a vacuum in the law on this very important question. That is not in accordance with the legal facts as they prevail in this country. Let us consider what is involved.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Barnett: Yes.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Would the hon. member indicate what legislation would cover the controls that might exist with respect to the whole range of an individual's options if there were nothing in the Criminal Code or any other statute with respect to the terms under which a woman might secure an abortion?

Mr. Barnett: I do not have all the relevant information before me. I am well aware that we have a great many laws which restrict the practice of medicine and provide who may perform surgical abortions in this country. The question of what can or cannot be done as far as individuals are concerned depends a good deal on the laws which state who can or cannot practice in the area of health. This law, in my opinion, adequately deals with the question of whether an abortion should be performed. I agree with the hon. member that abortion on demand is a lot of nonsense. There is no such thing. Even with the legislation in the Criminal Code—

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Perhaps I can be more specific, to help the hon. member with what he has in mind. Can he indicate what legislation presently exists, either federal or provincial, that guarantees the rights of the father with respect to the question of abortion?

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, that may or may not be so, but I suggest that the Criminal Code as it presently stands does not deal with that question in any way. In any event, I suggest that when a married woman approaches a doctor, in the ordinary practice of his profession the doctor would have some right to exercise his medical discretion to determine whether the other parent should be consulted. This, of course, moves into the question of social legislation.

I do not argue with the hon. member that there should not be certain changes in some of the relevant provincial social legislation. My main point is, first, that the passage of this bill would not leave a complete vacuum in the legislative field in this area, as suggested by the hon. member. Second, this whole subject matter should not be dealt with in the Criminal Code as part of the criminal law. There is a place for offences committed by those who are licensed to practice in the field of health services, but the questions that arise in relation to this provision in the Criminal Code are theological rather than criminal. The question should be considered in that light. In my humble submission, Parliament and the agencies of state should avoid legislating on theological matters. That is properly a matter for an individual's conscience, for religious bodies to which individuals choose to belong, and the religious tenets to which they choose to subscribe.

So often in the correspondence I receive on this subject it seems to be suggested that if this kind of bill were to pass, Parliament would be taking some positive action to say, in effect, that people must have abortions. Of course, this to me, as I think to any member of the House who has followed this matter, is arrant nonsense. It is this misconception of what is involved in changing legislation that should be stressed in a debate of this kind. I think this misunderstanding has been added to in part by some of the people who have coined the phrase "abortion on demand", because it creates the impression that if Parliament takes action to eliminate certain sections of the Criminal Code we will, in effect, be compelling people to have abortions, which of course is complete nonsense.

I have digressed from what I originally intended to say about this bill so as to deal with the question raised by the hon. member for Egmont. While we may not have reached a complete meeting of minds on the matter, I think we may have moved somewhat toward common ground. I have made the point that what we are doing is releasing this question from legislating on what people should or should not believe, freeing people to live according to the ordinary tenets of social legislation in such a way that they can follow their own beliefs in this matter regardless of what they may be. In a country which prides itself on freedom of religion and on freedom of belief, I think this kind of theological restriction should not be within the ambit of the Criminal Code of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate on Bill C-32, to amend the Criminal Code.

First of all I should like to point out that the object of this bill to remove from the Criminal Code the word "abortion", which would enable us to look upon abortion as an operation very similar to a tonsillectomy or a blood transfusion with which the government has absolutely nothing to do and which is left at the doctor's and patient's discretion.

Mr. Speaker, I am absolutely against this bill and in saying that, I am speaking on behalf of all my colleagues.

Our position is not only a matter of conscience for us as human beings, but it is also the point of view of 90 per cent of our electors.

As all hon. members know, abortion was openly questioned by the Ralliement creditiste at the time of the now well-known omnibus bill in the spring of 1969.

My position and that of my party is still exactly the same: time and government may change but a man's conscience does not, at least I hope so. It is quite often said that we should modernize our way of thinking. I agree on several points such as the union of churches, the modification of electoral legislation to lower the voting age to 18 and so on.

But the moment the subject is pure and simple murder of a child that cannot defend himself, I do not agree any longer. If I were to accept this principle I would have to agree that, for the economic welfare of pre-war Germany, it was alright to kill all the Jewish people who owned the biggest part of this country's capital.

If I did agree with the abortion principle I would also agree with the Felquistes ideas to the effect that federal or federalist politicians are harming the political and economic health of Quebec and so on.

However, I find from reading Hansard that the sponsor of this bill entertains a rather wide conception of freedom.

As recorded on page 935 of Hansard for November 5, 1970, the hon. member stated and I quote:

> Freedom consists of freedom of the press, freedom of speech with the right to criticize and protest, freedom of movement, which includes the right to carry on one's chosen activities without fear or interference.
> It does not include the right to destroy the basis of the society which is out guarantee of freedom.

I should like to call the attention of the House on this excerpt from the speech the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Chappell) delivered in the course of the debate on the bill to provide temporary emergency powers for the preservation of public order.

I am very anxious to hear the hon. member state whether he and his party consider that the basis of our society is simply not freedom to be born. Otherwise, what is our society heading for?

Why should we for days and months discuss the proper means to punish those who oppose our present system and, at the same time, try to legalize murder on request?

I might be told that the aim is to free the woman and to allow her to be the master of her own body, that the government should not interfere with a woman's alleged freedom to kill the fruit of her womb, but I do not believe in such a freedom. I do not think that to enjoy freedom one can justifiably kill another person, and I emphasize these words because evidently, before birth the child is already a human being distinct from his mother and possessing all the essential features of a human being.

Here, I should like to recall a fact that all hon. members have no doubt witnessed, at least those who keep small pets for the enjoyment of their children.

I for one have always allowed my children to keep a few rabbits as it keeps them busy and teaches them from infancy a sense of responsibility towards living beings. Now, if a female happens to litter while people are around, it will eat all its young to the last.

Such action is repugnant to me and certainly to all hon. members, after the explanation given.

We could therefore say under the law that a mother is killing her child so that he will not have to struggle for life. This is punishable just like murder. To my mind, a mother is not free or so-called free to decide whether the child must live or die once he is born. Now we would give this so-called freedom to the mother in respect of her unborn child?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The private members' hour has now expired.

[English]

It being five o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until Monday next at two o'clock p.m. I will not make any more predictions about the weather. I hope it will be pleasant and that hon. members will be able to enjoy a day outdoors.

At five o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, March 8, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

THE LATE A. B. DOUGLAS

Hon. Arthur Laing (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, once again we have the heavy task of noting the loss by the House of Commons of one of our members in the untimely death of the hon. member for Assiniboia. Ab Douglas was a man of very wide knowledge, great human qualities, tremendous industry and transparent integrity. We sorrow because a promising career in this place is now denied him.

I remind the House that his first public service had to do with education when he was a trustee in a school district in the province of Saskatchewan. He served in that or in like capacities on school boards for a period of 22 years. Probably no finer groundwork for unselfish public service could be laid than by being associated with a school board for a period of 22 years.

Mr. Douglas had the respect and friendship of every member of the House. His passing is a very great loss to us and we sorrow with his family. Our sincere sympathy goes to Mrs. Douglas and their four sons. I would hope some condolence would come to them from the knowledge that the very human qualities he brought to the House and to the task he performed here over the very short period of two and a half years are bound to endure.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in expressing our regret over the very untimely death of the hon. member for Assiniboia I should like to associate myself and my colleagues with the remarks of the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Laing). Most of us have known Mr. Douglas only since his election in 1968. Those on this side of the House saw him as a cheerful, goodnatured but very diligent representative of his constituency, constantly pressing for action for the welfare of the people he represented. To the people of Saskatchewan he was, of course, well known and highly respected for his work in various fields, including the education of youth, as the Acting Prime Minister reminded us, and among farmers.

I recall very vividly the occasion last October when the hon. member seconded the motion for the adoption of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. In addition to his attachment for his constituency and for his province, we noted his fervent interest in all manner of issues, including agriculture, tax reform, economic management and anti-pollution measures. On that occasion he quoted the following words from a speech credited to the late Governor General, Georges Vanier:

> People do not age by living a number of years. I am convinced we grow old only by deserting our ideals. We are in fact as old as our doubts and despairs, but we are as young as our faith and our hope, especially faith and hope in our youth, which is, after all, the same as saying our faith and our hope in our country's future.

To Mr. Douglas' family may I say that those words of the former Governor General are a most fitting description of the life of the hon. member for Assiniboia—a life filled with faith, hope and ideals.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the members of the New Democratic Party would like to go on record as expressing their great sense of loss at the passing of Mr. A. B. Douglas, Member of Parliament for Assiniboia. He was respected and esteemed in all parts of the House as a conscientious and hardworking member, and I am certain the House will miss him.

For me there is a sense of personal loss. Mr. Douglas came from Weyburn, Saskatchewan, an area which I had the privilege of representing for some 26 years in this Parliament and in the legislature of Saskatchewan. Consequently, I have known Mr. Douglas since he was a very young man and had a very high regard for him. We were very good friends. During the period that I was associated with the government of Saskatchewan I had the privilege of inviting him to serve on a number of commissions and boards representing the school trustees of the province. As one would have expected, he brought to every task painstaking industry and forthright integrity.

On behalf of the members of this group I would ask you, Sir, to convey to his wife, to his four very fine sons and to his mother our deepest sympathy in their time of bereavement. I hope it will be of some comfort for them to know that although he was cut off in his prime he gave of himself unstintingly in the service of his community and his country, and that we in this House feel we have lost a valued friend and colleague.

Mr. Oza Tetrault (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say on behalf of our group that we deeply regret the passing of the hon. member for Assiniboia. We always considered Mr. Albert Douglas to be a very active member in committees and in the House of Commons. May we offer to Mrs. Douglas and her family our deepest sympathy.

Mr. Speaker: I should mention to the House that I have already conveyed to Mrs. Douglas the condolences of the members of this House, and it will be my duty to transmit to her and to her family the expressions of sympathy by the representatives of all parties in the House.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C), 1970-71

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would like to move a motion pursuant to Standing Order 59. I move seconded by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury):

That, with the exception of the votes relating to the Department of Veterans Affairs, the Supplementary Estimates (C), tabled in the House on March 4, 1971, be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates;

And that the said votes relating to the Department of Veterans Affairs, namely, votes 10c, 15c, 35c, 40c, 45c and 50c, be referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last when the President of the Privy Council asked leave to make a motion somewhat along these lines I indicated that I had two points of order which I wished to raise. Shortly thereafter I communicated to you, Sir, and to representatives of the other parties the content of my two points of order, and I am glad to say that one of them has been met.

That first point of order was to the effect that there had been a commitment that any supplementary estimates relating to veterans affairs would be referred not to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates but to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. I appreciate the fact that the President of the Privy Council in redrafting this motion has kept that commitment, which takes care of that point of order. However, Sir, the other point of order still stands, and I raise it now as one that some of us regard as very serious.

My point has to do with the use of dollar items in the supplementary estimates for the purpose of legislating amendments to existing statutes. May I make it clear that this is not just a rehash of debates we have had over the years on the use of dollar items. The reason I say that is that recently we have changed our rules, and I submit that there is a new situation which makes the practice about which I am complaining an abuse of the rules and an abuse of the rights and privileges of Parliament.

If my counting is correct there are 21 dollar items in the Supplementary Estimates (C) which the present motion covers. Seventeen of these dollar items have the effect of changing the description attached to certain expenditures already approved, or of providing for a continuation into the new fiscal year of items, already approved, and so on. I do not complain about the use to which dollar items are being put in these 17 cases. There are some that are a bit shady, but in the main these 17 cases are in line with what I regard as proper practice for the use of dollar items.

However, Sir, the other four items are items which are not estimates at all. They are not a case of the government asking Parliament to provide money. The use of a dollar item is just a device. The dollar is not needed; the dollar is not spent. The dollar is just a device, and in the four cases about which I am complaining this device is being used to amend four specific statutes.

The four statutes being amended are the Pension Act, the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act, and the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act. I might indicate that the first two, the amendment to the Pension Act and the amendment to the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, will be found in item 35c under Veterans Affairs, the amendment to the War Veterans Allowance Act will be found under 10c in Veterans Affairs, and the amendment to the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act will be found under item 7c of Finance. If Your Honour will check these items, as I am sure has been done since notice of this point of order was given on Thursday, you will agree that it is quite clear that in each of these four cases we are providing by the bill to be based on these estimates that the statute in question is being amended. I do not think I need read the items in order to make that point.

In the case of the items that come under Veterans Affairs, the amendments in all cases consist of altering certain schedules so that higher pensions or allowances will be paid. In the case of the item that comes under the Department of Finance there is an extension beyond the period of time specified in the statute at the present moment. In other words, Mr. Speaker, in each of these four cases, actual acts on the statute books of Parliament are being amended by this process.

A moment ago I said that in my view this is a new situation because of the rule changes that we made. May I point out, therefore, that when we did the massive overhaul of our rules two or three years ago we made significant changes in two areas, one relating to the legislative process with respect to bills and the other relating to estimates.

With respect to bills, we cut down the number of stages of debate to a maximum of three; there are now not more than three stages at which a bill bringing in an Act or amending an Act can be debated on the floor of Parliament. However, we retained that possibility of three stages; there are always two and sometimes there are three. In no case did we eliminate all such stages.

With respect to estimates, however, and knowing full well what we were doing, with our eyes wide open we took them off the floor of the House of Commons completely. We abolished the committee of supply; we provided for estimates to be referred, on a motion that is not debatable, to standing committees; we provided for the committees to do the consideration of the estimates and we provided that a report back from a committee to the House is not debatable. We also provided that a bill based on estimates can be put through all stages in one day regardless of Standing Order 72, thus cutting out any chance for a debate at report stage, committee of the whole or any other opportunity. In other words, we completely removed from debate on the floor of the House the consideration of estimates.

At this moment I am not saying whether we did the right thing; I am simply stating a fact. I am saying we did it knowing very well what we were doing. In case anyone wants to say that on allotted days we can discuss estimates if we so provide, I am prepared to admit that such is the case. However, it depends on what opposition members put down whether or not that happens. But if an opposition member should put down as an opposition motion a discussion of the activities of a particular department, even at that point we do not have the estimates in front of us. In other words, we do not have the actual government proposal. At the risk of repetition, Sir, I therefore make the point that the change we made when we overhauled the rules a couple of years ago took estimates completely off the floor of the House.

To go back to my other point, we did not do that to legislation and we did not do it to ordinary bills. We did not say that anything other than estimates can be dealt with without ever being discussed on the floor of the House of Commons. There are no dollar items in the main estimates, of course, but when you put into the supplementary estimates dollar items which provide for amendments to the four statutes to which I have referred, you completely deny to the House of Commons the right that is guaranteed under the provisions, particularly about public bills, and any opportunity to discuss these matters.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, that this is an abuse of the rules, that this is an abuse of the rights of Parliament and that any rulings that there may have been about dollar items prior to the changes of the rules do not now apply. We are in a new situation; we are in a regime under which anything that is put in the estimates cannot be discussed on the floor of the House. I submit that for us to be handed a device under which amendments to four statutes of this Parliament are to be put through without there being any chance to discuss them on the floor of the House is an abuse of the rules and contrary to what we had in mind when we amended the rules two or three years ago, actually at the end of 1968.

As I have already said, Sir, I am not making a carte blanche objection to dollar items. I think that when a dollar item changes the description of an expenditure or of the way in which an expenditure already voted can be used, that it is proper, for that is in the field of estimates. But when something is tucked into the book of supplementary estimates and when that something amends existing statutes, then I submit it is wrong and we should not stand for it.

May I point out to you, Sir, that when Bill C-207 was first introduced and a point of order was raised by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) because of its omnibus nature, Your Honour admitted from the Chair that your first look at that bill caused your eyebrows to be raised, because it was such a wide bill and had so many things in it. Your eyebrows must now be at the top of your head because, having had an opportunity to look at this booklet of supplementary estimates, you will have seen on the front of it the words "Supplementary Estimates (C) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1971." You would be expected to believe that the title is correct and that that is what is in it. However, you would find in it not only supplementary estimates covering the whole gamut of public administration, but these four cases in which existing statutes are to be amended. I submit that if Your Honour had some doubts about the omnibus character of Bill C-207, you must have serious doubts about this proposal, not just because it has a wide range of things in it but because it has something in it that does not qualify under the heading of supplementary estimates.

I should also like to point out to Your Honour that if these estimates go through in their present form, the day will come when you will lead us over to the other place to get Royal Assent to a bill. On the assumption that you will use the formal words you have always used on other, similar occasions, this is what you will say: "May it please Your Honour, the Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the government to defray the expenses of the Public Service. In the name of the Commons I present to Your Honour the following bill: An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Public Service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1971, to which bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent."

Now, Sir, if you make that statement, you will not be uttering an overt falsehood but you will not be telling the whole truth. Your statement will be to the effect that what you are presenting to the Governor General or his deputy for approval is a bill containing estimates, containing sums of money required for the Public Service. The whole truth would be that in this bill along with moneys for the Public Service there are amendments to four existing statutes. I do not think that this House of Commons should put Your Honour in the position of having to make a statement in the other place which, as I say, although not containing an overt falsehood will not be the whole truth.

If I were concerned about the rights of the Senate, which of course I am only in an academic or objective way, I would raise another point. Actually, if I were over there, and thank heaven I am not, I would object strongly to the way in which this bill denies the Senate the right that it has to discuss and amend ordinary legislation. The Senate cannot deal with our supply bills. It can only accept or reject them. It cannot amend them. By tucking these four bills into a bill covering supplementary estimates, the government is denying Their Honours the right to discuss, vote upon or even propose amendments to four bills which they would otherwise have the right to do. Despite my well-known views about the Senate, I think it is appropriate that I point out in an academic way that this is contrary to the rights of Parliament.

I recognize that we in this place are anxious to find ways and means to expedite the handling of our business. Maybe we want to find some way to get some bills dealt with without their taking up any time on the floor of the House of Commons. If we are going to make this decision, let us make it as a House of Commons. If this is what we are going to do, it should be done by an amendment to the rules. Let us not have it shoved into our procedures by the government resorting to this device. These bills in this book of estimates are not a case of voting money but rather a case of getting four bills amended without parliamentary debate.

I welcome the fact that the motion has been changed so that the estimates having to do with veterans affairs will go to that committee. My prediction is that they will be passed very quickly in that committee. I even predict that if the necessary bills were brought to the floor of the House in the proper way, they would be passed very quickly and that no time would be lost in improving the position of our veterans. However, the whole point of my intervention is that the rights of Parliament are challenged by a government that uses this device. Any argument that might have been used for it in the old days when estimates came to the floor of the House does not apply under our new rules.

I therefore ask that Your Honour give this point of order the serious consideration that it deserves. The least Your Honour can do is require that the title of the bill based on these estimates be changed so that you will be an honest man when you go to the Senate to ask for Royal Assent. It would be even more appropriate if Your Honour would rule that the four dollar items in this book which are amendments to the existing legislation, should be removed from the supplementary estimates and made the subject of separate bills.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has raised a point on which I have spoken many times. As a matter of fact, I would refer Your Honour to the Journals of the House of two years ago when the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates brought in a report criticizing the government for this particular practice. At that time the committee saw fit to accept my persuasion and criticize the government. There then followed an allotted day on which this matter was discussed. Not only that, but Their Honours in the other place, in the report of the Senate Committee on National Finance, also criticized the government about these dollar items of a legislative nature. I will refer to them as I go along.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

I do not want to traverse the ground that has been covered by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre with regard to the practices of the House. What concerns me is the apparent lack of concern by both members of the treasury benches and the backbenchers on the government side as to what is happening.

Not only veterans affairs is involved. I suppose that by simply turning those items over to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) thinks he has met the objections on this point. Far from it, I suggest, Mr. Speaker. But there is an item in the Department of Finance supplementary estimates extending the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act which was passed in 1964 or 1965 and received very extensive debate in the House. It is due to expire in 1971 or 1972 with regard to certain arrangements which, incidentally, affect only the province of Quebec. It is the only province that availed itself of the measly carrot held out by the government under that bill. Yet by a dollar item that Act is being extended for two years. What is the purpose? Is the purpose to be hidden from the House? There is absolutely no way that the House can pronounce itself on the reasons for the extension or whether it should perhaps be extended for four years or something of that nature. In the same way the other House cannot express its opinions. It cannot amend such a provision in an Appropriations Act. It must reject the entire bill if it strongly disapproves. Yet on this occasion we are again asked to accept several dollar items.

In 1969 we had 12 legislative items of a dollar nature. The other House sought an explanation in detail which was given to them, but never does the government condescend to give an explanation to this House. I do not want to complain merely because of that fact, but this is supposed to be a government that deals openly. Open government, Mr. Speaker? It hides on all occasions, and this is a classic example of its attempts to dissimulate. No one who is supposed to be a commentator on the scene noticed that the interim arrangements for the province of Quebec under this Act were being extended two years. No one noticed it, and there are others equally hidden.

There are other examples. Your Honour will recall that in the session of 1964-65 the then Leader of the Opposition, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), held up the proceedings of the House, supported by the opposition, with regard to three dollar items which were then withdrawn by the then President of the Treasury Board. They involved the establishment of educational television and other items of legislative import, but they were withdrawn. We object to what is being attempted at this time by the government.

Not only is there the question of the statement made by Your Honour at the time the appropriation bill is presented in the other place or the statements which are made in reporting back to this House; I suggest that even the wording that is used by Your Honour when these estimates are tabled is in effect a misrepresentation of the true facts. We are asked to accept some estimates proposed by His Excellency for the purpose of spending certain moneys, but that is not so. There are also some legislative changes.

• (2:40 p.m.)

If Your Honour will refer to Hansard for March 3, 1969, you will see what was said on that occasion by members of the opposition and by the President of the Treasury Board. His justification was merely that it was more expeditious to do it this way. More expeditious for the government!

Let us look at these interim financing arrangements with the provinces. Is it done this way because the government does not want a debate? It could happen that its majority in the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee would not even ask a blessed question about it, not one; nobody must rock the boat by asking questions about government practices and policy.

So this is the method chosen—a tame committee with a tame committee report. Then it might be up to the House to take out of that report the portions dealing with the question of amendments to veterans legislation and the interim arrangements with the provinces regarding these programs and make them a subject for discussion. There is absolutely no way in which the legislation itself can be considered as such. The President of the Privy Council says "Nonsense". I repeat there is no way in which the legislation can be considered as legislation and, of course, I know he is such a good legal draftsman that he would, out of a vote in the estimates, determine how revised statutes should be written. Statutes are passed and they are the source of what goes into the revision of statutes. It is not estimates.

I trust that you, Mr. Speaker, will also take to heart the representations which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and I have made with regard to the nature of these estimates, their presentation and their acceptability. Are they in essence what they appear to be? I put it to Your Honour that they are not what they appear to be—they are not part of spending programs, they are requests for the changing of legislation. Surely an item of one dollar does not really represent a change in a spending program.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of Treasury Board): At least two points have been made in the current discussion, Mr. Speaker. One is that we have changed our rules and that in consequence we should look at past practices in a new light. The other is that past practices, even under the old rules, were perhaps incorrect.

With respect to this process of securing authority to act in a certain way by means of an Appropriation Act rather than through specific bills, I would point out that it has been the practice for a long while to use estimates and supplementary estimates leading to Appropriation Acts as a means of effecting changes in legislative enactments, and it has been well recognized, I believe, that this is an appropriate and satisfactory way in which to proceed. In the past it has not denied to members of the House an opportunity to examine, to cross-examine, to criticize and, where appropriate, to see that changes are effected. This has led to the practice of introducing dollar items in supplementary estimates over a long period.

Mr. Baldwin: Bank robbery is bad.

Mr. Drury: For some time it has been agreed that these dollar items should be limited to using the Appropriation Acts to amend other legislative enactments in the following cases:

1. To alter financial limitations imposed by legislation or by previous estimates. As an example, I might quote an increase in the maximum amount which may be loaned by CMHC for housing purposes.

2. To alter time limitations imposed by legislation or by previous estimates. An example of this was the change in the termination date of the trans-Canada highway program.

3. To extend the application of legislation to persons not covered by the legislation so as to authorize the making of payments to such persons in accordance with the substance and purposes of the legislation—for example, authority to make payments under the Government Employees Compensation Act to former employees of Dosco suffering from silicosis.

4. To amend legislation originally approved through items in the estimates or the Appropriation Acts. For example, broadening the scope of a revolving fund, itself established by an Appropriation Act.

5. To effect transfers of available funds to votes where additional funds are required.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre indicated that these description's of appropriate dollar items have in the past been satisfactory and, if I gather this meaning correctly, that this is still the case under the present rules. What we are concerned about is the marginal case which may fall outside the particular headings I have just given. We should perhaps consider the question whether there is adequate opportunity for members of the House to scrutinize the legislative changes which are being proposed, not by way of four separate bills, each having to make its own progress through the House, but by way of a single legislative enactment, namely, an Appropriation Act.

In the case of these amendments, we are not amending anything except schedules or termination dates of other statutes. We are amending the termination dates or rates of emolument contained in schedules. I suggest this clearly falls within the definitions I have given earlier of items which may properly be the subject of changes in legislation by means of an amendment to an Appropriation Act.

In this particular case, the change in program was announced by the Minister of Veterans Affairs in and to the House on December 2 last in a statement on motions. Not only did this draw attention to the government's intention but it provided an opportunity for brief comments to be made by hon. members or, at least, by spokesmen for each of the opposition parties. Advantage was of course taken of the occasion.

In the second place, we are now submitting these supplementary estimates regarding the particular matters under discussion to a standing committee of the House which is concerned with this particular subject. I suggest that by comparison with some of the proceedings in the Committee of the Whole in the past there is a much better opportunity provided to hon. members by way of reference to the standing committee of the House, under these arrangements, to examine, to criticize and to express views as to particular changes proposed in statutes.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is our decision to make.

Mr. Drury: I suggest it is a decision for the House to make, and the House has already made it.

• (2:50 p.m.)

It may not suit the convenience of the hon. member.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): When did the House make it?

Mr. Drury: I think the House made it, for example, by adopting a number of Appropriation Acts in the past. I hope it will reaffirm this by the adoption of the Appropriation Act in question. In anticipation of abolishing the committee of supply, explicit provision was made for opposition days during which only opposition members were free to raise in the House any question that in their view warranted or commanded public discussion.

In relation to this particular item we now have before us, before the end of the current fiscal year I understand there are a number of supply days left on which, in addition to the fullest discussion in the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, hon. members of the opposition, if they wish, may raise this issue and have it debated on the floor of this Chamber.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mainly with no decision.

Mr. Drury: The hon. gentleman complains about the lack of decision. This is a view with which I am unfortunately in agreement. One of our main problems is bringing the House to a decision on urgent matters.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is much better than having the government do so.

Mr. Drury: There has been too much lack of decision on the part of the House. In relation to this particular problem, and I think we are dealing with what is a marginal matter, I point out with regard to the schedules in the Pension Act that changes have been made by way of the Appropriation Acts in the years 1964, 1966 and 1968. Changes in the schedules to the War Veterans Allowance Act have been made by way of the Appropriation Acts in 1964 and 1966. This is not something new.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But we have changed the rules since then.

Mr. Drury: I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that we have changed the rules since the earlier cases. I suggest that by reason of the provision of supply days, which allow many occasions for discussion of these items at the opposition's choice on the floor of the House, with examination in detail of witnesses in standing committees of the House, we have really provided a more factual and deeper examination with less opportunity to conceal, if that is anybody's desire, than was the case.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You said it.

Mr. Drury: When supply was considered by the committee of supply, in what I think most hon. members would agree was too short a time for too big a subject, there was not the same opportunity for examination. I suggest that this particular reference to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs is entirely appropriate, and that the items as shown in the supplementary estimates are in order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, supported by the hon. member for Edmonton West, has brought up a most interesting and important point of order. I will wait until I have had an opportunity to study the arguments put forward by the hon. members and by the hon. minister before indicating to the House, in due course, my own views regarding the matter.

SPORT

WINNING OF CANADIAN CURLING CHAMPIONSHIP BY MANITOBA RINK

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, at this time I should like to extend my congratulations, and I am sure the congratulations of all hon. members of the House, to the Don Duguid rink of Winnipeg on their accomplishment in winning for the second year in a row the Macdonald Briar tankard, emblematic of Canadian curling supremacy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Simpson: I am sure that the best wishes of all members go with Don Duguid, Rod Hunter, Jim Pettapiece and Bryan Wood when they represent Canada next week at the world curling championship in France.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure that this is a question of privilege, but it is a very interesting change of pace.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

EMPLOYMENT OF FORMER MEMBERS OF CYC IN PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

Question No. 521—Mr. Godin:

Are any former members of the Company of Young Canadians on the staff of the Prime Minister's office and, if so (a) what are their names (b) in what parts of the country have they worked as members of CYC?

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister): There are no former members of the Company of Young Canadians on the staff of the Prime Minister's Office (a) and (b) are therefore not applicable.

ESTABLISHMENT OF CARRAGEEN EXTRACTION PLANT IN P.E.I.

Question No. 616—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. Is the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and/or any other government department investigating the feasibility of establishing a carageen extraction plant in Prince Edward Island as suggested by the hon. Member for Cardigan on October 15, 1970?

NUMBER OF WORK DAYS LOST IN 1968, 1969 AND 1970

Question No. 681—Mr. Orlikow:

How many days of work were lost in each of the past three years as a result of (a) strikes (b) unemployment (c) illness and/or accidents?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Labour and the Dominion Bureau of Statistics as follows:

		Federal Jurisdiction	Provincial Jurisdiction	Total
(a)	1968	498,960	4,583,770	5,082,730
	1969	472,960	7,584,100	8,057,060
	1970 (Prel.)	345,740	7,458,740	7,804,480

(b) This information is not available.

(c) Officials of the Department of Labour have participated with those of other interested departments in an endeavour to improve statistical data on industrial accidents, but to this time technical problems have prevented the development of a series that would include reliable data on working time lost.

FREDERICTON AIRPORT

Question No. 704—Mr. MacRae:

With respect to the answer to Question Number 203, given at page 2251 of Hansard January 11, 1971, what is the nature of the continuing reviews and how do they differ from a survey?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The response to Question 203 of October 20, 1970, referred to technical investigations, feasibility and costing of aerodrome works. In this context, a recent request by Air Canada for consideration of runway extensions at Fredericton for their DC9 aircraft after 1972 are now being evaluated. The continuing reviews referred to in the response are studies undertaken to assess the desirability or necessity of developing facilities to meet changing requirements of civil aviation in Canada.

PUBLIC SERVICE—REQUIRED INDICATION OF SEPARATISTS

Question No. 716—Mr. Robinson:

Will the government require all federal civil servants to indicate whether they are separatists or not?

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister): No.

INCENTIVE GRANTS

Question No. 736—Mr. Osler:

1. Will the government pay agreed-upon area incentive grants to plants that go into receivership before these grants have been fully earned and on what criteria will such decision be based upon?

2. Will the government insist upon proof that all outlays for equipment and services, made or on behalf of Churchill Forest Industries and other related companies, were normal and competitive?

3. Before approving payment of incentive grants, will the government satisfy itself that adequate pollution controls have been embodied in the plants making-up the new complex at The Pas, Manitoba?

4. Has the Government of Manitoba requested any extension of the payments deadline, presently April 1, 1971, for grants to Churchill Forest Industries and related companies?

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): 1. No, because the grants are earned by putting the plants into commercial production. But if that and other legislative requirements are met, the grants will be paid whether or not the plants are in receivership.

2. Yes, to the extent that the amounts of the grants are affected.

[Mr. Jerome.]

3. No, because there is no authority to impose this condition under the relevant legislation (which is not the legislation that now applies to new cases).

4. No.

DEPARTMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE—EMPLOYMENT OF MR. PATRICK WATSON

Question No. 744—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Has the Secretary of State or the Minister responsible for Information Canada, or Information Canada itself, engaged the services of Mr. Patrick Watson, known as a former producer-performer of the CBC program "Seven Days" and, if so, for what reason?

2. What are the terms or the specifications of the arrangement, including length, fees, expense arrangements and services provided to Mr. Watson?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): 1. The Department of the Secretary of State has contracted with Patrick Watson Enterprises Limited to assist in developing programs to facilitate citizen participation.

2. The contract is for the period of January 6 to March 9, 1971, at a fee of $481 per week plus travel expenses up to a maximum of $670 for this period. Office space and secretarial service is also provided.

WHEAT—TWO-PRICE SYSTEM

Question No. 772—Mr. Southam:

1. Is the government giving consideration to establish a domestic two-price system for wheat in Canada and, if so, when will a decision be made to that effect?

2. In the event a two-price system for wheat is established, will the consumer be called on to pay the cost?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. A two price system for wheat has been in effect since August 1, 1969. Since then the selling price established by the Government for wheat used for human consumption in Canada has been $1.95½ per bushel basis No. 1 Northern in store Thunder Bay or Vancouver. If changes are made in the established selling price by the Government the House will be advised.

2. The price of products derived from wheat is not controlled by the Government and it is likely that any increase in the cost of wheat and other production and distribution factors is passed on to the consumer.

WHEAT—SYSTEM OF CHECK-OFF FROM GRAIN SALES TO CREATE FUND FOR RESEARCH

Question No. 774—Mr. Southam:

Is it the intention of the government to institute a system of check-off from grain sales and oil seeds to create a fund for market research and development as suggested by the delegates to the recently-held western agricultural conference?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister Responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board): The Government is giving serious consideration to providing a method to permit such a check-off if it is supported by individual producers.

WHEAT—PLEBISCITE TO DETERMINE MARKETING SYSTEMS

Question No. 775—Mr. Southam:

Is it the government's intention to sponsor a plebiscite among farmers in the Wheat Board area to determine whether rye, flax and rapeseed should be brought under the complete jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Work is continuing on the merits of different marketing systems but no decision on a plebiscite has been taken.

PRAIRIE GRAIN POLICY PROPOSALS

Question No. 778—Mr. Southam:

Is it the intention of the government to drop the proposal that would have made losses on sales pools recoverable from future pools as outlined in the Production and Grain Receipts Policy for the Western Grains Industry on October 29, 1970?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Discussions on this and many other aspects of the Prairie Grains policy proposals are continuing. Conclusions will be reached soon and announced at that time.

CANADIAN COAST GUARD COLLEGE—CADET ALLOWANCES

Question No. 865—Mr. Muir:

1. Is the government giving consideration to increasing the allowances of the cadets attending the Canadian Coast Guard College at Point Edward, Nova Scotia and, if so, what is the amount the cadets presently receive and what is the proposed increase?

2. What is the present arrangement regarding the expenses of cadets attending the Canadian Coast Guard College and are there to be any changes in the present system and, if so, what are these changes?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The allowances which cadets attending the Canadian Coast Guard College receive are subject to negotiation and are fixed by the collective agreement between Treasury Board and the bargaining agent for Government Ships Officers (Canadian Merchant Service Guild). Present allowances: 1st year cadets, $80 monthly; 2nd year cadets, $90 monthly; 3rd year cadets, $105 monthly; 4th year cadets, $125 monthly. A new collective agreement is now being negotiated, consequently, it will not be possible to make any announcement concerning allowances until the new agreement is signed.

2. Once a year all cadets receive free return travel less the first $25 between the college and their homes. All travel expenses, in accordance with the travel regulations, are paid for cadets when joining and leaving ships during the sea training phase of their training. Being negotiable, it is also not possible to make any announcement about expenses at present concerning changes that may be negotiated in the new agreement.

GAME SANCTUARIES

Question No. 868—Mr. Robinson:

How many game sanctuaries are there in Canada (a) where is each located (b) what is the size of each (c) what type of game is protected in each (d) how much is the cost to the federal government to maintain each sanctuary?

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): There are Seven. (d) All the above noted game sanctuaries are established by Territorial Ordinances and any costs are charged against the two Territorial Governments and not against the federal government. Direct federal costs are nil. Game sanctuaries in Canada are either under provincial jurisdiction or are controlled by private citizens.

SNOWMOBILES—MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY STANDARDS

Question No. 869—Mr. Robinson:

Will the government consider the requirement of safety features for snowmobiles and other such motor equipment as is required for motor vehicles?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Ten safety standards for snowmobiles have been published in Part II of the Canada Gazette of November 25, 1970. Some of these standards have come into effect on January 1, 1971, and others will come into effect on April 1, 1971, and February 1, 1972. Improvements, refinements and additional standards are being considered.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—RECRUITING POLICY

Question No. 977—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Does the Department of National Defence now restrict the number of recruits accepted into the Canadian Armed Forces on a provincial or regional basis and, if not, is consideration being given to such a procedure?

2. If restrictions by provinces and regions are being considered, what is the total allowable number for each province or region and, if not already in practice, when will such policy be implemented?

3. By month, what has been the number of recruits by province or region up to and including January, 1971 for each of the past 13 months?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): 1 and 2. Annual quotas for the recruitment of men into the Canadian Forces are determined on the basis of projections of the manpower requirements on a trade-by-trade basis within the manpower ceilings. Monthly quotas to be used as guides in meeting recruiting requirements are distributed amongst 15 Canadian Forces Recruiting and Selection Units. Based upon population and past recruitment statistics the monthly recruiting target has resulted in the following approximate percentages being used as a general guide for the five military regions in Canada. Maritimes, 20 per cent; Quebec, 30 per cent; Central, 24 per cent; Prairies, 16 per cent; British Columbia, 10 per cent.

YOUTH

STUDENT SUMMER EMPLOYMENT—MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR PROGRAM—EARLY ANNOUNCEMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether there is a minister in charge of developing a program for this summer in connection with students?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my answer is that the cabinet is involved in constructing this program. I think it is substantially completed and I would expect an announcement in full of our intentions to be made in a very short period of time.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, in view of the lecture we had earlier this afternoon from the President of the Treasury Board about the importance of decisions, and since the vacation season for students will soon be here, in spite of all the snow we see around us, may we have a decision without further delay in order that any program the government proposes will have some possibility of being of some assistance to the students affected?

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure I can give an assurance to the Leader of the Opposition that our action will be announced in ample time to take care of the students who leave university after May 15, I believe.

Mr. Stanfield: Oh, come on; where do you live?

Mr. Laing: Well, probably we study harder in the province of British Columbia,—

Mr. Baldwin: And there is more need to do so.

Mr. Laing: —but that is when they leave university, and then there are those students who get out of high school on June 30.

CANCELLATION OF CONFERENCE SPONSORED BY CANADIAN COUNCIL ON SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the hon. Secretary of State.

In view of the questions which were directed to the Acting Prime Minister last Friday, could the Secretary of State tell us why the government has decided not to participate in the conference sponsored by the Canadian Council on Social Development?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I could not tell the hon. member which reason was determinant. Among others, I know that there was a problem of dates for this conference. I am aware also that other considerations were involved. It shall please me very much to summarize them for the information of the hon. member, as soon as I can, but I understand that in the end there is no more talk of participating in this conference, because it will not take place.

[English]

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in view of the considerable concern voiced last week about the cancellation of this important conference on transient youth and summer employment for students, which was to involve not only federal but also provincial representation, I wonder if the Secretary of State would indicate whether at the planning stage this conference was not delayed by at least a month at the request of the federal government?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, as I have said before, there were major considerations, particularly conflicting dates. Last Thursday the Acting Prime Minister stated that we could not announce the particulars of the program because consultations were taking place with the provinces and these had to come to an end before any official statement was made. The same difficulty would have come up if the conference had been held; the organizers would have invited representatives of the federal government precisely to discuss with them the latter's projects, which could not have been revealed at the time the conference was held, as the federal-provincial consultations were still in progress. I am sure the hon. member cannot feel that, in a field such as young people's activities and student employment, we can neglect the position of the provinces which is an aspect of paramount importance in such an area.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Since the Secretary of State has indicated the government had no plans and therefore could not discuss them at this important meeting, did the government give consideration to the possibility of asking for a further delay or of indicating in any way its reasons for not participating in this conference, apart from the reason advanced by the minister that there had not been direct federal-provincial consultation, because it is the understanding, I think, that all provinces had expressed an interest in participating in this conference?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, I have never said that the government did not have any plans. I said the government's projects were ready; the Acting Prime Minister said so last Thursday; he gave general indications to the effect that the program was bigger and better, I believe. It will be better organized and more efficient than last year's. But what I said, and repeat here, is that considerations of time, that is the need to consult the provinces, have kept us from meeting the first date set for the conference, and in another connection, that the possibilities of consultation offered by that conference did not involve provincial governments but the delegates of private organizations, which would certainly not have been useless. But that is not the type of consultations we seek. The delay in announcing a policy is due to the necessity of holding consultations with the provincial authorities.

[English]

SUMMER EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM FOR STUDENTS—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State or the Acting Prime Minister when the federal government first started to consult the provinces about a specific program relating to students this summer?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I believe that I can give an answer and if my memory serves me well, the first discussions go back to the middle of February, or rather to the beginning of February.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are three members waiting to ask supplementaries. I realize that the matter is important, but to some extent it seems to me the discussion is theoretical since we are dealing with a conference which I gather will not take place. Perhaps hon. members might like to go on to another subject. However, I know the matter is important and I believe the hon. member for Egmont has a supplementary.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Yes, Mr. Speaker. May I say on the point of order before putting my supplementary that the importance of this question right now is that it raises basic questions about the possibility for citizen participation in a problem of tremendous importance—

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order, and I did not raise a point of order. I just indicated that we should not have too many supplementaries on this subject. I always try to bring this to the attention of hon. members at the beginning of the question period because there is a temptation to spend too much time on the first question and then we could fall behind in our schedule. That is merely what I wanted to bring to the attention of hon. members but not by way of a point of order.

CANCELLATION OF CONFERENCE SPONSORED BY CANADIAN COUNCIL ON SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, would the Secretary of State indicate whether in the planning stages of this important conference the federal government did indicate that it would not likely participate in or support the conference in order that some kind of alternative plan could be made, rather than wait until almost the last moment to scuttle the conference?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that the responsible authorities in the department are studying with the Canadian Council on Social Development other projects in order to establish if the objectives of this conference could be promoted by different means in the near future.

[English]

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State whether or not he can give us some assurance that some type of conference will be held so that young people will be able to express their opinions and points of view?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: This is exactly what I have just said, Mr. Speaker. My department is trying to make this kind of discussion possible, even after the failure of the conference.

[English]

SUMMER EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM FOR STUDENTS—PLACE OF APPLICATION

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Can he inform the House at this time where students can apply to participate in the program the government is proposing for summer employment?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I take it the question was serious and I wish to make the same kind of answer. We have asked them to register with Manpower.

Inquiries of the Ministry

IMMIGRATION

ADVERTISING PROGRAM IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES—ADVICE ON CANADIAN EMPLOYMENT SITUATION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It arises out of the increasing number of reports that recent immigrants to this country are claiming they came here on the basis of advertisements and advice given to them at Canadian offices overseas indicating there would be ample job opportunities, that they now find themselves out of work and on welfare and that many of them are applying to go back to their own countries disillusioned and angry. Is the department continuing its advertising programs in other countries inviting people to come to this country, and are prospective immigrants being advised of the unemployment situation in Canada?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as indicated in the House some days ago, the advertising of specific job opportunities was discontinued some months ago, although the general program indicating Canada as a place welcoming immigrants does continue. It is our attempt in every case to inform prospective immigrants of the exact situation in which they might find themselves in coming to Canada. Of course, we regret very much when people do arrive and feel they have not been properly informed about the situation. We make every effort to correct that and make sure they do understand. However, there is a significant time lag between the time they discuss these matters with our officers abroad and the time they are in Canada. This can sometimes explain a difference of view about the situation which exists here. Sometimes these conditions change very rapidly.

Mr. Douglas: I want to ask the minister why his department would have an advertisement, for instance, in the Daily Express of January 14 of this year, and also one in the Daily Telegraph, telling interested persons that Canada is a land of great economic growth, with a high standard of living and excellent opportunities, when at that particular time we had over 600,000 unemployed. Is there any liaison between the two branches under the minister's responsibility, manpower and immigration, to inform immigrants of the lack of suitable employment in Canada for a great many categories?

Mr. Lang: Of course there is liaison, and of course the remarks which the hon. member quoted about Canada being a land of opportunity, of promise and of growth represent something in which not only I believe but in which this government as well as most people in Canada believe.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: As I indicated earlier, our campaign is directed to keeping the image of Canada before people because we have no doubt the economy will soon be such that we will welcome—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Mr. Laing.]

Mr. Douglas: I just want to ask the minister one question. Would he undertake that, in conveying the image of Canada to people who might consider coming to this country, he will give them the facts as well as the propaganda?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

NATIONAL SECURITY

WAR MEASURES ACT—COMPENSATION TO THOSE ARRESTED AND RELEASED WITHOUT CHARGE

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Justice.

In the light of the statement made recently by Mr. Louis Marceau, the ombudsman for the province of Quebec, that he would recommend payment of indemnization for several persons arrested and detained under the War Measures Act, could the hon. minister tell us whether the cabinet has already looked into the question of indemnifying some of the persons held in jail?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice and Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, I should think that the recommendations of the protector of the people, Mr. Louis Marceau, would be submitted to the Attorney General of Quebec.

[English]

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Could the Minister of Justice indicate whether he or the Solicitor General has received a copy of the Marceau report, and whether any consideration has been given to participating in possible reparations to innocent persons who have suffered damages as a result either of the War Measures Act or the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I will want to read a copy of that report.

DESTRUCTION OF PHOTOGRAPHS AND FINGERPRINTS OF PERSONS RELEASED WITHOUT CHARGE

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Is the minister now able to answer a question that I have asked on numerous occasions, and to which allusion has been made by other hon. members, about the destruction of photographs and fingerprints? If not, could he not telephone the Minister of Justice of Quebec to get this matter cleared up?

Hon John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I am afraid I have not yet received a reply from the Attorney General of Quebec.

An hon. Member: How long, oh Lord, how long?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I intend to take up the question again.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

INCENTIVE GRANT TO ATHABASCA FOREST INDUSTRIES LIMITED

Mr. A. C. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): My question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Has the government agreed to provide a $12 million special area development incentive grant to Athabasca Forest Industries Limited and if so, when will these funds be made available?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, we are faced with an extremely important application which the department is studying. I cannot, at this point, say whether our response will be positive, or to what extent.

[English]

Mr. Cadieu: Is the government delaying a final decision because of representations by executives of other Canadian paper companies and, if not, will the minister make a statement to clarify where it now stands on this important loan?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, we will be considering all aspects of this application. I cannot at this time say what the response will be.

FINANCE

EFFECT OF UNPEGGED DOLLAR ON INDUSTRIES—DISCUSSION WITH QUEBEC AND OTHER PROVINCES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is for the Minister of Finance. Has the Minister of Finance had a meeting with Premier Bourassa, or has the premier of the province of Quebec requested a meeting to discuss, among other things, the effect that the continued unpegging of the Canadian dollar has had on major industries in Quebec? In addition, have there been any such observations or requests by premiers of other provinces?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): In the likely event that representations are made with regard to the impact on particular industries, has the government any plan to alleviate the heavy damage that has been suffered by certain industries?

Mr. Benson: I would say, without accepting the generality, that we are always willing to listen to people.

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): In view of the uncertainty caused by the continuing rise in the value of the Canadian dollar, will the government make a statement on its policy with regard to any further appreciation in the value of our dollar?

Mr. Benson: No, Mr. Speaker.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

PUBLICATION OF CORRESPONDENCE WITH BRITISH COLUMBIA ON DESIGNATED AREAS

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Coast Chilcotin): My question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, and arises from the request of the British Columbia government that certain selective correspondence regarding special area designation in British Columbia be made public. Will the minister assure the House that all the correspondence in this matter between his department and the B.C. government will be made public?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, there is no reason whatever against publication of all the correspondence exchanged between the two governments, but we will follow the usual procedure whereby before releasing any document we solicit the consent of provincial authorities.

EFFECTIVENESS OF LOANS AND GRANTS FOR WORKS PROJECTS—DISCUSSION WITH MUNICIPAL AUTHORITIES

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In light of complaints by the chairman of the Metropolitan Council of Toronto that federal loans and grants for works projects are so hedged about by conditions that they are useless and unacceptable, will the Minister of Finance consult with Mr. Campbell and other municipal authorities with a view to making these federal loans and grants effective in promoting employment which is so urgently needed?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): We have made the funds available and many of the provinces have taken advantage of them. I understand that the Ontario government, after the difficulties they have had in deciding who is going to lead the party, is finally coming forward and requesting funds. The process is a very simple one. We want to make sure that these funds go into useful capital works which will provide employment.

Mr. Bell: You haven't even got a party in Ontario.

Mr. Brewin: My supplementary question is a repetition of the first question which the minister did not answer. Will he consult with the chairman of the Metropolitan Toronto Council on how to make these loans and grants effective?

Mr. Benson: If the chairman of the Metropolitan Toronto Council wants to come and see me, I will be glad to see him any time.

TAPS PROJECT—MACKENZIE VALLEY ROUTE—STUDY OF ECOLOGICAL AND ECONOMIC EFFECTS

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): My question is for the Acting Prime Minister who is also the senior cabinet minister from British Columbia. Will the government institute an interdepartmental study of the ecological and economic effects of the TAPS project and the alternatives to that project?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Acting Prime Minister): I would think it would be improper for us to consider making a study of the TAPS project because that could not be done without visiting Alaska, and I would think that any committee set up by us might have no right there. At present, departments are studying very thoroughly the ecological threat that might occur as a consequence of pipelines running through Canada. That is very much our concern, and a great deal of work is being undertaken there. I am quite certain that if a decision were taken to put down a major pipeline through Canada in the Mackenzie Valley area, the consequences would be sufficient for the government to bring the matter before the House.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): I have a supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister. It deals with the possible pipeline through the Mackenzie Valley. Can the Acting Prime Minister indicate whether he foresees the construction of this pipeline as something that could be undertaken under the auspices of the Canada Development Corporation to ensure Canadian ownership?

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, I think that would be a matter for decision by the CDC when it is set up.

GRAIN

WHEAT—AMOUNT TO BE HELD IN COMMERCIAL STORAGE

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration in his other capacity as the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Having in mind the critical cash shortage in western Canada, with its resultant effect on unemployment, does the Canadian Wheat Board intend this year to reduce by 150 million bushels, the amount of grain bought and held in commercial position at the end of last year even though space is available?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is the intention of the Canadian Wheat Board to carry in commercial storage the amounts which are required to keep the system operating at peak efficiency, and to allow it to carry grains which may be required suddenly to meet specific demands. This will involve a lowering of the amount of wheat in the storage system, and there may be an increase in the carrying of other grains as these become more important export items.

Mr. Korchinski: Will this space not be filled up even for a general election?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

STABILIZATION PROGRAM—COMPENSATION TO FARMERS FOR FARM STORAGE

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. In light of the fact that the government's grain marketing and stabilization program will force farmers to store much more of their grain on their farms, is it the intention of the government to provide some form of special compensation to farmers to cover these extra storage costs?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the premise that the stabilization plan in any way requires the farmer to store more grain on his farm, although the over-all good of the farm community may well be served by grain which used to be in more expensive commercial storage being stored on farms instead. The stabilization program involves a significant government contribution to over-all costs and, therefore, improves the financial position of the Prairie farmer. It is not necessarily worth while, however, to look to a specific storage payment system and in fact it may be better to pay the farmer in full for his effort in the price he receives for his grain, rather than give him a portion for storage and a portion for the other costs involved in its production.

WHEAT—LEVEL OF EXPORTS TO UNITED KINGDOM—DISCUSSION WITH BRITISH REPRESENTATIVE

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister in charge of the Wheat Board whether, in view of the discussions which took place over the weekend between officials of the Canadian government and Mr. Rippon, the representative of the United Kingdom, concerning trade between our two countries, and in view of the fact that wheat sales were one of the matters under discussion, he can inform the House if he took part in those discussions?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I did take part in those discussions.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, in view of the decline in Canadian exports of wheat to the United Kingdom during the last several crop years, can the minister give an assurance to the House that Canada will be able to maintain or increase the level of its exports of wheat to the U.K. market in the years immediately ahead?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the discussions was to enable the United Kingdom to understand clearly our concern about access to the U.K. market, not only for wheat but also for coarse grains, and I think we made this very clear to them. The position of our wheat, of course, is rather special, in view of the general need for this kind of wheat by several countries in Europe, including countries which are already members of the EEC. This position is related to the quality of our wheat and it is our hope that we can preserve and indeed enlarge this market, but this will take a continuing effort on our part.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question. The minister has mentioned the fact that there is a demand for Canadian hard wheat in Europe and in Great Britain. From his discussions with Mr. Rippon did he gather whether or not, in spite of the fact that Canadian hard wheat is required, we will be required to pay the import levy? Has he any idea how much this levy will be, and what effect this will have on the price received by the western farmers?

Mr. Lang: The whole question of the levy system and the details of any such system are under discussion between the government of the United Kingdom and a number of other governments in the whole context of our respective rights under GATT. No firm announcement to my knowledge has been made yet, but the levy system can be one that involves levies only when prices fall below particular levels and therefore need not concern a specific grain except in special circumstances.

TRANSPORT

SHORTAGE OF FREIGHT CARS AT PRINCE GEORGE FOR MOVEMENT OF LUMBER

Mr. Robert Borrie (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister on an extremely urgent matter. As a result of a serious shortage of box and flat-deck rail cars at Prince George, British Columbia, the lumber industry has been required to cut operations back to one shift. Would the Acting Prime Minister advise if action is being taken to provide cars so that the lumber industry will not be faced with a 40 per cent or more lay-off in manpower within the next week?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I regret that the Minister of Transport is not on the roster today, but I can assure the hon. member that this problem is known to him. It is under the most urgent consideration at this time, and I would hope that it will be remedied in a matter of days.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISBANDING OF COMMONWEALTH COMMITTEE ON INDIAN OCEAN SECURITY—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. It refers to the same very important topic about which I inquired on Friday, namely, the status of the Singapore committee to study security in the Indian Ocean. Since the minister at that time said the government believed this was a useful initiative of the conference but that a meeting of the committee now would not be carrying out the purposes of the conference, would the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs consider preparing a statement on this very important matter so that Canada, its people and other members of the Commonwealth may know what Canada regards as its status and prospects?

[Translation]

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): I thought, Mr. Speaker, that the Secretary of State for External Affairs had answered that question last Friday. At any rate, I will reconsider the hon. member's question and follow it up this week, if necessary.

INCREASE IN CHARTERED BANK CHARGES ON CURRENT ACCOUNTS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. It concerns the increase in charges on current accounts announced by the chartered banks. In view of this 33 per cent increase, which is rather outrageous and certainly is inflationary, is it the intention of the minister to look into the increase in charges announced by the chartered banks?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter for decision by the banks. I certainly have observed the increases, but I have no right to dictate to them what their charges should be.

Mr. Saltsman: Since the banks operate with a minimum of competition and since such increases might spark inflationary tendencies, will the minister consider this a special case and refer it to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I will refer it to the attention of my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and I would imagine that the Prices and Incomes Commission would also be looking at the matter.

HIGHWAYS

ALASKA HIGHWAY—DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES AND BRITISH COLUMBIA GOVERNMENTS RESPECTING PAVING

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In light of the increased activity in northern Canada and the Yukon and to stimulate employment, is the government now holding discussions with the American government and with the government of British Columbia about the paving of the Alaska Highway? If not, is it likely that such discussions will be held?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government of the United States has passed a measure empowering a group of representatives of the United States to discuss the improvement of the Alaska Highway with the Canadian government. This is very good news to Canada because over a number of years we have maintained the highway at heavy cost but at a level which is inadequate if it is ever going to be a valuable highway. We are now awaiting the approach of the government of the United States, and will be most happy to discuss with them an apportionment of the costs to improve the Alaska Highway.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): With regard to the bills now before the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States concerning the apportionment of cost of paving the highway, is it the view of the Canadian government that those apportionments are acceptable?

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend from the Yukon is referring to a private bill that has been before Congress on a number of occasions, and upon which no action has been taken. There is indication in that private bill of a certain breakdown of percentages, and I can tell him that the highway, in respect of cars and trucks at the present time, is used 72 per cent by American vehicles. If that is a indication of an approximate or fair distribution, it might be a starting point for our discussions.

STUDENT LOANS—SUGGESTED CHANGE IN REPAYMENT REQUIREMENT

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): I have a question for the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. In view of the present and expected high rate of student unemployment, will the minister consider making amendments to the student loan regulations so that students will not have to commence repayment of loans until six months after obtaining employment rather than six months after completion of studies, as is the case today?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this matter comes up for discussion each year between the provinces and ourselves. Of course, my hon. friend knows that where special circumstances exist the lending institutions can make provision whereby the repayment of a loan is deferred until the student is employed. Indeed, the repayment period can be extended up to ten years; the specified starting date can be varied by the lending institution.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry I should like to direct a question to his parliamentary secretary. In view of the fact that reports I have just received indicate that one area off the southwest coast of Newfoundland has been fished out by foreign draggers and that they have moved to other parts of the southwest coast and are continuing to ignore the government direction to stay outside the 12-mile limit, what action will now be taken by the government to enforce the declaration of this limit?

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to take that question as notice.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of the important statement made in the House on Friday by the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, and in view of the fact that the minister is supposed to be in the House today according to the roster, and bearing in mind the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, can the Acting Prime Minister assure the House that the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry will be in his place tomorrow to answer questions on this important matter?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I anticipated that the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry would be here today. He was in Vancouver yesterday and I was in Vancouver—

Mr. Stanfield: Everybody is in Vancouver.

Mr. Laing: Everybody goes there eventually.

An hon. Member: How is the weather in Vancouver?

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS ACT

PROVISION FOR EXAMINATION, PUBLICATION AND SCRUTINY

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-182, to provide for the examination, publication and scrutiny of regulations and other statutory instruments, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I move:

That Bill C-182, an Act to provide for the examination, publication and scrutiny of regulations and other statutory instruments, be amended by deleting clause 10 thereof and that all subsequent clauses be renumbered accordingly.

It would be really wishing for the moon to have this motion accepted, Mr. Speaker. However, the clause of the bill which appears on page 7 of the amended text, as reported back by the committee, reads:

The Queen's Printer shall continue to publish the Canada Gazette as the official gazette of Canada.

If the simple tenets of statutory interpretation are applied to the words of this clause, the plain, grammatical, ordinary meaning of those words appear to be declaratory in nature; nothing more or less than that. The clause appears to presuppose that the public officer known as the Queen's Printer has been, and presently is, publishing and printing the official gazette of Canada known as the Canada Gazette. Given this premise, the clause would authorize the Queen's Printer to continue publishing and printing the Canada Gazette as the official gazette of Canada. Why was this particular clause included in this bill, Mr. Speaker? Is it necessary? Is there not a Queen's Printer?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The research people are working overtime.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Does he not print and publish the Canada Gazette, and is the Canada Gazette not the official gazette of Canada? I heard the minister interject just now. Not having spoken to anyone before, I asked the minister about this matter in committee, as he may recall, because the thing looked too pat, too innocent. My suspicions were confirmed. We will see where the argument leads.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

Mr. Baldwin: This government could not be innocent; it does not know how to be.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Let us look at the official gazette of Canada from an historical point of view. What I am concerned about is the statutory authority for the Canada Gazette, that is, the statutory authority for the publication and the statutory authority for the financing of it. Perhaps I can deal with the historical aspect in a moment. Nevertheless, the minister indicated that somebody slipped up in April, 1969, because we suddenly found ourselves without any statutory authority for the Canada Gazette. In all this fine moving around, and notwithstanding the advice of all experts the government employs, somebody dropped, so to speak, the Canada Gazette. Some interesting consequences flow from this and that is something at which the minister will have to look.

In chapter 7 of the statutes of 1869, which is slightly over one hundred years ago, we find an act respecting the Office of the Queen's Printer and the Public Printing. Section 2 of that act provided:

It shall be the duty of the Queen's Printer to print and publish, or cause to be printed and published, for the Government, under his Superintendence, the Official Gazette of the Dominion, to be known as the "Canada Gazette"—

In that quotation from the act of 1869 is to be found the statutory authority for the Canada Gazette.

Over the years, a department of the government of Canada was set up by Parliament called the Department of Public Printing and Stationary. The Queen's Printer was made the head of that department. The last statutory citation for the Public Printing and Stationary Act is chapter 226 of the 1952 Revised Statutes. Section 2 of the original act was carried forward into chapter 226, with only a slight change in wording. Until April 1, 1969, section 27 provided that:

The Queen's Printer shall print and publish, or cause to be printed and published, for the Government, under his Superintendence, the statutes of Canada, the official gazette of Canada, which shall be known as the Canada Gazette—

Then, on April 1, 1969, the Government Organization Act, 1969, came into force. Section 105 provided for the repeal or amendment of various statutes to the extent indicated in Schedule B to that act. Schedule B indicated that the Public Printing and Stationary Act, Revised Statutes, Chapter 226, was repealed. Thereby, the Office of Queen's Printer, the Department of Public Printing and Stationary, and the "Official Gazette of Canada which shall be known as the Canada Gazette" were abolished. As I say, all these were abolished.

Part V of the Government Organization Act, 1969, established the Department of Supply and Services. Section 48 reconstituted the Office of the Queen's Printer and set out his responsibilities. Section 48 reads as follows:

The Minister may, by order, appoint an officer of the Department of Supply and Services to be the Queen's Printer for Canada who shall, under the supervision of the Minister, exercise such printing and publishing functions for the Government of Canada as are assigned to the Queen's Printer by law or as may be assigned to him by the Minister.

In this section, Mr. Speaker, Parliament does not assign to the Queen's Printer the function of printing and publishing an official Gazette of Canada. Nor does it give to the minister power to authorize the Queen's Printer to print and publish an official Gazette of Canada. The power of the minister as to printing and publishing is set out in section 44(1) (d) which provides that the powers and duties of the minister extend to and include, "...the acquisition and provision of printing and publishing services for departments." Nothing is said there about the Canada Gazette. Parliament has not given the minister any power to set up a Canada Gazette. Parliament has not given to the Queen's Printer the function of printing and publishing an official Gazette. Certainly, it did not do so in the act of 1969. However, since the Department of Public Printing and Stationary, whose deputy head was the Queen's Printer with responsibility for publishing the official gazette of Canada, was abolished by the act, it is obvious that the Department of Supply and Services cannot service hat extinct department.

It is now necessary to inquire whether any other law assigned to the newly reconstituted Queen's Printer, under section 48, the duty of printing and publishing an official Gazette of Canada. Here, Mr. Speaker, I put the minister to the task of examining the Statutes of Canada and telling the House whether the statutes reveal that any law of this Parliament gives the Queen's Printer or other public official such authority to publish the Canada Gazette. There is no such law in existence at the present time. The various appropriation acts, based upon the main estimates and supplementary estimates for the fiscal years 1969-70 and 1970-71 show that money is voted for the activities of the Queen's Printer. There is mention of a publication referred to as the Canada Gazette; but there is no purpose specifically cited for this publication in these appropriation acts or the estimates upon which they are based. There is no mention that the purpose of this publication, the Canada Gazette, is to be the official Gazette of Canada.

I have gone into the historical background, Mr. Speaker, and I come now to the point made by the minister in committee, because he said that there is no requirement for statutory authority. There, I differ with him. This lack of a parliamentary authority by statute for the publication of "an official gazette of Canada" was confirmed by the minister in the reply to a question that I had put to him. May I refer briefly to page 17 of committee report No. 7 of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, of February 16, 1971, where the minister is reported as saying:

Clause 10 does not set up the Canada Gazette. Clause 10 does not set up the Queen's Printer. Clause 10 just says that the Queen's Printer is now publishing the Canada Gazette and it shall be the official gazette of Canada. That is all.

It is now necessary, Mr. Speaker, to inquire whether the Queen's Printer, under the words, "or as may be assigned to him by the Minister" in section 48 of the Government Organization Act, 1969, was assigned to print and publish, "an official gazette of Canada" by the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Richardson). That, Mr. Speaker, must be the chain of authority. It has been noted that the powers and duties of the Minister of Supply and Services, given to him under the Government Organization Act, 1969, do not authorize him to do this. A search of the statutes reveals that Parliament has not, in any other act, authorized him or any other minister to assign to the Queen's Printer the function of printing and publishing an official gazette of Canada.

In the absence of statutory authority, there remains only the crown prerogative. Has the Crown, in right of Canada, a prerogative to print and publish an official gazette of Canada?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): It is not a gazette.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It appears to be a prerogative power to which the Minister of Justice refers when he stated in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, at pages 17 and 18 of the committee report on the bill:

The Queen's Printer shall continue to publish. The money has been voted in the estimates regularly. There is no official authority for the official gazetting in the United Kingdom, Mr. Beseau tells me. Really, we are not creating the Canada Gazette by statute. We are just saying:

"10. The Queen's Printer shall continue to publish the Canada Gazette as the official gazette of Canada."

It has already been published. It is already found in the Estimates under whichever department it is. We are just making it the official gazette of Canada.

I could go into a very long historical examination of the crown prerogative. I could go back to the middle of the 16th century, but I will spare the House that exercise.

Mr. Baldwin: That is where the government is all the time anyway.

Mr. Lambert: The minister referred to the status of the gazette in the United Kingdom, and this is the only precedent he can follow. There is no statutory authority for the Canada Gazette, therefore the minister must fall back on the Crown prerogative. The Crown prerogative has its origin and source in the United Kingdom. I suggest to Your Honour that the two cases are quite different and, therefore, we must come to statutory authority. Whether we have an official gazette of Canada on a statutory basis or whether it is by Crown prerogative is not a decision for the minister to make, but for the courts. It is not for the minister to say that statutory authoriy is not required or that the authority is under the Crown prerogative. Even though there is a very fine question whether, having had statutory authority from 1869 onward the Crown prerogative was abolished at that particular point and the authority was actually taken over by this Parliament to establish an official gazette of Canada.

I must apologize to the House for having gone through a rather lengthy historical review of the antecedents and origins of the Canada Gazette. The decision on the question whether the Canada Gazette, as printed and published since April 1, 1969, to the present, is the official gazette of Canada, is for the determination by the courts. The Minister of Justice, the Privy Council, this House or Parliament cannot assume that constitutional jurisdiction. What this House must properly inquire into, what the Minister of Justice should fully disclose, is the necessity for and the consequences of including clause 10 in Bill C-182. Why is it there? If the Canada Gazette has not existed as the official gazette of Canada since April 1, 1969, what are the consequences?

The Regulations Act, section 6(1), requires that every regulation shall be published in the Canada Gazette. Section 2(a) defines "regulations" as including a "proclamation". Section 6(3) provides that no regulation is invalid by reason only that it was not published in the Canada Gazette but no person shall be convicted for an offence consisting of a contravention of any regulation at the time of the alleged contravention that was not published in the Canada Gazette. There is an exception in paragraphs (a) and (b) of subsection (3). These paragraphs read:

> (a) the regulation was, pursuant to section 9, exempted from the operation of subsection (1), or the regulation expressly provides that it shall operate according to its terms prior to publication in the Canada Gazette, and
> (b) it is proved that at the date of the alleged contravention reasonable steps had been taken for the purpose of bringing the purport of the regulation to the notice of the public, or the persons likely to be affected by it, or of the person charged.

As a matter of fact, those paragraphs contain some of the wording of section 11 of the present act. By way of an aside, it is interesting to note that even the alternative method of notice provided for in paragraph (b), is of no avail where a person is tried on a retroactive offence; that is, it is impossible to give him notice of a regulation (including a proclamation) where the alleged offence was committed before the proclamation was issued or the regulation made.

Section 6 of the Regulations Act hangs upon the meaning to be given to the words "Canada Gazette". The exception to the necessity of publishing penal regulations hangs upon the meaning of "Canada Gazette". Under the Canada Evidence Act, section 18, the courts must take judicial notice of all acts of the Parliament of Canada. The courts are under notice that there is now no statutory authority for the printing and publishing of an official gazette of Canada. I want to draw that to the particular attention of the minister. As it now stands, the courts are under notice that there is now no statutory authority for the printing and publishing of an official gazette of Canada. It is for the courts to determine whether they should convict persons who appear before them on an offence created by regulation, or under authority of a proclamation that proclaims a penal statute to be in force, on and after April 1, 1969, or whether they should convict persons charged with retroactive offences created after April 1, 1969.

I pause to bring to the attention of the minister the effect these words could have on a recent action taken by the government. A proclamation, special measures under the War Measures Act and regulations appeared in the Canada Gazette, but the Canada Gazette had no statutory effect. What this House should not do, and what the Minister of Justice should not lead this House into doing, is to pass a provision that may have retroactive penal effect on criminal cases now before the courts.

As well as clause 10, the Minister of Justice should explain to the House the change that this bill proposes to make to the exception in paragraph (b) of subsection (3) of section 6 of the present Regulations Act.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is a different amendment.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): This is the proposal contained in clause 11(2)(b), to which I also have an amendment. I will leave my discussion with regard to that particular point until we get to my amendment to clause 11. Briefly, Mr. Speaker, the purport of my amendment is to fully bring out in the open the fact that it is incumbent upon the minister to explain to this House why he wishes to make a change, and the purport of the change. Therefore, I say to him, clause 10, which purports to classify or to qualify the Canada Gazette as the official gazette of Canada, deserves a fuller explanation. Why is it being done? I suggest, and the minister himself confirmed this, that in the course of the preparation of the government reorganization bill of April, 1969, something was inadvertently done which removed the statutory authority which gave the Canada Gazette its status as the official gazette of Canada. This entrains consequences, and the consequences are those which the courts may have to consider. The minister owes it to the House to give a full explanation of the changes which are proposed and also, as far as possible, to answer the questions I have raised concerning the validity or otherwise of the official status of the Canada Gazette.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I reply merely in the terms of the submission I attempted to make before the committee. The purpose of this clause is simply to confirm the Canada Gazette as the official gazette of Canada. In the repeal of section 27 of the Public Printing and Stationery Act effective April 1, 1969 and the subsequent government reorganization measure, authority over the Queen's Printer was transferred to the new Department of Supply and Services—nothing more. The Department of Supply and Services now reports to the House concerning the estimates of the Queen's Printer. The Queen's Printer continues to exercise the functions he always exercised and among those functions was, and is, the publication of the Canada Gazette. The statutes which refer to the Canada Gazette refer to it as the Canada Gazette. I submit that the continuity of the Canada Gazette has existed in practice as endorsed in the estimates of the House. This clause does not provide that the Queen's Printer shall continue to publish the Canada Gazette as the official gazette of Canada; it simply provides it shall be continued as the official gazette of Canada.

At the present time, the Canada Gazette is recognized as being the official gazette, but this recognition needs a statutory basis, one which the clause in question will give to it. There has been no interruption in the authority for the publication of the gazette. It is published—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Under whose authority?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Under the authority of the minister, who was given that authority by the Government Re-Organization Act. The hon. member reads the words "if designated by the minister", and it has been so designated. The Canada Gazette retains its status as a journal in which documents needing publicity for validation must be published. Nevertheless, the clause itself does not revalidate the Gazette; it merely repairs a lapse whereby the Gazette was not defined as the official gazette of Canada.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Would the hon. gentleman kindly indicate on what occasion the minister designated the Canada Gazette in the terms he used and whether, in any case, he has the power to do so?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): He has the power under the section of the Government Re-Organization Act which the hon. member read.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): May I ask a further question? Since the Department of Public Printing and Stationery has been abolished, the authority of the minister can only be directed to existing departments—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The Queen's Printer remains with us. Authority was transferred from one department to another without any lapse.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I listened with a great deal of interest to the learned arguments put forward by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert).

Assuming for a minute that his point is correct, that between 1969 and the present time there was doubt as to the existence of the official authority for the publication of the Canada Gazette, then if the effect of clause 10 is to remedy what clearly, at the highest, was an error or a lack of clarity in the amendment of the statutes, and although this provision may have some retroactive effect, I think we should pass it. I say this recognizing that all lawyers and, I hope, all parliamentarians abhor legislation whose effect is retroactive. I have certainly made it my business to oppose such legislation in this House on a great many occasions. It seems, though, that the effect of this clause is merely to confer a degree of legality which was omitted through mischance or misunderstanding when the statute of 1969 was passed.

What is the alternative? The alternative would be to allow the void, the confusion, to continue indefinitely. I cannot see the point of that, and for this reason I find it difficult to support the amendment.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Might I ask the hon. member whether he, as a lawyer, would be prepared to accept a conviction based upon a regulation which had been published in a gazette for which there was no authority?

Mr. Brewin: If this clause is passed it will be a declaration by Parliament that it did have authority, and I would be in favour of making such a declaration.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Authority for the Canada Gazette lies in the fact that it is the Canada Gazette, not that it is designated as the official gazette. All the statutes to which the hon. member refers speak of the Canada Gazette. The legal power is not changed by designating it the official gazette.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): This is too fascinating an argument to avoid becoming involved in, Mr. Speaker. On the question of substance raised by my hon. friend from Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), I would think that when the government introduces legislation which contains a clause of a somewhat dubious character in terms of it being, possibly, retroactive in effect, responsibility falls upon the minister concerned to inform the House as to the background of the situation in order that hon. members may know precisely what they are being asked to do.

The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) has outlined circumstances which might warrant us in taking the course the government proposes, but the onus rests upon the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner), and in my view he has not sustained it up to the present. It might well be that if I were counsel defending some of those charged under the provisions of regulations enacted under the War Measures Act, I would look with interest upon this particular argument. I might be compelled to consider whether this would constitute a valid legal defence. However, it is not for me, or for that matter the minister, to decide this question. It must be left to the courts to decide. This argument must have some effect on our judgment when we consider passing the bill.

I should like to go on from that point very briefly because the question of the Royal prerogative has been raised. We had an opportunity during our committee discussions to talk about this Royal prerogative and how it is exercised. I have raised this question before in the House. We are driven to consider the effects of section 12 of the British North America Act which contains a code in respect of what the Royal prerogative is and how far it can go. I am not going to apologize for reading it all because I think it is pertinent. Section 12 of the BNA reads:

> All Powers,, Authorities, and Functions which under any Act of the Parliament of Great Britain, or of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or of the Legislature of Upper Canada, Lower Canada, Canada, Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick, are at the Union vested in or exercisable by the respective Governors or Lieutenant Governors of those Provinces, with the Advice, or with the Advice and Consent, of the respective Executive Councils thereof, or in conjunction with those Councils, or with any Number of Members thereof, or by those Governors or Lieutenant-Governors individually, shall, as far as the same continue in existence and capable of being exercised after the Union in relation to the Government of Canada, be vested in and exercisable by the Governor General, with the Advice or with the Advice and Consent of or in conjunction with the Queen's Privy Council for Canada,

In other words, as the situation existed in these provinces and the United Kingdom in 1867, the Royal prerogative is continued and has become capable of being exercised by the Privy Council here unless and until the Parliament of Canada alters, varies or amends it. I think there is no question that the Privy Council have the right to do so under any constitutional system of responsible government. At some time, and this is not the time to do it, I hope to introduce a measure to clarify the relationship between the executive branch of government, the Governor in Council and the Parliament of Canada. Far too long, in my view, the government has taken upon itself the exercise of powers, allegedly under prerogative rights. This exercise of powers should be challenged, and there should be some clarification. Hopefully these things are worked out in a constitutional and democratic democracy, as we have in the past by precedent, practice or common law.

When you find governments, in particular this government, exercising the kind of authority the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his Cabinet have been exercising, I think it is time we had some clarification of what their rights are in relation to the rights of the Parliament of Canada. This is a collateral issue which I now raise in order to bring it to the attention of the House and, hopefully, the country, so that something may be done. The fact remains, and this was declared unequivocally by expert witnesses who appeared before the special committee on Statutory Instruments, that whatever the rights of the executive might be under the prerogative, they were always susceptible of being altered or curtailed by the Parliament of Canada. I hope the minister will not disagree with that. The Parliament of Canada is not going to be too rapid in its attempt to do this because usually the government has an obedient majority which will see that its rights are not curtailed. Somehow it happens that it is always the opposition which wants to curtail the rights of the party in power.

In addition to that, these experts witnesses pointed out that these prerogative rights may be curtailed. My hon. learned friend, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), started to develop that argument. The Parliament of Canada, irrespective of the rights of the Governor in Council, under section 12 of the British North America Act, did in fact act by designating the ways and means by which there could be an official Canada Gazette in which regulations and statutes could be published in order to give them the force of law.

In many instances there is a right to enact regulations, Orders in Councils, and decrees, but they remain ineffective unless and until they have been published. They can only be published in some publication which has the assurance of being the officially designated organ for that purpose. Our Parliament did make such a designation.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Having done so, it has assumed the right to deal with what might have been part of the Royal prerogative, and having done so that right does not flow back to the government. To that extent, the hon. member for Edmonton West is quite correct.

In simple words, there has been a hiatus between 1969 and now, that is from the government organizational bill until this attempt to rectify this omission or what can be interpreted as an attempt to rectify an omission. I must part company with the minister when he suggests that clause 48, which was read out by the hon. member for Edmonton West, does give this right. This is the right dealing with the appointment of an officer, persona designata, to exercise certain authority and perform certain duties. This is not the case at all, and one would have to stretch and torture the ordinary meaning of these words to suggest that they confer any right on the minister or the appointed official to establish another publication which would have the force of an official Canada Gazette in which these respective orders and regulations must be published. That is the point I make.

It may well be the better part of wisdom for this House to pass clause 10, as it may be necessary to remedy that omission; that is the problem we are facing. The government attempts to show progress by bringing forward many organizational bills. We now have another one before us. I suggest you do not make progress merely by turning your watch ahead 24 hours. You must make progress in many more effective ways. The minister should review the situation and consult with his advisers, perhaps other than the legal ones. I suggested the other day that I would not in any event accept the advice of the Minister of Justice. That was not because he is not a good lawyer, but because he is the Minister of Justice and I would not be entitled to it. Perhaps his legal advisers are wrong, and they have been wrong in the past. It has been my fortune to successfully appeal judgments of various courts. In some cases, officials of the Department of Justice have advised their agents to continue prosecution and higher courts upheld my appeals. Fortunately, they are right most of the time, but there are times when they have been wrong and this may be one of those times.

I urge the Minister of Justice to review this matter. It is difficult to admit that we are not always right. I have been a married man a long time and I find it difficult to admit that I am wrong. As a practising lawyer, and as a member of the Opposition, it is difficult to admit one is wrong. The minister may also find it difficult to admit he is wrong. If he is wrong and clause 10 is now to have a retroactive effect, we should have a look at it to see what that effect will be. We must consider what its total impact will be, particularly having regard to the very important proceedings which have taken place before the courts in the province of Quebec. If we decide, with full knowledge of the facts, that it is competent and proper for us to review the submission we will do so. I do not feel this rather casual manner of bringing this before us will result in obtaining a debate in the House. Therefore, I have for that reason, after some consideration, decided to support my hon. friend from Edmonton.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I shall not be long, and I am sure if the minister finds any comfort in what I say he will regard it as the kind of comfort Job's friends gave Job. The fact is this situation proves that when these mammoth bills which contain many ramifications, such as the government organization bill, come up in this Parliament frequently we would be justified in calling them disorganization bills. I should simply like to quote from chapter 226 of the Revised Statutes of Canada 1952. I refer to section 27, which was wiped out by the reorganization bill of last year. The heading is "Canada Gazette, Etc.". It reads as follows:

The Queen's Printer shall print and publish, or cause to be printed and published, for the Government, under his superintendence, the Statutes of Canada, the official Gazette of Canada, which shall be known as the Canada Gazette,—

I think that is the designation of it right there.

—and all such official and departmental and other reports, forms, documents, commissions, and other papers, as he is required to print and publish, or cause to be printed and published, by or under the authority of the Governor in Council; and whatever is printed under his superintendence, by authority of this Act, shall be held to be printed by him.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the rather large mouthful that was knocked out when we passed the reorganization bill last year.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 1. All those in favour of the said motion please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): On division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion negatived on division.

Motion (Mr. Lambert, Edmonton West) negatived.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House will now proceed to motion No. 2.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I move:

That Bill C-182, An Act to provide for the examination, publication and scrutiny of regulations and other statutory instruments, be amended by deleting paragraph (b) of subclause (2) of clause 11 in lines 33 to 37 at page 7 and substituting therefor:

"(b) it is proved that at the date of the alleged contravention reasonable steps had been taken for the purpose of bringing the purport of the regulation to the notice of the public, or the persons likely to be affected by it, or of the person charged."

I do not wish to talk out my motion, Mr. Speaker, or suggest there should be opposition to it. In effect, I am restoring to the act the wording which existed for many years. What it really boils down to is that it is more difficult under the present wording for the Crown to convict on unpublished regulations and is harder for the accused to defend himself. This is the effect of paragraph (b).

An hon. Member: What was the reason?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): If the hon. member would please read the section, he would see that it was in much more general terms. Because of the changes with regard to unpublished regulations there is a strong possibility that by passing clause 10, as we just have, there shall be a retroactive effect in respect of criminal cases now before the courts. I was actually disappointed at the minister's rather too cursory, if I may say so, explanation of the government's case. It was only a slight expansion of what he said in the committee and what he said there was insufficient. I think the minister should explain why he wants to change this exception in paragraph (b).

We are now dealing with clause 11 in the Statutory Instruments Bill, Bill C-182, which proposes to repeal the present Regulations Act and incorporate its provisions in Bill C-182. Clause 11 (2) (b), at page 7 of the reprinted bill, reads:

(b) it is shown that at the date of the alleged contravention reasonable steps had been taken to bring the purport of the regulation to the notice of those persons likely to be affected by it.

If we compare that wording with the wording that has been in existence over a number of years, I would say there is a great deal of difference. First of all, in the proposed law the wording is "it is shown that" whereas in the previous regulations the wording was "it is proved". There is a world of difference between "it is proved" and "it is shown".

[Translation]

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): But the French version reads "s'il est prouvé"—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I am very grateful to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice, but I will say that if the French text were faithful to the English one, it would read "s'il est démontré", and not "prouvé". The texts must agree. If, in the French version, the word "prouvé" is used, a proof is required. In English, only a demonstration is required.

[English]

So, there is a difference in the wording. Secondly, we come to the question of what persons. The proposed amendment refers to "those persons likely to be affected by it". Who is to judge who is likely to be affected? What the minister is incorporating in his amendment today reminds me of a book by C. K. Allen. If I recall correctly, he might also have attended to lectures of the late Professor Cheshire of Exeter College. The British had the most fantastic regulations dealing with food production and the marketing of food.

One of the great stories Doctor Cheshire told was when he, on behalf of Exeter College, was duly summoned before a court to answer why the college had either produced too many or too few eggs on some distant farm the college owned in contravention of some government food regulation that had an index number a yard long. When an inquiry was made as to what this regulation was, it was found that the blessed regulation had never even been printed. No one but some dim-witted and very minor official in the food ministry was aware of this regulation. It seems to me that we are getting dangerously close to this when we say here merely "to the notice of those persons likely to be affected by it". Surely, the law has operated satisfactorily. Has there been objection to the wording which existed previously under the Regulations Act? Surely to goodness if we in Canada are going to insist that our courts not only do justice but appear to do justice, it is not asking too much that there be proof the regulation had been drawn to the attention of the person being charged. Surely to goodness, that is different from merely giving notice to the persons likely to be affected by it.

It seems to me that the original language was more felicitous; that is the burden of my argument. I must confess that I did not notice the difference between the English and the French texts, and I thank the parliamentary secretary for bringing it to my attention, but it seems to me that there is a clear difference between the words "shown" and "proved". I ask the minister to answer my point. I am quite prepared to meet him halfway, but let us get this clause straightened out.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): May I say first of all, without accepting the hon. member's amendment, that I would be willing to change the word "shown" as it is found in the bill at page 7 in clause 11 (2)(b), the first three words of which read "as it is shown", to "it is proved" to bring it into accord with the French version which reads "s'il est prouvé". Both versions would be interpreted together under the Interpretation Act, in any event, so if there is any way of doing that with the unanimous consent of the House, I think that could be registered.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that the amendment suggested by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) be adopted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Regarding the substance of the hon. member's argument, what he does in his amendment is to attempt to resurrect section 6 (3) of the Regulations Act. Under the law as it now stands, a conviction cannot be obtained unless the regulation is published or, if exempted from publication, it has been brought either to the notice of the public or the persons likely to be affected, or the person charged has been given notice.

What we have retained in our version are the words "to bring the purport of the regulation to the notice of those persons likely to be affected by it". I want to point out that under the present law these are alternatives, three choices. The law can be satisfied if public notice is given, whether or not the person or class of persons likely to be affected have or have not been notified. We think that is too wide. On the other hand, we think it is too narrow to ensure that a particular person who has been charged has been given notice if he is among a class of people whom the regulation is affecting and should have, in the ordinary course, received notice of it. On the one hand, we think there is not enough protection to the individual, and on the other we think it would be going too far to notify each individual who is a member of a class of persons who have had that notice if general notice has been given to that class of person whether he be a mariner, an airline pilot or someone involved in the distribution of eggs or poultry.

If general notice is given to the trade or to a section of the public, and if a person in the ordinary course would have had notice of it as a member of that trade or class of public, then we feel that that is a fair compromise. So, under the present law and under the amendment suggested by the hon. member, the options are too wide and too narrow. An official notice could be published in the Canada without it being brought to the attention of the people likely to be affected, and the conviction would be valid. On the other hand, if it were to be a requirement in every case that everybody affected by the regulation had to be given personal notice before any conviction would be valid, that would be going beyond the realm of common sense. That is why, of the three options now available under the law, we have settled upon the one that brings about a measure of fairness and common sense.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief on this particular amendment. As I understood it, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) said that his amendment would put a heavier burden on the Crown and that, on the other hand, it would add to the difficulties of the accused in one of these cases. If that were the correct interpretation, I would be very sympathetic to his amendment. However, as the Minister of Justice pointed out, my impression is that the original clause as it is before us has exactly the opposite effect. The amendment gives three alternative ways in which notice can be imputed to an accused. It can be imputed to him because notice would be given to the public; that is one alternative. It can be imputed to him because persons likely to be affected have received notice, or it can be imputed to him if he himself has received notice. Clause 11 (b), as it stands presently, is restricted to one way in which notice can be imputed, that is when notice has been given to those likely to be affected. It seems to me that that is narrower rather than broader than the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton West. For that reason, the explanation of the minister is satisfactory to me and I would be disposed to support the original clause rather than the amendment.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have some comments to make, but perhaps I may be allowed first to ask the minister a question which he might see fit to answer now. Having in mind the fact that this provision relates to criminal practice, would it be the opinion of the minister that part of the substance of any charge which would have to be proven by the Crown beyond a reasonable doubt would be the fact that such publicity had been given in such places, in such a way and at such a time, that any person who might be charged with an infraction of the regulation was made aware of it. Would that be the view of the minister? The minister nods his head. The reason I asked the question was that, in my opinion, the difference here was the notice to the public. As has been pointed out the phraseology contained in the legislation we are now considering is, "taken to bring the purport of the regulation to the notice of those persons likely to be affected by it". This is the whole problem so far as ignorance of the law being no excuse is concerned.

• (4:40 p.m.)

In this place we may deal with a very serious amendment to the Criminal Code, as we did last year and as we may be doing later this year. It is not part of the basis of any successful prosecution to be able to establish that a person charged with a breach of a new offence, no matter how substantial an offence, knew of that change. Are there any classical scholars here who know about the Roman emperor who, being compelled to publish his laws, published them on tablets of stone but hung the tablets up so high that nobody could read them? I would have been happier if the word "public" appeared in that clause because you could have imported from the word "public" that it was essential the regulations had been given such notice and notoriety that any member of the public would be aware of them. The reason for that provision is that regulations are usually passed and proclaimed in the secrecy of cabinet offices. I am not saying that is wrong, but I point out the contrast. When we debate legislative changes in this House, with the aid of our friends in the press gallery, a certain amount of attention is given to the changes.

There is one other matter which I should draw to the minister's attention. One of the reasons we are in this difficulty, which has prompted the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) to move his amendment, is that the minister and his officials did not pay enough attention to what the committee suggested. I will not go into that now. I will be able to show later on, when dealing with one of the amendments, the limited extent to which the government has moved in complying with the committee's recommendations. However, I know that any response appears to constitute a magnificent effort because before this legislation we had nothing, and now even going forward a modest few feet looks to be quite a feat for the government.

If we look at the third report of the Special Committee on Statutory Instruments we find one important recommendation on page 91. This recommendation resulted from a substantial debate in the committee as well as the views expressed by the people who appeared before the committee. My hon. friend from Greenwood was quite concerned about this; in fact he and I were both concerned about it. Recommendation No. 9 on page 91 reads:

> Before making regulations, regulation-making authorities should engage in the widest feasible consultation, not only with the most directly affected persons—

They would be those covered by the wording in the legislation.

> —but also with the public at large where this would be relevant. Where a large body of new regulations is contemplated, the government should consider submitting a White Paper, stating its views as to the substance of the regulations, to the appropriate Standing Committee. When enabling provisions and statutes are being drawn, consideration should be given to providing some type of formalized hearings on consultation procedures where appropriate.

Later on when we came to making suggestions as to the form of the scrutiny committee that should be established, this was one of the proposals which would invest that committee with some form of authority. I recognize that a recommendation of that kind cannot be fully implemented and incorporated into a statute but I do think that those who drafted this bill might have seen fit to incorporate somewhere, as a matter of principle, that regulations, as defined in the bill, should be submitted to this process of consultation with those members of the public most directly concerned.

The preface to the report contains this paragraph, Mr. Speaker:

> This report is based on the assumption that public knowledge of governmental activities is the basis of all control of delegated legislation. For parliamentary democracy is a system of government which requires that the executive be responsible to the legislature and that both be accountable to the people, and there can be neither responsibility nor accountability where there is no knowledge of what has been done. In political matters knowledge is the beginning of power, and its lack, impotence.

I quote those words to show that I am quite disappointed there was not in the legislation, not so much in the actual operative sections, but at least in the form of the preamble, a statement of principle to indicate that it was the intention of this parliament to direct the government, to engage in the widest possible measure of consultation before regulations are drafted. If that had been done, we would not have needed to worry about the amendment of the hon. member for Edmonton West. I must express my regret that it was not done. I hope that when this bill, which does break some new ground, is considered for review something of that kind will be done so that the government of Canada, whatever party forms that government, will have no doubt of what we intended when we were giving directions to the government at this time.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I was a member of the committee referred to by the hon. member who just sat down. I think it might be interesting to note that on many occasions we did give earnest consideration to how regulations, orders and other statutory instruments could affect the lives of people. Perhaps I could note two specific examples that came to mind. We could set up a regulation involving beekeepers, and the likeliest way of getting that to the attention of beekeepers would be to see it got into the hands of people who publish magazines specifically directed to the beekeeping trade. But then there was the other problem that every few months a division of the Department of Transport issues suggestions for the operation of airplanes by the airplane pilots of Canada. Mr. Speaker, as you would know from your legal background a suggestion as to proper conduct or standards of conduct, set forth in something like that would, if breached, at least give a prima facie appearance of negligence.

Yet we knew it would be futile to suggest that something perhaps as thick as Eaton's catalogue, being altered every few months by tearing out some pages and replacing them with others, should be published for the public at large. So, in a variety of ways, we did suggest means by which public notice could be given if public notice were required, or special notice could be given if special notice were required. I think, therefore, that what the minister has put in his proposed clause 11, subject to the requests we have made, probably better meets what the committee felt was the best approach for it. The words used are "reasonable steps," but the obligation is still on the Crown to prove that reasonable steps were taken. If an airline pilot is sent a handbook and doesn't read it, I think it is a fact that the reasonable step has been taken to bring it to his attention. If somebody subscribes to a fisherman's magazine in which there is something particularly pertinent to him but he tosses it in the wastepaper basket, I think one could say that reasonable steps have been taken in that regard as well.

I understand that the wording of the motion of my learned friend from Edmonton West was not that far from the minister's and now that the minister has amended the wording the hon. member would ask leave of Your Honour to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, having heard the explanation from the minister and the change in the wording, with the leave of my seconder, I would ask permission of the House to withdraw the motion. I hope we do not regret this particular step. I think there are still some difficulties, but I am not going to be that difficult myself. I would, therefore, ask permission of the House to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I was not going to give permission but the eloquent plea of the hon. member for Edmonton West has persuaded me, and the mute appeal of the Minister of Justice has reinforced that determination.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Before we withdraw the proposed amendment, I should like to know if it is withdrawn what happens to the commitment of the minister to change the word "shown" to "proved"? Will that have to be moved as a separate amendment, or amend this motion, striking out all the words except the words after "proved"?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, the Chair could correct me but I think the committee accepted this change of the word "shown" to the word "proved" in the text of the bill. It is pretty loose procedure—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On the point of order, may we just review that so that the Chair and hon. members are agreed? Is it the understanding that by agreement there was an order that the bill be amended by inserting clause 11(2)(b) in the English version the word "proved" for the word "shown"?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Line 33.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That was agreed. Is it agreed that the hon. member's amendment be withdrawn?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. Lambert, Edmonton West) withdrawn.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Peace River on a point of order.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The next motion is an exceedingly important one. Having in mind the importance of private members' hour, I nevertheless wonder if there is a disposition on the part of the House for Your Honour to take a hasty look at the clock and say that it is five o'clock now.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I look at the clock and ask hon. members for consent, perhaps I might refer to amendments Nos. 3 and 4. These have reference to the same clause of the bill, and in substance I think are essentially the same amendment. I wonder if the hon. members who moved the amendments might agree that they could be debated together in the one debate, and then if we so wish we could deal with them in separate votes.

Mr. Baldwin: I would think so, Mr. Speaker. Although my hon. friend from Edmonton West and I, through a process of intellectual osmosis, have arrived at the same decision, nevertheless he has gone a little further on collateral issues and has made proposals which I have not dealt with in my amendment. While I think we are ad idem in most aspects, there is this difference. However, for the purpose of debate I think it would be much better if we could debate both issues and the Chair would not call us to order if we happened to deal with an aspect of the amendment of the hon. member for Edmonton West which was not included in my amendment.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we will agree with that, particularly since it will be interesting to see how the two hon. members will reconcile the amendments.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is agreed that motions Nos. 3 and 4 will be dealt with in the same debate and hon. members will vote on them separately.

Is it agreed that the Chair shall now call it five o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' NOTICES OF MOTIONS

INCOME TAX ACT

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT TO PERMIT DEDUCTION OF COST OF TOOLS IN CALCULATING TAX

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville) moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that the Governor in Council will amend the regulations under the Income Tax Act whereby the deduction in computing income allowed self-employed professionals, tradesmen and workmen in respect of capital costs of tools necessary to their trade and similar property be extended to all professionals, tradesmen and workmen, whether self-employed or otherwise who must purchase themselves such property in the course of their employment.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I very much welcome the opportunity to again pursue the subject matter contained in this resolution. Basically, the resolution sets out to allow all tradesmen, workmen and professionals, whether self-employed or otherwise, the opportunity of deducting for income tax purposes any capital costs for tools and other equipment necessary in the discharge of their occupation.

When this resolution was before the House during the last session, it provided an opportunity for hon. members to express their reactions to the intent of my proposal. Upon listening to the remarks of those members who engaged in the debate, and upon subsequently reviewing their contributions in Hansard, I must say that I was gratified by their support and their acknowledgement of the fact that this inequity should be removed.

I was gratified by the remarks of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Danson) who stated, as reported at page 6316 of Hansard:

What we are looking at is the process of examining our tax structure and the hon. member's notice of motion, I think, should be given very serious consideration.

I want to thank the hon. member for those remarks because I think throughout the debate the spirit and the intent of my submission has drawn support from both sides of the House.

However regretfully, that is about as far as the government members went. They agreed that the act was discriminatory, that it was inequitable. They agree that something should be done. They agreed that the resolution was, in fact, meritorious. However, they then proceeded to cite numerous reasons, all of which were superfluous, which in their opinion, would make it difficult to incorporate the substance of the resolution into the act. The solution they offered in their submission was the rapid implementation of the Benson white paper on tax reform which, I submit, does not even render the slightest acknowledgement to problems which this resolution sets out to overcome.

At this point in time we have not seen the legislation which has continued to emanate from the proposals for tax reform. Judging from the committee reports of the House of Commons and the other place, together with the remarks of the three hon. members opposite who spoke last year during the debate on this resolution, I am fairly well convinced that the new legislation will give absolutely no consideration to the object of my submission.

I may also say that in my opinion, contrary to the opinions of hon. members opposite who spoke on this resolution, the white paper offers no solution to the discriminatory aspects of the Income Tax Act that is contained in the resolution which has been introduced. As a matter of fact, it completely disregards the subject matter which I hope this resolution will overcome. I am not going to reiterate or cite the numerous reasons for the introduction of my resolution and, of course, the logical need for incorporating such a measure. All hon. members who spoke supported the principle and the intent of the suggestion, but had reservations about the manner in which I proposed it might be incorporated.

I believe that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) pointed out a valid observation in his presentation when he suggested that the Governor in Council did not have the power under the Income Tax Act to amend the regulations to incorporate the purpose of my notice of motion. He further stated that, in his opinion, in order to accomplish the purpose of this motion an amendment to the act would be required rather than to the regulations. He referred specifically to section 5 of the Income Tax Act.

I thank the hon. member for his submission and also for the fact that he was not quite as cynical as the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney) when he placed his support and his evidence before the House. I must say that the hon. member for Calgary South spoke in such an authoritative and critical manner that any sympathy he may have felt for the notice of motion was completely obscured. What I want to do today is outline specifically the relative ease with which this motion could be adopted and incorporated into the regulations by the Governor in Council under the authority of the Financial Administration Act.

Under section 22, subsections (1) and (2), of the Financial Administration Act, the Governor in Council can effectively amend both the Income Tax Act and the regulations. Those specific subsections of section 22 read as follows:

Income Tax Act

22. (1) The Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the Treasury Board, whenever he considers it in the public interest, may remit any tax, fee or penalty.

(2) A remission pursuant to this section may be total or partial, conditional or unconditional, and may be granted—

The subsection goes on to cite three specific ways in which this may be granted. I wish to refer specifically to subparagraph (c), which reads:

in the case of a tax or fee, in any particular case or class of case and before the liability therefor arises.

If we apply this provision we shall see the result is that, notwithstanding the provisions of the Income Tax Act or any regulations thereunder, the Governor in Council can by Order in Council legally amend, revoke or render invalid the provisions of the Income Tax Act or the regulations thereunder in respect of any case or class of case before the liability under the Income Tax Act arises. Therefore, the Governor in Council could immediately for the taxation year, 1970-71, and for that matter any subsequent years or past years, extend the deduction presently allowed to self employed professionals, tradesmen and workmen who, by reason of their duties, are required to incur capital costs because of their particular type of work. This, I submit, can be done without any change in the statute, and it would be in harmony with the public interest, simply by remitting by Order in Council the tax which would otherwise be payable.

There are numerous precedents to substantiate this procedure. One merely has to look at the Public Accounts. I am referring specifically to Volume 2 of the 1969 edition. If one examines this Volume one will see examples to prove that this method has been used on numerous occasions and continues to be applied with relative ease. May I add here, also, that this is done with very little public attention, and little regard to the utilization, appropriation or misappropriation of public funds.

If we look at page 27-4 of the 1969 Volume 2 edition of Public Accounts, we shall find a review of all the motor vehicle companies which failed to live up to the terms of the Canada-U.S. Auto Pact and which were subsequently granted remission of customs duty and sales tax on certain motor vehicles, parts and accessories. We find that American Motors (Canada) Ltd. was granted $3 million approximately; Mack Truck Manufacturing Company of Canada Ltd. was granted $1,373,000 approximately, and that International Harvester Company of Canada Limited, was granted $3,747,000 approximately. Then, we come to a huge remission. Ford Motor Company of Canada Limited was granted $100,528,394. It seems strange and conspicuous that one of the most ardent promoters of the auto pact, Ford Motor Company, was the first company to fail to live up to the terms of the Canada-U.S. Auto Pact. I submit that it is certainly the company that can be charged with the highest degree of guilt in confiscating Canadian funds. It is quite obvious that the government has acquiesced in what has happened and accommodated the company, and that the government has allowed its powers to be "superimposed" by those of the Ford Company. I submit that if that does not mean special status, then the auto pact is not a reality.

[Mr. Mazankowski.]

Let us look at other examples of the government's utilization of the power under the Financial Administration Act. Under the category of "other remissions" on page 27-23, we find income tax remissions granted under "class of case" rather than to individuals. For instance, P.C. 1968-832, of April 30, 1968, authorized the remission of the amount of tax or penalty payable by any person under Part III of the Income Tax Act on interest on first mortgage bonds issued by Churchill Falls (Labrador) Corporation Limited. On that same page we can see a classic example of the retroactive powers of the Financial Administration Act. These are spelled out in instrument No. P.C. 1969-16/151 of January 28, 1969, which authorized the remission of income tax, interest and penalties to certain members of the Hutterian Brethren Church for taxation years 1961 to 1967. The rest of the notation under that item reads:

A study concluded that where the land and other assets, also profits arising from farming or other activities, are registered or held in the name of an incorporated company as nominees for the common use of each and all of the members, such colony or corporation is not taxable under the Income Tax Act but each member of a colony must include on his income his share of the profit attributable to the farming or business activities carried on by the colony of which he is a member. In the past, the majority of the members of the Hutterian Brethren Colonies did not apply for and did not receive payments under the Family Allowance Act and the Old Age Pension Act to which they would have been entitled if they had applied. The portion of income tax and interest that would otherwise be payable by the members based on the foregone amounts of family allowances and old age pension is therefore remitted, also penalties for late filing income tax returns for the years 1961 to 1966.

I submit that these two examples clearly illustrate that an accommodation, as suggested in the notice of motion, could easily be made under this act. That would avoid the discrepancies and inequities that are inherent in the present situation.

May I cite other examples of remissions, to be found at page 27-23. Some notable individuals are listed there. For example, we find the name of Mr. Lucien Saulnier. The notation reads:

P.C. 1968-15/2101, November 19, 1968, authorized the remission of income tax and interest paid in respect of the 1963 taxation year. It has now been ascertained that income tax and interest in the above amount were levied in error by a re-assessment issued in 1964—

That remission was $8,424. There is another one involving a gentleman by the name of Mr. Ivan Head, who is now a special advisor to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), as follows:

• (5:10 p.m.)

P.C. 1968/1189, June 28, 1968, authorized the remission of income tax applicable to 1967 and 1968 taxation years payable by Professor Ivan Head on $120 per month living allowance paid to him under the terms of an agreement with the Minister of Justice in connection with a special study of the Canadian Constitution.

With these examples, Mr. Speaker, I say to those members on the government side who were sympathetic to my resolution but who tried to confuse the issue that whether we set out to amend the regulations, or in fact the act, the government does have the power to carry out the intent of my resolution under the Financial Administration Act. It is nonsense to suggest that the government cannot undertake to incorporate into the regulations the provisions of the resolution I have submitted for the consideration of the House. The government can undertake to incorporate my resolution, if it so desires. All it needs to do is seriously consider my proposal. I suggest to them that if they have any doubts perhaps they might be wise to consult with the Prime Minister or his special advisor, Mr. Ivan Head, as to the validity of my proposal.

It is in a spirit of genuine concern for those workmen who, as I have suggested, are being discriminated against under the provisions of the Income Tax Act that I again introduce this motion with the hope that all hon. members will endorse it and that the government will immediately and effectively act upon it. Then, the principle of fair and equitable taxation may, in fact, become a reality at least for this category of employees. I might add that after having tested the feasibility of such a remission in this present tax year, and perhaps subsequent years, the government might very well make the remission permanent by an amendment to the Income Tax Act.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson)—Consumer Affairs—Request for investigation of spread in pork prices; the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom)—Youth—Cancellation of conference sponsored by Canadian Council on Social Development.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' NOTICES OF MOTION

INCOME TAX ACT

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT TO PERMIT DEDUCTION OF COST OF TOOLS IN CALCULATING TAX

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that the Governor in Council will amend the regulations under the Income Tax Act whereby the deduction in computing income allowed self-employed professionals, tradesmen and workmen in respect of capital costs of tools necessary to their trade and similar property be extended to all professionals, tradesmen and workmen, whether self-employed or otherwise who must purchase themselves such property in the course of their employment.

Income Tax Act

[Translation]

Mr. Aurélien Noël (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, in the first place, I am sorry to say that I do not agree with the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) who thinks that the new act will not take into account the existing injustices in the old act, and that nobody seems to care. I think that his assertion is spiteful and should not appear in Hansard.

I do not agree either with the statement he has just made about Section 22, i.e. that the Governor in Council can amend the Income Tax Act in any of the circumstances he mentioned.

He has done a good, not to say exhaustive job to find particular cases. I commend him for looking into all those documents and finding innumerable particular cases, but one has to refer to the act, after all, and the act is clear about this.

Section 5(1) of the Income Tax Act, which lists some items that must be included in computing income from an office or employment and some items which may be deducted, provides that there can be no other deduction of any nature.

One must distinguish between an office and employment, and income from property or a profession, from a trade or business.

The distinction is absolutely vital when the taxpayer is computing his income tax. In this respect, the Income Tax Act is exceedingly restrictive, if I may say so.

Section 12(1) of the act provide that:

In computing income, no deduction shall be made in respect of
(a) an outlay or expense except to the extent that it was made or incurred by the taxpayer for the purpose of gaining or producing income from property or a business of the taxpayer,

The act marks the difference between "wages" and "income", between "wages" and "fees", between "wages" and "income from property or a business", and this is very important.

There are doubtful cases and only in such instances is the Governor in Council allowed to give the benefit of the doubt to a taxpayer who has apparently been wronged.

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: What was doubtful about the Ford Motor Company?

[Translation]

Mr. Noël: That is exactly the case. It comes within the scope of a policy to assist a concern which needed to create employment in a region of the country. This again is a special case.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to proceed as I have several points to make. In view of the clearly established regulations concerning deductions, officials of the Department of National Revenue do not have authority to allow a worker to deduct the cost of his tools or a lawyer in receipt of a salary to deduct certain expenses.

A physician employed by a firm or an insurance company is not authorized to deduct the books or instruments he needs. These expenses are supposed to be paid by the insurance company or the firm employing him.

• (5:20 p.m.)

There are rather subtle distinctions to be made, in the Income Tax Act, and it is the Regulations, that have been established over the years that enable the taxpayer to interpret the act accurately in such cases.

Also, not only are the Income Tax Division employees not authorized to allow certain deductions of this type, but even the Governor in Council is not authorized to enact a regulation authorizing such deductions because the act clearly says that no deduction other than those specified will be allowed.

I believe the Income Tax Act should be amended by Parliament because it alone has the right to do so.

I have been hearing for some time in the House that the act is what the government makes it, which is not true. The government is obliged to administer act as edicted by Parliament.

Consequently, to implement the proposed motion, Parliament should pass legislation. That is exactly what the government is proposing to the Canadian people. In fact, since 1962, it has tried to correct the many deficiencies which are to be found in the Income Tax Act. And this is what can be read in paragraph 1.2 of the white paper:

> For most of this decade the strengths and weaknesses of the income tax system have been studied closely and debated vigorously. Widespread recognition of defects in the system led in 1962 to the appointment of the Royal Commission on Taxation, with the late Mr. Kenneth Carter as chairman. In its monumental report published early in 1967—

—five years later! For five years, the possibility of improving the Income Tax Act was under study—> —the commission made serious criticisms of the existing law and proposed some fundamental changes. A vigorous public debate arose over the commission's report and the government received many letters and briefs concerning it.

If one wishes to read some interesting matter, one can read the briefs prepared by individuals, big companies, small companies, finance companies. Some were trying to throw discredit on the Carter report, others approved of it in part and I know of only one who was in favour of the whole report.

That being the case, the new government got busy looking for some other means of amending the Income Tax Act and of making it more humane, more just.

Therefore, after thorough studies and in the light of the sound principles outlined in the Carter Report, the white paper was drafted based on the following philosophy, and I quote:

> Let us look at the main points to be met:
> Canadians in the lower income tax brackets face a heavy total tax burden.

This answers the argument of my hon. colleague. An effort is being made to relieve the fiscal burden of the small taxpayer. I continue the quotation:

> In recent years sales taxes and property taxes have been increased substantially. Where changes in the income tax can provide relief, it must be given to those with lower incomes. The government proposes increases in the exemptions to ease the burden on these individuals and families.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vegreville will be pleased by this: We aim at easing the tax burden of small taxpayers, because they cannot deduct certain unavoidable expenses. To remedy the situation a new bill will soon be put, I hope, before Parliament, and not before the Governor General in Council, and the hon. member will then have the right to make himself heard.

There is another most important thing: we want to stop the abuses committed concerning the Income Tax Act. I keep on quoting from the white paper:

> Important forms of income and benefits escape taxation. The government proposes to bring them into taxable income.

In particular, a tax on capital gains is proposed. Some people spend their life consulting with experts so as to achieve, instead of an income, a capital gain which, according to the present Income Tax Act, is not taxable. Capital gains are not taxable, and it is proposed to remedy this situation. I keep on quoting:

> Wage earners are unable to deduct many legitimate expenses from taxable income. New deductions would be introduced to benefit employees and working mothers.

The answer to the motion under consideration has appeared in the white paper since November 1969. We are therefore partly acquainted with the government attitude, as stated in its white paper.

Now, to be more specific let us see what the white paper says in connection with employment expenses. Paragraphs 2.10, 2.11, 2.12 and 2.13 make clear what are the objects of the white paper, even if they are not flawless. The authors address the taxpayers in the following terms: Gentlemen, we wish to correct some deficiencies of the present Income Tax Act, but at the same time we do not intend to create new abuses. This is precisely the difficulty.

We have asked ourselves if we should accept as allowable expense any cost incurred by a laborer, such as the purchase of tools as well as the depreciation on them. What would then happen? Tradesmen would continually ask accountants to compute the depreciation on their immobilized assets for their income tax return. Such a procedure would needlessly complicate things.

So the simple rule contained in the white paper was decided upon. It is not the present law which could be criticized leisurely. The white paper says that it was concluded it would be better to allow these tradesmen a deduction of 3 per cent of their annual income. That was the best proposal for the time being and the people could be given the opportunity of expressing their views.

Here is what some people said. I shall quote only a few because the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs spent the summer reading briefs. We know for a fact that some are opposed to the 3 per cent deduction up to $150.

There were numerous briefs about employment expenses. I shall read excerpts of a few that criticize, some quite severely, the new fiscal proposal.

For instance, let us take professional engineers who incur expenses in the practice of their profession. Here is what they say:

Although we welcome the proposal, we feel it is inadequate.

I understand that; I would dearly like to pay little income tax.

The costs to the members of the liberal professions often exceed the maximum deduction allowed of $150.

I quite agree.

• (5:30 p.m.)

It is recommended that the 3 per cent maximum of the net income be retained, but that the limit of $150 apply only when it is not supported by proper receipts.

If a carpenter bought $500 worth of tools, every year he has to figure out the depreciation on each tool and jot it down on a piece of paper. Then, at the end of the year, he tells himself: I have to produce receipts. Does he have time to think of keeping his receipts? He has time to work, to earn a living, but not for accounting. Let every man stick to his trade, and the cows will be well looked after.

I shall now deal with the brief of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants. I feel they are well qualified to express an opinion on the question.

The brief of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants reads as follows:

It would be useless to authorize or force taxpayers to seek deduction for different expenses connected with their employment, because the administrative difficulties involved would far outweigh the slight increase in fairness which would result.

In another paragraph it is recommended to find some empiric scheme to allow small workers, small tradesmen who work for somebody else to deduct a certain sum of money which can be cumulative.

If one can deduct $150 a year for tools, in five years one will have quite a chest of tools.

The provisions of paragraphs 2.10, 2.11 and 2.12 are fair. I see nothing but fairness there.

One can read the following:

The commission recommended that expenses be deductible from wages or salaries if "reasonably related"—

This is the key word:

—"reasonably related"—

In the implementation of the Income Tax Act, one may find all kinds of abuses. Some are really deliberate but others are due to absent-mindedness or ignorance. That is what the law wishes to avoid by using a fixed term. That fixed term could be changed according to the comments on the part of the various public and private corporations, individuals, the Bankers' Association and other bodies. Only a few made recommendations, like the Canadian Conference of the Arts, the Canadian Bankers' Association and the Canadian Welfare Council. According to the latter, the method is good and could perhaps be improved somewhat.

The Canadian Bar Association, the Government of Ontario and the Canadian Chamber of Commerce also voiced their opinion.

To summarize my thought I shall say that the legislation is not made but it is being made. Everybody will have a chance to express his opinion in this regard. Its object is to protect the small wage earner. That is what my dear colleague was referring to when he spoke of the possibility of amending the law through regulations enacted by the Governor in Council.

The motion is not complete because it does not indicate clearly whether the proposed deduction would be granted as to the cost of all tools bought by individuals in the course of their employment or if it would be granted only in cases where the individual is not repaid for such costs by his employer. It should be more precise, should it not? Legislation must be clear, because people will give it different interpretations.

The Governor in Council, as I just said, cannot amend legislation through regulations if the question was not examined by Parliament.

Finally, why should such a motion be presented when we are in the process of amending the law with a view to improving the plight of the weak and to making the law more human?

[English]

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the notice of motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) is one that deserves very serious consideration by the House, perhaps at this time particularly when we understand that before long the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) will be bringing in amendments to the Income Tax Act and advocating them as reforms of our tax laws. The subject matter of this motion has been discussed at length in the House for a number of years. If the Minister of Finance fails to act on this kind of suggestion, then as far as I am concerned he will not be moved very far in the direction that I think should be apparent in necessary reform of the Income Tax Act.

The motion of the hon. member suggests that tradesmen and workmen who require, as necessary to their employment, certain tools should be in the same position under our tax laws whether they are self-employed or work for wages or salaries. This is a subject I have been raising in one way or another in this House since I first became a member in 1953. I have made various attempts to amend income tax proposals by the government. Most of my amendments have been ruled out of order by Mr. Speaker on the ground that they would affect the balance of ways and means and, therefore, could only properly be introduced by a minister of the Crown.

I would remind the hon. member for Vegreville that among past Ministers of Finance I have had the experience of pleading with Hon. Donald Fleming, who became Minister of Finance after the 1957 election and, more recently, the late Hon. George Nowlan who was Minister of Finance at the end of the period of Conservative rule. My pleadings fell on ears as deaf as the ears of Ministers of Finance including Hon. Walter Harris and Hon. Walter Gordon. However, one can always hope, and we welcome the fact that today various sections of the community are in favour of such an amendment to the Income Tax Act. It is being accepted by hon. members no matter where they sit in the House. I recall being greatly encouraged on one occasion when a group of members who now sit in the House under the title Ralliement Créditiste spoke during a debate I had initiated. Several members of that party rallied in support of this idea.

The hon. member's motion does not encompass the whole area of what I consider to be a basic discrimination under section 5 of the Income Tax Act. It leaves out the question of travel costs over long distances necessitated in respect of people who must travel to work from their residences. It does not cover the extra costs incurred by many married men who have to maintain a regular domicile as well as pay the cost of room and board out of their pockets while away from home.

This matter deals with deductibility of expenses incurred in purchasing tradesmen's tools and it is an important element in the discriminatory situation existing between self-employed and those who receive wages or salaries. One point I should like to make—and I hope no one sitting on the government side of the House will have illusions in this regard—is that the proposal which was in the White Paper, suggesting that there be a flat $100 deduction for expenses of working people on wages or salaries, is not by any stretch of the imagination an answer to this problem. When the Minister of Finance brings in his proposals for changes to the Income Tax Act, I hope he will not be bringing in that proposal from the White Paper, arguing that it is the answer.

I have submitted before in discussions in this House on the White Paper proposals that that particular proposal, far from removing the inequity referred to in this resolution simply creates a new one. In other words, it creates an inequity between those employed for wages and those self-employed, and leaves out of consideration the whole question of whether a particular workman or group of workmen who incur expenses in the course of earning their living incur expenses which go beyond those which everyone incurs in the ordinary course of living, that is, expenses for food, shelter, clothing, and so on. This aspect of our lives presumably is the aspect that is dealt with under the basic income tax exemption, however inadequate it may be. The principle is that there are basic expenditures which everyone has if he is to survive and this portion of the cost of living should not be subject to income tax.

Here, however, we are dealing with an entirely different area. I am sure, because of his motion, that the hon. member for Vegreville agrees with me that the source of the income should not be the factor which determines whether or not an expense is incurred in the course of earning a living. This is where the Income Tax Act, in particular section 5, makes an outright discrimination against all people who are not self-employed, because it sets out very specifically that certain deductions, and these only, may be made from taxable income and makes it impossible for anyone in a trade or profession who is employed for a salary or wage to deduct as an expense incurred in making his living expenses which are perfectly acceptable for persons who are self-employed.

One might take the situation in respect of doctors and, in certain instances, in respect of teachers. One could go over the whole ambit of occupational interests of the Canadian people and find cases where this type of discrimination exists because the deductibility of expenses is determined on the principle of the source of the income, rather than on whether the expense is necessarily incurred in the course of earning that income.

I hope the fact that this motion has come forward for discussion this afternoon will not go unnoted by the Minister of Finance in particular and by other members of the House, so that with this debate as a background we can assess in respect of this aspect of the matter at least the amendments to the Income Tax Act which the Minister of Finance has said he intends to bring forward.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for York North (Mr. Danson).

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, first I wish to thank you for referring to my constituency as York North. My hon. friend from Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) referred to it as North York. North York is a municipality and York North is one of the finest constituencies in this land. It is like referring to the hon. member for Vegreville as the hon. member for Ville Vegre. I suppose members on the other side of the House do get things backward at times.

I am delighted that the hon. member has again brought forward this motion. We discussed it briefly during the hearings in respect of the white paper on tax reform. Some of us who were involved in those hearings were delighted to have the opportunity to discuss this matter in order to amplify our thoughts. This is one area the committee did not find particularly controversial. I should not deal with the legalities of the motion because these were dealt with ably by my colleague from Outremont (Mr. Noël).

There are probably all sorts of interesting stories one could relate in respect of the Financial Administration Act, and I would be glad to discuss some of them over a Coke later with the hon. member. We are talking about a matter that was discussed in considerable detail. We tried to arrive at the fairest solution, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) stated and has been stating since 1963. He is probably a man well ahead of his time. As I said, this matter was discussed at the hearings of the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. It is a fact that some people must have books and typewriters, and Members of Parliament have numerous expenses none of which are deductible.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to the report of the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs relating to the white paper proposals on tax reform. I refer to sections 2 to 15, but more specifically to sections 2 to 13. A general deduction for employment expenses at 3 per cent of gross employment income up to $150 is proposed. We heard a great deal of comment on this. I should not say a great deal of comment; we heard from many people but it was not highly controversial because we tried to arrive at something fair and reasonable. The comments which appear on page 16 of the committee's report are as follows:

It has long been recognized by taxpayers, and by the courts—both here and in Britain—that discrimination exists in the tax system against employees in the matter of deductible expenses. The self-same expenses are often deductible where a person is self-employed and not deductible where he is an employee; the height of absurdity is reached when one person acts in both capacities and receives different tax treatment for the same expenses.

Recognition by the government of this discrimination, through the white paper proposal to allow employees a certain measure of relief, has been generally welcomed.

I believe that has been inspired by members of the House on all sides, such as the hon. member for Vegreville, or the hon. member for Ville Vegre.

Its form, however is open to criticism. Some briefs have pointed out that the maximum of $150 a year is too much for some employees and too little for others. Those who do not in fact incur many, or any, expenses would benefit unduly; those who incur more than $150 would be unjustly penalized.

The ideal solution would be for all employees to submit detailed and authenticated claims, but the problems of administration and compliance that this would involve, and for very little result, seem to rule this out and to make some flat allowance, based on a percentage of gross earnings and with a ceiling—as proposed in the white paper—the only practicable way to deal with the majority of employees.

There seems to be no valid reason, however, why those who have higher expenses should not be permitted to itemize and claim them, if properly substantiated. Since it seems likely that relatively few employees would avail themselves of this, the administrative burden would probably not be unduly heavy—probably not nearly as heavy as that involved in handling the claims of the self-employed—and justice would be done. Most briefs have advocated that this choice be given.

It may be noted that in the United States employees may itemize and claim deductions of all "ordinary and necessary" expenses in the same way as the self-employed. Employees are still not quite as generously treated as the self-employed, however. The self-employed may deduct all "ordinary and necessary" expenses from gross income in arriving at "adjusted gross income", and take the standard deduction as well, while employees may deduct from gross income only expenses in four specified categories—reimbursed expenses, travel expenses away from home, transportation expenses and expenses of outside salesmen—and must then take either the standard deduction or their itemized expenses.

However, the United States law does recognize the basic principle that an employee has a right to deduct ordinary and necessary expenses incurred in carrying on his work.

We note that the revenue cost of the white paper proposals to allow the employees' general deduction, moving expenses and others amounts to 235 million. We therefore hesitate to suggest that employees' deduction should be broadened. We recommend, however, because the principle is one of equity, that this be considered as soon as revenue needs permit, and employees given the option to itemize, substantiate and claim deduction of all expenses "laid out or incurred for the purpose of gaining or producing income", in the same way as the self-employed now do under section 12 (1) (a) of the Income Tax Act.

That is the recommendation. The recommendations of the committee of the other place, as they appear at page 53 of their report, items 5 and 6, simply concur without comment with the recommendation and proposals which are on page 16. Those are the findings of the committee, after much study.

A great Talmudic scholar once said that to understand the Bible you have to understand the golden rule, and the rest is just commentary. My submission is that we understand the intent of the white paper proposals and that of the report of the committee. We can comment indefinitely because we really had to strike a balance between trying to achieve equity and maintaining the necessary revenue. The revenue consequences are serious indeed. In effect, we are suggesting that what appeared to be a highly acceptable proposal to those who appeared before the committee be implemented when the tax reform proposals are implemented in the House, and if and when revenue consequences permit that this principle be extended further.

We recognize the immense administrative burdens that this could cause. On the other hand there was a case for equity. I recall quite vividly, and probably so do my colleagues in the committee many of whom are here in the House today, trying to define what is a fair figure if we had to hit an average figure for purposes of balance in our report so that the majority of the people would be properly protected under this provision and it is different from general expense deduction, that is, 3 per cent of income up to $150. I was satisfied that it was equitable and perhaps even overgenerous, using the term generous in the more technical sense, than in most cases where tools are purchased; and I have had experience with this.

It is not perfect by far, but in the majority of cases it is adequate and fair. I think that is the most we can hope to achieve. Perhaps we strive for perfection; but like all ideals, you strive for it and perhaps never achieve it. I think we had to strike a reasonable balance and that in this proposal we achieved it, not only because of the many submissions put before us but because of the submissions made by hon. members such as the hon. member for Vegreville and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I could go on further but there are in the House today colleagues of mine who served on that committee and I think it would be wise if they were given an opportunity to express their views on this worth-while motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques L. Trudel (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, I have carefully listened to the motion of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) who is arguing that we should amend the Income Tax Law, with a view to meeting a genuine need, through the governor in council.

Some procedure, which has certainly been discussed by my colleagues, is under completion.

A moment ago, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) said that he has been presenting similar motions to the House since 1953. The member for Vegreville referred to a motion which he has again moved. I suggest that the procedure they have chosen to follow was not the right one and that we should rather support the government's proposal. Surely this request is legitimate and deserves special attention.

I would like to emphasize, as my colleague for Outremont (Mr. Noël) said previously, that the hon. member, to support his motion, has been resorting to the rule of exceptions rather than speaking about the substance of the motion. In a lengthy speech, he has been referring to exceptional cases and I think that, by so doing, he has very much jeopardized his position.

The hon. member for Outremont has quite masterfully explained the Income Tax Law. He has quoted sections 4 and 5 of the law. Moreover, he has alluded to section 12. I do not want to repeat what he said, but I should stress that he has demonstrated quite scientifically indeed how the Income Tax Act applies and how it must be amended.

Now he referred to the submissions heard by the committee. I must point out that these submissions were not unanimous in their contentions. Some people were entirely agreeable to the provisions of the white paper. Others however, members of totally different professions, spoke of both independent workers and employees who eventually become employers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair.

[English]

I have been sitting here for many weeks during private members' hour and have enjoyed very much listening to hon. members who have spoken. Perhaps they are the best debaters in the House. May I repeat what I have said previously, that it is unfortunate that certain debates have to be sandwiched into one hour.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS ACT

PROVISION FOR EXAMINATION, PUBLICATION AND SCRUTINY

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-182, to provide for the examination, publication and scrutiny of regulations and other statutory instruments, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I believe that just prior to 5 p.m. it was agreed that motions Nos. 3 and 4 would be debated as one question and that votes would be taken separately if requested or required. The motions will now be put. Mr. Baldwin, seconded by Mr. Bell, moves motion No. 3 as follows:

That Bill C-182, an act to provide for the examination, publication and scrutiny of regulations and other statutory instruments, be amended by deleting therefrom clause 26 at pages 12 and 13 and substituting therefor:

"26. (1) Every statutory instrument issued, made or established, other than an instrument the inspection of which and the obtaining of copies of which are precluded by any regulations made pursuant to paragraph (d) of section 27, shall stand permanently referred to a committee of the House of Commons, of the Senate or of both Houses of Parliament that shall be established before the coming into force of this act for the purpose of reviewing and scrutinizing statutory instruments.

(2) The Standing Orders of the House of Commons that are applicable to a standing committee of that House shall apply to the committee established under subsection (1).

(3) Where a statutory instrument stands referred to such committee, the committee has, in respect of such statutory instrument, the power to recommend that the same be approved, varied or repealed."

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West), seconded by Mr. Fairweather, moves motion No. 4 as follows:

That Bill C-182, an act to provide for the examination, publication and scrutiny of regulations and other statutory instruments, be amended by renumbering clause 26 thereof as 26 (1) and adding the following:

"(2) The said committee further shall have the power to recommend by way of report to the House of Commons the amendment, replacement of annulment of any statutory instrument referred to it.

(3) In the event that the said committee should in any report recommend the amendment, replacement or annulment of any statutory instrument such report shall be brought on for consideration in the House of Commons within fifteen sitting days after the tabling thereof in the same session, if such be possible, or within the first twenty sitting days in the next session following and any debate thereon shall continue subject to the Standing Orders of the House of Commons, until the report shall have been finally disposed of."

As I have indicated, the discussion will take place on both motions, Nos. 3 and 4, at the same time.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I see the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Béchard) is here and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) is coming in. I am glad to see him here also.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I would not miss it.

Mr. Baldwin: I am particularly glad to see the minister here because earlier in the discussion on the motion put by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), when I was emboldened to point out that in my opinion the bill is a very skimpy edition of the proposals and recommendations contained in the report of the committee, the minister looked at me silently and reproachfully as if he were not ready to give much credibility to that statement. I could understand that coming from any other minister, but I think the Minister of Justice has read the committee report and I am convinced he will accept the fact that the bill is but a weak and puny version of the very reasonable and substantial recommendations made by the committee. I would have expected that kind of reaction from some of his colleagues who embrace the worst characteristics of the politician and civil servant combined—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): How many are there in that category?

Mr. Baldwin: I am not on the roster to answer questions today, otherwise I would. But I am sure the smelling-salts would have been brought down from their resting place in the cabinet room when the report of the committee was first circulated and read, because it contains recommendations and proposals which, while not going as far as I or some of my colleagues would have liked—those in my party and in the NDP—nevertheless it did make a very substantial beginning in dealing with this problem which we in Canada have neglected for a great many years.

I think on that point we can all reach agreement, Mr. Speaker. Other jurisdictions have dealt with it—the United Kingdom, the U.S., Australia, New Zealand, and so on—but in Canada we have not done anything about it. So when the committee laboured and finally produced what I thought was a pretty good report, I wondered how far it would get in cabinet and in the senior ranks of the civil service. Obviously there are recommendations in it which must be repugnant to senior civil servants for many years—I do not say this uncharitably and unkindly—have been used to having their own way, when it comes to the enactment of regulations and Orders in Council, without too much challenge in this House or in Parliament. I fully expected that some of the minister's colleagues who take the same position as civil servants would have felt the same way—but I did not think the minister would. I think he was just kidding me a little when he tried to intimate that so far as this bill is concerned it is a fair and accurate reflection of the committee's proposal.

It is true that the clause in respect of which my amendment has been moved does to a very limited extent follow the proposals of the committee. But I would say, Mr. Speaker, that it was one of those compromises which all committees have to work to achieve. I wanted the committee of scrutiny, which was to be set up by clause 26, to go a lot further in dealing with questions which were thought suitable for discussion and action by a parliamentary committee. But because we in the committee obtained agreement to other things, I was prepared to go along with this clause. As a foundation for my argument I would read the pertinent parts of clause 26 as follows:

> Every statutory instrument issued, made or established after the coming into force of this act, other than an instrument the inspection of which and the obtaining of copies of which are precluded by any regulations made pursuant to paragraph (d) of section 27, shall stand permanently referred to any Committee of the House of Commons, of the Senate or of both Houses of Parliament that may be established for the purpose of reviewing and scrutinizing statutory instruments.

The first point that engages our attention is that there is an exemption; that is the exemption set out in the next clause, clause 27, which deals with regulations that affect international relations, national defence, security or federal-provincial relations. There is obviously a very strong case to be made for a government to be entitled to say that in its opinion as a government the regulations it is proposing to promulgate do have an impact on and concern national security; that in those circumstances there is every reason for the government to exempt the regulations from the need for publication and, I suppose, ultimately from being considered by a committee of Parliament.

Certainly that is not the case with federal-provincial relations. As a matter of fact, if we consider the last two or three communiqués issued by the constitutional conference I can think of very little in those communiqués that would entitle the government to withhold them from the public view. The conference has done so little that there would not be much value in their communiqués and I do not think any parliamentary committee would be very anxious to discuss them. However, this is beside the point. The main purpose behind my motion does not relate to that particular aspect but to what will be the powers of this parliamentary committee. What will the committee have the right to do? What recommendations will it be able to make?

The report of he special committee which was the foundation for this legislation is very interesting. At page 86 of the report there is a very useful observation made about the report of the delegated legislation committee of New Zealand, and also an inquiry into civil rights which I think was brought about by the province of Ontario. I shall read the first paragraph:

> If Parliament is accepted as the sole legislative authority, and if by force of circumstances it must delegate some of its authority to others, then it stands to reason that the public will expect the Parliament to exercise something more than a merely nominal supervision over the work of those to whom law-making powers have been delegated.

I do not think anybody would quarrel with that observation. The second quotation I should like to make from the report of the inquiry into civil rights in the province of Ontario is as follows:

> It is a primary function of the legislature to make the laws, and it is responsible for all laws it makes or authorizes to be made. A failure by the legislature to find some specific place in the legislative calendar for supervision of subordinate legislation is, in our view, a dereliction of duty on its part and a failure to protect the fundamental civil rights of the individual.

Seven years ago this House, through one of its committees, took virtually the same position. The special committee that was charged with the responsibility of looking into the organization and procedure of the House, in a 1964 report made a categorical and unanimous recommendation urging the House—and, I assume, through the House, ultimately the government—to establish what it then called a committee on delegated legislation, which is simply another term for the same sort of committee of scrutiny envisaged in the legislation we are now considering, and giving to that committee very substantial powers.

Although that was the unanimous recommendation of a committee of this House, there was no opportunity to debate it: it was not the subject of any motion in the House. However, the government of the day took no exception to it. Members of Parliament had an opportunity in debate on collateral issues to commend this sort of approach to the serious problem of delegated legislation. So we have that recommendation made by a committee of the House. I have already read to the House two citations from bodies which examined this matter. In the result I think there should be no question of there being the need of a committee, one with the fullest right to examine delegated legislation and then to make recommendations.

The present clause 26 does not take this approach. Indeed, I look with some suspicion at the proposal contained in the clause 26, which provides that all that will happen is that every statutory instrument issued will stand permanently referred to any committee of the House of Commons, of the Senate or of both Houses that may be established for the purpose of reviewing and scrutinizing statutory instruments. That clause by itself is virtually meaningless and powerless. The reference to the committee may have a very useful and effective aftermath, but standing by itself it is useless. It is like the provisions of the current Regulations Act which provide that regulations shall be tabled. At first blush any innocent person reading that clause would have every reason to believe that regulations were tabled under the provisions of the Regulations Act, that committees and individual members of the House could examine the regulations and make proposals with regard to them, and if they came to the conclusion that the liberties, rights, prerogatives and property of the people of Canada were threatened they could do something about it. But that is not the case.

What will be the situation here? All that will happen is that the President of the Privy Council will from time to time at the commencement of each session table a list of regulations. In fact, he does not even have to table a list; he simply tables a copy of the Canada Gazette—the legality of which is now in doubt—which copy makes reference to a number of regulations. Nobody pays any attention to them. If an individual Canadian suffers damage and goes to his Member of Parliament or to a lawyer, he will find he has no chance to do anything to correct the situation. This is why it is not enough for the House to accept the present wording of this clause.

This sort of thing is not done in other jurisdictions. I admit that in Australia there is a committee of the Senate which I think makes a reasonable effort to examine proposals. I notice that in considering this point and what to do about it, the special committee was inclined to place too much faith in some comments made by the political scientist Bernard Crick, who in effect said, "Well, I don't think we want to go to the public. We don't want to challenge the government and we certainly don't want to put the government in danger". Consequently, he made what I think is a rather anaemic proposal in regard to what to do about this question.

In the United Kingdom I was able to observe the committee of scrutiny in action while I was over there several years ago. I asked for and secured an opportunity of discussing with Sir Robert Speed, as he then was, legal adviser to Mr. Speaker and who acts as special adviser to their committee of scrutiny, and also discussed with the chairman of the committee, Mr. Graham Page, M.P. and with the chief spokesman in the committee for the government, the way that that committee operates. I was invited to and attended two meetings where I observed the committee in operation.

That committee has a very effective way, administratively, of dealing with these proposals. I want to take a couple of minutes to enlarge upon this question since it is covered by my proposals. Sir Robert Speed, the legal adviser to Mr. Speaker, receives from the departments of government various Orders in Council and regulations which are covered by their terms of reference. Obviously, they issue a great many more than we do.

• (8:20 p.m.)

In Canada in the last 13 years we have enacted approximately 6,900 Orders in Council and regulations involving some 20,000 pages of fine print. We have dealt with, on an average, 530 of these a year. The British do a lot more than this. But there these matters are referred to the legal adviser to the committee, who vets them. Often he is able, from his experience and knowledge, to work out with government departments concerned variations, changes, adaptations, amendments and, in some cases, even the withdrawal of the objectionable parts of an Order in Council or the entire Order in Council. Others which in his opinion offend the terms of reference laid down, are referred to the committee.

The committee meets twice a month. I have before me an agenda of meetings of the committee. In one meeting, for example, 42 Orders in Council had passed through this sieve and were being considered by the committee. In another case there were 26. In each of those cases the members of the committee had a copy of the Order in Council complained of, and the comments of Sir Robert Speed. The committee met, and in three or four hours went through the regulations. In 75 or 80 per cent of the cases they were able to resolve the problem and given instructions to the chairman and to the legal adviser. In other cases they made recommendations.

To those who suggest that this kind of task lies beyond the scope of a parliamentary committee of this House which is provided with the proper degree of assistance to examine such Orders in Council I say that they are completely wrong and their notions are misconceived. A committee of this kind, armed and equipped with proper technical aids and with proper people to assist it, could very quickly develop an administrative capacity and a means of handling such Orders in Council. While the task of the committee might be difficult and lengthy, I am sure it would not be impossible. So speaking of the mechanical aspect, it is within our capacity to appoint a parliamentary committee to scrutinize such Orders in Council.

Having scrutinized them, what else should we do? Perhaps before the debate finishes this evening the minister will tell us what the government will be recommending with respect to a parliamentary committee with powers of scrutiny as well as other powers. I would much prefer that this be done now, before the bill passes, so that we know where we stand. I am not suggesting that the rules should be changed; nevertheless, I think there should be a definite understanding about how far the government is prepared to go in giving these powers and this authority to a committee of scrutiny. Clause 26 of the legislation is not authoritative in giving the committee the powers it should have.

Let us see what the committee had in mind when it brought before the House its third report which formed the basis of this legislation. I can bring this point forward simply and with reasonable expendition by referring the House to page 92 of the report where the recommendations are synopsized and the statements are in fairly clear, precise and limited terms. Paragraph 19 reads:

A new Committee on Regulations should be established, with the following particulars—

Then it lists the various pages of the document where the arguments have been examined and dealt with.

(1) It should be a standing committee of the House of Commons.

I pause here. There was some discussion in committee whether it should be a committee of the Commons or a committee of the Commons and the Senate. I think there is a pretty good case to be made for its being a committee of the House of Commons because its members are elected by the people of Canada. I think the authority should probably lie with them. Yet I would not be unwilling, if it came to a choice, to having members of the other place on the committee because in the other place there is an element of continuity which is sometimes lacking with respect to members of this chamber. There is something to be said for having the committee take up, at the beginning of each new Parliament, where it left off in the previous Parliament and having members on it with experience. However, I am not arguing that point.

(2) All regulations should stand permanently referred to it.

That is to be done under the legislation.

(3) It should strive to operate in an objective and non-partisan way.

Heaven help us, Mr. Speaker! We all try to reach these objectives. Sometimes we do reach them and sometimes we do not. I think a committee of this kind ought to be compared with the Public Accounts Committee which until recent times, when the government so unkindly attempted to change the powers of the committee, the chairman and the powers of the Auditor General, was reasonably objective and non-partisan, usually making unanimous recommendations and approaching issues referred to it in an objective, fair and non-partisan way.

(4) It should have a small membership to enable it to operate effectively.

That is agreed.

(5) To make the objectivity of the committee apparent, there should be some rotation among parties in the chairmanship.

I should like to take a moment to discuss that point. In my view the chairman should be a member of the opposition. In the Australian parliamentary system there is a Senate committee. We must bear in mind that there members of the Senate are selected through an elective process. Although the chairman is a member of the government party, the majority of the committee is made up of opposition members. I would think that the power of the chairman there is balanced by the majority of opposition members on the committee. I think a fair balance can be struck if the chairman is a good member. Nevertheless, I do not think I will live to see the day when this government will establish a committee which will have a majority of opposition members. There may be members on the government side whose views are opposed to that of the government but who are too timid to express that opposition.

Mr. Davis: Never!

Mr. Baldwin: However, I make this suggestion. When we deal with this matter either in the House or in committee, at the very minimum we should make certain that there will be a rotation of the chairmanship as recommended. I still think it will be better if the chairman is an opposition member. That is the custom in the United Kingdom. Mr. Graham Page, now a member of Mr. Heath's government, was the chairman of that committee for many years when other governments were in power. I should like to believe that the chairman of such a committee, which has responsibilities that ought to be above partisan considerations, will for most of the time be a member of the opposition. I continue quoting:

(6) It should normally sit in public session.

(7) It should be empowered to sit while Parliament is not sitting.

An argument was raised in respect of that point, Mr. Speaker. It was said that precedents going back as far as Sir John A. Macdonald's time indicate that there is no legal basis for a committee's sitting after prorogation. We challenged that to some extent, although we did not see fit to make the point a controversial one and bring it before the House. Nevertheless, since members of the House are busy, I think that a committee such as this might sit during some weeks when the House is not sitting, otherwise when it came back after a recess of three or four months it would be faced with a backlog of Orders in Council and regulations. I think that ways and means could be found of doing this. I am making this comment bearing in mind conditions as they are. I know it cannot be done now; I know it is not up to the minister to resolve this legal problem, but it is a matter we should consider.

• (8:30 p.m.)

(8) It should have adequate staff.

I have already dealt with that. I think this is a condition precedent to any measure of success, not only a staff large enough in number but one competent in terms of being able to deal with this question. When the committee has been in existence and has had authority for two or three years with the help of people like this, it will build up a jurisprudence. People charged with the responsibility of assisting the committee will be wise and reasonably able to cope with civil servants. The right kind of people will be able to prevent many of these issues coming to the committee.

It should examine regulations on the basis of six criteria.

Here I come to the foundation. I simply rest the case for my amendment on the recommendations of the committee.

(9) It should examine regulations on the basis of six criteria:

(a) Whether they are authorized by the terms of the enabling statute.

I do not think anyone will challenge that.

(b) Whether they appear to make some unusual or unexpected use of the powers conferred by the statute under which it is made.

I think that is a provision common to all jurisdictions which deal with Orders in Council through a committee of scrutiny.

(c) Whether they trespass unduly on personal rights and liberties.

Although not from my point of view, there may be some who would argue this. Some jurisdictions accept this principle. Having in mind the extent to which Parliaments are more and more trespassing on the rights, privileges and prerogatives of the individual, this is an absolutely indispensable part of the terms of reference of a committee. The statute might delegate authority to the Governor in Council, a minister or a corporation to take unusual and quite extraordinary action. It may be that they will do so without the government adequately explaining to the House the reasons for it.

There are some instances where these reasons are valid and where the government should have wide and extraordinary powers. However, we must never take away from this House or a committee of the House the right, under special circumstances, to say that when the government acts on the powers it has obtained, the effect of the actions are such as to trespass unduly. I stress the word "unduly".

(d) Whether they have complied with the provisions of the Regulations Act with respect to transmittal, certification, recording, numbering, publication or laying before Parliament.

I will not deal with this point except inferentially. With respect to the Bill of Rights, as I pointed out earlier, there is a case to be made for a committee having the right to examine the issues involved before regulations are promulgated.

(e) whether they

(i) represent an abuse of the power to provide that they shall come into force before they are transmitted to the Clerk of the Privy Council or

That is along the same line.

(f) Whether for any special reason their form or purport calls for elucidation.

In other words, if they are too complicated, if too much gobbledygook has gone into their construction, it may well be that a committee of ordinary members of Parliament will be established to try and simplify them.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

(10) It should have the usual investigative powers of a standing committee.

(11) It should have the same power as other standing committees to report to the House.

20. The Scrutiny Committee should have the power, in its discretion, to refer regulations to other standing committees and that they should then stand referred to such committees for consideration.

That proposal was made because the committee felt that this special committee which is to be established should not examine questions of policy, the drafting and promulgation of an Order in Council. However, if the policy in question were of such a nature that it cried aloud for consideration by this House, we felt it should be referred to the appropriate standing committee charged with responsibility in connection with the particular subject matter. In other words, if the Canadian Transport Commission promulgated regulations dealing with freight rates, as far as their form was concerned they might be perfectly all right. But if the issues of policy went far beyond what the committee felt was reasonable, that question should be referred to the Standing Committee on transport for examination. It would not have the power to set it aside but it could at least make recommendations.

21. Normally Parliament should exercise its power to review by a resolution that a questionable regulation be referred to the government for reconsideration but Parliament should continue to provide, where appropriate in individual statutes, for a procedure by way of affirmative or negative resolution.

There is some provision for that in the bill. Some members felt that the committee should adopt the views of Bernard Crick. They said that the committee need not have the right to refer, vary, affirm or amend. I disagree with that. There should be that right. We have it now. No one in this House can say that by a substantive motion or a motion on an opposition day it is not within the competence of this House to urge and recommend to the government that such and such an Order in Council is repugnant in our view to what is fair, just and proper, and to say that the Order in Council should be set aside, varied or amended. I recognize that this is only a recommendation and is not binding on the government; the government does not have to accept it. At least in such circumstances it would be necessary for the government to defend its stand, and it would be a foolhardy government which would ignore the recommendation.

If the members of a non-partisan, all-party parliamentary committee were to state that in their belief an Order in Council which they had examined fell within the meaning of the words and did "trespass unduly on personal rights of liberties", and recommended that clauses of the regulation should be varied and amended to conform with what they thought was right, I am sure the government would give it very serious attention. I do not think that anyone on the committee who feels as I do would suggest that any recommendations the committee might make would be binding upon the government. However, it would be a very foolish government which would refuse to pay attention to them. My own guess is that there would be very few occasions when it would happen. It would be extremely rare that a committee of scrutiny would find it necessary to make a recommendation to bring the matter before the House for debate. However, there would be cases when it would be necessary. I strongly urge that the committee's power be reinforced in the statute by declaration of this House along the lines of my amendment. It will have to be further embedded as a result of changes we will have to make in our Standing Orders.

I hope the minister will deal with many of the points I have raised. They are debating points. I frankly state that I have used this motion to make substantial and substantive recommendations. It was an opportunity to put forward my views with respect to this issue. I hope I have persuaded the minister of their valadity and that he will reply to them. He does not look like a hanging judge. He may even be persuaded to say that I am right.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have just listened to a very good Parliamentary speech on a bill which involves the rights of Parliament to supervise and control the executive in a way that we in Canada have neglected over the years. We have allowed, by way of wide enabling powers and statutes, legislation to be delegated to the cabinet, to ministers, to boards, to commissions by way of regulations and other statutory instruments beyond the control of Parliament, beyond the power of Parliament to review and revise and thereby beyond the power of the people to challenge.

I am accepting the invitation of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) to stray perhaps a little wider than the substance of the amendment because it goes to the very philosophy of the review of Parliament over delegated legislation. With the indulgence of Your Honour, perhaps I can meet his arguments on the terms on which he advanced them.

I believe this bill will provide better controls in the hands of Parliament over delegated legislation, regulations and statutory instruments made by government, ministers and boards. I believe, also, that it will provide a more open government because from now on, subject to narrowly defined exemptions, all regulations will be published in the Canada Gazette and this bill be enforced by means of a mandatory registration system whereby a regulation will not come into force until it is so registered and published.

Second, rules, orders or regulations governing the practice or procedure of federal judicial or quasi-judicial boards and commissions will be subject to the requirements of the new legislation. Third, members of the public will now be given a statutory right to inspect and obtain copies of statutory instruments and regulations, a right which they do not now possess. At the present time the public has no right to see or obtain a copy of any regulation or other statutory instrument having the force of legislation which has been delegated by this Parliament to ministers, to boards or other administrative bodies.

Fourth, a scrutiny committee of Parliament—this is the point upon which the amendment is based—will be given the right to examine all statutory instruments which are made or regulations which are passed. Fifth, the powers given to the Governor in Council to exempt regulations and other statutory instruments from the application of this provision of the bill are very narrowly defined. At the present time there is no restriction placed upon the cabinet or Governor in Council in the exercise of its power to exempt regulations from the obligations imposed by the Regulations Act. Now, the exemptions are narrowly drawn and they have to fit within one of the categories of clause 27 of the bill.

Finally, hon. members will henceforth receive a copy of every regulation which is published in the Canada Gazette. This may be a mixed blessing. It may provoke a further demand for office accommodation, but in any event the regulations will now be available and will be delivered to every Member of Parliament.

An hon. Member: The minister of manpower is smiling.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The hon. member for Peace River suggested I might have had trouble with some government departments in getting this bill before the House.

Mr. Baldwin: And your colleagues.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): And my colleagues. He is only too right. As a matter of fact, I am sure the only reason the bill is in its present form is the fact some of my colleagues and some of the departments have not fully appreciated what is in the bill. Certainly I have received better treatment in Parliament than I received in back corridor efforts to get this bill on the floor of the House. In any event, I want to answer the hon. member for Peace River and to assure him and this House that the recommendations contained in this committee report, one of the influential committee reports of this Parliament or of any Parliament—the report of the Special Committee on Statutory Instruments under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan); a committee which operated in a non-partisan fashion, as I think the hon. member will agree—have achieved almost complete legislative effect. Without going into those recommendations in detail, I want to enumerate them just for the record because, Your Honour, the hon. member has opened this up.

Members are free, of course, to look at the recommendations and the report of the special committee. The recommendations are to be found in summary form on pages 90 to 93 of the report. I do not have to read the recommendations; I can refer to them by number. Recommendation No. 1 was agreed to and is incorporated in the legislation. Recommendation No. 2 was partially agreed to. We had to provide for exemptions from examination, registration, publication and inspection somewhat wider than the committee thought advisable. Recommendation No. 3 was agreed to and is implemented in its entirety. Recommendation No. 4 was partially agreed to. The definition of "regulation" is amended, but not in the manner suggested by the committee.

Recommendation No. 5 is agreed to. Recommendation No. 6 is agreed to but will not be found in the legislation, of course, because it involves internal directives of the government and will be the responsibility of the Minister of Justice and the Deputy Minister of Justice. Recommendation No. 7 is agreed to. It will not be found in the legislation, but there will be a cabinet directive issued to all ministers directing in future that all enabling legislation should be drafted in accordance with the principles proposed by the committee as acceptable to the government and found in the evidence of that committee in the letter tabled by the former President of the Privy Council, now Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald).

Recommendation No. 8 is such that it cannot be incorporated in legislation. Recommendation No. 9 was partially agreed and it has been accepted in this bill, subject to reservations as to the feasibility of the white paper proposal. Recommendation No. 10 is agreed to and has been implemented already. Recommendation No. 11 has been accepted and agreed to by the government. Recommendation No. 12 has been agreed to and it has been implemented to the extent that regulations will, as a general rule, not come into force until the date upon which they are registered. Recommendation No . 13 cannot be implemented since for practical reasons some regulations cannot be registered and cannot be examined. Recommendation No. 14 in our view is not practicable in the sense that we cannot follow this in terms of a general recommendation.

Recommendation No. 15 is accepted in principle but, for the reasons given by the committee itself, cannot be dealt with in general legislation. Recommendation No. 16 has been implemented in its entirety in this bill. Recommendation No. 17 is implemented in part only for the reasons which were explained before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. Recommendation No. 18 will be implemented to the extent that it is proposed that a copy of part 2 of the Canada Gazette be delivered without charge to every member of the Senate and of the House of Commons.

Recommendations Nos. 19 and 22 relate to the establishment of a committee on regulations and a scrutiny committee. The government agrees in general terms to those recommendations and I will go into them in some detail because they are the ones to which the hon. gentleman has referred tonight. We differ from him in the sense that we believe that those recommendations cannot be incorporated in the statute but that they should be left to appropriate amendment of the Standing Orders or under a special resolution creating the scrutiny committee under the Standing Orders of this House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I went through that brief recital to illustrate to the House that if members are willing and able to review recommendations of the committee and compare them with the legislation, they will find that the committee report has been adopted in very large measure by the government in the presentation of this bill. What the hon. member for Peace River attempts to do by way of his amendment is to say that not only should we set up a scrutiny committee of this House or, as he admits, a joint committee of this House and of the other place, if that should be the wish of members of the House of Commons, but that in addition there should be two further statutory provisions. This is found in subsections 2 and 3 of his proposed clause 26. First of all, in subclause 2 of clause 26 he suggests as follows:

• (8:50 p.m.)

The Standing Orders of the House of Commons that are applicable to a standing committee of that House shall apply to the committee established under subsection (1).

I suppose that relates to recommendation No. 19, clauses 10 and 11 of the MacGuigan report. Then in subclause 3 the hon. member proposes:

Where a statutory instrument stands referred to such committee, the committee has, in respect of such statutory instrument, the power to recommend that the same be approved, varied or repealed.

We believe, first of all, that it is more appropriate for legislation to deal with general principles of law and for Parliament to decide if that legislation affects the operation of either House of Parliament and for each House to decide how the rules in that particular House should relate to the legislation. We do not believe it is an appropriate procedure to dictate to either House of Parliament how the standing rules of that House should be interpreted under the legislation.

What the government suggests here is setting up by statutory reference a scrutiny committee. We leave it to the House of Commons on the one hand and the other place on the other, or jointly if they should wish to do so, to decide how the Standing Orders should be amended or how the standing or special committees of the House should be fitted within the Standing Orders, along with what the powers of the committee should be. If hon. members are interested in my personal view as to what the power of that committee should be, I too can refer to recommendations Nos. 19 to 23, and I will not be binding my colleague, the government House Leader, who will be presenting the resolution on behalf of the government after consultation with other House Leaders.

I agree with the hon. member for Peace River that this ought to be a non-partisan exercise. We call it a scrutiny committee in the bill. Under recommendation No. 19 of the MacGuigan report it is suggested that this should be a standing committee of the House of Commons. I do not agree with that suggestion. The report then states:

All regulations should stand permanently referred to it.

The bill suggests that. The recommendation states:

It should strive to operate in an objective and non-partisan way.

I could not agree more.

It should have a small membership to enable it to operate effectively.

I agree. Then it says:

To make the objectivity of the committee apparent, there should be some rotation among parties in the chairmanship.

I think that is something the party leaders will want to work out.

The report continues:

It should normally sit in public session.

I agree with this, unless it involves regulations which are exempt because of national security.

Mr. Baldwin: That is why we included the word "normally".

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The next recommendation is:

It should be empowered to sit while Parliament is not sitting.

I have no argument on that score but I tend to agree with the hon. member for Peace River that this should be subject to the agreement of the House. It then states:

It should have adequate staff.

I agree with this. This should be done by permanent staff with only the contentious things being referred to members of the committee.

It should examine regulations on the basis of six criteria.

The report then enumerates the criteria as:

(a) Whether they are authorized by the terms of the enabling statute.

I agree with that. Then:

(b) Whether they appear to make some unusual or unexpected use of the powers conferred by the statute under which it is made.

I agree with the observations of the hon. member for Peace River in that regard. The next one is:

(c) Whether they trespass unduly on personal rights and liberties.

I agree with that. Then:

(d) Whether they have complied with the provisions of the Regulations Act with respect to transmittal, certification, recording, numbering, publication or laying before Parliament.

That refers to the statutory instruments bill if Parliament consents to it. The next one is:

(e) Whether they

(i) represent an abuse of the power to provide that they shall come into force before they are transmitted to the Clerk of the Privy Council or

Then it states:

(ii) unjustifiably fail to provide that they shall not come into force until published or until some later date.

At the time, I think the government was concerned that it should have a policy showing why publication is desired after the coming into force of the regulations. The recommendation then suggests:

(f) Whether for any special reason their form or purport calls for elucidation.

I agree with that. Then in paragraph (10) it states:

It should have the usual investigative powers of a standing committee.

I agree; but that should be left to the House of Commons or the Senate, as the case may be, and not included in the bill. That is why I reject subclause 2 as proposed by the hon. member for Peace River. Paragraph (11) of recommendation No. 19 states:

It should have the same power as other standing committees to report to the House.

I tend to agree, but again this is a matter for the Standing Orders and not for the bill. Recommendation No. 20 is:

The Scrutiny Committee should have the power, in its discretion, to refer regulations to other standing committees and that they should then stand referred to such committees for consideration.

I do not want to take a position on that because it tends to involve an old principle of renvoi. This is a question that can be discussed among the chairmen of committees when the scrutiny committee develops influence and prestige in this House. Recommendation No. 21 states:

Normally Parliament should exercise its power to review by a resolution that a questionable regulation be referred to the government for reconsideration but Parliament should continue to provide, where appropriate in individual statutes, for a procedure by way of affirmative or negative resolution.

The bill provides for an amendment to the Interpretation Act as to what is meant by an affirmative or negative resolution. This is a matter that can be worked out by the Government House Leader with the House leaders of the other parties. Recommendation 22 states:

The Scrutiny Committee should have the power to report at any time on general matters affecting the law or practice with respect to regulations.

I agree. I think that is one of the functions it should be seized with. But I reject the idea that the powers of this committee should be set forth in any way in the bill itself. I submit to Your Honour that the powers of this committee should remain a matter for debate when the House leader introduces the resolution for the establishment of a scrutiny committee, if Parliament consents to this bill.

The third subclause proposed by the hon. member for Peace River is to the effect that the scrutiny committee should have the power in respect of regulations and statutory instruments to approve, vary or repeal. I differ with him because the delegation of regulations and statutory instruments must remain in the first instance with the ministerial department concerned, the Governor in Council, the board or the commission. The executive remains responsible to Parliament, and Parliamentary responsibility, as I envisage it in respect of regulations and other statutory instruments, is to review them. The scrutiny committee will report to Parliament and, I imagine, in appropriate circumstances invite the minister, the department or the body concerned to see whether or not an amendment can be achieved.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the minister is deliberately misinterpreting me, but I never had that in mind. My amendment would deal with the power to recommend, and the recommendation could only be made to the government. I think there is a plain distinction. I put it on the basis that this is a power which presently rests with Parliament. This House can always recommend by making use of existing weapons and devices. I do not go beyond that. I would not attempt to suggest that this House should repeal or vary a regulation; only that it should have the right to act through the committee in making recommendations to the government.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I agree with the hon. gentleman that this can be achieved under the existing rules of the House or through whatever rules and powers are given to the committee. As the hon. member pointed out in his speech, this is a function or a power envisaged in a substantive motion by the opposition. In this way the matter can be drawn to the attention of the House, just as the Public Accounts Committee can draw great attention to many things in its report to the House.

The hon. member quoted some passages which appear at page 86 of the MacGuigan third report. I wanted him to go a little further into the committee's report because he admitted there was not unanimity in respect of the view he advanced. Below the citations to which he referred, the committee said at page 87:

> We are of the view that the benefits of the English system, which has been resorted to infrequently in Canada, as indicated above, can be enjoyed without any substantial resort to provisions giving Parliament absolute control over the operation of a regulation. We would refer to the following observations which have been made on this issue by thoughtful students of the parliamentary process and other responsible observers:

• (9:00 p.m.)

I want to quote one or two of those observers. The first is O. Hood Phillips, "Constitutional and Administrative Law", fourth edition, at pages 579-80:

> In practice instruments are never annulled, because the minister can count on the government's majority. Even if the government were "caught napping" the minister could introduce another instrument in identical terms. The procedure by negative resolution was seldom used before 1943. Its value has been questioned, but it has in recent years led to interesting and important debates. No amendment of the instrument is possible, although as a result of criticism the minister may withdraw it and submit another in a modified form. A better procedure might be to allow motions that a statutory instrument be referred to the government for consideration.

I agree with that and I believe the House has within its power the opportunity to refer the minister, through the report of the scrutiny committee, to the fact that the statutory instrument should be reconsidered. I believe the power of the House is sufficient for that.

Mr. Douglas: There is no guarantee that the report of the committee will ever be discussed in the House or that there will be a motion for concurrence. That seems to be the real weakness in the situation.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I could argue that point, but that, I would submit to the hon. member, is open to him and to the hon. member for Peace River to do when a resolution of the scrutiny committee comes before us. The burden of my argument is that this is a matter to be dealt with in the rules and not one which should clog the bill. I should like to cite Wade and Phillips, "Constitutional Law," seventh edition, 1965, at page 618:

> One common feature to all these procedures—

This is the scrutiny type procedure.

> —is that neither House has power to amend the statutory instrument. Although some feel that this should be possible, it might involve the House too closely in detailed consideration of matters which Parliament has already decided should be delegated to a minister it might give rise to complications and delay if each House introduced different amendments. It seems better that if a House is not satisfied with an instrument as it stands, the minister should withdraw it and start again.

I refer to one further citation from John E. Kersell, "Parliamentary Supervision of Delegated Legislation," 1960, at page 110:

> Motions for consideration seem a priori to be a realistic technique for gaining some parliamentary influence over subordinate legislation. British prayers for annulment and Australian motions for disallowance seem on the surface to give Parliament more effective powers of control, but as we have seen, such motions have little chance of success in doing more than can be done by the New Zealand counterpart—the motion for consideration... In New Zealand Members of Parliament can, if they are disposed, put their views and objections regarding sub-legislation just as forcefully and just as effectively to the minister, and through him to the departmental officials who, of course, in practice, administer and amend subordinate laws.

Dr. Kersell in expressing his views to the committee said this:

> I am not in favour of the annulling procedure at all. I think it would be more meaningful and more realistic to have a procedure whereby instruments would be referred to the government for consideration, as is the term in New Zealand. You are not telling the government that it cannot have this regulation. It is going to put the whips on it and acquire it in any case. That is referring to experience.

The burden of my argument is that the power of the committee really is to draw to the attention of the government, Parliament and the public the fact that regulations may contravene the criteria which have been advanced by the committee on statutory instruments and may go beyond the powers that are given in the statute, and that the enabling power in the statute itself may be drawn too widely, although that should be a consideration for Parliament in the consideration of the bill itself.

In summary, I feel it is up to the House to determine by its rules how this scrutiny committee should be set up. I think the government would prefer to see the flexibility of the rules of the House amendable by the House in respect of the operation and power of the committee. While I feel the executive is responsible to the legislature as it expresses its will on the breadth and scope of statutory instruments in the scrutiny committee, I believe the administrative power must remain with the government. The legislature has the power to throw light upon and draw attention to and the power to force government, by parliamentary scrutiny, to reconsider. I have confidence that the rules of the House can satisfy that need and are flexible enough that the committee would have ample recourse under the rules to bring any question to the attention of the House. I prefer to see what the hon. member is attempting to achieve left to the rules of the House rather than embedded in a statute.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I do not ask the minister to bind the government, but I hope that when the proposals are being considered in a resolution as to what should be the powers of the committee he would not object to the standard rules continuing. I refer to the standard rules which I am sure give to any committee the right to make recommendations. The Standing Orders provide that any committee may consider and report back. There is contained in the words "report back" an inference that the report can be wide enough to make recommendations. So I would hope that the minister would not object to a committee having the right to make a recommendation. I agree with him 100 per cent in that I do not think this House should have the right to vary or repeal regulations. However, I believe it should have the right to make recommendations for the consideration of the government.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The hon. member is asking for a personal view. He is quite right in recognizing that I cannot at this stage bind my colleague the House leader who is listening attentively to this debate. I do feel, however, that the committee should have the usual investigative powers of a standing committee in reporting to the House. As a matter of fact, the responsibilities of the Deputy Minister of Justice and my responsibilities for as long as I have the mandate given me by Parliament are made much easier if there is a strong and effective scrutiny committee, because any Minister of Justice can point to the committee report in respect of the criteria in a bill.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the two motions have been telescoped for debate purposes. I think we will see some differences in approach but I think fundamentally one will see, also, that the same end is achieved. I find myself immediately at a point of departure with the minister, particularly as a result of his latest intervention. It seems to me the House and the government have lost sight of what happens when a bill is passed. The government comes to Parliament to have a bill passed. That bill does not have one penny's worth of authority until the House has passed it. The cabinet can say what it wants, but unless the bill is passed by Parliament there is no authority whatsoever in the Governor in Council to make any statutory instrument. Parliament grants that power to the Governor in Council, to the minister or to the board, subject to approval, whatever the formula may be—but it is Parliament which grants the power.

I do not intend to discuss the contents of the committee's report concerning what statutory instruments might impinge upon certain guidelines. But surely to goodness, if Parliament grants the power, Parliament can take away or amend the power. If not, is it to be believed that once Parliament in a statute has given the power to make regulations, that power is forever gone? This is the first question the minister must answer. In our theory of government, can the minister say that this House forever abdicates its right with regard to amending or withdrawing the power to pass regulations? It certainly has that power if the appropriate legislation comes before it. The House can widen or annul the regulations if they come before it. The legislation may have to be brought before it by the government, not by the board and not by the minister but by the government, for the approval of Parliament, but the authority is that of Parliament and no one else.

To that extent I say the theory I shall advance is logical. I confess I find myself differing to some extent with my colleague from Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) although not in respect of the procedure. The scrutiny committee may examine legislation, it may comment upon it and it may suggest that it should be amended. It may also suggest that it be annulled. I must confess, also, that I believe the minister is attempting to be too nice to us. I will not call him naïve in this regard, but if a committee report should recommend a change in a regulation, make an adverse comment or report in respect of a statutory instrument or regulation, how does this get back to the House for consideration? Is it to be done by way of a private member's motion which goes to the bottom of the list unless the government makes room for it? A member of the committee may move that the report be adopted—for one day's debate on motions! Then the motion goes to the bottom of the list, if the government so desires, and it is forever gone. Under the House rules there is no way it can again be brought forward.

I am very sorry the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) is not here tonight. I trust he will be here before this debate terminates and before we reach third reading stage, because on second reading he indicated he wanted to participate in the report stage. As my colleague from Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) said, clause 26 is really the guts of this bill. He said a number of very pertinent things in the committee which I hope he will put on the record of the House. I hope, also, he will put on the record of this House the minister's answers in the exchanges he had with the minister. I intend to put on the record some of the things the minister said in his exchanges with me, because I believe they will point out the fundamental disagreement we have concerning the position of statutory instruments and how these may be controlled if we are to adopt the purpose of the scrutiny committee and take this bold step forward.

I was saying "Amen" to a lot of things the minister said tonight concerning the reasons why we should have a scrutiny committee. We are on all fours there. However, when it comes to the point, I find it rather strange for the minister to say it would be beyond the power of Parliament to either amend or direct the annulment of a statutory instrument. After all, is the power of the executive or of the minister, under some statutory provision, so supreme that they or he may make regulations for the effective administration of an act, a board or a commission and this is beyond the power of Parliament? If that is the thesis of the government and the minister, then there is indeed not only a cleavage but a gulf of difference in the approach to the theory of government as we have it in Canada today.

Statutory Instruments Act

• (9:20 p.m.)

As I have said, I hope my colleague, the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants, will refer to the views he expressed in his exchange with the minister. I now refer to committee report No. 7, page 10, where speaking to the minister in the more informal atmosphere of the committee I said:

I am going to pose a legal problem to you, Mr. Minister, in that the power of the Governor in Council was granted to it by Parliament in the original instance. In any statute, the Governor in Council is authorized by Parliament to pass the regulation and therefore Parliament should have the right to order the revocation of any regulation. To that extent, as I said in the House the other night, you have only gone part way. You have examined the patient, you have diagnosed his illness but you have not provided for the cure. I would say that Parliament since it delegated its power can withdraw and therefore there should be a means to do so in the legislation—not in the rules.

I insert a parenthesis here. The resolution setting up the committee and the rules that govern that committee shall be within the control of the government in the practical application of the practices of this House. It is not Parliament that will make the suggestion for a change in the rules, or has the initiative of setting up the resolution and calling for debate on that resolution to set up the scrutiny committee: this is entirely within the control of the government. I continue reading what I said:

You say "revision and scrutinizing of statutory instruments." I would say it must go further than that. Parliament itself can because otherwise once having granted the power to the Governor in Council, it is a power forever granted. I do not know who else has authority to initiate a resolution in the House. This comes to the problem of the rules. How do you get it before the House unless as suggested by my colleague here—

I was referring to the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants.

—that the report of the committee criticizing or recommending the revision or the striking out of a regulation shall be brought before the House within 15 days of the report being made? Otherwise, it is the Governor in Council that has the initiative of bringing in any resolution. No member of the committee could possibly do it because then it goes to private members' resolutions—to the bottom of the list. I put to you the problem.

The minister replied as follows:

I think Parliament is fertile enough in its procedures to make its weight felt through the committee on this matter and to bring it to the attention of the public and of the government's attention. If there would be enough automatic revocation power, two things would happen. The House would be flooded with resolutions to revoke particular regulations and also there would be uncertainty as to whether any particular regulation was going to be valid until revoked at some future time by a resolution of the House.

You get into the problem we face in law, of the difference between void and voidable. What would happen to people who had acted in good faith on a regulation only to find it later revoked by a resolution of the committee. We have to go on the assumption the government will be properly responsive to scrutiny by a committee of Parliament. If the government is not so responsive, it can leave itself open to a motion of want of confidence in the normal manner.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

I leave it to you in the House but I do not know how we could transfer from the executive to Parliament, the initiating measure either to pass or revoke regulations because of the blurring of responsibility that produces and because of the uncertainty in the meantime that it may produce.

I would like to comment on that passage, Mr. Speaker, because it raises some very interesting questions and, if I may say so, some rather dubious assumptions. First of all, under the motions before the House at the present time there could be no flood of resolutions to revoke particular regulations. Only the committee would bring in a report, and that is all we are concerned with. No one has suggested that individual members on their own initiative could bring forward resolutions to revoke or amend any regulation.

The minister mentioned uncertainty. Well, uncertainty has been created with regard to regulations in the past where they have been declared ultra vires by the courts. There is no question about that. How much more uncertainty would there be if, following the procedure outlined by the minister, a committee brought in an adverse report with regard to one or more statutory instrument? The minister says that a responsible government or a responsible minister would see that there was adverse criticism and would be moved to make the appropriate changes. But until that happened there would be uncertainty in the minds of the public. There would also be the question of prejudicial action having been taken under a regulation which is called into question. So the degree of uncertainty would not be one whit greater under the procedure I suggest than it would be under what I would call the benign assumptions of the minister. I will not call him naïve; I apologize for having said that before: they are merely benign.

Then there is the question of whether they are void or voidable, but under the legislation—and as outlined by the minister's thinking—any statutory instrument is voidable. If there is the possibility that the minister or the Governor in Council, in the face of adverse criticism, would change or revoke it, then to that extent it is voidable.

It must be understood, again, what my particular amendment seeks. My amendment simply says that the committee shall have the power to scrutinize and examine statutory instruments—it "shall have the power to recommend by way of report to the House of Commons the amendment, replacement or annulment of any statutory instrument referred to it." Let us stop there. Surely to goodness, the minister and I are ad idem up to this point, because he mentions committee reports. Then I go on to the next point because this is where we differ. But I repeat that we are ad idem up to the end of my proposed subclause 2. I express it a little differently. The statute says that a committee shall have the power to examine and scrutinize and the minister says that within the rules it will be able to recommend amendments. All right, Mr. Speaker, but I put it down in legislative form that it shall have that power, and not in the rules, because I maintain that the rules cannot be made with the same legislative authority.

As I say, the minister and I agree with respect to recommendation but in my motion I provide for an automatic consideration by the House of the report, through a motion to adopt or to reject it. The House will not say that such and such an instrument is hereby invalid. I go beyond the rules and want this principle expressed in legislative form, because the rules still depend upon government initiative.

It will be very interesting to see what will be proposed in the resolution to set up the scrutiny committee. The House might be beguiled into passing the legislation as it now stands and be completely silent on how the committee's reports may be considered. So I maintain that it should be provided in the statute, the same as it is in the Regulations Act and in the same way as there are requirements in any number of statutes that something shall be done within so many days if Parliament is sitting, whether this be the tabling of a document, of a report or of regulations. Therefore, I simply say in my motion that the committee's report shall be taken up and disposed of, if there is to be any amendment, withdrawal, annulment or otherwise—whatever is the nature of the committee's report—and that this shall be done automatically.

I do not need a rule change because I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that the government's resolution to set up this committee need not contain one iota of provision for consideration. The minister says that with respect to a committee report they will follow the rules. But I am sure the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) and others will ask, "But how many committee reports are not considered; indeed, will never be considered?" It is true that committee reports can be brought on for one day's debate, but that is not sufficient.

Frankly, I agree with the minister that the provisions for scrutiny, registration and so forth provided for under those clauses prior to clause 26 will go a long way toward guaranteeing that there shall not be any necessity for adverse committee reports. That is all to the good. But when he calls into question the purport of the amendment of my colleague from Peace River, and of my own, he somehow casts doubt upon the efficacy of the machinery that he has proposed for the preliminary screening of amendments.

I hope that the committee will have no adverse reports but will provide the ultimate seal of approval that the minister is seeking. I am not suggesting for a moment, whatever the composition of the committee, that it should have this power. But Parliament, yes. Parliament still has the supreme power, and it is here where the fundamental difference lies. I do not agree that a statutory provision that grants power to make Orders in Council or rules and regulations is a power forever given away.

The minister went on to say that there is a built-in procedure within the Interpretation Act, and since the minister raised this point perhaps I might deal with it. The minister referred to the proposed new section 28A, but I put it to the minister that the provision for a negative or affirmative resolution must be written into the bill. There is no provision in the Interpretation Act that such provision as to a negative or affirmative resolution shall automatically be read into any act. The proposed section 28A reads:

(1) In every act,

(a) the expression "subject to affirmative resolution of Parliament"—

Then the section goes on to describe the procedure. Reference is also made to the expression "subject to negative resolution of Parliament". I suggest that such provisions must first appear in an act, otherwise they have no application. All of this beautiful language could be a dead letter if the government—any government—as a standing rule of practice in the drafting of legislation omitted any reference to an affirmative or negative resolution. This is why I do not give it much credence. I do not think, in all honesty, that any member on this side of the House has sought in all seriousness to impose the restriction upon the power to make statutory instruments that they be not applicable until approved by Parliament. I think no record of that could be found and I agree with the minister that such provisions would not be practical.

Therefore, it is only in the most exceptional case that we would ever be presented with a provision within an act that provided that subject to affirmative resolution of Parliament there shall be the power to do such and such. Certainly we know why power is given to make regulations; it is for administrative convenience, flexibility and so forth, in order to make things move along faster than would otherwise be the case. Surely we are not going to say that having delegated such power we are then going to accept the fact that Parliament has forever withdrawn from the scene and will have nothing more to do with it.

Therefore, I urge upon the House the acceptance of the amendment standing in my name, which goes to procedure and authorizes a procedure that would be required to be approved in order for the House to consider a report on the status of a statutory instrument.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I can state my view on these two amendments very briefly. I am in favour of both of them.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is impossible.

Mr. Brewin: Well, then, one after the other. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) says that is impossible, and I will approve whichever one happens to be before me at the moment. I was a member of the Committee on Statutory Instruments and thoroughly endorsed the report issued by that committee. I think on second reading I congratulated the minister on introducing this legislation which, as he said earlier this evening, follows by and large the recommendations of the committee.

However, I cannot go along with the minister's reasoning in regard to these amendments. The core of the report of the committee, and I think the essence of this legislation, is the assertion of parliamentary control over delegated legislation. That is the real purpose of all this.

The essential instrument of that control appears in clause 26 which we are now discussing. Although there may be many other important provisions in regard to publication, the most essential provision of all is the establishment of a scrutiny committee of Parliament to assert its control over delegated legislation.

It is true, as the minister indicated, that a resolution will be put before the House by the House leader dealing with the setting up of a scrutiny committee. But what I like about the first of the amendments is that it provides that a scrutiny committee shall be established before the coming into force of this legislation for the purpose of reviewing and scrutinizing statutory instruments. I think it is as well that the statute make this provision because in my view the legislation without the committee is like Hamlet without the Prince of Denmark. The legislation would be inadequate. I think it should spell out that the two procedures, namely, the setting up by the House or by the Senate of the scrutiny committee and the enactment and bringing into force of this legislation are concurrent procedures—and they have my approval.

When he dealt with the powers of the committee, the minister said: Let the House determine by its rules what the powers of the committee shall be. I agree with the minister that many of the powers of the committee and many details of the committee's operations are rightly left to the rules of the House. But what the amendment is dealing with is not the details of the committee's operations but the fundamental function of the committee. It gives the committee not only the power to look at the statutory instruments that are referred to it; it explicitly gives the committee power to recommend that the same be approved, varied or repealed.

I think the minister pointed out that this power may be implied, that it may already exist under the rules of the House. I would ask him this question: Why should it not be enacted by a statute that in effect creates this statutory instruments regulation, and which incidentally I think should provide for the scrutiny committee to inspect and to regulate? I think the power to recommend that statutory instruments be approved, varied or repealed should be included in the legislation in order to establish the supremacy of Parliament. I think we are not dealing here with a minor matter but with a question of basic principle, namely, the supremacy of Parliament.

It is because I think the amendments make this clear—if they do not establish it—that I am in favour of the amendments. If amendment No. 3 is not passed, then my remarks will be the same on the fourth amendment and I will give it my support if it comes before the House.

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I hope you will be as indulgent with me as you were with previous speakers and will allow me to make some general observations on the two motions now before us. If Your Honour does that, I promise, when my turn comes to present my motion, not to be repetitive and to put my argument succinctly.

[Mr. Brewin.]

First may I make some observations and say what I hope the committee on regulations, or the scrutiny committee as it is called, will do. Recommendation 19(1) says that the committee should be a standing committee of the House of Commons. I hope that it will be a committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons, partly for the reason advanced by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), namely, that it would have continuity. Certain members of that committee would not need to worry about the quadrennial bugle call and rumpus of an election campaign and could keep their minds at all times on the regulations and other statutory instruments that the committee must scrutinize. As I say, they would serve on it continuously. Others of us might not be able to. The Senate members could be working when the rest of us were out on the hustings. They could be scrutinizing the regulations. For that reason I hope the committee is set up as a joint committee.

The second recommendation with which I thoroughly agree is the one saying that all regulations should stand permanently referred to the committee. My third and final point about the committee is that I hope its procedure will be flexible enough so that any member who is faced with a problem concerning any regulation can immediately take his doubts or his problem to the committee for immediate advice. Perhaps there would be longer range scrutiny of the matter.

If I could mention an experience of mine, perhaps it would bring the message home to the minister. Last year or the year before the Department of Fisheries passed some pretty stringent regulations which affected the rights of people to hold lobster fishing licences, to pass the title of a boat to other people or to hold that title in partnership with other people, and the like. This created a fair amount of correspondence with fishermen in the Halifax area. Sometimes one can be overwhelmed by a flood of letters and become unable to give proper advice. That is something I was faced with. If there had been a committee to which was attached a specialist, much like the Auditor General who helps the members of the Public Accounts Committee, it would have been a great help. I do not know what one should call such an official. Should one call him, perhaps, the scrutineer general, or the statutory instruments general?

Mr. Baldwin: Why not the grand inquisitor?

Mr. McCleave: The hon. member for Peace River suggests that he might be called the grand inquisitor. Grand or not, I hope that the person or persons permanently attached to the committee are knowledgeable.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Why not call him the legislative, or the statutory ombudsman?

Mr. McCleave: The hon. member suggests that he be called the statutory ombudsman. This place is throbbing with suggestions. I merely said that there should be a permanent functionary who should help this scrutiny committee. The points that appeal most to me are that the committee be a committee of both Houses, that all regulations stand permanently referred to it, for reasons I shall elaborate on in a few minutes, and that any member should feel that it is his right to take to that committee any problem that comes in his morning's mail, and that the committee with the help of the grand inquisitor or the statutory ombudsman will get to work immediately.

May I now refer to the points raised by the hon. member for Peace River and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). From the minister's remarks I had considerable difficulty in deciding if the bill went far enough or if it should have more teeth in it. Perhaps I could best illustrate my difficulty by quoting the evidence found in volume No. 7 of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, of Tuesday, February 16, 1971. At that time we were considering the bill. Before the committee were the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) and Mr. P. D. Beseau of the legislation section of the Department of Justice. I raised the matter originally in the way that is found at the bottom of page 9. I asked:

> The other question deals with the remedy, should a regulation or statutory instrument be found offensive in some regard. I take it that that committee reviews and scrutinizes it, but I am wondering whether we should not spell out a specific remedy in case the committee finds it wanting.

The Minister of Justice replied:

> Mr. Chairman, this enters, of course, into the relationship of the executive and the legislature. The executive is responsible for the preparation and issuance of regulations. We are providing through this bill a system whereby all regulations subject to certain narrowly drawn exceptions are published and sent to the scrutiny committee. The scrutiny committee will be a committee of Parliament. Parliament will have the recourse of drawing it to the attention of the executive by any means ordinarily available to Parliament, much in the way of the Public Accounts Committee or any other committee of the House.

That exchange ought to make us suspicious, because the Public Accounts Committee comes to this House almost every year with 20 or 30 recommendations. In any event, it comes in with a lot of flack. We sometimes hear complaints from the members of the committee that not all their suggestions are acted upon. I do not suppose all the recommendations of any committee can be acted upon; nevertheless, it seems to me that this procedure does not leave the members of the Public Accounts Committee as happy as they otherwise might be.

The following exchange also took place in the committee:

> MR. MCCLEAVE: We do get a report in which a committee has identified what it thinks is wrong about it but it seems to me that we should be taking it one step further to provide for it to be immediately or within 15 days brought for a discussion and a vote by either house of Parlement.
> MR. TURNER (OTTAWA-CARLETON): Could that not be left to the rules of the House and the resolution of the scrutiny committee as to how Parliament is to deal with it? We did not want to circumscribe how Parliament should act in this statute.
> MR. MCCLEAVE: I would be inclined to accept that but my colleague says no so perhaps I should throw it to him.

My colleague the hon. member for Edmonton West continued the discussion. Later, as found on page 26, that clause was stood at my request until I had had a chance to study it. After walking up and down the hall and talking to a few people about this, because I was concerned in case we were not developing an effective procedure, the following exchange took place:

> MR. MCCLEAVE: Mr. Chairman, I have had some discussion with my colleagues on this side about it and it seems to me that the right to make regulations is permanently referred to the committee to be established. So the committee can report to either Chamber that the regulation is excessive, unjust, or the like. This not only puts government on notice at that time, but there is no reason that the committee cannot next week come back and say the same thing, and say it over and over again, because the act is always there before the committee. A report on it does not render the committee functus with regard to that particular act or the regulation passed under it. I think in that respect we have a greater safeguard than the Alf Hales—

Instead of "act" I should have said that the regulations are there before the committee. The exchange continued as follows:

> MR. TURNER (OTTAWA-CARLETON): Public Accounts.
> MR. MCCLEAVE: Yes. In that respect we have, because they can become functus on something but the committee never could, as I read it.

• (9:50 p.m.)

The minister then said:

> The general umbrella is created by statute but it is up to either House to supplement it and put it through.

I said:

> But subject to perhaps stumbling on some better procedure I would be happy to accept it. I withdraw my objection.

Perhaps I am to be commended for that bit of caution at the end. Where I said there might be a better procedure on which we might stumble.

May I repeat the issue as I see it. The minister agreed that the regulation would always be before the committee and the committee could report on that regulation. It could report one week and, if the government took no action, presumably it could report the next week, and so on, if it felt very strongly what it regarded as an injustice in the regulation. The danger is that it depends on whether the committee is established as an independent committee; in other words, it will not be pushed around by anyone. If it were exercised enough, it could report to either House time and again. My remedy is fine in one respect, but not if the committee does not feel encouraged to always report on its difficulties.

The proposals of the hon. member for Edmonton West and the hon. member for Peace River do not state that the committee has the final say as to whether the regulation is defective. That is very important. It would be most improper to give any committee of this House the right to substitute its opinion for that of a government department with its expertise, the Governor in Council, the cabinet and their advisers. That would be wrong; also, it would be constitutionally unsound. However, I think the committee does have a right to express an opinion and to make a recommendation based on that opinion.

With the resources, expertise and common sense of the collective members, I think the committee has a right to report to this or the other chamber on any matter that has been referred to it. For example, they have the right to say that they have examined the regulations under the beekeepers act and feel that in some respects they are unjust and offend some of the rules laid down in the accepted Parliamentary practices of the world and, more particularly, the rules set forth in paragraph 7 (a-j) of the report of the statutory instruments committee. That opinion could then be tested. That is the real crunch in the whole issue.

I do not apologize for going into this matter at some length because I think we may reach a consensus. The minister is a fair man; he will listen to us. When the President of the Privy Council (Mr. McEachen) brings in legislation to set up the committee, many of the issues may already have been cleared out of the way. I do not apologize for scouting it at some length. Either remedy in the amendment before us seems to be very useful. The remedy suggested by the hon. member for Peace River, as contained in subclause 3, reads:

> Where a statutory instrument stands referred to such committee, the committee has, in respect of such statutory instrument, the power to recommend that the same be approved, varied or repealed.

That does not say "the power to approve, vary or repeal." It is simply a power to make the committee's opinion or recommendation known to the House. I think that is important. Again, we are not substituting a decision for that of someone else. We are simply stating whether we regard what has been done by the regulation-making authority is proper. It is up to Parliament to decide. No doubt the government, with all its abilities, will not have great difficulty if we are not on the right track. If we are on the right track, the regulation will probably be very quickly amended and the remedy secured without having to go to the House for a vote.

The other remedy, suggested by the hon. member for Edmonton West, is a little more complicated. It is set out in subclause 3 as follows:

> In the event that the said committee should in any report recommend the amendment, replacement or annulment of any statutory instrument such report shall be brought on for consideration in the House of Commons within fifteen sitting days after the tabling thereof in the same session, if such be possible, or within the first twenty sitting days in the next session following and any debate thereon shall continue subject to the Standing Orders of the House of Commons, until the report shall have been finally disposed of.

Again there is no attempt by the committee to substitute its decision for that reached by the minister, the Governor in Council or whoever has the power to make regulations. It is simply a right to comment on whether it regards the exercise of those powers to have been carried out properly, and to report to the House to have the procedure clearly spelled out so that all members can state whether they think the regulatory power has been properly exercised. Those are the main points. That is why I recommend either one of these two courses.

It is about half a minute to 10 o'clock. I understand that one member of the New Democratic Party, who is not present this evening, would like to speak on this matter. I also understand that the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) would like to say a few words on the subject. Perhaps the House would permit these hon. members to speak later on this important subject.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): If hon. members will allow, I will state the business of the House. Tomorrow is opposition day.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Tomorrow is ladies' day.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Tomorrow is ladies' day, sponsored by the New Democratic Party. According to the information I have received from the House leader, this bill will be called again on Wednesday. I think this has been a very useful debate so far.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF SPREAD IN PORK PRICES

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, on January 22, which seems quite a while ago, I addressed the following question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford):

> Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the spread in pork prices between the 20 cents a pound for dressed pork which a farmer receives in Saskatchewan and the retail price of pork products such as ham, which sells for $1.20 per pound, will the minister look into this price difference and consider appropriate action?

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, since farming began, farmers have been concerned about the fact that their bargaining position has not always been as good as it should have been. They hope that their bargaining position and their share of the consumers' dollar can be improved. I should like to address a series of questions to the minister or to the parliamentary secretary. First, I would ask him to look at this question and tell the House what action he is contemplating in connection with this wide disparity between the amount farmers receive and the amount consumers are paying. Does the Minister of Consumer Affairs concern himself about the difference in prices received by primary producers and those paid by consumers? Does he consider he has any place in this equation?

What check does he or his department make to find out whether someone is applying pressure in the marketplace? Is there a continuous check to see whether someone is applying undue pressure on the price of a product or a service, in this case the price of pork? Does he keep any consistent watch, if you will, to find out whether pressure is being applied? Does the minister concern himself about price wars which the supermarket chains may be waging among themselves in the course of which they force consumer prices down and then insist on reducing payments to producers of red meat?

I suggest this is the case. In the committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs during an examination of Bill C-181 I asked one of the witnesses whether this was the case. He replied that those engaged in the meat industry naturally tried to get a fair price for their products but when there was a supermarket war in progress the supermarkets put pressure on the meat packers to reduce their prices and pass the reduction on to the producers. In what way is the department concerned with these things?

Does the Department of Consumer Affairs concern itself at all with the relative difference in the bargaining position as between one group and another in the marketplace, or does it just make out as best it can? Does it attempt to judge the price margin on different products, in this case pork, or is the position of the ministry merely one of pricing can sizes, comparing weight units, acting as watchdog over advertising, and so on? I am suggesting to the parliamentary secretary that the department should really get down to the meat of the matter—

Mr. Dinsdale: The red meat.

Mr. Thompson: —and see that farmers get a fair price for pork.

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the production of hogs in 1970 has only been exceeded in one earlier year, as the hon. member may know, and that was in 1944. A combination of ample feed grains in the west and high prices in 1969 led to a large increase in output, and during the latter half of 1970 the price of hogs declined dramatically. The national average price was $34.63 in 1969 and this had fallen to $22.94 in the first week of January, 1971. These prices refer to 100 pounds dressed weight. These statistics are quite important and relevant.

There have been significant declines in the price of retail pork cuts. Ham, smoked boneless, dropped from an average of $1.35 per pound in 1969 to $1.14 in December, 1970. Shoulder roasts, Boston butt, fresh, fell from 73.5 cents in 1969 to 56.6 cents in December, 1970. These are national averages compiled by DBS. The relation between hog prices and the price of retail pork products was examined in detail by the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Consumer Credit and Prices, I think in the fall of 1966. The conclusion of the committee was that there was no simple relationship between the price of hogs and individual retail cuts. One thing did emerge clearly. A high level of consumer demand for a particular cut such as hams will mean that its price will not rise or fall in the same way as the price of the whole carcass. I hope this will clarify the situation, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.08 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, March 9, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

THE PRIME MINISTER

CONGRATULATIONS ON MARRIAGE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. On many past occasions I have had the opportunity of saying a few welcoming words to the Prime Minister when he has returned to the House from various sojourns. However, none of these occasions has been quite so pleasant as the one that presents itself today because this is the first occasion on which I have the opportunity to extend a double welcome.

Just a few days ago in this chamber we happily welcomed our annual floral notification that spring was born anew in British Columbia and would soon be moving eastward. This floral gift always cheers us up after a long, hard winter. Today we happily welcome the arrival of another much more significant gift from that province, and we must extend our thanks to the Prime Minister for the part he played in acquiring this gift and transporting it to Ottawa. The fact that he was able to make it a surprise gift is, of course, a tribute to his artistic ingenuity.

[Translation]

Last Friday, through the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), the members of my party offered their best wishes to the newlyweds. At that time I was held up by the storm in Montreal where I met some constituents of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who congratulated me on the quality of my French.

Having then been away from the House on that occasion, just as the Prime Minister himself, I would like today to express my best wishes to the Prime Minister and his bride.

[English]

The Prime Minister has done away with suspense in the most splendid way. Suspense ends best with a big surprise, and in this case the surprise is most welcome. Having had this big surprise, Sir, we will be prepared for any future little surprises.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, although the leader of this party expressed our pleasure at the news of the Prime Minister's wedding when that news reached us on Friday morning, I am most happy to join with the Leader of the Opposition once again in expressing our happiness and our very best wishes to the Prime Minister and to his bride.

• (2:10 p.m.)

The only advice my colleagues gave me as I rose to speak was to be brief, and I intend to follow it. I would like to suggest to the Prime Minister that if he will look at Hansard for February 1, 1958, he will discover that the last words uttered in this place by his father-in-law referred to the rights of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think it is one of the rights of this House to see Mrs. Trudeau at an early date, and I hope that right will be extended to us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Romuald Rodrigue (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to join my colleagues in greeting the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to the House of Commons.

With all hon. members of Parliament, my colleagues and I extend his wife our warmest welcome to the national capital.

We wish the right hon. Prime Minister and his young bride happiness, health and long life.

[English]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my wife and myself I should like to thank very sincerely the Members of Parliament who today and Friday expressed their feelings on the occasion of my marriage. I thank them for their expression of feelings, but I confess that my lack of experience both in this House and in matrimony leaves me a little bit dubious as to how I should deal with this matter.

The Leader of the Opposition spoke of a question of privilege. It may be a question of privilege; it may be a point of order. However, I do want to give a solemn assurance to the House, on behalf of the individual concerned, that there will not be a repetition of the incident so touchingly recalled the other day by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. I do not know how I shall reconcile this undertaking with the suggestion made by the spokesman for the New Democratic Party. If an appearance is made I shall make sure it is silent, but I think I can also assure the House that it will probably be the only occasion on which I will be able to ensure such silence.

I should add, Mr. Speaker, that my joy during the past few days has been sobered considerably by the sudden death on Saturday of Ab Douglas. Ab brought with him to this House in 1968 a degree of dignity, an unquestioned integrity and a sense of devotion to duty which soon won him the respect and friendship of all hon. members. I found when I visited Ab's family in his riding not so many months ago that this same respect and friendship were very evident amongst his neighbours. I think we all realize that when Ab Douglas spoke in this House he did so in the perspective of countless generations of men who have tilled the soil and who understand the honesty and the beauty of nature's work.

I wish to join with all other hon. members who have already offered their sincere condolences to Mrs. Douglas and her children.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my feelings of grief over the loss of a colleague who passed away Saturday, and of gratitude towards the members of all parties in the House who joined me in my happiness are obvious proof that the spirit of Parliament is something precious. Here is a place where emotions are at times tense, at times happy and filled with kindness, but one thing is sure, and that is that Parliament is at all times a place where human feelings prevail, where the men and women elected as members give their best in the service of the country. I am honoured, Mr. Speaker, to be a member of this assembly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

TRANSPORT

TRANSFER OF SHIP FROM PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND FERRY SERVICE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to present a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of recent disturbing reports indicating that the principal CNR car-rail ferry, the John Hamilton Gray, is being considered for transferral from the Prince Edward Island service to the Newfoundland operation—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, perhaps we should ask for a ten minute adjournment for a caucus—and the obvious importance of this car ferry to ensure adequate passenger and freight transportation to and from Prince Edward Island, in view of the complete lack of prior consultation between the Department of Transport and the provincial government of Prince Edward Island and the people of the island, and considering the basic responsibility that the federal government has to ensure under the constitution adequate and continuous transportation and communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie):

That the government of Canada immediately undertake to assure the people of Prince Edward Island:

1. That there will be no deterioration in the service presently being provided to the people of Prince Edward Island either in terms of its annual heavy transportation commitments to tourist traffic during summer months or in terms of the heavy movement of primary products and construction materials during the fall, winter and spring months.

2. That no change be made in the present ferry operation until there is satisfactory experience that the two new ferries to go into service this May will adequately compensate for the removal of one or more of the present ferries in operation.

3. That if it becomes necessary to move the John Hamilton Gray from the Northumberland Strait operation during the summer period that a firm undertaking be given that the ferry will return to Prince Edward Island service by early October—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate that I have to bring to his attention the limitations imposed by the Standing Order. I suspect he is coming to the end of the motion but I have doubts whether it is entirely proper to present a motion of the length and extent of the one proposed by the hon. member. In any event, I invite the hon. member to indicate to the House as soon as possible the full terms of the proposed motion.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I fully understand Your Honour's point and respect your judgment in this matter. I merely wish to outline the nature and complexity of the problem. The concluding words of the motion are:

—and remain in that service until the end of May in order that no dislocation may occur to the normal movement of rail and truck traffic so vital to the island's economy.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Egmont under the terms of Standing Order 43. The Chair must inquire whether there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I have to advise the hon. member that there is not unanimous consent and therefore the motion cannot be put under the terms of Standing Order 43.

CANADA LABOUR (STANDARDS) CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING HOURS OF WORK, WAGES, VACATIONS, TERMINATION OF EMPLOYMENT, ETC.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I move for leave to introduce an Act to amend the Canada Labour (Standards) Code.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will first put the motion.

Mr. Mackasey moved for leave to introduce Bill C-228, to amend the Canada Labour (Standards) Code.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am wondering whether the minister proposed to make a statement. As he knows, it is not customary to make a statement in support of the first reading motion.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I thought that hon. members might have wanted an explanation in the House rather than outside.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Woolliams: This is most refreshing.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. When shall the bill be read the second time? At the next sitting of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

HOUSING

ASSESSMENT OF INNOVATIVE PROGRAM

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the minister in charge of housing about the government's experimental program regarding low-cost housing. Has the minister had an assessment of this program made? If so, is he prepared to table or make public the assessment of the results of the program carried out so far?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the assessment is under way; it has been commissioned for some time and it will probably take some time to complete if it is to be an in-depth evaluation. Indeed, at best it would have to be an interim evaluation because I think it will take some years, in some cases, to determine truly the good and the bad of the program. Most certainly, however, when the interim report is available I shall be pleased to make it available to all hon. members.

Mr. Stanfield: Since the House will be asked to vote further funds for this program and in view of the charge made that the result of the program so far has been simply a lowering of standards and an increasing density, is the minister prepared to appoint a task force or an assessing party from outside his own department and outside CMHC to assess the program and to make its assessment known?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I have not had the opportunity of examining the report to which the hon. member is referring, although I read the article in the press this morning, as the hon. member perhaps did. I would much prefer to have that opportunity before elaborating on what might take place as a result of it. My previous statement about the evaluation process stands, and I think it will be useful for all members when it is available.

Mr. Stanfield: Can the minister assure us that an interim assessment of the sort he mentioned a few moments ago will be available to the House before the House is asked to decide about the continuation of the program or the precise form in which the program should be continued?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I would anticipate that when the capital budget of CMHC goes before the appropriate committee for examination all the information available will be distributed to hon. members. Whether it will be a formal evaluation or assessment report, with the quality that I would hope to achieve, I could not promise at this time. Nevertheless, all information that we have we will make available on that occasion.

CONTINUATION OF INNOVATIVE FUND—REFERENCE OF SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL REPORT TO COMMITTEE

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, does the minister intend to continue the innovative fund in this year's building program?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I announced when I tabled the CMHC budget that we shall wish to continue the innovative theme and thrust. I think circumstances this year are not the same as they were when we announced the program last year so there will be differences in approach. They are being worked out now and I hope fairly shortly to be able to announce them to the House. Of course, members can judge them on that occasion.

Mr. Gilbert: Would the minister agree to refer the report of the Canadian Council on Social Development to the appropriate committee so we may study it in depth? Also, will the minister attend the committee hearings?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether this is within my purview but I am sure an ingenious way will be found to examine that report and deal with it before the committee.

INNOVATIVE FUND—AMOUNT TO BE EXPENDED IN 1971-72—FLEXIBILITY OF PUBLIC HOUSING PROGRAM

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I have a supplementary question for the minister responsible for housing. In view of the fact the minister gave some indication last year regarding an amount of $200 million, has he determined any particular sum or amount that he is prepared to expend on the innovative program for the next fiscal year?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Not precisely, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Alexander: A further supplementary regarding the same topic. In light of the emphasis placed on innovation in housing, and in light of the rigidity of the legislation permitting the expenditure of the $253 million recently announced by the minister as earmarked for public housing, and because of the usual cost-sharing arrangements, both of which make innovation impossible, is the minister contemplating a review of the legislation and the cost-sharing arrangements in order to arrive at more flexibility in this area?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to think that a great deal of flexibility is available both to the provincial governments and the federal government in the public housing program. There is a series of changes taking place. I think the hon. member is aware of them. I cannot elaborate on them in the brief time that I have to answer the question, but I rather reject the idea there is that much rigidity now built into the legislation.

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE IN LAND ASSEMBLY

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): I have a supplementary question for the minister responsible for housing. In view of the ever-increasing price of land facing the major Canadian cities, is the government going to undertake a program matching last year's $200 million innovation fund to help the municipalities finance land assembly projects?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, there is a sizeable budget devoted to land assembly. The provisions of the Act were amended in 1969. If I remember correctly, I think I announced that some $43 million would be available for land assembly in 1971 from the capital budget of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

[Later:]

Mr. Carter: I have a supplementary to my previous question to the minister responsible for housing and urban affairs. In view of the serious need for more serviced land in our big cities, and in view of the fact that the amount allotted by the government of $43 million is obviously inadequate to meet that need, would the minister undertake to have an assessment made of the problems facing our cities and if necessary increase the amount to accommodate the need in various areas?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, we are in the process of assessing the needs of our cities. If we do increase the amount it will have to come from some other source and we face the question of general constraints on budgets. We are always examining the matter and I will certainly take the hon. member's views into consideration.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED VISIT TO CANADA BY BRIGADIER PATTAKOS OF GREECE—SUGGESTED REFUSAL OF OFFICIAL RECOGNITION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): My question should perhaps be addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs but in his absence I will address it to the Prime Minister. In light of the forthcoming visit to Canada of Brigadier Pattakos, one of the leading figures in the Greek military dictatorship, and in light of the moral condemnation of the world of that regime for its resort to torture and other totalitarian methods, will the Prime Minister give assurance that no official recognition of the visit will be accorded by the Canadian government?

[Translation]

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the question deals with a purely speculative news report and as far as I know, the Canadian government is unaware of any forthcoming visit to Canada by Brigadier Pattakos.

[English]

Mr. Carter: I have a supplementary to my previous question to the minister in charge of housing. I recognize—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether the hon. member might allow the Chair to recognize a few other questioners and then return to the hon. member in a few moments.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

FINAL REPORTS OF COMMISSION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Has he received a communication from the Commission on Biculturalism and Bilingualism to the effect that this commission intends to bring its work to an end but will not publish the reports it was to prepare? If so, what was the government's reaction? Shall we demand that the Commission complete its work in order that we may be informed of the expenses it has incurred and the studies it has undertaken?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): This letter has been brought to my attention today only. I have not yet replied to it. There has effectively been a letter such as the hon. member indicates. I shall see what reply I am to make and, should the House be interested, I have no objection to informing it of the text of my reply.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

Could the Prime Minister give us some indication before the end of the week as to the government's position in the matter and perhaps also table his reply to the letter?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I will reply as soon as possible, probably within a week. If the hon. member then reiterates his request, I will be pleased to give the reply verbally or to table it providing of course the senders of the letter are agreeable to the tabling of a copy of their communication.

FISHERIES

PREVENTION OF FISHING BY FOREIGN SHIPS WITHIN 12-MILE LIMIT—RESPONSE OF OTHER COUNTRIES —SPECIAL PRIVILEGES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry arising out of the statement he made last Friday concerning the imposition of the 12-mile limit. What has been the response of countries which have been contacted in connection with this matter, and I refer particularly to those which are deemed to have traditional rights in Newfoundland waters? Will the minister also assure the House that no foreign trawlers will be given privileges denied to Canadian trawlers?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Certainly I can give the House the assurance that no foreign trawlers will be given privileges denied to Canadian operators. I might also add that the entire west coast of Newfoundland is closed out to the 12-mile limit to foreign trawlers, as is the stretch of coast from Cape Ray to La Poile on the south coast. Under the new policy, any section of coast around Newfoundland can be closed but at the moment, as I say, the entire west coast and the stretch from Cape Ray to La Poile are closed to foreign trawlers. We have received no objections from foreign nations in this connection.

Mr. McGrath: In view of reported incursions by foreign ships into the Fortune Bay area and off the Avalon Peninsula in Newfoundland, does the government intend to extend the 12-mile limit to this area as well? Also, what has been the response of the government of France with respect to its territorial rights over the island of St. Pierre?

Mr. Davis: Where there is the likelihood of a clash of gear between small Canadian vessels and large foreign trawlers we will close the area, but the information I have received today is that there is no prospective clash in the areas the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): In view of the fact that subsequent to the announcement by the Minister of Fisheries violations of the 12-mile limit by vessels of a number of countries have been reported to him and to Members of Parliament from eastern Canada, what measures is Canada taking to enforce the declaration made by the minister two weeks ago and repeated last Friday?

Mr. Davis: There have been no violations of the 12-mile trawler limit, if I can refer to it in those terms, since my announcement of last Friday. Of course, if there is a violation the full force of the Canadian law will be employed against those responsible for the violation.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Can the minister advise the House whether air surveillance is taking place and whether patrol boats are in the area in which the draggers are fishing now?

Mr. Davis: There is air surveillance. Additional ships are in the area, our own protection vessels. There are no foreign vessels within 20 miles of the Newfoundland coast today and due to ice movements, I understand foreign vessels are moving out of the gulf at the present time.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A further question for clarification. The minister told us he had asked certain countries whether they had any objection. Might I ask him what his attitude would be if one of these countries did register an objection? Would the law respecting the 12-mile limit still be enforced against such a country?

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to intervene at this moment, but the question as asked is hypothetical. Nevertheless, the minister might like to give the information for the benefit of the House.

Mr. Davis: The assumption upon which the question is based is wrong. We have not asked these other countries whether they would obey our law; we have informed them of the steps being taken to prevent a clash between small Canadian vessels and large foreign trawlers within our 12-mile limit.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Would the minister tell the House what response he has received from the government of France with regard to the regulation as it applies to the fishing zone around the French-owned islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon?

Mr. Davis: That is a question which might be answered by the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he is in the House. I have heard of no objection; indeed, I have heard of no protest at all from France to Canada.

Mr. Speaker: I think the Chair should allow one further supplementary question on this subject and then we should go on to another subject.

Mr. McGrath: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. One further supplementary to the Minister of National Defence. Is the government giving any further consideration to placing Tracker aircraft or some other kind of surveillance-type aircraft in and around eastern Newfoundland to see that the law is enforced with respect to foreign trawlers?

Hon. Donald C. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): I am sure the hon. member will agree with me that the Canadian forces based at Summerside have been quite effective in this regard.

[Later:]

Mr. Lundrigan: I direct my supplementary to the Minister of Fisheries. I should like to give him the opportunity of clarifying his statement made to the Leader of the Opposition that we have not asked the various traditional fishing nations to move outside the 12-mile limit but that we have informed them of our decision that they stay outside. Can the minister reconcile that statement with his former statement in the House last Friday, as reported at page 3988 of Hansard, when on three occasions in the fifth paragraph he said we had asked various nations to stay outside the limit. Have we informed them that they must stay outside or have we asked for their co-operation?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, we have asked them to stay outside and for their co-operation.

CANADA LABOUR (STANDARDS) CODE

MATCHING OF PROPOSALS IN BILL BY PROVINCES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that we are usually advised that before improvements can be made in the Canada Labour (Standards) Code there has to be a consensus between the federal government and the provinces, may I ask the minister whether he has held consultations with the provinces on the basis of which he can assure us that the steps proposed by him in his bill which he introduced today will be matched at the provincial level?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): I cannot give that assurance, any more than I have been able at any time to give an assurance that the provinces will meet the existing minimum wage requirement. But there has been adequate consultation with the provinces in respect of those changes to the Act which might in some way affect provincial-federal relations.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Though the minister did not have a chance to make a statement this afternoon it has been indicated that one of the changes proposed will be the inclusion of a cost-of-living escalator. Can the minister say whether this is now to be government policy and whether we may expect similar amendments to existing legislation in connection with assistance and pension plans and also with respect to certain white paper proposals concerning unemployment insurance and welfare policies?

Mr. Mackasey: Nowhere in the bill is there any reference to a cost-of-living escalation clause.

HEALTH

ALLEGED RECRUITING OF MEDICAL DOCTORS OUTSIDE CANADA

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Would the he tell us whether the Canadian government has decided to recruit some 1,250 doctors abroad each year during a 20-year period, as Professor Mathews of Carleton University was reported as saying during the weekend?

Mr. Speaker: The question thus worded cannot be allowed. The hon. member is asking a member of the government to confirm or deny a report. Perhaps the question could be asked directly and to save time, the Prime Minister might want to answer the question as directed by the hon. member.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will take note of this question on behalf of the minister responsible for immigration. As far as I am concerned, I have not heard of such a report.

AIR TRANSPORT

INTRODUCTION OF LAW RESPECTING HIJACKING

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport a question in connection with air piracy. Has he received representations by telegram or otherwise from the Canadian Airline Pilots Association regarding the need for a law covering piracy and hijacking similar to the law which presently exists in the United States?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I believe such representations have been made, but whether within the last week or so or not I am unable to say with certainty. We have been in consultation with the Canadian Airline Pilots Association for several months and have involved the association in discussions with regard to the whole issue of hijacking. As the hon. member knows, the Minister of Justice has indicated his intention to bring forward just such a law as the hon. member has referred to.

Mr. Woolliams: Is there any reason Canada is not a party to the international air agreement which covers this subject?

Mr. Jamieson: I am not aware of the specific agreement to which the hon. member refers, but as far as I am aware we are participating in all international actions relating to the hijacking problem. As far as I know, we have not only accepted all international agreements presently in existence but, in addition, we have proposed various initiatives of our own which are now under consideration internationally.

Mr. Woolliams: Can the minister tell us why Canada is still without a law covering this subject, though such laws have been adopted by the United States and other western nations? Is there any special legal problem or peculiarity which is responsible for the delay, apart from questions of administration?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, quite a complicated problem over and above administration. I think I have indicated to the House on previous occasions that, with all due deference to other countries, we have been in the forefront in putting forward proposals. Perhaps the argument may be as to whether other proposals are as effective as the ones that we are suggesting, in other words, that some of the measures which have been put forward, including the laws to which the hon. member has referred, are not considered by most countries to be wholly effective. In summary, I think the situation at the moment is that all countries who subscribe to the ICAO convention and related documents are now working on what they hope will be an effective solution. But there is no conscious delay on our part.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAYS

SHORTAGE OF BOXCARS IN WESTERN QUEBEC—POSSIBILITY OF TEMPORARY LAY-OFFS

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport if he could use his good offices to remedy the serious shortage of freight cars in western Quebec at this time, an area served by the Canadian Pacific, in order to prevent temporary lay offs?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have checked in regard to both these questions, not only the one the hon. member has asked but also ones asked by some members from western Canada who inquired about shortages of cars in their vicinities. I have been advised by both railways that the basis of the problem is essentially the extremely adverse weather that we have had in the past few months which has made it extremely difficult to get cars back to their destinations quickly. I am told that there is now some evidence that the situation is improving and should continue to improve from now on.

AIR TRANSPORT

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—EFFECT OF STUDY ON POLICY

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Can the minister state what effect the air transport study of the Atlantic provinces which was tabled in the committee last week is going to have on air policy for the Atlantic provinces?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the report to which the hon. member refers is purely and simply an assessment made by consultants as a possible guide to future action. I can state categorically that it does not in any sense represent the policy of the Department of Transport at the present time, nor have any moves been made or are they likely to be made in the immediate future to implement any of the suggestions. They are merely being examined as of this moment.

Mr. Comeau: In order to set minds at ease, would the Minister of Transport make a full statement soon regarding the proposals for Atlantic provinces air transport?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I have just completed three sessions before the transport committee of the House at which I thought I made a fairly comprehensive statement on many aspects of the matter. If the hon. member has some specific inquiries I will be glad to do my best to answer them. Indeed, I am in the process right now of replying to a letter the hon. member wrote me a few days ago on this subject.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, in spite of the minister's words of reassurance on this subject, if any of the cities involved wanted to make representations would the minister provide a forum for them to do so?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would be more than pleased to do so. In fact, one of the main reasons for releasing the report at this time was to invite such public discussion.

FINANCE

INCREASE IN CHARTERED BANK CHARGES ON CURRENT ACCOUNTS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Yesterday I asked the Minister of Finance a question regarding the 33 per cent increase that the banks have levied on the handling of cheques and the minister said he would refer the question to the attention of his colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and added that he imagined the Prices and Incomes Commission would also be looking into the matter. May I ask the minister whether he has received this reference and, if so, what action he intends to take?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my colleague took the matter up with me immediately. The Prices and Incomes Commission is conducting a preliminary inquiry.

Mr. Saltsman: Could the minister give an indication when the Prices and Incomes Commission will be reporting, and could he also indicate whether he intends to ask the banks to suspend these charges until that report is available?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is no, I cannot. They are masters of their own work and when they have completed their inquiry will of course make a report. In answer to the second part of the question, I suspect that an inquiry of that sort coming from the Minister of Finance would have more effect than one coming from me.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BARBADOS—INCREASE IN CANADIAN AID

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

Can he tell the House whether the government intends to increase substantially, during the next two years, Canadian aid to Barbados, as stated recently by Senator Richard Stanbury, president of the Liberal Federation?

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am in a position to confirm that Canadian aid to Caribbean countries will be increased during the current year.

I wish to add that further to our regular program of bilateral assistance, we will contribute to an agricultural development fund for the West Indies.

Finally, I should like to tell the hon. member that we are also members of the West Indies Development Bank, whose activities are merely beginning to make themselves felt, and to which Canada will certainly contribute in a significant way.

AIRPORTS

TORONTO—DECISION ON SITE FOR NEW FACILITY

Mr. Kenneth Robinson (Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact the minister has received a letter from the Board of Trade of Metropolitan Toronto concerning the announcing of the location of the proposed site for a new international airport for Toronto, and in view of the board's concern that delay in making this known has an undesirable effect on private investment decisions for commercial and industrial establishments directly related to air transport, would the minister now advise the House where the site is to be located or when he will be able to make this announcement?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's mail must be more efficient than mine because I have not personally seen that letter to which he has referred, though it may have reached the department. In reply to the second part of the question I can only repeat what I have said on numerous occasions, namely, that I am waiting for an appropriate time to meet with the government of Ontario. Initiatives are being taken today to see whether such a meeting can be arranged for next Thursday or Friday.

ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO STATEMENT ON POLICY—PRESENTATION PRIOR TO DECISION ON MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. When can we expect a statement in the House on Canada's energy policy?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think I make many statements in the House on Canada's energy policy. I will try to make them more lucid so my hon. friend can comprehend them.

Mr. Harding: Will this government policy be presented to Members of Parliament and the Canadian people for discussion before any decision is made concerning a possible pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any necessary correlation between any pervasive or new statement on energy policy and a decision in respect of the Mackenzie Valley pipeline.

POSSIBLE MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—ECOLOGICAL SURVEY

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, could the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources inform the House whether his statement of March 3, in the House that the National Energy Board will be conducting the ecological survey of this pipeline is correct or whether the department of the environment under another minister will be conducting such a survey?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the guidelines issued by myself and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in August of last year make this very clear. The ecological issue is one thing that is inherent in any application before the National Energy Board, but because the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has special authority over the northern territory that department too will have a responsibility in respect of the ecological safety of the pipeline if built.

POSSIBLE MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—CONSULTATION WITH PEOPLE OF YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Mr. Eric Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, will the relevant departments be consulting with the people most concerned through their elected representatives, namely the councillors of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): That is a responsibility which would fall under my colleague the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, but certainly in the guidelines issued by the two departments it is envisaged, and I think stated very clearly, that the rights and well-being of the indigenous people would be one of the prime considerations.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the minister said he has made many statements on this and indeed, on other subjects, will he inform the House which of these many conflicting statements is government policy?

On December 28 the Prime Minister stated to the press that he intended to give consideration to the possibility of appointing the Hon. John Robarts to the Senate of Canada. Has he had a chance to consider that matter in recent weeks along with other important matters he has had on his mind, and can we expect an announcement in the near future?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must confess my mind was on other matters in recent weeks. When it comes to joining a union the only one I would want to commit myself to now is the union with my wife.

TRANSPORT

TRANSFER OF SHIP FROM PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND FERRY SERVICE TO SYDNEY-NEWFOUNDLAND ROUTE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister advise if he has now communicated with the Premier of Prince Edward Island regarding the spiriting away to Newfoundland of the largest and newest ship of the Prince Edward Island-New Brunswick ferry fleet, and has he given firm and formal assurance that this boat will return to service between Borden and Cape Tormentine annually from October to May?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the question the hon. member asks may I say I have had extensive conversations on the telephone with the Premier of Prince Edward Island. As is his custom he expressed great concern for the well-being of the province of Prince Edward Island which he directs so well—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: —and certainly I really did not need a copy of the earlier proposed motion because it is verbatim almost as if it were taken from a much earlier submission on this subject made by the Premier of Prince Edward Island to me. I am preparing a reply to that now with a view to having it tabled. I will be glad to table it in the House as he will do in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Macquarrie: The minister advised my colleague from Calgary North that he was considering legislation against pirating of aircraft. Is he doing something about the pirating of ships?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in the same connection may I say I resent—and I might phrase this as a point of order—the suggestion that perhaps my motion was in some way an attempt to repeat the earlier representations from the Premier of Prince Edward Island. In relation to my supplementary, in connection with the two new ferries that supposedly are to go into service in May, one in the early part and one in the latter part of May, will the minister give assurance to the people of Prince Edward Island that no substantial change will be made in the car-ferry service until both these ferries have proven themselves, as I believe—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can give that assurance. I have already given it to the hon. member for Hillsborough before the Committee on Transport on two separate occasions. Any proposals for changes in the ferry services will not be carried through until such time as the new ferries are operating satisfactorily. I have also given the commitment that we will certainly make sure the service to P.E.I. is maintained at a high level.

[Later:]

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I wanted to ask the Minister of Transport whether he can assure the House, and especially members from Prince Edward Island, that the acquisition of the new ferry, the John Hamilton Gray, will increase the carrying capacity of those ships servicing the gulf to the point where substantially increased quantities of P.E.I. produce moving into Newfoundland will be carried?

Mr. Jamieson: That is part of the plan, Mr. Speaker; indeed, we have started on that already. There is a subvention provided for that in the estimates at present.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member for Egmont might be allowed to ask a last supplementary.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In view of the possible transfer and possible renaming of the ship, I wonder whether the name "Benedict Arnold" has been considered?

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Can the minister indicate whether the John Hamilton Gray has been renamed Joseph R. Smallwood? If not, can he—

DOCKYARD EMPLOYEES WAGE DISPUTE—INQUIRY AS TO MEETING OF PARTIES

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my short question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Can he indicate whether negotiations will resume soon between his department and the striking east and west coast ship repair workers?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to reassure the hon. gentleman that there will be conversations tomorrow, Wednesday, between the dockyards' council and Treasury Board.

TRADE

POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF CENTRAL MINERAL EXPORT AGENCY

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Can he advise the House whether his department has been meeting with industry to discuss the establishment and/or need for a centralized Canadian mineral export agency?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, and I have checked.

BANKRUPTCY

STUDY GROUP REPORT—REFERRAL TO HOUSE COMMITTEE —QUEBEC OPPOSITION TO CERTAIN RECOMMENDATIONS

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

I should like to know when the minister will entrust to an appropriate committee of the House consideration of the report on bankruptcy that is now in his hands. Also, I should like to know what answer has been given by the minister to the Quebec Minister of Justice, who has expressed serious reservations regarding this report?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): In answer to the first part of the question, it is my intention to introduce a bill which in the normal course of events would, of course, be referred to a committee of the House. In answer to the second part of the question, I have had no communication from the Minister of Justice of the province of Quebec other than his wanting sufficient time for the province to formulate its position on the report and make that position known to me and to the public. I have willingly acceded to that request.

[Translation]

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I want to put a supplementary question.

Does the minister intend to give sufficient time to all parties wishing to make representations about the report on bankruptcy to appear before the Standing Committee of the House in order to discuss it and to express their views on the subject?

[English]

Mr. Basford: No it was not, Mr. Speaker. Of course anyone—and I have made this very clear—who wants to comment on the report is free to do so. I have been having some meetings with groups that are interested and my officials have been meeting with others. Over the next few weeks we have a number of meetings planned with groups that have asked to see us on the question of bankruptcy.

LABOUR

INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS TO CERTAIN ACTS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): My question is directed to the Minister of Labour. Following his announcement regarding amendments to the Canada Labour (Standards) Code and in view of the fact that other Acts, particularly the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act and the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act are so interrelated, is the minister in a position to announce now when he intends to bring in amendments to the Acts just mentioned?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): As the hon. member indicated, I hope to bring forward substantial changes to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act in this session of Parliament. We also have completed within the department a review of the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act, and we are now formulating policy and recommendations for the cabinet.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

TIME LIMIT ON SPEECHES ON BUSINESS OF SUPPLY MOTION

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to the debate that is about to take place on the motion of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin). May I suggest a slight change for today in Standing Order 58 (13) which provides that the mover of the motion and the person replying for the government shall have 30 minutes and everyone else 20 minutes. I think you will find that there is general agreement to permit 30 minutes to each of the four party spokesmen who lead off and a maximum of 20 minutes to the rest of today's speakers.

Mr. Speaker: Is there agreement to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that the first four speakers, including the hon. member who is moving the motion, be allowed 30 minutes and that all other contributors to the debate be allowed 20 minutes?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ALLOTTED DAY S O. 58—STATUS OF WOMEN—IMPLE-ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—STATUS OF WOMEN—IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF COMMISSION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood) moved:

That in the opinion of this House, the government should immediately designate a minister of the Crown to co-ordinate the implementation of the proposals contained in the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women which come under federal jurisdiction, and that it should give special and urgent consideration to the implementation of those recommendations designed to establish a basic equality of rights between men and women, including the recommendation for the inclusion of housewives in the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans, the provision of maternity benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act, the adoption of a national day care act, the initiation of a family planning program and certain amendments to the Criminal Code, and equal treatment in the federal public service; moreover that the government should convene a federal-provincial conference to consider the implementation of the recommendations of the commission which fall within provincial jurisdiction or which are the joint responsibility of the parliament of Canada and the legislatures of the provinces.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion which I have moved is designed to encourage the early and substantial implementation of the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. We wholeheartedly approve of the central principle of the report. A meaningful equality of opportunity to share in the responsibilities of society as well as in its privileges and prerogatives should be afforded to everyone in Canadian society. The commission's report clearly reveals that at the present time women in Canada are frequently being denied their fair share of both the privileges and prerogatives.

The report is based on the principle enunciated in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights that all people are equal in dignity and rights. The implementation of the report would effect a needed and important change in society. It deserves the support of all citizens, of men as well as of women, and the serious attention of this Parliament.

We are, of course, well aware that legislative changes by themselves are not enough. We need a change of attitudes as well as of laws; we should not delude ourselves that equal opportunity of employment for women is likely to become a reality in a society which does not make and carry out the necessary plans to provide full employment for all. Nevertheless, the carrying out of the recommendations of the Royal Commission in the legislative field will have a tremendous symbolic and educational effect. It will bring about a genuine social revolution.

We are encouraged by the speech made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in Toronto last Wednesday in which he indicated his concern about this subject. Perhaps I could take as a text for my remarks two statements made by him in that speech. The first one is:

It is always easy to talk of change—talk is often an excuse for inaction.

Later, he said:

I invite all Canadians to exhibit impatience with our rate of progress in this respect.

We agree with the Prime Minister that talk of change in this sphere of the position of women in our society will not be enough. Inaction cannot be tolerated. It is time we in Parliament exhibited the impatience with our rate of progress which the Prime Minister has invited. I am sure the women of Canada are impatient. We must be impatient, too. What the women of Canada fear, and what we fear, is that the Prime Minister's words will be verified and "talk" will replace "action". It is for this reason that the motion which I have introduced proceeds beyond the realm of generalities. It calls for action upon certain specific key areas covered by the report of the Royal Commission.

The approval by this House of the motion which I have introduced will give the go ahead signal not for further studies, not for further task forces, but for legislation by this Parliament in accordance with the recommendations of the report. Our caucus has already studied the report. It has approved the report's main recommendations in a statement which we made public. We have promised to put the full weight of this party behind 50 of the report's recommendations which come under federal jurisdiction. It is impossible, of course, to mention all of the 50 recommendations in the time that I have available, but we have specifically emphasized in the motion certain key recommendations.

The first of these key recommendations is the adoption of a national day care act. The provision of day care centres is centrally important. As the royal commission points out, that was the subject of strong representations from every part of Canada. Day care centres are of supreme importance to women who are in the position of a single parent, who do not wish themselves and their families to depend on welfare, and who, if they are to take employment, must provide for the care of their children. Day care centres are important to large numbers of other women who, whether or not we approve of it, are involved and will continue to be involved in the labour force, and to many women who are not in paid employment, such as housewives who, for one reason or another, need day care services for their children.

We agree with the report when it asserts that it is not trying to compel women to take employment. The report recommends freedom of choice but this freedom of choice involves an opportunity to be employed under conditions of equality with men. There is a nation-wide need and demand for child care services. As the report says, private initiative cannot begin to cope with so large a problem. I remind the House that other governments have effectively done so.

We are aware, of course, that under the present Canada Assistance Plan the federal government pays half the operating cost of approved day care centres. The commission, however, points out that this has not brought about the provision of day care centres in numbers anywhere close to the need and the demand. It, therefore, recommends that the federal government should not only pay half the operating cost but, during an initial seven year period, 70 per cent of the capital cost.

My colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis), who is herself a shining example of the effective role that women can play in public life—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brewin: —will take part later in the debate and will expand on the need for national assistance for day care centres. I would just like to remind the House that the provision of day care centres is not something which should be done to satisfy a small group of women. It is of the utmost importance to the welfare of a very large number of children. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics, in its report made in April, 1967, shows that one in five mothers of children under 14, a total of 540,000 mothers, are working and make up 24 per cent of the Canadian female labour force. Among them they have more than one million children of school age and pre-school age, about 18 per cent of all Canadian children. Of these it is estimated that about 167,000 do not require arrangements for their care, but this leaves some 908,000 children who require care arrangements. About 9,000 children in Canada are, in fact, getting this day care.

Research by Dr. Benjamin Bloom, who was mentioned in the commission's report, led him to conclude that 50 per cent of the individual's intellectual development takes place between birth and the fourth year, before the child has any contact with the school system. We have a grave social obligation to assist in the development of nearly a million Canadian children. It is not enough to say, as the Prime Minister did on Wednesday night last, that the Department of National Health and Welfare is prepared to enter into discussions. It must be prepared to make positive offers of increased assistance, as recommended by the royal commission. In this debate we would like to hear from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) not merely general statements of approval of the report, or of vague discussions, but an undertaking to proceed as rapidly as possible with this central recommendation of the commission on day care centres.

The work of the housewife does not appear in the statistics of the gross national product, although the work of the housewife is just as much that of a producer of goods and services as that of the paid worker. In a Canadian study prepared by this commission in 1968 it was estimated that the work of housewives, excluding volunteer work, amounted to 11 per cent of the GNP, or $8 billion. However, the housewife, because she is not paid a wage or salary, does not appear officially in the labour force. She is not able to provide for her security in old age as are wage and salary earners. Our resolution proposes that the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans be amended to allow a spouse to participate in these plans.
