place being filled by the hon. gentleman who regaled our ears with the flow of speech we had to listen to last night. Compare the calm dignity, the clear and cautious presentation, the logical reasoning, the matured judgment, the legal acumen, the plain and candid advice of the late member for Antigonish (Sir John Thompson) with the turgid, uninteresting stream of invective, windy declamation, and morbid imagery to which this House was treated last night by his successor, the present member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac). " Oh, what a falling off was there ! " There was in the hon. gentleman's whole speech, no evidence either of logic or reasoning, or calmness, or dignity, or ability, and it is not to be wondered at that the country should lament the change. The hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac) should say nothing about corruption or dishonesty. It does not lie in his mouth to speak of it so glibly as he has done. What does the resolution moved by the hon. member for South Oxford mean to the Canadian people ? It announces to the Canadian people—if you return us to power we are going to give you, if we can be believed, free trade as they have it in England. It means to the manufacturer that Canada will be again made a slaughter market for American goods, as it was in 1878. It means to the mechanic and labourer reduced work because of the reduced output of the factories, reduced wages and a reduced supply of the necessaries of life. It means to the farmer the destruction of his home market by the competition of western farmers—by Armour and Company of Chicago ; by Swift of Chicago ; by those men who injured us so very much in the past. But we are told by the hon. member for North Norfolk that protection is of no use to the Canadian farmer. It is against his interest that grain is not allowed to come in free ; the duty on pork was of no advantage to the Canadian farmer. And the hon. gentleman says : If the country returns our party to power, we will do away with that protection and will bring the people of Canada back to the condition in which they were in 1878. Let me give one item in which the Canadian farmer is interested, and which, to my mind, proves most conclusively that the theory of the hon. member for North Norfolk is entirely foundationless. I find by the returns that in one year Armour, Swift and other similar houses sent into Canada to feed Canadians 29,000,000 pounds of meat, fresh and salted. Then a protective policy was brought into play and a duty was put upon meat. The result was that last year these firms brought into Canada only 8,000,000 pounds of meat. That is to say, 21,000,000 of meat was shut out. How many Canadians would that feed ? What increased market would that mean to the Canadian farmer ? Would not that market be taken away from him if we did away with the protective tariff that shuts out the products of the American farmer? It is not necessary to argue this question in order to convince intelligent Canadian farmers of the advantage they receive from this protection. Hon. gentlemen say the people want to go back to free trade as it is in England. I do not think they do. Take the case of grain. I find that in one year the tariff shut out from this country American grain to the extent of 12,000,000 bushels, as compared with the amount which had formerly been brought in. The result is that the Canadian farmer has an increased market to that extent. I am willing to leave it to the farmers, for they are too intelligent to be deceived by the argument of gentlemen opposite. We are told by our opponents that the policy of this Government is class legislation, that they are legislating distinctly in favour of the manufacturers. What class of manufacturers. I would ask? The farmer is a manufacturer who is manufacturing products to go into consumption abroad as well as at home. If the Government are legislating for the manufacturer, they are legislating for the farmer, and they are doing so directly by putting a duty on such articles as the farmer produces. But we are told that the Canadian farmer wants free trade as they have it in England. The resolution before the House declares for a tariff for the purpose of raising a revenue and for that purpose alone, the element of protection being entirely removed from it. Before the Canadian people can judge of the value of the English system, they must know how the public revenue is raised in England. I have here a few items giving some information as to that point, and I read them so that the Canadian farmer, the Canadian artisan, the Canadian labourer may ask himself whether this system would be suitable to our conditions if it were applied. Great Britain raises a revenue of $100,000,000 by customs duties. That is much the same plan as we adopt here. But they have also direct taxes. We have often told the Canadian people: If you return the Reformers to power they will adopt a policy which means direct taxation upon the Canadian farmer, labourer and artisan. Now, the Reformers tell the Canadian people: We are going to give you taxation upon the same principles as are applied in England, for the leader of the Opposition declares that to be the model, the aim of his party. In England they levy taxes upon the land. We have often told the Canadian farmer that if the Reformers were returned to power there would be a direct tax upon the lands of the country. How much do the English people raise by a direct tax upon the land? Under this system, which the Reformers tell the Canadian people would be suitable for our conditions, Great Britain raised $5,134,000 last year by direct tax upon the land. Ask any farmer if he favours such a system. In Great Britain they levy a direct tax upon houses. Ask any man living in a house in any of our cities, towns or villages, or upon any of our farms if he wishes to pay a direct tax upon his habitation? If he does, tell him to vote for hon. gentlemen opposite, for their policy leads to that, as it has led to it in England, and these hon. gentlemen say they will give us the same principles of taxation as in England. The inhabited house duty is levied at the rate of twopence on the pound for houses of a certain value, fourpence in the pound on another class and sixpence in the pound on another class, and last year, the total amount raised by this duty was $7,205,000. Then in Great Britain they have a tax upon the right to kill game; a tax upon the right to carry a gun; a tax upon every male servant—fifteen shillings for each; a tax upon every carriage that is owned; a tax upon solicitors—I do not know that that would be such a great evil to the country, but however that may be, the tax is levied; a tax upon life insurance; a tax upon the right to sell patent medicines—hon. gentlemen might go into that extensively and collect a great deal of money; a tax upon bills of exchange; a tax upon receipts; a tax upon contracts—and so on. I would like to ask the Canadian people if they would like this to be the principle upon which our taxes are to be raised. Tax the land and you reach the farmer; tax the house and you reach the tenant; tax the servants and you reach the class who employ servants; tax the right to carry a gun and you reach the sportsman. Let the people understand the facts and I think they will realize the benefits which accrue to them from the policy of the present Government. I do not wish to continue this debate further, because I have taken up more time than I intended when I commenced. But I can only say that, in my opinion, the electorate of Canada only require to be well informed as to the policy of the Opposition to go and vote against that policy as they did in the past. Every time they have presented a policy in antagonism to the National Policy, since 1879, they have been defeated, and I believe they will meet with the same fate when they go back to the country again. They sometimes express an anxiety for an election. It is well for them that the election is kept off, because the sooner the election comes, the quicker they will be confounded, the quicker they will be relegated, for the fifth time, to the cold shades of Opposition. I say that the Canadian farmer only wants to know that the policy of the Opposition contains no protection for him, then he will not endorse that policy; the labourer only wants to know that it reduces his wages, that it reduces his opportunities of employment, then he will not endorse that policy; the manufacturer only wants to know that it brings him into competition with the slaughtered goods of the United States, that it destroys his capital, that it wastes his means, then he will not endorse that policy. No class of the electorate will vote for them. If they take the manufacturers, these must distinctly vote against them, because they have called them thieves and robbers; if they take the farmers, they make no provision for the protection of the farmers in their policy, therefore they will be against them. If they take the labourers, the labourers know that their policy will reduce their opportunities for work, therefore the labourers must be against them. The artisan must be against them, the commercial class must be against them, and, certainly, all the intelligent classes of the community will be against them. Then, where do they expect to get their support? I say they will find, in the future, as they have found in the past, that the policy they have laid down to-day will relegate them again to the cold shades of Opposition; and the Conservative party, I am quite satisfied, will be returned to power again, as they have been several times in the past, with an overwhelming majority of the people of this country at their back.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). In rising to discuss the issues that are presented to the House this afternoon, the question of how we shall raise the necessary money for the purpose of administering the affairs of this country for the ensuing year, and the proposition of the hon. member for South Oxford, as opposed to that of the Minister of Finance, I have only to say that I am distinctly in favour of the proposition of the hon. member for South Oxford. In that respect I differ somewhat from the hon. gentleman from East Grey (Mr. Sproule), who has just taken his seat. I differ from him in several other matters, but I am able to agree with him when he lays a tribute of respect upon the grave of our departed Premier; because, I hold that the members of the Opposition respect the worth of that hon. gentleman, and realize the loss that Canada has sustained in his death, just as deeply as the hon. member for Grey ever could. While I congratulate the Minister of Finance upon his promotion to the leadership of this House, I have also to express my regret that, for the first time in my parliamentary experience we have been deprived of the presence of the actual leader in our midst, and I have found these double duties devolving upon the Minister of Finance. Now, I believe that, however much that hon. gentleman may display his ability in handling the finances of this country, it is not in the interest of his political party, nor of this country, that such a combination should exist. We now find the Premier sitting in another Chamber which is in no wise directly responsible to the people, and entirely independent of them in any form, and he is accompanied by the hon. gentleman who controls the one department that, perhaps, involves greater interests than all the other departments combined. I refer to the Department of Agriculture. When we find the lawyer who is the head of that branch of our service, is also located in the Senate, away from any contact with public sentiment, away from associations with the people's representatives, I think it will be found, under these circumstances, that the public interest will distinctly suffer. When I heard the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, deliver his singular utterance with respect to the people's choice of a man to represent the county of Antigonish in succession to the late Premier, it occurred to me that no more scathing criticism could be administered to his political party. Granted that half of what he said with respect to that hon. gentleman was true, which I do not grant, it merely shows that after the Minister of Justice went down into the county of Antigonish, and after they had put a family relative of the deceased Premier into the field to secure for him the sympathy and support of the circumstances under which the late Premier passed away, the people of Antigonish, in face of the policy advocated by that hon. gentleman, refused to elect their man, and sent my hon. friend here to support the Liberal party. And yet my hon. friend from Grey comes down, and he, of all men in this House, says: "How have the mighty fallen!" It is words, only words.

Before proceeding to criticise the mode in which the Minister of Finance proposes to raise money for the next year, I want to say a few words about the position my hon. friend assumes to our party, on this side of the House. He told us a very amusing story about a man out in the Western States, who, astride of a very bad horse, was riding around the country in a very indefinite manner, and he thought it would be a long time before he would overtake the Lord in that way. It occurred to me that that incident might have been applied a good deal nearer home, and not so very long ago. I remember when there was an enormous activity in political circles; I remember when this Government was hastening the preparation of the voters' lists of this Dominion, and circulars were sent out to the revising officers to get their work done at the appointed time. An extra staff of printers were employed in the department for the purpose of hastening on the preparation of these voters' lists, and have them all ready. For what purpose? Presumably for an appeal to the people. Every other kind of business was suspended, but suddenly there came an Order in Council to call us together here in session; and the Secretary of State has presented a Bill to the House to make these voters' lists good and valid for the current year, so that we need not take the trouble to revise them during this summer. Was all that gone through to enable the Minister to introduce this Bill? Did it not look very like as if hon. gentlemen opposite were mounted on that very scaly horse, and were meandering about in such fashion that they did not know where they were going? But, finally, instead of going to the people, they suddenly made up their mind it was not safe to trust the people, that they had better face the people's representatives once more in session.

Now, Sir, I want to draw attention to one or two statements that were made by the Controller of Customs to his address to the House the other day. I do it because naturally the utterances of an hon. gentleman occupying his position, who controls the Customs, the one large revenue-paying branch, are likely to attract attention and receive consideration at the hands of the people. What do we find that hon. gentleman said with respect to the expenditure of the Mackenzie Government, as compared with the expenditure on public affairs to-day? I read from the official report:

The total expenditure of 1872-73 was $19,174,000. When the Reform party came into power in 1874, that expenditure jumped up to $24,448,000, or an increase of $5,318,000 in one year, in spite of their professions of economy.

Then the hon. gentleman goes on to moralize and prophesy. He said:

And I think it would require no prophet to assure us that, if they should come into power to-morrow, we would find history repeating itself.

Turning to the Public Accounts issued for the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1894—what do I find? I find that the quotation made by the hon. gentleman does not quite agree with the official statement in the Public Accounts. The hon. gentleman said the expenditure in 1872-73 was so and so. So it was. But it so happened that the whole of the year 1872-73 was passed before the Mackenzie Government came into power, and four months of 1873-74, and that the Estimates for 1873-74 were passed by the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite. Sir Leonard Tilley was Finance Minister, and one-third of the year had passed. The Controller of Customs concealed the fact that between those two periods we had added another province to confederation, and that the whole of the expenditure for Prince Edward Island was added to the expenses of the country. I am not surprised that the hon. the Controller has got himself into trouble in this House. I am not surprised that when the Minister of Railways and Canals was confronted with his campaign speeches during last fall, he found himself compelled to repudiate not only the statements of gentlemen who heard him make the statements attributed to him, but also the statements of his own official reporter. Let me draw the attention of the House to one more statement: That taking the whole of 1873-74, the Estimates for which were furnished by hon. gentlemen opposite, and in regard to which the preceding Government had expended four months of the revenue out of the twelve before Mr. Mackenzie came into office, during that year the total expenditure under the Mackenzie Government was only $23,316,000, and when that Government went out in 1878, after administering public affairs during five years, the expenditure had only risen to $23,503,000. The last year's expenditure of hon. gentlemen opposite has risen to the enormous sum of $37,585,000, and yet the Controller of Customs has the cheek to come and tell this House about his economy as compared with the Administration of the Mackenzie Government. The debt statements are another example. We assumed in 1873 along with the administration of Prince Edward Island, a debt of $4,700,000, which came into the accounts for the first time during the first year of Mr. Mackenzie's Government. Yet the Controller of Customs was not fair enough to make that statement.

But let me take another method with which hon. gentlemen opposite deal with the finances. We have heard considerable to-day from the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) with respect to certain expenditures in Quebec, and we heard a beautiful fairy tale about \$50,000 which was being contributed for some Liberal annexation fund from the American side. I think the hon. gentleman should have listened to the statements of the Finance Minister the other day, when he told the House that the credit of the American Union was so low that while we could borrow money in England at $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, the United States had to pay $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent; and yet the hon. member for Grey makes himself believe that they would spend \$50,000 for the purpose of annexing Canada to the United States.

Mr. SPROULE. That is why they are so anxious to get us annexed.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). I admire the abiding faith of the hon. member for East Grey. If he can accept that, it is clear that his faith could remove mountains if necessary to make an impression in a political campaign. But I come back for a moment to the statement made by the Controller of Customs with respect to provincial expenditure. He gave the House a table showing increased expenditure of various provinces, and then he held up his hand in horror, and said, Look how these Grit Governments have increased the expenditures in the various provinces of the Dominion. The $9,132,000 it took in 1894 to collect the revenue of the Dominion is the best answer to that statement; but he did not go so far as my respected friend, the member for King's (Mr. Macdonald), who told the House that Ontario had a debt of about $1,500,000.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Has it any debts?

Mr. CHARLTON. Do you say it has ?

Mr. IVES. They have been selling securities.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Has it any debts ?

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). Yesterday there was an election in North Brant to fill a vacancy, and so low had the political strength of the party with which the hon. gentleman is allied sunk, that they did not put a man in the field to contest the election, and allowed a supporter of Sir Oliver Mowat to be elected by acclamation.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think I may rise and say that that answer is not only disingenuous, but very unfair.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman gave way.

Mr. SPEAKER. The dignity of Parliament is not preserved by these interruptions.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I trust the same ruling will be applied—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). The Secretary of State must admit that I am not guilty of interrupting hon. members across the floor of the House. What are the facts with respect to provincial debts—how does it tally with the political record of Ontario for the last 22 years ? Sir Oliver Mowat has been Premier and administered the affairs of the province for 22 years. What is the strength of the Conservative party in that province to-day compared with the strength in its early history ? Take the last session of the legislature, and on two occasions they succeeded on mustering, on a party vote, 23 and 25 respectively, out of a division list of 62 and 66 against them.

Mr. IVES. Let me ask the hon. gentleman : Did the proportion represent the popular vote of Ontario ? How about the gerrymander ?

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). I shall have a word to say about the gerrymander, if the hon. member for Texas will wait till a little later.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order, order.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). Has any one ever seen the Premier of Ontario go to London to borrow a dollar ? Has there ever been a prospectus of the province of Ontario presented on the markets of the world to borrow money, as the Finance Minister of this Dominion has been doing at intervals of two years in succession lately ?—and he will have to go there again before two years are over. That is the best answer. There is no province in the world of this broad Dominion that can present so fair a record in that respect as the province of Ontario. Let me present to hon. gentlemen opposite two short extracts from the two last budget speeches made by the Provincial Treasurer of Ontario. I presume, that no gentleman here will deny that the Provincial Treasurer knows about the affairs of that province, probably quite as well as the Controller of Customs here or the member for King's, P.E.I. (Mr. Macdonald). The Hon. Mr. Harcourt says in his budget speech of 1894 :

Since confederation up to the close of 1893, our total grants to railways amount to $5,959,000. The present value of our annuities outstanding is $1,319,775, and at this very hour we have at our credit in the banks hard cash to the amount of $1,550,000.

That is the province that these gentlemen tell us is in debt.

Mr. INGRAM. How did they get it ?

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). They did not get it by going over to England and borrowing money as the Finance Minister whom my hon. friends support has been in the habit of doing, at intervals of every two years. Here is a quotation from the budget speech of the Provincial Treasurer of Ontario, delivered on the 28th February, this year, and I will read it for the benefit of hon. gentlemen opposite :

All told, deducting present liabilities from our schedule of assets, we had at the end of last year a comfortable surplus of $5,269,000.

That is the record of the province of Ontario. That is the record of twenty-two years of Liberal Administration under Sir Oliver Mowat ; and where to-day is the political party that opposed him in that province ? I have not a word of disrespect to say to my Conservative friends in Ontario, but I point to this : That after a prolonged siege, advancing the interests of that party, their last leader—and he was a gentleman of irreproachable personal character, and a first-class lawyer—retired on the Bench. He was succeeded by another gentleman at the last session of Parliament which met in February last, and I see it stated in the papers of the day that that gentleman is now anxious to be relieved from the cares of this little fragment of a political party up in the province of Ontario. Is not that the best evidence that the people of Ontario are satisfied that the Administration of Sir Oliver Mowat and his Liberal friends has been in the interest of the province ?

Just about the time we assembled for the opening of Parliament, there was an election in the county of Haldimand. There was a revolt in the Orange order in Canada of which the Controller of Customs is the Grand Master. There was some trouble in the family because there was a section who were in open revolt and put a candidate in the field against the present Secretary of State. Where was the Grand Master of that organization? In that hour of trial for his friends and for the association of which he was the presiding officer, where was he? Was he on the field of battle to counsel and guide and advise those gentlemen who had given him an office of high trust, and made him for the time being their commander-in-chief? No, Sir, he tells us himself, that of all places on this earth, he was away down at Washington. I do not know whether he made that trip in the Government car "Jamaica," that is said now to be gone to California with another ex-member of the Cabinet, or not; but at all events the Controller of Customs tells us, that he was down in Washington. If a Grit goes down there, there is trouble at once: he is declared to be plotting for the ruin of his country, but it appears that when the Controller of Customs goes there he is not open to that charge. Well, Sir, I want to draw attention to the statement made by the Minister of Finance respecting the United States loan. After telling us that he had placed his Canadian loan on the market at such favourable terms, that after deducting all the costs and expenses, and all the other charges in connection with the loan over in London, he placed it at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Then he goes on to say:

A short time after that the United States put an issue of bonds upon the market, and the rate of interest which those bear and which the United States have to pay, is within a fraction, in fact I think it is absolutely, $3\frac{3}{4}$ per cent, while the Canadian loan went on the British market at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

Subsequent to that we had a little discussion with the Controller of Customs over the same question, and he confirmed the statement that our loan was made at the net value of $3\frac{1}{2}$, the loan made by the United States bearing 4 per cent interest on the 30 years coin bonds for which \$65,000,000 was obtained. Now, whatever the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) went down to Washington for, he certainly did not secure much information about that loan. Sir, what were the facts? Twice in 1891 the Secretary of the Treasury issued bonds, but in November, at that particular period referred to by both the Finance Minister and the Controller of Customs, those 30-year old 4 per cent bonds were issued. The bonds that were placed on the market then, were bonds that ran for only a little over nine years, that bore 5 per cent interest on the face, and were sold for gold at a rate that netted a little under 3 per cent to the banks that purchased them, and the loan of February was selling then on the market currently, paying $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent to purchasers. What led to the difficulties? It was simply this: That in the United States Congress there was a section of members who were determined to make the payments of the United States silver equivalent to gold, at the rate of $15\frac{1}{2}$ to 1, when that coin on the market was only worth 33 to 1. The gold was flowing out of the United States treasury as rapidly as it came in until on the 28th of January, when the President sent his message to Congress, there was not enough of gold in the treasury available for three days' draft at the rate at which it had been going out of the treasury for the ten days previous. It was becoming a crisis in the United States. A contract was then made, after a great deal of negotiation, with not only the New York bankers (but also the Rothschilds of London, for the delivery of 3,500,000 ounces of standard gold coin of the United States, at the cost of the parties tendering, to the United States Treasury. It is true, those bonds were thirty years 4 per cent bonds, and they were sold to the bankers to yield $3\frac{3}{4}$ per cent, because the bankers took the risk of not being able to prevent the draft on the treasury, and they were bound to import half the gold required. Here is an important factor in that transaction which both hon. gentlemen omitted to mention. Why did they not tell us that the proposition stood open for ten days, which was made to Congress by these very same bankers, that instead of leaving the word "coin" in the contract, as it was gold they were supplying, they would take a 3 per cent gold bond at par in place of those very bonds? What did the New York "Tribune" of the 10th of February say about the refusal of Congress to endorse that proposition when it was laid before them by President Cleveland? It said this:

The President has made the necessary proposals to banks, but most judiciously has left ten days' time in which Congress, if it has the needful wisdom, can save the country $14,000,000 by passing a proper Bond Bill. Pass some Bill with the proviso that the Secretary of the Treasury shall contract to pay the same kind of money that the Government asks from lenders. If it wants to borrow silver, let it pay silver. If it wants to borrow gold, let it be honourable enough, and also shrewd enough, to pay gold. Why not authorize the payment of the same kind of money that the Government actually borrows, with 3 per cent interest? Nothing but blind and stupid partisanship, it must be admitted, prevents this.

And yet, for the purpose of making the people of Canada believe that our credit was so much better than that of the United States, the Finance Minister was either misled by those who made up that statement, or he suppressed what was essential in a fair statement of the facts to the public. Sir, I have as much attachment to my country as the Finance Minister or any one else; I have lived in the riding I represent as long as I can remember; the whole of my interests are in this country; I take no back seat to any man in this House for attachment to my country and its institutions; but I have not seen the day when I would stoop so low as to misrepresent a neighbour for the purpose of advancing the interests of my own country. Hon. gentlemen opposite talked to us very freely about railway transactions in which the Liberal party have figured discredibly in the province of Quebec. I have nothing to do with the local financial affairs of the province of Quebec; but I want to remind the House that the gentlemen who shout so loudly about that transaction took the Hon. Mr. Mercier into court and endeavoured to establish the charges which they made against him so freely, and they signally failed.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds and Grenville). The grand jury gave the verdict, that is, the people.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). Yes, we appealed to the people of Antigonish the other day, and we saw the result.

Now, I wish to draw the attention of the House for a few moments to a case that was before the courts of Montreal only a few days ago, and I will quote from the Montreal "Gazette" of the 14th of May, 1895, a statement made by Judge Desnoyers upon the application of the Solicitor General with respect to the suit against the contractor on the Curran bridge for a refund of money which the Solicitor General claimed he had got unfairly from this Government. Let me call attention to some of the details of that transaction. It related to two bridges across the Lachine Canal and the Grand Trunk Railway. The Government engineer's first estimate of the cost of completing those bridges was $160,000. But they proposed to make certain changes, to enable them to deepen the canal and improve the works, and the highest figure which the Government's own engineer gave as the cost of the work was $223,000. Although the work was within two or three hours run by rail of the headquarters of the Government at Ottawa, what did they do? They paid $394,000 for that work which their own engineer had estimated would cost $223,000, and then they instituted a suit against their own contractors to try to get $170,000 out of him. Let me make a few quotations from the statement of the judge upon the evidence placed before him with respect to the terms of the contract made by the department with the contractor, Mr. St. Louis. Here is a specimen of the wages which this precious economical Government contracted to pay to that contractor: A stonecutter foreman was allowed $4 a day for day time and $6 for night time, $8 a day for Sunday, and $12 a day for Sunday overtime.

Mr. STEVENSON. You need to take breath after that.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). You will need to draw your breath when you tell the people of Peterboro' that you contracted to pay a superintendent $12 a day for Sunday work. A double team got $5 a day, and, when religiously at work on Sunday, it got $10. What else do we find? We find that a derrick was worth $2.75 in the daytime, but the same instrument was worth $3.75 at night, and it was a religious derrick, because when it had to work on Sunday its conscience had to be appeased by giving it $7.50. That was the contract made under the supervision of the Minister right here in this House. I am not speaking of what occurred outside, but of the contract that these gentlemen made with Mr. St. Louis. He went to work to carry out that contract. What does the judge say in addition? He says:

And on the same scale for stonemasons, stone-setters and skilled labourers, Mr. St. Louis' bills must have been tremendous, when it is remembered the job lasted four months, and that at times there were 2,000 men at work in the daytime and 1,500 men at work at night. The men were paid alternately every week. Mr. Michaud tells us that some of the pays amounted to $34,000, some $10,000, some $15,000 and some $20,000.

And yet that went on for four months, although all that time the Minister and his responsible subordinates could have left this House and run down to the work any afternoon, inspected what was going on, and made things right. That went on until, instead of paying out $233,000, the Government paid nearly $400,000, and yet they ask us to believe that they did not know anything about it, and that the whole thing was economically administered. Let any hon. gentleman go to Ontario and present those figures to the electorate and try to make them believe that this expenditure was a really honest, just and fair expenditure of public money. When we find that the contractor destroyed his books because his safe was not big enough to hold them after he got through, and when we find him declaring under oath that he had given contributions to aid the party in power, need we go any further to find a reason why this extravagance was allowed to go on unchecked? What did the judge say? Did he instruct Mr. St. Louis to pay back this money? No; he goes on to say:

There was no proper surveillance by the officers of the Government on two of the jobs at least, viz., the Grand Trunk bridge and lock No. 1 of the Lachine Canal. The time-keeping on the two latter jobs seems to have been left to take care of itself, as far as the Government officers were concerned, so much so that two prominent public officers, high in office, lost their situation on that account. Mr. St. Louis procured all the workmen that were asked of him. He did not keep time personally, he had several clerks to do it, and one of them stuffed the lists. This was sworn to by himself, to his own disgrace; and when these lists were so made and cooked, they were certified blindly and as a matter of form by the officers of the Government.

And yet this is the Government which undertakes to tell us that they are administering the affairs of the country carefully. The judge thus sums up:

In my opinion, the main causes of all the trouble in this matter are :

1st. The extortionate prices stipulated for labour in Mr. St. Louis' contract, and, 2nd, the almost unlimited number of men on the said works, so numerous that they were in one another's way, and Mr. St. Louis cannot be held criminally responsible for these causes.

And the judge ruled that St. Louis had only worked up to the contract of the Government, and declined to order him to pay back the money. I ask if you can parallel that record in Ontario, or any other province of this Dominion under the administration of the Liberal party ?

But hon. gentlemen opposite have undertaken to show that the policy of the Opposition is unfavourable to the farmer. They have told us that protection has been a blessing to the farmer. I wish to glance at that statement for a moment. You remember, Sir, that when the National Policy was inaugurated, we were told that it was to create a home market which would consume our farm products raised at home. Hon. gentlemen opposite declared that to be the best market, and they said further that, in consequence of the stimulus afforded by the National Policy our manufacturers would be able to manufacture what we wanted at home. In short, we were to put an end to our foreign trade by consuming our farm products at home. The enormous population of operatives, which the National Policy was to place in our midst, would consume our farm products, and then we would be under no necessity to import from abroad because we would make everything at home. What are the facts ? Last year we exported nearly $50,000,000 worth of farm products after we had fed all the operatives which the National Policy had brought into Canada. I ask you, Sir, as a business man, how long it will be before, at the present rate, we will have sufficient consuming population established in the country to overtake the production of our farmers, even supposing our farmers stood still and did not increase their production at all ? What are the facts with respect to the protective policy as it affects the farmer ? These hon. gentlemen talk to us about taking off the duties and allowing the Canadian market to be flooded with American agricultural products. Do these hon. gentlemen know that to-day beef is being shipped from Toronto to the market of Buffalo to meet the wants of the people on that side of the river ? People do not ship products into a lower market from a higher and pay a heavy duty besides. All winter long the hog market, about which they make much fuss, has been higher in Buffalo, has been higher even in Chicago, than it has been in Toronto. And yet these hon. gentlemen, in the face of these facts, will maintain that the National Policy protects the farmer. Sir, I was amused when the hon. member for East Hastings

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth).

(Mr. Northrup) made that beautiful statement of his, with respect to how the National Policy operated to protect the farmers of Canada. He said :

One way is by grinding down the wages of employees and the profits of capitalists, so that we can produce more cheaply in this country than any other country in the world ; that is the way of hon. gentlemen opposite. Another way is to put up a tariff which will make outsiders who wish to come into this market, pay something for the privilege ; that is the Conservative way--the way in which we propose to keep our market for our own people.

Sir, how do they tax those who wish to obtain access to our markets, so far as the farmer is concerned, when this is the position of affairs to-day ? What is the use of telling us that there is protection in it for the farmers ? Why, Sir, the fact is that these hon. gentlemen are dealing with a condition of things that, if it ever existed under the National Policy, existed long ago, and the fact is that the hon. gentleman has got far behind the times and is entirely astray from the facts as they apply to us to-day. So far as the farmers of to-day are concerned, the effect is all in the other direction. Here is what a farmer says with respect to the influence of the National Policy upon one industry, that is the butter and cheese industry. During the last session of the Ontario Parliament, Mr. MacPherson, of Glengarry, spoke thus :

A careful study of the expenditure and returns of the business shows that the price of machinery and other modern appliances for butter-making has been increased by the Federal tariff sufficiently to raise the cost of producing butter from 1 to 2 cents per pound, and ventured the opinion, that, with improved methods and reduced taxation, butter in a few years could be produced in Ontario at from 8 to 10 cents per pound.

Did he believe that the National Policy was good for the farmer ? Did he believe that the protection that was afforded to them was any benefit to them ? Certainly not ; and every intelligent farmer will share his opinion. The fact stands out fair and plain that in the year 1894 nearly $50,000,000 of a surplus had to be shipped out of Canada after providing for the wants of our own population.

But they tell us that the price of wheat has gone up to-day. Yes, Mr. Speaker, it has gone up ; but what are the circumstances under which it has gone up ? Sir, I supposed that when we developed our railway system in the North-west and gave sixty-two and a half millions of Canada's hard coin to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway, we should have had a great highway that would have brought our western produce down within our own borders and brought it to our own seaboard, shipping it entirely over Canadian territory. But what are the facts ? Every one knows that the bulk of the wheat of the North-west went out of the hands of the farmers last fall at from 38 to 40 cents per bushel of 60 pounds, of the finest grade of hard wheat that is raised anywhere on the face of the earth, and that, so far as the Ontario farmer is concerned, the bulk of his crop was marketed at about 50 cents per bushel. A large proportion of the surplus of our North-west grain found its way down on the American side from Duluth. And why? Simply because American bottoms gave cheaper rates to outside markets than our own lines would give, though they had been bonussed so freely by Canadian money. What was the result? Two large milling companies, the Lake of the Woods Company and the Ogilvie Company proceeded to corral all the surplus wheat in the North-west that they could lay their hands on. Meantime, the farmers in the older provinces, with wheat below a cent a pound, fed it freely to their stock and used it up in various ways, making the most economical use they could make of it. To-day the price of wheat is high because the companies I speak of have cornered the market and the stock is not in the hands of the farmers. Is that a benefit to the farmers? Is that a benefit to the consumers? I venture to say that the only parties benefited by it are these speculators and a few small holders of grain scattered throughout the province of Ontario. With the latter I have sympathy, with the former I have none. These are the facts as to the National Policy as applied to the prices of grain to-day.

Our friends opposite are never tired of telling us about the relative position of the farmer in Canada and the farmer in England. My hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) told us to-day that the English farmer was in a difficult position, that he was being taxed right and left, and he and the Controller of Customs and the hon. member for East Hastings quoted to us long paragraphs to show that the British farmer was demanding protection. What is the position as between the Canadian farmer and the English farmer? All that we ask is to be placed on the same level as the English farmer to-day, and we do not ask any better protection than they have at the present moment, nor will we be satisfied with anything less. The English farmer to-day buys everything he consumes at the lowest possible rate. I think hon. gentlemen opposite will admit that. But the Canadian farmer finds that his agricultural implements, such as reapers, mowers and binders are taxed 20 per cent; and the small tools he requires, such as scythes, forks, rakes, and the whole catalogue of smaller implements used on the farm are taxed 35 per cent. And taxes collected from the Canadian farmer are not for the benefit of the treasury. The Controller of Customs admitted the other day that when the question arose as to the value that should be placed upon these implements for duty when they were imported for the use of the Canadian people, he did not refer the matter to independent officers but to the manager of the combine in Canada that controls the works that manufacture these very implements. If any evidence were wanted to show that this Government is not an independent government of the people, but the servant of the combinations, we have it in that one simple fact. Take, for instance, the sugar that the British farmer consumes to-day, and what do we find? According to the London quotations to-day the sugar that cost 4½ cents a pound here is sold in England at 3 cents, and it is as good to the farmer there who buys it as if he paid 4½ cents per pound for all he consumed. And so with all the articles that he uses, he buys them at the lowest possible rates for he is in the market of the world where everything is sold at its fair value. And the only article he pays an increased price upon is his tea, which is dutiable at fourpence a pound, and his coffee, which pays 14 shillings a hundred, or 1½ pence a pound. The average consumption of tea in England is about 6¼ pounds per head; and, allowing the consumption of coffee to be one-third additional, the English farmer does not pay more than 75 cents per year duty on these articles more than the Canadian farmer pays, who has those articles free. I say that under these circumstances, all we ask is that the burdens shall be taken off the back of the Canadian farmer, and that nothing more shall be placed upon him than his fair and legitimate share of the necessary expenditures in connection with the economical administration of the public affairs of this country; and that the extra taxes that are rolled upon him for the maintenance of these combinations under this tariff, and of these various other protective institutions, shall be removed from his back, and that he shall be given the same kind of fair-play that the British farmer receives.

Let me say one word further as to the plea these gentlemen are making for that the British farmers are asking for protection. Sir, it will be a sorry day for the National Policy in Canada if the British farmers succeed in getting protection imposed. I would like to see the faces of hon. gentlemen opposite who are telling us that the British farmer wants protection; I would like to see them go to the people, after their policy had been adopted in England, and tell the people that Canada's cheese was taxed 4 cents per pound to get into the British market; that Canada's beef was taxed 20 or 30 per cent to find its way into the British market; that Canada's wheat was taxed 15 cents per bushel to get there. Where would the shouting be about the protection that the National Policy gave our people? Do they believe that when Great Britain inaugurates the policy of protection, as they would lead us to believe, she is going to protect Canada? Won't she protect Great Britain first? And won't these protective taxes be imposed for the benefit of the British public, and not for the benefit of Canadian farmers? Then our friends opposite and their policy will be wiped out, and they will find just where their arguments have landed them.

But, Sir, hon. gentlemen opposite are never tired telling us about the effect of the National Policy in building up our industries. Now, I do not propose to deal with the broad statements about what has been done. I think it is wiser to start the machine, and see how it operates, where you know the facts. These gentlemen forget, when they make these statements, that there were active, energetic, and successful manufacturing industries in Canada long before the National Policy was inaugurated. Sir, I remember in my own town that in 1873, just at the time the Mackenzie Government was called to take power, we had a cotton mill, one of the earliest cotton mills started in this Dominion. It had been operated since 1859, and it had gradually grown up and developed with the country. At that time, the former proprietor died, and it was deemed necessary to enlarge the enterprise, and the public were appealed to take stock in it. The stock was extended then to $400,000; and this is the statement that was made as to the result of the operation of that cotton mill in previous years:

The mills, with their present capacity, are now earning upwards of 12½ per cent, or more than 8 per cent upon the proposed capital of $400,000.

That was in 1873, under a 15 and a 17½ per cent tariff. Well, Sir, the National Policy came into operation, and what is the result to-day? That cotton mill has been closed for several years, the $400,000 capital has been dissipated, and not one dollar of it has been returned to the original investors. To-day, the men who, on the faith of the National Policy, and the development connected with it, invested their little savings in that town in building little homes for their future comfort, have had to sell these at a sacrifice, and, in the majority of cases, have left the country to secure employment and earn a livelihood for themselves and their families. What was the position of the Ontario Cotton Mill at Hamilton? I speak of what I know. A friend of mine, a gentleman that I know personally, lost $20,000 in that venture out of $30,000 he invested, and he was only one man. Another gentleman that I know had a couple of thousand dollars in another mill. We have heard a good deal about what these mills are doing for the employment of operatives. If you go back to the census of 1891, you will find there is a cotton mill in a town about twenty or thirty miles west of where I live, which is returned as employing 180 hands, and as paying out $42,000 a year in wages. When you divide that up amongst the hands, it comes to the magnificent figures of $4.25 each, per week.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth).

Last year, under the benign influences of the National Policy, even that pittance of wages was twice reduced, under the blessings of the administration of this cotton ring that now controls that mill. Do you call that a blessing to the operatives of Canada? Is that the way the National Policy was to give employment and develop the country? In the same town there is a winey mill that figures in the census of 1891 as employing 100 hands and paying in wages, $20,000. It has been standing idle, and is closed. The $20,000 is no longer paid, and the operatives are scattered to find a living as best they can. But this mill figures regularly in the returns of the industries that the National Policy has brought into existence. Now, let me draw your attention to another result of the National Policy, as applied to the cotton industry. Our cotton mills in Dundas, so far as my recollection goes, went under the control of the Dominion Cotton Company, and I think their annual report of two years ago shows that the company controlled ten mills, scattered throughout this Dominion. What is the effect of that centralization of the cotton industries on the operatives in these various mills? I can speak again from personal observation. One mill, after running four days in the week for two or three years, finally ceased to run altogether, under the blessings of the National Policy, the operatives had to seek employment elsewhere, and they went to another mill under the control of this company. They left their families in their little homes in my town and went there to work. They tried it for a month or two, and what was the statement they made? They said, the wages are so miserably low that by the time we have paid for board, we have nothing left with which to maintain our families away from us, and to meet the increased cost due to the different members of the family not living in one household. What became of them? They had either to accept the pittance offered, or to take the other alternative and leave this country and go to a foreign land to earn the bread that the National Policy denied them. What has been the result as applied to the Dominion Cotton Company? They simply closed down the mills and regulated the output according to the consumption. But they exercised mighty good care to have the benefit of the full protection that the National Policy gave them. What is the amount of their last dividend? Here is a quotation from one of the Montreal papers of only last month:

In spite of the bad year, the Dominion Cotton Company has earned $320,000, or 10¾ per cent nearly, on their full capital of $3,000,000. When it is remembered that at least half of this capital is watered, the actual earnings are very large.

And that amount is wrung out of the operatives because they simply have to take the alternative of accepting the wages this combination chooses to give them or leaving the country, because if they leave the mill and go to any other mill in this country they are confronted with the same control. That is one of the blessings of the National Policy as applied to the cotton industry of this country, and that is one of the things for which we are asked to bow down and be thankful.

Sir, let me draw attention to one other institution, an institution organized in Toronto at the time the National Policy was brought into existence for the purpose of presenting to the people the great blessings the National Policy was going to confer on them. I quote from the Toronto "World," an orthodox journal on that side of the House :

This institution started in with a paid-up stock of $200,000. They got from various friends in addition $100,000 more. Under the pretense of giving business men an equivalent for their money, they obtained $200,000 more, which altogether amounted to about $500,000.

The institution did not prosper—it could not meet expenses. Last November a fresh syndicate took hold of the institution, and did they offer its old stockholders 100 cents on the dollar for their investment? Not at all. They asked them to hand over their stock without receiving one cent, and in return the new syndicate was to rejuvenate the concern and put it on a paying basis. They started in November to put this establishment on a paying basis. They operated it for some weeks, and what became of it? It died a natural death.

An hon. MEMBER. Unnatural death.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). Yes, it was strangled. Nobody would furnish money any longer to run it, it could not earn enough to run itself and pay the management. What did they do? They superannuated one public officer in Toronto and appointed the manager in his place at $3,000 a year, and on 6th February, in the middle of the cold winter, they opened their doors and turned out all the operatives and left them on the street to shift for themselves. That is the history of the "Empire" journal, the great organ of the political party opposite.

What is the history of the National Policy as applied to the agricultural implement industry? You can scarcely go into a town or village of any importance throughout western Ontario but you will find an establishment lying idle, the whole capital invested lost and the proprietors doing—what? Either going into other lines, or acting as agents for the great central combination which controls that industry. Has that been a blessing to the people of Ontario? Has it been a blessing that the various establishments scattered over the country should be closed and the business centralized at two or three points? I think the majority of the people of western Ontario will agree with me in saying it has not. You cannot go into a town or village of any importance in the west but you will find one of these dormant industries. The chimney will be standing there all right, the building will be there but the operatives have gone and the capital—where is it? Just a few months ago I had occasion to visit an active town in the centre of a good agricultural district in the county represented by the Secretary of State, old Haldimand. I happened to walk into a large brick building, and I said to the gentleman in possession: For what purpose was this establishment erected? His answer was, this was erected for a shoe factory. I asked, how much capital was put into it? He replied, about $25,000. I asked, did they make any money? He replied, no; we did not make any money, the capital is all gone, and I have rented the building for $70 a year as a place in which to carry on my little business. That is the revenue arising from the investment of $25,000. I do not select this as a special example, because all over the province there are such examples. I venture to say that more capital is locked up in dormant industries in Ontario than was ever locked up in any other enterprise, except one enterprise promoted at an early date by this Government in connection with the North-west, and that was when they started that great boom that was going to make everybody rich—the Colonization Companies. Sir, there are thousands of Ontario people to-day who are paying interest on money that was invested in those companies, who have a lively recollection of the wild goose chase led them by hon. gentlemen opposite when booming these enterprises. There never was a time in the history of Canada as last winter when the banks were so crowded with money, not seeking employment, but gathered in from active industry until the bankers were driven almost to despair to know what to do with it, and yet parallel with this is the fact that there never was a time in the history of Canada when so many men honestly seeking for labour on the street were denied such labour and thereby their daily bread. This is another proof of the effect of the National Policy as applied to-day.

Hon. gentlemen opposite are never tired of telling us about the development of the trade which is being secured to us outside of Canada, and the benefits that accrue to us in consequence of the development of that trade. What are they doing on that agricultural implement manufacturing industry to-day? Only a few months ago the Government passed an Order in Council providing that when a manufacturer exported one of these implements outside of Canada, and sold it to the competitors of the Canadian farmers in the United States, the Argentine Republic, Great Britain, or anywhere else, the manufacturer should get back 99 per cent of the duties that he paid upon the raw material that entered into the production of that implement. How did the Government treat the Canadian farmer with respect to that implement? Let me quote to you on that matter, a few words from the organs of the Patrons of Industry.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). Do hon. gentlemen opposite think that the Patrons are not farmers? Do you think that they have not got intelligence the same as we have? I heard one gentleman on that side of the House use the term "illiterate Patrons, if there are any." You did not hear it from this side of the House, but he qualifies it: illiterate Patrons, "if there are any." Sir, I say it is an insult to the agricultural population of this country. It is an insult to the Patrons of this country. What is the reason that the Patron institution is in existence to-day? It is simply as a protest against the burdens that this Government have imposed upon the farming community. They feel that things are out of joint, that they are not getting fair-play under the present administration of public affairs, and like everybody else they band themselves together for the purpose of advancing their own interests. Sir, I remember when gentlemen opposite cultivated that organization very carefully, just a little less than a year ago. All the nice things they could think of were said about the Patrons and their policy: but for how long? Just while they tried to use them for the purpose of defeating the Ontario Government, and when gentlemen opposite did not succeed in making the Patrons a tool for that purpose, then they turned around, and now they call them "illiterate Patrons." I point to the existence of that organization as an evidence of the feeling of unrest that is abroad to-day, because of the conditions induced by hon. gentlemen opposite and their policy as applied to the country. Now, this is what the Patron organ said on the 1st of May, so that it applies to the present time, and it is none of your seventeen-year old fairy tales such as we have heard from that side of the House:

The low tariff makes it more profitable for England to trade with them than with Canada. It is obvious the Canadian farmer, taxed by the tariff and combines till his back is sore, is in no position to compete with Argentina. Not content with imposing those drawbacks on ourselves, we have recently ordered that the Canadian manufacturer of implements, who imports his pig iron, coal, steel, &c., and pays high duties thereon, shall be allowed a remission of 99 per cent of the duty when the finished goods are destined for Argentina, Australia, United States, or any other foreign competitor, but shall pay the whole amount of duty and charge it to the Canadian consumer, with interest and profit added, when the machine is sold here at home. To "promote Canadian industry: keep Canada for the Canadians."

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth).

And this is to promote Canadian industry and to keep Canada for the Canadians. I recommend hon. gentlemen opposite to wrestle with these facts, and I ask them if they are not literally true? The pig iron that goes into these implements has been taxed at the rate of $4 a ton, and if it is Canadian iron there is $2 a ton bounty added to enable the Canadian manufacturer to produce it. All his other articles are taxed in the same ratio from $10 to $13 a ton on the other various grades of iron that enter into the manufacturing of these implements. Everything is taxed for the benefit of somebody else, and just as the paper I have quoted from says: If that implement is sold to the Canadian farmer, he has to pay every cent of that duty, whereas if it sold to his competitor down in Argentina he gets every cent off. Do you call that keeping Canada for the Canadians?

Now, just let me look for a moment at the competition the Canadian farmers have to face. We have to find a market outside of Canada for $50,000,000 worth of our Canadian products, and who do we compete with? We compete with Argentina, for example, that last year, according to the British official returns, sent 13,000,000 cwts. of wheat to the British market, sent 30,000 live cattle, and sent one and a half million carcasses of frozen mutton. Under what conditions do the people of the Argentine Republic ship these products to the British market? The River La Platte is navigable for 2,000 miles for large vessels up into those great plains of Argentina. They raise that wheat and those cattle almost in sight of the ocean steamer that takes those goods on board and delivers them into the English market where they meet us on exactly even terms. What is our position in Canada? We gave $62,500,000 to build the Canadian Pacific Railway to carry our products from the great plains of the North-west down to the ocean, and we have charged such high rates on that railway that the bulk of that wheat last fall found its way through American channels down to the seaboard. We have to meet the Argentine farmers in that open market of England under those conditions, and, Mr. Speaker, do the Government call that keeping Canada for the Canadians? In addition to that, these gentlemen in Argentina have this advantage, that while we are taxed at from 30 to 35 per cent on what we buy and consume, their duties run from 5 per cent on cottons up to 10 and 15 per cent on other goods. They do not pay half the duty that we pay to begin with, and they sell goods against us in the world's markets on even terms. And yet gentlemen opposite tell us that the National Policy is a blessing to Canada, when we have to sell in face of that competition, and when we have that competition more intensified by the action of this very Government in giving the Argentine farmers their implements at a rate of duty cheaper than what is imposed on the raw material that enters into our implements. Sir, let me quote to you one statement made by an American as to the energy and development of that country as our competitor. He said :

Before long Argentina will yet eclipse Chicago as the meat-packing centre of the world.

Think of it, Mr. Speaker, and we are selling those men implements cheaper to-day than we sell them to our own people, and our Government calls that protecting the Canadian farmer. Let me draw your attention, Sir, to another advantage that the farmers of Argentina have over us. I quote from an Englishman who is an ardent advocate of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, as applied to England. I quote from Mr. Howard Vincent, with whom we are all familiar. He speaks of the internal economy of Argentina, and he says :

A paper money now depreciated between 200 and 300 per cent, now secures nearly as much labour and food as it did when it was at or nearly par. The premium on gold is of the greatest advantage to the agriculturists. They pay for their labour, food, and indeed for their holdings, in depreciated paper, and they receive gold for their exported herds and crops. Its reduction will be firmly resisted by them by all possible means, and, if sudden or violent, would entail serious disaster. To the merchant it is different. He has to pay gold for what he imports, and can with difficulty obtain its equivalent in paper when he sells, and people cannot understand why he wants so much more "national" money for his goods than before, and buy sparingly or dispense with the article.

And this is the kind of competition that our Government is encouraging to-day by taking the duty off the implements that we sell to them and putting it on the Canadian farmer who has to compete with them.

In connection with that matter let me draw attention to the methods this Government have adopted for the increase of our trade. Sir Charles Tupper, in 1888, foreshadowed the idea of stimulating our West India trade by subsidizing a line of steamers for that purpose, and in 1890 our present Minister of Finance took a trip down to the West Indies with the aid of his private secretary, and at the cost of nearly $1,300 spied out the land to see how the trade was. In the following season the Jamaica exhibition was opened and we spent $22,000 in pushing our products before the people of Jamaica. We sent, as our commissioner, our old friend, whom we all remember and whom we liked to see so well for his genial ways, Mr. Adam Brown, of Hamilton, and spent some $5,000 for his services and expenses as our agent. In addition to that, we subsidized a line of steamers to develop that trade, to the extent of from $73,000 to $97,000 a year for the last four years. What has been the result of all this labour, and this liberal expenditure? Let us compare the trade with the West Indies in the five years from 1874 to 1878, with the trade which has been developed under this National Policy boom from 1890 to 1894. For the first five years, our average exports were $3,720,000 per year, whereas, in the latter five years they were $3,195,000 a year. So that, notwithstanding these subsidies of about $90,000 a year, we have not created much of a market for Canadian products in the West Indies. But what does the comparison show with regard to our imports from the West Indies? During the five years from 1874 to 1878, our average imports were $1,678,000 per year, and during the five years from 1890 to 1894, they were $3,666,000 per year. That was a magnificent development, was it not? We had increased our imports to more than double. But let me draw your attention to a little event that intervened in the interim. We had taken the duty off raw sugar altogether; and if you examine our trade in detail, you will find that great development to be due to that fact, and not to the subsidies given to the line of steamships.

Mr. WELSH. Free trade.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). It was free trade as they have it in England applied to sugar—that free trade which hon. gentlemen opposite are so worried over, and which they are so anxious to ascertain the meaning of. On these imports the average duty per year collected, in the first period, was $646,000; and in the last period, $687,000; but the average of the last three years, after the duty had been taken off, was only $293,000; showing that the increased trade was not due to the subsidies, but to the fact that we afforded the West Indies a better market for their sugar by removing the duty. As a result, we have sacrificed about $400,000 a year of revenue, besides the subsidies of $90,000, without succeeding in getting a market for one dollar's worth more of Canadian products. What are we doing in regard to the Australian trade that we have heard so much about—another mode in which it is proposed to protect Canada for the Canadians?

The Prime Minister inaugurated the efforts of the Government to develop a trade with Australia by going out there and travelling around on a pleasure trip, which cost us $2,745. We have also sent an agent to Australia. This Government, it appears, can do nothing to develop a trade anywhere without sending out an agent, and we have Mr. Larke out there, at a salary of $3,000 and expenses, to look after our interests and develop our business. In addition to that, we are paying $121,000 a year by way of subsidy for nine trips of steamers between Canada and that country. As a result of these efforts, we are developing a trade with Australia without doubt; but we are not going to be able to send any cotton goods there, if we are to judge by last year's exports of our highly protected cotton combine, because I find that they sent just $8 worth of cotton goods to the whole of Australia. Whatever goods we do send to Australia will be agricultural implements and machinery, on which our people have to pay the full tax under the National Policy, while it will all be taken off to enable the Australians to get cheaper machinery than our own people. Now, what does Australia send to us? Everybody knows that it is a great wool-producing and mutton-producing country. Let us look at the goods we got from Australia last year. They do not amount to very much; but the chief imports I will mention. We got $6,250 worth of green apples. Now, we raise apples in Canada, and we consider them pretty good ones. We imported from Australia, also, 59,000 pounds of butter, valued at $10,421. I do not think we need to bring butter into Canada from Australia, and to subsidize steamers in order to do so. Of lard, bacon, salt beef, &c., we brought in $1,300 worth, and we brought in 61,200 pounds of mutton, valued at $1,797. I think it will be admitted by all hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House that these are not articles which we should spend money in order to bring into Canada; and yet these are the chief imports that came to us last year from Australia. Now, how does the National Policy protect the farmer in the matter of wool? It carefully puts a duty on such wool as we produce a surplus of in Canada; but it does not charge one farthing upon the wool which the Australians send into Canada; that comes in free. Now, what does the Dominion Grange think of this attempt to promote trade with Australia? Hon. gentlemen opposite sneered a little while ago at the name of the Patrons of Industry, when they were mentioned in this House; let them sneer at the Dominion Grange. I can only say that that organization was brought into existence because of the pressure of circumstances that drove together men who felt that they were being unfairly treated under the policy of the Government; and what do they say? This is not the history of seventeen years ago, but the history of to-day, dealing with the live issues of the moment:

We desire to enter our most strenuous protest against subsidizing a line of steamships to Australia. As the products of that country are similar to the agricultural products of Canada, but are produced at a very much less cost, this would be a blow at our home market, and taxing ourselves to destroy our interests.

I think the majority of thinking men will say that is a fair estimate of the efforts the Government are making to develop trade by taking money out of the pockets of the Canadian farmers to subsidize lines of steamships to bring into Canada goods to compete with the products of our own people of which we have already a surplus. Under these circumstances, it would be a wonder if organizations of this kind had not grown up in our midst, and if they did not feel that the pressure was more than they were willing to endure.

But, Sir, I want, for a moment to glance at the process by which the Government are now working out the details of the National Policy. They told us that they proposed to tax the goods of those people who want to find their way into the Canadian market, and they proposed to do this for the purpose of keeping Canada for the Canadians. That might have been true some years ago. Is it true to-day? What is the history of the changes of taxation as developed under the administration of the present Government? Let us look for a moment at the mode in which they have developed our taxation. When the Finance Minister first entered on his office this is the statement which he made on the 27th March, 1890:

I stated last year, that, looking at the condition of the country and looking at the munificent contributions which have been given by this country for her public works—it seems to me that we ought not, after the close of the year 1889, to increase the public debt. That we ought not to increase the public expenditure for ordinary purposes, and that it was possible to meet the capital obligations we had already assumed, and to go to the year 1892 without adding to our net debt. After that we might consider whether or not we could not gradually decrease the debt which we have assumed and placed on ourselves.

He was then referring to the year 1889, and he repeated and emphasized that statement. He said:

Now, Sir, I am here to-day, one year after the time of making that statement, to affirm with equal truth to-day, $36,500,000 of ordinary expenditure from our Consolidated Revenue Fund is sufficient to carry our debt, pay our interest, pay all our ordinary expenditures, and leave $2,000,000 in the hands of the Minister of Public Works each year to build new and necessary public works.

To carry her present burdens Canada is amply sufficient, but for any further increase I believe good reasons are demanded and good reasons must be given.

Did he confine the expenditure to that $36,500,000? Look at the Estimates for 1895 of $38,517,000 and judge for yourself.

He boasts to us of the expenditure made on our public works. Look, he said, at our railways, at our canals, see the development of our resources by these means. What are the returns that they present to us? The expenditure on these public works was somewhere about $149,000,000, as the hon. gentleman correctly stated. On the Intercolonial, the expenditure was $44,966,424. On our canals the expenditure was $44,709,038; on the Canadian Pacific Railway our expenditure on capital amounted to $62,601,535, making altogether $149,000,000. Now, these are in the investments about which the hon.

Minister is so proud. Let us see what revenues flow into the treasury from those various investments. Look at the Intercolonial of last year. Our revenue was $2,987,000, and the working expenses $2,981,000, so that we had a net revenue of $5,832. But on the expenditure of the $44,900,000, where does the country raise the money to pay the interest? The Government take it out of the taxpayers of the Dominion. Even the small pittance of a revenue from the Intercolonial is not left us, because in operating the Prince Edward Island Railway we are $66,000 short of revenue to meet the current expenses; and that is an improvement for which I give the Minister of Railways credit. What is the revenue from our other great works? Take the canals upon which we spent nearly $42,000,000, and on which we are still spending millions of dollars for the year 1894, our revenue was $387,000. The expenses of maintaining the canal staff and making the repairs necessary to keep the canals in working order, without providing for the renewals or improvements, was $534,000, leaving a net deficit of $147,000. And besides we have to pay every cent of interest on the original $149,000,000, the cost of the construction of those works. How does the case stand in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, upon which we have expended $62,500,000? Who owns that road? Does Canada own it or control it? Has Canada anything to say in the administration of that great public work? No, Sir, that $62,600,000 belongs to a distinct and independent company.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). When you left the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I was reminding the House that a few years ago we on this side of the House were accused of not desiring a through line of railway upon Canadian territory, and we were continually lectured upon the disloyalty of a system that made connections with the North-west Territory through the United States. I referred to the fact that we had contributed $62,600,000 of good solid Canadian money to the Canadian Pacific Railway and that the line was now the property of the company. I want to draw your attention, Sir, to the developments that have taken place since these early days of the Canadian Pacific Railway system. That road covers a distance between Montreal on the east, to Vancouver on the Pacific Ocean, of a little over 2,900 miles over Canadian soil. What do we find to-day in addition to that? We find that what is known as the "Soo" branch of that railway runs from the main line to American territory at the foot of Lake Superior, where a connection is made with an American system of railway. From that point we find two railway systems running westward controlled and operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway, one system known as the Duluth, South Shore and Atlantic, operating, according to the last report, 584 miles of road, and the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Sault Ste. Marie system operating 1,167 miles, or a total of 1,751 miles of this grand national Canadian railway system operating on American territory. And we find in addition that the security of this grand enterprise that Canada has so liberally bonussed in order to put it on a sound financial footing is pledged for the payment of the bonds of these systems. According to Poor's Manual of Railroads, the most recent issue of which I was able to consult was that of 1893, I find that the bonds of these two companies for which the revenues of this system of ours are pledged, amount to no less a sum than $53,000,000. And what further do we find? We find this Canadian system giving connection from Montreal by way of Sault Ste. Marie and St. Paul and west through the great American state of Dakota and northward until it strikes the Canadian Pacific main line west of Regina at a small junction; and we find them running their through Pullman cars over American territory and giving that territory exactly the same railway facilities that they give to Canadians on our main line towards which we have contributed so much. And the men who have sustained and endorsed that system are the men who call themselves patriotic Canadians and who are very fond of crying "annexation" against gentlemen on this side of the House who decline to be bound by such expressions of sentiment.

Now let me turn for a moment as a matter of comparison, and ascertain what are the revenues derived by some of our sister colonies from the railways which they built and which they own and control. I showed before six o'clock that the $149,000,000 that we have invested in our Intercolonial Railway, in our canal system and in the Canadian Pacific Railway did not yield us one dollar towards payment of interest, so that every year the tax-payers of the Dominion have to feel in their pockets for the interest upon these great expenditures. I pointed out, Mr. Speaker, that on the canal system alone, in the payment for care and maintenance, we were $147,000 out of pocket. I turn to the Australian Government railways and in their Year-Book for 1894, giving their returns for the year 1893, the last returns available, I find some figures that should be interesting to Canadians. We find that in New South Wales the government owns and operates 2,351 miles of railway, constructed at a capital cost of £34,657,000 sterling. The gross revenues of that system for the year 1893 were £2,927,000, which, after paying all expenses left net earnings of £1,188,000, or over 3 per cent on the total investment for the construction of those railways. Lest it should be said that this is an isolated example. I turn to the sister colony of New Zealand, the figures for whose railways for the year ending 31st March, 1893, the latest available returns, are before me. The government in that year operated 1,886 miles of railway, the total cost of which for construction was £14,733,000 sterling. The net earnings, after paying working expenses, were £49,380, or a return upon the capital invested of over 3 per cent. For another example I turn to the colony of Victoria. That colony owns 2,975 miles of railway. These railways are reported upon in four divisions. The northern division has a mileage of 836. The net revenue of this system after paying working expenses was sufficient to yield a return of 2.97 per cent on the capital cost. The north-east division, covering 603 miles of road, earned a net dividend of over 4¼ per cent. The eastern section of 500 miles was operated at a slight loss. The western section of 1,018 miles yielded a net dividend of over 3 per cent, and the balance, the Hudson Bay Railway, 4¼ per cent on cost. And let me draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the further fact that the year for which these figures are given was the year of the great financial crisis in the Australian colonies, and the reports of the Victoria system speak of decreased freight and passenger traffic, while they state that the regular equipment which was sufficient to transact the ordinary business had been maintained. Mr. Speaker, I point to the position of our sister colonies as compared with that of this Dominion, and I ask, in all fairness, whether the producing population of Canada to-day are receiving returns from these investments compared with the burdens that are placed upon them thereby. The fact that we are receiving no revenue from so large an expenditure is not creditable to the administration of public affairs here, as compared with that in these sister colonies.

Now, Sir, let me turn for a few moments to some of the statements made by the Finance Minister with respect to the taxation that he said he had taken off the shoulders of the tax-payers of this country, and as to our financial position to-day. You remember, Sir, when, in 1891, the hon. gentleman came down to the House and intimated to us that he had decided to take three and a half millions of taxation off the backs of the Canadian tax-payers. That was an exceedingly liberal proposition on the face of it, to be presented in one session to any legislative assembly such as we have here. But, Mr. Speaker, how was it that the hon. gentleman became suddenly so generous to the tax-payers of the Dominion of Canada? I do not think we need to go very far to ascertain the reason. On the American side, for reasons best known to themselves, sugar was made free, and it was an object lesson in taxation that no Government could stand very long, to see a staple article of consumption like sugar sold just across an imaginary line at 4 cents per pound, while here it was 6½ cents. The Minister of Finance made a virtue of necessity, and took off $3,500,000 of duty from the tax-payers of Canada. Here is how he announces it in his Budget speech of 1891 :

Sugar has always been looked upon in Canada as a large producer of revenue. Sugar in one respect is one of the best articles possible for distributing taxation. The rich and the poor use it largely in proportion to their means, and there is, possibly, no article upon which a part of the revenue of the country can be more equitably placed. The Government has come to the conclusion to sweep away from the burdens of the great mass of the people, with one stroke of the pen, $3,500,000 of taxation.

"Of taxation." Those of us who were in this House previous to that time, remember the pitched battles that used to be indulged in across the floor of this House as to who bore the burden of this taxation. This time there was no hesitation on the part of the Minister of Finance in announcing that this was a burden of taxation, not upon the people outside of Canada who wanted to sell us sugar, but upon the consuming population of Canada who bought and used that sugar. But there is this remarkable feature in the matter to which I wish to draw attention, that the Minister always stops in his Budget speech at this point in his quotation. Now, I want to extend the quotation a little further down in that same speech. The next paragraph goes on to say :

We propose to ask the House to allow us to put on $1,500,000, and the question is where to put it on.

And he proceeded to put on taxes thus : he added 1 cent per pound additional on malt, and he estimated the yield would be $500,000 revenue. He added 20 cents per gallon excise duty on whisky, which he estimated would yield $600,000 ; and he added 5 cents per pound more on tobacco, and he estimated the revenue from that at $400,000, making, in all, $1,500,000 of taxes that he immediately imposed, at the same time that he took off $3,500,000. Now, Mr. Speaker, I may be a little obtuse, but it does strike me that when a man takes credit for taking off $3,500,000 of taxation, and, at the same time, puts on $1,500,000 on other necessities or luxuries that our people are consuming, it is not a very brilliant stroke of policy. I do not think it takes a very large-sized statesman to accomplish an operation like that, and I do not think it justifies the statement that at one sweep he had relieved the people of taxes to the extent of $3,500,000, when he immediately put on $1,500,000 without giving the people one breathing moment to realize what it meant to be relieved of $3,500,000. And, Mr. Speaker, there is more than that, he got the additional taxes that were imposed, for that year when he was making his Budget statement, the inland revenue made a return of $6,825,000; for the next year, 1892, it had risen to $8,007,000; in 1893 it remained at $8,444,000. But then he took 1 cent per pound off the malt duty, relieving that article of $50,000 of taxation, and the next season, 1894, his collections from inland revenue were still $8,364,000; showing conclusively that instead of taking $3,500,000 of taxes off the back of the Canadian tax-payer, he only took $2,000,000 to begin with.

But, Sir, how do they set at defiance the principles of the National Policy in the present session as applied to their mode of providing for the present condition of things? Sir, I heard the Minister of Finance making merry at the deficits that existed when my hon. friend from South Oxford was Minister of Finance under the Mackenzie Administration; and he rejoiced at the idea of my hon. friend from South Oxford warming himself at a deficit of less than $2,000,000. But the hon. Minister of Finance tried to warm himself last year by admitting that he had a deficit of $1,200,000, but it did not seem to warm him up worth a cent; and this year, after figuring very carefully, he comes down to the House with this humiliating announcement that he has a deficit of $4,500,000 in prospect for the current year. Fancy if you can, Mr. Speaker, the condition of things if the two parties in this House were to exchange places, and we were to present a deficit of $4,500,000. Why, Sir, there would not be metaphors enough in the English language to express their indignation at the Minister of Finance who had so far forgotten himself and his country as to allow such an event to transpire. Now, the hon. gentleman turns around and he warms himself at a $4,500,000 deficit. I should think it ought to make him comfortable if he thought my hon. friend rejoiced in one that did not come half way up to it.

But we listened to the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) the other day telling us about the Conservative process of providing for a revenue. And what was it? After sneering at what he calls the way of hon. gentlemen on the Liberal side of the House, he says one way is by grinding down the wages of the employees, and the profits of capitalists, so that we can produce more cheaply in this country than in any other country in the world. That is the way the Liberal party raise their revenue. Another way is to put up the tariff so as to make outsiders who wish to come into this market, pay something for the privilege. That is the way the Conservative party propose to keep our markets for our own people. Is that the Conservative way to-day? Sir, that is ancient history; that does not apply to the Conservative party to-day; that is not their policy, as expounded by the Minister of Finance from his chair across the floor of this House. I sometimes think that the dominant political party in this Dominion has fallen on evil times, that it has fallen into the hands of men who do not realize the capacity and fidelity that characterized their predecessors. If my hon. friend from East Hastings is an authority on this question, I think we must conclude that the Minister of Finance to-day has sadly fallen from grace, according to that principle of the Conservative party expounded by my hon. friend from East Hastings.

Now, what are the resolutions that are pending to-day in connection with this matter? Is it proposed to make outsiders who wish to come into this market, pay for the privilege of getting in here. Let us see how he has set about to provide for it. He puts another half cent per pound on sugar, and he goes back to his great sheet anchor, whisky, that has stood him good stead time and again, and has been more valuable to him than any other commodity he ever touched, either in his political or social career. Sir, it was the whisky question that brought him before the public, and gave him his position in the House to-day. The whisky question is the great sheet anchor of the Minister of Finance, and the leader of this House. To-day, after taxing sugar, what does he do? He goes back to whisky, and he puts another 20 cents per gallon on whisky. He expects to get $500,000 more out of this whisky tax, and $1,250,000 out of the sugar tax, or about $1,750,000 on whisky and sugar. How does the account stand, after taking off $50,000 from malt last year? He took $3,500,000 off the sugar in 1891, and he re-imposed on sugar, whisky and tobacco, $3,300,000 between then and now. That is the way he carries out the Conservative policy. I say, Sir, if the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) is the correct exponent of the Conservative policy, he ought to hasten and take the Finance Minister in hand and bring him back to the position the party formerly occupied, for he has got altogether away from the good old Conservative path. But the hon. gentleman has got into the avenues of the people's pockets. I remember hearing of a little boy who was asked to write an essay on the natural history of man. He set about it after this fashion: Man is a little animal that walks on his hind legs and wears clothes; he is very quiet; you can put your hand on him anywhere and he won't kick, but you must not touch his pocket. Sir, when it came to the hour of necessity, with an ugly visaged deficit of $4,500,000 haunting the dreams of the Finance Minister, and dogging him day and night, he did not take the National Policy mode of securing a revenue, by taxing outsiders who wished to bring something into the country. Oh, no; he went straight for the pockets of the Canadian consumers, and he placed half a cent on sugar that he knew they could not escape, and when they take a drink of whisky they have to contribute another 20 per cent to the purpose of creating this revenue.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. That is not enough.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). I have no objection to the whisky men contributing it. But I have to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to this, that if the principles expounded by the Finance Minister in the early and callow years of his political life were correct, we are making it more and more difficult every year for the people of the Dominion to reach that point which the hon. gentleman formerly said meant the well-being of the people, wiping out this revenue from liquor and prohibiting its consumption in our midst. That is the direction in which we are drifting.

But this does not cover the whole of the question. I want to draw attention to the difference between the policy of the Liberals and the National Policy, and I think the sugar question will illustrate it about as effectively as anything I can present to the House. The Americans under the McKinley Act of 1891, struck off the duty on raw sugar and sugars up to No. 16 Dutch standard, and left the duty of half a cent per pound on refined sugar for the benefit of the American sugar trust. At one operation they took $60,000,000 of taxes off their people. What is the position to-day of the sugar tariff here in Canada? Does the half cent a pound going into the treasury represent the amount of duty that the people of this country pay for their refined sugar? No. We have another tax, and it does not come out of the Americans either, it comes out of the consumers of sugar in Canada—it is a tax of 64 cents additional on every 100 pounds. For the protection of whom? The Canadian consumer? No—the Canadian refiner of sugar. Let us apply that to the sugar imports of last season, and see how it will operate. We imported in round numbers a little over 300,000,000 pounds of raw sugar in 1894. Say that 50,000,000 went direct into family consumption for ordinary purposes, and that 250,000,000 of that importation passed through the hands of the refiners. What is the result of the application of this system of protection to-day? Why, Sir, the McKinley tariff, as an engine for securing revenue for the sugar trust, is nowhere, it is not in it; and I will show you why. Take 250,000,000 pounds of raw sugar imported into Canada last year. The protection to the refiner on that sugar under the American tariff would have been $1,250,000. What is it under the tariff we are operating here to-day? No less than $1,600,000. Last summer when the fight was on in Washington with the sugar trust, and it took all summer to settle the question, the difficulty was over the amount of protection the Americans would give the sugar refineries; and at the close of that contest where were the sugar refineries placed? They were given one-eighth of one per cent of duty extra on refined sugar imposed for their protection; instead of 64 cents per 100 pounds given in Canada, they were only allowing 12½ cents per 100 pounds. We sometimes reach results better by comparison. For the last three months the dividend of the American sugar trust, with that protection of 12½ cents per 100 pounds, was 3 per cent in the quarter on a capital of $75,000,000, and experts on the American side say the whole of the sugar could be refined with a plant not costing over $15,000,000. Yet one-eighth of one per cent gives a sufficient return to pay on this enormous capital 3 per cent per quarter, or 12 per cent per annum, whereas our refiners are protected to nearly five times that amount, and instead of getting $312,500, as the American extra protection to the trust would give them on our imports of sugar, they received $1,600,000 protection from this Government. There is a line of cleavage between the policy represented on this side of the House and the policy represented by hon. gentlemen opposite. We do not object to bearing the burdens sufficient for the necessary maintenance and for the expenditure of this country; we are willing to carry the burdens necessary to pay interest on our public debt, heavy as it is; we are willing to bear the burdens imposed for the necessary working expenditure, but we are not willing to become burden bearers for specially protected industries after this fashion.

Hon. gentlemen opposite say that free trade as spoken of in Britain is impracticable here. I, for myself, and I speak for myself, say we are perfectly willing to bear the burdens imposed on our goods by a tariff that will enable us to meet our current expenditures; but so long as I am in a position to protest I will protest against being called on to maintain industries that cannot stand on their own legs. On this point I desire to draw the attention of the House to an article printed in the "Mail" a short time ago, an organ that cannot be accused of leaning towards popular sentiment, and this article was printed after it became the organ of the Government. It is as follows:—

The plea of those who want to locate newcomers here at any cost is, that we cannot expect them to come unless inducements are offered. This policy has been sufficiently illustrated in Ontario. Again and again it has been necessary for the legislature to do something to check the evil.

There have been peripatetic industries, the proprietors of which looked out for a "good bonus," started their mills, worked up the subsidy, and then looked out "for fresh fields and pastures new."

If the natural and commercial advantages of a place are not sufficient to attract manufacturing enterprises, it had better wait till they are.

It is no use trying to grow the plant of commerce by the aid of the expensive manure of subsidies. It wastes the substance of the people in uncertain speculations.

It wastes the substance of our country to-day in bolstering up industries and supporting institutions that are not able to stand upon their own limbs.

Sometimes, they tell us, that our Canadian industries would not be able to take care of themselves. Sir, I do not endorse that doctrine. Let me quote one example—and I have to acknowledge my indebtedness again to the Toronto "World"—to show what is done every day by Canadian industries which have never asked the Government for drawbacks on goods which they have exported, but who honestly consume Canadian iron in their industry and pay the burdens that were imposed upon them, and sell their goods to the community in open competition. Here is what the Toronto "World," in the month of March said with respect to one of these industries. Speaking with the representative of a new establishment in Toronto that was entering into the manufacture of bicycles, it says :

I am every day becoming more firmly convinced that we can manufacture bicycles and machinery just as well and cheaply in Canada as in any other country in the world. In proof of this I may say that we have just received from Messrs. Bertram & Co., of Dundas, a consignment of lathes, special tools and formers for use in the manufacture of our bicycles, which cost us one-third the figure tendered by some of the leading United States manufacturers. These tools and machines were made from the models of these in use by the Beeston, Humber Company, of England, acknowledged to be the most accurate and perfect in design, perhaps, in use at the present time. I sent the same specifications that went to Bertram & Co. to the United States firms, and the difference in the tenders sent in fairly staggered me. I can tell you. We, of course, then awarded the contract to the lowest tenderers, and we are now more than pleased at the manner in which the Dundas firm carried out their work.

Here is an establishment that has not asked to be bolstered up and protected. They are friendly to the National Policy, staunch supporters of it ; but, in the face of all those facts, here is the evidence that they do manufacture successfully to-day, and that they put cheaper goods upon the market than can be bought on the American side. These are men who have pluck sufficient to attend to their business, and they do not belong to that type of manufacturers who have to go around and lean on this Government for aid and support.

Sir, with respect to the question of how Canada should be developed and our industries advanced, I want to present the House with a quotation from a journal that has never been accused of being Liberal in its political antecedents or associations, and which has been known as the organ of a section of this community which has been solidly and staunchly Conservative. Let me read from that article briefly, for the information of the House. I think it puts the question in better form, and it answers the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite much better than I can do. It was dated the 14th March, 1895, and it says :

Canada ought to be one of the greatest and most progressive nations of the world. The Dominion covers one-fifteenth of the earth's surface, embraces about 40 per cent of the British Empire, and is only exceeded in extent by Russia, and its resources are in keeping with its extent.

But it does not progress as it should. We are supposed to have drawn 800,000 immigrants from Europe in the ten years ending 1890, yet our net increase of population was only 500,000 as against 19 per cent in the previous decade.

There are several reasons, but the chief one after all for the slow advancement of Canada is found in the trade conditions that exist.

We want consumers for the products of our fisheries, forests, mines and farms far beyond the capacity of this country to supply.

This want could be supplied by the United States to a certain extent, but their terms—free trade with them and discrimination against the mother country—are such as no loyal citizen of the Empire could accept.

Across the sea, in the British Isles, is a market for all, and more than all, that we can produce. Why do we not furnish a larger portion of her supplies ? Because it is a natural law of commerce that trade cannot flow all one way—one nation cannot sell to another without buying something in return.

And as we in Canada by an almost prohibitive tariff on British goods restrict our purchases in Great Britain, we, by that very act, restrict our sales to that country also.

What should be done, therefore, is to make a sweeping reduction in the customs duties now levied on manufactured goods imported from the United Kingdom. The adoption of this policy would vastly cheapen many articles that are used daily by our people. It will, by increasing our purchases in the mother country, add to our sales there as well, and it will make the cities of Canada the purchasing market for hundreds of thousands living just across the border.

Two objections to this policy may be anticipated. The alleged difficulty in raising a revenue and the interference with local manufacturing enterprises. In reply to the first objection : The increase in the consumption of British goods would more than make for the national treasury for the reduction in the rate of customs taxation, besides reducing the expenses of the Government. Canada is offering $750,000 of a yearly subsidy for a fast steamship service on the Atlantic, and the treasury is now being drawn upon for what is virtually a subsidy to increase our butter exports to England. Withdraw the artificial barriers against trade with the mother country erected by ourselves, and there will be a sudden bound in the commercial intercourse between us that will make both of the above expedients unnecessary.

Sir, that is not my language. That is the language of the Orange "Sentinel," a journal which has never been accused of Liberal proclivities. I commend it to the gentlemen opposite who are wandering around in the gloom and darkness of the past by-gone years, wondering what free nade as they have it in Great Britain means. Here is one of their own friends who has no difficulty in expounding the policy we are advocating with respect to developing and advancing the interests of our people in Canada.

But, we are sometimes told that we are not very consistent in our advocacy of trade relations, and that one time we talk reciprocity, and continental free trade, and trade with Great Britain, and lots of other statements are made like that. I want to give to you, Mr. Speaker, an authority on the advantages to our people of trade with the United States that will not be disputed by even the Minister of Finance himself, when I quote it. It is the opinion of a gentleman who has been in this House for many years, and this is the statement he makes before his electors, gathered last summer for the purpose of discussing the selection of a candidate for his county. He said :

He had a duty to perform before leaving Parliament, and he had already induced the United States Government to reduce the tariff on horses, barley and coal, and he was still in communication with an agent of the United States Government to bring about a further reduction in the American tariff which would benefit the farmers. He further stated that no person would be more disappointed than Sir Mackenzie Bowell, if he did not receive the nomination.

Is that not rank heresy to proceed from any gentleman who is a supporter of the National Policy? Why, Sir, it is worthy of a Grit of the deepest dye. He says that it is a benefit to the Canadian farmer to have the United States tariff reduced, and that he is securing reductions on horses, barley, and coal. Why, Sir, it was my respected friend from Cornwall (Mr. Bergin) who said this; and I am quoting from a report in an organ of the Government of the day, written by a friendly hand.

Sir, I have been grieved and ashamed to listen to hon. gentlemen opposite denouncing day in and day out the position of the mother country—the country that has never failed to stand by Canadian interests, that has given us the shelter of her protection and the shelter of her name through good report and evil report. Yes, these men are never done telling us that in free trade Britain distress prevails everywhere, and that people are suffering and in want, and are travelling towards a protective policy.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). They are preaching blue ruin in England.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). Yes, preaching blue ruin in England. They carefully quote to us some of the campaign speeches of the Conservative party in England, made a year or two ago; but they do not quote to us the divisions of the House that have recently taken place on any of those questions. It may do to go into the country and tell the farmers that they are oppressed, that competition from the outside is straining their resources and reducing the income of their estates; and if you apply that statement to the proprietors of those estates, it is perfectly true; but if you look back through the history of England for a few generations, you will find that some of those gentlemen gave very little, indeed, for the estates from which they are drawing large revenues to-day. Suppose the prices of the products of the farm were doubled to-morrow, and kept so for a few years, how much of the increase do hon. gentlemen suppose would fall to the average tenant farmer? Would not the aristocracy who control their lands immediately proceed to put up their rents to match?

But I want to call attention to another quotation, bearing on this very question, from a journal which cannot be accused of Grit proclivities or of being unfriendly to the Government of the day; and I commend to hon. gentlemen opposite the sturdy and vigorous language in which it characterizes their conduct in thus belittling the mother country that has done so much for us. If they turn to the "Orange Sentinel" of the 25th April last they will find this paragraph, headed, "Distress in Great Britain":

Many United States and some Canadian papers are constantly telling us that great distress prevails in Britain. The British Parliament appointed a Royal Commission to inquire into the condition of affairs. The inquiry included the period of the great storms in Britain, storms unprecedented for more than fifty years. In spite of this terrible weather, the people of Great Britain suffered less actual distress and have been more prosperous than those of any other country under the sun.

The commission sent out inquiries to all localities in England, and received 1,194 replies from districts representing over 20,000,000 of a population, with these results: 569 localities, with a population of nearly 7,000,000, report no exceptional distress; 454 localities, with a population of over 10,000,000, report that there is exceptional distress, due solely to the severity of the winter; 144 localities, with a population of 3,700,000, report exceptional distress from want of employment, due to slackness of trade, depression in agriculture, or particular local or industrial causes.

Scotland, Wales and Ireland are dealt with separately, and show that, apart from the severity of the weather, no exceptional distress prevails.

The returns prove conclusively that the mass of the British people are not suffering. Britain holds her own in everything that tends to make a people great, and lying telegrams to Yankee papers are only sent to help the combines and commercial thieves in the United States, who find it pays to abuse Britain.

We regret that any Canadian paper should reproduce these lying despatches and try to bolster up Canadian combines.

That, Sir, is no statement from my side of the House. It is a statement from a journal that has never staggered in its allegiance to hon. gentlemen opposite; but the force of the truth compelled it manfully to administer this scathing rebuke to those of hon. gentlemen opposite who are perpetually belittling the country which is the birth-place of many of us and the land we are all proud to be associated with. Sir, we are sometimes told that the National Policy has developed the country, has kept our people from leaving us, and has built up in our midst industries that have been of advantage to our people.

There is just one thing to which I wish to draw the attention of the House before I conclude, and which I think does not quite correspond with this statement. I refer to the redistributions that have taken place in my own province of Ontario and throughout the Dominion generally. You will remember, Sir, that after the census of 1881, when there was a Redistribution Act passed in 1882, Ontario had so far advanced in population and development that she was entitled to four additional members. Manitoba had also grown in the short period between that and the time she was constituted a separate province, and had one member added to her representation, and the confederacy was entitled, by increase of population, to five additional representatives in the House of Commons. Ten years of the National Policy passed over the country. We took the census of 1891, and we came to the redistribution of 1892, and what did we find? We found that in the premier province of Ontario our population had not gained at all, but had simply kept step with that of the province of Quebec, which is the standard province of confederation, and that if we had not gone back, at any rate we had not gained. This showed conclusively that Ontario had not retained her natural increase of population during the ten years of the National Policy, from 1881 to 1891. What was the case in the other provinces? Manitoba had gained two members, showing that notwithstanding the wealth that we had freely poured out, and the temptations we had held to Europeans to come and settle on the broad prairies of the North-west, Manitoba was only able in ten years to gain two additional representatives, whereas in five years, under the old regime, she had gained one. How was it with the maritime provinces? Nova Scotia was not able to retain her population, and her contingent will come back after the next election one member less. New Brunswick will have two members less, and the tight little Island of Prince Edward—the little gem that lies out in the gulf by itself, and there is no finer agricultural country on the continent—will have to content itself with a reduction of one member. This shows that in the aggregate the eastern provinces by the sea have lost population, since they are not able to retain the number of members they formerly had. British Columbia was entitled to no increase.

As regards the province of Ontario what are the facts? Hon. gentlemen opposite boast of the building up of our population by the National Policy, and point with pride to the growth of some of the larger cities. But, Sir, Toronto has grown at the expense of the smaller towns and villages, within forty miles of it, and the only part of Ontario where the population has increased is the new district of Algoma, and there the increase is due to the development of its mining industry. What was then the action taken by the Government. They were in the position that they had to redistribute some of the constituencies in order to equalize the representation, whereas if the National Policy had done all they promised it would, instead of diminishing they would have required to increase the representation. Not only would the older constituencies have retained their representation, but they would have increased it. Two of the older constituencies, however, in the Niagara peninsula, had to be blotted out, and their record, dating back to the early history of the province disappears. By the action the Government took they might just as well have passed an act declaring that the part of my constituency attached to North Brant should not vote at all. For what reason? It: the constituency to which they are attached, candidates of the party opposite, during the last two general elections, lost in both cases their deposit; and for fear the Liberal element of that constituency should not continue to do that sort of thing, we find the Government adding to it a section of another riding, which gave 350 of a Liberal majority at the last general election. They did this to enable the electors to still make sure that any candidate of hon. gentlemen opposite who would have the temerity to again test that constituency, would again lose his deposit. They might just as well have passed an act declaring that Conservatives and Liberals alike added from North Wentworth should be deprived of the right to vote because they were put where their votes could not be successfully used.

But, Mr. Speaker, you may change the outlines of a constituency, you may readjust your boundaries, but you cannot control the free and independent electors who reside within those boundaries. The population of Ontario, be they Conservatives or Liberals, have at least minds of their own; and I shall be very much mistaken if the Government do not find that their policy has done nothing to strengthen them in the estimation of the best thinking men of the Niagara peninsula. You may change these boundaries and adjust these schemes, but the experience of hon. gentlemen opposite in 1882 indicates that the people are free in their choice and will suit themselves when the time comes.

I apologize to the House for the time I have taken, and I thank the House for the kind attention it has given my remarks. We are willing to bear all the necessary burdens in order to pay our debts and maintain our credit and good name. We are willing to bear the taxation imposed upon us to meet the necessary expenditure of this country; we are willing to give our native industries every benefit of that protection up to that extent; but for myself I am not willing that any man should deliberately put his hand into my pocket and take more or less money out in order to bolster an institution that has not backbone enough to stand on its own legs, and I shall be found voting for the amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford.

Mr. McDONALD (Victoria, N.S.) I have listened with a good deal of interest to the address of the hon. gentleman who has taken his seat. I do not know whether it is in very good taste, on either side of the House, to find fault or to try and exaggerate in any way the distress prevailing in Great Britain to-day. But I think that when hon. gentlemen opposite attempt to rebuke members on this side for telling the country that there is distress prevailing in Great Britain and that things are not as they should be in that centre of free trade, they ought not at least to depreciate the institutions and condition of their own country. When I entered the Chamber, I think the first remark I heard the hon. gentleman make, who has just taken his seat, was with reference to the Hon. Mr. Mercier, of Quebec. I do not know whether he felt happy that the proceedings which were taken against him were not successful, but he was careful to tell us that Mr. Mercier was not convicted. Whether the hon. gentleman meant that Mr. Mercier was not guilty or whether he meant to express his pleasure at Mr. Mercier escaping conviction, I cannot say, but anyhow it seemed very gratifying to him that Mr. Mercier was not convicted. And no doubt he was very happy to taunt this side of the House with the fact that he was not convicted. On the other hand, he told us that the late contractor escaped, and that we had failed in convicting him. Well, I believe that the evidence was presented in both cases before the tribunals in the province of Quebec; and I may say for myself, and I think I speak for every honest man in this Dominion, that, whether it was the fault of the evidence, or whether it was the fault of the tribunal, or whether it was the fault of the laws, if we believed the evidence against them, it was a great pity the contractor and Mr. Mercier were not convicted of offences of which, I think, they were guilty, according to the evidence given against them. The hon. member told us first that everything was produced in Great Britain much more cheaply than it was here, owing to free trade. He said the people over there could manufacture to greater advantage than we could. Then he went on to tell us that in the republic of Argentine the people could produce wheat much more cheaply than we could—I think he said from 15 to 20 cents a bushel cheaper. Then he told us the manufacturers here were not prospering as well as they should, and that our farming was not paying those engaged in it. And, as well as I could understand, the only remedy that he proposed was that we should open this country to the manufacturers of Great Britain, and to the wheat growers of the Argentine Republic. He found fault because the Government allowed, on articles exported, a rebate of 99 per cent of the duties paid on materials entering into the production of those goods. Sir, so far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing that manufacturers should come into this country and manufacture for the republic of Argentine or for the United States or Great Britain, and not charge them a cent of duty on the materials they use in the production of their wares. I am perfectly willing that we should manufacture for the whole world, if possible, and that to the extent that we do manufacture for other countries we should return duties paid by the manufacturer. I believe that in the case of liquors sent abroad, the excise duty is returned: I know that it is so in the case of tobacco, because a common way to evade payment of the duties is to send the tobacco down to St. Pierre and then smuggle it back into the country. That was at one time quite an industry in the maritime provinces, and in some parts of Quebec, though I understand that it is now very largely put a stop to. Now, I propose to show that in the period of distress that we had from 1873 to 1879, in the highly protected country to the south of us, the export of home products increased year by year, while our exports of home products decreased:

	United States.	Canada.
1873	$505,000,000	$76,538,000
1874	569,000,000	76,741,000
1875	499,000,000	69,709,000
1876	525,000,000	72,401,000
1877	589,000,000	68,030,000
1878	680,000,000	67,989,000
1879	698,000,000	62,431,000

These figures show that while the exports of home products of the United States increased $193,000,000, ours decreased $14,000,000. In the highly protected country to the south of us, these exports increased by almost two-thirds, while ours decreased almost one-sixth. Now, let us make a comparison between Great Britain and Canada, during these years. I will give you the figures of the export of home produce for these countries, 1874 and 1879:

	Great Britain.	Canada.
1879	191,531,000	62,431,000

So, in Great Britain, a free trade country, and in Canada then under a tariff of 17½ per cent, these exports decreased pretty much in the same proportion. Contrast this with the period from 1890 to 1893. We find that in Canada the exports of home produce in 1890 were $85,257,000, while in 1893 these exports had increased by no less than $20,541,000. In Great Britain, the exports of home produce were $263,530,000, which, in 1893, had declined by $45,500,000. I think the trade in home products exported abroad is about the best test of a country's prosperity. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think there is nothing that our friends on the other side dwell upon more than upon the amount of taxes that are being taken out of the people. I often see it quoted, and I think I have heard it on several occasions in this House, that in 1878, under the old regime, the revenue was $22,375,000, while in 1894 the revenue was increased to $36,374,000. That is perfectly correct, and the increased amount was received by the Government. But in 1894 we received from the post office, from railways, and from interest on investments, the sum of $8,795,500, whereas, in 1878, we only received $4,533,000 from these sources. Here is a gain in these three items alone of $4,262,000. This is not a matter of taxation. This is what we receive in revenue from the post office, and from railways and canals. Now, the excise is not considered as a matter of taxation. It is not levied upon imports that are brought into the country, it is simply a tax upon whisky, tobacco and some other articles. In 1878, from tobacco and whisky we received the sum of $4,858,600, whereas in 1884 we received $8,381,000, that is a gain of over $3,500,000. Now, customs alone, in 1878, yielded $12,782,800; in 1894 they yielded $19,198,100, the actual increase being $6,415,300. It was natural that there should be an increase from 1878 to 1894; it is not supposed that the country would stand still; it is not supposed that we could build the great works that have been undertaken and finished between 1878 and 1894 without a large revenue. Now, the actual increase per cent on the imports from 1873 to 1878, was considerably larger than it has been from 1878 to 1894. If we had the same rates of duty in 1894 as we had in 1878, we could have collected $15,867,085 additional, whereas the actual increase was only $3,331,000. Now, we have been collecting a revenue largely upon articles that are not necessities of life for a vast number of our population, we have been collecting largely from what are called the luxuries of life. Take, for instance, ale and porter, I do not think the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Bain) would consider those articles necessities of life. I have here a table showing the duties collected on various articles in 1878 and 1894, respectively:

DUTIES COLLECTED.

	1878.	1894.
Ale and porter.....	$ 43,863	$ 65,661
Spirits	1,000,864	2,036,559
Wines	207,566	309,339
Tobacco	188,530	287,702
Patent medicines.....	29,744	62,937
Perfumery	5,953	10,280
Playing cards.....	4,014	10,013
Plate glass.....	14,467	66,668
Gold and silver manufac...	41,496	79,418
Silks and satins.....	246,669	743,402
Jewellery	46,404	51,124
Totals.....	$1,829,570	$3,772,540

The hon. member for Wentworth complained of the condition of the farmer. Well, in 1878 we imported of produce that is largely grown in this country, a total of $15,222,050; in 1894 we imported of the same articles $2,866,483. In breadstuffs alone, in 1878, we imported $13,452,460; in 1894 we imported $1,211,210. In all these articles, that is animals, breadstuffs, eggs, hay, provisions, plants and trees, vegetables and fresh fruits, in 1878, the imports amounted to $15,222,000 and in 1894, to $2,866,483. But if we imposed the tax that existed in 1878 upon five articles that are very much used in this country by all classes, we would have collected $9,028,304 of revenue, which have been remitted within the last four or five years. In 1878 there was a duty levied upon black tea of 5 cents per pound, of which we imported 9,772,334 pounds in 1894, which would have yielded a revenue of $488,616. There was a duty upon green tea of 6 cents per pound, which would have yielded a revenue in 1894 of $566,133. There was a duty upon coffee of 2 cents per pound, which would have yielded a revenue of $59,312. There was a duty of $2.45 per cwt. upon sugar, which would have yielded a revenue of $7,442,945. There was a duty upon coal oil of 7 1-5 cents per gallon, which would have yielded a revenue of $471,298, if the same duty were imposed as in 1878. But instead of that sum, the duty collected was only $392,743 from coal oil. So that the people were relieved, taking the same importations of those articles, of $8,635,000 from 1878 to 1894. Now, we are often reminded that the taxation is very high upon several articles in this country. But hon. gentlemen forget that in the year 1894 there were over $51,000,000 worth of free goods entered in this Dominion. In the first place, we had anthracite coal to the value of $6,355,285, admitted free; then we had 950,000 tons of salt imported into this country free. We had cork wood, largely used by fishermen, imported free to the value of $19,661. We are often told that taxes fall upon those who are least able to bear them; but I see that of silks, raw and unmanufactured, we only had $206,325 worth imported. We had broom corn, fibre, vegetable fibre, fruits, hemp (undressed), seeds, sugar, tobacco, trees and other articles, making up at least over $10,000,000 in value. Besides, there were cotton wool, cotton waste, cotton yarn for use in certain manufactories, drugs, dyes, ducks for belting, jute cloth, a very large amount of cocoanut oil, rubber, and many other articles of that kind, were imported into the country, to the value of $51,831,450. Of the imports of 1894, $69,873,571 were taxed, and $51,883,000 were left untaxed. The next question we often hear discussed in this House is the question of the exodus. We must not forget that the country to the south of us was settled early in American history. From England and Ireland, and other parts of Europe, in the last century, and in the century before, there was a stream of emigration to that country. People went there, and their friends followed them. No sooner were people settled here, particularly in the lower provinces, than they commenced to find their way to the United States. So long as I can recollect, even before confederation, one political party always charged the other with driving the people from the country. Well, Sir, they have been going to the country to the south and settling there, until now, I believe, the United States themselves are beginning to find that they have too many people. They had factory establishments in the Eastern States, they had lands in the western country, and people from the provinces took up lands vacated by people of the States to go out and take large tracts of land in the west. It is not a very easy matter to divert immigration from a country to which people have been accustomed to go, and where relatives and friends reside. But we hope in a very short time the tide of emigration that has been going to the United States will be directed toward our great heritage in the west. We often hear talk about 60,000,000 people to the south of us. The United States have 10 or 15 millions of Africans; and the opinion is generally expressed that the republic could get along very well supposing those ten or fifteen millions would take their departure and return to the country from whence they came hundreds of years ago. The United States also have a large number of what is called the Latin race, Spaniards and Italians, and there is a general consensus of opinion among the people of the United States that the country could get along just as well if those people returned to their homes. We have in this country a hardy people, a thrifty people, and a class of settlers of which any country ought to feel proud. One point which is very frequently overlooked in this debate is this: What will be the effect of a change of policy such as hon. gentlemen advocate? We saw in the United States a few years ago, an attempt made to change the tariff. We all know that the changes made fell very far short of what the people expected, and very far short of what we expected at that time. But the very fact that changes were taking place caused capital at once to be withdrawn. I think it makes very little difference whether we were right or wrong in 1878, because, for seventeen years we have followed the course then laid down, and have given protection to our native industries. We are importing the raw material and manufacturing it in the country. Capital is shy, and will not be invested where a country is subject to sudden and frequent changes in tariff. Although very few changes were made in the United States, yet the people distrusted the corporations, even private individuals distrusted the banks. In 1892 you could hardly take up a newspaper but you read that some tramp or gang had got hold of the hard-earned accumulations of some unfortunate individual in that country who had taken their money out of the banks, fearing they were not stable, and would not return it when demanded. There are many things we have undertaken, there are many courses we have pursued. On the great question of confederation itself a great many people, and probably a very respectable minority, supposed it would be a great injury to each of the provinces concerned. But no one would think of going back to the old position. A great many people were opposed to buying the North-west. But I presume there are very few people who would go back to the position we occupied before. Many people were opposed to the terms made with British Columbia. But I presume there are very few who would like to let British Columbia go, and return to our former position. Whether the Conservatives, in 1878, were right or wrong, we would have to begin over again if the tariff were changed. But I do not apprehend that any very radical changes would occur. Hon. gentlemen opposite, however, seemed to be determined that the manufacturers of this country shall be destroyed; they tell us that the manufacturers are making too much money. I should like hon. gentlemen opposite to reconcile the statements made by them during this debate. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) produced figures and submitted them to the House the other evening to show that our manufacturers were not making as much money in 1891 as they were in 1871, and these are the figures he produced: In 1871 the wages paid to men and those employed in factories amounted to $40,851,009; raw material, $124,907,846; total, $165,758,855. The product was of the value of $221,617,733, the balance of profit was $55,858,918; capital, $77,964,020; and the percentage of profit 73 per cent. The hon. gentleman went through a similar calculation in regard to 1881, and he stated that the profits were 42 per cent. He afterwards came down to 1891, and showed by his figures that the profits were 33.06 per cent; in other words, that the profits of the manufacturers of this country had been reduced 50 per cent in twenty years. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) went on to show us that the manufacturers were making a very large percentage in profits, and that, in fact, they were extracting money, not only from the pockets, but from the faces of the people of this country; and that they were making a profit of 33½ per cent, which he thought was something almost criminal. Now, Sir, I shall leave himself and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to reconcile these two statements. One hon. member says the profit has decreased from 73 per cent to 33½ per cent, and the other hon. gentleman states that under the National Policy the manufacturers are taking millions and millions of dollars out of the people of this country. Now, Mr. Speaker, probably every member addressing this House might feel that his own particular locality is the one that he should confine his remarks more particularly to. The coal industry is the principal industry in the locality in which I reside. I have not heard one hon. gentleman on the other side of the House state that if the Liberals came into power, the duty would be left upon coal. We have had an experience of free coal from 1871 or 1872 to 1879. The development and prosperity of the coal industry not only affects the immediate localities where the mines are situated, but it affects the whole province of Nova Scotia so far as its commerce is concerned. Large sums are paid to the men in wages; our schooners and steamers are profitably employed, and a large number of men are engaged, not only in the mines, but in handling the coal around the shipping piers. In the clusters of villages around the coal mines, the people of the surrounding country are enabled to find a very profitable market, which if destroyed in any way would injure the agricultural prospects in many counties of Nova Scotia. In addition to that, the revenue derived from the coal by the local government is very material, and it would be greatly affected if the duty were taken off coal and its production lessened. In 1878 the royalty collected on coal in Nova Scotia was $50,531.07, while for the nine months of 1893, the royalty collected was $174,810.07. The amount estimated by the Provincial Secretary for the year ending 1879—I cannot get access to the journals for that year, so as to show what it realized—but the amount estimated was $60,000 of revenue from this source, while in 1894 the Provincial Secretary estimated that the revenue from coal royalty would be $250,000. While the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac) was addressing the House last night, I was thinking that perhaps if the revenue of the province of Nova Scotia had remained as it was in 1878, there would be grave doubts that that hon. gentleman would now be sitting in the House. With an increase from $50,000 to $250,000 in coal royalties, the Government of Nova Scotia have been able to deal very liberally with respect to roads and bridges in the province. The county which my hon. friend represents was not forgotten, and I have no doubt that that was a very large element in contributing to his success in the various elections from 1876 to 1895. I doubt very much if the hon. gentleman (Mr. McIsaac) would have had a seat in this House were it not for the increase in revenue which enabled the provincial government to expend a considerable amount of money on roads and bridges in his county. We all know what advantage the local members in the province of Nova Scotia can reap from this expenditure, and the material assistance which it gives them in their elections. I am not finding particular fault with the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac). I am not aware of anything he has done personally with reference to this, but I know as a general rule, when $30,000 or $40,000 is voted for a county to build bridges, and $20,000 or $30,000 to repair the roads, and when it is absolutely under the control of the local member representing the county, it is an element with which we have to contend at every election.

Mr. McISAAC. How much was voted last year for the county of Antigonish on roads and bridges?

Mr. McDONALD (Victoria). I do not know the estimate.

Mr. McISAAC. Not one dollar.

Mr. McDONALD (Victoria). Oh, well. I know how it is. I think that the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac) probably acted more wisely than they did in the county I have the honour to represent. The amount was large and the people were needy in Victoria, and they were promised large sums, and I think that the amount was completely used up. But I do not believe that the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac) did that because I think he had a reserve. If I am not mistaken, I hardly believe that he would use it up in so short a time as the members in other counties did. I am not finding fault with the hon. member, but what I mean to say is this: If the Government of Nova Scotia were confined to the $50,531.07 bounty from coal which they received in 1878, I believe that it would not be so easy for their supporters to find their way to the local assembly or to the Dominion Parliament as well. Now, Mr. Speaker, a great deal has been said by gentlemen opposite in reference to the corruption of the Conservative Government, but I will leave it to gentlemen on the other side who may follow me, to tell the House and the country what benefit accrue to Canada from the following expenditures by the Mackenzie Government :

Steel rails.....	$2,000,000
Fort Francis Locks.....	250,000
Fort Pelly works.....	64,000
Georgian Bay Br., Central Ry..	109,000
Neebing Hotel and land.....	69,000
	$2,492,000

I shall be very glad to know from gentlemen opposite how much good Canada reaped from those expenditures while their own friends were in power. The hon. member from Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac) went into various calculations last night to endeavour to show to this House and to the country, and more particularly his constituents, that the sum of $7,000,000 had been stolen within the last seventeen years. Even suppose that were true, yet if we consider this two and a half millions wasted by the Mackenzie Government, and for which the country received no value, then we can make a fair comparison between the periods the Conservative and the Liberal Governments were in power. In his calculation he attempted to show that this $7,000,000 would build a net work of railways all over the province. Does he forget that when his own friends were in power they expended $11,000,000 on the Canadian Pacific Railway and built exactly 189 miles, or at the rate of 37 miles a year? If that $7,000,000 had been used in building roads as expensively as they were built under the Liberal party rule, he would be a long time getting home over them. Now, I have listened carefully to the hon. gentlemen on the other side who have addressed the House, to see if there was any article or any line of articles from which they propose to take the duty in order to place it on other articles; but I listened in vain to ascertain from any of them what they propose to do. It is all very well to talk about taxes; we must have a revenue; but I was very glad to find that every one of those who spoke intimated that they were not in favour of free trade. But they tell us that we are not extending our trade. The hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Bain) found fault with us on that ground, and ridiculed every attempt that is being made to extend our trade with other countries; he told us that we should extend our trade to the south. Well, if there was any question about that, or if there had been any lack of effort on the part of any Canadian Government, either Liberal or Conservative, in that direction, I should forgive him for saying what he did. But does he not know that even before we had responsible government in the Dominion, representations were made to the home government to induce the United States to give us reciprocity of trade? Does he not know that as early as 1847, after responsible government was granted to Canada, similar attempts were made, and that almost every year since successive governments have striven to obtain reciprocity with the United States, and that we only succeeded once? That was in 1854. Afterwards, the United States, not Canada, put an end to the treaty. Do they not know that in 1875-76 the Hon. George Brown—and I do not think I am speaking disparagingly of any Liberal in Canada when I said that he was probably the ablest man that ever belonged to that party—went to Washington in the effort to secure a reciprocity treaty; and if you read the correspondence, you will wonder whether, in all the offers he made, there was anything left that he did not offer. He first offered reciprocity in natural products, and then in manufactured goods, and at last he was willing to throw in all the claims under the fishery award, amounting to $5,500,000, if the United States Government would give him a fair treaty of reciprocity. All these offers were refused. We know that in 1866-67, every attempt was made on behalf of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and the united provinces of Quebec and Ontario to revive the treaty on even less favourable terms than those of 1854. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) told us in this House a very short time ago that the Canadas were willing to accept very much less than we gave them in the treaty of 1854; and still Canada has as yet been unable to negotiate a reciprocity treaty with them. Now, the National Policy was inaugurated in 1878, not by the Conservative party alone, but with the aid of the ablest men in the ranks of the Liberal party as well. We all know that it was a matter of complaint on the part of Mr. Blake, who led the Liberal party for a number of years, that his friends deserted him in 1878 for a false principle. I find, in reading the debates, that the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) were not the only men who were in favour of a protective policy in 1876. On the 3rd of April, 1876, Mr. Desjardins, who is now a member of the Senate, moved for copies of papers and documents relating to the sugar refineries. He said that after the Budget speech had been delivered in 1876, it was a well known fact that the most important sugar refinery in the Dominion had closed its doors, leaving useless an invested capital of $1,000,000, and throwing 300 men out of employment. The product of the refinery amounted to $2,620,000; and the value of the importations was $2,400,000; that the salaries then paid in the establishment amounted to $71,000; that $120,000 was paid annually for cooperage, and $14,000 for iron works and general repairing, and that when the establishment was in operation, 14,000 tons of coal, carried by our ships from the Pictou mines, were annually consumed. In view of these facts, he said, it would be idle to contend that in this case a private interest merely was concerned. He then went on to say that the refinery had been compelled to close down. In the four years, when this refinery was in operation, our trade with the West Indies amounted to $25,000,000, being $16,000,000 exported against $9,000,000 imports, leaving a balance in our favour of $7,000,000. He then proceeded to show that after the closing of that refinery, the price of sugar instead of going down, had gone up. There was sitting in the House at that time, Mr. Jones, then representing Halifax, and who, I am sure, was not the least able among the members of the House at that day. Whether or not he was successful or a wise politician, he was at least a good business man. As far as I am concerned, in commercial matters I would rather take the opinion of a man holding the position he did, and does still, than all the authorities to be found on all the dusty books taken down from the shelves of our library. Mr. Jones said he regretted very much that as Mr. Desjardins spoke in French, all the members in the House could not understand him. He was very happy to be able to agree with Mr. Desjardins. This trade with the West Indies was not a provincial but a Dominion matter. Mr. Jones always held to the idea that schooners were better than sailing vessels, and objected to subsidizing steamers for the West India trade. The trade of the maritime provinces with the West India Islands, he said, amounted to $2,500,000. Previous to the existence of the depression, this branch of our commerce had been in a flourishing condition, but the change in the tariff had considerably interfered with it. He had heard that since the change, consumers in this country had been obliged to pay a higher price for their sugar. The French and Belgian governments having established drawbacks in favour of their refiners, a deputation representing the British sugar interests had waited on Lord Derby and represented that the trade relations of Great Britain with the West Indies would be seriously affected by their continuance. It appeared, however, that nothing could be done, and the British sugar industry was threatened with annihilation. While a free trader, Mr. Jones thought they had abundant proof that whereas in this case, on the raw material 50 per cent duty was paid, only 40 per cent was paid on the refined article, affording foreigners a very considerable advantage. He went on to say that instead of the people paying more for their sugar when refined in this country, he believed that they were paying less; and he put himself on record as admitting that notwithstanding the duty, if the refiners were given a preferential duty, he did believe that the price of sugar would not be advanced any way. I must regret what happened afterwards. He was taken into the Cabinet and nothing more was heard from him on this subject, but I believe that those were his honest convictions at the time, and I am disposed to give them great weight because of his experience in business matters. But the Finance Minister of that day would not make the slightest change or give any preference to a home industry. Mr. Jones's statement with regard to the price of sugar corresponds exactly with what was said by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) yesterday. Notwithstanding the small difference in the duty, the duty being rather greater in the United States than in Canada, that hon. gentleman showed conclusively that although the duty was slightly larger in the United States on entering than here, still there was a difference of 44 cents per cwt. in favour of Canada than there was in New York, allowing for difference in duty. Now, among the business men and clear-sighted men who had a seat in the House in 1876, was the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson). I know that in this House there is no man who is listened to with more respect and attention. He then told us :

I am one of those who believe that to have the American market open to our products would benefit our farmers. I do not suppose there is any one in this House, and very few in the country, who would not believe that, if our farmers should send their products to the United States, it would be a benefit to them. We do not know whether negotiations tending in that direction may soon be opened or not, at least members of this House are not aware of it. The question is, whether, in the event of future negotiations, the imposition of a tax on grain would operate in our favour.

He goes on to relate what he supposed would take place between the commissioners from Canada and the United States :

Fancy the commissioner delegated by this House sent to Washington to negotiate such a treaty. The question would be asked, what he desired. He replies : I wish to have a free market in the United States for the products of our forests, fields and mines. The United States commissioner might ask : And what will you give us in return ? Our representative would reply, offering our markets for the same products of the United States. The astute American would naturally say : We have that already ; I do not see that you offer us anything. We must remember that we should have something to offer when we attempt to open up a new reciprocity treaty. I need not remind this House that the great lever we had before in negotiating reciprocity is no longer ours.

The hon. gentleman made, at that time, one of the best speeches on the question. He was frank, honest and sincere, and he opposed his party. Further on, when the motion was made to go into supply, it was supposed he would vote with his party in 1877-78, he said that he was of the same opinion still, that he believed the speech was perfectly correct, and the Government had plenty time to carry out his view, and he said that when he went on the hustings himself, when running his election, the people came and asked that there should be some protection for the farmer, and that he had to promise it to them, and that if the promise was not carried out he must resign his seat. Still the hon. gentleman occupies his seat. There is another, and I am sure he is not the least among the members on the other side of this House. I refer to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). Why, Sir, he looked upon protection as having something like a divine origin. He declared his belief in protection to a certain extent, and within certain limits. He said :

We have been told that a protective policy is one which could only be adopted by a patriarchal government—a government which could not only protect industries, but also limit production. I hold that a protective policy, on the contrary, runs through the whole legislative system of any country. To afford protection of life and property is the duty of government, and armies are raised and navies built to protect the nation. Prisons are erected for the protection of the public, and free grants given for the purpose of increasing the public wealth and adding to the population.

It may be safely assumed that no nation has attained to greatness in commerce or manufacture without having in the course of its history imposed exactions and restrictions. This has been notably the case with Great Britain herself ; and I think the assertion, that the development of various industries is necessary to the cultivation of the self-defensive power of a nation, is incontrovertible.

And, Sir, the speech that the hon. gentleman delivered upon that occasion, I think, is well worth reading ; and, although I have often heard him explain it, and make other addresses or speeches in the House, I must say that I prefer the one that he delivered on the 29th February, 1876. I do not think he need hope to explain the speech away or to improve upon it. Now, we are constantly reminded of Great Britain and her free trade. Great Britain is in a far different position from that we occupy. They have their coal, their iron, their limestone, and other materials of manufacture in the country, and in close proximity. They can manufacture to-day cheaper than any country in the world. But they have to import very largely everything that they consume other than manufactured goods. Their bread must be brought into the country, as also must their meat. Is it any wonder they made these things free ? The farmers are a small class compared with the industrial classes in Great Britain, and their influence is as nothing in comparison with that of manufacturers, artisans, and non-producers. If I were a non-producer in Great Britain, I believe nothing would induce me to favour the levying of a duty upon those articles that cannot be produced in the country. They have a large population in Great Britain—from end to end we may call it

one great city. The farming class is comparatively small, and probably will not be able to exert the influence to secure legislation, to impose duties upon breadstuffs. We are often told of free trade as it is in Great Britain. The customs taxes upon articles are very limited in number, but when they do put on a duty it is a pretty stiff one. We find that every pound of tea is taxed 7 cents. Tobacco, containing ten pounds of moisture is taxed 3s. and 2d., and if it contains less than that it is taxed 3s. and 6d. And on some kinds of tobacco and snuff, the tax is as high as 4s., and even 4s. and 6d. Now, the articles are very limited in number, but from them they raise a tax of about $100,000,000 a year. But in other respects, the taxes cover a great variety of articles. You cannot give a receipt there that can be produced in court without having it stamped. A man's promissory note would be no good unless it were stamped ; his draft would have to be stamped. Any agreement, in order to make it valid, must have a stamp. Every mortgage, every transfer of land, every legacy requires a stamp. Every lawyer who is admitted there has to pay into the treasury of Great Britain the sum of $250. A solicitor pays $125 ; a doctor, $150 ; a fellow or physician, $125 ; notary public, $150. On any agreement, or memorandum of agreement, not under seal, one has to pay 10 cents. Then we come to other articles, such as carriages. Any man who owns a carriage must pay 15s. a year—that is for a two-wheeled carriage. If it is a four-wheeled carriage, the owner must pay £2 2s. if for two horses, and £1 1s. if for one horse. Every man who owns a house must pay a tax. If the rental is £40 net, and not over £60, the tax is 4d. in the pound. If the rental exceeds £60, the tax is 6d. in the pound. Besides, there is a large amount collected on income. We know that there is a large amount of wealth in Great Britain. If the same taxes upon income were imposed here, we would find that they would yield but a small revenue. Public houses, restaurants, and beer shops are taxed, the tax increasing according to the number of hours they are kept open. If they are kept open on Sunday, the tax is very much increased. Another argument that is used here is the large amount of money that is made out of the different industries in Canada. Now, Mr. Speaker, any person can ascertain the amount of money in these industries by applying to get stock in the company carrying it on. I shall just read a few of the quotations. I may say, first, with regard to the sugar industry of this country, that not long ago, for every $100 invested in these refineries, no person would offer more than $55, and I believe that the highest quotation lately is about $85. Now, Sir, the Dominion Cotton Company's bonds are sold at par. The Dominion Cotton Company's stock, buyers will only give 98, and sellers were asking 105. The National Cordage Company, about which we have heard so much, has shares of a face value of $100, and, apparently on the day this was quoted, nobody wanted to purchase any shares in that company. Now, for coloured cotton bonds, sellers want 99, and buyers are willing to give 92½. The Coloured Cotton Company, sellers are asking 60, and buyers are willing to give only 57. There is one industry in the city of Ottawa which I suppose has very little to do with the National Policy, the Electric Light Company. Their stock is quoted at 185, whereas many of the banks are quoted as high as 240 and 250. I think, therefore, the argument in regard to the large amount of money that is made by these companies, is largely overdrawn; and probably the statement of the hon. member for North Norfolk is correct, that the cotton companies, the sugar and other manufacturing industries, are making less profits now than they were in 1878. Now, Sir, a large number of hon. members wish to speak on this subject, I will only say, that until hon. gentlemen opposite will satisfy, not only this House but this country, that they have a policy which will commend itself to the country, I think it will be a long time before they receive the confidence of the people, and that they will stand in opposition reviling and abusing the National Policy for many years to come.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, being forcibly bound to speak in a language foreign to that of the majority in this House and at so late an hour, especially after several hon. gentlemen have discussed so ably this question in this House, I think it my duty to crave very specially the indulgence of my hon. colleagues. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. McDonald, Victoria N.S.) spoke in such low tones during several minutes that I think he must have wished to put us in an utter impossibility to reply to him. In another part of his speech, the hon. gentleman seemed to me to be so little satisfied with the value of his own arguments, that I nearly came again to the conclusion that he did not wish us to reply to arguments urged in such a way. However, Mr. Speaker, I understood that, like all the other speakers opposite, he made an eulogy of the National Policy and he even seized the opportunity to bring into discredit the actions of the Mackenzie Administration: that he repeated many favourite arguments of the hon. gentlemen opposite and that, like his friends and colleagues, he exclaimed: Where is the policy of the Liberal party, where is your platform, members of the Opposition, and tell us how, if ever you come into power, you are going to raise the revenue required for the public service? I intend, in the course of the observations I am about to make, to reply to the arguments contained in the speech just delivered by the hon. gentleman. In order to do that, I will have to go back some years ago. It was during the session of 1877 that Sir John A. Macdonald, the true founder of the Conservative party, deserted the ideas he had advocated during a quarter of a century and, from a free-trader became the father of a hybrid fiscal system since qualified "National Policy," and calculated, in his opinion, to "protect" our manufactures, while giving us the revenue required to meet the public expenditure. Three reasons seem to me to have induced Sir John Macdonald and, with him, the Conservative party at that time, to adopt the political system which he put before this House on the 7th March, 1878, the first year this campaign was entered into, as I will show by unexceptional evidences. Mr. Mackenzie, the leader of the Government, then into power, had pronounced himself a free-trader, and therefore in favour of a tariff for revenue only. Sir John Macdonald, with the flexibility which characterized his whole political career, declared in favour of a revision of the tariff, as a counterpart to the platform laid down in the statements of Mr. Mackenzie. The second reason is that Sir John Macdonald wished at that time to have the too famous Pacific scandal to be forgotten, which Lord Dufferin in terms never to be forgotten, qualified an "atrocious crime." The third reason is that, in 1878, the country was undergoing a most severe commercial and financial depression, and Sir John A. Macdonald wished to go before the people with protection as a war-cry. This war-cry was going to be popular and to lead him into power. Here are, in short, Mr. Speaker, the three reasons which brought us the National Policy. The hon. gentlemen opposite, as did the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McDonald) to-night, are incessantly asking us what our platform is. They are likewise incessantly charging us with too frequent changes of policy. My hon. friend and colleague, the member for the county of Ottawa (Mr. Devlin) perfectly disproved this charge the other day, as also did yesterday evening, in such eloquent words, the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac). These two hon. gentlemen have shown to an evidence that the Liberal party, contrary to the statement made by the hon. gentlemen opposite, has a well defined political platform which differs from that of the Conservative party in that it is its formal contradiction and condemnation, in that it condemns the protective system. I wish to go further than the hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin) and the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac). I intend to carry the war into Africa, and I will try and show that the Conservative party is the very party which now disowns its free-trade tendencies and traditions, which now disowns its platform of 1877 and 1878. I assert, Mr. Speaker, that the Conservative party, up to the time I have mentioned, always was the free-trade party in this country. I suppose no one will doubt that Sir George Etienne Cartier was a Conservative; I suppose likewise that no one will doubt the statement that the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin) has always been and is still a member of the Conservative party. At a dinner given to Sir George Etienne Cartier by the Quebec trade, on the 23rd December, 1869, Sir George Etienne Cartier, then the leader of the French section of the Conservative party, referred in the following words to the question of protection:

The Quebec manufacturers ask to be protected to the utmost. It is a preposterous proposition, as much so as are extreme ideas in connection with free trade.

This last system compels you to pay to the Government by way of a direct tax the same duties as before.

With unlimited protection, you strike a fatal blow at the foreign trade. Just inquire about that from the Americans. We will not commit ourselves to such a folly. We have decided to impose a revenue duty that will give at the same time a sufficient protection, reserving our right to change our fiscal policy according to circumstances.

In another part of his speech, in answer to a claim made for a foreign outlet by one of the audience, Sir George Etienne Cartier said:

You have got it: see what my hon. friend, Mr. George Stephen, of Montreal, did. He established a cloth factory at Cornwall, where, at the outset, he had to import labour by dint of money. Now he sells his cloths at lower prices than the Scotch or English manufacturers.

I was reproached by the Manchester and Sheffield people with giving too much protection to this industry. I replied to them that the maximum duty was 15 per cent, the same as the duty imposed on their own goods. How is it, then, they said, that you can sell at lower prices than we can? We are unable to manufacture as good and cheap cloths as those sent to Manchester by Mr. Stephens.

So you see, Mr. Speaker, this leader of the Ministerial party was opposed to an extreme protection. Cartier, a leader of the Conservative party, was in favour of a tariff for revenue and opposed to an extreme protective system such as the one we now have. As soon as 1873, Mr. Thomas White, who later was made a Cabinet Minister, said before the Dominion Board of Trade:

A 15 per cent tariff means more than 15-per cent in favour of manufacturers. We must add to that the rate of transport of the goods imported which represents 5 per cent on the average, thus actually bringing protection up to 20 per cent. This ought to be sufficient for any industry suited to this country. As to others, it would be a want of wisdom to keep them up through fiscal legislation.

I suppose Mr. Thomas White, who became a Minister, was surely a Conservative. But there is more, and I fancy no one will have any hesitation for a moment to acknowledge a Conservative in Sir Charles Tupper. Now, what did he say when, in 1878, the Mackenzie Government increased the duty from 15 to 17½ per cent? Sir Charles Tupper then said in this House:

I very much fear the Minister of Finance is going into the perilous path of protection, which will bring ruin and desolation unto us.

Not only was Sir George Etienne Cartier, not only was Mr. Thomas White, not only was Sir Charles Tupper in favour of a tariff for revenue and therefore opposed to a protective tariff, but even Sir John A. Macdonald had pronounced himself as opposed to protection. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) whom the Ministerial press calls an ally of the Opposition, which is false, the hon. member for North Simcoe, who has become a leader of a third party and wishes to be considered as a Conservative and a member of the Tory party, this hon. member, I say, has given out, since he has ceased to support the present Government, that in 1878, Sir John A. Macdonald had pronounced himself against protection and that he only launched forth the National Policy as set forth in his resolution of the 7th March, 1878, because Mr. Mackenzie had declared in favour of a tariff for revenue. He added that if Mr. Mackenzie should have declared for protection, he (Sir John) would have taken to free-trade. This statement of the hon. member for North Simcoe is corroborated by the hon. member for East York (Mr. McLean) in an editorial published in the issue of the "Canadian Magazine" for December or January last. We have moreover, a new substantiation of this fact in a letter from Professor Goldwin Smith, published in the Quebec press, in January last. Here is what one can read in this letter:

Till the election of 1873 was over, Sir John Macdonald disclaimed protection, and described his commercial policy as readjustment of the tariff. I had a personal interview with him a few days before the election, and I learned from his own lips that he foresaw the evil consequences of an application of protection to a country like Canada, as nearly as I can think myself.

And ever since we have seen the Conservative party changing its policy, for after the election in 1879, it did not revise the tariff by imposing at once protective duties ranging from thirty-five to sixty per cent as they now are. As an evidence of this, we have only to look at the statutes passed since 1879. We will find that these changes were brought about by degree, in proportion as protection did something for Sir John A. Macdonald and his friends. In the face of such facts, I have therefore a right to say that it is the Conservative party which has changed both its opinions and its platform: from free-traders the Conservatives became protectionists. But, as for that, what right have the gentlemen opposite to charge us with having no platform? The Opposition may, no doubt, have one, but under the practice which obtains in Great Britain, it has a right to have none. Such is the doctrine professed by Todd in his work, "Parliamentary Government in England," vol. I, pages 415 and 417; I earnestly call the attention of the hon. gentlemen opposite to this opinion in connection with constitutional law:

The opposition exercise a wholesome influence upon parliamentary debate, and upon the conduct of the Crown in Parliament, for they are constitutional critics of all public affairs, and whatever course the Government may pursue, they naturally endeavour to find some ground for attack. It is the function of an opposition to state the case against the administration; to say everything which may plausibly be said against measure, act or word of every member of the ministry; in short, to constitute a standing censorship of the Government, subjecting all its acts and measures to a close and jealous scrutiny. * * It is an old maxim, that the duty of an opposition is very simple: "It is to oppose everything, and propose nothing." And in the same spirit, Sir Robert Peel used to say that "he declined to prescribe until he was called in." The peculiar office of the opposition is, doubtless, "to watch with keen eye the conduct of the government they oppose, to see if anything be wrong or blamable, or liable to criticism therein—to trip them up before they fall—at all events, if they stumble, to mark their stumbling, and call upon them to set things right again." The originators of measures and inventors of a policy, the individuals who come forward with their schemes and suggestions for public approbation, are not the opposition, but the ministers of the Crown; we (the opposition) stand here to criticise the suggestions and schemes which they bring forward, and which are founded on knowledge wherein we cannot share, and inspired, no doubt, by the feeling of responsibility under which they act. But it is quite compatible with these functions, under certain circumstances, to coincide with the policy of ministers and to ground their attack upon the weakness of the administration in carrying out principles which the sense of the country has approved.

Todd here quotes the opinions of Palmerton and Disraeli. Moreover, it was the doctrine supported by Sir John A. Macdonald when he was charged with failing to define with sufficient clearness his policy in the resolution he brought before this House on the 7th March, 1878. This doctrine was acknowledged as sound and constitutional, and here is what he stated at that time. I quote from his speech as reported in "Hansard," vol. I, page 853:

But, in the position I now hold, I think it is well that, at this stage of the debate, and in order to reduce the stream of discussion, which has been widening, into a narrower channel, I should lay before this House a resolution in amendment to the motion, which will be expressive of the policy of those with whom I am associated, and, I believe, the policy which will be acceptable to the country. In bringing forward this resolution, I am doing what, perhaps, I am not called upon to do. The hon. the First Minister very truly said, some years ago, that they, the Opposition, were not called upon to find a policy for the country; that the responsibility of finding such a policy rested with the ministry of the day; and that the constitutional duty of Her Majesty's Opposition, the constitutional duty that was thrown upon them was to criticise the administration and legislation of the Government, to hold them in check, to warn them when they were going wrong, to censure them when they had gone wrong, and generally criticise and observe upon the course of administration and legislation. If the Opposition chose to take a further step, they might do, certainly, but it is not forced upon them, and it is not forced upon them in reference to any subject.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, the Conservative party, which is unceasingly charging us with having no platform, ought in the future not to ignore the constitutional principle professed by Sir John Macdonald in 1878, when he was leader of the Opposition. Moreover, we have a platform, and what proves it, is the fact that the hon. gentlemen opposite, while contradicting themselves, are always impugning us in connection with that very platform. In order to show its advantages, I intend to evidence each statement set forth in it, by showing the disastrous results of the National Policy, just advocated by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McDonald), since our platform is the counterpart of the National Policy and its condemnation alike. The first thing this policy was to achieve, in 1878, was to put a stop to the commercial depression then prevailing and to prevent its recurring in the future. This depression of 1878 has passed, no doubt, but at the present time, this policy advocated in 1878 has given rise to another one, and a more severe one, as I will show in a moment. The National Policy was to put a stop to emigration, and to increase our population. The result was totally different from the anticipation of its fathers. The figures, in their brutal eloquence, contradict the promises which the then Opposition, through its leader, Sir John Macdonald, made to the country. From 1881 to 1891, under the protective system, the population of the province of Quebec, that French race, so vigorous and so strong, which, in 1760, only included 76,000 souls, only increased by 129,508, or 9.53 per cent; while, from 1871 to 1881, under a tariff for revenue, it had increased by 167,511, or at a rate of 14 per cent. In Ontario, the increase, which had been 306,072, or 18.6 per cent from 1871 to 1881, only was 187,399, or 9.73 per cent from 1881 to 1891. In Nova Scotia, where the hon. gentleman who has just spoken before me to-night is living, I think, the increase had been 52,572, or 13 per cent under a tariff for revenue. Under the so eminently protective system of the National Policy, that progressive policy, the policy of industrial growth, according to the hon. gentlemen opposite, from 1881 to 1891, its population only increased by 9,824, or 2.123 per cent. But the figures relating to New Brunswick are still more disheartening. From 1871 to 1881, its population had increased by 35,639, or 12.4 per cent. Under the so beneficial system of the National Policy, its population only increased by thirty souls! Of what crime were Nova Scotia and New Brunswick guilty that Providence, often severe but always wise in its decrees, should punish them to such an extent? I know not; but if I am to judge of their population by the deputation they send here, deputation composed of very nice fellows, no doubt, I think I am not mistaken when I say that these provinces only have what they desire, since the great majority of their representatives here boast of being good supporters and apostles of the National Policy just advocated by the hon. member for Victoria. For the whole Dominion, during the decade from 1881 to 1891, the total increase in the population was 508,429. During this period, however, we expended millions of dollars to bring here from the old countries of Europe, over eight hundred thousand immigrants. What was the result of this policy? We not only were unable to keep this immigration here, but we could not even keep here the natural increase in our population. If protection had been such a benefit to the country, it seems to me our people would not have left us. And if the population had increased under the protective system to the same extent as it had under a tariff for revenue, it ought to have increased by about two millions, instead of 508,429. As Sir John A. Macdonald used to say, moreover, a country that cannot keep its own people must necessarily be ruled by a wrong fiscal system. The National Policy was again, and they insisted on this, to give our farmers a local market. And in addition to that, it was to keep them in our country. The various censuses taken in 1871, 1881 and 1891 superabundantly show that instead of keeping our farmers in this country, this policy has unfortunately driven them out of it. Here is the number of farmers, as given in the various censuses. In 1881, we had 656,712 farmers in this country. In 1891, according to the last census, we had only 649,506 left. It is not necessary to comment at any great length the meaning of the figures I have here before me. Let me, however, give some particulars by the way. The farming population of New Brunswick, in 1871, numbered 40,306; in 1881, 54,485, and in 1891, it had fallen to 45,880. The farming population of the four original provinces of the Dominion, from 1871 to 1881, increased in number from 476,922 to 619,231 during the period of the tariff for revenue, thus showing during this decade an increase of 142,409. From 1881 to 1891, during which time we had protection to the utmost given to us by the hon. gentlemen opposite, we find that our rural population, instead of increasing, decreased by 7,206. If we now take the figures relating to the four oldest provinces of the Dominion, we find that the decrease in numbers was 36,277 souls. If the National Policy had given a profitable market to the farmers, it seems to me the farmer could better sell, and at higher prices, his products than in 1878. But, Mr. Speaker, quite the contrary is the case now. Here are the quotations taken from the Quebec "Chronicle," under date 17th February, 1877—and we all know that this is a Conservative paper, that it always had at least strong Conservative leanings, and that even now it supports the Government—and here are quotations taken from the "Moniteur du Commerce," under date 22nd February, 1895. The "Moniteur du Commerce" is known to be a purely commercial paper, but with Conservative leanings. The following table shows the prices realized by the farmers for their products in the month of February for each of the years 1877 and 1895:—

Mr. Speaker, when farming is prosperous in a country, everything is going well. Farming is the source, the basis of the public welfare and national wealth, that is acknowledged by all the economists. This not being true of our country, our farmers desert the Dominion and their produce do not sell. But, Mr. Speaker, not only has the position of the farmer changed with respect to the sale of his produce, not only has our farming population decreased in number owing to the protective tariff, not only has the value of farm lands decreased to the extent of at least 20 per cent, not only do farm produce sell cheaper as a result of the fiscal policy we now have, not only are the farmers powerless to realize for their products the proper and fair prices they ought to receive, but, owing to the protective tariff, they have to pay higher prices for industrial products. Owing again to such a tariff, our export of farm produce has decreased to the following extent: in 1874, 1875 and 1876, we exported for $59,897,000 worth of farm produce, or an average of $19,300,000 a year. Let us now see what the position is under the National Policy system. For the three years 1889, 1890 and 1891, our total exports of farm produce amounted to $38,988,000, or an average of $13,000,000 a year. Now let me give you some figures relating to some particular products. During the three years from 1874 to 1876, our exports of ham and pork amounted to $4,369,000, and for the three years from 1889 to 1891, under the protective system, they only amounted to $1,695,000, or a decrease of $2,674,000 for the three years under the protective system. I would like to know from my hon. friends the Conservative members and in particular from those French representatives of the province of Quebec who support the National Policy, whether we owe this result to the protective policy? From 1874 to 1876, we exported butter to the amount of $7,498,000, and from 1889 to 1891, under the protective system, we only exported it to the amount of $1,274,000, or a decrease of $6,224,000. This falling off in the value of our butter exports, as shown by the figures I have just given, proves that the policy of the Mackenzie Government was more sound and more favourable to the agricultural interests than that of the party now into power, although the Mackenzie Government never thought of going like the present Government into the small butter business. To sum up, the position in which our farmers stand is this: They sell their products at a decrease of 25 per cent, and they buy the protected industrial goods at prices higher by 30, 35, 40, 45 and even 50 per cent than if we had a tariff for revenue system. Another great promise which was made in 1878, was that the population of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, would in 1891, reach at least a million souls, owing to the results obtained from the protective policy. Now the last census only gives them 251,473 souls. Another promise was that made by Sir Charles Tupper. He promised that the price of wheat would go up, and that our far West would produce at least 640,000,000 bushels of it in 1891. Now, what has happened? In 1894, three years after the expiration of the prediction made by Sir Charles Tupper, which I need not say was not realized, they only reaped 180,000,000 bushels of wheat in these parts of our country. However, it was through such promises and false predictions that the voters were led to the polls in 1878. It was through such promises that the resolution moved by Sir John A. Macdonald was passed by the Conservative party then sitting in this House. It was with such arguments that the Mackenzie Government were opposed. They did not say at that time that they intended to raise the tariff higher than 17½ per cent. No, Mr. Speaker, they only referred to a revised tariff. They were also, by means of such a policy, to obtain reciprocity with the United States. It was the object, the tendency avowedly proclaimed by the promoters of the protective system in 1878: it was what the Conservative party then proclaimed. Since then, with respect to this as to any other question, the party now into power has deceived the electorate, as it did again in 1891, when it contended that it was in favour of reciprocity with the United States, and it obtained a majority under false pretenses. Never was the Government in favour of trade reciprocity with the United States. The hon. gentlemen opposite would not have it, for they are bound to the manufacturers, they cannot wish for any trade reciprocity with the United States, for they well know that this latter country will never accept any partial reciprocity such as proposed by them, because the Republic to the south of us would have a more extended system, comprising both farm produce and manufactured goods. Another promise which was made in 1878, was that the sale of the North-west lands would, as soon as 1892, decrease our debt by at least a hundred million dollars. In 1878, our national debt amounted to $142,000,000; in 1893, it had reached $241,641,039, or a deficit, compared with the hopes and promises of Sir Leonard Tilley, the then Minister of Finance, of two hundred million dollars. It is useless to say, Mr. Speaker, that in the two last years, our debt has increased to a truly alarming extent and that it now exceeds three hundred millions. One of the reasons given by the Conservative party in 1878 to catch the votes of the people was that under the protective system, taxes would necessarily be lower. On February 22nd, 1878, Sir Charles Tupper said:

Inasmuch as we governed the country with a small taxation, and inasmuch as we are prepared to govern the country again without those extravagant expenditures made by the present Government since they have been entrusted with power, all we ask is, not that the taxation of the people shall be increased, because we do not require so much money as the hon. gentlemen opposite, as we have shown by our economy in the past, and which we are prepared to practice in the future.

So, Mr. Speaker, they were to rule the country with less taxes than under the Mackenzie regime. I hope the hon. gentlemen opposite will not question these words of Sir Charles Tupper. In 1878, taxes amounted to $17,841,938; in 1893, they reached $29,321,367, or an increase of $11,479,429, and the expenditure was to be much less under the protective system than in 1878, when it amounted to $23,503,158. In 1894, it amounted to $37,285,025, or an increase of $14,081,867. Let me observe, Mr. Speaker, that a large portion of these taxes do not go into the public treasury, but in the pockets of the monopolists, the men protected by the gentlemen opposite. We, on this side of the House, denounce the tariff now in force as a system of robbery and fraud, in that it tends to form combines and monopoly coalitions such as now exist in the manufacture of nails, cotton, sugar, rice and coal oil. As I have stated a moment ago, the main argument of the Conservatives in 1878 had reference to a revision of the tariff and not to a protective system. True, they referred to protection on the hustings, but they did not openly support it in this House. The revision of the tariff was the only argument that brought about the overthrow of the Mackenzie Government. Well, when I consider what has since happened. I have a right to say: It is you, Conservatives, who have changed your policy. And the statements of Thomas White, of Sir A. T. Galt, who had been Minister of Finance, of Sir Hector Langevin who must have approved of the statement made by Sir George Etienne Cartier in Quebec, since he was his colleague in the Ministry, go to show that all your leaders were free-traders, and since 1878, you have gradually changed your policy. You never intended, in 1878, to force on the country a tariff as high as the one now in force; you began by making concessions to one manufacturer, then to another, and little by little and in proportion as protection brought these gentlemen to your camp, you have given us the high tariff which we now have. My hon. friend from Wentworth (Mr. Bain), in a speech as elaborate as it was eloquent, delivered this afternoon, stated that the origin of the Patrons of Industry was due to the policy of the gentlemen opposite. I will add nothing to what he said in reference to this question; but let me call the attention of the House to the fact that the working classes also formed themselves into associations because the policy of the Government is not acting fairly towards them, because it gives them no work. They say the country is prosperous; that it is flourishing. Have they forgotten the labour demonstrations, in the months of January and February last, in Montreal? Have they forgotten the like demonstrations in Quebec? Let me quote here, Mr. Speaker, what the newspaper "La Presse" published on the 26th September, 1894, in consequence of a despatch received from Quebec under the head:

NO WORK—PAINFUL SITUATION OF THE WORKING CLASSES IN QUEBEC.

We find in a Quebec newspaper the following description of the painful condition in which happen to be several working classes of that city:—

The workmen are not looking without fear at the coming of the next season. No works of any importance are talked about, except the proposed enlargement of the Château Frontenac, and thousands of men of all trades have been out of work for weeks and weeks.

Many will begin winter without any wood in the shed, without any bread in the chest, and having for all provisions arrears with the grocer and butcher.

Some of our leather establishments, such as Félix Gourdeau's, Bilodeau & Lamontagne's, Racine & Dion's, are closed down, and some others only keep open to conceal appearances.

True, there is the electric light station, on Prince Edward Street, and the new building of the cotton manufacture at Sault Montmorency, but it is only a mouthful to divide among a thousand people.

People are asking whether the time has not come for the public bodies to think about it, and start some extensive works. Our city council could perhaps consider the question of the building of the new city hall.

Such was the position in which stood the working classes, last fall and winter, in the cities of Montreal and Quebec. So I may assert that they are not now in favour of the fiscal policy of the Government. Let me quote, in support of the foregoing observations, a few statements taken from the report of the proceedings of the Trades and Labour Congress, held at Ottawa, during the month of September, 1894. We will see what they thought of our combines, as well as about the Conservative policy:—

It is not necessary for me again to call your attention to the many vital interests of those you represent, demanding, as they do, your most earnest and intelligent consideration. It is not only your particular organization and their interests, but the interest and welfare of the great masses of our country that we seek to improve and further. Particularly in these most trying times of depression is it necessary that we devote our minds to an intelligent consideration of the causes that have led to the very undesirable and far-spread distress and misery at present existing in our midst, and existing to a greater extent among our brothers to the south of us. The concentration of wealth in the grasp of a few has and is developing a power that, unless a halt is called, will inevitably lead to a more hopeless degradation of the workers than even at present exists.

Such is, according to this report, the cause of the destitution prevailing among the working classes. Such was, from a general standpoint, the policy of the Conservative party with respect to its results, as far as the farming community is concerned, and such is the opinion of the working classes about our extreme protective tariff, as expressed by their representatives in Congress assembled. Now, the present ruling party may be qualified the corruption party, corruption of which they gave us so many instances in the management of the public departments during these last years. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), in his attempt to show that the Liberal party is not as pure as the Conservative party, because the Conservatives had less elections controverted and voided than the Liberals. Mr. Speaker, it is no difficult thing for the hon. gentlemen opposite to controvert an election. We know what are the means at their disposal. To controvert an election, they have only to apply to some of the big government contractors, to some of the big railway contractors, or to the contractors for public works given by the Government, and they are sure to get the necessary thousand dollars to make the deposit required in controverted election trials. This is how they were procured with the required money, while we, of the Liberal party, have to take it out of our pockets. It does not come, as in the case of the Conservatives, out of the public treasury, as shown in many an instance. This is why the Conservative party, after the general election, had less controverted elections than the Liberal party. Is it a pure party, that which like the Conservative party expended, in 1887, in 22 counties of the district of Quebec, $117,000 robbed from the country? Is it a pure party, that which is composed of robbers such as are Larkin, Connolly & Co.? Is it a pure party, that which caused scandals to be given such as those I have referred to? Scandal of the commissions given out of the purchase of the plant of the Printing Bureau, amounting to $50,000. Scandal of the Curran bridge, amounting to $122,000, when the fair estimate of its cost made by the commission appointed by the Government amounted only to $160,000, while the expenditure incurred by the Government reached $430,000, making a net loss to the country of $270,000. Party of pure people, that which is composed of men who caused to be made four revisions of the electoral lists, under an Act passed for the purpose of disfranchising our people; revisions which cost the country the enormous sum of one million dollars. Party of pure people, that which is composed of men who gave us the scandal of the Sheik's Island wharf, which caused to the country a loss of $125,000. Party of pure people, that of the men who built the Little Rapid locks, which, according to the specifications, was to cost to the country $44,000 only, while the actual cost was $200,000, with unpaid claims to the amount of $90,000, or a difference of $256,000 beyond the price fixed by the specifications. Party of pure people, that of the men who built the Tay canal which, according to the specifications, was to cost $132,660 only, while its actual cost amounted to $476,123, or an excess of $343,468. Party of pure people, that which raised an election fund, afterwards refunded by means of a subsidy of $25,000 to the Lake St. John Railway, as admitted by the hon. the Postmaster General. Party of pure people, that which built the St. Charles Railway Branch, extending over a distance of fourteen miles, the cost of which was estimated at from $130,000 to $140,000, but the actual cost of which reached the sum of $1,750,000, or over one million dollars in excess of the actual cost of this railway branch. Party of pure people, that which caused the country to suffer all these losses and gave all these scandals. But I will, perhaps, be told that this party is one that punishes the robbers. In what way, Mr. Speaker, does it punish them? In 1891, a member of this House was driven away from it for having taken part in a conspiracy with a view to defraud the public treasury. A Minister was compelled to resign as such in consequence of one of the scandals. Proceedings were taken against the company charged with this conspiracy to cause it to refund the sum of $600,000. After four or five years, the Government settled this case for the sum of $100,000, and they accepted a claim for $45,000 on account of this amount. And at the time of the Kingston election, an account of $43,000 was paid to these same people against whom the Government had taken these very proceedings. Party of pure people, that which, after driving away this member charged with conspiracy, made their candidate of him and caused him to be returned to this House. Party of pure people, that which at the very moment I am speaking, is pressing this member to vote for the Government. Party of pure people, Mr. Speaker, that which allowed all the scandals I have just referred to, and which is willing to be a party to others still, provided it profits by them and be kept into power. But we have at last, it appears, the satisfaction to know that the country is prosperous, the manufactures flourishing, and that there is 75,000 of them in the Dominion. I will give only one word of reply to such an argument, for no voter who knows what is going on is not aware that the number of manufactures, compared with what it was in 1878,—and they were true manufacturing establishments at that time—is not larger now than formerly, and I am satisfied that there are no more manufactures now than in 1878. In the town of Sorel, where I live, we had more manufactures in working order in 1878 than we have now, and at the very moment I have the honour to address this House, our paper mill has likely closed down. The shoe manufacture which was subsidized to the extent of $15,000 by the town municipality of Sorel, had to shut down. But if there should be so many manufactures in the country, if the country should be prosperous, why should the trade, which in 1874 represented $58 per capita, have fallen to $53 in 1883, and to $46 in 1895, according to the admission of the hon. the Minister of Finance? In the face of such results brought about by the National Policy, what is to be said? We must have a change, and the country is now in favour of such a change. As soon as the governing party will give them a chance to pronounce themselves, I am satisfied the voters will know how to drive them away from the treasury benches, and punish the authors of the robberies and scandals committed under this administration and through their ruinous policy. We must have a change, and the change the country is anxious for is the one proposed at the Liberal convention held here, in June, 1893. It was attended by men of all classes, creeds and races. The Liberal party of this country met in convention in this town about two years ago and put a platform before the Canadian electorate. Contrary to the contention of our opponents, when coming into power it will know what to do, and in order that the country, as well as the Conservative party, which is always attempting to make it believe that we have no platform, may well know that we have one, and as a punishment for the persistency with which our friends opposite deny its existence, I am going to inflict its reading on them. Our platform is formal and positive. The Liberal party intends to do the contrary of the Ministerial policy. The platform of the Liberal party, as adopted at the convention held here in 1893, reads as follows:—

We, the Liberal party of Canada, in Convention assembled, declared:—

That the customs tariff of the Dominion should be based, not as it is now, upon the protective principle, but upon the requirements of the public service;

That the existing tariff, founded upon an unsound principle, and used, as it has been by the Government, as a corrupting agency wherewith to keep themselves in office, has developed monopolies, trusts and combinations;

It has decreased the value of farm and other landed property;

It has oppressed the masses to the enrichment of a few;

It has checked immigration;

It has caused great loss of population;

It has impeded commerce;

It has discriminated against Great Britain;

In these and many other ways it has occasioned great public and private injury, all of which evils must continue to grow in intensity as long as the present tariff system remains in force;

That the highest interests of Canada demand a removal of this obstacle to our country's progress, by the adoption of a sound fiscal policy, which, while not doing injustice to any class, will promote domestic and foreign trade, and hasten the return of prosperity to our people;

That to that end the tariff should be reduced to the needs of an honest, economical and efficient government.

That it should be so adjusted as to make free, or to bear as lightly as possible upon, the necessities of life, and should be so arranged as to promote freer trade with the whole world, more particularly with Great Britain and the United States.

We believe that the results of the protective system have grievously disappointed thousands of persons who honestly supported it, and that the country, in the light of experience, is now prepared to declare for a sound fiscal policy.

The issue between the two political parties on this question is now clearly defined.

The Government themselves admit the failure of their fiscal policy, and now profess their willingness to make some changes; but they say that such changes must be based only on the principle of protection.

That having regard to the prosperity of Canada and the United States as adjoining countries, with many mutual interests, it is desirable that there should be the most friendly relations and broad and liberal trade intercourse between them;

That the interests alike of the Dominion and of the Empire would be materially advanced by the establishing of such relations;

That the period of the old reciprocity treaty was one of marked prosperity to the British North American colonies;

Mr. BRUNEAU.

That the pretext under which the Government appealed to the country in 1891 respecting negotiations for a treaty with the United States was misleading and dishonest, and intended to deceive the electorate;

That no sincere effort has been made by them to obtain a treaty, but that, on the contrary, it is manifest that the present Government, controlled as they are by monopolies and combines, are not desirous of securing such a treaty;

That the first step towards obtaining the end in view is to place a party in power who are sincerely desirous of promoting a treaty on terms honourable to both countries;

That a fair and liberal reciprocity treaty would develop the great natural resources of Canada would enormously increase the trade and commerce between the two countries, would tend to encourage friendly relations between the two people, would remove many causes which have in the past provoked irritation and trouble to the governments of both countries, and would promote those kindly relations between the Empire and the Republic which afford the best guarantee for peace and prosperity;

That the Liberal party is prepared to enter into negotiations with a view to obtaining such a treaty, including a well-considered list of manufactured articles, and we are satisfied that any treaty so arranged will receive the assent of Her Majesty's Government, without whose approval no treaty can be made.

That the Convention deplores the gross corruption in the management and expenditure of public moneys which for years past has existed under the rule of the Conservative party, and the revelations of which by the different parliamentary committees of inquiry have brought disgrace upon the fair name of Canada.

The Government, which profited politically by these expenditures of public moneys, of which the people have been defrauded, and which, nevertheless, have never punished the guilty parties, must be held responsible for the wrongdoing. We arraign the Government for retaining in office a Minister of the Crown proved to have accepted very large contributions of money for election purposes from the funds of a railway company, which, while paying the political contributions to which, a member of the Government, with one hand, was receiving Government subsidies with the other.

The conduct of the minister and the approval of his colleagues after the proof became known to them are calculated to degrade Canada in the estimation of the world, and deserve the severe condemnation of the people.

We cannot but view with alarm the large increase of the public debt and of the controllable annual expenditure of the Dominion, and the consequent undue taxation of the people under the Government that have been continuously in power since 1875, and we demand the strictest economy in the administration of the government of the country.

That the Convention regrets that by the action of ministers and their supporters in Parliament, in one case of which serious charges were made against a Minister of the Crown, investigation was altogether refused, while in another case the charges preferred were altered and then referred to a commission appointed upon the advice of the Ministry contrary to the well-settled practice of Parliament; and this the Convention affirms;

That it is the ancient and undoubted right of the House of Commons to inquire into all matters of public expenditure, and into all charges of misconduct in office against Ministers of the Crown, and the reference of such matters to royal commissions appointed on the advice of the accused is at variance with the due responsibility of Ministers to the House of Commons, and tends to weaken the authority of the House over the executive government, and the Convention affirms that the powers of the people's representatives in this regard should on all fitting occasions be upheld.

That in the opinion of this Convention the sales of public lands of the Dominion should be to the actual settlers only, and not to speculators, upon reasonable terms of settlement, and in such areas as can be reasonably occupied and cultivated by the settlers.

That the Franchise Act, since its introduction has cost the Dominion treasury over a million of dollars, besides entailing a heavy expenditure to both political parties ;

That each revision involves an additional expenditure of a further quarter of a million ;

That this expenditure has prevented an annual revision, as originally intended, in the absence of which young voters entitled to the franchise have, in numerous instances, been prevented from exercising their natural rights ;

That it has failed to secure uniformity, which was the principal reason assigned for its introduction ;

That it has produced gross abuses by partisan revising barristers appointed by the government of the day ;

That the provisions are less liberal than those already existing in many provinces of the Dominion, and that in the opinion of this Convention the Act should be repealed, and we should revert to the provincial franchise.

That by the gerrymander Acts, the electoral divisions for the return of members to the House of Commons have been made so as to prevent a fair expression of the opinion of the country at the general elections, and to secure to the party now in power a strength out of all proportion greater than the number of electors supporting them would warrant ; to put an end to this abuse, to make the House of Commons a fair exponent of public opinion, and to preserve the historic continuity of counties, it is desirable that in the formation of electoral divisions, county boundaries should be preserved, and that in no case parts of different counties should be put into one electoral division.

The present constitution of the Senate is inconsistent with the federal principle in our system of government, and is in other respects defective, as it makes the Senate independent of the people and uncontrolled by the public opinion of the country, and should be so amended as to bring it into harmony with the principle of popular government.

That whereas public attention is at present much directed to the consideration of the admittedly great evils of intemperance, it is desirable that the mind of the people should be clearly ascertained on the question of prohibition by means of a Dominion plebiscite.

Such is the platform of the Liberal party as adopted at its convention held here nearly two years ago. It seems to me the hon. gentlemen opposite cannot ignore its existence, and they did not ignore it either, since they are always asking where we are going to get a revenue with such a platform. The Government organs have not the same fears with respect to this matter and some of them clearly state that it is possible to manage the affairs of this country with a tariff for revenue. In support of this contention, I will quote from the "Montreal Gazette" of the 21st February last. It undertook to contradict the statements of some of its contemporaries. Here is what it said :

An adequate revenue for the needs of the public service can unquestionably be collected by means of a tariff based on the principles of British free trade, that is to say, a tariff designed solely for the purposes of revenue, and from which every vestige of protection will be eliminated. Under such a system, commodities not capable of production in Canada will be taxed to the necessary revenue-producing point, and every dollar of duty laid on will find its way into the treasury.

That is indeed what we want, that every dollar paid by the tax-payers should go into the public treasury, and not in the pockets of the manufacturers. In order to give the hon. gentlemen opposite a foretaste of what is in store for them at the coming election, I may say that hardly a year ago, all the British colonies had a protective system. Since then the New South Wales, Queensland and Australia have adopted free-trade. Canada alone keeps to protection, but I am satisfied a radical change will be effected at the next election. We are asked what our platform is. I will answer this query by the declaration of principle made in Montreal by the late leader of the Liberal party, the Hon. Mr. Blake, at a dinner in the Windsor Hotel, on the 29th March, 1881, which the Quebec Liberal party had been required to attend by its late leader Mercier :

For us of the Liberal party, our hereditary opinions are in favour of liberty, liberty of the nation, liberty of the person, and liberty of property. We believe that a cause which calls upon us to restrict any of those liberties requires us to believe and to profess the opposite of these principles. We believe that, prima facie, it is right for each one of you to be secured in the liberties to which I have referred, and amongst the most valued liberties in connection with property is freedom to sell or exchange it to the best advantage, freedom to dispose of it where you will, to whom you will, upon the best terms you can.

Our platform, our ideas, our opinions were formulated by our present leader in 1877, in the course of a speech which was much noted. And this platform, these ideas, these opinions, we hope to see them carrying the day under the leadership of the man who set them forth in 1877 in such eloquent words. The country is only waiting for the next election to assert that the present leader of the Liberal party is the only man able to shape its destinies and bring it out of danger ; that of all the political leaders who have a share of the public sentiment, he is the most upright in his public as well as in his private life ; that he is our greatest speaker and that by his noble, worthy, beyond all suspicion course, he has indeed deserved to become the Prime Minister of Canada.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY—SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1895.

Mr. FOSTER presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER read the Message as follows :—

ABERDEEN.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, Supplementary Estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending 30th June, 1895, and in accordance with the provisions of "The British North America Act, 1867," the Governor General recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

Government House,
Ottawa, 21st May, 1895.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

Mr. CAMPBELL. At this late hour of the night it is not my intention to trespass very long upon your time ; in fact, after the very able addresses which have been delivered by the hon. member for North Wentworth (Mr. Blain) and the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau) there is very little that can be said upon the subject that is new. I would much prefer that some hon. gentleman opposite had attempted to reply to the arguments which have been addressed by these two hon. gentlemen, as I would then have had an opportunity of answering any points they might raise, if indeed they were able to raise any. However, the subject that we have been discussing for some days now is a very important one, and it seems to me that this is the time above all others that we should discuss the financial situation of the Dominion ; this is, as I take it, a sort of stock-taking time. We want to consider how Canada stands to-day, what progress she has made, if she has made any, and what is the best course to pursue. The Minister of Finance, in his Budget speech, has again reaffirmed the policy that the opposite party have been advocating for a number of years past. The Liberal party, on the other hand, in the motion that has been submitted by the hon. member for South Oxford, has called your attention to what, in my opinion, is the very serious state of affairs in the Dominion at the present time, and that hon. gentleman suggests a remedy that I think would best meet with the approval of the people, and meet the demands of the situation. There is no doubt that we have reached a very serious condition of affairs. It is sufficient to say that the Estimates of this year, as submitted by the Minister of Finance, amount to over $38,000,000, to which another million and a quarter may be added by the estimates just now laid upon the Table ; and before we get through the work of the session, there will probably be another million or a million and a half more submitted for our sanction. If the Government follows the usual course that has been followed for many years past, there will be further supplementary estimates of a very large amount. But at all events, the Estimates which have now been submitted to the House, will amount in round numbers to $39,000,000, which are required to carry on the affairs of this country until the 30th June, 1896. Now, Sir, in my opinion this is altogether too much. I think that for a country with scarcely five millions of people, $39,000,000 are altogether too much to ask for to grease the wheels of state. You must bear in mind that not a solitary dollar of this $39,000,000 is proposed to be expended on public buildings, in digging canals, or bonussing railways, but it is all required to carry on the affairs of this country for one short year. Now, when we recollect that in 1878, when the Mackenzie Government went out of power, the expenditure for the same services then was only $23,500,000, you can readily see what an enormous increase has taken place in the burdens upon the people within the last sixteen years. I remember well at that time that Sir Charles Tupper, who was then Finance Minister, brought a charge against the Administration of the day that they were spending too much, that $23,500,000 were too much and that the Government ought to carry on public affairs with $22,500,000 ; but like all their other promises, it has not been fulfilled, and we find, year by year, the expenditure has gone up, until now it has reached the enormous sum of $39,000,000. This does not tell the whole story. If this were all, and it could be shown that this amount was necessary to carry on the affairs of the country, no person could object ; but, in that time they have increased the public debt from $140,000,000 until it now stands at $249,000,000. An increase of $109,000,000. In my opinion very large sums are literally wasted and thrown away. When we bear in mind the fact that in 1878 it only required $23,500,000 to run the country, and the further fact that there is not one single acre more now to govern than there was then, and that there are only half a million more people now than then, it will readily be seen that there has been a very large increase, and one which, in my opinion, is altogether unnecessary in the expenditure of the country. I desire to point out a few directions in which a large amount is now literally wasted, which could be saved to the people. I find, according to the Auditor General's Report, that there are no less than 572 persons now receiving pay from more than one source. I will give some illustrations. J. H. Douglas, of Montreal, customs appraiser, receives a salary of $1,800, a handsome salary and one which should be sufficient remuneration for him during twelve months. In addition he obtained on account of customs seizures, $2,053, making a total income of $3,853 instead of $1,800. Then we have J. M. Bowell, of Vancouver, who is collector of customs there, and receives $2,000 a year. He has received in addition for Chinese immigration services $400, making a salary of $2,400. E. Marceau, of Montreal, acting superintendent engineer of canals, receives a salary of $3,000. He also received for translating the Geological Survey Report, $819, making his salary $3,819. A. R. Milne, of Victoria, collector of customs, receives a salary of $3,000. For Chinese immigration work he received $400 more, and for services in connection with the Fehring Sea matter, another $400, making a total of $3,800. I think if proper economy were practiced, a very large saving in this direction could be made to the country. Although we have a printing bureau, which has cost the country a large sum, we paid last year to outside parties for printing, $44,690, and for printing and lithographing, $224,935, making a total of $265,625. Although we have a Minister of Justice drawing $8,000 a year, a Solicitor General drawing $5,000 a year, one deputy head in the office drawing $3,600, two chief clerks drawing $4,375, four first-class clerks drawing $7,175, four second-class clerks drawing $4,882, two third-class clerks drawing $1,500, and two private secretaries drawing $1,200, and messengers drawing $412, or a total in round figures of $35,000 for the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General, yet we paid during last year $101,000 for legal expenses and taxed costs. Of that amount D. O'Connor, of Ottawa, received $19,850, and Christopher Robinson, of Toronto, $21,783. It seems to me that with the Minister of Justice and a Solicitor General and all the staff necessary to carry on the business of that branch of the public service we should be able to get along without paying a lawyer in Ottawa $19,850. I think if we cannot get along without employing so much outside help, we should dispense with the Solicitor General and cut down considerably the staff of the Minister of Justice, and in this way save a good deal of money to the people. I find in every branch of the public service there has been an enormous increase during the last sixteen years. Not only so, but when an examination is made of the Auditor General's Report the conclusion must be arrived at that the greatest recklessness and extravagance reigns supreme in the department. I remember when the Colonial and Indian Exhibition was started in London, Eng., the estimated cost of a Canadian exhibit, as submitted to the House, was $75,000, but before all the bills were paid the cost reached nearly $500,000. So again, with the Columbian Exhibition at Chicago. The Canadian exhibit was estimated to cost about $75,000. The Minister stated yesterday that already $243,000 had been paid, and no doubt a great many bills were yet to come in, and in the Estimates for the next year and probably the following years large amounts will be needed to pay claims sent in under this head, and before all the bills are paid no doubt the total amount will run up to $400,000. Looking over the Auditor General's Report, I find there has been altogether too much expense in connection with that exhibition. There has been hardly a Minister, Deputy Minister or first-class clerk who has not been sent to Chicago and his expenses paid by the country, and if proper supervision had been had and the accounts properly audited there would have been no occasion to spend such large sums of money on that exhibition. I have the account of the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) in regard to his charges at the exhibition. I find the first item is $957 for supplies to the Canadian pavilion, and it includes cabs, railway fares, portage, exhibition entrances, extra dinners, sundries, express charges, cigars, &c. Then I take the personal expenses of the hon. member (Mr. Cockburn) and I find that he has been living like a prince in Chicago at the expense of the tax-payers of Canada. I will give you a few items of his bill to show the way the money was squandered. I find that from the 24th of June, to the 1st July, seven days, his bill at the Virginia hotel, Chicago, was as follows:—Seven days' board at $20.—$140; extra meals, wines, and liquors, $24.30; laundry, $6.40; livery, $11; messengers, 20 cents; total, $180.90. The next day there are also portage charges, and $3.10 for blackening his shoes. Then the next week we have board for seven days' at $20—$140; extra meals, wines and liquors, $46.25; laundry, $2.20; livery, $3.50; paid for flowers, $2.75; the next week, we have the same item of seven days' board at $20 a day, $140; extra meals, wines and liquors, $33.20; laundry, $1.65—his laundry bill was not so heavy that week—livery $5.

Then it was necessary for the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) to have his hat pressed, and so he charges the country $1.25 on that account. You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that his wine bill was pretty large that week, and although I cannot say as to whether there was any connection between the hat pressing and the large wine bill, yet it is rather singular that it was necessary to get his hat pressed at the expense of the Canadian people by reason of the alleged wine bill. Then we have a charge of $3.80 for flowers, and $1.25 for cabmen. The next week there is a similar charge for seven days' board at $20 per day—$140; extra meals, wines, and cigars, $14.50; laundry, $3.75; and livery, $1.50. So it is through his whole account, and I say that it is outrageous that our money should be squandered in such a manner for this exhibition. I would like to know what his constituents in Centre Toronto think of their member, living in Chicago at $20 a day and $5 a day for wines, liquors and cigars, besides having all his expenses paid. Yet the hon. member (Mr. Cockburn) had the audacity to tell this House that he had spent $3,000 of his own money in connection with that exhibition. I do not see how it was possible for him to spend any more money than he has charged up to the country. The amounts are all very large, and the Government are to blame for allowing the bills to run up in that way. If a proper supervision had been made of those accounts, and if they had been properly audited, it is my opinion that a very large saving would have been made to the tax-payers. You will find, Sir, that the greatest extravagance prevails in every department of this Government. It was stated here by the hon. member for North Wentworth (Mr. Baint) in reference to the Department of Railways and Canals, although we have a Minister of Railways drawing $8,000 a year, a chief engineer drawing $6,000 a year, and with all the clerks and engineers necessary to conduct the affairs of that department, yet within one hundred miles of the city of Ottawa, a little work that should have cost $150,000 or $175,000 has cost the people of this country nearly $400,000. If, in any ordinary business concern in this country the man conducting it allowed such a waste as that, he would soon get his discharge. It is no excuse for the Minister of Railways and Canals to say, that he did not know that this work was going on. It was his business to know, and the people of this country are paying him to see that the works under his administration are properly looked after, and that the treasury is properly protected. If you follow up the contracts that have been let, and the Government work that has been done throughout the country, you will find that there has not been a single public building erected during the last ten or fifteen years in connection with which there has not been a large amount of extras charged. Right in front of this House we see the Langevin block, which should have been built for $450,000, but already we have paid $800,000 in round numbers for it, and Mr. Charlebois, the contractor, has still a claim against it for nearly $200,000. I have no doubt that that claim would have been paid by the Government if it had not been for the investigations which took place here in 1891. The other day we were told by one of the Ministers that there is a claim for $17,000 extras in connection with a public building in Toronto, the drill hall, and no doubt before the matter is settled, that claim will be swelled up to probably to $25,000 or $30,000. The Finance Minister has admitted to the House this session that last year we had a deficit of $1,200,000; that on the 30th June of this year we will have a further deficit of four and a half millions, and probably a deficit for next year of $1,700,000. Seeing this sad condition of affairs, and seeing that in the last fifteen years our expenditure has piled up by leaps and bounds, until it is now $40,000,000 a year, let me ask what is the proper course, in view of this deplorable state of things, for any prudent business man to take. Would he not first try and reduce his expenditure so as to bring it within his income. Instead of doing that, the Finance Minister takes an opposite course, and he goes to work to levy taxes and to increase the burdens on the people of the country. We find that the fact that the duty was to be increased on sugar was conveyed by a friendly hint to the wholesalers, the friends of the Government throughout the country. Read the Ottawa "Citizen," of 6th May last, an organ that is the mouthpiece of the Government here, and what does that paper say. In its issue of 6th May, speaking of Hamilton, it says:

The wholesale grocers in Hamilton are well pleased with the advance in the sugar duties, and say the Government could not have selected better articles to increase the duties on than it did, as the changes will not be felt by the consumers. Nearly all the wholesale grocers had received a hint that the duty on sugar would be raised, and all had a large stock on hand.

Now, I say, if that statement is true, it is a most scandalous thing for the Government of the day—

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. gentleman intend to state before this House that a hint was given by the Government to wholesale dealers or grocers?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have given you the statement of your mouthpiece in this city.

Mr. FOSTER. I understood the hon. gentleman to give it as his opinion, and I would like to know if it is his opinion.

Mr. CAMPBELL. No. I state what your mouthpiece, the Ottawa "Citizen," said.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no mouthpiece in the Ottawa "Citizen." The hon. gentleman has no right to say so.

Mr. CAMBELL. It is the organ of the Government, the recognized exponent of the views of the Government. If the hon. gentleman wishes to deny the relationship which is supposed to exist between the Ottawa "Citizen" and the Government, he is free to do so. He is not the first Minister to say that their own organs are unreliable and not to be believed. I am just giving the statement which I find in the Ottawa "Citizen" of May 6th: and what was the reply of the hon. Controller of Customs yesterday? That from the 27th of March to the 2nd of May, 1894, there was 20,528,000 pounds of sugar entered for consumption, whereas from the 27th of March to the 2nd May this year there was no less than 85,519,000 pounds entered for consumption, and the further quantity of fifteen or sixteen million pounds entered, as to which, I believe, the Customs Department has a dispute on hand whether it should be entered free or not. According to his own reply, there was 65,000,000 pounds more sugar entered at the customs this year than there was in the same period last year. What inference can we draw from that except that this statement that the wholesale grocers received a friendly hint is borne out by the fact that so large an amount was entered? It looks very suspicious, to say the least of it, that so much larger an amount should have been imported this year than last year, unless they received a friendly hint, as the Ottawa "Citizen" said they did. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up the time of the House any longer. I have only to say that I am fully in accord with the resolution which has been placed in your hands by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and I think that resolution ought to commend itself to the favour of this House. In my opinion, it proposes the proper remedy. I think, Sir, that instead of increasing the burdens of the people, which are now so heavy, we should do away with the enormous amount of unnecessary expenditures which exist in all branches of the public service, and in that way make our income meet our expenditure. There is no doubt that we could do this in many ways. If the Government were to manage the affairs of this country as they ought to be managed, there is no doubt that a very large saving could be effected. The resolution proposes that equilibrium between the revenue and expenditure should be restored, and that the tariff should be so modified that it may be made a tariff for revenue only. Sir, I cannot conceive why any person should object to that. I think the Government of this country have no right to meddle with my affairs or with those of any other man in this country.

All that the Government are justified in doing is to take as little money out of the pockets of the people of this country as will be necessary to carry on the affairs of the country efficiently and well; and when they have done that, it is their bounden duty to see that every single dollar of that money is laid out to the best possible advantage. How can they possibly know how to protect all the industries in this country? Unless they protect all men alike, they will do injustice to some, and it is utterly impossible to conceive of any Government having the necessary ability to enter into all the minor details of every man's business so as to adjust the tariff to give him equal protection to what another man has. It is an impossible task, and therefore the only right thing for the Government to do is to let every man alone, leaving him to run his business according to his own ideas. There is no doubt that such a policy would tend to the best interests of the people of this country. In no period in the history of Canada has it made such rapid progress as it did when we had a revenue tariff before. People are apt to forget that from 1867 to 1874 we had only a 15 per cent tariff, and there was no time in the history of Canada when our manufactures were on a more substantial basis. In 1871 the capital invested in manufactures was $77,964,000; hands employed, 187,942; raw material, $124,907,000; wages paid, $40,852,000; products, $221,617,000. In 1881 it had increased: Capital invested, $165,200,000; hands employed, 255,000; raw material, $179,918,000; wages paid, $59,429,000; products, $309,171,000. After ten years of the National Policy with all the protection afforded by this policy, they stood in 1891: Capital invested, $354,620,000; hands employed, 370,000; raw materials, $256,000,000; wages paid, $100,000,000; products, $476,000,000. Population increased between 1871 and 1881 at the rate of nearly 18 per cent, while from 1881 to 1891 it only increased at the rate of a little over 11 per cent. In my own part of western Ontario, we have not one solid institution to-day that was not started and put on a good basis when the tariff was only 15 per cent; and after it was altered from 15 per cent to 17½ per cent, they continued to prosper and grow strong, and lay the foundation of their future greatness. But since the tariff has gone up to 30 or 35, or even 45 per cent, they have not progressed as well as they did at that time. In fact, many of those institutions that were then prosperous and were developing the resources of the country, have since gone out of existence. We can recollect the great furniture establishment of Jacques & Hay, in the city of Toronto, which, under a 15 per cent tariff, was employing a large number of men, and distributing a large amount of money and wages throughout the country, but since then that institution has gone down until it has ceased to exist. We can all remember the good old times when ship-building was in a flourishing condition in this country. Why, in the city of Chatham we had a large ship-building industry and built some of the largest ships ever floated on the lakes. One hundred and fifty to one hundred and seventy-five skilled mechanics were then employed in our ship yards; but since the National Policy came into existence this industry has disappeared and the grass is growing where, in those days the sound of the hammer and the chisel was heard. Why should we build vessels, when by our policy we are making it impossible for them to earn dividends? Is it not the most outrageous policy ever perpetrated? Here in the railway committee, we had a long discussion as to whether we should grant a charter to a company to build a bridge crossing the Detroit river at the city of Detroit. Men were coming forward with their millions of dollars to invest in a bridge that would span that beautiful river at the city of Detroit. What for? Not to look at, but to facilitate the trade and commerce of the two countries—to remove the obstacles that stand in the way of transportation from the west to the east. But while we have men thus coming forward to build bridges and tunnels and remove natural obstructions, our Government raises artificial barriers to prevent trade and commerce. Why, last year, we bought and sold from the United States no less than $88,000,000 worth. Our whole trade with England was no less than $107,000,000. The Controller of Customs boasted that our trade with Great Britain had increased while our trade with the United States was decreasing. What is there to boast about in that? Does he not know that every dollar we send into the United States, we have to throw over a wall thirty-five to forty feet high; and that every dollar they send into this country, they have to throw over a wall erected by this Government thirty-five to forty feet high. There is no duty charged on anything we send to England, and yet we send almost as much to the United States. When we look at the position of this country and the United States, when we look at the vast trade that could be developed if we only had access to the American markets—and it is a policy of the Liberal party to take every possible steps to secure reciprocity with the United States—we cannot understand how any one can approve of the suicidal policy of the Government. No doubt, if the Liberal party were in power, as I believe in a short time they will be, it would not be long before the barriers separating the two countries would be removed, and then an era of the greatest possible prosperity will open to this Canada of ours. We cannot conceive of any act which you could place upon the statute of this country that will confer anything like the advantages which will be conferred by a reciprocity treaty with the United States.

Mr. CAMPBELL

I see the Controller in his seat, and I know something about his county, and I know that the people of his county would be benefited very largely by such a treaty. Last year thousands of bushels of barley raised in his county were sold in Toronto at 42 cents a bushel, when right across the way at Buffalo the very same barley was selling at 60 to 65 cents. If a reciprocity treaty could be arranged, as I believe it could, there is nothing that could confer anything like the advantages upon the people which such a treaty would. It would throw open the great coasting trade of the continent to our people. Last year there were over 7,000,000 tons of iron ore which came down the Great Lakes, and it is a lamentable fact that only 5 per cent was carried by Canadian vessels. But once you open the coasting trade to the people of the Dominion, once again the sound of the chisel and hammer will be heard, and our sailors will not have to seek on foreign shores the employment denied them at home. I am heartily in favour of the resolution placed in your hands, Mr. Speaker, by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). It is a resolution which ought to receive the commendation of this House, but whether it shall or not, one thing I must say and that is that when the appeal is made to the people, the Government will find out that the National Policy has run its course and can no longer be relied on.

Bill (No. 96) to incorporate the International Radial Railway Company.—(Mr. Mas-son.)

CULLERS' OFFICE, QUEBEC.

Mr. RINFRET (for Mr. Langelier) asked,
1. Whether there is anything owing at the Cullers' Office, Quebec, for inspection dues?
2. How much is due and owing? 3. By whom, and how long has the money been owing? 4. Is it the intention of the Government to enforce payment of the sums so due?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I must ask the hon. member to move an order of the House for the purpose of obtaining the information asked. Too much time would be occupied in preparing an answer to this question, and the former part forms part of the subject which the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Miller) has asked the Public Accounts Committee to inquire into, and that is as to the arrears due the department, a return in respect of which the officers of the department are now engaged in preparing. That return will, no doubt, be ready when the House meets again.

WATER LOTS ON ST. LAWRENCE.

Mr. TISDALE (for Mr. Reid) asked, In what position is the controversy between the Dominion and the Ontario Governments as to the right of the respective Governments to issue patents of the water lots lying in front of the municipalities bordering on the River St. Lawrence, and is the Government aware of the fact that the Ontario Government are issuing patents with a reservation clause protecting them in the event of it being decided hereafter that the Dominion Government are vested with the right? Has a case been prepared, or if not, is it the intention of the Government to prepare a case for submission to the proper tribunal for a decision?

Mr. DALY. The question of the right to issue grants of water lots in the great lakes, the River St. Lawrence, &c., has been submitted to the Supreme Court for decision, and it is probable that the case will be argued at the next sitting of the court. The Government has no information on the subject of the issue of patents by the Government of Ontario in the matter.

CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS.

Mr. INNES (for Mr. Somerville) asked, How many private secretaries does the Controller of Customs employ in his department, and what are their names?

Mr. IVES. The Controller of Customs is not in his seat, but I have the answer here. The Controller has only one private secretary and his name is J. R. K. Bristol.

INDIAN RESERVES IN QU'APPELLE VALLEY.

Mr. DAVIN asked, Whether there is any intention to lease certain lands forming part of the Indian Reserves in the Qu'Appelle Valley, near Fort Qu'Appelle, to certain persons for the purpose of giving them the sole shooting privileges over such lands?

Mr. DALY. No.

FISH IMPORTED FROM FRANCE.

Mr. COATSWORTH (for Mr. Kaulbach) asked, What is the quantity of dry fish, also pickled fish, imported from France or any of her dependencies into the Dominion of Canada, in the years 1891-92-93 and 1894; the ports at which they were entered, and the amount of duty collected on each description?

Mr. IVES. The following is a statement of the quantity and value of salted and pickled fish imported into Canada from France and her dependencies during the undermentioned years:—

THE LOBSTER INDUSTRY.

Mr. COATSWORTH (for Mr. Kaulbach) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to further promote the lobster industry in the maritime provinces by establishing one or more hatcheries in the county of Lunenburg, N.S. ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The work is still in an experimental stage, and the suggestion that the hatching of lobsters might be economically carried on at or near the canneries, under the supervision of the fishery officers, is under consideration of the department.

FISHING LICENSES PAID TO NEWFOUNDLAND.

Mr. COATSWORTH (for Mr. Kaulbach) asked, When can the fishermen of the maritime provinces who have spent their money in license fees for bait to the Newfoundland Government, expect the refund of money, and to whom will the payment be made for disbursement ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries undertook to recover back from the Newfoundland Government fees collected from the Canadian fishing vessels under the Bait Act. Legal proceedings were instituted through the Department of Justice, by a local law firm, and some of the fees have already been recovered from the Newfoundland Government. The distribution of the money collected is awaiting the decision of the Department of Justice on certain law points, touching the law costs incurred in the suits against the Newfoundland Government. The portion of the fees which have been collected has in the meantime been placed to the credit of the Receiver General for Canada. The payments will be made to respective claimants as soon as the claims are finally adjusted.

CAPE BRETON RAILWAY.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, What is the gross amount of capital expenditure, for all purposes, on the Cape Breton Railway, up to 1st April, 1895 ? What are the gross receipts, under the following heads, for the several years the line has been operated, up to 1st April, 1895 : Cash receipts for freight carried ? Cash receipts for passengers carried ? Cash receipts for express carried ? Amount allowed for carrying the mails ? The gross amount of cash receipts, without the mail subsidy, from opening of the line to 1st April, 1895 ? The gross amount of expenditure, under the head of working expenses, from the opening of the line to the 1st April, 1895 ?

Mr. HAGGART. The gross amount of capital expenditure on Cape Breton Railway up to 1st April, 1895, is $3,860,184.54. It is not possible to give the receipts or expenses of the Cape Breton Railway, as they are not kept separately from the receipts and expenses of the rest of the Intercolonial Railway system.

THE EMMANUEL ST. LOUIS CASE.

Mr. CASEY asked, What is the effect of the decision of Judge Desnoyers in the charge against Emmanuel St. Louis for having obtained $144,874 by false pretenses with intent to defraud, and for having destroyed his books, papers, &c., whilst Her Majesty the Queen was his creditor, delivered on 13th May instant ? Is it open to the Government to take further criminal or civil proceedings against the said St. Louis ? Have any such proceedings been taken or is it the intention of the Government to take them ? If so, what and when, and what is the present state of such proceedings ?

Mr. HAGGART. The effect of the decision of Judge Desnoyers on the charge against Emmanuel St. Louis is a legal question. The question of further criminal proceedings against Mr. St. Louis is at present being considered by the Minister of Justice. The civil proceedings are being prosecuted.

Mr. CASEY. What is the present state of things ?

Mr. HAGGART. One case has gone in appeal to the Supreme Court, and the other is before the Exchequer Court.

Mr. CASEY. Cannot the Minister answer more fully ? I have asked, what proceedings have been taken, when they were taken, and what is the present state of such proceedings ?

Mr. HAGGART. The civil proceedings have been taken a couple of years ago, and the case is in appeal now, and is at present before the Supreme Court. That is, Mr. St. Louis' case. The proceedings in reference to recovery by the Government are at present being prosecuted, and were up for hearing before the Exchequer Court and will be again.

Mr. CASEY. Perhaps, if I let that part of the question stand, the Minister can answer more fully again.

Mr. HAGGART. I will try and give you a more exact statement.

Mr. CURRAN. The case is ready for trial.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means ; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. KENNY. Mr. Speaker, we all recognize that in these concluding years of this century the nations of the world enjoy a greater measure of liberty than at any previous period of the world's history. To-day in all parliaments and amongst all peoples, the Budget debate is the one which excites the greatest interest in the nation. In discussing it we pass in review not only the expenditure and income of the past year, and the estimate of the expenditure and income of the year to come, but we have under consideration also the fiscal policy of the Government of the day as well as that propounded by the Opposition. We have placed before us the policies which actuate the political parties in the country. The past two years have been years of remarkable and great depression unprecedented in the world's history, and in this Dominion of ours, we have felt it, as described by the Toronto "Globe," "in diminished force." During the course of this debate, hon. gentlemen opposite in criticising the remarks which have been made on this side of the House, have questioned the accuracy of the statement that the condition of the agricultural labourers and of the working classes in free-trade England was unsatisfactory. Sir, in proof of the agricultural depression which exists in England, I beg to call the attention of the House to the following sentence which appeared in the Queen's Speech at the opening of the Imperial Parliament :

I regret that agriculture continues to be in a seriously depressed condition. The subject is still under the consideration of the commission appointed in the autumn of 1892. In the meantime the proposal will be submitted to you for facilitating the construction of light railways, a measure which I trust will be beneficial to the rural districts.

We have here, Sir, in the most formal manner, placed before the Imperial Parliament, the statement that the condition of agriculture in Great Britain is so unsatisfactory that a Royal Commission has been sitting two years, has not yet made its report, and meanwhile the Imperial Government, in order to give some aid to agriculture, and to help the rural districts of England, has taken the unusual step of assisting in the construction of light railways. This is most convincing evidence that the condition of agriculture in England is unprecedently bad, and that free trade has not benefited the farmers of Great Britain. It is also within the knowledge of hon. gentlemen, that in England, since the present Parliament met, so great are the numbers of unemployed people that a select committee, presided over by Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, one of the members of the Cabinet, has been appointed to take into consideration the condition of the unemployed in England. When the members of that commission had taken evidence and considered the question, they did not feel justified in making any suggestion to Parliament, but they simply presented the evidence and left to Parliament the responsibility of dealing with this serious question. This condition of the population of England is a matter of extreme regret to us, but it is natural that we should take it into consideration when comparisons are instituted between the policy of protection which prevails in Canada and the United States, and the policy of free trade which prevails in England. The depression of the last few years has had its influence upon Canada, although as described by the Toronto "Globe" it has been felt here with diminished force. Hon. gentlemen opposite, and especially the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), have attempted to convey the impression to the House that the depression which existed between the years 1874 and 1878, was greater than the depression which prevails throughout the world to-day. I do not believe such to be the case, but whether that be so or not, at all events it is satisfactory to us who have supported the policy which has prevailed in Canada for the last fifteen years that the condition of the Canadian people in these past two years of depression has been infinitely better than it was in the years from 1874 to 1878. I know that the hon. member for South Oxford contends, and he has made the statement during the course of this debate, that the condition of the population of Canada, especially in the five older provinces, was better from 1874 to 1878 than it is to-day. He made the assertion; he gave us no proofs and I think that is not the generally accepted opinion of the people of Canada. In fact, I do not believe it is the opinion of the hon. members of this House, no matter on which side of the Speaker they may sit. But the result of the depression in Canada has been that our expenditure has exceeded our income, and there is a deficit. The hon. Minister of Finance, in the admirable speech which he made in introducing the Budget, informed the House that he intended to make immediate provision to meet that deficit; and the bold and courageous policy he then announced commends itself to the country. I had not the pleasure of hearing the speech, but it seemed to be a surprise to the financial critic of hon. gentlemen opposite, the hon. member for South Oxford. Indeed it had such an effect upon that hon. gentleman that for the moment he seemed to have lost his power of speech, and he had to ask for an adjournment of the House, in order that he might have time to recover from the effect of that announcement. As a citizen of Canada as a member of this House, I congratulate the hon. Minister of Finance upon the policy he adopted in courageously meeting the deficit in the manner he did. I do so for this reason, that, occupying the position which we Canadians do before the world, it is all-essential that we should maintain our foreign credit; and to do that we must be careful to maintain the equilibrium between our expenditure and our income. The advantages of maintaining our high credit are manifest. It is a decided advantage not only to the Dominion, but to the various provinces of the Dominion who are borrowers abroad, to the various municipalities, to the banking institutions, and to the commercial credit of our people. Therefore it is that all credit is due to the hon. Minister of Finance for the manner in which he met the deficit. And, Sir, in dealing with this matter of deficits, and with the comparisons which have been instituted by the hon. member for South Oxford, between the condition of the country to-day and its condition during the years when he administered its financial affairs, we have to look at the history of deficits in Canada. I find that during the first seven years of Liberal-Conservative administration the surpluses amounted to $11,000,000. From 1874 to 1879, when the hon. member for South Oxford was the Finance Minister, we had a surplus in one year and deficits in four years out of the five, the result being that at the end of those five years, there was a net deficit of $5,491,313. Then followed fifteen years of Liberal-Conservative government, the result being a net surplus of $16,000,000. Therefore, during the twenty-two years of Liberal-Conservative administration, we have had surpluses amounting to $27,352,890, and during the five years administration of the hon. member for South Oxford we had deficits in four years out of the five, amounting to $5,491,313. It appears that the only record that the hon. member for South Oxford has left of his connection with the administration of the Government of Canada has been those deficits, affording a verification of the oft-quoted words, that the good a man does in this world is often buried with him, and the evil alone survives. During those years, from 1874 to 1878, which the hon. member for South Oxford asked us to review and criticise, we find that whilst he was not able to meet the deficits, yet he increased the customs taxation, and our national credit was very much weaker and lower than it is to-day. Hon. gentlemen opposite, during the course of this debate, have contended that the existing deficit can in no wise be due to the fact that the customs tariff has been reduced during the past few years. Why, Sir, they must know, if they carefully examine this matter, that if the customs taxation of 1874-78 had been adhered to on such articles as tea, coffee and sugar, there would have been no deficit to-day. But, in refutation of the statement which is frequently made that there has been no reduction of taxation in the present tariff, as compared with that which existed two or three years ago, I desire to point out that our importations in the year 1891 amounted to $113,345,124, and the duty to $23,481,069, while in 1894 our importations were nearly exactly the same as in 1891, being $113,093,983, and the duty was only $19,375,822, showing a marked reduction of customs taxation. Hon. gentlemen opposite are also fond of simply quoting the amount of taxation which Canada pays in the way of customs revenue, without, at the same time, showing fairly what the amount of our importations is on which that taxation is imposed. In order to carry out the comparison between the two periods, I find that in 1879 we paid in customs revenue $12,939,540 on an importation of $80,341,608, while in 1894 we paid a very much larger amount in customs revenue, $19,379,822, but on an importation of $113,093,983. These figures show that the rate of customs taxation was actually less in 1894 than in 1879. Take the year 1875, and we find that the customs duties per head amounted to $3.95, whereas in 1894 they amounted to $3.85. It must be borne in mind that we are now manufacturing very much more largely than we were in 1875, that the goods now made in Canada compare most favourably with those we were importing in 1875, that they are really better value than the goods then imported, and that we are obtaining for our own people all the benefits which result from manufacturing the goods within our own territory. But the hon. member for South Oxford, in admitting his deficits and declaring that they amounted to $4,500,000, makes this remarkable statement. The whole amount, he said, was extracted from the pockets of our neighbours on the other side. Of all the wondrous statements which the hon. gentleman has made in this House, of all the ridiculous assertions he has made in this country, I think that statement surpasses them all. The hon. gentleman, when he thus spoke, was referring to the Halifax award. We know that the commission which sat in Halifax and resulted in that award, was the outcome of the Washington treaty, and we are aware that the Washington treaty was negotiated by the late Sir John Macdonald in Washington in 1871. We know, especially those of us who come from the maritime provinces, and are, therefore, more particularly interested in fishery questions, that when Sir John Macdonald submitted to the Canadian Parliament a Bill to ratify that treaty, that Bill was opposed by hon. gentlemen opposite in Parliament and in the country, and if they had had their own way, Canada never would have received one dollar of the $4,500,000 awarded us by the Halifax Commission, nor would our fishermen have ever had the bounty which they enjoy to-day. I am surprised at the audacity of the hon. member for South Oxford in referring to that matter, and in taking credit to himself and his party for the manner in which those negotiations were conducted, and the issue to which they were brought. Why, Sir, the late Mr. Mackenzie, speaking in Ontario, stated that he never expected to get a dollar as the result of the Halifax Commission. Such a statement by that hon. gentleman, who was then leading his party, was prejudicing the case in Canada before it was heard; but, after he and his party had done everything they could to prevent the ratification of the treaty, we succeeded in obtaining an award of $4,500,000. The commission met in Halifax in 1877, and it is a remarkable circumstance, that while the hon. member for South Oxford was a member of the Government at that day, neither the hon. gentleman nor any of his colleagues in the Government took part in the commission. The leader of the Government, the late Mr. Mackenzie, was so busy here watching the treasury, as is recorded in his great historic letter, that he was not able to turn his back less the treasury might be depleted in his absence. He had not sufficient confidence in his colleagues to leave them and go down himself to Halifax and take part in the commission. Nor had he sufficient confidence in any member of his Cabinet to send one down in his place, and so he actually went outside of his own colleagues and selected Sir Alexander Galt, formerly a colleague of Sir John Macdonald, and who was afterwards appointed by Sir John Macdonald, High Commissioner in London, to represent Canada on the commission. If, therefore, any credit for the conduct of the negotiation is due to any one, it is certainly due to Sir Alexander Galt and not to any member of the Mackenzie Administration. The hon. gentleman cannot justly claim any credit for the result of that commission. The fact that Sir John Macdonald's management secured to Canada the Washington treaty is what obtained for us the Halifax award; and if hon. gentlemen opposite had had their way, we would never have received a dollar and our fishermen would never have received the bounty. In discussing the question of the Budget, we have to consider the policies of the two parties. The policy of the Conservative party is well known to every Canadian. It was inaugurated in 1878, and confirmed by the people in 1882, 1887, and 1891. But, Mr. Speaker, we have had on former occasions, when hon. gentlemen opposite have propounded fiscal policies, very great difficulty in understanding what they really meant, and it is equally difficult to understand them to-day. We remember that after their defeat in 1887, when their policy of slander and abuse failed in its object, and when in 1888, they changed leaders, they found it necessary to form a new policy. It was then we heard, for the first time, of the policy of commercial union, unrestricted reciprocity or continental free trade. Call it what you will, it meant discrimination against the mother country; it meant the adoption of the American tariff; it meant placing the tariff of our country under the control of a foreign legislature. That doctrine was most persistently advocated by hon. gentlemen opposite, it was also advocated by their friends in the United States, with whom they were corresponding continuously and with whom they had agreed on a common platform. So much was this the case, that when we asked for a definition of the Liberal policy, we were referred by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), to the resolution introduced in the United States Congress by Mr. Hitt, then chairman of the committee on foreign affairs. That was a most extraordinary statement. In fact, this movement was so akin to annexation that it excited our suspicions and alarm and its American advocates said distinctly they meant annexation. When this fact was brought home to the Canadian people, they again rejected hon. gentlemen opposite and relegated them to another five years' term on the Opposition benches. Sir, the fact is that the people of Canada realized that that policy was a policy disloyal to Canada and disloyal to British connection. But there has been seemingly a wonderful change in the views of hon. gentlemen opposite. From the highest pinnacle of protection on which they stood when they urged the adoption of the tariff of the United States, they have descended to the lowest rung of the free trade ladder. One is amazed at such a change, and, in seeking for a reason, it seems to me that they desire to rehabilitate themselves in the good opinion and esteem of the people of Canada—which they have lost; and that their quasi treasonable movements being discovered, they attempt to associate themselves with some form of policy, or some cry in which the word "Britain," or "British" appears. Hence, we have them to-day advocating a policy diametrically opposite to the policy they advocated in 1891, when they declared that they had nailed the flag of unrestricted reciprocity to the mast, and were determined to keep it there until they sailed into the harbour of political success. They hauled down the flag—these hon. gentlemen are great at hauling down flags—but I think that when the opportunity is afforded us, as it will be in the general election, of placing before the people of Canada what these hon. gentlemen mean by free trade as it is practised in Great Britain, the result will be the same as before, and they will find themselves after the next general elections in quite as small a minority as they are in this House at the present time.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). They have abandoned that.

Mr. KENNY. They have not abandoned it yet.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). Pretty near it.

Mr. KENNY. Referring, Sir, to the abruptness of the change in the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, I find that in 1891 the hon. leader of the Opposition made a speech in the city of Boston, where he was quoted as follows:—

Touching briefly on the policy advocated by some in opposition to reciprocity—the Imperial Trade League—Mr. Laurier said simply that it was absurd. Trade could not be made to follow allegiance. He had no objection to British trade, he wanted Canada to get all possible of it; but they wanted United States trade, too, and Canadians, he thought, were not disposed any more than other people to throw away the Yankee dollar for the British shilling.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what great change has come over the condition of the country since these words were uttered. It seems to me that the conditions of Canada and the United States are very similar to what they were then. If the Yankee dollar was so desirable in 1891, is it not equally so to-day? And yet the hon. gentleman seems to have forgotten entirely the Yankee dollar, and now to love only the British shilling. If unrestricted reciprocity was so valuable as it has been represented to be, why do hon. gentlemen abandon their efforts to secure it? My hon. friend from Central Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) aptly referred to the statements of the hon. member for South Oxford, that the result of the policy of unrestricted reciprocity advocated by a gentleman opposite would be to add $10 to the value of every acre of cultivated land in the province of Ontario, and $30 to the value of every horse. My hon. friend from Toronto showed that there are 22,000,000 acres of uncultivated land in Ontario, at $10, $220,000,000; and 1,250,000 horses, at $30, equal to $37,500,000. This would yield enough to pay off the national debt, and leave a surplus of $7,000,000. If this would be the result, simply counting the value added to property in Ontario, what would it be if we count the value added to property throughout the whole Dominion? It surely would leave us a very handsome surplus after paying off our national debt. If the policy would do so much for Canada, why should it be abandoned now? Having nailed the flag of unrestricted reciprocity to the mast, why have hon. gentlemen opposite hauled it down so unexpectedly? As I said before, I think the reason is that we told the people of Canada exactly what was meant by this policy of unrestricted reciprocity, and Mr. Blake, their chosen leader, said it was so disloyal that he could not any longer associate himself officially with the party. We have to deal to-day with the subject of free trade as it is in England. But while I have before me the "Globe" report of the speech delivered by the hon.

Mr. KENNY.

leader of the Opposition at Boston, I will take the opportunity to explain a statement made previously. In the last session of Parliament, when reference was made by me to the speech which the hon. leader of the Opposition made at this Boston dinner, on 17th November, 1891, quoting from an American paper, I said that the hon. leader of the Opposition was reported as having said that:

England and Canada must separate, and it was manifest to him that the interests of his country were identical with the interests of the United States.

At that time, I had not in my hand his revised copy, the Toronto "Globe's" report of his speech; but the hon. gentleman stated in reply, he would be bound only by the report of his speech which appeared in the Toronto "Globe." He would not be responsible for even his ipsissima verba taken down at the time by a reporter, but he would be bound by the version of his speech which he had revised before it appeared in the Toronto "Globe." On looking over that revised report of his speech, I find that the following is the manner in which he himself admits he referred to the separation of Canada from England:—

Britain and Canada were, however, drifting further and further apart, and the time was coming when they must separate; but he was a British subject, and, as such, he hoped that when the final separation came about, it would come in friendship, as a son leaves the house of his father to become the father of a family.

Here, Sir, we find the leader of a party in a British country, the leader of a party in this British dependency, saying that Britain and Canada were drifting further and further apart and must separate. Sir, I deny that, I deny it most emphatically. Such is not the opinion of the people of Canada. It may be that hon. gentleman's opinion, and it may be the opinion of half a dozen hon. gentlemen who sit around him, but I tell him it is not the opinion of the majority of the people of Canada. They do not believe, they do not desire, that England and Canada shall separate. I say that such compromising language as that is unwise, unjust and unfair, unwise to himself and unjust and unfair to the people of Canada. I refer to that incident for the reason that it was a matter of discussion last year. Frequent reference is made to the condition of trade in two periods of our history, and the contention is made that the condition of our people is not as prosperous as it was in 1878; and further, that while a few "bloated manufacturers," or "thieves and robbers," as they are called by hon. gentlemen opposite, have been making money, the masses of the people are actually poorer than they were in 1878. Sir, I believe the contrary to be the case. I believe that in no period of the history of Canada has wealth been more evenly distributed than it is to-day; and I believe, further, that in no previous period of our history has the material well-being of our people been as great as it is to-day. For evidences of that we have only to visit the people in their homes, where we find them better housed, where we find them better fed, and where we find also a general material improvement which is most marked and most satisfactory. The contention of hon. gentlemen opposite that the condition of the people to-day is worse than it was in 1878, is capable of proof. Now, frequent reference is also made by these hon. gentlemen, as a sort of bugbear to frighten the people, to the national debt. We all know that during the last ten or fifteen years Canada has expended very large sums of money on important and necessary public works, on the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, on the Intercolonial Railway, on public buildings all over the country. In fact, there is only one trouble with Canada, and that is that our revenue is too small. If we had a couple of hundreds of millions per annum instead of thirty or forty millions, it would be very much easier to conduct the business of the country. As a matter of fact, the net debt has increased 19 cents per capita during the last fifteen years. But let us go back and examine the history of this debt. I find that in 1873, the net debt was $99,848,726; in 1879, it was $142,990,187; that period was under the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite. During those six years the debt had increased $43,141,726, or an annual increase of $7,199,289. Let us take the history of the debt under the Liberal-Conservative regime, and we find that whereas in 1879, the net debt was $142,990,187, in 1894 it was $246,183,089; or an increase in the fifteen years of $103,192,842, or an annual increase of $6,879,723. The actual debt increased more rapidly from 1873 to 1879 under the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite, than it has during the fifteen years since. The estimate which the people of Canada placed upon that fact can be understood when we remember that they evidently considered that the administration of public affairs by hon. gentlemen opposite was—I would not like to say incompetent and corrupt, though that is the kind of language with which the hon. member for South Oxford emblazons his financial statements; but I will simply say that it looks, at all events, as if the people of Canada thought it might have been incompetent and corrupt, because they took the very first opportunity of turning them out, and they have kept them out, and my opinion is that they will keep them out for many years to come. Sir, take the condition of the trade of the country. One would imagine, listening merely to the doleful utterances of hon. gentlemen opposite, that our trade was decreasing. Let us refer to the condition of trade in 1879 when these hon. gentlemen retired. At that time the aggregate trade with Great Britain was $67,288,848; in June, 1894, it was $107,255,123. In 1879, our trade with the United States was $70,904,720; in June, 1894, it was $88,844,040. I shall simply select one or two other places with the trade of which we are most intimately concerned. In 1879, our trade with Newfoundland was $2,280,823.79; in 1894, it was $3,633,154. With the West Indies it had fallen, under their management, to $4,753,099; in 1894, it had increased to $7,131,172. I will not weary the House by giving other figures. Sir, the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) during the course of his speech the other evening, said that he was delighted to hear that the banks of the country were in a solid and solvent condition, that it was a source of pleasure to him, that he rejoiced in it; but he said that it was due, not to the favourable condition of the country, but simply to the good management of the banks; that it was solely a matter of management. With all due deference to the hon. gentleman, I contend that while the administration of Canadian banks has been most capable and most wise, at the same time, I do not care how wise the management may have been, if the banks had not had good customers, and if the general condition of the country had not been prosperous, certainly the banks could not have been prosperous. If the banks were simply doing business with thieves and robbers, as the manufacturers and the manufacturers' employees are termed by hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not think their condition would be very satisfactory. But nothing reflects more perfectly the condition of a country than the condition of the banks, and that is such a political axiom it should not have to be argued, in any deliberative assembly. I was rather surprised when the hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Paterson) stated that the conditions of the banks afforded no indication of the general condition of the country. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman was then referring to the chartered banks. I find that the habit of referring, in the course of a Budget debate, to the savings of the people is not confined to Canada, but that Sir Wm. Harcourt, in his recent Budget speech, delivered in England, referred to that fact, and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), when Finance Minister, stated that the savings of the people in the savings banks had increased within a certain date from $2,000,000 to $7,000,000, and he thought that was a subject for congratulation. The hon. member for Oxford, in making that statement, recorded his opinion that these savings banks deposits are an indication of the well-being and thrift of the people of the country. The amount of deposits in the savings banks in 1874 was $7,210,260, and in 1878, when hon. gentlemen opposite resigned the seals of office, they had increased to $8,497,013, or an increase during those five years of about $1,285,000. Let us see what follows. During the five years when hon. gentlemen opposite administered public affairs, the increase was, in round numbers, $1,200,000: in the five following years the deposits increased, not one million, but twelve millions. That is the way hon. gentlemen opposite endeavour to show how much poorer the country is becoming—by referring to the fact that the deposits in the savings banks are increasing. But I venture to say this, that not only have the deposits in the savings banks increased, the amount being now $43,600,000, as against $8,000,000 when hon. gentlemen opposite retired from office, but I also desire to point to the condition of the chartered banks of the Dominion, to which the hon. member for Brant referred. And here it is noticeable that the deposits in the chartered banks in 1874, when the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) took charge of the financial affairs of the Dominion, and when he was en rapport with the banks of the country, actually shrank from 77 millions in 1874 to 70 millions in 1878. I do not know whether the deposits increased in the Bank of Ontario. The correspondence with Senator Simpson would seem to indicate that in that particular bank the deposits rather increased, for reasons which the hon. member for South Oxford knows better than I do, and which I do not propose now to stop and inquire into, because that matter might come up appropriately on some other occasion when the hon. gentleman is indulging in one of his corruption tirades. Let me point this out, that whilst the circulation in the banks of Canada in 1878 was only 20 millions, and in 1893 had increased to 33 millions, the deposits in the former period were 93 millions, and in the latter 174 millions, the discounts in 1878 were 190 millions, and now 205 millions, and the general assets of the banks in 1878 were only 175 millions, and now they are 302 millions. This is the way in which we are obliged to show how very much worse off the people are than they were under the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite, by instituting a comparison of the conditions of trade and of our banking institutions at the two periods. Of course, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) could not make a speech without abusing the manufacturers of the country, and it does seem unfortunate that some of us who invested a part of our means in starting manufacturing enterprises in the different communities in which we live, and did so as much with the object of helping those communities as from a desire for personal gain, when we come here, should be called thieves and robbers. Of course, the term is intended to be offensive, it is intended to be insulting, and so it is accepted. But, I say, to brand the manufacturers of this country and the men who have gone into those joint stock companies, by which manufactures were started in this country and are now conducted, as thieves and robbers, is most insolent, most offensive and most unjust. Only recently, I am told—I read it in a newspaper, for I have not had time to look at the "Hansard"—that a gentleman who occupies a prominent position in the province of New Brunswick, Mr. Alexander Gibson, of Marysville, who is the best known and most prominent business man in the maritime provinces, was grossly assailed and abused in this House because he happens to be connected with some manufacturing industries. Let me pause to point out, that these epithets can be applied as well to the farmers of the country who are protected, to the miners, who are protected, and to the fishermen, who are protected, as well as to men engaged in manufacturing, refining or any other industry. I have always been in favour of a protective policy, and when I advocated it I asked its extension to all classes of our community, to farmers, fishermen, miners, as well as manufacturers: I am not ashamed of it, and I am not ashamed to declare, here or elsewhere, my connection with a manufacturing enterprise. Such industries have not been a source of profit to me individually, but I am very glad to say that they have been of decided advantage to the community or communities in which they have been started. As to the condition of those manufactures, I find that the increase in the number of manufactories between 1881 and 1891 was something like 25,800; that the capital invested in 1881 was $165,000,000; that to-day it is $353,000,000; that the number of employees was 254,000, and that it is now 367,000; that the wages paid in 1881 amounted to $59,000,000, and that in 1891 they were $99,000,000; that the value of the products in 1881 were $300,000,000, and in 1891, $475,000,000. Sir, that is an increase that is gratifying to Canadians. I know that the hon. gentleman who guides the financial policy of the Opposition has no faith in Canadian manufactures, for he has told us distinctly that he does not believe that Canada is a suitable country for manufacturing. I am quite sure that he is just as antagonistic to our manufactures as he was in 1874 or 1878, when by his management of the affairs of the country the sugar refiners were obliged to close their industry. That reminds me, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) made a remarkable statement which is being repeated throughout the country, and something similar was started by the leader of the Opposition at a meeting which took place at St. Constance. I cannot quote the words of the hon. gentlemen precisely, but they were to the effect: That the duty which prevailed in Canada during the past year on sugars, refined, was a tariff which put $2,000,000 a year into the pockets of the refiners of the country. I am connected with a refining industry in this country. It is a joint stock company, it is a public company, and its affairs are public, its annual statement is published, and therefore there is no secret connected with it. I regret to say that no portion of that $2,000,000 ever came near us, for last year we could not actually earn a dividend, and we were simply able to pay the interest on our mortgage. In the whole year's work of 1894, there was not sufficient money earned to pay even one-half per cent. I therefore say, in the presence of hon. gentlemen here who are business men, that for any man to rise in his place in this House and on his responsibility as a member, and in order to create prejudice against a manufacturing industry in this country; for any man to say that the tariff had put $2,000,000 into the pockets of the people engaged in that industry, when it did not earn a dividend, is saying what is grossly inaccurate, and which if repeated can only be termed a deliberate falsehood. I have served seven or eight years on the board of directors of one of those sugar refining companies with the Hon. Mr. Boak, who is one of the most prominent Liberals in the city of Halifax, who is today the President of the Legislative Council of the province of Nova Scotia, selected for that position by the Grit Government there, and yet that gentleman, because he happens to have some investment in a sugar refinery and to have become identified with it, for exactly the same reasons as I did, because he thought it would help the community; that gentleman, forsooth, must be dubbed a robber and a thief by gentlemen of the Liberal party in this House, because he happens to be connected with that industry. I reside in a community where there is no great individual wealth, and it is only by uniting together that we can succeed in starting these enterprises. Therefore, Sir, the utter fallacy of the statement, that any such money was to be made out of that business in Canada is shown by the fact that the companies which were engaged in that industry have experienced the extreme depression during the last year, as has been the case in other branches of commerce. I am told that the two refineries in Montreal paid small dividends. I know nothing of their private business, but I know that rumour has it that the dividends were paid, not from the earnings of that year, but from reserve funds. I am not surprised at the attack of the hon. member (Sir Richard Cartwright) on the sugar refineries of Canada. He closed them once before, and he is prepared, I have no doubt, to close them again. But, if there is so much money in the business, why does he not come down and buy some stock? The stock of that refinery was selling at from 50 to 60 cents on the dollar, and you could buy a share of the preferred stock upon which

$100 was paid, and with it a share of the common stock, for $60. If there was any such profit to be earned as is contended by hon. gentlemen opposite—I say contended by them, because I do not think they believe it in their hearts—I have no doubt they would inundate us trying to get the stock. But more than that; if they think the industry is so remunerative, they can actually buy a refinery, for there is one idle in the neighbourhood of Halifax. I am sorry it is idle, but if they think there is so much money to be made, I invite them to come down and invest their capital and set that refinery going. The hon. gentleman also read an extract from the newspaper which referred to the large profits made by the Acadian Sugar Company in reference to sugar on hand, but subsequent returns laid on the Table of the House prove how inaccurate that newspaper report was. I desire also, Mr. Speaker, to point out, that in instituting a comparison, as we are forced to do from the line of argument which the hon. gentleman has adopted, we must look at the condition of the life insurance business in Canada. I find that, like the deposits in the banks, the amount at risk on life insurances decreased from the year 1874 to the year 1878. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) succeeded in decreasing the deposits in the bank, and he also succeeded in decreasing the amount of life insurance at risk. In fact he was making the people poor so fast that they could not pay their life insurance premiums and had to abandon their policies. The amount at risk in 1874 was, in round numbers, $85,000,000, and in 1878 it had decreased to $84,000,000, whereas in 1893, the amount at risk was $295,622,732, showing an enormous increase. Well, Sir, as business men and having to gauge the business condition of the country, we rely to some extent at least upon the report of the mercantile agencies. These reports give us some idea and some indication of the stability of the commercial community, and they are accepted on this side of the Atlantic, and I presume in Great Britain too, as a guide in those matters. I find that in the Dominion of Canada from 1875 to 1879, there were 9,187 failures, and the amount of the liabilities of these bankrupt firms was $132,371,240. On the other hand from 1890 to 1894, there were 8,503 failures, and the amount of liabilities, $78,357,641, or a decrease of $54,000,000, in the liabilities of the failures which took place from 1890 to 1894, as compared with the failures that took place between 1875 and 1879. Mr. Speaker, in my own province from 1875 to 1879, the liabilities of the firms that failed amounted to $9,651,760, and from 1890 to 1894, they only amounted to $4,175,262, or a decrease of $5,476,498. Thus it is conclusively shown that the condition of the mercantile community of this Dominion has been indefinitely better during the past five years than it was from 1875 to 1879; and yet the hon. gentleman says that he does not believe the people of the five older provinces are as well off as they were in 1878. In fact, he does not believe that anything can be prosperous unless he is administering the finances of the country. Sir, referring to the condition of affairs in my own province, my hon. friend from Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac), in the speech he made the other evening, stated that the manner in which this Government was running the Dominion into debt and its extravagant expenditure invited an adverse vote from the people of Canada, and he also endeavoured to convey the impression that Nova Scotia was not in a prosperous condition. Well, Sir, I do not wish to exaggerate facts. Nova Scotia, like the whole Dominion, must share somewhat in the general depression; but I do not know a province in the Dominion which is better off to-day than the province of Nova Scotia. In proof of that statement, I find that the leader of the Liberal local government of that province, of which the hon. member for Antigonish was a member, placed in the mouth of the Lieutenant-Governor on the occasion of the opening of the last session of the legislature, the following words:—

While the past year cannot be described as one of general prosperity throughout the Dominion, it must be a gratification for us to know that a fair degree of success rewarded the industry of our people in their diversified fields of labour. A good harvest, an average fishery, marked progress in mining operations, and considerable activity in other departments, combined to enable the people of Nova Scotia to avoid to some extent the depression of trade which prevailed so widely on this continent.

That is a very good answer, I think, to any hon. gentleman from the province of Nova Scotia who endeavours to convey the impression that that province is not fairly prosperous. As regards the finances of Nova Scotia, I find that in 1882, when the Grit provincial government went into power, the province had no funded debt. By 1893, during their eleven years of office, they had piled up a debt of $3,142,922. I also find that whereas the expenditure of the province in 1883 was $541,099, by 1893 they had increased it to $822,462, an increase of 52 per cent, as against an increase of only 21 per cent in the Dominion expenditure by the Liberal-Conservative Federal Government in the same period. The exports of Nova Scotia to-day will compare favourably with what they were in past years. I could also show—but I do not wish to detain the House—that the shipping tonnage at the port of Halifax has very much increased. The hon. gentleman made reference to the reduction of our shipping, which we all know—we have threshed it out before—is due to circumstances with which neither this Government nor the Government of Nova Scotia have anything whatever to do. I am sorry that the efforts made by the Government of Canada to obtain a fast Atlantic service have not been successful. I still hope that the day will come when Canada will have on the North Atlantic a service as good as that which any other country enjoys. I have also to express my regret that the negotiations looking to a union of the colony of Newfoundland with this Dominion have been unsuccessful. I think that was an occasion on which Canada might deal generously with the sister colony, who are the only remaining British subjects on North America who are not a part of our confederation. I do not intend to express any opinion upon the terms which Canada offered or the terms which Newfoundland asked, for I have not had time to study them, and in fact one could hardly offer an intelligent opinion without hearing them very fully discussed. But I think that any distress which may prevail in Newfoundland, and which we know unfortunately does prevail, is not of the character which hon. gentlemen have attempted to convey to this House by reading exaggerated reports of the condition of things there. I believe the distress is largely due to the fact that in Newfoundland they have only one industry. What they want is a diversity of employment for their people, such as we have in Canada. If they had only some of those cotton factories, woollen factories and sugar refineries which we have in Canada, affording diversity of employment to their people, it would be infinitely better for the country. Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the condition of our people in Canada to-day will compare favourably with that of any other people in the world. I do not know five millions of people on this globe amongst whom there is a general condition of well-being as there is amongst the five millions of people residing in the Dominion of Canada. I believe that is largely due to the fact that under our National Policy we have succeeded in securing for our people diversity of employment, and I believe that policy is an acceptable one to the people of Canada. I believe that it will be accepted by them at the general elections, and that its continuance will make of this Dominion the fairest land on earth.

Mr. RIDER. Mr. Speaker, I have much pleasure in rising to support the resolution proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). It seems to me that there never was a time in our history when a resolution of this kind was more called for. The resolution reads thus:

That the Estimates for the fiscal year 1894-95 amount to the sum of $38,517,152, independently of any further Supplementary Estimates which may be brought down.

That the said sum of $38,517,152 is in excess of the amount expended in 1893-94 by the sum of $922,127.

That the deficit for the year 1893-94 amounted to $1,210,322.

That the deficit for the present year is estimated by the Minister of Finance at $4,500,000.

That from statements made by Ministers of the Crown, in this House, it appears that our existing obligations for railway subsidies and for public works now in progress will involve a further outlay of $20,000,000, computed as follows:—

For railway subsidies now voted.....	$8,729,000
For the St. Lawrence Canals.....	6,000,000
For the Trent Valley Canal.....	5,000,000
For the Intercolonial Railway and minor works.....	1,000,000

The interest on which sum, together with the subsidy provided by statute to be paid on account of a fast Atlantic service, will entail an addition to our already very heavy annual fixed charges of $1,400,000.

That, inasmuch as enormous sums of money are now exacted from the people of Canada which are not paid into the treasury, and inasmuch as the burthens of the people are thereby greatly and unnecessarily increased, and it is of the utmost importance to the well-being of the community that not only should the present extravagant expenditure be diminished, but that the said burthens should be reduced as largely and speedily as possible,—it is expedient that in making provision to restore “the equilibrium between revenue and expenditure,” as recommended in the Speech from the Throne, the existing tariff be so modified that it may be made a tariff for revenue only.

Yesterday we had laid before us supplementary Estimates, which were somewhat of a surprise, as the Finance Minister, when he presented the main Estimates, said there would be no other call on the revenue of the country. The supplementary Estimates will make an addition of about $1,500,000, or $2,422,000 in excess of the amount expended in the last fiscal year. In 1878, the then Opposition promised that if returned to power they would inaugurate a system of economy and retrenchment which would enable them to run the Government with the revenues of the country; or, rather they promised that they would manage the affairs of the country at an expenditure of about $22,500,000. The last year of the Mackenzie Administration, our expenditure amounted to $23,500,000. This was claimed, at the time, to be excessive. It was said that the business of the country could be run on at least a million dollars less each year, and that there would be no necessity to increase the public debt. At this time, much was said about the National Policy. It was a policy which was to give the people a home market; it was a policy which was to protect them by imposing high taxes. I propose to review the course of trade and show how that policy has been carried out. We were told at that time that real estate would be a safe investment. Farmers were told that they might be called upon to endure an increased burden for the time, but that the value of their farms would be maintained—that not only would real estate at the values existing then be a safe investment, but that any improvement they might make would be money as safely invested as though deposited in the soundest financial institution of the land. What are the results to-day? I have been looking over the difference between promise and performance, and I find that the net increase of the debt of Canada to-day is $110,000,000, or $23 per head. I find that the Government have expended, since 1878-79, about $566,000,000, in round numbers. If they had kept their promise, and expended no more than what was necessary to carry on the business of the country, they need only have exacted from the people, by way of taxation, the sum of $368,000,000. They have, therefore, expended $198,000,000 more than they said was necessary, or an excess of $41 per head. In order to ascertain how much the people of the county I have the honour to represent, have to pay of this increased expenditure, I have made the calculation upon a per capita basis, the population being 18,067, and I find that the share of the people of Stanstead would be no less a sum than $740,747, and that their share in the increase in the net debt of Canada, is $415.541, making an extra burden which has been placed upon the county of Stanstead, and which, sooner or later, must be met, some way or other, amounting to $1,156,288. And I have no doubt the decrease in the value of real estate will amount to as much more. If the hon. gentlemen now on the treasury benches had carried out their promises, a resolution such as the one I have the honour of supporting would not be required. I believe the Finance Minister looks upon the farmers as manufacturers. I understand that he accepts them as such, and it seems to me that this is a great deal in keeping with the other representations put before the people. If there is a class of the community who deserve protection or encouragement in any way, it surely is the farmer. How are we told that they get it? We are told that they get it by means of the duty on pork. The hon. Minister of Militia claimed great credit for having placed a duty upon pork. He gave this House to understand that that duty virtually enabled the farmer to export pork. I do not believe that the fiction known as the National Policy has ever produced one pound of pork, butter or cheese, but whatever progress has been made by the farmers has been made in spite of, and not because of the National Policy. If the farmers are to be considered as manufacturers, why should they not receive the same encouragement in the way of getting their raw material on as advantageous terms as do the manufacturers—the woollen, the cotton, and the iron men? Later on, I propose to deal with this subject, but at present I propose to draw attention, for a few moments, to the very grave state of the finances of the country. The Finance Minister has been compelled, through force of circumstances, to admit an immense deficit. We were given to understand, at the opening of the session, that this deficit would be met by a reduction in the expenditure, and the adoption of a vigorous system of economy. That certainly was an idea which should meet the approval of the whole community, and I was rather in hopes that the Finance Minister would be able to make good that contention: but I find that, instead of adopting any such measure for meeting this bad state of affairs, he resorts to the same old method of putting on more protection in the shape of higher duty. So far as the increased duty upon sugar is concerned, it is quite evident that very little benefit has accrued to the treasury up to the present time. It has been reported—I will not vouch for the accuracy of the statement—that the refiners had a tip as to what was to be done. The results would seem to justify such a statement, because we find that large quantities of raw sugar were brought in just a few days prior to the time when the duties were to take effect. The saving to the refiners upon recent shipments would be no less a sum than $350,000. The hon. member for South Oxford says that it would amount to a good deal more, and I should think it quite likely. How will the tax upon sugar affect the consumers of this country? Say that the people of Canada consume, in round numbers, 350,000,000 pounds a year. The duty now levied is at the rate of 1·14 cents per pound. The tax, at this rate, would amount, in round numbers, to $4,000,000. That means this amount will be taken out of the consumers in Canada. And how will this great sum be divided? About $1,750,000 will find its way into the treasury through the customs officials, and about $2,250,000 will go into the pockets of the refiners. This is the way the hon. gentleman proposes to meet the growing expenses of the country. There is no doubt that retrenchment can be effected in nearly every department. There is no very important work at present in view necessitating a large outlay beyond the ordinary revenues of the country, and it seems that by inaugurating a system of economy and carrying it out vigorously—not a vigorous system of economy allowed to lie in a pigeon-hole, but the application of business methods to the management of the business affairs of the country—the necessary equilibrium between revenue and expenditure could be restored without resorting to any system of taxation, and without adding new burdens to those already borne by the people of the country. This system of protection by means of high taxation is said to be intended to develop the resources of the country—the natural resources, I presume. I will trouble you with a table, showing the amount of taxes collected on a few articles that are not produced in this country, and which are necessary articles, articles in use in every-day life. I have taken these figures from the Trade and Navigation Returns for the year ending 30th June, 1894:

Baking powder.....	$ 31,941
Yeast	13,088
Mustard	16,931
Spices	23,352
Currants, dried.....	64,552
Prunes, dried.....	23,934
Figs and dates.....	19,365
Raisins	141,832
Tea and coffee.....	27,528
Rice	76,942
Sugar and molasses.....	100,175
Dairy salt.....	11,385
Packages for salt.....	2,025
Cocoa, cocoa nuts, and other nuts.....	156,768
Peaches	18,809
Grapes	29,375
Oranges and lemons.....	95,409
White and decorated stone table-ware...	210,324
Table cutlery.....	61,149
Total.....	$1,125,815

This is evidence, Mr. Speaker, that this policy of protection by high taxation is not entirely for the purpose of developing the natural resources of the country, but is for the purpose of extracting money from the pockets of the people that will enable the occupants of the treasury benches to keep themselves in power. Now, to hear the hon. gentlemen opposite in their election tours, you would be led to believe that they were very solicitous for the welfare of the farming community of the country. But their treatment of this class indicates that it is their votes they care for more than their welfare; and I am surprised at the success hon. gentlemen opposite have been able to achieve while maintaining such a wide divergence between promise and performance. In looking over the tariff passed at the last session, a few items specially attract my attention. I will refer to one—fence wire, plain, annealed-oiled and annealed, and galvanized. That is an article upon which the manufacturers have a very high protection. Now, I am not one of those who believe that the manufacturers are robbers and thieves; and I do not think that I have ever heard any hon. gentleman on this side of the House denounce them as such. I have often had the pleasure of listening to the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny). This is not the first time, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member has incorporated in his speech the allegations that gentlemen on this side of the House speak of the manufacturers as thieves and robbers, for I have heard him say that every session since I first had the honour of a seat in this House. I might congratulate the hon. member upon his improved delivery of that part of his speech, but that is as far as I could go.

I will give the hon. member a little idea of the working of this tariff. Fence wire, for instance, is one of those articles that constitute the farmer's raw material. The manufacturers of fence wire in this country are given protection to the extent of 25 per cent, and they get the rod from which the wire is drawn duty free. Why should not the farmer get the wire he requires for building his fences duty free? The protection on wire is such that it enables the manufacturer in this country to farm out the country, to divide it up into commercial districts, and make different prices to different sections. According to this arrangement, the farmers of the province of Quebec are obliged to pay from 10 to 13 per cent more for their fence wire than is charged the farmers in the province of Ontario. The manufacturers, as a rule, base their price, not upon what they can afford to sell it, but upon the prices prevailing in foreign countries, with the Canadian duty added. This is effected in certain localities by a system of discrimination. It seems this is an article wherein they can make discrimination, and they discriminate between provinces within our own country, a country that is doing so much for them. In respect to this article they discriminate against the farmers and the dealers in the province of Quebec to the extent of 10 to 13 per cent on the three kinds of wire I have named. Now, barbed wire is another article which to the farmer is raw material, and how is this treated? This is delivered in 500-pound lots to any point in Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, freight prepaid; they are on an equal footing so far. But the prices in Ontario are from 12½ to 20 cents per cwt. less than are charged to the dealers and farmers in the province of Quebec, and this very article is manufactured in the city of Montreal. The merchants and the farmers of the province of Quebec pay 20 cents per cwt. more than is paid in the border towns of the province of Ontario. In places like Kingston, which is near to the American border, where the article can be procured at a low rate of freight, the farmers can buy it in the United States market and pay the duty, and have something of a margin left; therefore, the manufacturers put the price down in places like Kingston, Toronto and other points in Ontario. Now, Sir, that system is an outrage upon the farmers of this country, especially upon those who suffer most from it. It is something that the manufacturers never should allow to exist; it is to their discredit, and it surely discredits the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, a policy which they stand up and affirm to-day as strongly as they did when it was first adopted. Take iron or steel piping or tubing. This is an article that is largely used by the farmers in laying waterworks, and heating purposes. Let us see how the duty is arranged. The duty upon iron or steel tubing or piping in the manufacture of boilers is 7½ per cent; for use in petroleum refineries, imported specially for such use, in sizes from ¼ to 2 inches in diameter, the duty is 20 per cent. But for the sizes that are needed by the farmers and builders, the rate of duty is half a cent per pound and 30 per cent. It seems to me that the farmers in this country have only to know these facts in order to be able to judge this Government, not by their pretensions, but by their deeds. For instance, the farmers of this country produce pork, butter and cheese in excess of the requirements of the market; and the Minister of Militia undertook to point out that the duty upon pork had protected the farmers in consequence of which they were able to export to the extent, I think he said, of $2,000,000 in the past three years. Now, this is an acknowledgment of a most ignominious failure in the operation of this National Policy, because, as propounded in 1878, the National Policy was to give the farmers the home market, a market which would be better for them than any foreign market. They realize full well that when they have to go into a market like that of Great Britain, they have to meet the world in open competition, and if our farmers here are placed under any disadvantage in production, they surely cannot compete successfully in the markets of the world. If their agricultural machinery, fence wire, and so forth, cost more here, it is very evident that they cannot raise their farm products as cheaply, and that a duty upon articles that they produce largely in excess of the requirements of the home market, is simply no protection at all for them. It is no advantage to the farmer, it is laid rather to mislead him, it is done to throw dust in his eyes, to make him believe, if possible, by some such flimsy excuse, that the Government are really solicitous for his welfare. That is the reason that they have put on the duty, but it is of no advantage to the farmer, because I find that the very articles the farmer needs in the prosecution of his business are the articles that pay a very heavy duty. What I consider is raw material to the farmer, and what I believe that the farmers should get free, if any free goods are allowed to come into this country, are farm implements, which are now taxed 20 to 35 per cent; plain fence wire, which is now taxed 25 per cent; barbed wire, which is taxed ¾ of a cent per pound; buckthorn wire, which is taxed ½ cent per pound; iron piping, 2 inches in diameter and under, which is taxed ½ cent per pound and 30 per cent ad valorem; wire nails, which are taxed 1 cent per pound; cut nails, which are taxed ¾ cent per pound; fertilizers, which are taxed 10 per cent; Indian corn, which is taxed 7½ cents per bushel; and kerosene oil, which is taxed at 110 per cent. In regard to artificial fertilizers, that is an article which is imported to a considerable extent from the United States, and the duty of 10 per cent ad valorem, although it may not seem large, amounts to a tax of $1 to $3 per acre for the farmer. It seems there is no good reason why a tax should be placed upon fertilizers. If the manufacturers of this country are willing to meet fair competition, if all they want is a fair field and no favour, surely in an article of this kind they should not exact from the Government any protection. They have the United States market free, and should be willing to reciprocate. The United States Government allows the importation of all kinds of artificial fertilizers duty free. Anything that will assist the farmers in fertilizing their soil and increasing the amount of their crops the United States consider a national benefit, and therefore fertilizers are admitted free of duty. Why, therefore, should not the farmers of this country also be able to get fertilizers free? Now, kerosene is an article of great importance to the farmer; it is more largely used by farmers and by workingmen in cities than by any other portion of the people; and yet it has to pay a duty of 110 per cent. We imported last year 6,545,850 gallons, on which there was a duty collected of $466,163. It is evident from the amount of our exports that this is an article which enables the oil refiners to control the home market on account of the high duty. I desire to give the House another evidence of the deception practiced—if that word is parliamentary—by hon. gentlemen opposite in their dealings with the farmers. The farmers consider that a duty on corn is to them no protection, but rather a burden. We import quite a large quantity of corn, and export little or none. In order to give proof that cannot be gainsaid or denied in regard to the honesty of the Government in dealing fairly with the farmers in this respect, I refer to an Order in Council, passed a number of years ago, giving the distillers a rebate of duty paid on corn imported for use in the manufacture of spirits for export. This was not a measure passed before Parliament in broad day light, it was a measure passed in secret session of the Ministry, the advisers of the Crown, and it gave to one class of the community an unfair and undue advantage. It was sometime before this was found out, and when it was discovered it was brought before Parliament in this way. The hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) moved the following resolution during the session of 1889:—

That whereas distillers are allowed a rebate of duty upon corn imported for use in the manufacture of spirits for export, it is, in the opinion of this House, but just and right that farmers and stock-raisers who import corn to feed cattle or other stock for export, should also receive a similar rebate.

To my surprise I find among hon. members supporting the Order in Council, allowing the distillers a rebate on duty paid on corn when such rebate had been refused to the farmers, no less than ten members who are now on the treasury benches. When we consider this fact, we are satisfied that those hon. gentlemen have made no progress. Have we heard one word of penitence or atonement for such action as that? If we had, we might expect something better from them, and we might be disposed to say that under other circumstances they would meet the farmers fairly. We know this, that our farmers have to meet in the markets of the world the competition of other countries. In the British markets, they compete very largely with United States farmers, who have the advantage as regards cheap freight, besides being able to produce more cheaply, because they get the raw material at a lower rate, and thus our farmers are placed at a disadvantage. This subject came up again in 1890, when the leader of the Opposition moved as follows:—

That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved that, in the opinion of this House, no rebate should be allowed on corn imported for use in the manufacture of spirits.

In the division list, I find the names of eleven of the present Ministers of the Crown voting against the motion. So it is very evident, when you consider that they were the same men as those who had previously withheld from the farmers their just rights and privileges, that we could not expect anything better from them, and I am very sorry, indeed, to find among those who voted against the farmers on both motions, the name of the hon. member who formerly represented the county which I now have the honour to represent. We have been told by hon. gentlemen opposite that by adopting this line of policy, we should be more likely to obtain reciprocity with the United States. It is very evident, from the trend of trade between the two countries, that reciprocity with the United States would be a great blessing to Canada, and in evidence of this, I present a table showing the trade between Canada and the United States, in which farmers are interested:

	Value of Exports.	Value of imports.
Apples, green.....	$221,187	$ 44,277
Vegetables	107,233	132,896
Potatoes	193,917	50,329
Hay	753,575	18,404
Oats	20,817	59,239
Barley	216,493	1,395
Buckwheat	139,700	31
Beans	261,662	17,006
Pease	329,568	7,753
Indian corn.....	10	683,873
Maple sugar	28,093

Mr. RIDER.

	Value of Exports.	Value of Imports.
Eggs	199,636	11,698
Wool	15,486	566,401
Horses	480,525	62,321
Sheep	642,231	45,708
Poultry	52,023	8,978
Hides, raw.....	283,430	1,664,857

Now, Mr. Speaker, wool is an article produced by the farmer and it is an article which is not produced in excess of the demands of our home market. If there is one single article which would be enhanced in value in the Canadian market by the imposition of a duty, surely it is wool; but yet in this instance the farmer is obliged to compete with the markets of the world. The woollen manufacturer requires that not only his wool, but his dye stuffs and raw materials shall be duty free, and if he has any important machinery to be brought in, a special Order in Council is passed to enable him to do so without paying duty. It seems manifestly unfair, and to my mind misleading, for the Government to pretend, that by putting a duty upon articles which our farmers produce largely in excess of the requirements of the home market; that they are giving them protection, while they refrain from putting protection on such a commodity as wool which is not produced in excess of the country's needs. The same might be said with regard to raw hides. That is a product of the farm, which we exported only to the value of $283,430, while from the United States alone we imported to the value of $1,664,857. The farmers of Canada might derive some little benefit from having a duty imposed upon hides and wool, taxes are imposed upon articles which they are obliged to use, and yet the Government allow hides to go on the free list. Let us take the list of some of the raw materials imported free of duty for the benefit of the manufacturers:

RAW MATERIAL FOR MANUFACTURERS, IMPORTED DUTY FREE.

	Value.
Diamonds, unset.....	$ 169,619
Grease for manufacturers.....	266,306
Hides, raw.....	1,866,333
Raw silk.....	203,040
Wool	1,085,254
Raw sugar	8,382,150
Tobacco unmanufactured	1,753,992
Cotton for manufacturers.....	2,997,071
Nets, seines and hooks, for use in the fisheries	434,530
Gutta percha and india-rubber, crude..	976,948
Wire rods for wire-makers.....	510,783
Steel rails for railways.....	1,748,669
Tin in blocks, and tin plates.....	1,274,512

It will be seen, Mr. Speaker, that necessaries for the use of the fishermen were imported free to the value of $434,530. Now, I have no objection whatever to the fishermen being allowed the privilege of importing their nets, twines, seines, and so forth, duty free, but I do not know why the farmer should not be considered on the same footing.

There is no industry in this country which requires a greater amount of labour for the amount of revenue received from it, than that of farming. Speaking for the farmers of the eastern townships, they each one of them will require to work his whole family in order to make 5 per cent upon his investment, and if the farmers were to figure a fair ordinary wages on the work of their families on the farm, they would have to throw in the use of the whole capital invested and get nothing in return. So long as that state of affairs exists, it seems to me that it is the bounded duty of this Government, instead of inflicting further burdens on the people in the way of taxation, to inaugurate a system of economy. Surely there is plenty of room for economy in the administration of affairs by this Government. I cannot see why the Government machinery should cost more to run to-day than in 1878, and if it does cost more, hon. gentlemen opposite are to blame for it. The increase in the population at all events, does not justify any increase in expenditure, and it is quite plain that there is great opportunity for retrenchment. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have given you the free list of the raw materials of the manufacturer, and I will now on the other hand give a table showing some of the manufactured goods imported, and the amount of duty paid thereon:

DUTIABLE GOODS TO CONSUMERS.

	Duty paid.
Cotton goods.....	$1,139,068 41
Drugs, dyes, medicines.....	364,419 24
Rubber goods.....	157,800 11
Leather goods.....	200,552 88
Musical instruments.....	83,488 19
Oilcloth	74,344 12
Woollen goods.....	2,876,873 17
Silk goods.....	539,257 56
Ribbons, silk.....	197,905 42
Thread, cotton.....	84,864 82
do linen	31,240 25
do silk	6,239 38
Sewing machines.....	26,886 40
Needles, sewing and knitting.....	10,392 92
Farm implements.....	79,112 73
Carriages, carts.....	44,059 68
Window and plate glass.....	159,590 65
Glassware, lamps, chimneys.....	187,256 55
Bicycles	100,040 41
Coal, bituminous.....	843,841 89
Tools—carpenters' and mechanics'..	139,670 46

It will be seen that on woollen goods imported, and used by the farmer to a large extent, the people of this country were called upon to pay $2,876,873 duty, and that while the manufacturer has his raw material free, the farmer has no protection on the wool he produces. This table will give you a little idea of the extent of the duties collected on many of the manufactured articles, the foundations of which are duty free to the manufacturer. Now, with regard to our trade with the British Empire, I find that it is as follows. Our exports to the British Empire were as follows:—

The Mine	$ 471,115
The Fisheries	6,078,895
The Forest	12,053,566
The Farm	43,284,900
Miscellaneous	20,469
Manufactures	4,229,664

Total$66,138,609

To the United States we exported as follows:—

The Mine....	$ 5,130,186
The Fisheries	3,260,677
The Forest	13,308,196
The Farm	5,095,624
Miscellaneous	54,308
Manufactures	2,448,607

Total$29,297,598

Our total exports of home produce to the whole world were :

The Mine	$ 5,801,009
The Fisheries	11,102,692
The Forest	26,355,448
The Farm	49,559,622
Manufactures	7,692,755
Miscellaneous	75,327

Total$100,586,853

Our imports from the British Empire for the year ending 30th June, 1894, were :

Dutiable goods	$ 28,225,204
Free goods	13,296,580

Total$ 41,521,784

On these, the total duty collected was $8,431,987.22. From the United States, our imports were :

Dutiable goods.....	$25,823,635
Free goods.....	27,210,464

Total.....$53,034,109

On which the total duty collected was $6,960,950.68. Now, let us compare the total imports :

Total from United States.....	$53,034,100
do British Empire.....	41,521,784

Difference.....$11,512,316

The difference of duty collected was :

On imports from British Empire....	$8,431,987 22
do do United States.....	6,960,950 68

Difference.....$1,471,036 54

This statement shows that we imported from the United States $11,512,316 worth of goods more than from the British Empire, and levied upon them a lesser duty to the extent of $1,471,036.34 than upon the goods we imported from the British Empire. In the face of these facts, where is the foundation for all this cry of loyalty? It surely cannot be found by examining the tables of trade between the two countries. If the hon. gentlemen were sincere in their protestations of loyalty to the mother country, surely they would treat the British manufacturer with as much consideration as they do the

Mr. RIDER.

American manufacturer. Now, the figures of our total trade, exports and imports, are :

Total trade with United States.....	$ 82,331,698
do British Empire.....	107,660,393

Our trade with the United States, it seems, is nearly as large as that with the British Empire. This shows most conclusively the great need of having a system of freer trade between Canada and the United States. Our present trade with that country has been carried on under great disadvantages. There is a high tariff wall between the two countries, both ways, protected by an immense army of customs officials. This shows that the articles, a list of which I have given, that have passed between the two countries, are necessary articles. They are articles which we have exported simply because the United States market is the most convenient and the most practicable market for them. In comparing the position of the Canadian farmer with that of the United States farmer, I find that the Canadian farmer is labouring under a disadvantage to the extent of the greater cost of the articles which are his raw material. For instance, the markets of the British Empire are as free to the United States farmer as to the Canadian farmer for the sale of all his products; and if the United States farmer has an advantage over the Canadian farmer in getting, at a cheaper rate, his kerosene oil, fence wire, nails, agricultural machinery, artificial fertilizers, &c., he has that much advantage over the Canadian farmer in those markets. If, as the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) stated in the House the other evening, prices are as low in Canada as in the United States, why the need of this high tariff?

Mr. TAYLOR. To preserve the home market against slaughter goods.

Mr. RIDER. What the manufacturers of Canada or any other country require is a market; and I have confidence in the business capacity of our manufacturers to believe that if they have a fair and equal opportunity, they are able to compete with the manufacturers of any nation under the sun. To restrict them to the Canadian market alone is, I believe, a disadvantage to them; but just so long as they can control this market, the consumer is obliged to pay the amount of the duty over the price at which the same article can be got in the United States or elsewhere.

Mr. TAYLOR. Will the hon. gentleman tell us why the Americans keep a higher protection against Canadian and English manufactures than Canada does against the outside world?

Mr. RIDER. That is a question which is seriously discussed by the American people.

Mr. TAYLOR. How did they vote at the last election ?

Mr. RIDER. There are, perhaps, half the people of the United States, if not more, who believe that they have suffered in the development of their natural resources by the system of protection, which is in existence there. Of course, in many respects, the protection is greater there than it is here ; but we have copied their system, and have taken all its bad features, without any of its good ones. For instance, the United States farmer gets his artificial fertilizers free, while the Canadian farmer has to pay tribute to the manufacturer ; and will the hon. member for Leeds pretend, for one moment, that that is in the interest of the Canadian farmer ? Yet the farmers of the two countries are producing for the same market abroad, and whichever can produce to the best advantage is the one who will have a corresponding advantage over the other in the market. Now, we have in England a High Commissioner who is supposed to be looking after the welfare of Canada as a whole, and he has an opportunity of being well posted, and he ought to be able to give reliable information. What report did he make to the Finance Minister in regard to canned goods ? He wished to make it appear that there was a grand opportunity for Canada to go into the canning of meats, and this is what he said :

There is an immense consumption of canned meats amongst the poorer classes of this country, chiefly beef. The article is put up in attractive tins of 1 pound, 2 pounds, 4 pounds, 6 pounds and 14 pounds, and the wholesale price is about 4d. per pound. It is considered by those with whom I have consulted that the advantages existing in Canada are very favourable to the development of a trade of this kind.

He says further :

Canada should be able to compete on terms of considerable advantage with the United States, for not only is the price of meat lower than in the United States, but as tins are admitted free of duty, the canning also should be less expensive than in the neighbouring country.

No one on the opposite side will gainsay a word uttered by the High Commissioner, and we have the High Commissioner declaring that meats are cheaper here than in the United States. If that be the case, I would like to know how hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches can for a moment pretend that the duty on meat is of any advantage to the Canadian farmers. It is simply levied with a view of misleading the farmer, with a view of making him believe that this is a paternal Government, that it is watching after his interests. All this is done to keep him quiet and peaceful while the Government are extracting the contents of his pockets to be used in ways best known to them. The country is told that the Government are so solicitous about the welfare of the farmer that they have established an experimental farm in order to disseminate useful information. If we look at the expenditure on that farm, we should imagine that great benefits ought to be derived from it. There has been nearly a million dollars already expended on it, but I should like to know what benefit the farmers have ever got from it. Of course it is all very fine for hon. gentlemen opposite to exclaim : See what we are doing for the farmer, and no doubt some of our farmers are misled by these exclamations. They do not stop to consider who is the Minister of Agriculture. It seems to me that Ministers should be selected who are fitted to manage the departments over which they are called to preside. But we have, in the Minister called upon to preside over the Department of Agriculture, a gentleman who is a lawyer by profession. Why should a lawyer be given this position ? What can he know about agriculture ? What interest can he take in it ? Why, Sir, I question whether he could give a practical idea to the poorest of our farmers. What we want is a practical man to deal with questions affecting agriculture. Then look over the Auditor General's Report, and you will easily find illustrations of my remarks. It appears that there was a contract entered into by this Government in 1891, with a company known as the Haras National, of Montreal, for the hire of six stallions a year for five years, at the rate of $1,000 apiece, which means that the country will be called upon to pay $30,000 for the use of six stallions for the five years. And this is done for the benefit of the farmers. I do not believe there is a man in this House who would give $1,000 for the six stallions. Surely no hon. gentleman will venture to defend any such squandering of the people's money as this. In conclusion, I have to condemn the method adopted by the Government in dealing with the grave state of the finances of this country. Instead of meeting that unwelcome visitor, a deficit—the result of a system of extravagance unknown in the records of any previous Government—by retrenchment and economy, they propose to meet it by adding to the burdens of the people. Look over the Auditor General's Report for the past year. The least observant reader would be able to ascertain many ways in which savings might be effected without crippling the service of the country. There is not a department which is not spending large sums in excess of requirements ; and if the Government thought seriously of reducing expenses, they would have no difficulty in finding the means out of the Auditor General's Report. It is a good old saying that charity begins at home, and when the Government find that expenditures are going on a scale far outstripping the possible revenues of the country, they are bound to inaugurate a system of economy and retrenchment. But instead of this, what do we find? We find that although the population of Canada has not increased materially, the Government have found it necessary to increase the number of Her Majesty's advisers, until we now have fifteen Ministers and three Controllers to do business for less than 5,000,000 of people. It seems to me, if we take into consideration the number of Ministers of the Crown and compare it with the number of Ministers in England or the United States, the number we have is a serious reflection upon the capacity of those who now fill the treasury benches. The impression is abroad, and I believe it is growing, that the present occupants of the treasury benches are incapable and not qualified to deal with the business requirements of the country. With your permission, Sir, I will give you an idea of the expenses which are being incurred in the different departments, and the extracts from the Auditor General's Report, which I propose to give, are only samples of what can be found in nearly every department, so far as I have been able to ascertain. Here, for instance, is a bill of the travelling expenses of a public servant in the receipt of a yearly salary of $3,200 per year. The account which he sends in for travelling expenses is as follows:—

Deputy Minister ($809.99)—

To Ottawa Station, cabs, $8 ; street cars, 10c.....	$ 7 10	$ 1 00

Here is another bill of a similar character from a second-class clerk in the receipt of a salary of $1,400 per year :

Côté, I., paymaster, 33 trips ($1,821.28)—

Cabs : office to house, $13.50 ; to Ottawa station, $34.25 ; stations to hotels, $72.05 ; hotels to stations, $66.75 ; sundry, $87.75 ; from Ottawa station, $30.25	$ 304 55

Mr. RIDER.

That is pretty generous tipping, Mr. Speaker—I suppose that is what it is for.

Steamers, $37.30 ; boat-hire, $5.75 ; ferries, $2.55	45 60
Horse-hire, $57 ; team, Ste. Anne's to Murray Bay, &c., twice at $25....	107 00

Now, Sir, I believe we have a right to hold hon. Ministers who are paid each $8,000 a year for looking after this business, responsible for this state of affairs. It seems to me extravagant, extravagant in the extreme, that such bills as this should be allowed. This is simply an illustration of many bills that are brought in under similar circumstances and embracing like charges, and this state of affairs exists in nearly every department. Surely such a state of affairs cannot be upheld ; surely we have a right to expect the Ministers to whom are confided the affairs of the people as advisers of Her Majesty, and as heads of these departments, to keep a more watchful eye upon the expenses of the country. These things are evidence that ample opportunities exist for curtailing the expenditures without lessening the efficiency of the service.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he proposes to finish by six o'clock.

Mr. RIDER. I have still a good deal of matter here.

Mr. FOSTER. I would suggest that the hon. gentleman move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. RIDER moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to ; and House adjourned at six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 28th May, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 98) respecting the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix Railway Company. —(Mr. Amyot.)

Bill (No. 97) respecting the Clifton Suspension Bridge Company.—(Mr. Northrup.)

IMPORTATIONS OF RICE.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) asked, How many pounds of rice were imported between the 1st day of July, 1894, and the 1st day of May, 1895, both inclusive? How many pounds of rice uncleaned, unhulled or paddy were imported between the 1st day of July, 1894, and the 1st day of May, 1895, both inclusive?

Mr. WALLACE. The statistical records of this department at this date only admit of information on this subject for the nine months of the current fiscal year ended on the 31st day of March last, upon the close of the first quarter of this calendar year. If the hon. member requires the information down to the 1st day of May, as asked, it will take time to obtain the facts, as the request would necessitate a special circular to all collectors of customs throughout the Dominion directing them to forward the information. 1. I may say that the total quantity of rice imported into Canada from the 1st day of July, 1894, to 31st day of March, 1895, inclusive, was 6,068,729 pounds. 2. The quantity of rice uncleaned, unhulled or paddy imported into Canada from the 1st day of July, 1894, to the 31st day of March, 1895, inclusive, was 4,834,783 pounds.

WAKEFIELD AND RUPERT MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. DEVLIN asked, What changes, if any, have been made during the past year in the matter of the mail service between Wakefield and Rupert, in the county of Ottawa? If none, do the Government intend making any change?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No changes have been made in the mail service between Wakefield and Rupert during the past year. Application has been made for a daily mail, which is still under consideration.

PAYMENTS TO TEMPORARY CLERKS.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, What was the gross amount paid in each department of the Government, inside and outside service, during the last year for temporary clerks, giving each department separately, and the gross sum total paid?

Mr. FOSTER. As the question concerns all the departments and cannot be answered by any one in particular, it would be better for my hon. friend to move for an Order of the House.

MR. THOS. MALONE.

Mr. GUAY (for Mr. Langelier) asked, Why did the Government refuse to issue the usual Civil Service insurance policy to Thomas Malone, ex-Deputy Supervisor of Cullers at Three Rivers? Was the application for insurance not duly made by Mr. Malone some time before the superannuation? Is Mr. Malone not in receipt of a pension since his superannuation, and is it not customary for the Government to continue life insurance policies on superannuated officers and deduct the amount of premium from their pensions?

Mr. FOSTER. Shortly after Thomas Malone's application for a civil service insurance policy was received, a recommendation for his retirement was sent to Council by the department to which he was attached, and the application was held over pending the result of said recommendation. Mr. Malone was subsequently placed on the retired list, and a policy was not issued to him. The Government having been advised that, having regard to the true intent and meaning of the Civil Service Insurance Act, the primary object of which is to make provision for the families of persons dying in the service, a policy could not properly or legally be granted to the applicant. Mr. Malone is in receipt of a retiring allowance. The form of policy at present in use provides that in the event of a member of the civil service to whom a policy has been issued being placed on the retired list, the premiums shall be deducted from the retiring allowance of the insured, but no case has arisen in which the policy-holder has been placed on the retired list.

PONTIAC PACIFIC JUNCTION RAILWAY.

Mr. DEVLIN asked, How much was paid by the Government in the way of subsidy to the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway during the past year? For what portions of road constructed, and when were such portions constructed?

Mr. HAGGART. There was paid in the calendar year ended December, 1894, $18,750, as follows:—On the 60th and 70th mile, completed August, 1894, $16,192; balance of subsidy from Aylmer to 60th mile, completed September, 1894, $2,558; total, $18,750.

LETTER CARRIERS FOR HULL.

Mr. DEVLIN asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to appoint letter carriers for the city of Hull?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is not the intention of the Government to appoint letter carriers for the city of Hull at present.

GOVERNMENT SURVEYORS—OUTSIDE WORK.

Mr. DEVLIN asked, Do the Government permit permanent employees, such as surveyors or civil engineers to compete with outside surveyors and engineers and to engage in contracts which are not Government works ?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

DUTY ON CANADIAN TOBACCO.

Mr. GIROUARD (Two Mountains) asked, 1. What is the amount collected in 1894, for duty on Canadian tobacco ? 2. How many pounds of tobacco were so subjected to duty in 1894 ? 3. On what quantity was such duty levied in the years, 1885, 1886, 1887, 1888, 1889, 1890, 1891, 1892 and 1893, respectively ?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). 1. The amount collected in duty upon Canadian tobacco in 1894 was $19,547.32. 2. The quantity of Canadian tobacco so subjected to duty in 1894 was 390,946 pounds. 3. Such duty was levied on the following quantities of Canadian tobacco in the years mentioned :

	Pounds.
1886	346,471
1887	568,355
1888	708,873
1889	786,456
1890	632,035
1891	442,403
1892	468,962

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS IN CAPE BRETON.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, The cash receipts for freight and passengers at the several stations and ticket offices in Cape Breton for freight and passenger service over Cape Breton and other Government railways, for each year since the commencement of the operation of the line to the close of last fiscal year ? The number of miles of Government railways in Cape Breton, and the cost, per mile, for the operation of Government railways during the last fiscal year ?

Mr. HAGGART. It will take considerable time to prepare such a statement, as the cash received at each station has to be separated to ascertain the part belonging to the Government railways and the part belonging to other railways ; but the earnings at each station of the Cape Breton Railway for freight and passenger service over the Cape Breton and other Government railways, for each year, can be given in three or four days when I get the information from Moncton.

Question allowed to stand.

ATHLONE-TOTTENHAM MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. CHARLTON (for Mr. Mulock) asked, (a.) Has any contract been let in 1895 for carrying the mails between Athlone and

Mr. DEVLIN.

Tottenham ? (b.) If so, were tenders first invited ? (c.) Who tendered ? (d.) At what prices ? (e.) To whom was the contract let ? (f.) Was the lowest tender accepted ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes. Tenders were invited, but the notices were withdrawn, and the existing contract has been renewed for a further term. Tenders were not opened. The contract was awarded to S. E. Turner.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE.

Mr. CHARLTON (for Mr. Mulock) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to give representation to the graduates of the Royal Military College on the Board of Visitors of the College ? If so, when, and to what extent ?

Mr. DICKEY. The advisability of giving representation to graduates of the Royal Military College on the Board of Visitors has been under consideration in the department for some time. No decision has been arrived at yet.

PROCEEDINGS AGAINST EMMANUEL ST. LOUIS.

Mr. CASEY asked, What civil proceedings have been instituted against Emmanuel St. Louis ? When were they instituted ? What amounts were involved in each ? What result has been reached in any cases which have been decided ? What is the present state of such as are still pending ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. An information was laid in the Exchequer Court on the 18th October, 1894, claiming the sum of $143,881. This suit is now ready for trial. An application was made on the 7th January, 1895, returnable on the 10th January, asking the judge to fix the 29th January as the day for trial. This motion was enlarged by consent until the 12th January, and was again enlarged by order of the judge of the Exchequer Court until the 18th February upon the ground that the criminal proceedings against St. Louis were then going on and that by that date the criminal case would probably be over. On that date the criminal case not being concluded, and as it was impossible to say when it would be, the application to fix the date of the trial was dropped. On the 13th May Judge Desnoyers gave his decision on the criminal case, and instructions were at once given to the counsel for the Crown to apply to the court for the fixing of the day of trial. This application comes up for hearing on the 30th inst. The Crown has asked that the 20th June be the date fixed for the trial. I may add that the short delay which occurred before applying anew to the judge to fix the date of the trial was due to the necessity of communicating with Mr. Osler, counsel for the Crown, who lives in Toronto.

IMPERIAL TITLES.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to make an inquiry of the Government in reference to a matter that has been somewhat discussed in the country, that is, the conferring of Imperial titles on Canadian subjects. Are the titles conferred on the recommendation of the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of His Excellency, or by what authority? I would like to know for my own information, and I know there are many people throughout the country who would also like to have some information on the subject.

Mr. SPEAKER. Government orders.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I would like to have a reply to my question. I think it is a question which may be asked, and on which we should have information. If it is done by the will of the Imperial Government, we would like to know it; if it is done by representations from the Government here, we would like to know it.

Mr. FOSTER. Let the hon. gentleman put his question on the paper. It is a very unusual one; I think there is no precedent for having it asked in the House.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Well, we will create a precedent.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. RIDER. Mr. Speaker, when I had the privilege and honour of moving the adjournment of the debate on Wednesday last, I was proceeding to give you evidence to show that there was no necessity for levying fresh burdens on the people of this country with the object of meeting the difficulties now before us. In order to satisfy myself upon this point, I have been looking over the Auditor General's accounts to see where in economies might be made to relieve the people from such burdens, and I have prepared a list of the departmental employees and the salaries paid in 1878 as compared with 1894. You well know, Sir, that the Mackenzie Administration was accused of being very extravagant in the employment of civil service employees and in other ways, and that there was no necessity for so great an expenditure to be kept up. The statement I have prepared which shows an unnecessary and extravagant increase in

Salary paid.	Number in 1878.	Number in 1894.	Increase in Number	Increase in Salaries.
1,000	15	144	129	129,000
1,100	9	35	26	28,600
1,200	21	45	24	27,600
1,300	28	35	7	9,100
1,400	28	130	102	142,800
1,500	8	34	26	34,000
1,700	4	18	14	23,800
1,800	8	55	47	84,600
1,900	3	8	5	9,500
2,000	6	28	22	44,000
2,300	1	5	4	13,800
2,400	10	27	17	40,800
2,500	4	4	10,000
2,600	6	6	15,600
2,800	5	5	14,000
3,000	2	4	2	6,000
3,200	11	19	8	25,600
3,400	3	3	10,200
4,200	1	1	4,200
5,000	3	3	15,000
6,000	1	1	6,000
Totals ..	154	610	456	694,200

Making the number employed in 1878, receiving $1,000 and over, 154, being an increase in the number of 466, and an annual increase in salary of $694,200. It would seem, in view of this fact, and other expenses, when we compare the two Administrations, that there would be no necessity for resorting to increased or new taxation for the purpose of meeting the financial difficulties which we have to face at present. I find, also, in comparing the travelling expenses of Ministers and officials, under the two regimes that the difference is even greater. One of the faults charged by hon. gentlemen opposite against the Mackenzie Administration was the amount of these travelling expenses; and, therefore, it is but proper that the people who have not the opportunity of looking over the Auditor General's accounts, should have put before them the facts in as clear and precise a manner as possible. I find that the travelling expenses of Ministers and officials, including cab-hire, in 1878-79 amounted to $6,241.50. The travelling expenses of Ministers and officials, including street car fare and cab-hire, in 1893-94, amounted to $23,629.41; or there was over five times as much expended in 1894 as in 1878. Surely no one can pretend that this is not a controllable expenditure, entirely under the control of the Government. I find, also, that, notwithstanding the fact that there are at least ten lawyers in the present Government, no less a sum than $242,502 has been paid during the past two years for legal expenses, and that one individual in the city of Ottawa, Mr. D. O'Connor, received of this amount, $39,098.90 for legal expenses. This state of affairs should not be allowed to exist, and no doubt a great deal of the extravagance practised by the employees is due to the example set them by the Ministers. I was proceeding during the debate on Wednesday last to give you an idea of the travelling expenses incurred by some of the officials, as they go junketting about the country at the people's expense. I will give you another item in this connection. It is in the case of the private secretary of a Minister, in the receipt of salary as private secretary of $600 per year. That gentleman is also filling another position, that of second-class clerk, for which he receives a salary of $1,150, which, this year, will be increased to $1,200. Let us see the account of travelling expenses sent in by this official:

Private Secretary, 27 trips ($778.03)—
Cabs: to Ottawa station, $26.75; stations to hotels, $21.50; hotels to stations, $18.85; sundry, $54; from Ottawa station, $20.75.....	$141 85
Single fares: Ottawa and Montreal, 46 at $3.50, $161; sundry, $68.70.....	229 70
Fares to New York, Mar. 28, and return, $22; to Calumet and return, 2 at $3.10	28 20
Pullmans, $49; porters, $13.25; steamers, $5.....	67 25
Telegrams, $15.28; phones, $1.05; stationery, $1.....	17 33
Ry. to Chicago Fair grounds, $1.50; entrance-tickets to World's Fair, $3.....	4 50
Board, $255.20; American postage, $2..	257 20
Sundries not divided (waiters, bell-boys, papers, &c., in early accounts).....	14 40
Waiters, porters, bell-boys, car-boys, $9.15; newspapers, $3.05.....	12 20
Barber, $1.30; laundry, $1.50; cleaning boots, $1.60; 2 books, $1.....	5 40
	$778 03

Now, if this were a single case, it would not be worth while bringing it before this House, but it is simply an illustration of how the business of the departments at Ottawa is being conducted, and that at a time, too, when the country is passing through a financial crisis, when the Government finds itself face to face with an alarming deficit, and a continuously decreasing revenue. Instead of attacking the evil, instead of removing the root of the evil by reducing expenditure, as they are in duty bound to do, the Government resort to new taxation, and impose taxes on people without necessity. On that point, I think, I have stated sufficient to show that the Government have not adopted the right course in meeting our financial difficulties; and I shall now, with your kind permission, Mr. Speaker, proceed to say a few words in connection with what is known as the so-called National Policy. Hon. gentlemen opposite pretend to have as much confidence in the National Policy at present as a panacea for all our financial ills as they had when they first adopted it in 1878. Let us review our export trade, and find how much it owes to the National Policy. I find that our total exports from the mines, fisheries, forests, farms, and manufactures, are a little over $100,000,000. Of this amount the manufacturers sent out $7,692,000, but of this item there was nearly $1,000,000 set down as household effects—effects of people who are leaving the country. When we deduct this, we find that less than $7,000,000 is the extent of the exports sent out by our manufacturers. From this it is evident that those manufacturers who are making enormous wealth under the influence of the National Policy, are not making it by the creation of a new trade, or by trade with foreigners bringing foreign wealth into the country, but are simply making it out of our own people, without adding any new wealth to the country whatever. There was a time when in nearly every village, we had our carriage makers and other small manufacturers; but, under the operation of this policy, which facilitates the formation of combines, these have all disappeared, greatly to the disadvantage of the communities in which they were situated. I believe, Sir, that this policy known as the National Policy, so far from being what was pictured to the country in 1878, has proved a most ignominious failure; and I believe the most sanguine of the supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite, must accept one of two conclusions—either that the National Policy is a bad policy, or that it has fallen into mighty bad keeping.

Mr. RIDER.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Both.

Mr. RIDER. I believe, Sir, that both are true, that this policy is bad, and that it has fallen into bad hands. I believe a good policy in bad hands will produce worse results than a bad policy in good hands. And in view of the results we have seen, it seems to me it is the duty of this Government to reform, and I believe they will have to reform matters or the people will take them in hand and reform them themselves. I wish to say but a few words in connection with some of the commercial ventures of this Government. The farmers of this country, a few months ago, were considerably stirred with the prospect of a home market. The Government was proposing to pay 20 cents per pound for butter with the idea, as they professed, of helping to build up a reputation for Canadian butter in foreign lands. If we look back we will find that it seemed to be very near election time, and, no doubt it was thought to be a very fine thing with the farmers to have a home market at last, the home market which has been so long promised and never realized. Now, when we find that the butter bearing the imprint of this Canadian Government is being sold at a loss of from 5 to 7 cents per pound, it surely reflects badly upon the business standing of the Government in foreign lands; and I believe that nothing has been done that will so much depreciate the value of this most important Canadian product, as the course adopted in this case by the Government. It would seem that the Government has been in truth doing those things that it ought not to have done and leaving undone those things that it ought to have done. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I believe that there never was a time when the public mind was in a more receptive mood. I believe that the people are studying the financial affairs and the fiscal policy of the Government as they never did before, and that when they have the opportunity of pronouncing judgment they will declare that there has been a great discrepancy between promise and performance on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite. Sir, I beg to thank hon. members for the kind attention with which they have listened to me in this debate.

Mr. RYCKMAN. Mr. Speaker. I have the honour to be one of the representatives of the city of Hamilton, the birthplace, I may say, of the National Policy, and the chief manufacturing centre in this Dominion. I have listened to hon. gentlemen opposite during this discussion condemn the National Policy and condemn the manufacturers of this country, and I feel that I cannot let this opportunity pass without taking some part in the discussion, for I have seen the benefits which have followed the building up of manufactures in our own city, benefits accruing not only to our own citizens but to the farmers for twenty miles around the city. Every member in this House and thousands of people out of it will remember the bad times during the Mackenzie regime. All are aware that the workshops during that time were deserted and that hundreds and thousands of workmen were walking the streets of our cities unable to find employment. But what took place when the protective policy was brought in by the Conservative party? The workshops were opened, capital came in and labour was employed. I can give you instances in my own city of Hamilton. Near the Grand Trunk station we have a large rolling-mill, whose great chimney stood smokeless and idle during the years of the Mackenzie administration. But after the protective policy came into force, capitalists came in and operated these mills, engaged hundreds of willing workmen, and have since paid out hundreds of thousands of dollars in wages. Then there were the works known as Beckett's foundry, a large brick building. The friends of hon. gentlemen opposite used that building for political meetings in 1878, as the works were not running. But after the protective policy was inaugurated all was changed, the cotton factory was started, the shuttles commenced to fly, hundreds and hundreds of hands were employed—men and women, girls and boys—and since then wages to the extent of hundreds of thousands of dollars have been earned and paid there. Of course, hon. gentlemen opposite say that times are not as good as they were. We admit that. There has been great depression all over the world, affecting even the greatest nations on earth. In Great Britain they have done everything they could to relieve the distress of their people, but they have not succeeded as they expected. Take again the United States, with the highest protective tariff in the world—they have had their troubles there also; their people have been out of work, their trusts have been forced to the wall, national banks have broken down by the hundred. But in this young country only one bank went to the wall. We have stood the pressure and have carried on our business still. We have suffered from the shock, but to a less degree than other countries, and I believe that the policy of moderate protection will soon again bring us into a condition of prosperity. Hon. gentlemen say that shops and factories are not increasing. In the city of Hamilton, we have a large malleable iron works which has just finished an extensive addition intended for the manufacture of scales and other products of iron. We have under construction a smelting works in which will be invested probably $400,000. This industry will give employment not only to men in Hamilton, but also to men engaged in the mines, to men manufacturing dynamite, to men making tools, to railway men who transfer the goods—it is almost impossible to predict the benefits that will flow from the establishment of this industry to the working-people of the country. We find also, that as a result the natural resources of the country in the way of iron mines will be developed to a great extent. Only last week I was informed of a new industry to be started in the city of Guelph, in the form of a rolling-mill which will manufacture a line of goods not now produced in this country. This is a high grade of iron, known as Norway iron. One of the directors of the company told me that he had had a conversation with a member of the firm of Goldie & McCulloch who said they had to import this iron hitherto and was glad that hereafter they would be able to purchase it at home. These are but indications of what is being done, and I believe that new factories are being developed to a greater extent than many people have any idea of. Now, Sir, the manufacturers of this country, of course, anticipated the depression in other countries and they, as far as possible unloaded their goods, and have no accumulated stocks on hand. I feel satisfied for some years to come these manufactories will go on manufacturing the supplies this country requires and that the demand will keep their men employed. I claim that the workmen of this country are greatly assisted and protected by the National Policy. Just as soon as this protective policy is changed, just so soon will the manufacturers of this country find it necessary to close their works or reduce the pay of their men. On the contrary, the policy of this Liberal-Conservative Government has been to secure good wages for the working-people and in every way promote their interests. Let me give you an instance. I remember that in 1877, there was a cargo of furniture shipped from the United States to the city of Hamilton. The consignee rented a large flat, unloaded his goods, and called in an auctioneer. The auctioneer got up on his table and announced to the public that they had just brought over from the United States a large cargo of furniture, bedsteads, sofas, chairs, and all kinds of fancy ware, which they were offering for sale, and which must be sold under the hammer for what it would bring. The auctioneer spoke to the people in this way: "Gentlemen, now is your time, these goods are brought from the United States, and a forced sale has got to be made, so now is the time to invest your money." Such instances as that were frequent during the time the Mackenzie Government were in power. Now, I will show you, Mr. Speaker, how the Americans are trying to crush out our manufactures. Wherever they find only one firm manufacturing any particular line of goods, they take every possible means to run them out and close them up, and so control our market. I wrote to one of the manufacturers in the city of Hamilton in 1891, asking him for information on this subject, and this was the reply he made me:

S. S. Ryckman, Esq., M.P.

My dear Sir,—Yours of 17th inst. received and contents noted. I am always pleased to give you any information that I have in regard to the matter you ask. The facts of the case is this: During the Mackenzie reign, and when the country was suffering from the unequal competition of the American manufacturers, we, along with every Canadian manufacturer, felt the bad effects of the goods that were thrown into this market, and we resolved to get even with one American house that were trying to wipe us out, we being the only competitor that they had in their line—one line of goods in particular, which will show how they were slaughtering goods in our market. I refer to an article in the harness business known by the name of rein-snaps. These were sold in the American market at \$5.50 per gross for $\frac{3}{4}$ —the same size sold in Canada, \$2.50 per gross, F.O.B. at New Haven; of course, freight and duty to add, and which after delivery the goods were away below what they could be made for, and left us out in the cold. We thought, being a large wholesale house, would be the best house for us to order through, and concluded it was better to buy them than make them, and, as we wanted to teach our competitors a lesson, we wanted to buy through them a large lot of the lock snaps, and did buy \$1,000 worth. Our arrangement with the firm in Hamilton was for them to buy for us \$1,000 worth of the lock snaps, and we to take them out of bond, paying our own freight and duty, they to receive 5 per cent for their commission. Of course, they did not see what we wanted the goods for, or they would not have entered into the arrangement; they only saw 5 per cent. We made them give us a written agreement, in black and white, they agreeing to fill the contract. Well, when the first shipment came along, for about \$500 worth, they commenced to think something was wrong, and refused to supply any more, but we threatened a suit for damages, and they had to deliver. When we got them all in Hamilton in bond, we paid the firm and then shipped all the goods through to Detroit in bond. So we had the goods in Detroit, less the freight, at \$2.50 per gross. Then we sent our traveller, Charles Carpenter, whom you know to be a staunch Grit, to Detroit to get the goods, and he commenced to place them on the American market, commencing at New York and finishing at St. Louis, selling in small quantities; and their own goods at \$3.00 per gross, or \$2.50 per gross less than they could buy them at home.

I think this is a pretty strong case as showing the way in which the Americans try to crush out manufactures in this country. Now, Sir, I claim that business men generally, other than manufacturers, are benefited by the protection which the National Policy affords. I may mention that I myself have been in the grocery business in the city of Hamilton, and during one period of six years that I carried on a business aggregating about $300,000, we did not lose $25 in bad debts. For the last year or two I have been carrying on business to the extent of about $60,000 a year, and so able are the people to pay for what they purchase, that we have not lost $5 in bad debts; and I may say that our trade is mostly with farmers and mechanics. That is one fact showing that business men generally are benefited by this policy. The life insurance men also are protected, because many mechanics and workmen in towns and cities are carrying a small life insurance for the protection of their families, and as long as they are able to get work, as they do now under the National Policy, they are able to pay their premiums. Now Sir, the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) referred to the duty on sugar, and said there was a great difference in price between England and Montreal. Well, I have been largely dealing in sugar, and this spring I purchased 125 bags of German sugar, which I found an inferior article to what is sold in this country. It is made from beet root. For $1 we had to give three pounds more of that German granulated sugar than of the Redpath sugar, but the difference in price is owing to the inferior quality of the former. Now I will refer to the home market. This is a most important subject in discussing the trade policy of the country. Prior to the inauguration of the protective policy it was contended that the result would be to largely increase home production and home consumption, and that contention has been borne out over and over again. Wherever manufacturing industries have been established, a greater number of men have been employed in those industries, and all these men are consumers of manufactured goods and of farm products. There is a vast quantity of vegetables and perishable articles which farmers are not able to ship out of the country, but for which they find a ready sale in the home market, wherever manufacturing business is carried on, because the people have the ready money to pay for those goods. I may say that the farming community for twenty miles about Hamilton find a ready market for their fruit and vegetables. If the farmers were obliged to export those goods, the goods would have to pass through the hands of one or two commission merchants, who would eat up the profits which the farmers now keep for themselves by selling direct to the consumers. I may say that the farmers surrounding Hamilton supply themselves with groceries and a great part of their clothing by the sale of their vegetables and other farm produce in the home market supplied them to-day by the protective policy. So, I claim that the farmers are greatly benefited in that way. All kinds of farm produce meets with ready sale in the city of Hamilton. I contend that the protective policy, instead of having benefited the manufacturers at the expense of the farmers, has benefited the latter class as well as the former. A careful estimate places the entire product of the Ontario farms at $500,000,000, of which about one-tenth is exported, the balance being used for home consumption. This proves that the home market is, by all odds, the best for our farmers. The question to be asked is, Would it be well to jeopardize the home market, which consumes so large a portion of our agricultural products, for the possible good that might arise from the free entry of the one-tenth we have to spare into the markets of the United States? Time and time again the people have said, no. It is claimed that Canada has not prospered under the National Policy, but statistics prove the very reverse. Take the case of our farming population, for instance, and see how it compares with the farming population in the United States. According to the reports of the Ontario Bureau of Industries—and hon. gentlemen opposite will not question the truth of statements issued from that quarter—the value of farm lands, buildings, implements, and live stock in Ontario in 1882 was $882,624,610, while in 1889 it was $982,210,664, an increase of nearly one hundred millions of dollars in seven years in the wealth of the farmers of the province of Ontario alone. Take the condition of the Canadian and American farmers to-day, and what do we find?

The farms in the Dominion of Canada are mortgaged to the extent of about $80,000,000, and it is a well-known fact that the greater part of this indebtedness has been incurred in order to improve old farms or acquire new ones. The New York "Times," one of the most reliable journals in the United States, recently made the following statement:—

The farms in our state (New York) are mortgaged for over $700,000,000. * * * The farmers of the United States are staggering under a burden of mortgage indebtedness approximating nine thousand millions of dollars. The greater portion of the money represented by the faces of these mortgages has not been expended in improving the farms, because the larger proportion were supplied with buildings before the mortgages were laid. The money has been spent to enable the farmers to live.

It is contended that our farmers would be benefited greatly by obtaining free admission for their products into the United States markets. Why? The United States export agricultural products every year to the value of $400,000,000, after supplying home consumption; so it is apparent that it would not be of very great advantage to our farmers to compete in a market already overstocked. Unrestricted reciprocity of trade with the United States would, moreover, seriously affect our trade with Great Britain, for the policy means, if it means anything, that we would have to meet the same duty there as the rest of the world, including the United States, has to meet. In 1878 our exports of animals and their products to Great Britain amounted to the value of $9,060,279, while to the United States it was of the value of $4,483,206; in 1890, the same class of exports to Great Britain amounted to the value of $18,578,722, while to the United States the value was only $5,906,474. So we see the home market was altogether more satisfactory to our farmers. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Rider) referred in the course of his speech to the expenditure on the experimental farm. I was under the impression that hon. gentlemen opposite were the great friends of the farmers; yet they claim that the Government should not have expended so large a sum in furnishing means to educate our farmers in the highest degree possible in regard to agriculture. I am sure the Government have taken all possible means to instruct our farmers, they have issued books of various kinds, and have engaged men of great experience as lecturers, and have adopted other methods to give our products high standing, not only in Canada, but throughout the world, and when the hon. gentleman found fault with the expenditure on the experimental farm, I thought he was certainly not very friendly to the farming community of this country. Diversity of industry is necessary to complete success. No nation that ever attained to greatness depends on a single industry. Not many years have elapsed since Canada possessed few industries, but, within recent years, a great advance has been made in that respect. A reference to the Statistical Year-Book shows that in Canada in 1881 the capital invested in manufactures only amounted to $7,000,000, with a total yearly output of $209,000,000, and in the past ten years these amounts have been vastly increased, nearly, if not quite, 100 per cent; and I am proud to say that nowhere has that increase been more marked than in the city of Hamilton. When we think of the large amount of wages paid out, and the number of hands employed, the figures speak volumes for our industries, and they indicate the excellent prospects of our Dominion. The public generally are beginning to see—not only Conservatives, but Reformers—that the policy of protection is the best policy for this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite are in the habit of speaking to farmers who live away from manufacturing cities and they tell them that the manufacturers are destroying them and ruining them, and making them pay heavier taxes than they should pay. I will be able to show you, Mr. Speaker, that those who live in the neighbourhood of cities and in manufacturing centres appreciate the benefits conferred upon them by the protective policy and, to my knowledge, in many cases they have set their political feelings aside and have voted for the National Policy, because they know it is to their own interests to do so. There was a by-election in the city of Hamilton about two weeks previous to the last Dominion election, and the Hon. J. M. Gibson, a Liberal, was elected to the Ontario Assembly at that by-election by over 700 majority. But in spite of that, two weeks after, Mr. McKay and myself were elected supporters of the National Policy by over 600 majority. That proves that over 1,000 Reform votes wheeled into line in support of our protective system. Hamilton was generally known as a Reform city, but lately its people have begun to see that the National Policy is for the benefit of property holders and wage-earners, and all classes of the community, and they now support that policy. I remember, Mr. Speaker, that in the time of the Mackenzie Government you could walk street after street in Hamilton and see "To Lets" on dozens of vacant houses. That is altered now, and bankers, and merchants, and the people generally, know that the change is to be attributed to the policy of the present Government. Our American friends protect their manufactures, and they protect their people as well. If one of our sons goes over to work in the United States the first reception he gets is, that they tap him on the shoulder and say: Young man, go home; whereas we allow United States citizens to come into Canada and take their chances with the rest of us. Now, Mr.

Mr. RYCKMAN.

Speaker, I claim that Canada has made more progress than any other country under the sun, considering her age and population. The high standard of our products prove this. Our cheese ranks as high as that of any other country in the world. Take our apples, our wheat, our barley, our beef and mutton, and they are prized in every market to which we send them. I may say, Sir, that during the latter part of this week I visited New York city, and I was taking dinner with a friend, who said to me: Mr. Ryckman, I suppose you will be glad to have a little Canadian lamb. I replied that I would be glad at any time to take anything Canadian. "Do you know," said my friend, "we pay 3 cents more a pound for Canadian than for American lamb here." I asked, "How is that?" and the answer was: "I do not know whether it is the breed or not, or whether it is fed better, but, at all events, we pay it because we like it better." That shows you, Mr. Speaker, that our products are valued in the American markets. Take our institutions, and we find that they are equal, if not superior, to those of any other country. Our banking system is good, and no one can find fault with it. Our postal system is good. In fact, an American gentleman wrote me last year asking me for some information with regard to our post office order system, and he said that they wanted to improve their system in the United States, and they thought that by adopting something such as we have in Canada they would be much better off. We all know, Sir, that our national credit stands high in the money markets of the world. Let me ask: What have hon. gentlemen opposite to offer to the people of this country in lieu of the policy of the present Government? What policy do they propose to the farmers and to the people of this country generally, at the next election? They have latterly announced that they are in favour of free trade. Well, Sir, if they go to the country on that cry, I have not the slightest doubt that they will be beaten worse than in any previous election since confederation. We are lying alongside a great nation to the south of us with a high protective system in force; and how, in view of that, can any political party honestly appeal to the electorate of this young country on such a policy as free trade? I remember that not very long ago, the Liberal party was not quite so pronounced on the question of free trade as they seem to be at present, and when they shifted their policy around from one scheme to the other. At the present time they are following a somewhat similar course. To the farmers they say: We will give you free trade; but when they are speaking in a manufacturing centre, their cry is: Gentlemen, manufacturers, we are not going to hurt you very much; your protection has got to come down sooner or later, but we will take it down by degrees.

The people of Canada have seventeen years' experience of the policy of the Conservative party, and I have no doubt that at the next election they will support it with greater enthusiasm than ever before. Let me point out to you, Mr. Speaker, some of the progress made by Canada under the National Policy, and I will do so by comparing the year 1881 with the year 1891. In the manufacture of textile fabrics and dress, including cotton and woollen goods, boots and shoes factories, tailors and clothiers, dressmakers, &c., in 1881, there were 10,163 establishments and 60,617 employes. In 1891, there were 17,650 establishments and 80,662 employes. In the industries connected with paper, including printing establishments, the increase in the ten years was 48 per cent in the establishments, and 53 per cent in the number of employes. In the manufacture of machines, tools and implements the increase in the ten years was nearly 30 per cent for employes and the same for establishments. The value of the machinery and tools in the industrial establishments of the Dominion in 1891 was $80,803,265. The total number of industrial establishments in Canada in 1881 was 49,923, with 254,935 employes. In 1891, there were 75,765 establishments and 367,496 employes. In the years between 1875 and 1878, when hon. gentlemen opposite ruled the destinies of the country, thousands upon thousands of young men were unable to get employment at home, and were compelled to seek a livelihood upon a foreign soil and under a foreign flag. But, Sir, when the National Policy was adopted in 1878, manufactories and industrial establishments were started, and those young men, previously exiled from Canada were able to find remunerative occupation at home. Our country has great resources; as great as those of any country in the world. We have valuable timber lands, almost inexhaustible mineral resources, productive agricultural lands, and teeming fisheries. We have a fine class of people, good, honest, hard-working men, who love their country, and who are capable of developing it, and under our present protective system there cannot be a doubt that the energy of our people will cause Canada to progress. It must not be forgotten, however, that this Reform party has a record of its own—that its ability to govern this country has been tested fairly in the past, for it held the reins of power in the Dominion for a period of five years. They promised a millenium of prosperity when they obtained office in 1873, and you can all remember the result. Instead of prosperity, there was an era of disaster, distress and deficits such as was never known before or since in the history of Canada. It was no wonder that the people, when the opportunity arrived, swept them out of power, and it is no wonder they have kept them out ever since. Under the Conservative Government, the protection of Canada will continue, and our people will continue to enjoy prosperity as they do now; for I see no chance of the Liberals getting into power so long as our Liberal-Conservative Government adhere to the policy now in force, that is, the policy of regulating our tariff to suit a young country like Canada. So long as they do that, I think they will be satisfactory to the people of this country, and when the next general elections come round, our friends of the Opposition will find that the policy of protection will be endorsed by the ballots of the people. I do not know what the manufacturers of this country will think; but I know that the manufacturers of the city of Hamilton are rather modest people, and, when the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) gets up here and declares that the manufacturers are plunderers who are taking money out of the pockets of the people, they will, of course, regard his remarks as applying not only to the manufacturers, but to the men they employ, the workingmen; and I think the manufacturers and the workingmen of this country will show their appreciation of the hon. gentleman's remarks when they cast their ballots at the next general elections.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Ryckman) took great credit to the National Policy for the starting of the Hamilton Rolling Mills, which he said had been standing idle up to 1878 on account of the trade policy of the Mackenzie Government. When half the truth is told, and only half the truth, it is very misleading; and the hon. gentleman ought to have told this House and the people of the city from which he comes, the real reason why the Hamilton Rolling Mills were lying idle. Those mills were owned by the Great Western Railway Company, and steel rails became so cheap that the company were obliged to abandon the rolling mills which they had used for years for re-rolling the old iron rails. When iron rails were set aside, and steel rails were introduced, the Great Western Company had no further use for the rolling mills. But the hon. gentleman forgot to tell the House that after the National Policy came into operation, in the first year of the existence of the Hamilton Rolling Mills Company under it, they paid a dividend of 75 per cent on their capital; and to-day the same company enjoy a protection of from 30 to 75 per cent—I will not imitate the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he talks of three thousand per cent, which is a kind of calculation which no member of this House understands except himself. My hon. friend from Hamilton also spoke of the foundries in that city running full blast. I would like to tell him and this House that the Hamilton foundries were standing idle for months during the winter; but, because they thought that a general election was about to take place, the Conservative rooms in the city of Hamilton were opened, and the old placards and the old flag and the old brag and the old swag were unfurled to the breeze, the Tory owners of the Hamilton foundries at once set them to work. I dare say that if they had been in the secret of the Government, their men would have been idle still. My hon. friend spoke of the building trade of Hamilton being bad during the time of the Mackenzie Government. Let me tell him, after an experience of twenty-five years in this country, that the building trade of Canada was never in a worse condition than it is to-day. In the very city the hon. gentleman represents he will find hundreds of idle workmen walking around looking for work. It is true, they are laying macadam on the streets; but an acquaintance of mine there yesterday told me that the workmen were only getting an hour or two of work when the contractors saw fit to give it to them. My hon. friend might have told this House how the National Policy had driven R. M. Wauzler out of his factory in Hamilton, a man whose name was known throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion, and, in fact, in every part of the world where his machines were introduced; but, owing to the protective duties imposed on his raw material, his business was destroyed, and his factory closed. Then, my hon. friend spoke of the smelting works about to be started in the city of Hamilton. I trust that those works will be started, and that they will cost $400,000, as he says they will; but the cost, so far, has been borne by the citizens of Hamilton, who passed a by-law providing that if a certain sum of money was spent in the starting of smelting works, the city would grant a bonus of both land and money; and so far, whether the money has been spent or not, the company have been able to induce the people of Hamilton to give them the money and the land, and that is all that has come of the smelting works, so far as I can see. The building was of so permanent a character that the first gale of wind which swept across the district from which I come, blew to the ground one of those tall chimneys we have heard so much about. My hon. friend also talks of sugar. I do not know where he gets his information; but when we were fighting the sugar combine of Nova Scotia, some of his Conservative friends came to me and asked me to prevent, as far as lay in my power, the organization of the sugar combine that was going to be formed in Halifax. They said it would control the trade of the east, while the Montreal combine would control the trade of the west, and the whole sugar trade of the country would be at the mercy of these two combines. One of these gentlemen told me that when they imported sugar from abroad they were able to make money, but to-day when any one has the courage to import sugar, a doubt is expressed by the customs authorities as to the value of the sugar, it is detained for an examination, and scrutinized; and when, at last, it is passed through the custom-house, the price of sugar drops, the importer has to sacrifice his sugar, and then the combines raise the price to the old figure again. My hon. friend also spoke about the postal service of Canada. Perhaps he is not aware that the postal service of Canada is a branch of the general postal service of Great Britain, and that the United States have as much to do with the postal arrangement between the two countries as the Canadian authorities have, and I am glad to say that on both sides of the line the most amicable postal arrangements are carried on. The hon. gentleman said he would like to know what the Liberal party have to offer the farmers. Well, I can tell him that what we offer the farmers is taxes for revenue only, economy in administration, and no boodling. We were told last session by the late First Minister, who, I regret, has departed, that we would not be able, for some years to come, to get experimental farm reports, because the Government had to economize. The first economy they were to practice was upon the farmer; and if we have to wait until this amount of money is saved by this reckless and extravagant Government, the farmers will never receive a report of the experimental farm. My good friend spoke of young Canadians in the United States coming back to Canada. I regret that too few of them come back; but I have this to say, that our Canadian young men, when they go to the States, are able to take positions there which are alike a credit to themselves and an honour to the country from which they come. There is scarcely a factory or a Government work, or a work of any importance that is not directly or indirectly administered by Canadian young men, and they enjoy the most implicit confidence of their employers. The hon. gentleman says that the National Policy is a benefit to the country, to the farmer and to the merchant. It is not a benefit to all the manufacturers, but only to the favoured few who have the ear of the Government, and for whom the Finance Minister is the mouthpiece on certain occasions. Let me read you this extract from the report of the annual meeting, this year, of the shareholders of the Montreal Cotton Company:

At the annual meeting of the shareholders of the Montreal Cotton Company, which was held to-day, very satisfactory reports of the year's operations were submitted. The profits for the year were $174,628.28, being about 15 per cent on the capital of $1,200,000. A dividend of 8 per cent, amounting to $84,000, was paid to the shareholders, being 8 per cent for the first nine months on $1,000,000, and on $1,200,000 for the last quarter of the year; $15,000 was taken off the building account, $25,000 put aside for wear and tear of machinery, and $19,000 taken off for new flumes, making a total of $59,000. There was carried forward to the surplus account $75,652.49. This account now stands at $721,586.55, being over 60 per cent on the capital stock. During the year the company paid $211,616.58 in wages. The balance-sheet shows a total of $2,561,981.91. The only liability of the company is $300,000 7 per cent bonds, which fall due on May 1 next, for payment of which $200,000 new stock has been issued at par. The first call of 50 per cent was paid on January 15 last, and the last call is payable on March 15th next. This will increase the capital $1,400,000, the company being free of all incumbrances.

Now, the other night the Minister of Railways and Canals wanted to show that the province of Ontario had increased in ten years $95,000,000 in wealth. He said that in lands there was a decrease but that the increase was in the buildings, the implements and the live stock. But where are the buildings? Does the hon. Minister pretend to say that the buildings have been stolen? Are they not still on the land? And where are the implements? To whom do they belong? Not to the farmers, I am sorry to say, but to the manufacturers who hold a rod of iron over the backs of the farmers and exact heavy interest on the unpaid portion of these implements. I would like to state for the information of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Ryckman), a few facts in connection with the depreciation of land in Ontario. This is no problematical or hypothetical statement at all, but it is the actual facts furnished by a company, from the very city which the hon. gentleman has the honour to represent. Well, this company states that lands have depreciated as follows:—

Counties—	Per cent.
Essex, Kent and Lambton.....	30 to 40
Huron, Bruce and Grey.....	40
Elgin, Oxford and parts of Middlesex.	20 to 30
Wellington and Simcoe.....	30 to 40
Ontario, Durham and Northumberland	35
Hastings and Prince Edward.....	35 to 50
Lennox and Frontenac.....	40 to 50
Dundas, Stormont and Russell.....	25 to 30

In the township of St. Vincent, county of Grey, 161 acres of land, which were valued in 1887 at $5,500, the company is prepared to sell to-day for $3,500, or a depreciation of $3,000.

In the township of Arran, county of Bruce, 100 acres of land, which were valued in 1887 at $2,500, were sold last year by the company for $1,200.

In the township of Kincardine, county of Bruce, 150 acres, valued in 1879 at $5,000, were sold in 1894 for $2,000.

In the township of Goderich, county of Huron, a farm of 180 acres, valued in 1886 at $6,000, is now offered by the company at $3,500.

In the township of Camden, county of Kent, a farm of 150 acres, valued in 1888 at $10,500, was sold in 1894 at $7,500.

In the township of Anderdon, county of Essex, a farm of 100 acres, valued in 1886 at $6,000, is now offered for sale by the company at $2,800.

In the township of Hallawell, Prince Edward county, 174 acres, valued in 1889 at $7,500, the company will now sell for $3,000.

In the township of Athol, Prince Edward county, 100 acres of land, valued in 1887 at $5,000, the company will now sell at $2,800.

In the township of Fredericksburg, Lennox county, a farm of 200 acres, which was valued at and sold in 1879 for $14,000, cash, the company is offering for sale now at $8,500, and the best offer they have got, so far, is $7,500.

The company add:

There are many cases yet similar to these that could be given, and, from the experience of the society, we consider the estimate given above as to the shrinkage in value quite moderate. As to the towns and villages in western Ontario—for instance, Harriston, Wallaceburg, Essex Centre, Chatham, Collingwood and nearly all towns of similar size and population—they have depreciated nearly 50 per cent in value.

The hon. gentleman has said that protection has done a great deal for the workingman and that it has raised his condition. I would like to read to this House what Macaulay says in this connection:

Our rulers will best promote the improvements of the nation by strictly confining themselves to their own legitimate duties, by leaving capital to find its most lucrative course, commodities their fair price, industry and intelligence their natural reward, idleness and folly their natural punishment, maintaining peace by defending property, by diminishing the price of law, and by observing strict economy in every department of the state. Let the Government do this; the people will assuredly do the rest.

How does this apply to our Government, with their Curran bridges, Tay canals, Langevin blocks, and Kingston graving docks? The ex-Minister of Militia (Mr. Patterson), in one of his campaign speeches, is reported to have said that the Hon. Alex. Mackenzie was the man who built the Tay Canal. Was ever such a slander cast upon an honest man as this? But no doubt it is in keeping with the statement made by the same gentleman that if the Government failed in ballots they could use bullets to secure their election. Fancy the late Mr. Mackenzie consenting to a work that cost $470,000, the annual outlay in interest on which is $18,815, the annual expenditure of operating which is $2,500, and the cost of maintenance, $2,000 per mile, or $12,000 for the six miles, making in all an annual expenditure on a canal of six miles long of $33,315, and for the whole of this annual outlay of $33,315, the people of Canada had the satisfaction in 1891 of receiving $58.81, and in 1894, $130.62, total revenue. This is in keeping with the whole of the work, and this was done, Mr. Speaker, to compete with the Canadian Pacific Railway. The people of this country spend $33,315 a year in order that the people of Perth may use this canal, to the increase of the revenue of the country by from $130 to $150 a year. Then we have our Curran bridge, and I am glad the Solicitor General is in his place, because he knows something about the work in connection with this famous enterprise. The total cost, as given by the Government's engineer's report, was $490,725. The total estimated cost was $170,000, or a difference between the estimated cost and the actual cost of $320,725. This estimate of $170,000 as the cost of the bridge was made by the late Mr. Page, chief engineer of canals. We have never had before, and I doubt that we shall ever have again a man more capable of carrying on the duties of his department than Mr. Page. The name of Mr. Page was never touched by the breath of scandal. No contractor of experience would hesitate to undertake any piece of work under the estimate made by Mr. Page, and no estimate made by him and submitted to this House, either when Mr. Mackenzie was in power or under this Conservative Government, had to be increased. When Mr. Page reported this estimate of $170,000 for the bridge, Mr. Hannaford, of the Grand Trunk Railway, expressed his willingness to undertake the work for the amount. But that was not the policy of the Government. They allowed months to elapse, and then, at the eleventh hour they offered the work to the Grand Trunk, providing they would guarantee the opening of navigation on the 1st of May. But Mr. Hannaford, as the engineer of a great corporation like the Grand Trunk Railway Company, was not going to place his company at the mercy of the Government, and he very properly refused to undertake the work upon the terms offered. Then our friend St. Louis was called in to do the work. And how well he managed it! According to the report of the commissioners, it was reported by the engineer in charge that on 1st March, 1893, three-quarters of the stone on Wellington Street bridge had been cut, the work occupying 17,259 hours. But to finish the last quarter of this work required 32,804 hours. And on the Grand Trunk bridge, on the same date, 1st March, 1893, half of the stone was cut, 5,115 hours having been occupied in cutting it. But to cut the remainder of the stone required 52,075 hours, or a total of 57,190 hours. And for lock No. 1, Mr. Speaker, it actually cost the Government no less than $67 a yard to cut the stone. Why, as a practical man, I would cut the faces of all the members of the Cabinet and the two Controllers on every stone at that price per cubic yard, and I would throw in the Solicitor General in full length as being the best-looking member of the Government. Why, Mr. Speaker, they went out of their way to find means of spending the money. There was a railway running from the quarries at Terrebonne to the line of the Grand Trunk, from which the stone could have been unloaded upon the works. But it did not suit Mr. St. Louis to use that railway; he had no profits where the Grand Trunk were concerned. And so the stone was teamed twenty-two miles; and even after teaming it twenty-two miles it was found that they had a false charge for teaming that never was performed to the amount of $12,712. And the management of the rest of the canal was in keeping with this part. We find that the expenditures for repairs and general management on the Lachine Canal increased rapidly. The report said:

Mr. Kennedy was appointed superintendent of the Lachine Canal in November, 1890. A comparison has been made of the expenditure for repairs previous to Mr. Kennedy's appointment, since 1879, and has been divided into periods of three years each, to correspond with the time during which he held office, nearly three years, until suspended.

The Government puts it this way:

Repairs cost—	Increase.
From 1879 to 1881.....$ 42,512 73
do 1882 to 1884..... 54,999 29	$12,486 56
do 1885 to 1887..... 61,966 77	6,967 48
do 1888 to 1890..... 65,956 73	3,989 96
do 1891 to 1893..... 155,409 39	89,452 66

Now, Mr. Speaker, these figures are entirely misleading, because each increase is counted on the basis of comparison with the expenditure of the period immediately preceding it. But in order to find the real increase, we must compare the expenditure of every period with that of the period from 1879 to 1891. On that basis we find the increases to be as follows:—

	Increase.
From 1879 to 1881.....
do 1882 to 1884.....	$ 12,486 56
do 1885 to 1887.....	19,454 04
do 1888 to 1890.....	23,444 00
do 1891 to 1893.....	112,896 66

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have heard a great deal about the Government prosecuting the criminals. There was one criminal, however, whom I have not heard referred to in this House; I mean the man who appropriated in one night from the banks of the Lachine Canal some 450 sticks of timber from 25 to 30 feet in length, 12 inches by 12. The Government has never made any effort to secure the conviction of that person, because they knew that if convicted he would have to be sent to jail, and our Canadian jails are not exactly hospitals, not exactly places of retreat for the benefit of the health of those who occupy them. Up in Prince Albert, I see by the records, a boy who stole a half a cord of wood got eighteen months in jail. I suppose you would call that petty larceny, and, if so, the stealing of the 450 pieces of timber I have mentioned might well be called grand larceny. So, while petty larceny gets eighteen months in jail, grand larceny goes scot free. While I do not pose as one who is in favour of increasing the public expenditure, I still think that, in this particular instance, a change should be made in the Department of Railways and Canals. In the case of the Intercolonial Railway the Government take credit for reducing the expenses and bringing about a balance between revenue and expenditure. But, when it comes to expenditure of this kind we find that they try to shift the responsibility to others.

Now, I claim that no living man can occupy the positions of chief engineer of canals, Deputy Minister, and chief engineer of railways. The position of Chief Engineer of Canals was held by the late Mr. Page, who was an able man, and I may say, with all due respect to the present chief engineer, an abler man than the present incumbent of that office. I claim that every one of these positions ought to have a responsible head, instead of one man trying to manage all three. The reason that all this scheming took place on the Curran bridge was simply because Mr. Schreiber had too many other duties to perform, and he had not the time to look after all the details of these various jobs. Therefore, I claim that in each of these departments we ought to have a responsible head who would be able to give his whole time and attention to that particular branch of the public business. Now, we are told by our Conservative friends, as if it was something they were proud of, that Britain's greatness has departed. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance where he goes when he wants to borrow money. Where does he go when he wants to replace the money that has been stolen in the various ways that I have indicated? Why, of course, to Great Britain. Great Britain lends to the world. Let me read him this statement of a high authority:

All the world appears to be in debt to Great Britain. Mr. Burdett, a statistical writer of some note, in his "Official Intelligence," estimates that the amount of foreign stocks held in Great Britain aggregates the enormous total of $3,819,035,000, and the interest receivable upon them is $145,000,000 per annum. The Boston "Herald" commends these figures to the notice of American protectionists and silverites. As Great Britain has a gold standard and a low revenue tariff, according to the doctrine of American silverites and of Canadian and American protectionists she ought to be sunk in the depths of poverty, but she manages some way to get all the world in debt to her and to keep it in that position. More than that, her ocean marine is larger than that of the United States, Sweden and Norway, Germany and France combined. She does over 60 per cent of the ocean-carrying trade of the world, and her foreign commerce is equal to that of any two of the great powers of the world combined, with Canada's foreign trade thrown in. That is pretty fair, is it not, for an old, effete, free trade country, whose people refuse to take any stock in the beneficent (?) system of protection which Canada and the United States persist in keeping hanging around their necks to dwarf national development and retard national progress.

Sir, we find that in 1880 the gross exports of Great Britain were £286,000,000 or $1,430,000,000; in 1890, her gross exports were, £328,000,000 or $1,640,000,000, an increase in ten years of $210,000,000, or 15 per cent. The exports of Great Britain to the United States increased during that period from £38,000,000 to £42,500,000, or $22,500,000. During the decade from 1880 to 1890, Canada's exports increased from $88,000,000 to $97,000,000, only $9,000,000, or 8 per cent. During that decade Great Britain reduced her national debt by $450,000,000; while Canada increased hers by $100,000,000, or 50 per cent. Yet, Sir, the hon. Minister of Justice, whom I am glad to see back in the House again, said that Great Britain was being driven from the civilized markets of the world; that every year her output was decreasing; that she was spending millions on her army and navy to force her wares and her goods and other merchandise, into the uncivilized markets of the world. This is the testimony of the distinguished statesman who has been honoured by Her Majesty. This is his gratitude for the honours bestowed upon him. Well, Sir, let us see how our trade stands with the West Indies. In 1875, we had a trade with the West Indies of $3,945,000; in 1876, it dropped to $3,675,000; in 1892, it had dropped to $3,546,000; in 1893, it had dropped again to $3,145,000; or $800,000 less in 1893 than in 1875. This decrease in our trade with that country took place in spite of the fact that the Hon. John Macdonald, of Toronto, was sent there for the purpose of working up a trade; and in spite of the trip of the Minister of Finance himself for the same purpose. We remember also that our estimable friend, Mr. Adam Brown of Hamilton, went on several occasions to the West Indies for the purpose of increasing our foreign trade; but in spite of all these efforts it has steadily decreased. Now, the Minister of Railways, as well as the Minister of Finance, had something to say about our western trip; but he did not tell the House very much about his own western trip. He was coldly received in some places, especially in the skating rink in Winnipeg. It was a little warmer for him in Moosomin, and we remember reading that the Minister of Agriculture told the farmers up there to go into mixed farming—at least so it is said in the west. At all events, we heard that when he reached the British Columbia coast that the miners came before him to complain about the duties that were exacted from them upon their mining machinery, the Minister of Agriculture, who I understand, is not a practical farmer, told the miners of British Columbia to go into mixed farming. Now, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Railways said that we went out there to make promises. We did not do anything of the kind. We found that the town of Revelstoke, where our good friend from Yale (Mr. Mara) resides, was nearly half destroyed by the river; and when the people told us that the Government had no money to expend upon necessary public works, we told them what we are prepared to repeat from our places in the House, that there had been enough money stolen in connection with Curran bridges, and misapplied on Tay canals, to do all the work at Revelstoke. But the people had another complaint to make; they wanted to hold their land more securely than they were able to do. We found that the only gentleman who had any patent for his land was the hon. member for Yale, but no other man in that locality had any title deed for his property. Perhaps, however, that state of affairs may have been improved since then. Next, we find that in going up to Edmonton, they crossed the river in an old-fashioned ferry. I would like the Minister of Finance to visit that place, and more especially the Solicitor General. The people of that place want a bridge built. Well, there are no cousins of the Minister of Public Works living in Edmonton. It is a long way from Laval up to Edmonton, but I suppose the Minister of Public Works could send some of his constituents up there to secure votes for him. Still the Ministers were very liberal in their offers to the people of Edmonton; they were willing to build a bridge for them provided the town supplied half the money. Fancy a Government that was generous enough to spend $18,000 at Laprairie, for a little post office where the income is less than $300, making such an offer as this to the people of Edmonton. The Government were willing to spend $18,000 for a useless piece of work in a little village, and the only excuse the Minister of Public Works was able to give was that it would adorn the banks of the St. Lawrence. But away out in the Saskatchewan district, where the people have to run the risk of their lives in crossing and re-crossing the river, the people can only get a bridge provided, because there are no relations there of the Minister of Public Works, if the town will supply half the money. At Prince Albert, the public buildings were so poorly built that the people had to put up timbers and shores to prevent them falling upon those who were obliged to use them. What does this mean? It simply means that where money cannot be stolen the work is made to suffer. It is the same with every public work. No public work has been constructed by the present Government that did not cost from 25 to 100 per cent in excess of the estimate, and, in the case of the Curran bridge, the cost was two and three-quarter times more than the estimate. So far as this debate has gone, no speaker on the Government side of the House, and no member of the Government has made the promise that in future honesty would be observed. The Government simply called on their followers to vote down the amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), but they never indicated by word or deed that they would reform their administration by conducting the affairs of the country in an honest manner. We were told by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Ryckman) that the banks and insurance associations were in a flourishing condition. It is the first time in my life that I knew the Finance Minister had anything to do with the insurance companies. I had the idea that our large corporations were conducted by general managers and boards of directors; but it now appears that every institution that is successful owes its success to the Government of the day. Nothing is said about the Canadian Pacific Railway not paying a dividend, or the Grand Trunk Railway receipts falling short of expenditure; but hon. gentlemen opposite claimed that the Canada Life was a glorious institution, and they pointed to the large number of people who have taken policies in that company. I am glad of the fact; but that is no sign of prosperity; it is rather the reverse. It is true that many men of means insure their lives, but the general run of people insure largely for want of money to enable them, in some other way, to make provision for their families after their decease. We are told that the banks and savings banks have larger deposits than formerly. I should like the Minister of Finance to go to the bank with which I am connected, and tell the manager how to prevent a reduction of circulation, for the bank's circulation has diminished nearly 15 per cent. It is not a sign of good times, but of bad times; it is a sign that the people have no confidence in business, and are putting their money into the banks instead of investing it in business enterprises. Yet the Government glory in the fact that there is more money in the banks to-day than there was many years ago. It may be so; but there is less work being done in the country than there was some years ago. Instead of credit being taken by the Dominion Government for the condition of our banking and insurance institutions, it should be given where it belongs, to Mr. Ramsay of the Canada Life, to Mr. Walker, of the Bank of Commerce, to Mr. Clouston, of the Bank of Montreal, and many others. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Ryckman) spoke with great emphasis on the condition of workingmen in Canada, as compared with the condition of workingmen in Great Britain. It is true that, relatively speaking, the wages of the mechanic in Canada are higher than those of the mechanic in Great Britain, but the social condition of the British workman is better, his amusements are more varied, cheaper, and better, his rentals are less; his clothes are cheaper and better, and last longer; and the purchasing power of his dollar is greater than here. When it suits the Tories, they are loyal; but when it suits Tory interests, hon. gentlemen opposite run down everything English. If the Liberals were to speak as violently against Great Britain as do hon. gentlemen on the Government side of the House, every hon. member opposite would call the Liberals traitors on every platform in the country. I am sorry the Controller of Customs is not in his place, because I desire to refer to a statement made by him when he was going over the works carried out in this country. In the course of his speech I mentioned that the hon. gentleman had forgotten to enumerate among the canals built, the Tay canal. The hon. Controller then claimed that the Tay canal was part of my stock in trade. I want to tell this House that I have always been able to live by my trade, and never had to place myself on the country to support me. As I understand it, the Controller's stock in trade, more particularly, is connected with following a fife and drum band on the 12th July. That hon. gentleman is a man who, although Controller of Customs, never imported a dollar's worth of goods in his life. He is a man whom no one would hire at $50 per month to conduct his business; and if he did so, it would involve a loss. Hon. gentlemen opposite are constantly wanting to know the opinions of our leader. Where was the Controller when the Haldimand election was going on? Where did he go? He visited Washington, in order to get posted on the way to conduct his departmental business—and the hon. gentleman needs instruction. Mr. Speaker, the last hon. member who addressed the House laid great stress on the opportunity that would be given the Liberal party at the next general elections. We are ready for the general elections. I think more ready than are hon. gentlemen opposite. We were ready last spring, we hoped that the Government would then bring on the general elections, and I am told that if the opinions of some members of the Government had been taken, the elections would have been brought on, but a difference of opinion prevailed in the Cabinet. I am satisfied, however, that when the time comes the people will rise in their might and remove the incapable men who are now controlling the affairs of our country, and place honest, efficient, able and loyal men at the head of the Government.

Mr. ROSAMOND. I do not propose to follow the bad example of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, in referring to personalities during the present discussion. Instead of discussing the financial or fiscal policy of the Government, and the amendment moved by the hon. member for South Oxford, the hon. gentleman wandered over every subject connected with scandals, and matters of that kind. I do not propose to make a lengthy speech, but I will refer briefly to some of the statements made during the debate. The burden of the song of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the Opposition side of the House has been with respect to the iniquities of the National Policy. Now, I am not at all sure that these hon. gentlemen opposite know what the National Policy is. At all events, Sir, if we take into account their mode of discussing it, we would imagine that they did not understand it. It does not mean simply a tariff for high protection. That is not the whole of it. The National Policy is not simply for arranging the tariff in such a way as best to promote and encourage the industries of the country without placing unnecessary or undue burdens on the people. It means also the building up of great and important works, and the deepening and enlarging the canals of the country in order that the products of the farmers may be carried to the seaboard as cheaply as possible. It also means establishing experimental farms, and encouraging industries specially connected with the farming operations, such as cheese factories, and creameries, and establishments of that kind. Taking it as a whole, that is the National Policy. I want to say a word or two, Mr. Speaker, with reference to the tariff. I maintain that the tariff we have at present is not one whit higher than it was during the time of the Mackenzie Government (when the hon. member for South Oxford was Minister of Finance), so far as the total duty upon each article imported is concerned. So far as the consumer has to pay upon the separate article, the duties under the Mackenzie Government were just as high as they are to-day. The rate was 17½ per cent then all round, and let us suppose that it is now 25 or 30 per cent according to the nature of the article. But hon. gentlemen must remember that the cost of the articles in those days was a great deal more than it is at the present time. For instance, cloth that was sold at $1 a yard then, can be bought to-day for 50 cents a yard, and 17½ per cent upon a dollar is quite as much as a duty of 25 or 30 per cent on cloth that cost 50 cents per yard. Therefore the actual expense to the consumer was as great, if not greater, during the time that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was Minister of Finance than it is to-day. I wish the House to bear this in mind, because it will have some bearing on an extraordinary statement by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). The hon. gentleman as reported on page 553 of "Hansard," said:

Before this debate is through I intend to prove—and if I were not to undertake it, there are fifty good men and true on this side of the House able and willing to do so—that the actual taxation taken out of the pockets of the people is $60,000,000 a year, as against $20,000,000 per year, which was all we ever exacted.

I do not suppose, Sir, that any person could believe in the actual correctness of that statement, and I question very much if the hon. member (Sir Richard Cartwright) himself, if he had taken time to consider, would be prepared to guarantee the statement as being correct.

Mr. McMULLEN. We can prove it, too.

Mr. ROSAMOND. I question very much if the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) could prove that, notwithstanding all his great abilities. I suppose he thinks himself quite as able a man as the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and I am perfectly sure that neither of the hon. gentlemen can prove the statement to be correct.

Mr. McMULLEN. I can.

Mr. ROSAMOND. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), in another part of his speech, says :

So far as a tariff is protective, the measure of the taxation is the total consumption of imported goods, plus the goods manufactured under that tariff in the country. Where those goods are double the amount imported, the tax will take $3 out of the pockets of the people for every $1 which it puts into the treasury. Where the goods manufactured in the country under the tariff are four or five times the amount of the goods imported, then you may fairly conclude that it will take four or five times more out of the pockets of the people than it puts into the treasury.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think we can get at the absurdity of a statement of that kind if we compare the imports of the year 1878 with what they are to-day. I have not made any special calculations as to what these imports were, but I have taken as correct—and I suppose hon. members on the opposite side of the House will take it to be correct also—the statement made by the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald). At page 999 of "Hansard," he says :

In 1877 we imported from foreign countries only $1 worth of furniture for every $13 worth manufactured in Canada. We imported only $1 worth of carriages for $52 worth we manufactured in Canada. In clothing, we imported $1 worth for $57 worth manufactured here ; in spikes, nails, tacks, and other manufactures of that kind, $1 imported to $10 worth manufactured here ; in boots and shoes—which were particularly mentioned by public speakers and hon. members as an item in which American competition was particularly severe—we imported $1 worth for $69 worth manufactured here ; in saddlery and harness, $1 imported to $73 manufactured ; in other goods of all kinds, $1 to $26 ; in woollen goods, $1 to $17 ; in machinery of all kinds, $1 to $27 ; agricultural implements, $1 to $14.

Now, if you apply this statement of the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Macdonald) to the argument of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), it will be seen wherein the absurdity of the argument consists. If we imported $1 worth of furniture for every 13 manufactured in Canada in 1887, and then remember what the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said :

Where the goods manufactured in the country under the tariff are four or five times the amount of the goods imported, then you may fairly conclude that it will take four or five times more out of the pockets of the people than it puts into the treasury.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Not four times.

Mr. ROSAMOND.

Mr. ROSAMOND. Yes, if there were four times as much manufactured in the country as imported, then there were four times as much taken out of the pockets of the people of this country, according to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). But according to the member for East Huron, there were thirteen times as much manufactured in Canada as was imported in 1877, and, therefore, there were thirteen times as much taken out of the pockets of the people of this country during the Mackenzie Government as was put into the treasury. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. Macdonald) also stated that in 1878 we imported only $1 worth of carriages for $52 worth we manufactured in Canada, and, therefore, there were $52 taken out of the pockets of the people of Canada for every dollar put into the treasury during Mr. Mackenzie's Government. With reference to boots and shoes, $69 would be taken out of the pockets of the people for every dollar put into the treasury, and in the case of saddlery and harness, $53 was taken out of the pockets of the people for every dollar put into the treasury during the time of the Mackenzie regime. On woollen goods $17, on machinery of all kinds $27, on agricultural implements of all kinds $14, would be taken out of the pockets of the people for every dollar that went into the treasury, according to the arguments of these two hon. gentlemen. On the 8th of May, the hon. member for East Huron went on to say that of eighteen leading articles, representing a total of $73,263,000, manufactured in Canada, we only imported $3,624,000 worth, or in the relation of about $1 to $20. So that, taking all those articles together and averaging them, for every dollar that went into the treasury in the year 1878, $20 was taken out of the pockets of the people of this country, and, I suppose, according to the arguments of the Opposition, was pocketed by the manufacturers and others who were receiving some benefit from the tariff of those days. I think, Mr. Speaker, that is a very fair and reasonable comparison, on the line the hon. member for South Oxford took in his speech in reply to the Budget speech of the Finance Minister. The hon. member for South Oxford said that a thousand millions of dollars had been taken out of the pockets of the people of this country during the last sixteen years. It is astonishing how the members of the Opposition can handle these millions in the reckless way they do. But, if so much money has been taken out of the pockets of the people of this country within that time, I would like to ask how is it possible that the people are so well off as they are ? I think it is paying a very great tribute to the National Policy that, notwithstanding the fact that one thousand millions of dollars have been taken out of the pockets of the people, they are still in the extraordinarily prosperous condition they are. I am not saying that the hon. gentleman's arguments or statements are correct; I am only pointing out the absurdity of them and of many of the contentions of hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House. The hon. member for South Oxford said, as reported, on page 657 of "Hansard": "I know that very large classes of the community are much poorer." I totally dissent from any such statement as that; I think it is wholly and utterly unfounded. Any person who knows anything of the condition of our people, of the farmers and labouring classes especially, must know that the people of this country are vastly more prosperous than they were in 1878. There is not a shadow of doubt on that point. I know it of my own personal knowledge: I know it by going among the farming community and among the labouring classes generally. One has only to visit the farmers in their homes to see the luxury in which they live to-day as compared with 1878, to be satisfied that the people of this country have very much improved in their condition and prospects since the National Policy came into force. In another place, on page 656 of "Hansard," the hon. member for South Oxford said: "The enormous taxation under which we laboured in 1894-95 as against the taxation which existed in 1878." Now, this is another very serious error. I think a comparison of the taxation will show that there is very little difference between the taxation of to-day and the taxation of 1874. In the six months ending December 31st, 1894, goods to the value of $54,572,395 were imported into Canada, upon which a tariff taxation of $8,701,037 was imposed, being at the rate of 15.9 per cent. How does that compare with former periods? In 1876, the rate of taxation upon imports was 13.14 per cent; in 1878, it was 14.03 per cent; in 1881, a period of great prosperity, it was 20.19 per cent; and in 1889, also a year of business activity and material progress, it was 21.65 per cent. That is to say, the tariff taxation now levied is 4.7 per cent less than it was five years ago, and only 1.9 per cent higher than in 1878, the last year of the Mackenzie Government. If we take the per capita contribution to federal revenue through the customs tariff, the talk of excessive taxation is found to be equally groundless. In 1872, the amount of duties paid per head of population was $3.61, and that was under a low tariff; in 1873, the amount was $3.55 per head; in 1874, it was $3.77; in 1875, $3.95; and in 1878, $3.13. Since the revenue tariff period, as it is called, the rate has been a good deal higher, rising to $5.23 per head in 1883 and again to $5.02 in 1889; but since the latter year, in consequence of the abolition of the sugar duties and a general scaling down of rates, the per capita taxation has steadily declined.

until, in the last half of 1894, it amounted to only $3.43 per head of population for the whole year, or just 30 cents a head more than in 1878, when the hon. member for South Oxford controlled our fiscal policy. Therefore, the statement of the hon. member about the enormous taxation under which we laboured in 1894-95, as against the taxation which existed in 1878, is wholly groundless. There was one remark made by the hon. member for North Wentworth (Mr. Bain) to which I would like to refer. He complained very bitterly that in his vicinity factories of various kinds—I think he specially referred to cotton factories—had been closed, and he made a very mournful lament about the number of hands that had been thrown out of employment—men who had built homes for themselves and who had been obliged to go away to other parts of the country for work. Now, I have no doubt at all that there have been factories closed for various causes. That is not to be wondered at. The National Policy does not furnish brains or intelligence to every person who wishes to go into a manufacturing industry. It only gives assistance and encouragement, which is all that can possibly be done, by arranging the tariff in such a way that manufacturing industries can be built up. But factories will be obliged to close unless they keep up with the times in having machinery of the most improved kind and the best skill that can be got. That is the case not only in this country. We know very well that in England, the home of free trade, the policy which is so much held up for imitation by our friends on the Opposition side of the House, there are factories closed all over the country for precisely the same reason—because their machinery has become old and antiquated, and they are unable to compete with factories equipped on the latest and most improved principles. That would be so in every country, and I think it is entirely beside the question to blame the National Policy, because some factories or some establishments have been obliged to close down. That happens in every country's period. Now, Sir, I think there can be no question whatever in the minds of reasonable, intelligent men, that the country has made enormous progress since the National Policy came into force.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Because of the policy?

Mr. ROSAMOND. Because of the encouragement which that policy has given. That is exactly what I meant to say. Every one knows that almost immediately after the National Policy came into force, business men generally embarked in new enterprises, spent their capital in building new mills, and buying the latest machinery, confident that they were going to be encouraged by the arrangement of the tariff, and that in place of the opposition, they would have the support of the Government, and business enterprises of all kinds took a start forward and improved very much. I think that the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) knows that very well. He knows that in his own county the same improvement took place that was witnessed in every other county. The hon. member for North Wentworth (Mr. Bain) complains that when agricultural implements were exported from this country, the manufacturers got a rebate of duty equal to 99 per cent of the duties on the raw material used in the manufacture of these implements. I think that is perfectly reasonable. It is certainly not a matter which can be charged against this Government any more than the Mackenzie Government. The same thing was done under the Mackenzie Government in precisely the same way, and I do not see, therefore, why any charge should lie against this Government on that account. The hon. gentleman forgot that the farming interest get the benefit of this rebate, because any manufacturer who makes a large quantity of implements can manufacture them more cheaply than if he made only a small quantity. The effect, therefore, of this rebate, by increasing the output of the Canadian manufacturer, enables him to give the farmers the benefit of the decreased cost.

Mr. McMILLAN. I wish to correct the hon. gentleman's version of a statement that I made.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is the hon. gentleman rising to a point of order?

Mr. ROSAMOND. I would be glad if the hon. member were allowed to make his statement.

Mr. McMILLAN. The hon. gentleman says that I made the statement that under the Mackenzie Government agricultural implements were allowed to come into the country through local societies. That is not correct. Mr. Mackenzie did not do so.

Mr. ROSAMOND. I am very glad the hon. gentleman has made the statement he has, because it is not at all what I was referring to. I was not at all referring to anything my hon. friend has spoken of. It was not to his remarks, but to those of the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Bain) that I was replying. That hon. gentleman said that the exporters of agricultural implements were allowed a rebate of 99 per cent of the duties which were charged on the raw material that went into the manufacture of these implements. I do not remember that my hon. friend (Mr. McMillan) made any statement of that kind. At all events, I was not alluding to anything he said. The principle of giving a rebate of the duties upon articles exported out of the country was in existence under the Mackenzie Government precisely as it is now. It may not have been given on the same articles, or to the same extent, but the principle existed exactly as it does today. In referring to the comparison of taxation, I wish, also, to refer to the degree of prosperity which existed during the regime of Mr. Mackenzie, and that which now exists. I know very well that some of the statistics which have been produced by this side have been criticised, but I think that the statistics furnished by the banks will not be questioned. They are sworn to, or, at all events, certified to, by credible men connected with our banking institutions. If we refer to the period of the Mackenzie Government from 1874 to 1878, we find that the note circulation of the country was, in 1874, $27,904,000, and that in 1878 it had fallen to $20,475,000. In 1874 the total deposits amounted to $77,113,000, and in 1878 they had fallen to $70,856,000. The discounts to the people of the country in 1874 were $131,680,000, and in 1878, $113,485,000. The total assets in 1874 were $187,921,000, and in 1878, $175,450,000. Of course, it will be said, and said correctly, that that was a time of very great depression, but I think that no intelligent man will refuse to admit that the depression of the last five years has exceeded, in intensity, very largely, that of 1874-78. Now, it would be a fair comparison to take the last five years and compare them with the five years of the Mackenzie Administration. The note circulation in 1889 amounted to $32,207,000; and in 1893, notwithstanding the depression, it had increased to $33,811,000. The total deposits, which, in 1889, were $134,650,000, had risen, in 1894, to $174,776,000. The discounts to the people in 1889 amounted to $149,958,000; and in 1893 they had increased to $205,623,000. The total assets were, in 1889, $253,789,000; and in 1893 they had risen to $302,696,000. That, I think, is a fair measure of the difference between the two policies. During the Mackenzie regime, in all these instances, the amounts had steadily decreased. That was a time of depression, I grant you; but from 1889 to 1893, a time of still greater depression, they had steadily risen. This is an exceedingly fair comparison of the results of the two policies. One hon. gentleman—I am not sure whether it was the last speaker or not—referred to the general depression in farm lands in this country. I hold that that is not a fair representation of the matter at all. We know very well that farms all over the world have fallen in value; it is not a thing peculiar to Canada at all. If the value of farm lands have fallen in Ontario and the older provinces, they have fallen to a still greater extent in England, the home of free trade. I simply refer to this because we know that hon. gentlemen opposite are asking us to adopt a policy of free trade. Speaking of that policy, I suppose none of us quite know what is the policy of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It has been repeated often enough.

Mr. ROSAMOND. The hon. gentleman says that it has been repeated often enough. It has been repeated often enough, perhaps, but it has not been twice stated the same. For instance, we had the hon. leader of the Opposition in Winnipeg saying :

We shall give you free trade, and, although it will be a hard fight, we shall not give in one inch or retrace one step until we have reached the goal, and that goal is the same policy of free trade as exists in England to-day.

But he did not sing the same tune when he got to Montreal, for there he did not say "the same policy of free trade as exists in England to-day." but he said :

The step in England was all the way from protection to free trade ; whereas we propose in Canada to go from protection to a revenue tariff.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Now we have it.

Mr. ROSAMOND. The hon. gentleman says now we have it ; but the leader of the Opposition did not say the same on these two occasions.

Mr. LAURIER. Just the same.

Mr. ROSAMOND. I submit that no person will say they are the same. Free trade as it is in England is entirely distinct from a revenue tariff. At Toronto the hon. gentleman spoke somewhat differently from his speech in Montreal. So I think that we on the Conservative side of the House are not to blame if we do not understand really what hon. gentlemen opposite are driving at. And I imagine that when the country comes to vote at the next election they will find just as great difficulty in understanding what the hon. gentlemen propose to do. The people are satisfied that they know what the present Government is doing. We know that the country has prospered, notwithstanding the depression and hard times throughout the world ; and we know that Canada has stood the strain of that depression better than any other country in the world. That is a fact known to every business man in the country, known to every banker in the country, and I believe that it will be to the interest of the people of this country, to the interest of the farmers, of the workmen and of the great body of consumers that the policy which has been so successfully carried out for the last sixteen years should be maintained for the next sixteen years to come ; and I have no doubt but that it will be. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the attention with which I have been heard.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock the hon. member for North Lanark (Mr. Rosamond) had just finished his speech. I am free to confess to a feeling of more than ordinary disappointment at that speech. The hon. gentleman rarely challenges the attention of the House, and when he does he generally speaks pointedly and with effect. On this occasion I had anticipated that, as he was specially interested in the subject-matter the House was discussing, being himself one of the protected manufacturers, the House would have had the advantage of hearing from his lips the case put as strongly, from their standpoint, as it could be put. And I suppose I must do the hon. gentleman the justice to hold that the case was put from his standpoint as strongly as he was able to put it. And yet, if that was the strength of the case, then we must all acknowledge that the case is an exceedingly weak one. The hon. gentleman commenced by stating that the existing tariff, the National Policy tariff is practically not one whit higher than was the tariff under Mr. Mackenzie ; that though the present tariff is from 30 to 31 per cent and the tariff under Mr. Mackenzie only 17½ per cent, still, under the peculiar condition of things now existing as compared with the condition of things then, the tariff of to-day is no higher than the other. The hon. gentleman said that cloths which were then selling for $1 are now to be purchased for 50 cents, or only one-half the price at the time of the old tariff, and, that being the case, they were not more highly taxed at 31 per cent now than they were at 17½ per cent then. Sir, there is a good deal of ground for the hon. gentleman's contention. I call his attention, however, to a factor which he omitted to notice in his remarks—the item of specific duties which ignores the value of the goods altogether and which were present in the existing tariff, but were not present to any considerable extent in the tariff with which he compared it. I call attention also to the remarkable admission made in the hon. gentleman's speech, an admission that I hope every tax-payer in the country will recognize and appreciate—that, notwithstanding that goods have fallen in value at least one-half, we have adopted a policy so onerous that the consumer is obliged to pay as much as formerly ; in other words, the consumer gets no benefit whatever from the cheapening of goods which is going on from year to year throughout the world. If this is true, it is an acceptance of one of the strong points which we have urged from time to time against the National Policy. Surely every hon. gentleman will concede that it is right and that it is desirable that, as goods become cheapened in the markets of the world, the consumer here should share in the benefits. But the protectionist policy as set forth by the hon.

member for North Lanark says: No; as goods decrease in value so we will increase the taxes you pay, so that at no time and under no circumstances can you hope to have cheaper goods than you had in former years.

The hon. gentleman went on to deny certain statements made by my hon. friend to my left (Sir Richard Cartwright) with regard to the volume of taxation paid by the people of this country. I hoped that an hon. gentleman of the care and prudence of the hon. member for North Lanark, would have gone further than a mere denial of my hon. friend's statements. I thought, from the vigour with which the hon. gentleman denied the truth of the statement, that he would be at least prepared to advance some fact or argument in support of his denial. But the hon. gentleman seemed satisfied to place his denial against the statement of my hon. friend beside me, oblivious of the fact that when my hon. friend here made his statement as to the volume of taxation borne by the people of this country, he enforced it by illustration and argument, and by facts from the public records, so manly, so vigorous and so clear, that, unless these are controverted, the conclusions he drew must be accepted by every fair-minded man. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman denied that any taxation is paid by the people beyond that which goes into the treasury. But the hon. gentleman must see that the statement made by my hon. friend from South Oxford went to this length, that where a tariff acts as a protective tariff, where it has that object and effects that object, excluding all foreign manufactured goods from the country, it does so with the object of compelling people to purchase goods made at home; and the competition which would result from the influx of foreign goods being excluded, the consumer is compelled to pay to the home manufacturer for the goods he buys as much or almost as much as if they had been imported from abroad and the tariff tax paid the Government on them. In other words, the protective tariff is framed to compel the purchaser of goods to buy the article made at home, and to pay for that article as much as the foreign article when imported and the duty paid on it can be sold for. So that the purchaser in each case pays the duty. In the one case to the treasury. In the other to the home manufacturer. So that one of the main grounds of complaint which the tariff reformers have against the existing tariff is this, that in addition to a very large amount more than is necessary which is paid into the treasury of the country on foreign goods imported there is the enormous sum of money which we pay, and which we are compelled to pay, to the manufacturer of the home-made goods, which never goes into the treasury at all. That is one of the chief grounds of our complaint against this protective tariff.

The hon. gentleman went on further to say that he saw no reason to complain of the Government's policy in offering a rebate of 99 per cent to the manufacturers on those articles which enter into the manufacture of their goods. Well, from the standpoint of an extreme protectionist, I dare say there may be some grounds for the hon. gentleman's contention. It may be right, it may be fair; but let me point out to the hon. gentleman one or two things involved in that contention. It was contended some years ago by those who advocated a protective system, that the consumer did not pay the duty at all; the duty was paid by the foreign manufacturer or merchant from whom the goods were bought. If these taxes on the raw materials on which the rebate is given are not paid by the manufacturer here, but if they are paid by the man from whom he bought them, then a gross and grievous wrong is perpetrated when he is repaid money that he did not pay out. That will be conceded. If, on the contrary, he does pay that out of his own pocket, then the argument that the consumer, or the person who imports, does not pay, goes to the winds. I think that will be conceded by the hon. gentleman. But one ground upon which they claim that they have any right whatever to a rebate of this duty, is the ground that the man who imports pays the taxes himself; and if he is going to export the goods again to sell them abroad, he has a right to have the tax he has paid on this raw material, rebated to him. Then so much is conceded, the ground is clear thus far—the consumer does pay the duty. At any rate hereafter we will not have the cry proclaimed throughout the country that the consumer does not pay at all, but that somebody in a foreign country does.

Now, I would like to call my hon. friend's attention to another curious anomaly which exists, the injustice of which he does not see, or professes not to see. We have a firm manufacturing, we will say, agricultural implements. They pay $10, $15 or $20 duty upon the raw material which enters into the manufactured article. They ship off an agricultural implement to the North-west Territories, and they ship off a similar one to the Argentine Republic. They are permitted by the Government to sell, they are encouraged by the policy of the Government to sell that machine $10, or $20, or $30 less to the Argentine farmer than they are permitted to sell it to the North-west farmer. The Argentine farmer and the North-west farmer are producing the same things and compete with each other in the markets of the world; therefore our Government pursues a policy which permits and encourages the manufacturer of goods in this country to sell machinery at a lesser cost to the foreign farmer who competes with the North-west farmer, the result of which is that it costs the latter relatively a great deal more to produce his grain than it does his competitor, and both sell in the same market. What is the result? Evidently this policy is not one which is conducive to the best interests of that class of men whose interests the Government ought to consult.

Now, I thought that we had placed before the country two clear and distinct policies, and we were in hopes, many of us, that we were going to the country in a short time to challenge the verdict of the people upon the question as to which was the better policy in the interests of Canada. But it appears, Sir, that there are a large number of gentlemen in this House who say that they do not know what the Liberal policy is.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I notice that that statement is received with cheers by some hon. gentlemen on the back benches opposite, thereby showing their own ignorance. I shall be very happy to present to any one of those hon. gentlemen a copy of the political platform agreed upon by the Liberal party of Canada when they met in convention two or three years ago. The policy of the Liberal party was laid down at that time in terms very clear and distinct, and if hon. gentlemen will take the trouble not to read each other's speeches, not to read what Mr. A or Mr. B, who sits alongside of them says about the policy, but to read the policy itself, they will find it formulated in language so clear that nobody but one whose mind is wilfully perverted, can misunderstand it. Sir, during the progress of this debate, several hon. gentlemen, the Minister of Railways, the Controller of Customs and others, did me the honour to cite certain remarks I had made at different times in the maritime provinces, for the purpose of showing that I held a somewhat different view as to the policy of the Liberal party, from the views held by my leader and others. Sir, I am absolutely satisfied to spare the House the annoyance of reading any of my speeches, because the speech of mine which the Controller read, puts it as plainly and as lucidly, and more so, than I could put it to-night. I stand by every word of the speech he quoted in the House. The Minister of Railways in referring to what I said, stated :

Now, however, a new policy, a tariff for revenue purposes only. * * This policy of a tariff for revenue purposes only was explained by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), who said, in a speech delivered in the maritime provinces, that there were three kinds of tariff, a free trade tariff, a tariff for revenue purposes, and a revenue tariff.

He meant a protective tariff, a mistake, I suppose, of the printer.

He spoke of what a revenue tariff was, compared it with a protective tariff, and he instanced as a revenue tariff a tariff such as that in force in England, and it is such a tariff and such a policy that we are dealing to-night. I venture to tell hon. gentlemen, that when the country comes to understand what a revenue tariff is, as explained by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), and as it will be explained to the country from one end to the other before the general elections arrive, a tariff for revenue will occupy the graveyard with other departed ones.

But when the hon. gentleman was challenged by me directly in his speech as to whether I had said anything indicating that we were going to adopt the tariff which the English people have in force, "Oh, no," he said, "you did not say so, but I deduce that from your remarks." Notwithstanding my disclaimer, half a dozen of the lesser lights of the party, when they get up to speak, still, parrot-like, repeat the old story that the policy of the Liberal party is a policy which favours the adoption of a system of taxation similar to that which prevails in England. It seems to me it has been a put-up job, if I may use a vulgar expression, to repeat, in one way or another, this statement, with a view to induce the country to believe that our policy is not what we have declared it to be in solemn conclave, not what the resolution moved by the hon. member for South Oxford declares it to be, not what he and my leader have, time and again, stated it to be, but some policy which hon. gentlemen opposite wish it to be. It is perfectly plain to my mind that hon. gentlemen opposite know that our policy is so true, is so thoroughly defensible, so commends itself to the good sense of the people that they dare not challenge the verdict of the people upon it. They are bound to twist it, to make it something else, to say it is not what we declare it to be, it is not what we have formulated, it is some other thing which they desire it to be. We decline to allow hon. gentlemen opposite to force a false issue on the people. We are going to the people on the policy formulated at our great convention, and enunciated by our financial representative and by our leader.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). And as often repudiated.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Not only are we prepared to go to the people upon this policy, but if we get fair-play, we will win upon it, and hon. gentlemen opposite know it.

Mr. FOSTER. You will get all the fair-play you want.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). I admire your pluck, but not your prudence.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Although our policy is not to adopt the tariff and system of taxation which exists in England—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)—not because the principle on which that system is based is unsound, because we are thoroughly in accord with the principle, but because the circumstances of this country do not permit its application in the same way as they do there, still, as an academic question, it may be worth while to consider, for a moment or two, whether or not the policy as it is in England, which hon. gentlemen opposite denounce so viciously and so strongly, is as they represent it to be.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Did you not say that the next fight was to be a free trade fight?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will tell the hon. gentleman what I did say. Why, the Controller of Customs, who, above all others, is a man who might be supposed to know something on this question, and whose duty it is to keep himself posted, has been guilty of making statements so opposed to the facts that I can only attribute them to his ignorance; I will not presume to say that he intended to mislead the House, for I give him too much credit for that, but I put them down to his ignorance.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman quoted them.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He quoted an article which he had picked up out of some magazine, the author of which he did not know, and which I challenged him to name, and he was not man enough to do it. He said the English people were taxed on their linen sheets. I asked him his authority, and I offered him the English tariff, which I hold in my hand, and challenged him to show such a tax. He said he had seen it in an anonymous article in an English magazine. And this statement came from whom? Not from a back bench member, but from the Controller of Her Majesty's Customs in Canada, a man whose duty it was to post himself on these matters, and know what he was talking about when he was speaking and making comparisons between the tariff of this country and the tariff of the motherland. The hon. gentleman warned the people of the Dominion what tremendous taxes they would have to pay if the system of taxation as it exists in England was introduced here. The hon. gentleman told the House that there were a large number of taxes imposed, and he read them over with great gusto. He said there were license fees of all kinds to which the people had to submit—fees for liquor dealers, refreshment houses, dog licenses, game licenses, gun licenses, for male servants, for carriages, for armorial bearings, and he went over the list and ran over the items one after another, and then turning triumphantly to his followers, said: This is the Liberal policy, and this is what you would have to submit to. One would suppose the hon. gentleman had examined into this matter.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Are hon. members aware that, although these taxes are collected by Imperial officers they are collected by Imperial officers not for the Imperial revenue, but to be divided among the local authorities of the country? I wish to tell the hon. gentleman that of the £1,000,000 sterling taxation which the Controller referred to as collected by those license fees, and others, the whole sum so collected by Imperial officers was divided among the local authorities in the different counties of Great Britain and Ireland.

Mr. HUGHES. No.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And when the hon. Controller tried to frighten us with the probate duties, hon. gentlemen should recollect that half of those duties, collected by the Imperial officers under Imperial supervision are also distributed among the local authorities of the country.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). By Imperial authority?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) They are collected by Imperial officers and distributed by local officers for local purposes. The whole sum, about seven million pounds sterling, or $35,000,000, is so collected and distributed. So it is only a mode of collection. In this country we allow certain taxes to be collected by the several provinces, and by the municipalities, and in England they are collected by Imperial officers and distributed in the way mentioned. And so the hon. Controller went on to talk about the income tax, and one would suppose that every man having an income of $100, $200, $300, $400, $500, $600, $700, or $800 is taxed in England. It is not so. There is not an income in England under $800 taxed a penny. The English system is one which aims at compelling rich men to pay a fair share of their riches towards national taxation, and so far as England is concerned, no man who receives up to $800 per annum pays a penny of taxation as income tax. Further, on all incomes from $800 to $2,000 a rebate of $800 be allowed.

Then we were told about inhabited house duty. The Controller said that every house is taxed. Is that true? I am not arguing that such a system, is ever going to be introduced here, I am simply showing how utterly ignorant are some hon. gentlemen who have spoken without looking into the question and studying it. What are the facts? The total annual value of houses in Great Britain is £142,000,000 sterling, and the total number is 6,833,000. How many are charged house duty? Only $1,200,000 out of the 6,800,000 and out of the £142,000,000 of value, only sixty-five millions of value are taxed at all. The number not charged house duty is about 5,500,000, the annual value of which is 76 million pounds sterling. All houses occupied by artisans in England are exempt from house duty, also all houses under $100 in annual value, and there are over five million of these. So you see, Mr. Speaker, that the English system—if we were discussing the desirability of introducing it here—is not the system which hon. gentlemen opposite have placed before the House. But we never have said that we are going to introduce the English system into this country.

Let us see, if we can, what the two policies are, as defined by those who have authority to define them. I find the hon. Finance Minister laid down his policy. I do not think we have ever tried to pervert that presentation: I do not think we have ever tried to misrepresent it: I do not think we have ever tried to put into his mouth a definition he did not give, and I will read to the hon. gentleman and the House the statement he made when he introduced and laid down his policy. I want to show the House the broad lines of demarcation or distinction between the policy which he says should be pursued and that which we say should be pursued. The hon. gentleman's policy is a policy of taxation for the development of the industries of the country. Our policy is a policy for revenue only—to use the words of our platform, and of the resolution before the House. The hon. Finance Minister said:

The arrangement of a tariff and the principle which is to be adopted has two aspects, it looks to the revenue which is required in a country and it looks, as well, to the general trade and development of a country.

I wish, at this early stage of my remarks upon this subject, to say that, so far as the revenue aspect is concerned, it is of infinitely less importance than the effect of the principle and the details of the tariff upon the trade and development of a country.

It was not, therefore, for revenue he was going to tax the people; nor was it for revenue that he was going to restrict the trade and commerce of the country. The object of raising a revenue—which common people have heretofore supposed was the main one in levying taxation—was infinitely less important in his mind, than that by levying heavy taxation he could build up certain industries in the country. He went on to say:

I wish to say here that the Government of the day, and the party which supports the Government of to-day, take their stand squarely and firmly upon the embodiment and upon the preservation of the principle of protection in the tariff, the degree of that protection to be according to the circumstances of the industry and the conditions of business and of trade at the present time.

Now, Sir, that is the hon. gentleman's policy, and we will start with the understanding, clear as he has expressed it, that he does not ask the authority of the House to levy taxation in order to raise a revenue, and that that is a matter of infinitely less importance than the main purpose which he has in view when he lays on the taxes upon the people. Now, Sir, what is the Liberal platform? I quote from the convention resolution, agreed to by 2,500 delegates, whom the hon. gentleman sneered at, who assembled here at their own private cost and charge, and who have, after deliberation, solemnly agreed upon this as the platform upon which they were prepared to contest the coming election. I say, Sir, it is neither manly nor honourable for hon. gentlemen opposite to seek to evade the issue which we have placed squarely before the people, and upon which we are prepared to challenge their verdict. Here is what the Liberal platform says:

That the customs tariff of the Dominion of Canada should be based, not as it is now, upon a protective principle, but upon the requirements of the public service.

We do not say there should not be a customs tariff: a tariff sufficiently high to raise whatever is necessary to carry on the government of the country. We say, on the contrary, it must be so, and we say, further, in our platform that "this tariff should be reduced to the needs of honest economical and efficient government." That is the platform of the Liberal party in convention, and that is the very idea embodied in the resolution which my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) has submitted to the House, and upon which we are going to vote. It is stated by hon. gentlemen opposite, that my hon. friend to my right (Mr. Laurier) has made use of some language which shows that we did not mean what we said. Well, the leader of the Liberal party moved the resolution I have quoted in the convention, and I beg the attention of the House while I read a paragraph from the speech he made upon that occasion, and I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether it is fair to divorce a phrase from the sentence, and to ask the country to believe that the phrase contains the whole of what the leader of the Liberal party intended to say, when every qualifying word and condition are eliminated? I remember the old story about the atheist who said he could prove from the Good Book that there was no God, and he proceeded to prove it by quoting from the Psalms, "There is no God," but omitted to quote the preceding words, "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God." So, these hon. gentlemen opposite, after divorcing from the speech of my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) one or two words, try by repeating over these divorced words to make him say the very opposite of what he did say. What the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) did say was this:

I say the policy should be a policy of free trade, such as they have in England, but I am sorry to say that the circumstances of the country cannot admit at present of that policy in its entirety, but I propose to you that from this day henceforward it should be the goal to which we aspire. I propose to you from this day, although we cannot adopt the policy itself, to adopt the principle which regulates it, that is to say, that, though it should be our misfortune for many years to come to have to raise a revenue by customs duties, these duties should be levied only so far as is necessary to carry on the business of the Government. (Cheers.) I submit to you that not a cent should be extracted from the pockets of the people except every cent goes into the treasury of the people, and not into the pockets of anybody else. (Cheers.) I submit to you that no duty should be levied for protection's sake, but levied altogether and for the purpose of filling the treasury to the limits required. I submit to you that every cent that is levied should be levied, first and foremost upon the luxuries of the people.

That is a plain and a distinct statement; so plain and so distinct that an honest man cannot misunderstand it. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) states here that the interests of this country require that what is necessary to carry on the government of this country shall be raised by customs taxation, and that, unfortunately, it must be so raised, for many years to come. But, he said: The principle underlying the British tariff is a sound principle, and we should keep it as the goal we have in view, and which we hope some day to reach. But those hon. gentlemen opposite will have none of this policy, because it comes from the motherland. When they want a precedent for the liberty of free speech, or a free press, or religious liberty, where do they seek it? They go to the motherland for it, where civil and religious liberty has had its origin. They are glad to take everything of freedom from the mother country, but they shut down on the principle of free trade.

Mr. FOSTER. So do you.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No, Mr. Speaker, we do not. We say that the principle of free trade is a sound principle, but we say that it must be applied with discretion in this country, and that the circumstances of the country do not permit us adopting it at present. I, for one, say: If the circumstances of the country did permit of it, it would be a good thing for Canada. We cannot hope to have it for years to come; but, Sir, we will eliminate, at any rate from the tariff, all that system of protection which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has inserted there, not to raise a revenue, but, as he says himself, to develop certain favoured industries in this country. I submit, for the consideration of hon. gentlemen opposite, a declaration made by that distinguished statesman, President Cleveland, in his inaugural address in 1893. I, for one, at any rate, endorse it. It is not necessary for me to go further than the Liberal platform and the definition given of it by my leader; I give to both my unqualified adhesion, but I say, Sir, that President Cleveland has, in his inaugural address, laid down the principles and the manner in which they should be applied, in a way which, at any rate commands my assent. He says:

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

They could not defy with impunity the inexorable laws of finance and trade. * * * While there should be no surrender of principle, our task must be undertaken wisely, without vindictiveness. Our mission is not punishment, but the rectification of wrongs. If, in lifting the burdens from the daily life of the people, we reduce inordinate and unequal advantages too long enjoyed, this is but a necessary incident of our return to right and justice. When we proclaim that necessity for revenue furnishes the only justification for taxing the people, we announce a truth so plain that its denial would seem to indicate the extent to which judgment may be influenced by familiarity with perversions of taxing power; and when we seek to reinstate the self-confidence and business enterprise of our citizens, by discrediting abject dependence upon governmental favour, we strive to stimulate those elements of American character which support the hope of American achievements.

Substitute the word "Canadian" for "American" there, and you have an admirable exegesis and explanation of the trade policy of the Liberal party in this country. We are not going to rush like a bull in a china shop to destroy vested interests and that kind of thing. We will proceed with prudence, with caution, and, I hope, Sir, with what is markedly absent from the Government's policy—with statesmanship.

Now, Sir, if we can get down to a calm and cool discussion; if these are the two issues which divide the two parties in this country, let us see what the arguments are, pro and con. The protectionists say that a revenue tariff is condemned by the results shown between the years 1873 and 1878. I think I am right in saying that because it has been quoted time and again, not by one, but by twenty of hon. gentlemen opposite. Let me ask is that so? Does our experience of the years between 1873 and 1878 justify that statement? If it does, then you condemn equally our experience of confederation from 1867 to 1873. During that time, when a Conservative Government was in power, you had a revenue tariff, just as you had afterwards when a Liberal Government was in power; and you had a measure of progress, which I think the Conservative party itself would acknowledge as gratifying. Therefore, it appears to me that, if the same tariff was continued from 1873 to 1878 which was in force from 1867 to 1873 and if there was depression and commercial trouble under it, during the latter four or five years you have no right, by any rule of logic to charge it to that system under which the country had progressed so happily in the previous years when the same tariff was in force. It must be remembered that the depression which existed between 1873 and 1878 was not confined in any sense or way to the Dominion of Canada : nor was it in any sense or way consequent on the adoption by the Liberal party of any new fiscal policy. The Liberal party, when they came into power in 1873, merely lopped off, not the mouldering branches, but the growing branches of extravagance, which had grown to an enormous extent in the previous fiscal years, and continued the same fiscal policy, superadding to it a policy of economy and prudence in the public expenditure. That depression under which this country laboured from 1873 to 1878, was a depression world-wide in extent : and I wish to draw the attention of the House to a statement in regard to it made in a book lately published in England, entitled : "England's Foreign Trade in the Nineteenth Century," which received the Cambridge prize, written by a gentleman of the name of Bowley. On page 79, he says :

The most marked features of the diagram of imports and exports since 1870 are the two great falls in value : the first, the most noticeable, in exports, beginning in 1873, and reaching its lowest point in 1878, after which the values increased again till 1882 ; the second beginning, both in imports and exports, in 1883, while the recovery commences in 1886. * * * These changes may be due either to diminution of the actual amount of goods exported and imported, or to a reduction of prices of these goods, or to both causes. We shall see subsequently that, on the whole, the amount rapidly increased, and, therefore, the depression is mainly due to a fall of prices.

Here we have the statement made in this book, which received such commendation as to win the prize at the great University of Cambridge, that the depression began with the year 1873, and culminated in the year 1878, when it reached its lowest point, and that it was caused largely by the fall in prices. The author quotes from the "Statist" the following paragraph in regard to the cause of the depression :—

Having its origin in the excessive lock up of capital in the construction of railways, especially in America and Germany, many of which when built had neither population to use them nor traffic to carry ; in the wild speculation that followed the German assertion of supremacy on the continent ; in the exaggerated armaments, which withdrew an inordinate amount of labour from productive industry and overweighted the taxpayers of the great European nations, and in over-production in the principal trades in all commercial countries ; it was aggravated by a succession of bad harvests in both hemispheres ; by famines in the East and in South America ; by repudiations by governments and other public debtors ; and by the political anxieties which the reopening of the eastern question gave birth to.

The effects of the depression which began in 1873 must not be exaggerated. In the figures of total imports and exports, as published, it is very striking ; but, when we allow for the general and continuous fall in prices, which took place concurrently with the decreased value of imports, we find that the amount (measured in goods, not in money) of foreign trade transacted has continually increased. The depression affected capitalists and their profits, shook credit, checked for many years the outflow of capital abroad, and made employment uncertain for the small proportion of employees and workmen who are dependent on those trades which fluctuate in sympathy with foreign disturbance.

We have here, Sir, a description of facts as occurring in England almost similar to those which occurred in Canada during that great depression—almost similar to those which occurred in Germany, France and the United States. It did not matter what the fiscal policy of any country was, it seemed doomed to share in the extraordinary and general depression of the period. But, Sir, if hon. gentlemen point to the depression which existed from 1873 to 1878, as a warning against our reverting to the revenue tariff policy of the day, does not the same warning apply to countries which had a protective system and in which that depression was intensified ? What would have been the condition of things in those years, when the ordinary depression was intensified by a succession of three or four bad harvests, if my hon. friend at my left (Sir Richard Cartwright), instead of lightening or keeping light the taxation of the people, had chosen to double that taxation upon them ? Did the giving to them of cheap goods harm them ? Did it intensify the depression, or did it relieve it ? The question has only to be stated to be answered ; it answers itself. Is it possible to conceive that if the price of every article which entered into the consumption of every family in Canada had been increased 30 per cent, that would have benefited the people ? The thing is absurd. If while our products brought a low price we had to pay a high price for everything we purchased, bad as the condition of the country was, it would have been intensified tenfold ; and I say that to the firmness with which my hon. friend stood by his guns and refused time and again to increase the taxes of the people, notwithstanding the pressure that was brought upon him—to that firmness the people of Canada owe a great deal more this day than they are prepared to give him credit for.

Now, Sir, I listened the other day to the able speech delivered by my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), wherein he gave examples of the progress made by Canada, even in manufacturing industries, between 1873 and 1878. I listened also to the statements made by the hon. member for North Wentworth (Mr. Bain), who followed in the same line, in a remarkably able speech which was listened to by a thin House, but which I hope hon. gentlemen who had not the pleasure of hearing it will do themselves the pleasure of reading. I say those gentlemen proved beyond a doubt that in this period of universal depression the manufactures of this country steadily and healthfully increased. The increase was one which all fair men who are disposed to do justice to the question could congratulate the country upon, and it showed conclusively that under a revenue tariff the manufactures which we would all like to see grow and increase and fructify in this country, did grow and increase and fructify in the period from 1873 to 1878, in a manner pleasing to every patriotic man. I say further that that fiscal system, although it did not keep all the people in the country, succeeded in stopping a large portion of the exodus that was going on. Our population maintained itself wonderfully during that period, not only in the cities, but in the rural districts; while real estate advanced steadily in value, and in 1878 maintained a price as great if not greater than it did in 1873. More than that, our shipping went on increasing to such an extent that during that period we added to the registered shipping of this country $5,000,000 worth of tonnage. All these things show not only that a revenue tariff is not only good in itself, but is suitable to the condition of affairs existing in this country; we know that, not only from theory, but from a practical application of the principle, not from 1873 to 1878 alone, but also from 1867 to 1878.

Now, Sir, from 1878 until the present, what have we to congratulate ourselves upon? We are told by the Finance Minister that we ought to congratulate ourselves upon our increased foreign trade. But is not his policy one the main object of which is to restrict our foreign trade? That main object of a protective tariff is to exclude foreign goods; yet still the hon. gentleman turns round very coolly and congratulates himself on the fact that the main object he had in view has not been achieved and that the commerce of the country has expanded in spite of his policy. He coolly takes credit to himself as the result of the National Policy of the very expansion in our foreign trade which the National Policy was destined to destroy. He tells us about the increase in our exports. I am not going to dwell upon that point, because it has already been very fully and ably treated by a number of gentlemen behind me during this debate, further than to remark that it is childish to attribute to the National Policy the increase on the quantities exported of the products of the farm, the forest and the sea. The National Policy neither causes the rain to fall, the sun to shine, the grain to grow, our hardy toilers to increase the quantity of their productions nor any of the causes to exist which enable us to augment the quantity and value of Canada's exports. Nor on the other hand, does it affect or control the prices of these exports. The whole difference of opinion as to Canada's rate of progress between the two parties, it seems to me, consists in the aspirations and hopes which animate each of them. These gentlemen opposite are satisfied with the lamentable increase in our prosperity which we have had for the past few years. They are satisfied that a million of our people should have fled from our country in the last decade. They are satisfied that the values of real estate should have fallen 25, 30 and 40 per cent. They are satisfied that ship-building as an industry has been wiped out of existence. They are satisfied that the registered tonnage of the country has fallen, as it has since 1878, $11,000,000 in value. But, we on this side, hope for better and higher things for this young country. We look to the great North-west, and hope to people it; and we hope to do that, not by means of the "vigorous immigration policy" which has characterized hon. gentlemen opposite, but by means of a policy which will give the lands of that country into the hands of actual settlers, by a policy which will not put a paltry 100,000 people there in twenty years, but will establish half a million people there in that period, I venture to say, and I think I am using language of quiet soberness and truth that if it had not been for the unnatural restrictions imposed on the trade and commerce of the country, if it had not been for the unnatural land laws enforced against the settlers, we would have had to-day half a million more people in that country than we have. We, on this side, hope for greater things, and will not be satisfied with the slow rate of progress at which Canada has been going. I listened with pain the other night to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), whose position entitles him to speak with some authority on mercantile matters, when he stated that the progress made on that part of the Dominion from which he and I come, was one with which he is satisfied. Satisfied—when his own metropolitan city of Halifax has lost in population over 7,000 people in the last ten years. Satisfied—when the great province of Nova Scotia has in ten years added but 10,000 people to its whole population. Satisfied—when New Brunswick stands to-day where she stood ten years ago, without 1 per cent added to the number of her population. Satisfied—when Prince Edward Island has added in ten years the enormous number of 97 people to her population. Satisfied—when the real property of all these provinces has gone down in value from 20 to 40 per cent. Satisfied—when our shipping which ploughed the seas a few years ago has disappeared, and $11,000,000 of its tonnage cannot be found. Satisfied—because a few mushroom manufacturing factories have been built up, many of which are closed one-third to one-fourth of the year, and which give employment to a few thousand people at the cost of the great farming, fishing and mining interests of the country.

Well, Mr. Speaker, there may be some things in which we may take just pride. There has been an increase in our savings banks deposits and in our exports and imports. These things indicate that we are going ahead to some extent.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Mr. MONTAGUE. But you did not go ahead in those very things from 1874 to 1878.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The trade policy surely could not control the harvest or determine whether it would be good or bad, and as for imports, I shall show that any decrease was only in the values and not in the quantities. I shall prove that, beyond the shadow of a doubt, by a statistical table which I shall read directly. Judging by the one great factor which determines the prosperity and advancement of a country, there is not that prosperity to-day in Canada that hon. gentlemen opposite, in their hearts, would like to see. Take the population of this country, and what are the facts? Leaving out the question of immigration altogether, and you have a loss in this new country of Canada—a country for which we all, I care not what be our political proclivities, hope better things—of 400,000 people in ten years. Adding to that the 800,000 immigrants no longer in the country, and you have a loss in ten years of 1,200,000 people. How will you get over these facts? Are you going to avoid them by hiding your heads, ostrich-like, in the sand? If you are honest men, you have to look the facts in the face and see if there is anything in the existing system which has given rise to this awful exodus from this new country. Take the maritime provinces, with which I am more familiar. Those of you who know the natural resources of that country, know that they are unequalled in any part of the world. Take Nova Scotia, whose shores are washed with waters teeming with fish, and whose mineral resources cannot be excelled even by the far-famed Kootenay valley of British Columbia; take New Brunswick with its great forest wealth, and Prince Edward Island with its agricultural resources; and tell me why these provinces, peopled as they are by those sprung from the best stock in the world, have retrograded in the past ten years in their population. It is one of the most damning facts ever brought against any policy carried out by any Government. Between 1871 and 1881, our progress was not what it ought to be, but we increased, at any rate, 110,000 people in population during that decade. What have you done to-day? You have introduced your policy of restricting trade and taxing trade and taxing the people in order to build up factories, and you have driven out from these three provinces no less than 165,000 people in the ten years. We all remember the fluent tongue of the Finance Minister, as some years ago, he dwelt with much unction on the natural flow of the people from the rural districts to the cities. I challenge him upon his own ground. Take the cities in the maritime provinces, with populations of over 5,000—St. John, Halifax, Charlottetown, Moncton, Fredericton, Yarmouth and Truro; take their population in 1881 and compare it with the population of 1891, and what have you got? The paltry, pitiable increase of 7,000 in the aggregate. Why, the natural increase in the people should have been 13,000 odd in those cities alone. We have lost, therefore, in ten years, not from the rural districts because many of these have been partially decimated—but in the cities alone of over 5,000 people, where, if anywhere, the policy of the Government ought to show some proof, we have lost not less than 7,000 people, and a total of 165,000 in all the maritime provinces. I say that the factor of population is the one which determines, above all other, the prosperity and advancement of a people. Show me a city or county whose population has doubled or increased 30 or 40 per cent in ten years, and I will show you a county or city where the elements of prosperity exist, where real estate has increased in value, and where the people are thriving, happy and prosperous.

Then, hon. gentlemen opposite tell us, among other things, that if they have not kept the population at home they certainly have given employment to the few who did remain at home. Is that true? I say it is not. Before the census returns came down the hon. gentleman could generalize, but now we are able to bring them face to face with their own official figures which they cannot deny. But what do we find? We find that out of 1,659,000 people engaged in different occupations in Canada, nearly one-half, or 790,000 are employed in agriculture, fishing, lumbering or mining, while only 320,000 are engaged in mechanical pursuits. When you come to analyse the pursuits in which these 320,000 are engaged, how many are found to be engaged in pursuits which are assisted in any sense or way by the National Policy? Why, Sir, it will not be contended that the ordinary carpenters and joiners, or dress-makers, or blacksmiths, or painters, or machinists, or those engaged in other similar trades are in any way influenced or improved by the National Policy.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). Certainly they are.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman interrupts me, without there being any point in his interruption, for a mere assertion such as he makes proves nothing. The hon. gentleman will see that these classes to which I have referred number 255,000 out of 320,000. I have analysed and gone over the census to see how many there are who are directly affected by the National Policy. I find them to be of the following classes: Cotton mill operatives, woollen mill operatives, textile manufactory operatives, not specified, manufacturers and officials of manufacturing companies, mineral and soda water makers, glass blowers and workers, hat and cap makers, hosiery and knitting mill operatives; my hon. friend to my left (Sir Richard Cartwright) had something to say as to the amount they made—linen mill operatives, oil works employees, organ makers, rope, twine and cordage factory operatives, sugar makers and refiners, umbrella and parasol makers, and silk mill operatives. And all totalled up they number some 30,000 people. And this is the sum total of the people who are directly influenced or affected beneficially by the National Policy. And that, Sir, out of a total of 1,659,000 who are engaged in different occupations and avocations in this Canada. Now, Sir, I say that this system is an unjust and unfair system because, while it is a system of protection so far as the goods market is concerned, the hon. gentleman has never had the pluck to carry out his system to its logical conclusion, and give protection to the labour market. The hon. gentleman will protect goods coming into the country because he gets a quid pro quo from those whose interests he protects, but never has the hon. gentleman protected the labourer. He could do that by carrying out the system of excluding foreign labour as he excludes foreign goods, and so allow the Canadian labourer to have an increased price for his day's work. The hon. gentleman from East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) talks about this policy giving a fair day's wage for a fair day's work. But where is the fair day's wage? If the hon. gentleman looks at the returns he will see that the operatives in the cotton factories in Nova Scotia receive an average of 65 cents per day. Is that a fair day's wage for a fair day's work? Wages, Mr. Speaker, is a relative term. The amount of wages a man gets does not determine, fully and finally, whether a man is getting a fair day's wage or not. The determining factor is how much he can purchase with his wage. If a man in England on $1 a day can purchase more of the necessaries of life than can be purchased in a protection country on $1.50, the wages in England, though nominally lower, are really and actually higher. If you will look again at the book from which I have already quoted, you will find this very question of the English workman dealt with, and you will find the position I take set forth in very clear and specific language:

As regards real incomes, that is, wages or salaries reckoned by their purchasing power, their improvement has, according to Mr. Giffen, been continuous since 1775.

From 1775 to 1815 prices rose, but incomes rose still more.

R

From 1820 to 1851 prices fell 33 per cent, while incomes remained steady.

From 1851—

When Mr. Gladstone put the cap stone upon the free trade system——to 1870 prices rose 26 per cent, but incomes rose 66 per cent.

From 1870 to 1890 prices fell 30 per cent, while incomes rose 40 per cent.

In other words, incomes and wages, reduced by index number to the value which gold had in 1871, were approximately in the proportion:

1851	76

These figures must not be used indiscriminately, they merely state that the average workingman could obtain with his wages in 1890 four times as much as those things which are consumed, food, manufactured goods, &c., as a man in a similar position could in 1820. To my mind, these figures speak volumes. It is not enough for the hon. gentleman simply to point to an increase in the number of men or women in a certain industry receiving the wages they got before or even a nominally slightly higher wage, unless he can show that the wage they get enables them to purchase more of the necessaries of life than did the wages they formerly got. One word more from this work upon this point, as I think it important, and I will pass on:

The benefit of this increase of purchasing power has not been equally distributed; it has come mainly to the working classes and to people with small incomes. Our imports consisting so largely of food, it is those who had to consider every penny expended in housekeeping, who are enriched by the reductions in the price of bread, meat, and rice. Since the era of foreign trade there are hardly any in regular employment so poor that they cannot obtain as much bread as they want of a finer quality than middle-class people at the beginning of the century; meat is no longer a rare luxury among any large class of workmen, as it was fifty years ago; it is only necessary to allude to the reduction in price of tea and sugar, which have done so much respectively to make life endurable for adults and for the healthy nourishment of children. At the same time, a variety of food is possible, which must conduce greatly to the health and pleasure of city life.

Now, Sir, let us consider for a moment why the Liberal party condemn the National Policy. I have spoken of the advantages hon. gentlemen opposite claim for it, now let us see why we condemn it. We condemn it, in the first place, because it is a system which wrings from the people millions of dollars for treasury purposes more than the old tariff did. What is the sense of trying to throw dust in the eyes of the people as to the incidence or amount of taxation, when your public accounts show that, whereas during the period from 1873 to 1878 we only levied about seventeen and a half millions per year of taxation, you have been levying, during the past seven or eight years, between twenty-seven and thirty millions. Not, mind you, for the private purposes of the protected manufacturer, but simply for the purposes of revenue. And this has brought about an era of unbridled extravagance. I remember well when, in this House, in 1881, the Conservative party—Tory party I like to call them, because that is what they are—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I see some of them like to be called that. It is not a term of reproach or ought not to be. A Tory is generally an honest man, not the hybrid who calls himself a Liberal-Conservative. We say that when they entered upon their carnival of extravagance in 1881, they began the system of fleecing the people, and taking millions of dollars per year more out of their pockets, to enable them to continue this system of extravagance, than ever was done under the Mackenzie tariff; and we condemn it on that ground. Protection always generates extravagance, I do not care where it is applied. Look at the result in the United States. They have taken so much revenue under their high tariff that at one time they did not know what to do with the money; and the whole country was engaged for years in trying to find out men whom they could pension to use the money up; and hundreds of millions of dollars are to this day being squandered in pensions to thousands of people who do not deserve it, and would not have got it, if that country had not this abominable system of protection in force. Again I say we condemn it because it taxes the people directly for the treasury ten million dollars per year more than they were taxed under the Mackenzie tariff. I have made a very careful calculation upon this point, and I say that between 1878 and 1895 you have taken out of the pockets of the people of Canada at least 80 millions of dollars more under your present tariff than you would have taken out if the Mackenzie tariff had been continued. Mark, I make no reference at all to the millions you have taken from the people which did not go into the treasury; I am speaking entirely of the sum which you took out of their pockets and put into the treasury.

Now, Sir, I have heard gentlemen argue at public meetings and in this House, that the difference between the two policies is not very great, that it is only the difference between 17½ per cent and 31 per cent; that it is not so very much after all. I say, Sir, that the difference represents more than the mere difference between a 17½ and a 31 per cent tariff, and if hon. gentlemen will apply it to the importation of any given quantity of dry goods, they will see what I mean. Take $100 worth of dry goods that came into this country under the Mackenzie tariff. The cost of importation, freight, insurance, &c., are given to me by a gentleman largely engaged in the trade, as amounting to 8 per cent. That makes $108: add the 17½ per cent and you have $125. Then the wholesaler has his profits to the original cost of importation, say 15 per cent, which added to the $125, makes $144. Then he sells to the retailer, who adds his profits of 25 per cent to the $144, making at least $180. So that under a 17½ per cent tariff the consumer pays $180 for goods which cost $100. Now, take it under a 31 per cent tariff. The importer brings in $100 worth of goods upon which he pays $8 as the cost of importing. Add the wholesaler's profit of 15 per cent, and the retailer's profit upon that of 25 per cent, and you have $200 which the consumer pays for $100 worth of goods under a 31 per cent tariff. So that the increased cost to the consumer on these goods is not the difference between 17½ and 31 per cent, but it is $20 on every $100; and any hon. gentleman can figure it out for himself and show me, if he can, wherein that statement is inaccurate. Therefore, I say there is a tremendous difference between the old Mackenzie tariff of 17½ per cent, which is generally known as a revenue tariff, and this protective system of 31 per cent. I say that is one of the evils, one of the minor evils, arising from this protective tariff. Then again, I say, this protective tariff prevents us from getting the benefit of the cheap goods which are produced abroad. The hon. member for North Lanark (Mr. Rosamond), himself a strong supporter of the Government, told us to-day that goods costing a dollar a few years ago, can be bought abroad for 50 cents now; and that is true. I took the trouble a short time ago to examine the statistical returns of the exports from Great Britain as to the great leading textiles. It cost me some time and some labour and, although it may be a little tedious, I think it of sufficient importance to justify me in asking the House to listen while I read some of the figures. This statement was taken from the actual exports and the declared values of those exports, and shows how much goods have fallen in value where they are manufactured. The table I am about to read shows the exports and selling values of the great staple goods in 1874, 1884 and 1894:

Now, Sir, the lessons to be learned from these figures, which are very wearisome to read and still more wearisome to listen to, are these, that although the increase in the quantity of cotton yarns sold in 1884 over 1874 was 23 per cent, it sold for 4 per cent less in value. In 1894 the quantity produced was 12 per cent less, but it sold for 32 per cent less. The same story is told in cotton fabrics, so much so that, as Mulhall puts it, a mile in length of cotton cloth cost £31 in 1874, it cost £23 in 1884, and £18 in 1890. Hon. gentlemen will see from that short synopsis the tremendous fall there was in the price of these fabrics, bearing out entirely the statement of the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Rosamond) that they had fallen, many of these articles, 50 per cent in value. Notwithstanding that fall in value, the people of this country cannot get the benefit of it. I want to show in the next place that notwithstanding the tremendous fall in the prices of goods, we are prohibited by this system of protection from getting the advantage of these cheap goods.

Mr. FERGUSON. How many of these goods were produced in Canada during the same period?

R

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I want to show that this policy which the hon. gentleman supports prevents the people from getting the benefit of the large reduction in the cost of these goods. While there was 23, 25, and in some cases 30 or 40 per cent reduction in the cost of these goods, the abominable policy which he supports prevents the people from getting the advantage of these reductions. In the twenty years there was an increase of over 40 per cent in the quantity of cotton fabrics produced and this increased quantity sold for 5 per cent less price. Take linens. Decrease in quantity, 1884 below 1874, 20 per cent. Decrease in price same period, 27 per cent. Increase in quantity, 1894 over 1884, nearly 1 per cent. Decrease in price same period, 13 per cent. Iron and steel. 1884 produced 40 per cent more in quantity than 1874, and sold it for 21 per cent less price. 1894 produced 24 per cent less quantity than 1884, but sold it for 23 per cent less price. Sugar, refined. 1884 produced in quantity 40 per cent more than 1874, and sold it for 10 per cent less price. 1894 produced 20 per cent less quantity than 1884, but sold it for 35 per cent less. I have done with these figures ; they took me some time to prepare and collate in order to insure their accuracy. They point a moral and adorn a tale, and if the people of the Dominion, while compelled to sell their goods at decreased prices, that is the goods which they export, their grain and other agricultural products which are sent into the markets of the world, are not allowed to benefit by buying cheap goods, then truly is their state most pitiable, they are being fleeced at both ends. If these figures which I have read prove the statements I have made, can any one wonder that people have been fleeing from Canada by hundreds of thousands during the last ten years ? Would not this justify them in leaving this country, great and glorious as this country is, and great and glorious as are its possibilities of development ? If this policy is to continue, if there is no help for the people except the slow rate of progress that has taken place during the past ten years, why should our young men remain here ? If young men on the farm find that the farm is being mortgaged, that it is becoming more heavily involved, are they justified in remaining here to drag along for another ten years instead of going away to better their fortunes abroad ? No, you cannot blame any one. It will be in the future as it has been in the past, unless hon. gentlemen opposite are prepared to recast their policy, or to go to the people, when they will recast it very speedily for them.

I say more than that. The great charge we bring against the National Policy is not so much the increased money it takes out of the people and puts into the treasury, not so much the fact either that it prevents the people from enjoying the benefits which flow from the purchase of cheap goods, but it is this fact, standing prominently above all others, and which is patent wherever a protective system exists—that you are taxing the people not only for revenue but for your protected interests. I was greatly disappointed when the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Rosamond) spoke to-night, and I was disappointed with his speech in this view. I said : here is a practical man ; he challenges the accuracy of the statements made by the hon. member for South Oxford ; he is one of the protected industries of the country, for he owns such an industry himself ; he says that the statements of the hon. member for South Oxford are not correct, he denies them—now he is in a position to disprove them by facts—yet that hon. gentleman did not give us one fact to disprove them. Why did the hon. gentleman not take up the question of cotton, or iron, or cordage, or sugar, or any one of the numerous illustrations which the hon. member for South Oxford gave to prove his statement that you are taxing the people enormously not for the benefit of the treasury but for the pockets of the protected industries, and show that my hon. friend's statement is wrong ? The hon. member for South Oxford did not deal in generalities ; he made a general statement first, and he illustrated it with a wealth of argument and profusion of illustration which was convincing to every open mind that listened to him. If his facts were incorrect, if his illustrations were wrong, who was in a better position to correct them than the hon. member for Lanark himself ? Did he, in the half hour's speech which he delivered to the House, challenge the accuracy, in any one detail, of the figures which the hon. member for South Oxford gave to prove the general statement he made as to the enormous sum of money that is being wrung out of the people in the shape of taxes, not one dollar of which goes into the treasury ?

Take the subject of cordage, to which I have referred, and in which the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) is largely interested, a question which specially affects the interests of that part of the Dominion from which I come ; and I ask the hon. member if that is not a case in point where under a protective policy the manufacturers fleece the people without paying a dollar into the treasury ? How much taxes do you levy ? The customs tax is one cent and a quarter per pound, and 10 per cent ad valorem, equal to 2½ cents per pound. How much does that give us in the treasury ? Almost nothing. In 1894, there was $18,000 collected on cordage of all kinds, the quantity being 776,000 pounds. There was not a dollar paid into the treasury on rope. The monopoly in rope is complete, so much so, that the protective system, so far as rope is concerned, has been carried to its logical conclusion and foreign rope is excluded absolutely from this market. With what result ? With the result that the cordage combine controls the market and the extent of the tariff represents the amount which the consumers of cordage will pay for their cordage in this country. In other words, he will pay 2½ cents per pound more than if the duty was not there. Every dollar of this tax goes into the pockets of the cordage combine. This combine goes down into Newfoundland, where it has to compete with English and American manufacturers, and there the combine sells cordage at 1¾ or 2 cents per pound less than to Canadian consumers. So the people are being fleeced and mulcted in this enormous sum, not for the benefit of this country or its treasury, but with the result that the fishermen of Newfoundland, who fish against our fishermen, are able to obtain their cordage under our protective policy 2 cents per pound cheaper than can our own fishermen. Why did not the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Rosamond) say something about the cotton mills ? We have heard a great deal about the cotton mills and the capital invested in them. The hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Bain) gave the House a statement so far as regards some of the mills in his section, and the effect of protective policy on those who invested capital in those enterprises and the development to which this policy enabled those mills to attain. What has been the effect in the maritime provinces? We have in New Brunswick the St. Croix, the Courtney Bay, the Parks, the Moncton and the Marysville mills; in Nova Scotia there are the Halifax and Windsor mills. In all these enterprises, according to the census, $3,308,000 of capital have been invested in the construction of buildings, machinery, and equipment. They employ 2,215 hands, and pay a large amount yearly in wages. In Nova Scotia the average wages per head is $196, or 65 cents per day. I want to ask this House, with the single exception of the Gibson mill, which occupies a very exceptional position, where are the men and where is the capital that were originally engaged in the establishment of these mills? I have shown the House that instead of encouraging the shipbuilding industry, the Government, by adopting this protective policy, have induced men to invest any capital they had in these mushroom enterprises, with the result I have indicated.

Take the Courtney Bay mill, near St. John; what is its history? It had a capital of some $320,000, it carried on operations for some years and then became involved; the property was mortgaged to carry on the business; the bondholders foreclosed; the enterprise never paid one dollar of dividend and was ultimately sold out, and the shareholders who had put $320,000 into the enterprise, lost every cent. Such was also the case in the adjoining mill, the Parks mill, which under the old Mackenzie regime tariff went on prospering fairly well for a number of years. It followed in track of the Courtney Bay mill, and the capital was lost, the mill mortgaged, and the bondholders foreclosed. It was the same with the Moncton mill, except that the shareholders there got 15 or 20 cents on the dollar out of it, and one or two dividends. The same story runs through them all; men are enticed to put their capital into these mills thinking they were going to make fortunes, and for a year or two, all goes merry as a marriage bell. They get increased prices, but fierce competition between the numerous mills, that grow up in a restricted market, ran the prices down.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) "Hear, hear." I well remember that when the prices came down hon. gentlemen opposite told us: Now you see our prediction is correct. Protection has had the effect we said it would; it developed a home competition which has resolved the question of prices as you want getting cotton as cheaply as you would if it to be resolved, and here you are to-day you were importing it from Great Britain.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That sounded splendidly for a year or two, but what took place? Follow the history of the mills. A year or two had not gone by, after the time you got this cheap cotton, before a fierce competition in a restricted market brought bankruptcy to the cotton mills, and the money lords of Montreal stepped in and bought out these factories for a song. The original investor lost his all. He lost his interest upon his money, and the capital he invested at first. The mills fell into the hands of men who did not even pay cash, but gave their bonds in payment of the few cents on the dollar they offered the original shareholders. The combine was formed, the competition ceased; that took place which always takes place under protection and a restricted market. A monopoly is formed and the monopoly dictates the price. You do not get the cheap cotton now you once did. The competition exists no longer. The mills are owned by the combines. The quantity they shall make and the quantity they shall sell, and when and where they shall sell it, and the price at which it shall be sold, is all dictated by the combines. And so far does that combine go, that although the Marysville mill, owned by Mr. Gibson, is not in the combine directly, yet in order to secure that there should be no competition, they enter into a contract with Mr. Gibson whereby they are bound to take from him everything he manufactures or can manufacture, at a stated price, so that he shall not sell it on the market in competition with them. What is the result? You have excluded the cheap cottons of England by your protective system. Your monopoly has prevented competition at home, and the monopoly dictates the price at which people shall pay for their cotton, and your protective policy enables the combine to add at least 30 odd per cent to the price for which you would be able to purchase the cotton in England if the policy did not prevail. That, Sir, in a nutshell, is the history of your cotton mills; and the history of your cotton mills is the history, very largely, of your other protected enterprises.

I say also, Sir, that in the matter of cotton as in others, the protective system forces the consumer to pay enormous sums every year, which do not go into the treasury at all. What are the facts about the importation of cotton? We imported $4,000,000 worth of cotton last year, and we paid duty into the treasury of $1,140,000. We manufactured in Canada, according to the census of 1891, cotton to the value of $8,000,000, but we paid no duty into the treasury upon that. Did the cotton manufacturers take advantage of the protective duty, or did they make a present of it to the people? Is there a man in this House who believes that they are fools enough, when the law permitted them, not to add the 28 per cent duty to the price. But there is more than the 28 per cent. It costs 8 per cent to import, and the protective system therefore gives them 36 per cent of an advantage. On the $8,500,000 worth of cotton which they manufactured and sold to the people, this 36 per cent would amount to about $3,000,000 taxes upon cotton alone, which the consumers paid, not into the treasury, but into the pockets of the manufacturers.

An hon. MEMBER. Who has got that?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) My hon. friend opposite says, "Where is it; the manufacturers have not got it." It does not follow by any means that because the people paid it the manufacturer makes it as profit.

An hon. MEMBER. Why?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Because he manufactures at greater loss and with less advantage than they do at home in England. The thing is lost absolutely to the consumer and manufacturer.

Mr. CAMERON. Oh.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman does not see it. All I have to say is: I pity the dulness of his brain. Perhaps the whole three million dollars was not taken out of the people. They took a shade below it maybe, and you can knock off, if you like, such sum as they would have to sell their cotton for so as to undersell the imported cotton. They had a protection of $3,000,000, and it may be that they only took $2,500,000, leaving them a half million margin to undersell the cotton that competed with them. As the hon. member from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) has pointed out, the Dominion Cotton Company control eleven mills. They had a capital of $1,500,000. They were making so much money that they were ashamed to pay a dividend on the one and a half millions, because the dividend was so enormously large that the people would have revolted against it. What did they do? They increased their capital by $1,500,000 more, and all but $150,000 of that $1,500,000 was water. They have $3,000,000, therefore, of nominal capital, and of the last one and a half millions only $150,000 was paid in cash. The report they published in 1893 of their earnings showed 10 per cent on the $3,000,000 of capital, but on the last $150,000 cash which they paid in, that would amount to 200 per cent. Therefore, the policy of the Conservative party, while extracting $3,000,000 from the people in the shape of taxes, enables these men to put 200 per cent in their own pockets. My hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Rosamond) stood up here as the representative of the manufacturing industries, himself a manufacturer protected by the tariff, and he disputed the statements made by my hon. friend from South

Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). But why did he not rise in his place and show that, with regard to sugar, or cotton, or iron, or wool, or any one of those enterprises which my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) referred to, there was some mistake in his calculation. No; the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rosamond) was as dumb as an oyster, because he knew that these facts were unanswerable.

Just let me say a word about sugar. Mr. Speaker. My hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) spoke at some length upon this question the other night, and he attempted to make the House believe that the people of Canada got their sugar as cheaply as do the people in the United States, and when he said that, he evidently thought that the question was ended. Well, Sir, was the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood) dealing with perfect frankness in that matter? I say he was not. The hon. gentleman understands that question as well as any gentleman in the House, and he knew that the conditions were entirely different, because up to this year, when the Minister of Finance put his half cent per pound upon the raw sugar, the Canadian manufacturer got his raw sugar duty free, and was protected to the extent of 8-10ths of a cent per pound at first, which latterly was lowered to 64-100ths upon the 100 pounds. Now, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood) says that the Canadians are able to sell sugar as cheaply as they can in the United States. Why? The hon. gentleman knows, in the first place, that the people of the United States have to pay a duty of 40 per cent ad valorem upon the raw sugar, and which 40 per cent goes into the treasury. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood) knows further, that the refiners there are protected in addition $\frac{1}{8}$ of a cent upon refined sugar, and he knows that $\frac{1}{8}$ of a cent is $12\frac{1}{2}$ mills a pound equal to $12\frac{1}{2}$ cents per 100 pounds while ours are protected 64 cents per 100 pounds. The hon. gentleman will see, therefore, by allowing for that difference, that while you have a protection of almost $\frac{2}{3}$ of a cent per pound, they have only a protection of $12\frac{1}{2}$ mills. How much advantage does that give the Canadian refiner over the American refiner upon 100 pounds of sugar? It gives $51\frac{1}{2}$ cents.

Mr. DAVIN. Have not the Americans 40 per cent.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Forty per cent is the duty paid on raw sugar; but, in addition to that, the protection given to the refiners of the United States is in the proportion of $\frac{1}{8}$ c. per pound, as against $\frac{2}{3}$ c. per pound, or nearly so, in this country. So that the sugar refiner of this country gets \$1.50 a barrel more protection on his sugar than the United States refiner. Therefore, if our refiners sell at the same price as the United States refiners, they are pocketing \$1.50 per barrel more than the American refiners are.

Mr. FOSTER. Is $\frac{1}{8}$ c. per pound the only protection ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) One-eighth of one cent on refined and the 40 per cent on raw sugar. The protection they get is $\frac{1}{8}$ c. per pound. The charge I make against the National Policy is that we pay millions every year in the shape of taxes which do not go into the treasury, and that this applies to sugar as well as to other articles. During the year 1893-94, we imported 2,800,000 pounds of refined sugar, on which the duty paid was \$22,230, that is at the rate of 8-10c per pound. That is what the treasury got. On the raw sugar imported, 300,000,000 pounds, which was imported free, the protection of 8-10c. per pound amounted to \$2,400,000, or, at the rate of $\frac{2}{3}$ c. per pound, to which the protection was reduced a year ago, it amounted to \$2,000,000. Where did that money go? Did the sugar refiners make a present of it to the people of Canada? Is not the thing ridiculous and absurd? Are they different from other men? Will they not make anything they can out of the consumers? They will; every one will. It is no wrong to be charged against them. I was sorry to hear the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) attempt to make the public believe that some serious charge was made against the gentlemen engaged in the refining of sugar. We make no charge against them. They are doing what anybody else would do under similar circumstances. We make our charge against the policy which enables them to tax the people for their own benefit. The hon. gentleman talks of the Hon. Mr. Boak, of Halifax, being attacked in this House. I fear that that remark was made by the hon. gentleman for a political purpose, and a political purpose only. I have sat in this House for thirteen or fourteen sessions, and during that time I have never heard a word said against Mr. Boak or any one associated with him because of their connection with the sugar industry. If the protective policy enables him and others who have invested their capital in the sugar industry to charge two or three million dollars a year to the consumers more than they would otherwise be obliged to pay, they are not to blame; but the men who are to blame are those who maintain that policy upon the country. It is the policy we protest against which enables us to impose upon the people every year millions of dollars of taxes, not one dollar of which goes into the treasury. The product of the refineries is shown by the census of 1891 to be equal to \$17,000,000 in value. Suppose we had imported that quantity from Great Britain free of duty, you would have saved exactly one-eighth of that amount, because you would have got the sugar one-eighth cheaper, that is, \$2,125,000. That is nearly exactly the sum you compelled the people of Canada to pay on refined sugar in 1893-94, and not a dollar of it went into the treasury. That is the charge we make. We do not complain of taxing cotton or wool or sugar or anything else such reasonable sums as they ought to bear to discharge the burdens of the state. That has to be done. We are not fools; we know that a revenue has to be raised, and we are prepared to levy the necessary taxation to produce it. But we are not prepared, as my leader says, to impose one dollar of taxes on the people unless that dollar is paid into the public treasury.

Now, I want briefly to show the House how the public have been fleeced in the matter of coal oil. I will not speak of the amount the Trade and Navigation Returns show was paid by the people in direct taxes. I will show from certified invoices, which I hold in my hand, that the rate of taxation we pay in the maritime provinces is over 150 per cent. These invoices, which were made last October, were handed to me by the importer, and they are certified by the customs officer with the seal of the Customs Department upon them; and what do they show? Four tanks of refined oil were imported, valued at $791, on which the amount of duty paid was $1,130.28, a duty of 150 per cent. Another invoice, two or three days afterwards, was for six tanks of refined oil, valued at $1,077, on which the duty paid was $1,538.70, a duty of 150 per cent. If there are gentlemen in this House who can uphold or defend the continuance of such a wrong as that, I have nothing more to say. I say it is unjust, and they know it is unjust; it is taxing the people unduly and unfairly on one of the most ordinary necessities of life.

But hon. gentlemen say, "Oh, well, if you have to pay more for your goods, our policy protects the farmer"; and I want rapidly to say one or two words on that. I do not think any more silly argument is used or could be used by hon. gentlemen in support of the proposition that the protective system should be continued than that it protects the farmer. How can it protect the farmer? What are the facts? Look at the Trade and Navigation Returns: Is Canada or is it not an exporter of a surplus of farm products? I hold in my hand an extract made from the Trade and Navigation Returns, which shows that in butter, cheese, lard, bacon and hams, shoulders and sides, salted beef, mutton, salted pork, poultry and game, canned meats, and other meats, we export an enormous quantity, amounting in value to nearly $18,000,000. What do we import of these products? We import $575,000 worth. Now, can any gentleman argue without laughing, that a country that exports that quantity and imports practically nothing can be protected by an import duty? What do you do with your barley, your beans, your oats, your buckwheat, your pease, your wheat? You send them abroad, because your market is there. Does the putting of a duty on increase the price of these things. What do you do with your mackerel? Suppose you put a duty of $10 a barrel of mackerel, would it increase the price. Not a cent, because all our mackerel is shipped abroad, and finds its market in the United States.

Mr. FOSTER. How about pork?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not think it increases the price of pork at all.

Mr. FOSTER. Then why did you want a high duty on it?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will just come down to the very question of pork. We exported pork in the shape of bacon and ham, shoulders and sides, to the extent of about $2,000,000 in value, and we imported $96,000 worth.

Mr. IVES. We imported much less than we used to do before the duties were imposed.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman stick to the point? I am arguing that where you are an exporter of an article in the proportion in which you export this, the putting on of a duty cannot affect the price.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Would you take it off?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The Finance Minister has done me the honour of asking me a question, and his friends seem very anxious to prevent me replying. I was going to answer it. I tell the hon. gentleman that the price paid for pork to the farmers—that is the undressed hog—is regulated by the market price in Chicago. I took the pains to go to the leading packers in the town from which I come, and I asked them the question so that I might read their answer in Parliament or elsewhere—and I have read it to thousands of farmers at many meetings—and they answered that the price they paid to the farmers is regulated by the price paid in Chicago. It is true, as was well shown by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that, owing to the wonderful facilities they have in Chicago for packing pork, they are enabled to sell it, when packed in barrels, cheaper, perhaps, than we can, but the price paid to the farmers is the same in the pork-packing states as is paid in the pork-packing centres of Canada.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Would you take the duty off?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If we were in power the duties would be regulated according to a revenue tariff. That would be treated in the same way as other articles, and there would be no discrimination made.

But I have wearied the House already too long on these points and shall pass on. This system is indefensible on the grounds I have stated. It is utterly extravagant. Hon. gentlemen opposite entered upon a career of extravagance in 1881, and I wish to do the Finance Minister the justice of saying that I believe he made strenuous efforts, a few years ago, to stop it, but found himself powerless. With all his desires for economy and retrenchment, he was absolutely powerless in the hands of those who live by extravagant public expenditure. The expenditure under the Conservative Government, as I said before, has increased by $14,000,000 yearly. If we should come into power, we shall be able to reduce that expenditure enormously.

Mr. FOSTER. How much?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will tell the hon. gentleman how much, but before doing so I will call his attention to a statement made by the Minister of Railways a couple of years ago. What did the hon. gentleman say then? He said, two years ago, when the expenditure was $2,000,000 more than it is proposed to be next year, that it could not be cut down one dollar. Let me read from his speech on the Budget in 1894. He was then in a state of chronic defiance. He defied everybody. He defied the leader of proposed to be next year, that it could not down the expenditure one dollar. He defied the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) our future Finance Minister, to show where he could make any reductions. He spoke as follows:—

I defy the hon. gentlemen opposite to show in what particular they intend to reduce the amount of expenditure in this country. I defied them last session to do this, and I defy them again. Before the people of the country will consent to put these hon. gentlemen in power, they must be prepared to show in what respect the amount levied upon the people is in excess of the country's requirements. * * * What item is the hon. gentleman going to reduce; in what manner is he going to lighten the imposts upon the country? * * * What a farce it is for these hon. gentlemen to state that if they get into power, they will lessen the burdens of the people.

That was the song which the hon. gentleman sang in 1894. He said: I have looked over the public expenditure—civil service, public works, militia, North-west, and all the rest—and I defy you to cut down a dollar. He told us the same story five or six years ago, when the country was alarmed at the extravagant expenditure on the Intercolonial. I told the hon. gentleman from my place, year after year, that it was in the knowledge of every man in the maritime provinces that the Intercolonial was run on a scale of extravagance which was appalling, that if any man with a business head on his shoulders took charge, $600,000 or $700,000 a year could be knocked off without injury to the public service; that this money was being recklessly squandered by an extravagant Administration for political purposes. I was challenged, and my statements were scouted; yet, two years later, the hon. gentleman came down and reduced the expenditure $600,000. And, having reduced it $600,00, he congratulated the country that the administration of that department was better than it had ever been. Then he came down and defied us to cut down our general expenditure another dollar. Yet to-day he proposes to cut down the expenditure $1,600,000 for the coming year. He told us it was not possible to cut down the expenditure one dollar on the Intercolonial, and he cut it down $600,000. Then, he said that it was not possible to cut down the expenditure of the general service, and the Finance Minister proposes to cut it down $1,600,000. What reliance can we place on the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite when they make statements of that kind?

Mr. FOSTER. That seems to trouble you.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The trouble is the hon. gentleman has not gone far enough in the right direction, but I will tell the hon. gentleman that I am satisfied with the statements made by my hon. friend from Winnipeg as to the extent to which reductions can be made in the public expenditure without injury to the public service. What did that hon. gentleman show? He showed that the expenditure of 1894 had increased $14,000,000 over that of 1878. He showed that the increase of population in that period was only 22 per cent, which might justify an increase of $5,000,000 in expenditure. That would make a justifiable increase of expenditure in 1894 over 1878, of $5,000,000. Suppose we throw in another five million for expenditure fastened on the country in the shape of interest and charges imposed by hon. gentlemen opposite, and which we cannot get rid of. Suppose we throw in five million dollars more, and allow an increase in proportion to the increase of the population. There is still a saving of $4,000,000 which a good economical, strong Government—strong in its support by the people—could and will effect. I do not think that is an extravagant sum. I believe that saving can be effected, and if we come into office we shall do it. How does the hon. gentleman stand to-day? I remember his casting sneers across the House at the fact that, owing to the depreciation in the value of goods, there was not sufficient money raised by the Mackenzie Administration to meet expenditures, and there was, consequently a deficit for several years. That deficit was a terrible thing, but the burden of their plaint has now changed. I hold, Mr. Speaker, that a deficit is not a thing to condemn a financier for, unless it is caused by extravagant expenditure. In what position does the hon. Finance Minister stand to-day? $1,250,000 deficit last year; $4,500,000 this year, $3,000,000 next year; following each other in rapid succession.

Mr. FOSTER. Where do you get your $3,000,000?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will show the hon. gentleman. He levies $1,800,000 increased taxation to meet an anticipated deficit of $3,000,000, and then he hopes that the balance will be made up by betterment of trade. Suppose his hopes are not realized. What then? We will have a deficit of $1,250,000 next year, notwithstanding the additional taxation of $1,800,000 which he is going to impose upon the people. Sir, the chickens are coming home to roost; the hon. gentleman has learned that when there is a depression, the Finance Minister ought not to be held responsible for the decreased revenue resulting from customs ad valorem duties. He never was the man, though, to say that, to my hon. friend regarding his period of administration. The facts then were as the facts are now, but to these is superadded the extravagant expenditure to which the hon. gentleman has succeeded and which will never be reduced until another party comes into power. For this I condemn the Government.

I say further that they have developed administrative negligence besides. I was going to say official corruption. Yes, I will say official corruption—corruption in the highest places. Why, Sir, we have had here but a few years since a scandal at the very mention of which every Canadian had to hang his head in shame. Is there a man here who walked through the streets of London during the time of the investigation into the Langevin-McGreevy-Connolly scandal who did not feel the shame of it as a Canadian? Is there a man here who read in the English newspapers that out of four millions of dollars spent in contracts in Canada about one million dollars was stolen, who feels any pride in the fact that, though the case was probed to the bottom and those who were responsible shown up to the public gaze, to this day no man has been punished unless you except the farce of six weeks imprisonment which was awarded to two of the minor culprits? Why, Sir, the thing is disgraceful in the extreme. And have they improved? Where is the Langevin block scandal to-day? Has that been investigated; have those who were responsible for criminal expenditure of public money been punished? No, not even the first step has been taken. Where is the Caron-Ross-Beemer scandal? In this case $25,000 was personally paid to a member of the cabinet who, in his turn, advises the giving of railway subsidies to the corporation from which he derived the $25,000. Is that gentleman morally more guilty than the rest? No; for every man of them endorsed his action, every man of them voted to support his action as politically and morally right. He told them he was prepared to do it again, and they applauded him to the echo. It is not the hon. Postmaster General I condemn; he is the victim of circumstances. He did it for his party and they applauded him and voted to declare his action perfectly correct. Then you had the Harris land job which stinks in the nostrils of the better disposed people of St. John. Then you have the Tay canal, the Sheik's Island dam, and the Galops Rapids. You had the culminating scandal when within a hundred miles of the capital city you had $200,000 stolen on a $200,000 contract. What about the Curran bridge scandal? Did hon. gentlemen read the remarks made by the judge who presided at the preliminary investigation? An hon. member behind me read a portion to the House the other day, but the House was thin? Will he allow me to read some of these remarks.

An hon. MEMBER. Fire away.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) "Fire away" says the hon. gentleman. Of course we can "fire away," but the question to which the country will demand an answer is, when the judge in his place has declared that $200,000 has been stolen from the country, who are the culprits and how have they been punished? And if the Government say: No: the departments are so mixed up in this scandal we dare not punish, the tax-payers will repudiate the reason. On every hustings in Canada these facts will be spoken and the tax-payers will require an answer. The Government prosecuted one of the men the other day, for what? For obtaining $170,000 under false pretenses. The judge dismissed the charge. I do not myself agree with the legal conclusion the judge drew. But I am not concerned with that. I am concerned with the facts which he stated and upon which there could be no difference of opinion. And what did the learned judge say? After reciting the charge he says:

Defendant sent in his accounts periodically, as the work was in progress, for the labour so furnished by him, and his accounts were certified by the officers of the Government, and the signatures of the latter to that effect affixed to the documents. The different accounts sent in by the defendant to the Government for labour furnished aggregate $275,655.34. On the strength of these accounts the Government paid him $220,550.20, and now complains that he has made overcharges in his accounts.

The two experts took cognizance of the contract for labour above mentioned obtained by the defendant, and the pay-lists and accounts rendered by the latter to the Government (and filed in this case). They also had communication of the depositions of a number of the witnesses—

Acting upon the said information, the two experts made their respective reports separately. One of them, Mr. Vanier, certifies that the defendant has already been overpaid $95,000 besides what he still claims, and the other, Professor McLeod, says he has been overpaid $100,000, also independent of what he still claims.

The prosecution has produced about forty carters who had been employed on said works. They all claim to have been employed for a shorter period of time and to have been paid smaller amounts than those charged by the defendant.

The prosecution, in support of their pretensions that the defendant has made overcharges for carters, have produced witness Henri Frigon, a brother-in-law of the defendant, who swears that he was employed from the 6th of March to the 21st of April, hiring men and checking the time of the carters who worked at the excavations for the Grand Trunk bridge. He says he kept two little books to that effect, which were given to him by Mr. Villeneuve, another brother-in-law of the defendant. It appears by these two little books, compared with defendant's pay-list, that the defendant overcharged the Government upwards of fifty thousand hours for carters during the said lapse of time (about 47 days).

He also admits that he entered in his said books as carters about twenty-five fictitious names of persons, who, of course, never worked at all. He says he entered such fictitious names at the request of Villeneuve, who wanted to raise a sum of money to buy himself a horse and rig, and for other outside expenses.

Frigon further says that defendant was aware of such fictitious names being put in. Frigon also admits that while being paid $4.50 per day to keep the carters' time, as aforesaid, he managed to obtain from Mr. Kennedy another similar pay of $4.50 per day, for services supposed to be rendered on the Wellington bridge, and he says he was to look after the tools and materials used for the construction of the Grand Trunk bridge, thus making for himself the snug pay of $9 per day from the 7th of March to the 21st of April.

Frigon also asserts that he received from Villeneuve, besides his $9 a day, about $300 per month, money raised by fictitious names on the lists, and says he used this money towards a payment of expenses, wine, cab-hire, kitchen expenses, &c., for the benefit of St. Louis' job.

Now, with regard to the overcharges alleged to have been made by the stonecutters, Mr. Leonard Shannon, accountant, proves that the amount charged to the Government by the defendant for stonecutters on the three different works, namely, Wellington bridge, Grand Trunk bridge and Lock No. 1, is $42,535.25, exclusive of the time for foremen stonecutters. Expert witness, Mr. McLeod, gives his estimate for the cost of stone-cutting, and fixes it at $10,953.98, making a difference or overcharge by defendant of $31,581.29. Michael Doheny says that he counted the stonecutters for the three different works every day from the 20th March until the 17th May, a period of 58 days, and entered them in a book, which he filed. His figures, compared with the pay-list of the defendant, shows an overcharge by the latter of 3,307 days, equal to upwards of $10,000 during the said period of time.

Charles Latour, mason, says he worked four days in all. C. Latour, who appears to be the same person, is charged in the defendant's accounts for 49 days, plus 30 hours' overtime.

Aime Rateau worked for about six or seven days, including night time, had an accident then and worked no more. He is charged in the defendant's account as having worked 38 nights at $4.60 per night; that is to say, he is charged as having been paid for overtime whilst he was in the hospital disabled.

Zepherin Leveille worked 16 days, and is charged in the defendant's accounts as having worked 45 days, and so forth for the others, who all say that they have worked and were paid for a much shorter time than that charged by the defendant.

According to the accounts filed by Mr. St. Louis, the cost of cutting the stone for said Wellington bridge, Grand Trunk bridge and Lock No. 1 averages $30 per cubic yard, and we have the testimony of Mr. J. B. de Lorimier, contractor, to the effect that the same work would cost about $4 and a fraction per cubic yard, if made in ordinary circumstances, but that it would cost more, of course, if made by night work or Sunday work.

Mr. McLeod says it should cost an average of about $7 per cubic yard.

And here is where the department's malfeasance comes in:

In the tenders of Mr. St. Louis, above referred to, no mention is made of timekeepers, although, according to the evidence, they were just as necessary as the foremen, if not more so, for the proper execution of that large enterprise.

As there was no provision for timekeepers, according to Mr. St. Louis' contract, those assistant timekeepers were entered in Mr. St. Louis' accounts as night and overtime foremen, day masons, overtime skilled labourers. On that ground the defendant is charged with having obtained $1,861.40 by false pretenses.

There was no proper surveillance by the officers of the Government, on two of the jobs at least; namely, the Grand Trunk bridge and Lock No. 1 of the Lachine Canal. The timekeeping on the two latter jobs seems to have been left to take care of itself, as far as the Government officers were concerned.

Mr. St. Louis procured all the workmen that were asked of him. He did not keep their time personally. He had several clerks to do it. Those clerks made the lists, and one of them stuffed the lists. There can be no doubt as to that, because it is sworn to by himself, to his own disgrace, and when those lists were so made and cooked, they were certified blindly, and as a mere matter of form, by the officers of the Government. On the strength of those lists, so certified, the money was obtained from the Government. Every man's pay was put in a separate envelope, with his name on it, and distributed to the men, fictitious or real. One can conceive how easy it may have been to distribute loaded envelopes to fictitious men, or rather to men personating men, when it is known that sometimes as many as 800 men were there together shoving and jostling for their wages; so much so that the paying clerks had to require the services on some occasions of as many as 20 policemen to prevent the shanty where they were sheltered, from being overturned.

Who can wonder at it when men who never worked a day, were paid for 30, 40 and 50 days work? He winds up:

As stated above, I believe, after studying this record, that there have been frauds committed to the detriment of the Federal Government, but I do not think that they were as large as alleged. Mr. St. Louis' contract was extremely favourable to him. He was allowed $4 a day for a foreman stonemason, day time, and $6 a day for the same foreman for night or overtime; $8 for the same foreman on Sundays, and at the rate of $12 for the same foreman for Sunday overtime. He was allowed $5 a day for a double team, and $10 a day for the same double team on Sundays. He was allowed $2.50 a day for the use of a derrick, day time, $3.75 for the use of the same derrick night or overtime, and at the rate of $7.50 a day for the same derrick for Sunday overtime, and so forth on the same scale for stonemasons, stonemasons and skilled labourers.

It is no wonder that Mr. St. Louis' bills must have been tremendous, when it is remembered that the job lasted about four months, and that there were at times as many as two thousand men at work in the day time, and 1,500 men at work at night time. The men were paid alternately every week. Mr. Michaud tells us that some of the pays amounted to $34,000, some $10,000, some $15,000 and some to $20,000. In my opinion, the main causes of all the trouble in this matter are:

1st. The exorbitant prices stipulated for labour in Mr. St. Louis' contract; and

2nd. The almost unlimited number of men allowed on the said works, so numerous that they were in one another's way, and Mr. St. Louis cannot be held criminally responsible for these causes.

Now, Sir, I have at some length given those facts because they stand out in broad, black and damning disgrace of the department under which they were carried on. I say if these things can be done within a hundred miles of Ottawa, what must be done in contracts carried out 1,000 miles away. If such things can be done in the green tree what, I ask, may be done in the dry? Hon. gentlemen know that in this matter the Government have been guilty of criminal neglect. They know that in this matter there has been no business application, no business conduct. As in all other matters, everything seems to drift. There is a want of business knowledge, a want of business application. The country seems drifting slowly to the dogs. They let men get what prices they like, exorbitant prices, prices three, four, and five times more than they would pay if they were carrying out a private contract of their own. The public can judge why the Government pay these awful and exorbitant prices to men who, it was shown, give large contributions to their election funds. And we have to-day these gentlemen, not, mind you claiming exemption from the scandals of a year or two ago, but revelling in the scandals of the present. There is a want of business capacity which marks their dealings, not only in the Customs Department, but in Public Works, in the Railway Department, and throughout the whole Government. The heads of the Government seem to be gone. The men who guided them and to whom they looked up for inspiration and advice, have gone away, and we have the dregs left. The hon. gentleman moved a want of confidence, I almost wonder he took the trouble. Let them die, die as they are dying, through sheer inanition.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. member who has just taken his seat has not gone over a great deal of ground, although he has spoken at considerable length. He started out—because I will come right to business with him—by a statement that not only did the National Policy take out of the pockets of the people the amount of the duty, but it also took out of the pockets of the people fully as much again. Now, Sir, that statement was made by the hon. member for South Oxford; it was also made from the back benches: and with the permission of the House, I will reply to what the hon. member for South Oxford said:

We have the most awful tariff exactions. We have had a taxation of sixty millions a year since 1879, and a billion of dollars have been taken out of the pockets of the people.

He is fond of that billion, because you remember that in summing up what our indebtedness is, he declares on his own ipse dixit that it is also a billion, without giving rhyme or reason for that statement. Said he: We tax ourselves to the extent of $60,000,000 a year; in 16 years, $450,000,000; the cost of collection equals half of the revenue; although we have statistics to prove that it does not equal the half of half. Yet the hon. member for South Oxford, in the most reckless manner, declares that it equals half. Then he goes on to add to that an amount that brings it up to a billion dollars:

So far as our tariff is a protective measure, the taxation is the total consumption of imported goods, plus the goods manufactured under that tariff in the country.

Precisely the same statement, though not made so formally nor so definitely, has been made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. Again, I will quote the hon. member for South Oxford:

The more manufactured, the more taken out of the pockets of the people. Where the goods manufactured are four times the amount of the goods imported, then you may fairly conclude that it will take four times, or five times more out of the pockets of the people than it puts into the treasury.

So the argument is irrefutable, the richer you make a country in manufactures, the more certainly do you rob the people generally, and the sure course to wealth would be to blight every manufacturing industry that could arise! That is the logic of these gentlemen, that is to say, if they ever give a thought to logic. But I think after the speech to which we have just listened and the previous speeches from the Reform side of the House, I do not think we shall come to the conclusion that there is much logic at all events in one part of the debate. Take cotton. We have had the version of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), and I will give the House the versions of the hon. member for North Norfolk and of the hon. member for South Oxford. The latter hon. gentleman gave the total import as the value of $4,000,000; total value of manufactured articles, $10,000,000; tax, $5,600,000; amount paid into the treasury, $1,140,000, while the manufacturers receive $4,460,000. The hon. member for Norfolk said the manufacturers receive $2,250,000, and the hon. member for Queen's placed the amount at $3,000,000. Which of those hon. gentlemen is right? Because surely when we are here in the great council of the nation discussing so important a question as the tariff of the country we are not to be told that a million dollars one way or another on a single item of the fiscal policy is of no account whatever. Why, Sir, it is trifling with the question. Here is an hon. gentleman sitting on the front Opposition benches, who if the Reform party came into power, as he anticipates—hope tells a flattering tale just now, and the hon. member for South Oxford anticipates the same outcome, and on the back benches one hears a curious squeak like an echo, that the party is coming into power, but we have heard that cry before, and it has died away and nothing came of it—the hon. member for Oxford would be Finance Minister and the fiscal policy of this country would be entrusted to his tender mercies and the member for Queen's would be in the ministry, as also would be the hon. member for North Norfolk. If those three hon. gentlemen on one item of the fiscal policy differ so much that one says $2,500,000 is taken by manufacturers, another $3,000,000, and another $4,000,000, I think the public are in a position to demand from them what they mean; under which king they serve; to which estimate they will adhere; and that when hon. gentlemen opposite call upon a Tory Government to explain a difference of $50,000 or even $10,000, the Reform party should not be permitted to say that one million or two millions of dollars amounts to nothing. And it matters nothing, because the speech of the hon. member for Oxford, like the speech to which we have just listened, and like the speeches of a member of the Reform party with whom I would not compare them for a minute, whom I would put above and apart from them, show the utmost recklessness, not merely in regard to one detail of that policy, but the utmost recklessness of statement as to what their general policy is. What have we heard in regard to the policy they have placed before the House during the present debate? We need not go over the debates from year to year. We need not take up what they said in 1879, and then go to 1888, when they began to set forth their commercial union policy, and to 1889 when they proposed unrestricted reciprocity, and to 1890 when they wobbled again. Then we had the leader of the Reform party down at Boston de-declaring for continental free trade, a declaration made in a speech in which I was amazed to see he went back to the war time and was somewhat unfaithful to Canada, and I thought unjust to England, to gain the applause of the Americans who were listening to him. When I read that speech I could not help remembering how a great Liberal and a great man, and splendid orator behaved in the teeth of the war sentiment, when men were aroused and almost mad, how Joe. Howe attended a great meeting held at Detroit in 1865, stood before the people and told them he would not take back one single action, that the people of Canada behaved as a free people should have done, and he asked them: Is there an Irishman, Englishman, Scotchman or American who would for one moment surrender the right of asylum to people coming from other countries? That was the way in which a great man and a great patriot acted on that occasion. Then we come back to 1892, when there was a wobble again. Again, in 1893, there was something different. Now, in 1894, we have their new policy defined. That policy is a curious one, because I find in the speeches of the hon. member for North Norfolk, and the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Macdonald), and other hon. members on the Opposition side of the House that they are constantly harking back to the beauties of reciprocity with the United States and point out the value of the American market. They are belated reciprocityists; they are belated politicians; they are unable, however, to change with the facility of their leaders, whose views change with the regularity of pilots looking out on a shifting sky, and as they find the breeze veer, trim their sails and fix their rudders. Sir, the hon. gentlemen were discordant in their own speeches; they were discordant in their own cries and in their oratory—shall I call it oratory, or is it not the parrottery of discordant cries? Take the very point that hon. gentlemen opposite have sought to make, namely, that so much money has been taken out of the pockets of the people by the manufacturers that in sixteen years a billion of money has been extracted. Of course if that is so, the result must be that not only would the manufacturers under the policy of the Conservative Government put the natural profit into their pockets, but also put into their pockets the amount which it is said is given them, because, and an hon. gentleman repeated it to-day—they have it as pat as a b c, and can go over it as a child can go over its alphabet, but if they go over it for ever it will be useless and have no effect because its monstrously ridiculous character is manifest the moment it is stated—they say the manufacturers get not merely the natural profits on what they manufacture, but also the duty, and not only the duty but the percentage on the duty, and not only that but they put so much in their pockets in addition and they are thus able to fleece the country; and this last sum never goes into the treasury. I have stated that the Reform party in this House is a party of discordant cries, and I find proof of this in the speeches of several hon. members, including the hon. member for Oxford and the hon. member for North Norfolk, because the hon. member for North Norfolk committed himself to this one point, which I dwell on, for it is the centre of their position, and the falsity of which, if proved before a public audience, breaks through their line of battle. We need not trouble to answer them because they answer themselves. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) makes precisely the same statement as the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and precisely the same statement as the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). Yet in his own speech is found a triumphant answer, where he endeavours to show that the manufacturers were as successful from 1871 to 1878, and from 1868 to 1871, as they were subsequently under the National Policy, and this is what he says:

If it can be shown that, even though the product was larger in 1871 or in 1881, the business was still unprofitable, some argument would be given in favour of a change which would make the business more profitable. What do the figures show?

He asked triumphantly what do the figures show? And he finds that the percentage of profits in 1871 for the manufacturers was 73 and in 1881 it was 42 per cent. One would think that under this protective system, by which the manufacturers are said, by hon. gentlemen on the Liberal benches, to put large sums of money into their pockets, that the profits would be much higher in 1891, but alas, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) finds that in 1891 the percentage of profit was only 33·6 as compared with a higher profit in 1881, and a still higher profit in 1871. Let us ask these gentlemen: where then did all this money go that was taken out of the pockets of the people and put into the pockets of the manufacturers? The moment they are posed with that question, we have them saying, as the hon. member for Queen's said "Oh, it is taken out of the pockets of the people but nevertheless it ruins the manufacturer." They tell us that the manufacturer gets not only the natural profit on what he produces, but that he also gets a percentage on the very duty, and nevertheless that it ruins him completely. Such a contention as that has only to be stated in order that its absurdity may be seen. The hon. member (Mr. Davies) again made, what struck me as a very peculiar assertion. He told us that the Liberal party were not going to be "free traders as they are in England"; although I confess that I thought I actually heard the leader of the Opposition say so. I thought I heard that the hon.

gentleman (Mr. Laurier) declared for "free trade as they have it in England." If that is not the policy of the Liberal party, then what was the meaning of half the speech of the hon. member (Mr. Davies)? He devoted half his time to showing, that things are in a very prosperous condition in England. Well, there was no necessity to do that, if the Liberals are not going to give us free trade as it is in England. Again he says: Although that is not our policy, we are going to aim at it, and the great principles that underlie free trade as it is in England, are the principles we go by. Well, Sir, it rather struck me as if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) denied that the Liberals wanted free trade as it is in England, and then felt uneasy lest the people were convinced that that was exactly what they wanted, and so he went on to prove that it would be a very good thing indeed. What else was the significance of all which he read out of that little red book? He told us of falls in values, but we all knew about that. He told us that wages had risen comparatively, because the purchasing power of money was greater; or in other words, he told us that the price of labour had not fallen with the same rapidity as the price of commodities. Well, Sir, we all knew that, and we all knew further that the very same thing has happened in Canada, and that the value of commodities in this country have decreased in greater ratio than has that of labour. The hon. gentleman described his chief as "having spoken with a wealth of argument and profusion of illustration rarely equalled." Well, Sir, I have heard the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) frequently. I have heard him in and out of this House, and all I can say is this: that the only way in which during this debate he varied from his past, was in being more verbose (and I was astonished to find that was possible) more flatulent, more reckless in assertion, more careless of his facts, and altogether weaker than I have ever known him to be for many a year. Yet, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) in an excited strain tells us "that there was a wealth of argument and a profusion of illustration that was utterly astonishing" in the speech of his leader (Sir Richard Cartwright). The wealth of argument consisted in giving us two long speeches in which he raised one question after another that had no bearing whatever on the issue before the House, and then leaving the actual issue undiscussed. He told us, in defiance of all statistics prepared even by Reformers, that real estate was reduced in value, and left the subject without an attempt at proof. What, however, has that to do with the tariff? During the course of his two long speeches, he never discussed with any illumination nor with any care the changes made in the tariff, and he utterly failed to grapple with the speech of the Finance Minister. Then, imitating the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) brought forward an illustration about cotton. He told us that year after year, England exported large quantities of cotton than ever before and at lower prices. That we did not need to be told, for every one with any knowledge of contemporary or past history, knows it. Although he was in the House at the time, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) might have known that when parties were on different sides of this House, when steel rails were higher by a vast percentage than they are now, and higher by a vast percentage than when the Reform party went out of power; the hon. gentleman might have known that in a falling market, with scandalous want of prudence, if not scandalous corruption, the Reform party went on buying steel rails. The hon. gentleman said that Canada was deprived of buying these cheap cottons because of the tariff. Well, strange it is, that Canada buys cottons and buys them to a very great extent, giving a large and handsome revenue to the treasury because of the amount she buys. If the statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) in that respect has any significance at all, it would be in the inference from it, that the prices of cotton had remained the same in Canada as they were some years ago. But let me read the prices in Canada. In 1878, gray cotton sold at 7½ cents per yard; in 1885, at 4¼ cents per yard, and in April 1895, at 4½ cents per yard. So on with the various grades. Cotton at 7¾ cents per yard in 1878 fell to 5 cents in April, 1895; cotton at 8¼ cents in 1878 fell to 5½ cents per yard in April, 1895; cotton at 9⅞ cents per yard fell to 6¼ cents in April 1895; cotton sold at 9⅞ cents in 1878, sold for 6¾ cents in April 1895; cotton sold at 11¼ cents in 1878, sold for 7½ cents in 1895. White sheeting which sold for 25½ cents in 1878, sold for 16½ cents in 1895. Canton flannels which sold for 10½ cents in 1878, sold for 8 cents in 1895; what cost 11½ cents in 1878, fell to 8¼ cents in 1895; what cost 12 cents in 1878, cost only 9 cents in 1895; what cost 14 cents in 1878, fell to 10½ cents in 1895; and what cost 17 cents in 1878 cost only 12¼ cents in 1895. The prices of cotton bags fell in the same way; what cost $24.50 in 1878 fell to $18 in 1895; what cost $22.50 in 1878 fell to $14.75 in 1895. Cotton yarns, whites, fell from 23½ cents per pound to 12 cents per pound; and cotton yarns, coloured, fell from 33½ cents per pound to 22 cents per pound. Bleached shirtings fell from 6¾ cents to 5 cents; from 7¾ cents to 6¼ cents; from 9⅞ cents to 6½ cents; from 9¼ cents to 7½ cents; from 10¼ cents to 8¼ cents; from 12¼ cents to 9¼ cents; and so on. Denims, tickings, and ginghamms fell in the same ratio; cheese cloth, apron checks and bleached sheeting in about the same ratio. The difference in values to-day as thus shown is about as follows:—Gray cottons, 35 per cent less than in 1878; bleached sheeting, 20 per cent less; Canton flannels, 27½ per cent less; bags, about 30 per cent less; yarns, 45 per cent less; bleached shirtings, 25 per cent less; tickings, 35 per cent less; apron checks, 40 per cent less; cheese cloth, 40 per cent less. At the same time we have mills employing over 8,000 people, and much capital, and paying over $2,000,000 a year in wages, showing a state of things which surely it would be undesirable not to have in existence. Now, Sir, when prices have fallen here, what is the meaning of the hon. member for Queen's coming forward and telling us that prices have fallen in England? We know they have. The hon. gentleman's argument meant nothing if it did not mean that he would do away with the duty altogether, and let those cheap goods in to the destruction of our manufacturers. Suppose he did, what would be the result? Would not population, to the extent to which it is supported by these manufactories, disappear? And where would he get his revenue? People who remained would not get as good cottons nor one cent cheaper. The hon. gentleman went on to argue that in England, under the policy he still seemed to hanker after, the people were not taxed, and did not complain. Now, it so happens that we know what they are saying in England about the state of things there. Here is the report of Mr. Wilson Fox, assistant commissioner, on the county of Lincolnshire:

Farmers all protested against being assessed for income tax on half their rental. Many considered that one-fourth of their rental was the most they should be assessed on. As it is, the habit of many of the larger farmers to keep good accounts, a number of them have been successful in recent years in their appeals to the commissioners, and several income-tax commissioners informed me that the number of appeals has been increasing year by year.

Here are farmers complaining that they have to pay income tax on half their rental. Does any one suppose, if the hon. gentleman got rid of the protective policy, as he wants to, that we should not have an income tax here as they have it in England, and that our farmers would not cry out in the same way? Here is what Mr. Harry Rew says in his report on the Salsbury Plain District of Wiltshire:

I cannot do better than quote the following passage from a statement of his views sent me by Mr. E. A. Rawlence, as it fairly expresses the contention of those who advocate what is commonly termed protection:—"In regard to free trade, whatever may be the wisdom of maintaining this policy, it is useless to endeavour to close our eyes to the fact that the serious depreciation in the prices of all home-grown agricultural products is due to the glutting of our market by the surplus products of our colonies and foreign countries. It must of necessity happen that in some part of the globe there will each year be an abnormally productive crop, and hence a surplus, which must be disposed of at any price.

Mr. DAVIN.

Then, he gives the argument of this man, who shows from the custom-house returns the duties collected from imported products, such as chicory, coffee, cocoa, and chocolate, tea, currants, raisans, figs, plums, and prunes, making a total of £4,097,739, or over $20,000,000. This farmer goes on to say:

It can scarcely be disputed that all the items enumerated in the above schedule are absolute necessities of life, as well for the cottager as for the peer, and almost as necessary as wheat and flour, and yet we tax these necessities, which we cannot produce, to the extent of over £4,000,000 per annum.

Now, Sir, the hon. member who preceded me spoke about the expenditure, and one speaker after another on the Opposition side sought to make out that the people are taxed to death. Let us have the duties on tea, coffee, cocoa, and chocolate that were in existence in the time of the previous regime, and we shall very soon have some millions of dollars to make the present deficit disappear. The hon. member, near the close of his remarks, came to the conclusion that there was just $4,000,000 in excess of what ought to have been added to the expenditure. All we have to do to make up that sum is to put aside what we raised by inland revenue, about $4,000,000, if I remember rightly, more than was raised in 1878. Nobody supposes that is a burden on the poor people of this country. Then, if you take the amount we raise from customs duties on such things as wines, diamonds, silks, satins, &c., you will find that we raise nearly as much on these things as would make up that amount which the hon. member thinks may possibly be in excess of what should have been raised. But there is the thing that surprises me; when hon. gentlemen talk about what our expenditure should be, as compared with what it was in 1878, they never enter into a calculation to explain how they would have carried on the public works which we have put into operation in that time. Would they have built the railways? If they would, they would have had to get money. Would they have had to deepen the canals? Nobody doubts that they would. We have at present the finest system of inland waterways in the world and well worth the money. Some hon. gentlemen talk about the income from these canals not being what it should be, but we have the Liberal papers asking now, as they have asked at other times, that there should be no tolls charged at all. Would we have had these put in operation? If so, they would have had to supply the money, and their expenditure would have been just as large as it is to-day, and probably larger. The proper way to estimate the burden is to consider the amount of interest that has to be paid. That amount, as has been pointed out, not only by myself but by others, is only some 17 or 18 cents more for each individual than it was in 1878. Now, the hon. member quoted Mr. Cleveland, and of course we are not surprised that he should go to President Cleveland for a definition of the Liberal policy, and he also went to the platform of 1893, as laid down in Ottawa. But, Mr. Speaker, we in the west have had the opportunity of judging what the policy of the Reform party would be, because we have had the honour of a visit from the leader of the Opposition. That hon. gentleman spoke at Winnipeg, Regina, Vancouver, and he laid down everywhere—especially in Winnipeg, at the gateway of the Territories—the proposition that his policy was freedom, civil and religious, and freedom of trade as they have it in England. We cannot have it now, he said, but we will aim at it, and we hope in time to get it. We had the same thing from my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Davies). Well, Mr. Speaker, I shall not weary the House by explaining what free trade as practised in England means. You have only to go to the Reform almanac to find out what it means, and I shall not weary the House with quotations from English reports, showing what the farmers in England suffer from the system. I have here a report by a Mr. James Hope, in which he says :

The farmers also complained to me of the practice which has recently been adopted of taxing them on sums paid as fire insurance premiums. These sums ought certainly not to be taxed as income, and I consider the farmers' complaint on this head a most reasonable one. Another matter to which my attention was specially drawn, was the charging of inhabited house duty upon the assumed annual value of farm houses.

This is exactly what we told the farmers who were exposed to the siren voice of our Opposition friends : If you go in for free trade as it is in England, you will have to pay the inhabited house tax and the income tax, and all the other taxes which the farmers of England are protesting against. Another grievance is thus described on page 10 of the report by Mr. James Hope :

Another grievance which was prominently brought before me, was the principle upon which the income tax is assessed upon the supposed income of farmers, and the charging farmers' houses with the inhabited house duty.

And yet the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) told us that men in humble circumstances had to pay very little indeed in England. Why, one of the men of whom I have spoken complained bitterly that they had to pay on their tea and all those things which are free of duty in Canada. The hon. member for South Oxford made the statement, and it was also made in a most emphatic manner by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). that the manufacturers got hold of the Finance Minister last year and made him alter his tariff resolutions. One of the followers of hon. gentlemen opposite said in the west that the manufacturers got the Finance Minister to change his tariff to such an extent that its own father would not know it. That statement has been made here by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). That hon. gentleman quoted the manufacturers' report, in which the secretary takes credit to himself for having influenced the Minister. This is a matter which has to be cleared up. It has been again and again stated in the west, and I think I have seen the statement in the "Globe" newspaper. We have heard it made in this House also. The hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) elaborated it the other night in a most emphatic manner. It is said that although the Finance Minister came down with something in the way of tariff reform which was pretty good, the manufacturers got him by the throat, and he had to take it all back. I will just quote the words of the hon. member for Winnipeg :

In carrying out this promise, the Finance Minister did bring down resolutions, which, if put into force, would have lessened somewhat the imposts then upon the country. He was not allowed, however, to carry his policy into force.

The hon. member for Winnipeg went on to quote this manufacturers' report, just as the hon. member for South Oxford did. I am very sorry that neither the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) nor the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is here, because I would ask them to give me the instances in which the manufacturers made the Finance Minister change his tariff. I would challenge them, as I did on the public platform one of their followers. I put the two tariffs before him, and I said : There is the tariff as it was ultimately agreed to, and there it is as it was first brought down—show me the changes. He said, I will do it some other time. Why, Sir, he was only echoing the lying statements made by the Grit press when they saw the manufacturers' deputations come to Ottawa, just as farmers' deputations came. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) and myself were among some few members of Parliament who introduced to Sir John Thompson deputations of farmers. No doubt deputations from the manufacturers came here. But what does that show ? It shows that the tariff had affected them a good deal. I would ask these gentlemen to prove their assertion, because I should not be expected to prove a negative. The statement as made in the press outside, and as made in the west, is false.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What statement is that ?

Mr. DAVIN. That the Finance Minister brought down certain changes in the tariff.

but was made to take back water by the Manufacturers' Association.

Mr. LANDERKIN. He took back none ?

Mr. DAVIN. I say practically none. I will ask the House to bear with me because I am called on to prove a negative. The only way to prove a negative is by induction. And, although it may be wearisome to the House, and certainly is not pleasant to myself, I will go over the items, and I will stamp that lie once and for all, for what it is. Sir, immediately on the Finance Minister bringing down his financial statement last year, and before a single manufacturer's deputation had time to come, contrary to my rule in these financial discussions, I spoke early in the debate, and I said what has been brought against me again and again. Speaking of the tariff said :

It is one of the boldest things that have been done in the history of tariffs—and I recall what was done by Mr. Gladstone ; it is a bold, sage and a liberal measure, and it will have my undivided support.

That is quoted against me in the west, and they say : " Though he characterized the tariff in that way, what did he do when the manufacturers changed the tariff in such a way that its own father would not know it ? " He was as silent as the grave. I explained my position ; I put the tariff under their noses, as if the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) was here now. I would do as regards him. I gave them the two tariffs, but they did not dare to accept the challenge, and I said I would show that the statement that any modifications of importance were made was utterly false. Now, Sir, in the course of the speech I wanted to show what had been done to take off taxation, and I wanted to justify the opinions I had formed of the tariff, and I may say I was quite surprised at the length the Finance Minister went. And if I was criticising it from the standpoint taken by hon. members of the Opposition, instead of taking the position that they have taken, I would have taken the position that he had gone too far. Here is what I said in my speech last year just after the tariff was brought down : Lumber, free. That was considered a great boon ; we used to pay 20 per cent. Barbed wire, 1½ to ¾ cents. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will note the changes from specific to ad valorem in those articles mentioned in my speech. I will note the changes lowering from a specific to a lower specific duty, and any case where there was a restoration or a partial restoration. I will then, at the end give the number of the changes that were made from specific to ad valorem, the number of the changes that were made from high specific to lower specific, and the number of cases where there was full or partial legislation. Tarred paper, from ½ cent per pound to 25 per cent. There was specific duty abandoned, No. 1.

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What number was that on the tariff ?

Mr. DAVIN. I will give you the tariff list.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I have the tariff of last year. What was that last item ?

Mr. DAVIN. Tarred paper, from ½ cent per pound to 25 per cent.

Mr. LANDERKIN. In the final passage of the Bill is it 25 per cent ?

Mr. DAVIN. I think so. What do you make it there ?

Mr. LANDERKIN. Tarred paper, 25 per cent. When the Bill was introduced it was 20 per cent. It was increased.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order, order.

Mr. DAVIN. You are quite right. The difference, however, from ½ cent per pound to 25 per cent would be equivalent to a change of about 5 per cent. But, in any case, the point I make is that specific duty was abandoned for ad valorem. I hope my hon. friend will look at it carefully, because I may err in one or two points, and I would be glad to have him correct me.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What item is that ?

Mr. DAVIN. The item I have just read.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That was not a specific duty at all.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes ; it was changed from ½ cent per pound to 25 per cent.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You mean it was changed from 20 per cent to 25 per cent.

Mr. DAVIN. No ; it was changed from ½ a cent per pound to 25 per cent.

Mr. LANDERKIN. No.

Mr. DAVIN. I say it was.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I say it was not.

Mr. DAVIN. Axle grease, from 1 cent per pound to 25 per cent. There is another case of specific duty abandoned. Whips, from 50 cents per dozen and 30 per cent to 35 per cent—another case of specific duty abandoned. Axes, chopping axes, from $2 per dozen and 20 per cent to 35 per cent. Scythes, hay knives, from $2 per dozen and 20 per cent to 35 per cent ; portable machines, threshers, and separators, from 35 to 30 per cent. Buckthorn fencing, from 1½ cents per pound to 1 cent per pound. Hubs, spokes, felloes, hewn and sawn, from 15 per cent to 10 per cent. This was the original change. I think they are free now. Pails, tubs, churns, from 25 to 20 per cent. Farm and freight wagons, from $10 each specific and 20 per cent ad valorem, to 25 per cent.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Might I ask the hon. gentleman, if he will allow me, is he reading from the old tariff ?

Mr. DAVIN. No ; from the speech I made last year.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. DAVIN. He is all right.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The hon. gentleman has no objections.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would ask the hon. gentleman to keep order. This is not a seemly way to carry on the debate.

Mr. DAVIN. I will explain to my hon. friend. I am reading the items of the tariff which was brought down, and which I mentioned in my speech, showing what reductions from the old tariff were made and also all subsequent changes. I may tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I have gone to a great deal of trouble about it, but in such a number of items it is barely possible that one or two mistakes may have crept in, but I do not think so. Fertilizers, from 20 to 10 per cent. Guns and all connected therewith, from 35 to 30 per cent. Flax fibre and flax tow, free. It was from 1 to 2 cents per pound in the old tariff. This is specific duty No. 6 done away with or No. 9, more properly speaking, because I lumped three articles under one item. Saddle jiggers and stirrups, saddle trees and cheap moshan trees for cowboys' saddles, including pack saddle trees, free, instead of 10 per cent. Laths and shingles, free. The duty on common soap was reduced from 1½ to 1 cent per pound. Condensed milk and coffee, sweetened, from 1¼ cents to 35 per cent. This is a case of specific duty being abandoned, and the case before was a case of a specific duty reduced. Unsweetened, from 35 to 30 per cent ; this was made 3 cents per pound ; oatmeal, from ½ cent per pound to 50 cents ; this was further reduced 20 per cent. Cleaned rice, from 1¼ cents per pound to 1 cent ; but this was restored. There is a case of restored duty. Biscuits, sweetened, from 35 to 25 per cent ; maccaroni, vermicelli, from 2 cents per pound to 25 per cent—another case of specific duty abandoned. Starch, including farina, from 4 cents to 1¼ cents per pound—another case of reduced specific duty ; this was changed to 1½ cents per pound. Starch, unsweetened, from 2 cents to 1½ cents per pound ; mustard cake, from 20 to 15 per cent ; sweet potatoes, 25 cents to 10 cents per bushel ; ad valorem the same, 10 cents. Pickles, from 40 cents per imperial gallon to 35 per cent. There is a case of abandonment of specific duty. Sauces and catsups, 40 to 35 per cent ; soy, from 10 cents per gallon to 35 per cent, another case of abandonment of specific duty. Yeast cakes and baking powder, from 8 cents to 6 cents per pound. Blackberries, gooseberries, raspberries and strawberries, from 3 cents to 2 cents per pound ; raisins, from 40 to 25 per cent ; oranges, lemons and limes, from $1.60 to $1.50 per thousand ; fruits in cans, reduced from 3 cents to 2 cents per pound ; jellies and jams, from 5 cents to 3 cents per pound ; coffee, not directly imported, 3 cents to 2 cents per pound ; ad valorem being the same. Coconuts, when imported directly, from $1 to 50 cents per 100 pounds. Nutmegs and mace, from 25 to 20 per cent—this was restored. That is restoration No. 2. Barrels containing petroleum, from 40 to 20 cents ; shoeblackening, from 30 to 25 per cent ; earthenware, from 35 to 30 per cent ; glass jars, reduced from 35 to 30 per cent. Spectacles and eye glasses were reduced from 30 to 20 per cent, and this was restored. Clothes wringers, from $1 and 30 per cent to 25 cents and 20 per cent ; sewing machines, from $3 each and 20 per cent to 30 per cent. That was a case of abandonment of a very high specific duty. Corset clasps and steels, from 30 to 20 per cent, the specific duty of 5 cents remains. Enamelled ironware reduced from 35 to 20 per cent ; but this was restored. Plated cutlery, from 50 cents per dozen and 20 per cent to 35 per cent. That is specific duty abandoned. No. 13. Clocks, from 35 to 25 ; furniture, from 35 to 30 ; cottons, from 35 to 25 ; fibre ware, from 30 to 25 ; sugar candy, from 45 to 35. This is a case of abandonment of specific duty. The old was 1½ cents and 35 per cent. Cotton balls, batting and sheet wadding, dyed and undyed, from 2 cents and 3 cents per pound and 15 per cent, to 22½ per cent. This shows that my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) was entirely astray to-night in his statement of the duty that is paid. No such duty as he stated is paid. Cotton warp and cotton yarn (dyed, from 34 to 25 per cent ; unbleached cotton fabrics, from 26 to 22½ per cent. The old was 1 cent per square yard and 15 per cent. I calculate it was 26. Bleached cotton, 25 cents instead of 2 cents per square yard, and 15 per cent. This is case No. 17 of the abandonment of specific duty. Shirts—poor man's shirts—costing less than $3 per dozen, from 75 per cent to 35 per cent. All cotton clothing and other manufactures, from 35 to 32½ per cent ; lamp wick, from 30 to 25 per cent ; caplin, unfinished leghorn hats and manilla hoods, from 20 per cent to free. Coke, from 50 cents per ton to free ; cotton yarns, not coarser than No. 40, from 2 cents per pound and 15 per cent, to free ; prunella free, instead of 10 per cent ; shoe buttons, free, instead of 5 cents gross and 20 per cent ; eyelets, hooks, &c., free, instead of 30 per cent ; nitrate of soda, free, instead of 20 per cent ; woollen and worsted yarns, finer than No. 56, and mohair yarns, free, instead of from 10 to 20 per cent. That, I think, was changed again somewhat, and I put it down as restored. That is No. 5 of a restoration thus far. Glue and mucilage reduced from 30 to 25 per cent each ; gum and sizing, from 25 to 10 per cent. The old was 1 cent per pound. That is the twentieth case of abandonment of specific duty. Muriatic and nitric acid, from 25 to 20 per cent. On sulphuric acid there was a slight reduction, and on acid phosphate, from 3 cents to 2 cents per pound. Essential oils, from 20 to 10 per cent; lubricating oils, from 7 1-5 to 6 cents per gallon; crude petroleum, from 7 1-5 to 3 3-5 cents per gallon; ochres and dry colours, from 30 to 25 per cent; paints and colours ground in oil, from 30 to 20 per cent; spirits of turpentine, from 10 to 5 per cent; varnishes, lacquers, japan driers and the like, from 25 to 20 per cent, the specific being the same. Putty, from 25 to 15 per cent; plate glass, less than 12 square feet, from 6 cents to 4 cents per foot; show cases, from 59 to 35 per cent. The old was $2 each and 35 per cent. That is No. 21 of specific duty abandonment. Plaster of Paris, from 32 to 15 per cent, the old was 10 cents per cwt. Plaster of Paris, calcined, from 27 to 20 per cent. The old was 15 cents per cwt. Rough marble, from 25 to 20 per cent; leather board and leatheroid, from 42 to 20 per cent; old, 2 cents per pound. Leather, japanned or enamelled, from 25 to 22 1/2 per cent; belting, from 25 to 20 per cent; india rubber clothing, from 39 to 35 per cent; old, 10 cents per pound and 25 per cent. That is another case of specific duty abandonment. Composition nails, from 20 to 13 per cent; cut nails, from 1 cent to 3/4 cent per pound; cut tacks, under 16 oz., from 2 cents to 1 cent per thousand; cut tacks, over 16 oz., from 2 cents to 1 1/2 cents per pound; wood screws of certain lengths, brought down from 6 cents, 8 cents and 11 cents to 3 cents, 6 cents and 8 cents per pound; other screws reduced from 35 to 30 per cent; iron and steel nuts, from 25 to 20 per cent; chopping adzes, from 35 to 20 per cent; picks, from 40 to 35 per cent; then changed back again to 35 per cent. The old was 1 cent per pound and 25 per cent; so that here again we have a specific duty restored. Mattocks and hammers, from 35 to 30 per cent. Here again the duty was changed back to 35 per cent. Surgical and dental instruments, from 20 to 15 per cent; safes, vaults and scales, from 35 to 30 per cent; engines, boilers and machinery, from 30 to 27 1/2 per cent; brass and copper wire, from 15 to 10 per cent; gas fixtures, from 30 to 27 1/2 per cent; bells, from 30 to 25 per cent; brass nails and rivets from 35 to 25 per cent. In this case old duty restored. That is the seventh case of restoration, the duty being restored to 35 per cent. Copper nails and rivets from 30 to 25 per cent; gold and silver leaf from 30 to 25 per cent; cane or rattan from 25 to 12 1/2 per cent; veneers of wood from 10 to 5 per cent. In the case of rattan it was changed to 17 1/2. That is the only case I know of where there was a change made to 17 1/2 per cent. Picture frames from 35 to 30; mouldings, plain wood, from 25 to 20 per cent; gullt from 30 to 25.

Mr. DAVIN.

Cordage—new, 30 per cent, old equal to 1 1/4 cents per pound and 10 per cent; twine and cotton cordage from 30 to 25 per cent. This was another case in which the old duty was restored. Nitro-glycerine was changed from 10 cents per pound to 25 cents; dynamite from 5 cents per pound and 20 per cent to 2 cents per pound; blasting powder from 3 cents to 2 cents; acids used for medicinal, chemical and manufacturing purpose, not specially provided for, from 20 per cent to free; brass scraps, &c., free; brass in strips for printers rules from 15 per cent to free; coal dust from 10 per cent to free; emery wheels and emery in bulk crushed and ground from 25 per cent to free. Here the old duty was restored. That is number nine of the restored items. Lampblack, ivory black, free instead of 10 per cent; oil—cocoanut and palm, carbolic or heavy oils, oil of roses including attar, free instead of 10 per cent. Platts, chip, manillas, cotton, mohair, free instead of 30 per cent. Hammocks and lawn tennis nets and other like articles manufactured of twine from 35 to 30 per cent; jute cloth dyed or bleached from 25 to 10 per cent; women and gentlemen's dress goods ranging from 25 per cent to 32 1/2 per cent down to 22 1/2. Oil cloth matting and carpets from 40 to 30 per cent. The duty on live hogs was reduced from 2 cents per pound to 25 per cent. A deputation, consisting of the Conservative whip the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) and other members of Parliament including myself, introduced Mr. Graham and several farmers to Sir John Thompson, and the consequence was we had the duty on hogs placed at 1 1/2 cents per pound. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) was very strong in dwelling on the impossibility of that duty helping the farmers; but he did not dare to say that if the Reform party came into power he would change that duty. He was challenged by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) several times, but he would not commit himself, although he tried to make out that it was of no value whatever. If the hon. gentleman will consult the farmers of the North-west Territories or the farmers of Ontario he will find that they set great store on that duty of 1 1/2 cents per pound. Thus in 26 cases specific duties were wholly abandoned for ad valorem duties. In 16 cases specific duties were reduced; in 10 cases, not very important ones, old duties were either partially or wholly restored. What becomes of the statement which has been made in this House that after the Finance Minister had made good resolutions and brought them down, he at the direction of the manufacturers went and altered them? I have gone over the items, and I have given twenty-six cases of specific duties abandoned for ad valorem duties. The hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) told the House that last year a gentleman was vapouring in the corridors and expressing his determination that specific duties should be upheld. The instances of specific duty being restored are few. There are 26 important ones abolished; in 16 cases reductions were from high to low specific duties and there are 10 cases where wholly or partially ad valorem and specific duties were restored to what they were in the old tariff. What becomes then of the statement made again and again in the west, and made in the "Globe" newspaper, although that paper for some time after the tariff was brought down was very fair in its criticism, and made by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), that when the Finance Minister brought down reforms in the tariff, at the dictation of the manufacturers he had to withdraw them? Sir, I am not now referring to what has been stated in this House but out of this House, and I say I have stamped that statement as what it is—a lie, and after I have proved that exhaustively, no man can make that statement and keep the character of a truthful man afterwards. I am sorry I have had to occupy the time of the House in thus going over the tariff in detail, but it was the only method to adopt unless we could have induced hon. gentlemen opposite to do the fair thing and give us the items on which they based their charge. But hon. gentlemen opposite dare not give their grounds, but by putting forward general statements they hope to influence the farmers and the mechanics. But the fact is we have ample time and opportunity to show the farmers that these extravagant statements are wild and ridiculous. I will not trouble the House by reading the reports of the conditions of farm labour in England, but I will only say this—unless I am challenged to read the report—that the labourer is sometimes in a very bad condition, that his wages are about 10s. per week or $2.50, making an average of about $12 per month. I never can understand some of the arguments put forward by members on the Reform side of the House, and what good can follow efforts to make out that the farm labourer in Canada is not as well off as the wretched farm labourer in England I am at a loss to know. All I can say is that we have evidence now before us, taken by an English commission, which shows that while the labourer in Ontario obtains from $15 to $17 per month, and is fed with eggs and meat, porridge and milk, and fruit three times a day, the farm labourer in England is fed pretty poorly, and in Scotland he only gets his brose and $10 a month. But I took the opportunity in the county of Carleton to obtain statements from two of the farm labourers there, one is a Scotchman and the other an Englishman.—Robert Rennie of Aberdeen, Scotland, and the other Henry Winstanley of Derbyshire, England. The following is the letter:

The Rock Farm, Bell's Corners,
Ottawa, May 15th, 1895.

Sir.—In answer to your inquiry as to the comparative wages and board of farm labourers in Canada and England and Scotland, we beg to say that the information we give is based upon our experience in those two countries.

In England wages differ in the different counties, but in Derbyshire, England, where I was for thirteen years in the midst of a county almost wholly devoted to farming pursuits, the wages for a really good man would be about £16 ($80) per year and board. Lads of about seventeen years of age would get £12 to £14; some only £10, that is, $60, $70 and $50 respectively, and board. The board, so far as my Canadian experience goes, is in Canada far and far away ahead of any to be obtained in England. In fact, the latter is not to be mentioned by the side of the former. In one particular instance I can call to mind where men were required for the hay harvest, 2s. 6d. (60 cents) was offered per day, without board of any description or lodging or beer, which is mostly given on English farms.

In Scotland wages are higher than in England. A really good man is paid £26 per year and board ($130); one not so efficient, £14 per year and board, equals $70; the board not so good as in England by far, the principal food being oatmeal and potatoes, bread and tea only on Sundays. Meat, perhaps, in a place above the usual run of farm board, is given, perhaps, once a month; most places one never has it at all.

Most emphatically I state, as an Englishman, that a farm man is in every respect better off in Canada than in England, where he is mostly put down to be a serf and ignorant, being devoid of intellect and wanting in common sense, and is spoken to in a patronising manner by the village squire and parson, and expected to salute each in passing. The labourer's wife and children are the same. But I thank God that, with the ever-increasing power of self-government given to him, the labourer is gradually shaking off the yoke of parson and squire, and is beginning to think and act for himself, and will not, in a few years' time, be led by the nose by either of the two mentioned.

In Canada I find Jack is as good as his master, but in England it is in many places, "God bless the squire. God bless the parson and all their rich relations, and help us poor people to keep all in our places."

Yes, sir, in nine villages out of ten in England it will be found as I have stated. "Hodge," or "Chaw-bacon," is the name usually applied in England to the farmer's man. Possibly, Mr. McMullen would alter his opinion, had he a little experience of English farm labourers' life and position, or even a little talk with

Yours respectfully,

HENRY WINSTANLEY,
of Derbyshire, Eng., and ROBERT RENNIE, of Aberdeen, Scotland.

Mr. Thos. Graham,
Rock Farm, Bell's Corners, Ottawa.

Now, Sir, that, at all events, together with the evidence we have in these books, disposes of the absurd statements that the farm labourer in England or in Scotland is better off than he is with us in Canada. For what purpose such a statement is made in this House. Heaven only knows, unless it be to decry Canada, which one can scarcely believe. I shall not, Mr. Speaker, take up the time of this House, by for the hundredth time going into a comparison between the state of things that existed between the years 1873 and 1878, and the state of things as they have existed from 1878 down to the present time. The record of the period when the Liberal Government was in power is a record of depression, and a record of retrogression; but the record from 1878 when confidence was restored by a Conservative Government coming into power, is a record of advance and progress. Let me deal a little more at length with the speech of my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). His somewhat elaborate argument was replied to in a masterly manner by my hon. friend from South Grey (Mr. Masson), but if I may venture to say so, I wish to make one or two remarks to complete the case so well made out by my hon. friend (Mr. Masson). The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) made a comparison between the nine months of the current year and the 12 months of the preceding year, but, as everybody ought to know, it is impossible for one to make any reliable calculation upon such a basis. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) told us that the imports for the nine months of 1895 down to March 31st, were $42,979,130, dutiable goods; and $31,014,535, free goods, coin and bullion, not included. Why he does not include coin and bullion, I cannot understand, and he does not explain, because they are marketable commodities, and are sold and bought for a profit just like anything else. The duty of $13,278,853 was, as he says, a rate of taxation equal to 17·94, and he compares that with the rate for the whole year of 1893-94, which he finds to be 17·76. Therefore, he declares that the rate for 1895 is higher than the rate for 1893-94. But the disturbing factor in his calculation is the assumption that the rate would be the same for the three months of the year 1895 as in the preceding nine months. As a matter of fact, the rate for the three last months of 1894, after the month of March, was 15·3, which demolishes his calculation at once. Applying the same rule to the three months of 1895, we would have a lower rate than 17·76, which there again, queers his calculation. I asked the Customs Department to send me a return of what was brought in for the month of April, 1895, and I learn that the total of dutiable goods was $4,848,156; duty, $1,468,431; and the free goods, $4,026,937, the coin and bullion being $34,703. The total was $8,909,796, the total duty being $1,468,431, which would give 16·48 for the month of April. No doubt when we have the returns for the next two months the percentage will be still lower, and thus is destroyed completely the calculation which the hon. gentleman made, his assertions that taxation was not very much reduced. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) was more honest than the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). That hon. gentleman based his calculation upon the same period, but what did he do? He took the duty on the dutiable goods as though the entire abolition of the duty was no reduction of duty at all. That, of course, was a most dishonest thing, and I am sorry that the same sort of dishonesty—probably that is too strong a word—but I am sorry that the same sort of recklessness, the same sort of unsatisfactoriness characterized a great deal of what he said. What did the hon. member (Sir Richard Cartwright) declare? He declared in that same speech that while a great number of articles had been placed on the free list, there were only three in which the public were in the least interested. Mr. Speaker, I have gone into details too fully; I have trespassed on the patience of the House; but if time permitted, I could take up that tariff and read fifty, sixty or seventy articles which were placed on the free list, many of them by the last tariff, in which the public are deeply interested; and you have only to read them to stultify completely what was stated by the hon. gentlemen. As to the comparison of percentages, let me say that it is deceptive to the ordinary mind, not accustomed to consider matters of this sort—a thorough business man would detect the fallacy at once. Let me point what the results were for the six months ending December, 1893, and for the six months ending December, 1894: I will take the percentages which the hon. gentleman has taken and see what the exact effect of the changes in the tariff is, and you will see that it is very substantial. The general results of the tariff changes made in 1894, as reducing the average customs duties, may be seen as follows: In the six months, July to December, 1893, the last half year altogether under the former tariff, the total value of imported goods was $60,894,062, on which the duties amounted to $10,198,562, the average rate thus being $16.75. In the six months, July to December, 1894, the first half year altogether under the new tariff, the total value of imported goods was $54,572,395, on which the duties amounted to $8,701,037, the average rate thus being $15.94. The rates under the new tariff, therefore, averaged 81 cents less than the rate under the old tariff, being a reduction of 4·84 per cent on the rate before the change. What does that mean to the importer? It means that an importer who would have had to pay $100 of duties under the old tariff would only have to pay $95.16 under the new tariff. If the new instead of the old average rate had prevailed for the last half year of 1893, the duties paid would have been $9,706,513, or $472,049 less for the six months. If the old instead of the new average rate had prevailed for the last half year of 1894, the duties paid would have been $9,140,876, or an additional $439,838 for the six months, something near half a million. Now, Sir, the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) made a very ingenious speech, in which he grappled with certain positions taken by the Finance Minister. Homer sometimes nods, and when you are dealing with figures you may be insensibly led to compare percentages; and the hon. member for Winnipeg took a fair point when he said to the Finance Minister "You have argued from percentages, and now I will argue from percentages," and he tried to make out that the progress from 1868 to 1878 was greater than the progress from 1878 to the present time. He takes, for instance, the savings of the people. Let me say you cannot show the relative progress by comparing percentages if you ignore the basic figures from which you start. A man may read off percentages by the yard, and he will make an impression on an ignorant mind; but you "queer" his position at once the moment you ask him to give the basic figure from which he starts his comparison. It is an old fallacy, and it can be illustrated thus: Suppose you compare the progress of a city with 100,000 inhabitants with the progress of a village which commences with two inhabitants. Add two to the population of the village and it increases 100 per cent; add 5,000 to the population of the city, and it increases only 5 per cent; add two more to the village, and it increases 50 per cent more; and so on. Therefore, the hon. gentleman's argument was not valid; it was an argumentum ad hominem, and the hon. gentleman admitted it. There was also an error in his statement of the savings of the people, taken from the Year-Book: he has to go to another page to get the exact savings of the people. He tried to prove that between 1868 and 1878 there was a greater percentage of savings; but all you have to do is to take the exact figures, and you see that whereas things were in a languishing state from 1873 to 1878, there was great progress from 1873 to wards, until at present there are vast sums to the credit of the people in the savings banks and elsewhere. What did the hon. gentleman do further? He made an ingenious argument, and I compliment him upon it. Probably it may have been characteristic, but it was too clever by half. What does he do? He takes not the duties, but the percentage of revenue got by the Conservative Government in certain years, and he says, "If we could have taken the same percentage of revenue in 1875, instead of my hon. friend from South Oxford having had a surplus of $800,000, he would have had a surplus of $8,000,000." He arrives at this conclusion by taking the percentage of duty of 1894 and applying it to the total value of goods, both dutiable and free, entered for consumption in 1874. Now, where is the fallacy here? It assumes that with a population of 3,750,000, with a higher tariff, with exports $28, 000,000 less, with an output from factories of $221,000,000 as against $477,000,000 in 1894, the country would still have imported the quantity imported in 1874. It is quite absurd. If you had the present tariff and the same population and only the same amount of exports, it is morally certain that two things would have happened. You would not have had the purchasing power we have nor the need to go outside for the same quantity of goods. Therefore, the whole fabric of my hon. friend from Winnipeg tumbles down completely. In fact all the arguments used by the hon. member were ingenious but misleading and unsound. I paid some attention to his speech because it was more carefully prepared than those of others. He referred to the reduction in values of some $8,000,000. Now, I have shown that there were twenty-six cases in the tariff of specific duties abandoned and the Finance Minister abandoned them in a falling market. That was a dangerous thing for the Finance Minister to do. It bears out what I said that the Budget was a daring thing. I characterized it as a bold Budget. He has paid the price of his boldness for the shrinkage in values would have made no difference in the amount of duty collected on these 26 articles, if the change had not been made from specific to ad valorem, because no matter how values shrink, if the specific duties remain, the Finance Minister gets his revenue. I have shown that in some 26 cases he abandoned the specific duty altogether and in some 16 or 17 he reduced the specific duty from a high to a low rate and so far as the $8,000,000 shrinkage has been affected by the reductions in these items it would, of course, have had no existence had the specific duties remained. Let me just recur to the point I made a moment ago as to the progress in these deposits, which were elaborated upon so much by the hon. member for Winnipeg. The people's deposits amounted to:

1873	$12,933,834
1874	14,021,270
1875	13,782,000
1876	13,563,347
1877	13,525,087
1878	14,128,185
1879	14,704,487

Then the deposits increased right along until 1894, they reached $55,955,590. Yet my hon. friend would argue from percentages, forgetting the base figure from which he started, in order to show that there had been actually more progress between 1868 and 1878 in the savings of the people than between 1878 and 1894. If that increase between 1878 and 1894 is not a sign of increasing prosperity, it is very extraordinary. You will remember that so great an authority and a statesman of such vast experience as Sir William Vernon Harcourt argued recently that the savings of the people was one of the truest guarantees you could have of a country's prosperity. Is it not obvious? I can give you an illustration. I remember calling on a friend of mine who had been a fellow student at college and also in the Middle Temple. He had been a little reckless and had got married to one who turned out to be, not only a very pretty, but a very prudent woman. He is now an eminent judge in Great Britain. I said to him: How are you getting on? He said nothing, but went to his bureau, pulled out a drawer, and handed me a bank-book in which there was a considerable sum to his credit. If anybody had told me that my former fellow-student and friend would ever have been able to save any money, I would not have believed him without the evidence. But there was the very best proof you could give of his prosperity and progress, namely, that he was saving money. And it is the best test you can have of the progress of the country. I shall ask the House to bear with me a few minutes longer while I deal with one or two other matters.

An hon. MEMBER. Dispense.

Mr. DAVIN. I cannot dispense. This debate has taken such a form that I must dare to be dull and pay my hon. friends of the Opposition the sincere flattery of imitating them. I always pay the hon. member for South Oxford the respect of carefully reading his amendment. I notice that he himself hangs his cap on his amendment. He behaves as certain excellent preachers do, who give out a text, and then never say a word about it, but go on to something else. None of his friends pay him the compliment of carefully reading the amendment, but I always do. At all events, it has the charm of novelty. It is the one thing in his speech which has the charm of novelty. His speech is, year after year, like an old barrel organ that rolls out the same tune, but the amendment changed each time. I am reminded by the hon. gentleman's yearly speech and amendment, of an old Italian who used to come round the place where I lived as a boy with his barrel organ. The organ and the old Italian were always the same, but every year there was a new monkey. The barrel organ and the Italian have been the same for the last sixteen or seventeen years, but there is always a new monkey—always a fresh policy—and my hon. friend has therefore a new amendment. The first part of the amendment is a matter of account. He then goes on to say that extravagant expenditure should be diminished. But it should not be necessary in any amendment to say extravagant expenditure should be diminished. All you have to do is to prove the extravagance, and it is a truism that it should be diminished. Then the amendments goes on to say:

Mr. DAVIN.

The burden of taxation should be reduced as largely and speedily as possible, and in restoring the equilibrium, the tariff should be made a tariff for revenue only.

I complain of that because it is dubious. Nobody can make out, from the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford or from the speeches of his friends, what that means. They carefully conceal their meaning by the phrase "tariff for revenue." Sometimes it is free trade as it is in England; then it is a tariff such as they had when they were in power. But that is not a tariff for revenue only. Seventeen and a half per cent, under certain conditions, would be a very respectable protection. Therefore, I say, this amendment is dubious. What sort of a speech should we have had to support it? He should prove proposition number one. He should show that there was extravagant expenditure and apply his remedy. Now, the hon. member for South Oxford and the hon. leader of the Opposition both dislike to apply their tariff for revenue, when they are asked to apply it. Sir, that is not necessarily unreasonable. It would be quite fair for any member of the Opposition to say: We agree with Sir Robert Peel that no one should state his policy in amendment. But they do state their policy in contradistinction to the policy announced from the Government benches, and, stating it, they are bound to show the people how they could carry it out; they are bound to show what they mean. It is not enough for them simply to repeat the words "revenue tariff." What is the use of getting up and denouncing all sorts of duties as robbery of the public, as the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has been doing? Any man can abuse taxation; but let those hon. gentlemen show how they are going to carry on the government of the country without it; show how the Government in the present condition of this country is to raise its revenues under their tariff. This is a country of vast extent, as compared with what it was when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, and how are they going to manage the country to-day under a tariff such as they once had? Therefore, I say they are bound to apply their policy. Well, Sir, the revenue tariff which should reduce the alleged burdens, and especially diminish the alleged extravagant expenditure, and still keep up the management of the country, would certainly take with the people, and all these hon. gentlemen have to do is to show how it will work. The Government has burned its boats behind it; it is bound to the oar and cannot abandon it; and, if the hon. member for Queen's, instead of throwing himself into a theatrical attitude and shouting to gods and men, and calling on all to witness that this is a most unjust and extortionate tariff, will sit down quietly and show how he can carry on the country and save three or four millions, or two millions even, I will promise him that it will not be only a feeble and unfounded cry that they are raising, that they will get into power, but the country will be glad to accept them and have them effect the saving. My hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) raises a skeptical laugh, and well he may, for I am certain that the challenge will not be accepted by the hon. member for Queen's. Now, the hon. member for South Oxford, after his manner and the manner of his friends, answered part of his own argument. In his speech, he declared that he had never denied that it was not in the power of the Government to adopt a fiscal policy which would avert disaster. Disaster may come whether you have a free trade policy or a protective policy. Then, what is the meaning of all the arguments that are used by members of the Opposition? They try to make out that the country is in a ruinous condition. The hon. member for South Oxford says that the country has been bleeding away—that is his language—for years and years. Speaking of the present prices of property, he says that, if a careful account were made up of the country to-day, it would be found infinitely worse than it was sixteen years ago, that it is not nearly so wealthy as it was, and that this is true especially of the older provinces. I would not like to take up the time of the House with statistics, but hon. members will find that all they have to do, in order to answer the hon. gentleman, is to take his own words, when he declares that no policy can be adopted which will be certain to avert disaster. But, without going into the figures, let me ask the hon. gentleman to take the assessment of Kingston, the city where he lives, the assessment of Toronto, the assessment of Montreal, the assessment of towns and cities in the lower provinces—to say nothing of the value of farm houses and homesteads. Take the assessment of Winnipeg, which city the leader of the Opposition visited not long ago. In 1878 the assessment of Winnipeg would amount to two million dollars, while to-day it is $22,000,000. The assessment of Brandon which did not exist in 1878 has an assessment of about three or four millions. Portage la Prairie—I speak now from memory—has an assessment of about two and a half millions. Then, you can go further west, to Regina, Calgary and Vancouver. The assessment of Vancouver—a place that did not exist in 1878—is about $19,000,000. And yet the hon. member would try to make out that Canada is worse off to-day, with all this added wealth, than it was in former years. But, even supposing the hon. gentleman's statement to be true, he tells us himself that no policy can be guaranteed to avert disaster. But what does the hon. member do? He actually went into a discussion of the deficits, 1858-59-60-61-62-63. What, in the name of heaven, the deficits in these years have to do with the question before the House, it was hard to understand. Then, taking up more time, he dealt with some rubbishy Act of the time of Edward IV., with a view of making some doleful, pointless point with regard to the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague). But at this period he had to call a halt. He reminded me of a certain English statesman making his first speech. He was a heavy young man, the son of a duke. He has attained to better things than were then expected. He spoke very leisurely and only for half an hour, and in the middle of his speech he actually yawned. When asked what caused him to yawn at such a time, his answer was that he was so plaguey tired of his speech. The hon. member for Oxford seemed so tired of his speech that he had to call a halt and take a rest. After having four days to fit himself, he came once more to the scratch, but, I am sorry to say, proved to be in no better condition than at first. He went into the question of shrinkage of values from 1875 to 1878. As a criminal comes back to the scene of his fatal deed, fascinated thereby, the hon. gentleman came back again and again, fascinated by the doleful memories of the deficits of 1876-78. Now, I will ask the House to bear with me while I treat of one other matter. The hon. member for Winnipeg said he would not deal with the reduction of the Mounted Police, but would leave that question for me to deal with. I may say that I differ with the Government in reducing the number of Mounted Police. The Minister of Finance has reduced the vote by $155,000, and he has reduced the number of men. If we had known in the west that there was to be any reduction, I think we would have shown the Government that it was not a wise course to take. Anyway, as soon as we knew that a reduction had taken place, we made certain representations to the Government, and no further reductions were made. Now, I want to point out to the House why, in my estimation, it is not desirable in the interests of Canada to make further reductions, and why I cannot endorse the changes that have been made. We have in the North-west, 26,439 Indians, making more than 5,000 families, and that would give you some 10,000 fighting men. These are scattered all over the North-west. You have 646 at Fort Pelly; 272 at Cote; 225 at Key; 149 at Kee-see-kouse. These Indians occupy three or four large reserves north-west up in Eastern Assiniboia, fifty or sixty miles from the railway. There are few settlers, comparatively, although the country is a splendid one for settlement. There is good land as far east as Lake Winnipegosis, and north to the Porcupine Hills. There is a vast country to the north of the Saskatchewan, including the Carrot River District, and the valley of the Red Deer river. Now, with these 646 Indians in a country forty or fifty miles from a railway, it is evident that you require policemen. I think there is a police station within some twenty miles, with one or two men; but if you had no policemen there the settlers would be afraid to go in. As it is, with a few policemen, the settlers can, with confidence, go in. Then down south you have the Moose Mountain Agency with three large reserves, forty or fifty miles south of Moosomin, south of the railway. There is a splendid English settlement there, introduced by my late friend, Mr. Pearse. There you have 237 Indians, and you require some policemen. Then you have the Crooked Lake Agency, which covers a large tract of country between Broad View and Qu'Appelle Valley, a magnificent country. There are 574 Indians, and do you mean to say that you do not need some police there? Then you have the Assiniboine Agency, with 210 Indians, fifteen miles south of Indian Head. There, again, you require some policemen. Then, at Muscowpetung agency, in the Qu'Appelle Valley, some thirty miles north of Regina, you have a magnificent district, including the Pasquah, Muscowpetung, Piapot and Standing Buffalo reserves. Here there are 708 of an Indian population, and, of course, you cannot allow that country to be without police protection. Then we have the File Hill Agency, including the Little Black Bear, Star Blanket, Okanees, and the Pee-pee-keesis Agencies, with a population of 280, covering an area of country between the Pheasant Hills and the Beaver Hills, a beautiful country, with thousands of acres fit to be taken up. These reserves are some forty miles north of Fort Qu'Appelle, and what are you going to do if you have no body like the Mounted Police to keep order? Then you have the Touchwood Hills Agency where you have the Day Star, Poor Man, George Gordon, Muscowequan and the Yellow Quill reserves, with a population of 839, from fifty to eighty miles north of Fort Qu'Appelle, covering a large section of country in the Little and Big Touchwood Hills. In this district are some of the finest spots for settlement in the whole North-west, such as the Little and Bill Quill lakes, and the Nut lake, farther north. The settlers in this section of the North-west are confined chiefly to the west side of the Beaver Hills. Here, again, you could not allow them to be without the protection of the police. Then we have the Duck Lake Agency, and what I have said about the other agencies can be said of this. Then there is the Carlton Agency, around which there is a splendid country. This is in the part of the North-west where the rebellion commenced. It commenced, you remember, about the Duck Lake Agency, and it is most important that where you have people going into that district from Prince Albert and from Edmonton, you should have police protection. Then you come to the Battleford Agency and the Onion Lake Agency, where there are reserves running from the north-west part of the Bear Hills through the Eagle Hills, and many miles west of Battleford and the Battle River, a grand country for settlers. Being far from the railway it will require police protection for many years. Then for a distance of 80 or 90 miles through the beautiful valley of the Saskatchewan, there are countless acres of good land open for settlers, till we come to the Onion Lake reserves, covering a large section on the Onion and Frog Lakes, and as far west as the Moose Hills. Then you have the Saddle Lake agency, with a population of 698. Here again you have a magnificent country around Saddle Lake that will require police protection. Then you have the Edmonton agency, with a population of 718. Here you have the Enoch, Alexander, Joseph, (Alexis), Paul and Sharphead, Michel and Orphans at St. Albert reserves. People are going in there, and it would never do to leave them without police protection. Then there is the Hobbema agency, of which the same may be said. Then in Treaty No. 7, you have some of the most powerful of all the Indians. You have the Blackfoot agency, the Blood agency and the Piegan agency, containing a population of 4,428. Then there are 5,589 in the Athabasca and Mackenzie River districts; 1,725 in the Peace River district, and 852 in the Nelson and Churchill River district. All these populations make up the total I mentioned of 26,439 Indians. From what we know of the cost of an Indian war in the United States, I think this House will agree with me that it would be very unwise to reduce the number of police further than we have, and for my part I believe, and it is the opinion of those who know the North-west best, that it would be desirable the moment this stringency is past to revert to what the strength of the force was before any change whatever was made. I have trespassed on the patience of the House longer a good deal than I intended, but some of the points taken up have not been dealt with before. Some of them were specially interesting to the part of the country whence I come. I could not expect all would interest the House generally, and therefore I have to thank my friends for their forbearance in allowing me not only to present my views, so far as regards the interests of the country at large, but also as they apply to matters in which the people of the North-west are specially interested. I will only say that even as regards those I hold the country has a general interest in them, and I must say respecting a remark made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) the other evening, that if his friends came into power they would be able to reduce the expenditure there by some two hundred thousand dollars, that, I fancy, in the North-west Territories at all events, the people will feel that their interest is to abide by a party whose policy has in the main been so successful, and whose action towards the North-west Territories has been so generous, and which is destined, I believe, to be fruitful in producing prosperity and making us in the lapse of not too many years a wealthy and powerful portion of our great Dominion.

PRAYERS.

SOUTH SHORE SUBURBAN RAILWAY.

Mr. LACHAPPELLE moved :

That that part of the Fourth Report of the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, referring to Bill (No. 35), to incorporate the South Shore and Suburban Railway Company, be referred back to the said Committee for further consideration.

He said : I think there is one sufficient reason for my bringing this motion before the House. A very serious question of principle has been raised by those opposing the Bill for the incorporation of this company. That question of principle is this : That the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, as they contend, have the exclusive right to give permission to the company to construct the railway over the Guard Pier. That question has been brought before the Railway Committee by the opponents of the Bill, but, as a matter of fact, it has not been sufficiently discussed in the committee ; in fact, I think I am within the truth when I say that it has not been discussed at all. It is for this reason that I want the Bill to be again referred to the Railway Committee in such a way that we shall have an expression of opinion from the committee on that question of principle. I think that is a sufficient justification for my making this motion, seconded by Mr. Masson.

Mr. MASSON. In seconding the motion which has been moved by my hon friend, I do so on the ground that the discussion of the Bill in the committee was entirely taken up by those in opposition to it. No member of the committee, except the promoter, and one who made a suggestion in regard to one of the details of the Bill, said a word pro or con on the subject. The question of policy is whether it is in the interest of the public that such a Bill should be passed, the only reason given for reporting against the preamble being that it is not in the interest of the public. Now, the interest of the public is shown by those who are interested in the construction of this railway. On the south side of the St. Lawrence, every municipality for a considerable distance on each side of the proposed bridge is in favour of the Bill. They have expressed their approval of it by their petitions, and I am informed that they are willing to give substantial financial assistance in carrying out the project. Therefore, so far as the south side of the river is concerned, it is clearly in the interest of the public, if the people understand their interest, that the bridge should be built. I am further informed that for the last twenty-four years the building of a bridge, at or near that point, has been a live question in that neighbourhood. On the island side there is no opposition that can be looked upon as having a reasonable basis except what comes from the harbour commissioners, and their opposition refers to a detail and not to the real merits of the scheme. The question of the advisability of having a bridge there does not enter into the discussion, so far as the harbour commissioners are concerned. Their opposition is based on the ground that it is proposed to make use of the Guard Pier, one of the harbour works of Montreal. The plans of that guard pier were submitted to the committee, and they show that at the water's edge it is 250 feet in width, and on the top, 45 feet in width. It was alleged that if an electric tramway were built on the top of that pier, it would be rendered ineffectual for harbour purposes. It was explained by the promoter of the Bill, although the committee did not seem to grasp his statement, that it was not proposed to make use of the top of the pier. It is proposed to make use of the outer side of the pier away from where it is intended by the harbour commissioners at some future time to build wharfs on the inside of the pier, so that the building of the tramway would not in any way, as far as the public is concerned, interfere with the use of the guard pier for harbour purposes. The height of the bridge was referred to, and it was said that it would be impossible of approach except with a very heavy grading. I am informed, and I believe it to be the fact, that that guard pier is at present one mile and one-third in length, and the present height to the top of the embankment or mud-wall bank is 45 feet, so that the difference of grade to reach the pier is not very large. Besides, the promoters of the Bill had an amendment ready, as a matter of detail, providing that the obstruction should be subject to the approval of the harbour commissioners and on such terms as might be agreed upon. The question arises whether, as a matter of policy, if the harbour commissioners have such control, it is in the interest of the public or not that they should absolutely refuse all right of access thereto. One of the representatives of the harbour commissioners, in presenting that matter before the committee, said that at some future day undoubtedly a railway would run along that embankment, but they objected to power being given to a railway company to do so. But all the company asks is that they be allowed to do so on such terms as might be agreed upon and settled by the Governor in Council. These are matters of detail, and I submit that the committee were considering more the question of detail than the principle of the Bill when they hurriedly disposed of it this morning. I have much pleasure in seconding the motion that it be referred back to the committee for reconsideration.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman from Grey (Mr. Masson) has stated that the opposition in the committee to the Bill came from the harbour commissioners for the port of Montreal. I would remind my hon. friend that the chairman of the board of trade of Montreal—

Mr. MASSON. On the ground of the harbour commission.

Mr. KENNY. No, at the instance of his own council, and by a unanimous vote of the council, the chairman of that board of trade attended the committee and opposed the Bill. I have also to remind my hon. friend that the representative of the largest navigation company of the port of Montreal, the Richelieu Navigation Company—the company which pays the largest amount of fees of any navigation company to the Harbour Commission of Montreal—opposed it, and just here I may say that those of us who are accustomed to deal with matters of navigation and who know the difficulties of navigating in a rapid current like the port of Montreal, recognized how very objectionable the Bill, as proposed, would be from the standpoint of those interested in navigation. Now, my hon. friend must recognize this. It was palpable to every member of the committee this morning. In a question important to Montreal, because the city of Montreal is most concerned, when the chairman of the harbour commission, when the president of the board of trade, and the representative of the largest navigation company on the St. Lawrence all unite in opposing this Bill, I must say that I think the committee did wisely in rejecting it, and the House will, under the circumstances, make a great mistake in re-submitting it. If the matter is one of so very great importance, why cannot it stand until next year? We will all be here next year, and then have a chance of reconsidering it. Under these circumstances, I submit that it would not be wise for us to adopt the motion just made.

Sir DONALD A. SMITH. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) has so well presented the case of those who oppose the construction of a bridge at Montreal that it is really unnecessary that anything more should be said with regard to it. But as the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) mentions that the opposition came from the harbour commission, I would certainly say, as one of the representatives of Montreal, that in this he was altogether in error, and that the opposition to it is not solely from the harbour commission of Montreal, but from the board of trade, and also from all those who are most largely concerned in the trade and commerce of the city of Montreal. They feel that it would be a very great inconvenience to that trade were such a bridge built there at present at the point spoken of. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Masson) mentioned as an argument in favour of having the bridge built now, or having the Bill sent back to the committee for reconsideration, that it was admitted a bridge might be required, and would be built there at some future time. Well, that may be. Many things come to be required in the future which at present are not wanting, and certainly it is the opinion of the great body of the people of Montreal that at present this bridge is not wanted, and that we would be very much better without it. You have against the Bill the city with its suburbs of some 300,000 people. It may be that you have on the south shore a few hundred who are anxious for it, but surely the opinion and the wish of such a large majority ought to have weight with this House. I would submit that I hope the House will not refer the Bill back to the committee, but, as suggested by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), will leave it for consideration at another session of Parliament.

Mr. CURRAN. In addition to what my hon. friend has just said, I would bring under the notice of the House this fact. It was stated by the chairman of the harbour commissioners this morning that the guard pier which it is the desire of this company to use, will not be completed for perhaps three years, so that the promoters of this Bill will lose nothing by coming back another session. There is plenty of time to dispose of the guard pier and decide whether it is to be handed over to a private company, after the guard pier itself has been fully completed.

Mr. EDGAR. There is one matter connected with the discussion of the Bill before the committee which has not been mentioned, and which is very important. The opposition was made to this Bill by the harbour commissioners. After a considerable amount of discussion, the counsel for the railway company agreed to accept a clause which would leave it in the control of the harbour commissioners to regulate the passage of this railway over their works and make what conditions might be agreed upon. That seemed, certainly, to be acceptable to the committee, so far as that branch of the case went, and it looked to me as if they were going to adopt it. Then, the hon. gentleman who makes this motion, the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Lachapelle), who, as a member of the committee, introduced the Bill, rose and repudiated the authority of the counsel to make that offer, and declared that he would not consent to anything of the kind. Then the Bill was thrown out. I would like the hon. member to settle that matter. I think the House is entitled to know whether the hon. member who had charge of the Bill or the counsel who represented the company had authority when he spoke, because, if the counsel were right, and the hon. member will now say that he would agree to what the counsel said, I certainly, for one, would vote for the reconsideration of the Bill.

Mr. LACHAPELLE. Mr. Speaker, the matter is very important, and I wish to say a few words in answer to the hon. member who has just spoken. Unhappily there was a misapprehension on the part of the attorney of the company. I merely rose to say that I thought there was a misunderstanding on the part of that gentleman, and that we were before the Committee on Railways and the House of Commons, to decide whether, on the one hand, the committee and the House, or, on the other hand, the Board of Harbour Commissioners, has the right to decide who shall have the privilege of passing on the guard pier. That is the point, and it is for that reason I thought it right to present the motion I have made this afternoon. That point has not yet been discussed. The chairman of the Board of Harbour Commissioners has said that that body refused and will always refuse to grant permission to pass on the guard pier. The Minister of Railways asked Mr. Gemmill, the attorney of the company, if it was his intention to ask the harbour commissioners' permission to pass on that pier. By a misapprehension which I cannot understand that gentleman answered: Yes; we will ask the permission of the harbour commissioners. Then the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) said that if it was the intention to ask the permission of the harbour commissioners, there was no use going further with the Bill, as the chairman of the harbour commissioners had already declared that permission would be refused. Then I rose and said that I thought there was a misunderstanding. And I think, because of that misunderstanding, the conclusion has not been made sufficiently clear to justify the refusal of the Bill, and it is for that reason, Mr. Speaker, that I ask the House to decide the very important question whether it is the harbour commissioners who have the right to grant permission on the public wharf—for this is not a private wharf—or whether this House has the right to decide that point. I would say to the hon. member for Halifax that we are not bound to discuss the question during the session. I do not want to make the session longer than it must be. It may be the matter will be discussed next year. Many Bills are not finished the same session, but are passed in the following year after their first introduction. Under the circumstances, I think I am right in asking the House to refer the Bill again to the Committee on Railways.

Mr. LAURIER. For my part, I am waiting to see if the Government had any instruction to offer the House upon this point. The Government is represented on the Committee on Railways, and the House would have been gratified, I think, if the Government had given their views upon the subject. Speaking for myself individually, I would say that, under all the circumstances, I would conceive it to be the duty of the members of the House to support the decision of their committee. In a matter of this kind especially, where a good deal of information is given to the committee which cannot be laid before the House, I cannot conceive that such a motion as that made by my hon. friend from Hochelaga (Mr. Lachapelle) should be entertained at all, unless it were shown that in the committee there had been a miscarriage of justice or some gross error. If I understand the hon. gentleman aright, the statement he makes is tantamount to saying that the vote taken this morning was taken under a misapprehension. If that was the case and the members of the committee were satisfied that they voted under a misapprehension, if they now realized that some information given had not been properly understood, I suppose that the members of the committee would be the first to rise and say so. But, so far, I have not understood any such expression to fall from the members of the committee who have spoken. On the contrary, the opinion expressed by the members of the committee who have spoken is to the effect that the vote was given because of the course taken by the promoters of the Bill before the committee. Under such circumstances, I must say, though I regret it, that I cannot see, for my part, any reason why the decision of the committee should be reversed.

Mr. HAGGART. In answer to the hon. gentleman, I have to say that I think that when the matter was before the committee the whole question was thoroughly understood. The application of the bridge company before the committee was to be allowed to make use of a certain improvement built by the Harbour Commission of Montreal. The solicitor on behalf of the company stated that he intended to introduce into the Bill, as my hon. friend from Ontario (Mr. Edgar stated, a clause to the effect that the consent of the harbour commissioners should be given before the company might use the improvement. The promoter of the Bill differed from the solicitor of the company, and the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) said that if that clause was to be inserted in the Bill, the measure might as well be dropped, as the opinion of the harbour commissioners had been expressed, and that they would on no account allow the company to use the harbour improvements for the purpose of building the bridge. I think the question was understood by the committee, and I do not see any reason why the Bill should be sent back to the committee for reconsideration.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL. (Translation.) Before the House should deal with this motion, I would like to enlighten it as to the state of the public feeling in Montreal and its neighbourhood, in connection with the building of this bridge. The hon. member for Montreal West contended that the three hundred thousand people who form the population of Montreal were opposed to the building of this bridge. I am in a position to state that such is not the case. The great majority of the Montreal people and those of the south shore would be happy to find that this public work has succeeded. We all know that the Victoria Bridge is now the only one through which direct communication can be had between Montreal and the south shore, and this Parliament often heard of the difficulties raised by the Grand Trunk Company to prevent the other railway companies from communicating with Montreal. In fact, it is almost an impossibility, except on exorbitant terms. The public feeling in Montreal is in favour of the proposed scheme. The opposition offered by the Montreal Board of Trade and Harbour Commission was referred to. But I would like to know what public work in Montreal was not strenuously opposed by these two corporations? Last year, when a new scheme was talked of, it was confronted with as strong an opposition as these two oppositions could offer. There is one thing sure, it is that the Montreal people would like a new bridge opposite their city which would make equal terms to all the railway companies wishing to go into the city of Montreal. This bridge is also required in order to develop the industrial and commercial interests of that section. For particular reasons which I have no desire to review, the Board of Trade and Harbour Commission are opposed to the building of this new bridge, but the enlightened public sentiment is anxious for the success of this work. I understand that this morning, before the Committee on Railways, there was a misunderstanding between the solicitor of the company and the promoter of the work with respect to the interference of the Harbour Commission. The promoters are willing to submit to a certain extent to the control of the Harbour Commission. They admit the right of the Harbour Commissioners to control the building, management and working of this bridge, but they decline to be at their mercy as to their right to exist. Apart from that, they only acknowledge the authority of Parliament. The Montreal Harbour Commission owes its existence to this Parliament and it was appointed to exercise part of the public powers. The company will likewise be dependent on the same body and will acknowledge the supreme authority of the Dominion Parliament. The company ought, therefore, to have an opportunity to form itself and build this bridge without having to go through the objections of the chairman of both the Montreal Board of Trade and Montreal Harbour Commission.

Motion negatived.

REPEAL OF THE ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

Mr. PELLETIER (Translation) moved first reading of Bill (No. 99) to repeal the Electoral Franchise Act and amending Acts. He said: Mr. Speaker, a similar Bill was moved in this House in 1891. I then voted against such a proposition for the following reasons: A general election had just taken place and about half of the returns were protested. In many cases the election was declared null and void and a new election had to be held. I considered the repeal of the Act was premature owing to the controverted elections which might be declared null and void and would have to be held again under this Act. And, moreover, at that time four more sessions of this Parliament remained to be held. The Bill I am now introducing is consistent with the convictions I always held with respect to this, that the electoral franchise should be regulated by the provincial authority. The main argument by which I support this opinion is that as long as the electoral franchise shall be based on property qualification it ought to fall within the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities, for property exclusively falls under their control. We can only reach property through the local powers, local organizations and municipal councils. One of the reasons given for the maintenance of the law now in force was the necessity of making uniform the federal franchise. This reason does not hold good, since the law, such as it is, does not even carry out that principle. The fact is the law is variously enforced. I always was earnestly opposed to the Act now in force and, as I stated a moment ago, if in 1891, I voted against its repeal, I never intended to vote for the principle of the Act. I then voted against its repeal because I considered the proposition as premature inasmuch as we needed the Act for the elections which might be declared null and void and which would have to be held again. Here is the Bill, and I move its first reading.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

REPORT.

Report of the Postmaster General for the year ending 30th June, 1894.—(Sir Adolphe Caron.)

YAMASKA RIVER—LOCK AND DAM.

Mr. MIGNAULT (Translation) asked. What was the total amount paid in each year by the Government for the work of repairs and maintenance, on the dam and lock on the Yamaska River, for the years 1890, 1891, 1892, 1893 and 1894? 2. How many lock-men are employed at the said lock, and what pay does each of them get? 3. What is the amount derived from the said lock, by the Government, for each of the years 1890, 1891, 1892, 1893 and 1894? 4. Are the lock-men obliged to remain at the lock during the whole time of the season of navigation?

Mr. OUIMET. (Translation.) In answer to the hon. member, I may say that the expenditure in connection with the repairs on and maintenance of the river Yamaska dam, was as follows: 1890, $541.73; 1891, $10,499.88; 1892, $3,929.58; 1893, $1,608.09; 1894, $999.68. Two hands are employed during navigation time, each receiving a salary of $40 a month. The receipts from the lock were $222.49 in 1893-94. The answer to the last question is: Yes.

FOREIGN POWERS AND THE FRENCH TREATY.

Mr. EDGAR asked, 1. What foreign powers have become entitled under treaties with Great Britain to like commercial privileges with Canada as those granted to France by the treaty of 6th February, 1893, known as the French Treaty? 2. Do each and all of such foreign powers become entitled to all the reductions proposed by Article 1 of said treaty?

Mr. IVES. 1. From the best information at the moment attainable, it appears probable that the following foreign powers will, under treaties with Great Britain, become entitled to like privileges in Canada as those granted to France by the treaty of February 6th, 1893, on its ratification, &c., viz.:

Argentina, under treaty of	1825
Austria-Hungary do	1876
Belgium do	1862
Bolivia do	1840
Chile do	1854

Columbia, under treaty of	1866
Costa Rica do	1849
Germany (Zollver'n) do	1865
Muscat do	1892
Russia do	1859
Salvador do	1862
Sweden & Norway do	1826
Uruguay do	1885

It is also possible that the treaties with the following countries might be held to be binding on Canada in like manner—although doubtful—the wording in some instances being obscure and in others being subject to further action, which, whether taken or not, it would require time and correspondence to ascertain:

Egypt, under treaty of	1889
Montenegro do	1882
Mexico do	1888
Persia do	1844
South African Republic, under treaty of	1884
Venezuela, under treaty of	1825
Zanzibar do	1886

The answer to the second question is given as far as possible in that to the first.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, the debate to which the House has been listening for the past number of days has taken a very wide range, and the House will therefore pardon me if I take somewhat longer time than is usual at this particular stage of the debate to refer to the different points which have been raised. Hon. gentlemen opposite, from the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to the humblest member who has spoken from that side of the House, have evidently been endeavouring to make their campaign for the coming election; and, in order to do that, they have been urging this House to believe that they possess certain virtues in all the lines in which public men should be virtuous. And in order that I may answer them this afternoon, I wish to consider the claims which have been urged by hon. gentlemen opposite under four different heads: First, their ability to govern this country; next, their purity as administrators; next, their economy as administrators, and last, the excellence of the trade policy which they have presented to the country. Speaking a very short time ago in the city of Montreal, the leader of the Opposition saw fit to declare his hope, for the hundredth time, that they were about to come into power; and on what was his hope based? Only on this, that the great chieftain of the Conservative party had gone, and that in consequence the elements which followed him were dissolving and scattering. Well, Sir, it is true the old chief-tain is gone, and that willing hands are erecting monuments in his honour is evidence of the great work he did for Canada, notwithstanding the abuse of hon. gentlemen opposite for many years. Succeeding him fell that other great man Sir John Abbott, whose work is also recognized most thoroughly by Canadians now of every class; and succeeding him and abused as was his predecessors, Sir John Thompson now sleeps in the soil of his native province, notwithstanding the abuse of hon. gentlemen opposite through successive years, wrapped in the robes of a nation's honour and embalmed in the bitterness of a nation's tears. Though those men are gone, though we mourn them, though their colleagues and old supporters mourn them, though we are glad to know that Canadians mourn them because while they mourn them it is a testimony to the work and worth of the Conservative party as well, I want to tell the hon. leader of the Opposition that the Conservative party of this country is not built on men, but is built on principles, and though those leaders have gone the principles live, and when it appeals to the electors, as we must do very soon, he will find the same old vitality and the same old strength put forth in the campaign, and that the same old victories will perch upon our banners as of yore. This fact he should have considered, that since Sir John Macdonald's death we have won from them, no less than 18 seats; hon. gentlemen opposite have won from us 4 seats. If the hon. gentleman can take any comfort out of that, instead of having been educated at a Scotch school, as he told the people in the province of Ontario, was the case, it seems to me he must have been educated at Dean Swift's Academy at Lagado, where they learned the science of extracting sunbeams from cucumbers. I want to say to my hon. friend that I was somewhat astonished to hear the charge that we were afraid to go to the elections. A few months ago when it was thought we were going to the contest, what was the cry? The cry then was in column after column of the Toronto "Globe," that we ought not to go, and His Excellency was advised in column after column in that newspaper not to permit us a dissolution because we had no right to appeal to the country; apparently hon. gentlemen were then not spolling for the fray. And the hon. gentleman who sits for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), who is the leading constitutional authority upon the other side of the House, discovered a new constitutional reason which he urged before the people why the Government should not dissolve Parliament and appeal to the country, and what was that reason? That there was too much snow upon the ground and elections could not be advantageously held. It was not the snow that was upon the ground, but the snow that was to fall that disturbed the peace of hon. gentlemen opposite when they thought they had to face the electors. I want to say to hon. gentlemen opposite that the Conservatives of this country are not afraid of the people. We have appealed to them in the past and have not had very much reason to complain. We are willing to abide by the judgment of the people; hon. gentlemen opposite seem never willing to abide by the judgment of the people. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has constantly expressed his want of confidence in the people; but the people are even with him, for they have voted their want of confidence repeatedly in that hon. gentleman. Sir, the debate has taken this line: an attack upon the members of the Government, an attack particularly upon a want of ability, it is said, that has been demonstrated by my hon. friend the Finance Minister, who leads this House so ably, and who is no unworthy successor of the distinguished men who have occupied during so many years the place in which he sits in the Parliament of Canada. I wish to say to the hon. member for South Oxford that while members of the Government may not have the confidence of their opponents, we do enjoy the confidence of our friends; and, thank God, no member of this Government has had to go back to his constituency to fight with his friends to get the party nomination with which to go to the people. Sir, the hon. member of South Oxford cannot say that. For many years that hon. gentleman was wandering up and down the province of Ontario and at last secured a resting place. I took occasion some years ago in the course of a speech in this House to say that that resting place would tire of him, and my prophecy came true only a few months ago when the hon. gentleman was seeking renomination in the constituency of South Oxford. What did they say there? He was wrathful and he abused them without stint; and when he found it was difficult to get the nomination—I do not know to whom he referred—when he found men conspiring against him—he referred to some one on his right or left or behind him, when he said this in the convention:

But he would ask, if it was true that the men be worthy of confidence, who, while pretending to be friendly, were plotting against a colleague. Fair fighting is one thing and assassination is another. While you may call for the head of an enemy, it is not fair warfare to stab a friend under the fifth rib.

And, Sir, it was not a mere local matter, for it was published with the very greatest care by the Toronto "Globe" in order that all and sundry, to use the idiomatic expression of the hon. gentleman opposite, might know exactly what he meant. There came a time, however, when the matter was settled. That time was when a gentleman in Toronto wrote a letter into the riding, a gentleman who had recently been organizer of the Liberal party, stating :

That, in view of the active canvas being made for the Liberal nomination, it might not be uninteresting to Mr. Jackson (to whom he was writing), to know that, when it was decided by the party leaders, subsequent to the general elections of 1887, that an early appeal should be made to friends of the party for substantial assistance, so as to make the necessary preparations for the next general elections, the only Liberal in Toronto who was asked to subscribe, and positively refused, was Mr. S. H. Janes. He told a friend and myself, when presented with the subscription book, that he had no funds for party purposes.

Well, Sir, immediately that was heard, and immediately that letter was sent abroad, these purists in South Oxford decided that Mr. Janes was unworthy of the nomination of the Liberal party, and my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was selected as a candidate once more ; due to the fact evidently that he had been more liberal in the giving of substantial aid. Mr. Speaker, this is a new phrase we have. We have heard it in times past called "Big Push" ; we have heard it called "human devices" ; we have heard it called "putting down bribery and corruption" ; we have heard it called "mesmerism" ; we have heard it called "relief for the poor" ; but here is a new phrase in the vocabulary of purity : "Substantial aid," and to my mind it expresses it better than any of the other terms. I understand now—and here is another evidence that appears to me as if my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is being stabbed under the fifth rib by some of his friends—I understand that the Liberal party of Toronto are advertising for a new campaign song. Evidently the old song he sings seems to have been played out in the minds of gentlemen in Toronto, because they are asking for a new campaign song. I would suggest to my hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), and who is the poet of his party, who it is said is competing for the prize, that he should compose a poem in which he should employ his genius in settling in proper background, before the electorate of this country, these beautiful gems which are evidence of Liberal purity. But, after the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) had his nomination, he was not even then safe, and his ribs were still in danger, because my hon. friend knows that there is a Liberal paper published in the town of Aylmer, in the province of Quebec, and that Liberal paper had something to say in regard to my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and here is what it said. Nothing ever so hard was said of him by any hon. gentleman on this side of the House :

An enthusiastic Liberal of Montreal said the other day : If the Lord would only lay Sir Richard Cartwright on a bed of sickness for the next six months, nothing in the Dominion or out of it could prevent the Liberal party getting into power.

That, Sir, is how my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) seems to be appreciated among the very gentlemen who he says are so enthusiastically united against the Conservative party of this country. Now, Mr. Speaker, who are the gentlemen who are asking the electors of this country to dismiss this Government, and to place them in power ? They are gentlemen who have always claimed electoral purity and who have always practised electoral corruption. They are the men who, in 1874, passed an Act forbidding corruption at elections, and yet in the next election no less than thirty of these were shown to have purchased their seats ; and since the introduction of that law, eighty-three Liberal purists have fallen, to 48 Conservatives. Eight purist Liberals have been disqualified to one Conservative. They are the gentlemen who have always claimed that they were the party of righteous legislation in regard to election matters, and yet I remember when they were in power, that every one of these gentlemen voted for a Bill to take a Liberal township, a Liberal stronghold, from a constituency in which it had done its duty for a Liberal candidate at the general election, and to place it over into another constituency where it might do double duty in a by-election. Every one of the Liberals, Sir, voted for it under the guise of righteous legislation. They are the gentlemen who claim to be the party of low taxation, but I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite in this House, as I have challenged them in the country, to name one single item in all their five years of power—except the one item of coal oil, and then they took off an excise duty on coal oil and put a customs tax on tea to make up the loss—on which they reduced taxation. I say that in all these five years of power, they never reduced one single dollar of taxation on the people of this country, but on the contrary, they constantly added taxation on their shoulders, in all adding a customs taxation of three million dollars. Not only that, Sir, but they tell us : They are men who want to take office for the public good. I have their campaign sheet here which says "All they want is office for the public good." Look at them. Mr. Speaker, see the hungry look in their faces and see if it is the public good they are after. When they went into power on just the same cry before, only three or four years elapsed when eight of their Cabinet Ministers "who went into power for the public good," slipped into office for their private good," and one Cabinet Minister who went into office "for the public good," or rather for his family's good, put fifteen of his relatives as pensioners in the public treasury of this country. Sir, the fact is, as I shall show, that in five years of office these Liberals made such a record of blundering stupidity and incapacity, that they were hurled from power by an indignant electorate and so long as the electors of this country remember that they ever were in power, their chances are very blue for ever getting into power again. Well, Mr. Speaker, let me ask: Why am I discussing these matters?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Hear, hear.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will tell my hon. friend in a moment. My hon. friend (Mr. Davies) is smiling, but it is a smile of the lips and he will know it before I get through. Why do I discuss these matters? I discuss them because my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) last night said: When we get into power, we will do just the same as we did when we were in power before. My hon. friend will know that there is very little chance of my making any comparison with the future record of the Liberal party. That is away in the dim and distant future, and the House will therefore pardon me if I say something this afternoon as to their past record, more particularly as we have the certificate of my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies), that when he gets into power: "He will do the same as they did before." I want to say, Sir, in the first place: that standing here to-day, twenty-seven years from confederation, the records of this country show that hon. gentlemen opposite as a party have been wrong on every great public question upon which they ever declared a policy. In all the history of our years as a Dominion, these men have never propounded a policy that subsequent events had shown to be a proper one. Why, Sir, let me in the light of the present, read the announcement of their great leader in 1871, as to a great public enterprise in this country. Mr. Mackenzie on page 672 of the "Hansard" of 1871, says as follows, as regards the Canadian Pacific Railway:—

Mr. LAURIER. What are you quoting from?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The "Hansard" of 1871.

Mr. LAURIER. There was no "Hansard" in 1871.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There is a "Hansard" in the Library made from "Globe" reports of the debates of that year.

Mr. LISTER. There was no "Hansard" then.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend is taking refuge behind a very slim willow. I want my hon. friends from the west to listen to what Mr. Mackenzie said then, and I want hon. gentlemen opposite to take a mental note of it, too, and to say what they think of their policy. Mr. Mackenzie said:

Mr. MONTAGUE.

He would recommend a cheap narrow-gauge railway, with steamers on the lakes, instead of a costly broad-gauge road, for the North-west and British Columbia, and the railway across the prairies need not be constructed for many years.

Sir, that was the policy of the Liberal party. Looking back now, was it right or wrong? Looking back now, is there a man who will say it is right?

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes. It was right.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) says that it is right. Well, he has always been a narrow-gauge politician, but no Canadian having an atom of regard for public opinion of his judgment will say as he says. I am old enough to remember, and old enough parliamentary to know, that hon. gentlemen opposite opposed the construction of the great Sault Canal which gives us a water way independent of the people of the United States. My hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, last year could not refrain from expressing his pride at the construction of that great work, and thus admitted that he was wrong with regard to it when he opposed it. Why, Sir, let me just read a few extracts, because they are matters of history and the people of this country ought to know them, as to what these gentlemen opposite thought of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Here is what my friend the member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) says:

This was a contract from which there was no escape politically or commercially, excepting one, and that is annexation to the United States. It is escape that no politician likes to talk about, but it will come one day, and, when it comes, we must take our chance and make the best bargain we can.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Where is the hon. gentleman reading from?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am reading from a report of a speech delivered in Charlotte-town in the year 1880.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Where is the report?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will show the report to my hon. friend. Does he deny the utterance?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) From what paper?

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend has a custom of denying statements in this House—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will show to-day that my hon. friend denies them sometimes—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman knows, if he will allow me—

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, some days ago I asked a question of hon. gentlemen opposite, and you ruled, very strongly indeed, and very peremptorily I thought, that I was decidedly out of order. I now ask for your ruling, though I ask for no pity from hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. SPEAKER. My ruling, as I stated then—if my ruling is called in question, of course it may be appealed against—is that no hon. member is permitted to interrupt an hon. member who has the floor, except on a question of order.

Mr. LAURIER. I ask your ruling, Mr. Speaker, on this point. The hon. gentleman stated that my hon. friend beside me has the habit of denying statements made by him. I ask if that is in order?

Mr. SPEAKER. I doubt very much if I can be called upon to rule upon that. If the hon. Secretary of State states that the hon. member for Queen's is in the habit of denying statements made by him on the floor of this House, then it certainly is not in order.

Some hon. MEMBERS (to Mr. Laurier). Hear, hear; take it back.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend, I think, entirely misunderstood me, for the very reason that he would not allow me to proceed with my sentence. I said that my hon. friend was in the habit of denying statements which were attributed to him in this House, and I was about to say immediately afterwards that I intended to deal with some of those statements a little later on in my speech. If there is any question of order in the point raised by the hon. leader of the Opposition, I shall be very glad, Mr. Speaker, as I always am, to submit to your ruling. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask the attention of the House to this fact, that instead of the Canadian Pacific Railway compelling us to seek annexation to the United States, it is the one great work which has enabled us to hold ourselves politically independent, and commercially independent, of the people of those states. Sir, let us take a look at a speech delivered by my hon. friend the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who always grows vigorous in his denunciations of the Conservative policy. He said:

This scheme, whether designed or not, is a great crime. Its supporters in the Government may take the attitude of criminal complicity or of stupidity. If they choose the latter alternative, posterity will accord each a coat of arms, the central figure a head, with dropping ears and pensive countenance, the head of the meditative donkey.

Again I refer to a speech made by the hon. member for North Norfolk, in which he said:

Of course, the projectors and promoters of the enterprise would claim that after the road was opened from ocean to ocean, a large amount of through business would be developed, but he thought there was a great deal of fallacy in the estimate of the probable amount of through freight.

Indeed, the whole thing would be a fizzle from beginning to end. That was the statement made by the hon. member for North Norfolk. I am quoting it now to show—

Mr. CHARLTON. Where is it contained?

Mr. MONTAGUE in the "Hansard"—that hon. gentlemen opposite were wrong upon that great public question. Sir, see the business which has been developed. View their predictions now in the light of subsequent events. Here is another prediction of the hon. member for North Norfolk:

He believed that the estimate of Asiatic trade likely to be secured was greatly exaggerated.

He had often heard the grievance of British Columbia on the floor of the House. * * * * * Those men from that province had seats here, and they made more noise than the delegates from any other province.

Well, Sir, my hon. friend who took that stand went a few years afterwards to Victoria, in the province of British Columbia, and declared that it was the great Liberal party of this country that had promoted and constructed the Canadian Pacific Railway.

It is hard to realize, sir, the vastness and magnitude of the Dominion. Of course, I came by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and it affords me great pleasure to bear unequivocal testimony as to the courteousness of its officials, the completeness of its equipment and the character of the road, and I congratulate you most sincerely on the completion of the great work, which promises British Columbia more intimate relations with the sister provinces. I doubt not that the time is not far distant when lines of steamers will be established between here and Asia, Australia, and the north-western coast of America, and I hope that your most extravagant dreams will be more than realized. The great Liberal party had always been the friends of the Canadian Pacific. The province owed them much with regard to it.

And not only did he praise the Canadian Pacific, and, going still further, he denounced the Conservative Premier, Sir John Macdonald, for not having spent more public money in the harbour of Victoria. My hon. friend will not deny that.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do deny it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It was made in a speech delivered on the 26th of August, 1886, and reported in the British Columbia papers.

Mr. CHARLTON. Read the extract.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I shall be most happy to do so. The extract is this:

What has Sir John Macdonald done for this city when its representative and Premier of the Dominion? I might ask why Victoria, the fourth port of the Dominion, why for this port there has only been set apart in the Estimates the paltry sum of $8,500 for harbour improvements, and why for these numerous harbours, bays and inlets there is but a grant of $10,500? Why is it that British Columbia has not received one cent to improve the navigation of the Fraser River?

Sir, the hon. gentlemen opposite seem to be ever the same. They try to put east against west, and province against province. Even this year while the leader of the Opposition and his colleagues were promising public expenditures in the west, his friends at the same time in the east were attacking us for doing justice to the west. So much with regard to the opposition which these hon. gentlemen displayed against the Canadian Pacific Railway in its early days. Now, Sir, there was a time when the question was how much of the railway should be constructed. Hon. gentlemen opposite said that the line around the North Shore of Lake Superior was no good, and they opposed it with might and main. I want to ask this House now of what use the Canadian Pacific Railway would be to Canada if we had not this great connecting link—how much of a national work it would be? Were we right or were they right? They were wrong. In a thousand ways they have been compelled to admit since. Then there came a time when the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was in distress, a time when danger threatened them, and when they came to this House and asked for aid; and if that aid had not been given, the Canadian Pacific Railway would have been bankrupt, and if the Canadian Pacific Railway had become bankrupt, the credit and progress of this country would have been destroyed for the next half century. Where did these men stand then? They were still, Sir, on the narrow-gauge policy; they were still unable to appreciate the opportunities and possibilities of this country. Here was their policy, as laid down by the member for West Huron, Mr. M. C. Cameron, who is not now in this House, to be found on page 2642 of "Hansard" of 1885:

I say the name of any Parliament, in the face of these facts, that would ratify these resolutions, will stink in the nostrils of every honest man, and the names of its members will go down to future generations as political time-servers and slaves, who for the third time, at the bidding of an unscrupulous and corrupt Government, sold this country to this corporation.

Were we right or were we wrong? Hon. gentlemen opposite know that they were wrong; they know now, in the light of history, that the Conservative party were not time-servers and slaves, but patriotic men, willing to stake the credit of this country, because they knew that in staking its credit they were going to build up the credit and the future of the Dominion. That money loaned at that time was paid back. We lost not a dollar, but we averted a national calamity. Well, Sir, I now come down to more recent times. I come to the great trade fight of 1891, when hon. gentlemen opposite asked us to adopt the policy of unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union. Were they right or were they wrong? Once more, Sir, they were wrong, and so wrong that they are now ashamed of it themselves; so wrong that they now deny that they ever supported it; so wrong that not a Canadian with investments in this country but trembles when he thinks how near Canada came to accepting that sham policy that would have been destructive to the Dominion in times of danger. So much, Sir, for the points of history in regard to the conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite upon great public questions. Now, they are calling for economy. Well, Sir, it is an old cry, the cry of economy, with hon. gentlemen opposite. My hon. friend the member for North Norfolk, when he spoke to the Patrons, declared it to be a time-honoured rule of the Liberal party,—and he might have observed that it was a rule more honoured in the breach than in the observance, as I think I shall be able to show when I deal with that part of the subject. Sir, I want for a few moments to speak as to some of the economies of hon. gentlemen opposite. We have heard a great deal in this House about the question of superannuation. Hon. gentlemen opposite, when they were coming into power—before they were in power—cried out for economy in our superannuation, just as they are crying out now; and yet, when they were in power, they increased the vote necessary for that service 100 per cent in five years, and superannuated many a man that still walks the streets of Ottawa and elsewhere—superannuated them ostensibly because their health was poor, but really because they wanted places for their supporters who were anxious to "serve the public for the public good." Not only that. While they were thus losing money to the country by their mismanagement of superannuation, and I am absolutely correct in my figures, as hon. gentlemen will find—$53,000 and $106,000 were the figures when they began and closed—while they were thus constantly losing money to the country, they devised no scheme by which the income and the outgo should be made to balance. And now they attack us notwithstanding the fact that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance brought down a Bill two years ago which goes a long way towards evening up income and expenditure in that branch, and has another on the paper which will wipe out the balance on the wrong side altogether, and make the superannuation fund pay its own way. That is what this Government mean to accomplish. They attacked my hon. friend the Minister of Railways for his expenditure on the Intercolonial. My hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), in a table which he made of expenses that they could save—a table which, I am bound to say, if I am not unparliamentary, was not drawn up with a due regard to the rules of Sabbath observance—tried to make out that the Minister of Railways ought to have saved another $100,000 on the Intercolonial. But, let me here take a note of what my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), said, when he exclaimed, "What we did then, we will do again." Let us see what they did then in order that we may judge what they will do again. Sir, these economical gentlemen had 714 miles of railway under their control. And on that economically-managed railway, in 1876-77, they lost $507,000; and in 1877-78, $432,000; and now, when my hon. friend the Minister of Railways has actually wiped out the deficit and made the Intercolonial contribute $5,000 a year to the treasury of Canada, the hon. gentleman from Queen's (Mr. Davies) exclaims: Let us come in again and see what we can do in regard to the Intercolonial. And remember this, Sir, that the management was then in the hands of a gentleman who said that he had to sit on the treasury with a gun in order to keep his friends behind him out of that treasury. The Minister of Railways has done a great service to the country in connection with the Intercolonial. The past two years have been most trying years upon railway management. Our Canadian railway companies have been compelled to present most discouraging showings, and in the United States the great railway corporations have been in the direst distress. In the whole Republic, with an increase mileage of 1,000 miles, the earnings, as compared with the previous year, fell off $30,000,000. One-third of all their railway mileage went into the hands of receivers, roads with a capital of $79,924,000 were sold by the sheriff, while in the receivers hands railway property worth $1,500,000,000 were placed. In the face of these facts the management of the Minister of Railways cannot be too highly complimented. Ask any great railway man in Canada as to the management of that road under him and they will tell you it is splendidly run, and hon. gentlemen in attacking it are but showing their hypocrisy and determination to find fault. What he did last year, Sir, he is doing again this year, viz., bringing it out without loss. How is he doing it? The trade has been less upon it as upon other lines. He is doing it by careful business management, and business management that is fully appreciated in the country. Then, Sir, I want to speak with regard to another matter. Hon. gentlemen opposite claim that they are economists as regards the number of Ministers of the Crown. Why, that is as familiar as the voice of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). It was an old cry in 1873 and 1874. And what did they do when in power? They said that the salaries were too large. Possibly, for they ought to have known their own worth, and were their own judges. The salaries were too big and the number was too great, they said. But what followed? They filled every place, drew every cent of salary, and added one gentleman to the Cabinet without portfolio—in defiance of their professions previous to the elections upon that point. Perhaps I should say, however, that they did introduce a Bill to do away with one of the ministerial places. They introduced a Bill to do away with the Receiver Generalship; but in order that one of the gentlemen who "took office for the public good only" should not be dispensed with altogether, they made for him another office, and called it the Attorney Generalship. When the Bill creating that office went to the Senate and the Senate threw it out, the effect of that rejection was to reduce the Cabinet by one, but, Sir, that did not suit them. So they withdrew the Bill, all of course "for the public good." We hear a great deal from hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to the salaries of the Civil Service. I am not here to defend the Civil Service. I am here to say that we on this side, all agree that when a man is in the Civil Service, he ought to earn every dollar the country pays him, and that is the policy of this Government. But hon. gentlemen opposite should not say anything with regard to the salaries of the Civil Service. History and the record of public documents sometimes tell tales. Here is a Bill I wish to show the House, introduced by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) on the 8th March, 1875, in relation to the Civil Service of this country. And what does that Bill provide? Second-class clerks, under his Bill, would have had from $800 to $1,600 per year. Under the present law, their salaries are $1,100 to $1,400. First-class clerks, under his Bill, $1,600 to $2,000 per year; under our Bill, $1,400 to $1,800. Chief clerks, under his Bill, from $2,000 to $2,800; under our Bill, $1,800 to $2,400. Messengers, under his Bill, $400 to $600; under our Bill, $300 to $500. Temporary clerks, under his Bill, not to exceed $730 per annum; under our Bill, not to exceed $400 per annum. Extra work of civil servants, under his Bill, 50 cents per hour; under our Bill the payment of a single cent of extra money to these gentlemen is strictly forbidden, unless voted by Parliament. Hon. gentlemen opposite may take all the comfort they like out of this record upon Civil Service salaries. Now, then, I shall take up one more question, and I do this partly in defence of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and partly because it is a matter on which the people have a right to know the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite. Somewhere in the western part of Ontario, my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) is said to have declared that the leader of the Opposition had agreed to the Interprovincial Conference resolutions. My hon. friend from East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) brought the matter up and made a great ado about it. He (Mr. Macdonald) made a speech in which he declared that if the Minister of Railways did make such a statement, he should have the manliness to repeat it here, so that the leader of the Opposition might have the opportunity of contradicting those false statements made on public platforms before the electorate of this country. That is very plain. Then he (Mr. Macdonald) went on to moralize upon the evil practice of making statements not correct. Sir, let him take his lesson home to himself. Now, I am here to give an opportunity to the leader of the Opposition of denying that statement of the Minister of Railways. I say here that the hon. leader of the Opposition did agree to the terms of the Interprovincial Conference. I say to the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) that when he charged the Minister of Railways with having made a false statement, it was he himself and not the Minister of Railways who was guilty. I say still further that that agreement of the leader of the Opposition to support the Interprovincial Conference resolutions is in the public records of this country. You will find, in the speech of an hon. gentleman who formerly represented L'Islet (Mr. Desjardins), a conversation across the floor between the leader of the Opposition and Mr. Desjardins. Mr. Desjardins said :

I have the right to ask the leader of the Opposition, if it is true that he pledged himself to Mr. Mercier to increase the subsidies to the provinces and to carry out the resolutions of the Interprovincial Conference, if he got into power.

And the leader of the Opposition thus replied :

I am sorry that the hon. gentleman, who is so versed in political matters, has not done me the honour to read my speeches during the last three or four years. I have spoken on that question in Toronto and Quebec, and have always asserted that I was in favour of the Interprovincial Conference resolutions.

The hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) and the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) have been telling the people of Ontario that the Minister of Railways spoke falsely when he charged the leader of the Opposition with being in favour of those resolutions. I now ask the leader of the Opposition to rise up—like the gentleman that he is—and say that we were not telling falsehoods, but speaking from the public records of the country upon a grave and serious matter, and that the gentlemen behind him did not know the mind of their own leader on that great question. Sir, the leader of the Opposition will not rise, and he dare not deny the record I read. I say that this is a matter of public concern, because here are his lieutenants in Ontario saying that he will not support those resolutions. But against their statement, here is his public declaration in the Parliament of Canada saying that he does support those resolutions. He made a similar declaration in answer to the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). I say now, in the light of Parliament, that he did make such a declaration, and I say still further that that will add $1,700,000 to the public expenditure of this country, and the hon. gentleman knows it just as well as I do, and the men behind him ought to know it too. So much with regard to their economy; now I want to say a word or two as to their purity. Sir, they had not been in power a year when they wrote a letter to the superintendent of one of the canals of this country telling him to purchase supplies, from whom do you think? From a gentleman who sat behind them in this House of Commons, supporting their Administration; and without public competition at that. Has this Government done anything of that kind? If we did do so, would not hon. gentlemen opposite howl? Here is the letter :

Public Works Department,
Ottawa, May 5, 1876.

Sir,—I am directed to authorize you to purchase until further orders from Messrs. Frothingham & Workman such iron as may be required in connection with the canals under your charge.

F. BRAUN,
Secretary.

J. G. Sippell, C.E., Montreal.

And what else did they do? They gave to a member of this House who sat in the Speaker's place, which you adorn, Sir, a contract for public printing, without competition, and at rates 50 per cent higher than the work would have been done for by any other job printing office in the country, and when he lost his seat by reason of that contract, they elected him again to the chair. They appointed to office a man who, in London, had been reported as a corruptionist in the courts of the country. And then when they wanted land to carry on a public undertaking, land which could have been purchased at $75 an acre, they gave private information—see the sworn evidence given before the Senate Committee, a copy of which I have here—they gave information to one of the gentlemen sitting behind them; that man with some associates purchased another part of land just near where this public work was to be erected; the Government of the day, instead of following the usual method of procuring property in such cases, appointed partisan valuers to value the property; and then, in order to help the men who wanted to sell, they appointed as Government agent, to assist them in the purchase, a lawyer, one of the very men who owned the property. And the result was that they paid $500 an acre for land which ought to have been bought at $75 an acre, and they paid for improvements against the purchase of which even these partisan valuers had reported to the Government, they paid thousands of dollars, notwithstanding that they had not even the affidavit of the men who spent the money. In this whole transaction, the evidence of which is upon record in our public documents, the country lost a hundred thousand dollars. It was open and barefaced piece of corruption. Now, Sir, let me refer to another case. My hon. friend from East Huron—and I deal with this now partly in answer to my hon. friend from South Oxford—said: We only increased the debt by reason of the fact that we were compelled to carry out the obligations left by the Tory party when they went out of office. He then referred to the Welland canal contracts. I tell the hon. gentleman, they were not obliged to carry out the obligations of the Tory party unless it was a good work and in the public interests, and I tell him further that if they had carried out the obligations and practices of the Conservative party, they would have saved hundreds of thousands of dollars to the country. What did they do with regard to the Welland Canal contracts? My hon. friend says that no contracts were cancelled. He was technically right, but morally he was very wrong. The Conservative Government called for tenders for work on the Welland Canal in 1873. These tenders came in in October, 1873, but before they were acted upon, hon. gentlemen opposite came into power. And what did they do? They wrote a letter to the engineer asking whether there was not some informality with regard to these tenders. And there was some informality of course! I have the letter here, Sir, if hon. gentlemen dispute what I say. And the consequence was that these tenders were laid aside, and other tenders were called for. And I am here with the evidence afforded by the public records to give my hon. friend the result of that second call for tenders. On section 2 of the Welland Canal the lowest of the first tenders which were called for and received by the Conservative Government, was $321,000. In the second calling for tenders the lowest was $396,000. And the contract was let to the lowest tenderer. In section 3 there was only a difference of $30,000 between the lowest of the first tenders, and the amount at which the contract was let. On section 5 the lowest tender on the first call was $266,000, and on the second call, $312,000; and the contract was let to the fifth lowest tenderer at $352,000. On section 14, the lowest tender on the first call was $292,000, and the work was let for $321,000, notwithstanding that upon the second calling for tenders there was a tender put in for $292,000. On section 12, the lowest tender on the first call was $302,000, and on the second call, $327,000, and the work was let for $551,000. On section 7, first call, lowest tender, $251,000; second call, lowest tender, $283,000; and the work was let by these purity and economy-loving gentlemen at $327,000. On section 13, the lowest of the first tenders was $270,000; the lowest of the second tenders, $313,000; and the work was let for $325,000. It will be seen, Sir, first, that the prices at which the Conservative Government would have got the work done was much the lowest, and second, that the lowest tenders were passed over by these gentlemen. Now, just a word as to the method of argument pursued by my hon. friend from East Huron. Taking a certain number of years, he said that the average of contracts to the lowest tenderer in the time of Sir John Macdonald, was 35 per cent, while in the time of Mr. Mackenzie it was 84 per cent. For his comparison he took the years 1874, 1875, and 1876, of Mr. Mackenzie's time. But he forgot this—that the system had changed, that a deposit was required in Mr. Mackenzie's time, while no deposit was required in Sir John Macdonald's time, the consequence being that all the men who tendered under Mr. Mackenzie had to put up evidence and did put up evidence of their ability to do the work, and there was no excuse for neglecting them. Still further, the hon. gentleman omitted to take the year 1877 into his calculation. Had he done so, he would have found this percentage suffer material damage, because, in 1877, this economy and purity-loving party gave forty-two contracts, all told, of which seventeen were let to the second, third, fourth, or fifth lowest tenderers. I want now to discuss another point that came up in the speech of my hon. friend from East Huron, and afterwards to discuss the general trade policy of the country. In the first place, it seems to me that the effort of hon. gentlemen opposite has been mainly to prove that they have not changed their views upon the trade question. I am not going to discuss the question whether they have changed their policy or not. Surely it is patent enough to the people of this country; surely it has become notorious that they have been skipping about from pillar to post, and have discredited themselves before the people of Canada. The only reason they can possibly have for hoping to convince the people that they have not changed their trade policy is that they share the belief of my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) "that the masses of this country are not remarkable for their intelligence," anyway, which opinion the hon. gentleman expressed in a famous letter to the people of the United States some few years ago. As regards the question of protection or free trade, I want to begin my argument by showing that the hon. member for South Oxford has always been the controlling spirit of hon. gentlemen opposite. The light and airy, beautiful nothings of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition do not count against the vigorous demands of the hon. gentleman from South Oxford; and while the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) may talk gracefully and beautifully, the man who says it shall be thus and so is the man from South Oxford—and I want hon. gentlemen opposite to remember that when I come to discuss this question of the trade policy. Let me begin by saying that when he sat on the treasury benches—at I want his attention, his distinguished attention for a moment—the men behind him were demanding, night and day, the introduction of protection into Canada. My hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson), and my hon. friend who then represented Halifax (Mr. Jones), even the hon. leader of the Opposition himself, in season and out of season, were demanding fair-play for the industries of Canada. I say it to their credit, but I charge it up to their weakness that they failed; and my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island last night complimented the hon. gentleman from South Oxford that he resisted all this pressure, that, notwithstanding the howl and turmoil there was around him for protection, he came out victorious, and stood by his guns, and refused to give it. Now, the fact that he is the leader, the real controller of hon. gentlemen opposite, notwithstanding that they squirm occasionally, is an important fact to be remembered as I come to discuss the position of that party at present upon the trade question. Now, Sir, one or two words as to the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald), who impugned some of my motives, I fancy, and doubted my accuracy when I was speaking in the west upon some of these questions. Sir, I had stated, it appears, that in 1887 the gentlemen opposite adopted protection as their policy. I then stated the truth. I stated the fact that Mr. Blake saw that he was wrong, and publicly went back on his course. I am now here to prove what I stated. Does my hon. friend want me to do so? He says they issued no circular to the manufacturers. Well, my hon. friend cannot expect me to carry around all their campaign literature with me. Surely, my hon. friend does not expect me to have all these circulars and to keep them for a number of years. But I state the fact for my hon. friend's information, that such a circular was issued to the manufacturers, trying to humbug them, telling them that they need not be afraid of the advent of hon. gentlemen opposite to power.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is a pity you have not the circular.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It would be a pity if I did not have it, but I have. Here is the circular, Mr. Speaker. This was the circular sent to every manufacturer in the country, and it was handed to me by a manufacturer in the country. Here is the heading, in great, black type:

Mr. MONTAGUE.

Mr. Blake on the tariff. Manufacturers have nothing to fear.

It further adds that the condition of the country wont allow a reduction of the tariff to any extent, and that stability of tariffs was what Canada wanted, and that was sent to every manufacturer in the country, and I am glad for the advantage of my hon. friend that I have it. And not only that, Mr. Speaker, but I have a speech of my hon. friend, too. Here is a speech my hon. friend delivered in Toronto, in the year 1887, in the same year, and in the same campaign; and here is what my hon. friend who wants to see the circular in Toronto in the campaign of 1887:

Mr. Charlton said that the circumstances were such that the question of the National Policy was now out of court. That the high taxation, as the reports goes on to say, which was then existing, had to be maintained.

Not only that, Sir, but in the session of 1887, it was the first session I was in this Parliament, the then Finance Minister (Sir Charles Tupper), complimented Mr. Blake across the floor after his conversion to a safe policy, and Mr. Blake did not by the lightest sign attempt to signify his disapproval. My object now is to show that at that particular moment, the hon. member for West Durham, the Hon. Mr. Blake, was on top. He did not stay there very long, however, and our hope that men might thereafter invest their capital in the development of Canadian enterprise without having it made the foot-ball of a party in their mad and unceasing struggle for office. But we were disappointed. Sir. The hon. member for South Oxford got in his sledge hammer blows again, and scarcely had the echoes of Mr. Blake's protection speech died away in the country, when the hon. member for South Oxford was controlling again. There was a new hand on the helm of the ship, there was a new voice dominant among the crew of hon. gentlemen opposite, and the Liberal ship was drifting for the purpose of catching a breeze that would take them into office, but always threatening and meaning the destruction of the platform of assistance and encouragement to the industries of Canada. Sir, what is the fact? The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) saw that it was a will-o'-the-wisp that the hon. gentlemen were pursuing, and decided to abandon it. He got control for a moment, but the hon. member for South Oxford very soon supplanted him again. I want hon. gentlemen to remember that, because I want them to remember that the hon. member for South Oxford is still in control. He is the real leader, he says so himself. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) is the tital leader; but I want this House to know what the real leader, and the dominant spirit, and controlling influence of hon. gentlemen opposite, says on this question, and to see how much weight they are to attach to the oily and airy nothings that have been put before this country as an excuse for their trade policy. Now, just one word more. I am dealing now with specific denials made in this debate. The hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), I think, made a specific denial that no gentleman on the other side of the House, or belonging to that party, had ever supported free trade between Canada and the United States. That is what he said, and here are his words :

I mean to say, in answer to the inquiry from me, that no hon. gentleman on that side of the House can point out one line in which the Liberal party have ever advocated the abolition of duties upon articles imported into this country from the United States, through any system of reciprocity.

Great heavens ! Mr. Speaker, has it come to this, that in this Parliament, and within easy reach of the library of Parliament, hon. gentlemen will so far forget themselves as to make such a statement as that ? I do not mean to say that the hon. gentleman did it intentionally. The hon. gentleman did not think that his party had ever adopted any such foolish policy. He never gave them credit for having so little sense. Sir, he had not judged them properly ; I will not read now from the speech of my hon. friend at Boston, which was read last night, which advocated such a policy as absolute free trade, but I will read the resolution that was moved in this House by the hon. member for South Oxford himself in 1889, and I want my hon. friend from Yarmouth to insert this in his speech when he sends it to his constituents, just after his statement that they had never advocated any such policy. Here is the resolution, and every Liberal in the House voted for it, including the leader upon that side :

That it is highly desirable that the largest possible freedom of commercial intercourse shall obtain between the Dominion of Canada and the United States, and that it is expedient that all articles manufactured in, or the natural products of either of said countries should be admitted free into the other.

Now, I want to show the position in which hon. gentlemen are. Either the hon. gentleman was absolutely misrepresenting—but I do not believe that, he is not that kind of a gentleman,—or he was passing judgment by imputation when he says that surely no Liberal ever could have been so silly, could have been so lacking in judgment, as to have supported any such policy as that. Sir, I ask him to look down to the front benches and see the gentleman who moved it, and to look down still further on the front benches to the hon. leader of the Opposition, who, time and time again, in his beautiful words, declared with great sentiment that he was willing to stand by it, to live by it, and to die by it, if necessary. Sir, I ask my hon. friend from Yarmouth not to forget this when he goes to speak to his constituents, but, in the meantime, to make a moral resolve never to trust to the hon. gentleman's opinions on the trade question before he has carefully looked up the record in the library of this Parliament. Then, once more my hon. friend from Yarmouth made another specific denial, and that specific denial was that no gentleman on the other side had ever supported commercial union. I said at the time, "Oh, yes, the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies)," and the hon. member for Queen's said : "Oh, no." The hon. member for Queen's said : "I have denied it time and again in this House." Well, I will tell you what the hon. member for Queen's denied. He denied a speech which he made at the Charlottetown Board of Trade, and the reason he gave for denying that speech was because, he said, it was not correctly reported, that it was reported in an Opposition paper which had done him injustice, and he therefore denied and repudiated it. Did the hon. gentleman ever make any other speeches on commercial union ? The hon. gentleman is silent. The hon. gentleman did make another speech on that subject—and I am not saying now that I do not always accept the hon. gentleman's denial.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No, you do not. You would not allow me to explain a moment ago.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I always accept the hon. gentleman's denial, but I want to give the House the grounds on which he makes the denial, because, surely, that is fair to the hon. gentleman. There is a paper published in Charlottetown called the "Patriot." I think the hon. gentleman is connected with the publishing company, indeed, I believe, he is president. That journal published a speech delivered by the hon. gentleman on 21st August, 1887, on the subject of political union, and here is what he said at Cape Traverse, P.E.I. :

Commercial union would also settle the nasty questions arising respecting our fisheries. The idea that we would be disloyal to the British flag under commercial union was humbug. He wanted to live under the flag as well as any one, but he wanted a flag under which he could live. The keynote should be struck in the banner province. Commercial union means a uniform tariff from the North Pole to the Gulf of Mexico. The reciprocity treaty of 1854 he was prepared to accept, but he was afraid the Americans were unwilling to concede it. As commercial union seemed to be more easily attainable, he was prepared to support it, because he believed it would secure to us wealth, peace and happiness.

This report was not published in an Opposition paper, but in the "Patriot," of Charlottetown, and the hon. gentleman was or is the president of the company. Hon. gentlemen opposite say they have not recently changed their trade policy. I am not disposed to quarrel very much with that statement, indeed, I am prepared to accept it in a very large measure, because I want to be fair to hon. gentlemen opposite. I desire to note the resolution moved at the convention held in Ottawa, in 1893. In that resolution hon. gentlemen called for certain things, for a reduction of taxation, for freer trade, for a return to a tariff that would raise revenue; but I defy hon. gentlemen opposite to show a line in which they declared for tariff for revenue only. True, there is nothing in that resolution which declares tariff for revenue only, but I fancy the resolution ought to be read in the light of the speeches which were made at that convention, because the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) last night claimed that we are divorcing sentence from sentence, and I propose uniting sentence to sentence and sentences to the resolution in order that hon. gentlemen may have a fair presentation of their case. In those speeches at the convention as I shall show the cry was for free trade as it is in England, though the resolution was vague and indefinite, the speeches were definite indeed. I do say this though that the hon. gentlemen opposite while they have not, as I admit, changed their policy very recently, they have changed the name of it, just as they did in 1889 and 1890. They supported commercial union. The member for West Ontario wrote a letter in which he said it was unwise to call it commercial union, so they called it unrestricted reciprocity, on the ground that "a rose by any other name would smell as sweet"; and so instead of calling the policy now free trade as they have it in England, hon. gentlemen call it a tariff for revenue only, which being interpreted means the system they have in England just as sure as we are standing here to-day. In the resolution now proposed hon. gentlemen say:

The existing tariff should be modified so that it be made a tariff for revenue only.

No protection there—every vestige of protection is to be removed; there is to be no incidental protection, because if such had been their intention it would have been stated. We must accept what hon. gentlemen opposite say, and what they say is that they are not in favour of protection in the slightest degree, but favour a tariff for revenue only. What does that mean? Consult any of the works upon political economy. It means, Sir, the system in vogue in England. Some hon. gentlemen opposite have attempted to conceal that fact; they have been saying, we are in favour of a tariff of incidental protection. Did the hon. member for South Oxford ever say that? Has any one ever heard that hon. gentleman say a word about incidental protection? What was the speech to which this resolution was the conclusion? Half of it was the bitterest kind of attack on any kind of protection, and the other half was a defence of the English system of taxation. I want to read the resolution of my hon. friend in the light of the speeches that were made before it, and in the light of speeches made after it, and I will leave this House and the country to draw their conclusion. Here are some of the speeches made before it. The leader of the Opposition said at Newmarket:

Mr. MONTAGUE.

Not a vestige of protection shall be allowed to remain.

At St. Thomas, he said:

Our policy is the antipodes of theirs.

At Winnipeg:

It was a system of bondage and slavery.

Surely hon. gentlemen opposite will not leave a trace of slavery. At St. Thomas the hon. gentleman said:

Protection is a fraud. We want the policy of Britain, the policy which has made England the greatest nation in the world. Free trade as it exists in Britain is the goal which henceforth the Liberal party of Canada will struggle to attain.

Mr. GILLMOR. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. member for Charlotte says "hear, hear." I will just in a moment mention how delighted my hon. friend who is a free trader was when his friends adopted this policy at the convention, and he patted them on the back and said: That is right, boys, I believe in that policy. But that compliment to them is death to the contention they are now making, that they are not for free trade as it is in England. At the Ottawa convention the leader of the Opposition said:

I submit to your judgment that the servile copy of the American system which has been brought amongst us by the leaders of the Conservatives, is, like its prototype, a fraud and a robbery. I call upon you, one and all, to pronounce at once and give your emphatic support to the proposition that we shall never rest until we have wiped away from our system that fraud and robbery under which Canadians suffer.

Again, the hon. gentleman said:

My loyalty does not ooze from the pores of my body.

I never knew that charge to be made against the hon. gentleman. But he said further:

I do want to go for an example to the mother country, and not to the United States, much as I respect and love the people on the other side of the line.

And once more:

I preach to you the gospel of absolute destruction to protection. Not a vestige shall remain.

Once more:

We shall never rest until it is wiped out entirely.

And once more, at Montreal, the hon. gentleman said :

Our object was the destruction of protection ; there can be no compromise. We stand here against protection, a system of protection has been the bane and curse of Canada. The Liberal party believes in free trade on the broad lines that exist in Great Britain.

In the county of Peel, he said :

I propose we shall follow England's example, and open our ports to the products of the world.

Is there any incidental protection there ? Not by any means, but it is free trade, if the hon. gentleman understood what he was talking about. Now, let me say that we have heard in this House during the present debate an hon. gentleman opposite state :

That the leader of the Opposition at any time in his life has not gone back on any great trade policy which he had advocated for Canada, and put before the people.

Well, Sir, he has not changed possibly ; but, Sir, he has renamed his policy of free trade as they have it in England in order that the pill might go down better with the Canadian people. I have another gentleman to read from. I do not need to name that hon. gentleman because the extracts bear his ear-marks and are self-announcful of their author :

These men and their bonused manufacturers are scoundrels great and scoundrels small.

Again :

It is the most villainous system to be found on earth.

Again :

It is thievery, villainy and highway robbery.

And so on. Again :

The condition of the people was like a house on fire. The Liberal party were coming to the rescue.

Surely not to put it half out. Again, from the hon. member (Sir Richard Cartwright) :

The National Policy was worse than war, pestilence and famine.

Surely these things are not to be only partially wiped out. And now we come to my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), as to how he interprets it, and this is what he says :

It is a system accursed of God and man.

What did the hon. gentleman propose ? Did he ever propose "free trade as it was in England" ? My hon. friend (Mr. Davies) looks dubious now, as to whether he should answer or not ; but for his information I will tell him that he did. I will tell him so from a speech which he scattered broadcast in the provinces by the sea ; a speech which is said to be "A great deliverance of the Hon. L. H. Davies at Middleton. A masterly discussion of the Trade Question." Now, I want to read what that hon. gentleman proposed, and I want not to divorce that speech from the resolution which calls for a tariff for revenue only ; but I want to unite them, as they should be united in their life, and as they will be united in death. Here is what he says :

To-day the people of Canada stand face to face with such an issue. And the next contest in this country is to be one between free trade and protection.

Did the hon. member (Mr. Davies) mean just the same kind of fight as they had in England ? My hon. friend is still dubious, but for his information I had better read on :

That great issue—

What great issue, Sir ? The word "that" is an important word there :

—That great issue, (the issue between free trade and protection,) was faced years ago by our fathers at home. Free trade won, and has ever since been the policy of Great Britain.

My hon. friend (Mr. Davies) smiles, but he does not deny his utterance. My hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, is not alone, because the hon. gentleman from Queen's (Mr. Davies) presented the same policy down by the sea, as the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Laurier) presented in the convention, and also throughout the country. And now, Mr. Speaker, as to how other people understood it besides the Conservatives. How did my hon. friend from Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) understand it ? He did not misjudge his leader surely. He said "hear, hear," when I said "free trade" a few moments ago. He was pleased. His speech is found on page 53 of the convention report, a document issued officially by the Liberal party, and here is what the hon. gentleman from Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) said :

Our leaders propose to follow the example of England in trade matters. You cannot find so good an example in all the world.

The hon. member (Mr. Gillmor) said that after he had heard the speeches.

England has fought many of the best battles in the world, but the best battle she ever fought was the battle of free trade. Free trade is good enough for me. Talk about conditions ; conditions do not affect it at all.

And, Mr. Speaker, that announcement of the hon. member (Mr. Gillmor) was met by cheers on the part of the gentlemen who had come together for the purpose of making a policy for hon. gentlemen opposite to put before the country. Reading that resolution of the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and reading those speeches, I ask any man in this House, or any man in this country, what could they possibly be understood to mean but the English system of tariff ; the English system as it was explained by the leader of the Opposition ? But what have we heard since ? The narrow-gauge member from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has declared :

That what the people want is to be severely let alone.

That is the laissez faire system of England ; that is the free trade system of England. He said further :

The Government is trying to fool the farmers when they tell them that protection on pork is any good for them. It is something that no intelligent and well-informed farmer will ever believe.

The member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) advocates the removal of beef duties and he wants free trade in beef. On page 1174 of "Hansard," he says :

The statement is made that farmers are protected. I deny that most emphatically.

The member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) says :

It is audacity to say that the duties placed on agricultural products are of any value.

The member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says :

I deny in toto that the farmer requires protection.

Again, he says :

I contend that the free and untrammelled admission of grains under the tariff of 1878 was in any degree detrimental to the agricultural interests.

Again, he says :

The importation of Indian corn was advantageous for Canada.

And I did not see the member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) cheer when he made that statement. And once more the member for North Norfolk says :

The duty on pork is absolutely useless.

Just here let me say this Government differs most emphatically with these gentlemen upon the question of agricultural protection. We say to the people of the United States : If you will give us your markets we will reciprocate, but we won't yield up ours without something in return. Every man in this House ought to stand by that policy. Look, Sir just at the pork protection upon which the member for North Norfolk said we got no advantage. In 1889, we discovered that American prices were so low that they could pay the small duty we had against them and come in here and undersell our farmers in their own market. We sent up the duty, Sir, and this table shows the results, both as to imports and exports, the exports being increased by reason of the industry being encouraged by the protection of the home market :

LARD, HAM, SHOULDER BACON AND PORK.

Imports—	Lbs.
1889	27,000,000
1891	14,000,000
1892	11,000,000
1893	4,000,000

Mr. MONTAGUE.

Exports—	Lbs.
1889	4,000,000
1891	7,000,000
1892	12,000,000
1893	20,000,000

So much, Sir, as to the hon. gentleman's opinion upon pork. Now, Sir, reading these statements with the statements made previously to the resolution ; reading these statements with the resolution passed, I want to ask the House what these gentlemen could expect us to understand their policy to be ? Certainly the country understood it. Certainly every man in this House who applied a fair judgment to it, understood as the member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) declared :

That their next fight would be upon the question of free trade and protection.

I wish now, Sir, to refer to a matter to which I have briefly alluded several times in my address. Who is to be the maker of the new tariff ? Hon. gentlemen opposite may talk as to a half-way system, but who is to be the maker of the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite ? Well, we have the announcement, and the hon. gentleman from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has given notice, that he is to be the Finance Minister when hon. gentlemen opposite get into power. He has made the statement a long while in advance, and so he is safe. But he is to be the Finance Minister when they come into power, and now I want to read into that resolution what the coming Finance Minister says as to his position on this question. At Ingersoll, he said this :

There are some people of the Liberal party who are there for their flesh-pots and their stock of cotton or some other stock, who did him the justice to believe that he would do what he promised, and that he would not be satisfied with half measures.

Once more, at Montreal, he (Sir Richard Cartwright) said :

There is no Canadian manufacturer who need be afraid to face the competition of the world. Our policy is death to protection.

You see, Sir, there is no mistaking what that means. And once more he says, with regard to the fight in the United States, and the defeat of the Democratic party there :

There are two lessons which I think the Reformers of Canada ought to learn. One is presented for our warning and example in the fate which has befallen the Democratic party in the United States. It shows to all who choose to read the signs of the times, that when a party is placed at the head of a great popular movement, if that party is half-hearted in the prosecution of its aim, it will be deservedly swept out of power by the very people who have sustained and advanced it.

And he says then :

When we get into power, there will be no half measures. We will destroy this policy, root and branch.

Now, Sir, in the light of all these announcements I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, what is this House to understand ? They are to understand one of two things: Either that hon. gentlemen opposite will destroy protection root and branch and go to free trade; or that they are misleading the people of this country. Let them take either horn of the dilemma that they like, because they certainly must except either one position or the other. No half measure; no half way-house; destructive root and branch is to be the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite; and I give notice to the men who have invested their money in the industries of this country, and to the toiling thousands who are supplying their wives and children with bread, that if ever these hon. gentlemen get into power, the hand of the spoiler will be up on them, and that spoiler will be the hon. member for South Oxford, the coming Finance Minister in any Liberal Government that may be formed. And now let me tell hon. gentlemen what is thought of their policy in trade circles. Here is what the "Trade Bulletin," of Montreal, of 15th February, 1895, says in substance, in the course of a long article:

If it were not for the momentous consequences that we fear hang upon the reversal of our present trade policy at this juncture, we would unhesitatingly advocate a change of Government, as too long tenure of office often leads to an abuse of power. The commercial life of a nation is passing through a critical period, and it should be remembered that any radical change in our fiscal system might result in upheavals as disastrous as those which have occurred in Australia and the Argentine Republic, and which have shook the United States to its foundation. The introduction of a policy based on the broad lines of British free trade would be a fatal mistake, and might hurl us into a commercial pitfall from which it would take us years to emerge. It is too well known that if our protective barricade, which insures a home market for our manufactures, were removed, or even lowered to any great extent, the Americans would at once monopolize the home trade.

I have now given the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite; I have given the interpretation of their policy by their own friends; I have given its interpretation by independent trade journals; and I say to them that they are either on the broad lines of free trade, or else they have been humbugging the people of this country—humbugging some classes by a cry of free trade and humbug others by other means—sending circulars around possibly to the manufacturers and others who have invested their capital, telling them that they need not be afraid. But the hon. member for South Oxford will control, and he says there will be no half measures when he gets into power.

An hon. MEMBER. When?

Mr. MONTAGUE. When? Early in the next century, some time, it is said, but certainly not in this. Now, I want to say a word or two about my hon. friend's growing funny at my expense in connection with protection in Great Britain. I am delighted to have caused the hon. member for South Oxford a smile. He has been fishing so long with such a melancholy bait, and with such disastrous bad fortune, that the smile that was said to have been a German silver smile, which he wore in days gone by, has gradually changed into that bluish hue with which artists have always painted that space that lies between abandoned hope and absolute despair. Well, Sir, I am glad to cause even a smile at my own expense, and I do not begrudge him the pleasure. What did I say in the country? I said this, that England, after four or five centuries of protection, took down her barriers and bade defiance to the world. That is what I said, and the hon. gentleman proceeded to prove it. The hon. gentleman read a Tariff Act passed in England some hundreds of years ago; and his only answer to my assertion that the only country which had adopted the policy he had been advocating had done so only after centuries of protection, was to cause this House to smile at the absurd wording of that Tariff Act. Some of the hon. gentleman's newspapers alleged that I had not told the truth when I said that England had been a protective country for centuries; and I am here now to say to my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson), who paid me great attention in connection with this subject in the country, that I did not state one word that was untrue. I said that the woollen industry, the cotton industry, the iron industry, and every other great industry of England had been built up under a system of protection; and I now say, further, that no country has ever grown great that has not grown great by protection. Do hon. gentlemen deny it?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) smiles and denies. Why, Sir, it is the statement of my hon. friend the member for North Norfolk, made in 1878. I am quoting it literally. These gentlemen are like the old ballad, "The Hunting of the Snark." You remember the story. When the butcher and the beaver did not agree very well, the butcher contrived to make a separate sally; but in a short time he found himself alongside the beaver again. Then the ballad continues:

Neither betrayed by a word or a look
The disgust that appeared in his face,
But the valley grew narrow and narrower still,
And the evening grew darker and colder;
Until from sheer nervousness, not from good will,
They marched along, shoulder to shoulder.

Now, the statement has been made, and it has been made constantly in this debate, that England was brought to the verge of ruin by protection.

Mr. GILLMOR. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend says, "hear, hear." I was sure my hon. friend would say that, and he has had evidence of it from the opinions of hon. gentlemen opposite. Here is a work of a free trade historian who was patronized by John Bright, and who wrote his books at the bidding of the Cobden Club. Here is what this author, Augustus Mongredien, says on page 133 of his book :

This adoption of free trade principles was not the result of pressure from adverse circumstances. The country was flourishing, trade was prosperous, the revenue showed a surplus, railways were being constructed with unexampled rapidity, the working classes were fully and remuneratively employed, the imperial average of wheat for the week ending June 28th was 47s. 11d. per quarter, and bread was cheaper than it had been for many years. The prevailing convergence towards free trade principles simply proceeded from a conscientious recognition of economic truths.

My hon. friend smiles. No doubt he has read it. My hon. friend states that he is above the authority of the historians of the Cobden Club; but I prefer to take their opinion, even to that of the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor), or that of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lange-lier).

Mr. GILLMOR. He says it was an immoral practice.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Well, I am not dealing with morals or with immorality. That is not in my department; it belongs to the department of the hon. member for North Norfolk. What I stated was this, that England grew prosperous by protection, and I have proven it out of the mouth of a free-trade Cobden Club historian who, I think, will be accepted by this House. I have quoted him for this reason, that when I made some such statement in the country, the Toronto "Globe," whose representative is here, said that I had misquoted Mongredien; and if the "Globe" reporter wants this copy of the book, he can have it in order that he may retract that misstatement of his paper. I quote it because I wish to say to this House and to the country that neither in this House nor on a public platform have I ever stated what I believed to be untrue, or stated a fact as to which I had not made all the inquiries in my power to substantiate its truth. Now, what has been the history of England on the trade question? Why did she adopt free trade?

Mr. LAURIER. What is the title?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Here it is, I will pass it over—History of the free trade movement in England, by Augustus Mongredien.

Mr. MONTAGUE.

Mr. GIBSON. What about the proclamation to the Indians?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Hon gentlemen opposite are in a bad way. Now, I want to discuss why England adopted free trade and what her previous policy was. Hon gentlemen opposite know that Mr. Cobden made a prophecy. What was the prophecy? It was that in ten years every country under the sun would adopt the same method and the same tariff. That is why England adopted free trade—largely to get the markets of the world. Did she get them? Just let me give the hon. gentleman some examples. The duty levied against Manchester goods by the French in 1860, was 12½ per cent; in 1882, it rose to 16 per cent; and in 1882, it was 42 per cent. The duty in France on Leeds goods in 1860 was 10 per cent; in 1882, 32 per cent; and in 1892, 50½ per cent, in other words, France is a sample of just what the nations of the world are doing, namely, shutting their markets to England. And England, as I shall show from English resolutions and from the English "Hansard," is beginning very severely to feel that effect herself. She had enjoyed protection for 400 years. The hon. member for South Oxford taunted me with having gone back 400 years and he said, that is the spirit which dictates the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. I want to show that the spirit of modern times is the same and a good deal stronger than was the spirit then. Austria adopted protection in 1879; Russia increased her tariff in 1877 and 1881. Germany put up hers higher in 1879; France increased her tariff in 1882 for purely protective purposes; Spain did the same in 1887 and 1888; Greece adopted a high protective tariff in 1889; Switzerland took the same course in the same year. Sweden and Norway also followed suit, and Italy began protection to her agriculture last year—and so on through the whole list of European countries. What I want to show to the hon. gentlemen and the people of this country is that the policy which the Opposition propound is one which every other country has rejected, and I put this question to the people. There are two teachers before them. The one is the teacher of history and experience, cool, calm and unbiassed, that gives its warning. The other teacher is hon. gentlemen opposite who are anxious to get into power—for the public good, they say themselves—for the pleasure and profits of office, we know very well from their history. I ask the people of this country: Are they going to accept the teaching of history and experience? or are they going to accept the teaching of hon. gentlemen opposite, who in five years have adopted five policies, and each time declared that the policy they then adopted was the true and only policy for the redemption and salvation of Canada? Just a word or two with regard to the United States. I remember saying in 1893, in this House, that the United States had not adopted free trade, that they would not very materially reduce their tariff, and that if their Government did so, the Democratic party would be defeated and turned out of power. The hon. leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) shook their heads and smiled an incredulous smile, and said: You do not know anything about it. We are now in the course of the year 1895, and events have proved that I was right.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. MONTAGUE. No, the Democratic party were not defeated in the United States and the tariff reform did not get a death blow in the United States! Surely the hon. gentleman does not assert that?

Mr. LAURIER. Tariff reform and the Democratic party are two things.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend says that tariff reform and the Democratic party are two things. So also, Sir, honest tariff reform and hon. gentlemen opposite are two things. The Democratic party in the United States have pursued just about the same policy of turning and twisting on the trade question as hon. gentlemen opposite have, and the fate of the Democratic party in the United States will be the fate of hon. gentlemen opposite in the coming campaign. What caused the defeat of the Democratic party in the United States? The hon. member for South Oxford declares that they did not go half far enough, and that was the reason they were defeated, and he proposed to go still further in this country. Just a word or two concerning the condition of England; and I do this because of the constant reference which has been made to the glowing condition of England by hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken from time to time. I have here,—and I must here pay the highest compliment to my hon. friend from East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) who discussed this question so thoroughly—a report to show just the condition of agriculture in England at present. The commissioners appointed to inquire into the agricultural depression have obtained reliable data, and in their report of 15th March, 1895, they state as follows:—

The gross value of land in the United Kingdom has fallen in the last thirteen years by £13,400,000 and rents have been reduced from 5 to 75 per cent.

The wheat crop, which averaged £31,000,000 from 1870 to 1875, has fallen in 1894 to £7,600,000.

Every kind of crops in regard to which the English farmers looked for profit, has fallen in price.

And the "Field," an agricultural journal, says:

Last year we imported agricultural products to the value of £142,000,000, £18,000,000 of which could have been raised upon the fields of Great Britain, had foreign competition not been allowed to prevail.

Here is a message sent to Canada by a gentleman from the county of Simcoe, and who has written to the Orillia "Packet." Here is what that gentleman says:

Things are bad in England among the farmers. Everything comes from abroad. Cassells are even now issuing a book printed in Holland. The Bibles from the Oxford press have a little note to show that they were printed in Germany. However well free trade may sound in theory, practically it is a failure, and I sincerely trust that Canada will never adopt it. England gets her eggs from Holland, her butter from Denmark, her cheese from America, and her beef and mutton from Australia. In the meantime the Essex farmers are going through the Bankruptcy Courts at the rate of 300 a year.

Just one word more. An agricultural society in England recently passed a resolution. What was that resolution? It was that the difficulty with English farmers was that no matter how bad the harvest, they never had a good market or increased prices. That contains a lesson for us. We have had a high protective duty on wheat. Hon. gentlemen opposite have said that it never did us any good. The time has come now when the National Policy is doing us good now on wheat.

Mr. CHARLTON. Why?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Because it is 15 cents lower in the United States than it is in Canada, and because we have a high tariff against the United States. Hon. gentlemen opposite say: But there is a corner in wheat. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I have taken pains to find out what this duty means now to the Canadian farmers. I have wired to various sections—

Mr. CHARLTON. There is no wheat in the farmer's hands.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend is always wrong, I am afraid. If he had allowed me to show that circular before he asked for it, he would have saved himself some confusion, and if he had allowed me to read telegrams from men whose opinions he will not dispute, he would have saved himself some confusion and some regret. I have telegrams from every section, the facts concerning which I read. I will pass them over to the hon. gentleman if he wishes, and I think he will accept as conclusive the one I shall read at the end. At Seaforth, my informant tells me, 4,000 bushels of wheat have been marketed at the higher price, and 15,000 bushels are still held by the farmers. In St. Mary's, according to my informant, 5,000 bushels have been marketed at the higher price, and 20,000 bushels are still held. At Dunnville, 5,000 bushels sold, and 40,000 bushels still held. At Brampton, 2,500 sold, and 20,000 bushels are to be found in half the county. At Mitchell, 1,000 bushels sold, and 20,000 bushels held by the farmers. At Lucan, only 500 bushels sold, but 25,000 bushels still held by the farmers. At Hagersville, 5,000 bushels sold, within the last month, and 15,000 still held. At Exeter, 10,000 bushels sold, and some farmers, my informant says, are holding from 300 to 800 bushels, many thousands of bushels being held in the township, and many farmers around this village are holding two and three years' crops. The unfortunate down-trodden farmers whom my hon. friend has been talking about have been able to hold three years' crops of wheat. Now, this is the report from Mr. W. W. Ogilvie, of Montreal, who knows, perhaps, just as much about the wheat question as my hon. friend from North Norfolk. By telegram, dated 27th May, Mr. Ogilvie writes :

Late reports show that from a million and a half to two million bushels wheat are still held by farmers in Ontario. As usual in cases like the present, they are holding for still higher prices. Some districts in Manitoba are delivering freely at present prices.

There is the telegram of Mr. Ogilvie, of Montreal, who knows his business. What does that mean? Let us take his lowest estimate of a million and a half bushels of wheat held by the farmers of Ontario. According to the "Globe" newspaper of 24th May, they are getting from 14 to 15 cents more than they are getting in corresponding towns in the United States. Multiply 1,500,000 by 14 cents, and you have $210,000 given to the farmers of the province of Ontario by the National Policy, on wheat alone. My hon. friend from Charlottetown (Mr. Davies) smiles at that. He does not like it. These are facts he does not like and he never will like; but the farmers like them, and the farmers to-day are thanking their stars that they did not take down the bars and allow American wheat in free as the hon. gentlemen did in 1878, and yet what is the policy of hon. gentlemen? It is this. Let us take off the farmers protection! Let us import foreign grain and foreign meats, and destroy our home market. Sir, we are against that from start to finish unless we can get other markets in return.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

NOVA SCOTIA STEEL COMPANY.

Mr. FRASER moved that the House resolve itself into committee on Bill (No. 56) to amend the Act to incorporate the Nova Scotia Steel Company (Limited).

Mr. DENISON. This Bill is one in which the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) is very much interested, and I think it was understood that it should stand over until after his return. I would ask the hon. gentleman to allow it to stand.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes: I think that was the understanding.

Motion withdrawn.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 28) to incorporate the St. John River Bridge Company.—(Mr. McAlister.)

Bill (No. 38) respecting the Hamilton Distillery Company (Limited).—(Mr. McKay.)

CAMP HARMONY ANGLING CLUB.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 71) to incorporate the Camp Harmony Angling Club.—(Mr. Sutherland.)

On section 6.

(In the Committee.)

On section 6.

Mr. TISDALE. I think this clause should be amended. As passed by the committee, it would enable this club to buy up all the fishing rights and fishing streams in the two provinces of New Brunswick and Quebec. I think there should be some limit to the counties or streams, in order that the clause may not cover both provinces.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I agree with the view of the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), and I think that probably this clause might establish a bad precedent, although I do not think in this case there is any danger of the club exceeding the powers that Parliament means to give them. I think that all the club requires under the Act could be given if the clause were modified as proposed; and to that end, I have prepared the following amendment as a substitute to the first part of the clause:—

6. The club may from time to time acquire and hold, by purchase, lease, license or otherwise, such lands, riparian rights, fishing rights (including lands, riparian rights, leasehold and other interests in fishing rights owned by all or any of the said petitioners) on the Restigouche and Upsalquitch rivers and their tributaries, in the county of Restigouche, in the province of New Brunswick, and in the counties of Bonaventure and Rimouski, in the province of Quebec, as is deemed advisable by the club.

As the committee will see, that clause limits the operations of the club to these three counties, instead of the two provinces, as in the Bill now drawn.

Mr. McALISTER. I do not see any necessity of putting in a clause providing that the Government shall not be responsible for the guardianship or protection of the river.

As it is now, they are not responsible in any way, and the guardians are put on and kept on by the anglers and by the club. While I do not think the clause is objectionable in one respect, yet it may look as a reflection upon the parties asking for incorporation, and as if the Government wished to shirk all responsibility. I do not think that clause should be inserted.

Mr. MULLOCK. I would ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries whether, in the absence of that clause, any responsibility whatever could devolve upon the Crown.

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is to prevent any responsibility being thrown upon the Government. The clause can do no harm, and it may do good.

Mr. MULLOCK. I think it can do harm to the Government in this way, that if in a Bill like this we begin by saying that the Government is not to be responsible, the omission of such a clause in a subsequent Bill may justify the opposite conclusion. It is clear that the Crown is not in the slightest degree responsible for the guardianship of the river at the present moment. The words are so much surplusage, and whoever is interested in the Bill, can have no objections to their being there, because they do not accomplish anything; but I think it is a very unwise precedent to adopt. The absence of such a provision in any subsequent measure may be the foundation for a conclusion establishing responsibility.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I have already occupied so much time that I propose to reduce what I have to say to the briefest possible space. Before you left the Chair, Sir, I was speaking upon the question of the effect of the protective tariff on the price of wheat. Since you left the Chair, I have had placed in my hands further evidence of the truth I then asserted. The prices, I am told, at Gretna, Manitoba, on May 20th, were from 72 cents to 74 cents per bushel, while at Niche, North Dakota, the price was only 60 cents, the one point being only a short distance across the border from the other, this showing that the same effect has been attained in Manitoba as has been secured in the province of Ontario. I am still further able to inform the House that an hon. gentleman sitting opposite to me sold only a few days ago something like 3,500 bushels of wheat at Fort William for $1.00 per bushel, while the price at Duluth was only 81½ cents on the same date. I had, Mr. Speaker, before the House rose for dinner stated what my view was with respect to the adoption by England of a free trade policy. I have shown, I think, to the satisfaction of the House that the effort of Great Britain and the hope of Great Britain was to secure other markets abroad, thinking that other countries would follow her own example. I showed also that Britain was disappointed in that hope, that instead of her securing other markets, those other markets were being closed still more against her as the years went by. I have now to say in reference to what some hon. gentlemen have urged on the other side of the House, that no farmer can be found in Great Britain who is not a protectionist so far as his industry is concerned; and I have still further to say that the policy of free trade was carried in Great Britain, not by the votes of farmers, but by the very strongest support of manufacturers, who contributed large campaign funds to the Cobden Club and carried it in spite of the agricultural population of that country. I have still further to say that every protectionist fight that has been won in the countries of the world has been won largely by the influence of the farmers. And I have not to go abroad, nor have I to bring any evidence that will be disputed by hon. gentlemen opposite, for in 1878 the protective tariff fight was won by the farmers of this country who not only wanted their home market for themselves, but who had the broad and proper idea that the creation of a varied industry extended the home market and gave them a better opportunity to sell their products. I have not to go outside the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite for evidence of what I have said, because in a speech recently delivered by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), he admitted that the defeat of the Liberal party in 1878 was aided by the votes of 30,000 Liberal farmers who left the Liberal ranks to join the Conservatives in putting these gentlemen out of office. And why? Because they had refused to keep the home market for the Canadian farmer. Some of my hon. friends smile at that. Well, I suppose they put no faith whatever in the statement of the hon. gentleman from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), but I am quoting him literally. Now, Sir, not only has England failed in regard to securing the markets of other countries, but England is to-day—and I say it in the light of evidence which I have in my possession—England is to-day in many respects growing very weary of the policy which was adopted then; and not only that, but as I shall prove to this House, to the absolute satisfaction of hon. gentlemen opposite. England in the very highest places is beginning to reverse the policy of free trade which she adopted some years ago. Sir, I thought no truer word was ever spoken than was spoken by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) the other day when he declared to this House that England was the slaughter market for creation. No people have appreciated that fact better than the capitalists, and the artisans, and the agriculturists of that country. English boards of trade, trades unions, consuls abroad, agricultural societies, as I can prove by the evidence of the official debates in the English House of Commons, are now moving in the direction of a defensive tariff, and the English Parliament itself has practically, in one sense, abandoned the free trade policy and adopted in one respect a protective policy. My hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) dissents, but I will prove to my hon. friend that I am absolutely right. I suppose he (Mr. Mills) will not controvert me in this statement: That the ideal policy that England had in view was, that the cheaper she could buy the products for her people, no matter where they came from, the better it was. That was the ideal policy in Great Britain, and I can show the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills), that they have abandoned that policy only very recently in the House of Commons in England. Just a word or so, Mr. Speaker, as to some of the industries of Great Britain. First, as regards the iron industry. Ryland's Iron Circular, which is the official voice of the English trade, on 22nd September, 1894, contained the following:—

For a number of years past very serious apprehensions have been aroused by the circumstances of the iron industry in the United Kingdom, more especially in view of the progress made by competitive countries. In commercial circles it is now quite a common thing to hear our iron industries spoken of as a manufacture that has ceased to make progress and is doomed to gradual decay. An examination of the returns for some years past appears to confirm this view.

It says further:

The summary of the situation is that there reigneth hand-to-mouth buying, keen foreign and home competition. This applies as well to iron as steel. The export trade of bars, sheets and wires has gone to the continent, so much that more than one prominent iron merchant is contemplating the establishment of a foreign office for facilitating the buying of continental iron.

A late annual report of the secretary of the British Iron Trade Association, says:

The iron trade has for several years been having a bad time of it in this country, as various foreign countries are now our active competitors in it. As a sign of the times, and an illustration how continental countries are now competing with us in the one article of iron alone, I may state that the Great Central Railway station at Birmingham, the very centre of the British iron trade, which is one of the largest—if not the largest—in England, had recently been constructed exclusively of Belgian iron.

I commend this sign of the times to gentlemen who say that workmen are rushing to England looking for work. A Belgian firm was doing work in England while thousands of English workmen were standing idle looking at them, and as a result of this, English iron being driven out of English markets, what has come? Sir, blackened blast furnaces, silent mills and idle employees by the thousands. Sir, I have here Ryland's Circular for 1894. In the one of the numbers, 22nd December, 1894, you have an article upon the decline of the iron trade. It is called "In memorium." And it tells a sad and disheartening tale. Let me quote its words:

The summary of our list shows that there are about 406 blast furnaces standing idle, that will never be put into blast again, and 126 finished iron works that will probably never be worked again.

And, Sir, why is this? Let the London "Iron and Coal Trade Review" make answer:

We have pointed out that the threat of successful competition in neutral markets on the part of the United States is not a mere bogie; it has become a stern reality. It was shown at a recent meeting of the Middlesboro' Chamber of Commerce by Sir Edmund Head in unmistakable terms that in Alabama iron is produced and sold at about five shillings per ton less than it costs at Cleveland, the cheapest centre of the pig iron industry in this country.

And here let me give you some figures to show how the manufacture of iron, once monopolized by England, has gone to other lands. The following table shows how England is being met with competition abroad:

TONS OF IRON PRODUCED.
	1856.	1886.	1893.
Great Britain.....	3,586,387	6,870,665	6,977,000
Germany	363,881	3,339,863	4,937,461
United States.....	893,137	5,634,543	9,157,900

England doubles her production since 1856; the United States multiplies hers by 11, and Germany hers by 12, during the same period. The "London Iron and Trades Journal" recently said:

If iron manufacturers and steel producers have been carefully watching the course of the English and foreign markets during the last few months, the figures that have come under their eyes must have caused them not a little astonishment and anxiety as to the future. The enemy is again at our gates in the form of foreign competition, but it is not this time either Germany, or Belgium, or France with whom we have to reckon, but our most protected kinsmen in the United States.

I shall quote here from a recent speech made by Mr. Lowther, M.P., in the House of Commons of England, upon this very subject, as reported in the English "Hansard" of March 15, 1895 :

They were always told that the idea of any country in the world being able to compete with the United Kingdom was absurd. The President of the Board of Trade was aware that at this moment the pig iron manufacture of the Southern States of America, Alabama, was being landed at Glasgow at a price lower than that at which it could be produced at a profit in the great iron-producing centres of the United Kingdom.

Sir, what are the facts shown by the English "Hansard," which I have here. Recently, the Chambers of Commerce, of Sheffield, of Birmingham, of Bolton, of Bristol, of Cardiff, of Newcastle, of Stockton, of North Staffordshire, and other great manufacturing places, have all passed resolutions showing that the depression in this great trade was on account of two facts : first, that the home market was consumed by foreign products, and second, that the foreign markets have not been opened to English productions. Now, Sir, let us see for a moment as to another great industry. Take the sugar industry of England. Will hon. gentlemen opposite say that the sugar industry of England is prosperous ? Is there a gentleman there who will state that ? Let me tell them that Germany has become the greatest competitor of England, not only in her own markets, but in the markets of the world as well. In 1836, Germany began to give bounties, and that year the production was 141 tons of sugar, while in 1893, Germany produced 1,745,137 tons. And what has England been doing ? In 1893 she took no less than $50,000,000 worth of sugar from Germany, while Germany brought not one single pound of sugar from Great Britain. And what has been the result ? Here is the result to be seen in the Liverpool "Courier" of a recent date :

Another well-known Liverpool house has resolved upon the stoppage of their works. Messrs. Jas. Leitch & Co., 10 Dale Street, and with a refinery on Blackstock Street, have determined upon this serious step in consequence of the condition of circumstances which prevent the manufacture of cane being a profitable business. The closing of their refinery means, at any rate, that 200 men, many married and with families to support, will be added to the already too large army of the Liverpool unemployed. This firm has been in existence for about fifty years.

Mr. Gladstone's consolation that more sweets are now manufactured in this country is no salve to the hundreds and thousands who have been deprived of their livelihood in a war of which all the glory falls to the peddling philosopher and political schemer, and all the profits to the bounty-maintained foreigner or the speculator who are to be found preying upon the disasters of commerce.

The closure of the refineries of Messrs. Heap, Jaeger Bros. has now been followed by the stoppage of Messrs. Leitch & Co.'s works. Outside Liverpool the results are worse. Bristol has practically ceased to refine, there are only a few Clyde refineries continuing the struggle, and the London sugar refineries will certainly not boast of being prosperous, the well-known firm of Martineau having stopped their works temporarily.

My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) wants to apply the same policy to Canada, because the sugar industry is one of the industries in which the hon. gentleman has the knife up to the hilt, and when he spoke in Montreal he said : Let the people of Canada buy their sugar abroad like the people of England do, and let the refiners put their sugars into jams and make jams instead of supplying Canada with sugar. Does any one want such a policy here, yet that is the policy which hon. gentlemen propose. Now, Sir, just a word or two as to the general trade of Great Britain. We find that Germany is gaining ten to one on Great Britain in the markets of the world in the supply of manufactured articles. The hon. gentleman will find that statement in the report of the English consul resident last year at Berlin, and here is what Sir Lothian Bell said the other day to his association :

Cottons, woollens, rails, machinery will be produced as heretofore, and in overflowing measure : they may be produced even by Englishmen, or by men of English race, as now ; but they will be produced by them, not in Lancashire, Staffordshire, Lanarkshire or Yorkshire, but on the banks of the Ohio, at the foot of the Alleghany, or it may be in even more distant quarters still.

We find also that England is losing the trade of India, and it is going where ? To protected countries. She has lost her markets in other countries, and her colonies largely as well. Now, Sir, is all this being suffered meekly by the British people without a murmur ? By no means, Sir. If my hon. friends will consult the English "Hansard" of 27th February, 1895, they will find that in the House of Commons the statement was made by one of the most prominent members of that House that already twelve hundred million dollars of British capital has been driven to investment in foreign countries, and what is the reason ? My hon. friend smiles too soon again. The reason, as given in the Parliament of Great Britain, is that it has gone abroad to get beyond the reach of hostile tariffs, because it cannot be invested in England to supply those foreign countries with the products. Now, Sir, is Parliament sleeping ? My hon. friend smiled when I said that the Parliament of England had taken this matter into their own hands. Let me re-state the principle, which I declared was the principle of absolute free trade, namely, that the cheaper the people can buy the manufactured product, the better for the people. Let us see how England regards that. In the English House of Commons, on the 19th February, 1895, a resolution was passed, and passed unanimously, which was in fact a protection resolution. Man after man was challenged to say a word against it, and did not do so. That resolution—and mark its wording—was as follows:—

That, in the opinion of this House, it is incumbent upon Her Majesty's Government, in the interests of the industrial classes of the United Kingdom, to restrict the importation of goods made in foreign prisons by the forced labour of convicts and felons.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friends smile; but what difference does it make where the goods are made, so long as the people get them cheap? My hon. friend says that had nothing to do with the question of free trade or protection. Let me tell him what a great member of the British House of Commons said with regard to that question, and then we shall see at whom he was sneering when he said it did not mean protection. Here is what Mr. Joseph Chamberlain said:

He (the President of the Board of Trade) does not come to the consideration of this question biased in any way by those eternal principles which were laid down the other day by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and which teach us that the lower the price of commodities the better it is for the nation. He has flung aside these proposals as though they were the proposals of belated philosophers.

Speaking thus of the speech of the president of the English Board of Trade, who supported that resolution, on which there was a discussion occupying 44 columns of "Hansard," and not a single man to be found to raise his voice against it. What was the reason of that? The reason was that the brush industry of England has been ruined by the competition of foreign prison-made goods coming from Germany. What matters it whether the goods are made in prison or anywhere else, so far as the principle is concerned? The brushes were good, the prices were low. Then why are they to be shut out of England? Because their importation has ruined the British brush industry and left British brushmakers without labour. If that is not protection. Sir, I do not know what is. England has begun in that resolution the protection of her own industrial classes. Not only that, but let me tell hon. gentlemen that Mr. Chamberlain, speaking recently on the question which hon. gentlemen say is dead in Great Britain, declared:

I am inclined to think that in our staple trades—for instance, in the coal trade, in the iron trade, in the cotton trade, and, above all, in the greatest of all our trades, the trade of agriculture—the margin of profit has entirely disappeared.

Mr. MONTAGUE.

Up to the present time wages have not fallen at all in proportion, but if the present state of things continues it is simply inevitable either that wages will have to be considerably reduced or that works will be closed, land will lie idle, and the numbers of the unemployed will be largely increased. * * * I find that there are a number of people, and I think an increasing number, who under the present conditions of trade are coming to the conclusion that our free trade policy has been a failure, and who would therefore be ready to go back in the direction of protection.

When she opened her markets to the world, she had a monopoly of two things. First, of the world's markets, and second, of skilled labour and the most improved machinery. The time has come when she has lost both monopolies, and not only that but her markets at home largely. Not many years hence, we may look for a reversal to some considerable extent at least, of her policy of trade. That is my conviction, and it is borne out by the signs of the times. Now, Sir, I want to speak for a few moments as to the result of the elections recently held in the United States, and to draw a comparison between that country and Canada in regard to the recent depression. While the depression was wide-spread, there can be no doubt that the depression in the United States was intensified and multiplied a hundred-fold by the uncertainty which existed in regard to the tariff of that country. That is certainly in accordance with hon. gentlemen's knowledge; they know it as well as I know it. The very first scare was that the protective policy would be entirely destroyed. Capital ceased to be invested; the product of the factories began to be shortened; labour was lessened also—people were thrown out of employment and their families out of bread. The second cause of that depression was that there was a largely increased importation in consequence of the tariff reductions which were made. Though they were nothing so radical as the hon. gentleman from South Oxford professes here, these importations lessened the employment of home labour, of course. Let us take an extract from the Dublin "Evening Telegram" of February 2nd, 1894, when the tariff Bill was going through United States Senate. It spoke as follows:—

There is at present going through the United States Senate a measure which ought to be of vast importance to Irish industries, especially to the woollen and linen industry of this country. The time to take the field is not after the new tariff has been in operation for some time, but on the day it comes into operation.

And, suiting the action to the word, in the city of New York on the day the tariff went into operation 1,908,274 pounds of English and Irish woollen cloth and 7,822,829 square yards of dress goods were waiting to be entered at the customs house of New York to compete with the product of the labouring people of the United States themselves, while from September, 1893, to 1st March, 1894, there were imported into the United States, of manufactured woollens, cottons, silks, flax and hemp goods, $44,000,000 worth from Great Britain. Under the changed tariff, from September, 1894, to March, 1895, there was imported $78,000,000 worth, the labour in the making of which was taken away from the American people and given to British people. That was good for the British people, but it was bad for the people of the United States. And, Sir, that would be just the result of the destruction of our tariff here, as hon. gentlemen know very well. They know that the reductions which were made in the United States tariff did not bring it down to the present height of our tariff; they know that the United States tariff is still higher than ours; and yet the hon. member for South Oxford declares that they did not go half far enough and that when he gets into power there will be no half measures. Now, as to the depression which existed in this country between 1874 and 1878, had the importation of foreign goods anything to do with it? I think I shall be able to prove that the importation of foreign goods had something to do with it. What evidence do hon. gentlemen opposite want? Surely nothing better than the hon. gentlemen themselves. I can produce here the speech of my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson), saying that there was disastrous competition from the United States; the speech of the hon. member for North Norfolk, saying that there was competition and that it ought to be done away with; the speech of Mr. Jones, of Halifax, saying that our sugar refiners were being ruined and praying to Heaven and the Finance Minister to do something for those sugar refiners when he refused the clamour, as my hon. friend from Queen's would say, for aid to our industries. I will prove it not only by these gentlemen but by the official circular issued by Mr. Burpee, then Minister of Customs, who advised his collectors all over the country that American goods were being imported, at slaughter prices in our markets, and that they had better look out sharply for the value of goods as they came in. If that is not sufficient, I have the report of the American consul at Toronto, in 1877, who, writing to his home Government, said in effect: We have accomplished it at last; we have killed the industries of Ontario. Your export of goods is growing from year to year, and we have fixed the Canadian industries so that they never shall revive again. Is not this an evidence that the importation of these goods had something to do with regard to the depression which then existed? I want to call the attention of the House to this fact, that the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, as explained at present, is a policy which gets nothing and gives everything. Unrestricted reciprocity had its faults, and they were great and serious; but under unrestricted reciprocity, though we gave everything to the United States we got something, however small it might have been, in return. But to-day if you follow out the policy pronounced upon favourably by hon. gentlemen opposite, we give everything to every country in the world and we get nothing from any country in return. As to the question of depression, have we felt the depression of these last few years to anything like the same extent as we felt the depression from 1874 to 1878? Why one financial paper says that Canada stands as a chimney in a burnt factory compared with other countries of the world, and the London "Financial News," says that Canada seems to be the only country doing well in these times of distress, speaking of the way in which Canada weathered the storm. The "Canadian Journal of Commerce," speaking on the same subject, says:

The manufacturers there (in the United States) have stocks on hand which are unsaleable. They are in great need of ready cash, and if Canada's market were now unprotected, there would be such an influx of American goods as would drown out the industries of this country like one burst from a reservoir. The calamity would bring the manufacturers of Canada into a worse financial and industrial plight than that in which the Americans are. The tariff, with all its faults, is demonstrating at this time more than it has ever done the value and the necessity of guarding our industries from slaughtering operations.

That is the opinion of the commercial world voiced by the mouthpiece of commercial institutions, which treats of commercial matters free from any political bias. Now, I have a word to say as to the temper into which the hon. member for South Oxford worked himself over the free list. Ice was free, he said, and leeches were free. I only stop to ask this House whether it is worthy of any public man pretending to have statesmanlike views, to enter into such pettifogging criticism at a time when his utterances on the policy of his party are being looked to with great interest, and when people look to him instead to propound a policy which would be of some utility to the country. As to the free list, the hon. gentleman said that it contained only three articles which went into general consumption, and that everything else was for the purpose of aiding the manufacturers. Well, I have no hesitation in saying that the policy of the Government is a policy of free raw materials as much as possible, for the manufacturing industries of Canada, because such a policy must result in giving cheaper goods to the consumers and at the same time give employment to Canadians engaged in the manufactures into which these raw materials enter, and by giving employment to them an enlarged home market to the agriculturists. The hon. gentleman has found fault with our tariff as regards raw materials, but what was the policy of the hon. gentleman himself, in 1873, when in power? He found a few things on the free list for the benefit of the manufacturing interests and he put his knife in to them at once. He added nothing to the free list, but the first act of the hon. gentleman was by Chap. 6, Victoria 37, 1874, to put 10 per cent on each of the following articles, which were on the free list, under his predecessor, in order to destroy, if possible, the industries of the country:—

Cotton netting for rubber shoes.
Cotton warp.
Plush for hatters' use.
Felt for hats and boots.
Prunella.
Silk twist for sewing hats and boots.
Machinery for mills and factories, not made in Canada.

Has the hon. gentleman's policy changed? We will now come to the titular leader of the Opposition, who made a speech in Winnipeg a short time ago. He said this:

We shall attempt to get this money which will be lost, if we take off some of the present taxation, and to make up the deficit which will arise, it will be necessary to get an addition from some other sources. This will be attempted to be done in this manner: in the first place, there will be a difference made in the present tax imposed upon raw material which is to be used for manufacturing articles.

Did the hon. gentleman mean that as a tax upon raw material? If I understand the English language that is what he meant, and although the Toronto "Globe" has been apologizing ever since, the hon. gentleman has never yet taken it back, so that his policy remains at that at present. Not only did hon. gentlemen opposite thus tax these small articles, but they put 50 per cent upon raw sugar, 40 per cent on refined, and the result was that every refinery in Canada was closed notwithstanding the protests of Mr. Jones, of Halifax, and other Liberals interested, and we were consuming foreign sugar, while our own people were idle. Another fallacy to which I want to call the attention of the House is the charge by the hon. member for South Oxford that because he had taken off some taxes and declared that by so doing he had received the burdens of the people that therefore the Finance Minister admitted that the National Policy was a tax on the people. Was ever assertion more ridiculous? What kind of taxes has the Finance Minister taken off? In the first place, we admit that a tax on raw material is always a tax which the people have to pay. The Finance Minister, first of all, took the tax off raw sugar; then he took the duty off tea, and then the duty off coffee; then the bill stamps law was done away with as well as the newspaper postage which was a direct tax to almost every family, and if the hon. member for South Oxford will add these various items up he will find that we have taken some ten million dollars off in these very items, not to mention the reductions made last year at all. The assertion, therefore, that because the Finance Minister reduced the taxes and claimed credit for it, he admitted that this tariff policy was a policy of taxation of the people, is an assertion so utterly absurd as scarcely to require refutation. In all their changes of policy, Sir, I am bound to admit there has been one idea common to all the schemes and that idea has been to destroy the industries of the country. If anything were ever wanting to show that the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite is absolutely to destroy the industries of Canada, that want was supplied by the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford as well as the speeches of the hon. gentleman who succeeded him. For, from beginning to end, it was an attack upon the industries of Canada. I have here, Sir, the campaign book of the Liberal party.

An hon. MEMBER. The new one?

Mr. MONTAGUE. A new one, yes. It says that the Liberal party lives upon the decay of principles that are opposed to it; and it says, further, that the Liberal party is a party whose leaves are ever green. Imagine, Mr. Speaker, that sort of description applied to my hon. friend from South Oxford, a gentleman whose leaves of hope are ever green. But the Liberal party not only lives upon the principles that are opposed to it, but if I am not mistaken, the only way in which it wishes to live is by the decay of the industries of the country; for nothing gives the hon. gentlemen greater pleasure than to find a vacant shop or a silent factory. They rejoice over an individual being out of work as if they had even returned to power itself. Now, just to show how anxious hon. gentlemen are that our industries should not prosper, I want to say a few words, which I may address to the leader of the Opposition. The hon. gentleman went down to Montreal and made a speech there, telling the people of Montreal: You have increased in population from 1881 to 1891 by 39 per cent, while from 1871 to 1881 you increased 31 per cent—a miserable 8 per cent improvement under this great National Policy. But the hon. gentleman forgot to include a part of the county of Hochelaga, into which the city of Montreal has grown by her artisans taking up their residence there. Instead of the miserable increase of which the hon. gentleman spoke, he should have given an increase of 102,000 between 1881 and 1891, as against an increase of 62,000 between 1871 and 1881. But, Sir, after the hon. gentleman had spoken in Montreal, and told them there that the National Policy was doing them no good, he went to Winnipeg. He had attacked us in Montreal for not creating industries in Montreal. But what was the policy he pursued in Winnipeg? Speaking to the people of Manitoba, what did he encourage them to do? Did he encourage them to trade with other parts of Canada, to help to build up an interprovincial trade in order that we might be mutually interdependent and mutually prosperous? Did he encourage them to help build up Montreal? No; he told them that there proper places to trade with were St. Paul, Minneapolis and Chicago. The hon. gentleman did not repeat these sentiments at Montreal. But he got compliments upon that speech. Not from Canada—he never gets compliments from the Canadian people; the policy of these hon. gentlemen draws compliments from abroad. The Conservative party are always opposed by outside elements. What we ask for is the support of the Canadian people themselves. Here is a compliment to the hon. gentleman's speech from the Minneapolis "Tribune":

During the thirteen years that we had the Canadian markets, up to 1866, trade with the North-west provinces of Canada was very large and profitable. Our jobbers in all common lines and our manufacturers of flour, lumber, furniture and farm implements all testify to desirable Manitoba trade, which Mr. Laurier's policy would again make possible for them.

Sir, the hon. gentleman is welcome to the congratulations of the Minneapolis press, but the congratulations of the Minneapolis press will never carry him into power in this Canadian country. The hon. gentleman seems always to talk for American applause and I am bound to say that he succeeds in getting it. Now, Sir, just a word or two as to the industries of Canada. We have had specific charges in this House as to our industries, and now I have some specific information. I will not give in detail the figures as to raw materials, as they have often been given in the House. Here are, however, some of them and they indicate the increased employment given to our people:

RAW MATERIALS IMPORTED.

	1871.	1879.	1893.
	Lbs.	Lbs.	Lbs.

	Lbs.	Lbs.	Lbs.
Sugar	21,000,000	22,000,000	343,000,000

But I want to say a word or two as to our cotton and sugar and some other industries generally, and then I shall go on to some specific points. Here is a table which shows what we have been doing.

	Hands.	Wages.	Capital.
Cotton—
1891	8,502	$2,102,603	$13,208,121

1881	3,154	1,295,841	1,630,598

Tin and sheet-iron working were not separated. By comparison they stand thus:

	Wages.	Capital.	Output.
1881	953,736	1,993,054	3,733,246

In 1878, we had 2,200 looms in our cotton mills; in 1895, we have 12,104. We had 111,000 spindles in 1878; to-day we have 491,000. In 1878, these mills employed 1,310 men, women and children; now they employ 8,216. At that time they paid $276,000 in wages; to-day they are paying $2,102,330. And, notwithstanding the contentions of hon. gentlemen opposite, it has been demonstrated in a masterly way by my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) that cotton was being sold here, quality considered, just as cheap as in the markets in England. My hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) still doubts. He would doubt no matter what sort of evidence I brought forward, so I need not pursue the subject in detail. Then, Sir, as to sugar refineries. In 1878, there were four refineries. How many men did they employ and what wages did they pay? Not a single hand did they employ and not a single dollar of wages was paid. In 1891, they employed 1,927 hands and their product was $17,127,000. It is the policy of the Government to maintain these industries rather than bring in the product of foreign labour from the United States, or from any other country, more particularly as, within the walls of that protective tariff, we have produced a competition which has given prices to which no Canadian can object. I take the town from which my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson) comes. I am sorry my hon. friend is not here. He has admitted that the National Policy has made him rich. I think I have seen the question in the "Globe": "Has the National Policy made you rich?" The National Policy has made the hon. gentleman from South Brant rich, and I am glad it has. But the hon. member says that is not the question; has it done anything for you? I tell my hon. friend that he could not grow rich without affording opportunities for labour to hundreds and thousands of people through all these years; and, as he has grown rich he has. I have no doubt, paid his people a fair day's wage for a fair day's work, I am glad to know that the men who work for him have been buying their houses and growing rich as well. Well, Sir, Mr. Paterson's confectionery works, according to the commercial reports, were rated in 1878 at from $6,000 to $10,000. In 1895 it was rated at from $75,000 to $150,000. Then as to other industries there: Buck's stove works, in 1878, were rated at from $50,000 to $75,000; to-day they are rated at from $200,000 to $300,000. Harris, Son & Co., agricultural works, were rated, in 1878, at from $30,000 to $50,000, and to-day their works are assessed at $135,000. The Waterous engine works have risen from $150,000 to $200,000 or $300,000. And only the other day, when the Waterous Company proposed to leave the city of Brantford, the city granted them a large bonus, which is, perhaps, the most expensive protection we can possibly have, and if the hon. member for South Brant were here I would challenge him to deny that he had voted for that bonus, because he was anxious to keep these people in the city of Brantford, for the reason that, as the paper supporting him declared, it was better to keep them there if they could, not only to give strength and prosperity to the city, but to afford a market to the farmers around the city. But my hon. friend from Brant has been making a public utterance as to his own business under the National Policy. He admits that he prospered, but he says it is not due to the National Policy. Speaking last fall he said as follows:—

He would make the comparison with 1893. The National Policy was to keep the Canadian market for the Canadian manufacturers. Well, in 1878, $88,000 worth of candies came into Canada; in 1893, $86,000 worth came in. It kept out $2,000 worth—only $2,000 worth all over the Dominion. In biscuits, Canada imported in 1878, $24,000 worth, and in 1893 we imported $32,000 worth. What chance had Mr. Paterson to be rich with that? In 1878 $97,646 worth of pickles came into the country, and in 1893 it had risen to $109,580 worth. Those figures did not bear out the assertion that the National Policy had made him rich.

In that is a very ingenious statement. But what has become of the greatly increased consumption? It is true that the imports are about the same. Had it not been for the National Policy they would have been much larger and we should have been using the products of foreign labour. The way to measure the fourth of the business in which he is engaged is to look at the evidence of these figures. As to pickle-making and bakers and confectioners:

Pickle-making—

Establishments	3	17
Hands employed.....	25	89
Wages	$ 4,200	$ 20,050
Output	24,000	119,000

Bakeries and confectioneries—

Establishments	1,180	1,836
Hands employed	3,963	7,043
Wages	$1,122,266	$2,283,553
Output	9,476,975	15,433,198

It will thus be seen, Sir, that the market has grown immensely, and that Canadian labour has been supplying it. This fact the member for Brant did not mention. Just a word or two as to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). You remember, Mr. Speaker, that last year when the question of canned tomatoes came up in this House, my hon. friend was extremely solicitous about a cent being taken off canned tomatoes.

Mr. CHARLTON. Peaches.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Peaches, yes; but tomatoes as well. Peaches and tomatoes were the especial object of my hon. friend's solicitude then, just as wrecking privileges were the especial object of his solicitude in other days. Well, Sir, what is the reason that he is so anxious about canned tomatoes and canned peaches? I find that in 1881 there were four canning factories in North and South Norfolk. I do not think there were any before 1878. I find that the capital invested was $13,000; that the number of hands employed was 91; and that the value of the produce was $34,000. I find that in 1891, under this iniquitous policy which my hon. friend denounces from platform to platform, the number had not increased, but that the capital had risen from $13,000 to $144,000, that the number of hands had risen from 91 to 409, and that the value of products had risen from $34,000 to $273,000. These figures are for the county of Norfolk alone. This explains the anxiety of my hon. friend that these canning men should have a special advantage. Well, he was anxious for them, but he was anxious for the farmers of the county of Norfolk who have devoted their fields to raising the articles which are used in these canning factories, and out of which the farmers are making more money than they possibly could in any other line from the same soil. Taking the country over, in animal and vegetable goods, canned and cured, in 1881 the wages paid were $4,432,000; in 1891 the wages were $8,408,992. And how have prices ruled? I sent down to Mr. Kavanagh's grocery, in Sparks Street, Ottawa, to get the prices, and I found out that before the National Policy came in, these canned tomatoes for which my hon. friend has so great a solicitude, were worth $2 per dozen; while last fall they were selling at 98 and 99 cents per dozen. And yet the hon. gentleman says that the duty is always added to the price. Which is best, Sir, that we should consume American canned goods put up by American labour, fed by American farmers, or consume our own vegetables, raised by our own farmers, put up by Canadian men and women who are fed by the Canadian farmer? Well, let me speak of some other points which I, in company with my colleagues, visited. I am only now dealing with small points. There is no point as to the industries of the cities. Hon. gentlemen admit that point. I went to Chatham, and discovered that these National Policy industries were not all existing within the great cities. My hon. friend from Kent (Mr. Campbell) will be able to tell me whether there was a great wagon industry before 1878; or whether there was a great fanning mill industry in Chatham before 1878.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend says, yes; but I have telegrams here from proprietors and other men, and from the mayor of Chatham. The hon. gentleman will admit that Mr. Manson Campbell, mayor of Chatham, is a reputable man; and Mr. Manson Campbell's telegrams states that:

In 1878 there were less than 50 wagons a year built in Chatham. The Chatham Wagon Company was established in 1882; it makes 2,000 wagons this year, and other factories make 600 or 800 in the town of Chatham.

In fanning mills, Mr. Campbell himself made 300 in 1878. In the last three years he made 6,000 mills each year, and the price of these same fanning mills to the farmers have gone down one-fourth. My hon. friend from Kent seems to have blundered. Would he like to see this wagon factory destroyed? His policy will do it. Now, as to the town of Wingham, from which my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Macdonald) comes. We held a meeting at Wingham, and we found new factories there; we found a furniture factory which did not exist previous to 1878.

Mr. MACDONALD. The town of Wingham gave large sums of money for the purpose of helping this industry.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And my hon. friend voted for those sums, my hon. friend voted for those bonuses, my hon. friend voted to place a direct tax on every man in the town of Wingham for the purpose of starting an industry in that town, and yet he supports a policy which will destroy the industries of Canada. I can tell him that industries in the town of Wingham did not amount to much before 1878. I have the telegrams here if he wants to see them. And I will tell him that the chair factory—

Mr. MACDONALD. The population of the town of Wingham increased 1,500 from 1872 to 1878, but from 1881 to 1891 it only increased 247.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have not got the population figures. It may be that they are like the circular letter to the manufacturers which my hon. friend spoke about. But I want to tell him that the chair factory was established in 1888. I want to tell him that a large furniture factory was established in 1887 and that its capacity was largely increased in 1888. I want to tell him that when I went to the town of Wingham they said to me about my hon. friend from East Huron, "He makes long speeches, but we believe with the London "Advertiser," that one smoke-stack is worth a ten-acre field of men that talk, and talk, and talk." I want now to say that we visited the town of Galt, the Manchester of Canada. The lights were in the factory windows at night, the factories were working overtime, and the workmen came to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, and said: "Don't change this policy, but let us earn our living on Canadian soil." The farmers came to us and said: "We have got the very best home market that is to be found on this continent." We went to the town of Peterboro', and we did not find a Liberal who was in favour of the trade policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. When you mentioned it to them they denied it, and they said they were for protection, and they would not allow the hon. gentlemen opposite, if they got into power, to give anything else. We went to Listowel, and we found a piano industry. They said to us, "Keep up the duty on pianos, we want the industry to prosper." We went to the town of Bowmanville, and we found that they had recently, by vote of 444 to 4, paid a big bonus to keep an industry in that town to employ their own people, and to furnish a home market for the farmers. Now, I want to tell the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) who lives in London, and who has grown so jolly of late, that new industries have started in London.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I must accept the statement of my hon. friend, but my hon. friend must accept the proof which I give him of my statement in reply. I want to tell him that previous to 1895 not a pound of iron enamelled ware was made in London. I want to tell the hon. gentleman that the ware that was consumed in Canada was brought from Germany and the United States. I desire to inform him further that the manufacture of that ware was begun this year by the McLary Company, of London, who have invested $150,000 in the business, and who are turning out a weekly product of $1,500, and they wire me that in a few weeks they will be doubling their output and supplying a large part of the market of Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that is not a new industry, that it existed in London before. The hon. gentleman knows it did not, just as well as I know it at the present time.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I can tell the hon. gentleman that Elliott's factory was a very large one in 1878, that it is dead and went into bankruptcy. The Globe Manufacturing Company also went into bankruptcy. The London Manufacturing Company—two of them—also went into bankruptcy.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman has not substantiated his statement. The buildings once occupied by these industries are now occupied by others. The hon. gentleman has gone out of a very small hole. I stated that new industries were being established in London, and the hon. gentleman said, no. I have established my point, and the hon. gentleman has gone around by a circuitous route to answer me. I want to say not only that, but further that we are not only establishing, and, indeed, have established sugar industries, cotton industries, agricultural industries, but we are beginning to establish a great iron industry.

Mr. CHARLTON. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. member for North Norfolk says, "Hear, hear." The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., also smiles.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman seems to think this is purely an Ontario policy. "I tell him there is no reason why New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island should not be manufacturing just as well as Ontario." Does the hon. gentleman deny it?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. member for Hastings showed that the union itself was a calamity.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend from Bothwell grows dubious again. Let me tell him for his comfort that I am quoting the member for Brant in a speech he made in 1876, in this House, in which he said he desired protection for all Canada, not for any particular part of it, and that the eastern provinces should be better off than even Ontario under it. Hon. gentlemen opposite certainly have declared that they will destroy any hope of an iron industry being established in this country. To-day, a great iron industry is about to be established in Kingston. These will cover the construction and operation of a blast furnace, steel plant, blooming mill, and rolling mill. The works are to cost $600,000; daily capacity of furnace will be 250,000 pounds of pig iron; the capacity of steel plant will be 30,000 pound of steel blooms; capacity of blooming mill, 80,000 pounds of steel or iron bars; hands required, 300 to 500. Kingston is to provide $250,000, secured by a first mortgage. Where are the returns expected from at first to recoup Kingston? Largely from the bounties given by this Government, and not only by this Government, but by the Government of Sir Oliver Mowat. While hon. gentlemen opposite are standing here railing against the policy of encouraging Canadian industries, their leader in the province of Ontario has done what? He has passed a statute under which he gives $125,000 a year, or $1 per ton over what the Dominion Government gives for every ton of pig iron produced in Ontario. Not only is this industry being established at Kingston, but at Hamilton, as well as an iron industry is being started. I received a telegram yesterday from prominent Hamilton people.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend doubts again. Hon. gentlemen opposite said that this enterprise was on paper merely. I tell them now that the cost of the smelting plant will be $400,000; that all the foundations are laid; that all stacks and smelting arrangements and casting house are erected; that everything is on the ground except engines, boilers, and connections; that the cost of steel plant will be $200,000 more; that the company will employ 100 hands in the iron department, and 200 or more in the steel department. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite are they going for ever to abandon the idea of establishing an iron industry in Canada? They ought surely to give the House an answer to that question, because they say they will destroy protection to that industry at once. They say that that industry can be established with this market. In reply, I say that the same statements were put forward when the attempt was first made to establish an iron industry in Great Britain, and the same statement was made in regard to the iron industry of the United States. And what is the result? In the United States, by the system of protection and bounties given they are producing iron, which is being sold in the markets of Great Britain cheaper than it can be produced in Great Britain itself. Do hon. gentlemen accept that statement?

Mr. LAURIER. I do not deny it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman had better not deny it. I have here the English "Hansard," because some of the journals supporting the hon. gentleman did deny it. I have a letter, moreover, from the manager of the Alabama Iron Works giving figures with respect to iron production and prices, and I have speeches delivered in the House of Commons in which the attention of the president of the English board of trade is called to the fact that iron from Alabama is being laid down at Liverpool cheaper than it can possibly be produced at Cleveland, which is the centre of the black district of England. Sir, there is no use in multiplying illustrations. It is child's play. Everywhere in all the lines of industry capital is being invested and increasing numbers of our people are being employed. Hon. gentlemen know it and dread it, but the people of Canada appreciate it. One or two words more as to our industries, and then I shall close. Hon. gentlemen opposite have made a very strong attack on our census—they have attacked trifling points in it. They are dealing in small figures and attacking little points which in any census are peculiar. This, Sir, is not the business of statesmen. It is trifling with the House and the country. Where is the real and great increase of our industries shown? It is shown in the industries where the output is over the value of $50,000 per annum. Industries having a yearly output under $2,000 only represent 6·7 per cent of the whole and only increased 55·6 per cent. On the other hand, industries having a yearly output of $50,000 and over, formed 54·8 per cent of the whole, and increased 69·6 per cent during the decade. Not only so, but hon. gentlemen opposite assert that the manufacturers have grown rich and the labourers have grown poor. Take the fifth group of industries, with an output of $50,000 and over, and hon. gentlemen opposite will find that these establishments in 1891 took $155,460,492 of raw material and worked it up into $260,795,190 of finished product, the added value being $105,334,698. Labour received of this, $46,842,640, or 44·5 per cent; while capital received $58,492,056, or 55·5 per cent. In 1881, $96,361,536 of raw materials was worked up into a finished product of $153,767,771, the added value being $57,462,235. Of this, labour received 41·8 per cent, and capital 58·20 per cent. So the artisan is better off individually under the present policy than he was under the policy adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite while the number employed is very largely increasing. I have shown, I think, from start to finish not only by the facts I have adduced, but by the very sneers which I have produced from hon. gentlemen opposite, that no matter what they may name their policy it has had one central and leading idea, namely, that industries should not be established in this country, and that the Liberal party would destroy every item of encouragement for those industries, should the party get into power. That is the policy they have supported, and that is the policy which

hon. members on this side of the House cannot and will not accept. We are proud to say we have encouraged industries; we are proud to believe we have to a very large extent increased the home market; we are proud to know that home competition has produced its legitimate effect, namely, low prices; we are proud to know we have done some thing towards making a better, a greater, a more harmonious and more independent national life, because you cannot have a successful national life without you have the various industrial classes, without you have the warp as well as the woof, the industries and the farmers to supply the wants of the artisans who are engaged in those industries.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Mr. Speaker, I have been very much pleased with the speech which has been delivered by the Secretary of State. I am a little surprised at the tone of that speech, for I do not think it exactly becomes a Cabinet Minister, and it is a little more aggressive than it should be. I like the voice of the hon. gentleman. It is mellow, and so is the matter of his speech. I have heard that address, however, ever since I have heard the hon. gentleman speak. The hon. gentleman spoke in glowing terms of the late Sir John Macdonald, and I was glad to hear him do so. But a gentleman told me the other night that Sir John Macdonald once said about the Secretary of State: "He is good at making long speeches, but he is good at nothing else." The hon. gentleman spoke very kindly of Sir John Macdonald, of Sir John Thompson, and of Sir John Abbott, the Premiers who are gone, but he forgot what was due to his leader, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, and he never even mentioned his name once. Are we to live in memory of the past? Are the men who now lead the destinies of the party to be ignored? The Prime Ministers who are dead are eulogized by the Secretary of State, but he had not one word to say for the Prime Minister who is alive. What we want in Canada to-day is strong and able men to lead the Government. We do not want a Government composed of factions, or a Cabinet, in which its youngest member ignores his leader, owing to factions that exist in that Cabinet. Why did not the Secretary of State tell us of the qualities and of the abilities of Sir Mackenzie Bowell.

An hon. MEMBER. He is not his leader.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am reminded that the leader of the Secretary of State is not the Premier of Canada, but that his leader is the Minister of Railways. Well, the Secretary of State referred to the Minister of Railways often. They remind me of the heavenly twins, and I do not wonder that the hon. gentleman ignored the Premier and praised up the Minister of Railways. I expected a tariff speech from the Secretary of State, but I heard only the same old speech vamped over that I heard him deliver first in the village of Elmwood. That was just seven years ago; just a year after Judge Upper put the Secretary of State in this House. That was a few years also, before he issued a proclamation to the Indians. He told us then of somebody writing a letter to the Superintendent of Canals—there was no Tay Canal at that time—and he told us all these little things that he has gone over to-night. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) read extracts from speeches, and therein his own speech was remarkably good. The extracts he read were from the speeches of gentlemen on this side of the House, and so, of course, they were the best portions of his speech. He spoke considerably about England, Germany and the United States, and of the poor benighted statesmen of those countries who were letting their country go to the dogs, when they might be able to run things on a much better scale if they sent for a gentleman of the ability and experience of the Secretary of State. According to him, Gladstone, and Salisbury, and all the distinguished men of England do not know their business. He could inform them.

Again the hon. gentleman told us of the decay of England, and I think it is about time that the Cabinet Ministers of this Government should give up their fusillades against Great Britain. Sir, she is the mistress of the world. She is the land above all other lands, that has proclaimed liberty of speech, liberty of the press, liberty of the subject, liberty of conscience and the liberty of Parliament. It is from her that we have learned our liberty, and so we on this side of the House value our connection with England and with the Empire. We do not believe in gentlemen opposite who say: If this system of protection is bad for British connection, so much the worse for British connection. That kind of loyalty is not our loyalty. The Minister of Justice, the Secretary of State, the member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup), and several other Conservative members have made a tirade against the institutions of England in this House. I hurl back their accusations at them, and I tell them that England is a good example for this country to follow. When they tell us that England is going to the dogs they know better. They know that England still leads and that she will ever lead as long as British statesmen are true to the principles of liberty and freedom. Look at England as she is to-day. She has nearly as much foreign trade as France and the German Zollverein combined. She has more foreign trade than Belgium, Holland, Russia and the United States all put together. She has as great a foreign trade as Russia, Austria, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Spain, Portugal and the United States put together. Yet in face of this, hon. gentlemen opposite for the sake of gaining a little political popularity as they think, and for the sake of appealing to the baser passions, stand up in a Parliament under the British flag and assail the institutions of the motherland. What a pitiable position for men to take who have sworn to be loyal to the Queen. Sir, Britain's export trade nearly equals that of France and the German Zollverein combined, and it is greater than that of Holland, Russia, Austria, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Spain, Portugal and the United States all put together. Hon. gentlemen opposite may read extracts out of little newspapers, but this is the glorious truth about England. They may read extracts out of little papers, which are just as unreliable as the men who read them, but that does not alter the fact. Britain's tonnage exceeds that of Russia, Norway, Denmark, Sweden, Germany and Holland all put together by 8,000,000 tons. She has six millions more tonnage than France, Italy and the United States combined, and her tonnage is nearly half of the entire tonnage of all Europe and North America put together. Is it not wonderful, Sir, that these gentlemen who pretend to be loyal will get up in this House and decry Britain when she has such a wonderful showing as that?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I was much pleased at all events with one statement made by the Secretary of State. He said that he never told a lie on a public platform. Well, he qualified it and he added the words "public platform." Surely the hon. gentleman must have taken Holy Orders. Did he make that statement to contrast himself with his conferees? Did he mean to say that he was better than any of the other Cabinet Ministers, and did he mean that they would occasionally stretch a point on the platform, although he never did. Perhaps, Sir, there is some hope for the country when a Minister of the Crown, without any provocation, finds it necessary to say that he never told a lie on a public platform. When he was decrying Britain, when he looks for hope and security to the United States, and when he looks to Germany and other foreign countries, what does he call that? Well, Sir, if the Premier was here I might make a recommendation to him, and I know he would do anything I tell him, almost. I would recommend him to send the Secretary of State to teach the poor benighted political heathens in England and other places. Judging of the estimate the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) has of his own capacity, he is the one who should undertake that mission and it might be a wise and prudent thing to send him. We had four Conservative Governments in Canada within four years. Well, Sir, we regret the causes of the changes. We have some new men in the Government it is true, but I almost believe that they are worse than the old ones, and in that connection I am reminded of a little story about a difficulty that arose in a church. They had had four ministers in the church, and the last one tendered his resignation. A lady in the congregation went to the minister and asked him to withdraw his resignation. Well, he said, I don't think I can, but when I am gone you will get a better man. "Oh, no," said she, "unless we change our faith, we cannot get better, for I find that in the four ministers we have had in this church the last one was always worse than the one we had before." It does appear to me, Sir, that the Conservative Governments are getting worse as they are getting older. I do not think it would be any offence to say that the leaders of this Government are not equal to the leaders who have gone before, although I suppose in their own minds they feel that although they have less experience, they are safer to guide this country than any others. But the Secretary of State let them down very nicely. He said the Conservatives never thought of the kind of men they had—it was principle they were after. I quite agree with him that they do not look into the calibre of the men they put into the Government. The Secretary of State seemed to be very happy because a certain gentleman opposed the nomination of the hon. member for South Oxford in his constituency; he extracted a great deal of comfort out of that fact; he seemed to delight in it. I wonder if he knew that he was stabbing the leader of the House just then. The leader of the House was elected for King's, N.B., but he found the climate of that county not very salubrious, so he left it for his health, and crossed the Fredericton bridge into the county of York. I think the Secretary of State might have spared his leader, and not have drawn me out to reply in this manner. I remember that Conservative leaders in times past had to change their constituencies—Sir John Macdonald himself—and I will try to console the leader of the House with this reflection—left Kingston on one occasion and took another constituency. I suppose the Secretary of State was thoughtless, as young men occasionally are, and I hope the leader of the House will not take it very badly, because he represented a constituency for a few years until the people found him out, and then he had to change. Perhaps after the people find us all out, we shall all have to change. But the leader of the House ought to warn the Secretary of State not to speak of these things, because they might cause discord in the Cabinet; for I believe they have had some discord in the Cabinet. The Minister of Justice resigned, and for a little time became Attorney General for the human race. Then he came back very much improved; but his health broke down entirely after his return from Antigonish. It is wonderful what a bad effect that election had on the health of the Minister of Justice, and the other members of the Government. Now the hon. Secretary of State spoke of a circular that was issued to the manufacturers. There was no name to that circular: but I will read to you a circular which was not of a nodescription character, but which was issued by the Secretary of State himself; and it will show you that he ought not to talk about circulars. Here is his own:

To the Indians.—The Queen has always loved her dear, loyal subjects, the Indians. She wants them to be good men and women, and she wants them to live on the land that they have, and she expects in a little while, if her great chief, John A. gets into Government again, to be very kind to the Indians, and to make them very happy. She wants them to go and vote, and to all vote for Doctor Montague, who is the Queen's agent. He is their friend, and by voting for him every one of the Indians will please Queen Victoria.

It does not appear to me that the hon. gentleman is the agent of the Queen tonight. He has been railing about the Queen and her institutions and her public men. He read an extract from a speech of Mr. Chamberlain: and I will read that speech to you just to show how much he read of it. Why, the Secretary of State never told a lie on a public platform, and I want to corroborate his statement. But he does not want to confine himself; no doubt he leaves himself free in the House. Here is the quotation he made from Mr. Chamberlain's speech:

I find that there are a number of people who, under the present condition of trade, are coming to the conclusion that our free trade policy has been a failure, and who would, therefore, be ready to go back in the direction of protection. This opinion is not to be treated lightly. It ought to be carefully considered.

Now, that is a very important thing for a statement to read to the House. Why did not the hon. gentleman finish Mr. Chamberlain's speech? Mr. Chamberlain goes on to say:

I will only lay before you two reasons why I differ from those who desire to abandon it. My first reason is this: In times past in this country, when England was under protection, and in foreign countries to-day which are also under protection, notably in the United States and in France, trade is even worse than it is here. My second reason is a little more complicated, but I think I can make it clear to you. We cannot maintain by ourselves, by our own efforts alone, the vast population that is crowded within the limits of our territory. We depend upon our foreign trade. But if by any means, by protection or any other, you shut the door upon foreign goods, you may be quite certain that the result will be that there will be fewer English goods that will go abroad.

Bear in mind that depression in trade is not a new thing in this country. We have had depression in trade very great and extending over very long periods, at different times in our history. Why, the other day I was reading a most interesting work entitled "A Social History of England," and I happened to come across a description of the state of things in the reign of Henry the VIII.; and the complaints made at that time of the state of trade and the social conditions which were brought about by the depression of trade, might be made at the present moment by any one of us.

That is about the time of the halcyon period of which the Secretary of State spoke—some 400 years ago. In speaking of the Fredericton bridge, I might recall the statement the Finance Minister made that once the matter was brought to the notice of the leader of the House by a gentleman of weight and character and standing, he would give him an answer. Well, the leader of the House took a somewhat strange ground at that time. It was the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) who put the question, and to whom the reply was made. He is one of the hard-working members of this House. He works incessantly and endeavours, as far as possible, to see that the public money is properly expended. I wonder why the leader of the House should have taken such ground on this question. I was reminded, by his answer, of what I once read, and which applies to this case: McMullen and Foster—what should there be in that Foster? Why should his name be sounded more than McMullen? Write them together and McMullen is as fair a name. Sound them, it becomes the mouth as well. Weigh them, it is as heavy. Conjure with them, and McMullen will start a spirit as soon as Foster. In the name of all the gods at once, upon what meat does this, our Foster, feed that he has grown so great? When the question was asked with reference to the money thrown away on the Fredericton bridge, why should the leader of the House have taken such high ground. It appears that there was one who lived some years ago who understood the situation better than did the Finance Minister.

That hon. gentleman says that we have had different platforms. Well, ever since I have been in this House, the Liberals have had the same platform. Suppose that everything the hon. gentleman said about our platform were true, which I deny, I would a hundred thousand times rather have it than protection. You could not mention scarcely a single thing that has been advocated in this country which I would not prefer to protection. Protection is unjust in its design, and unjust in its carrying out. It takes the money that one man earns and gives it to another. It is without scientific basis. When they tell us that protection should exist everywhere in order that we should build up industries, they do not defend it on any scientific basis. The hon. Secretary of State spoke of it as a universal need which every country must apply to itself. Every country, say our friends opposite, must have protection in order to prosper. Before the union of the British Empire, England had a tariff against Ireland and against Scotland, and Ireland had a tariff against England, and Scotland had a tariff against England. When they were united, these hostile tariffs ceased to exist. I would like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite if it was good for these kingdoms, before the union, to have these hostile tariffs against each other, why would it not be good for them to continue these tariffs. If the principle was good before the union, why should it not be good afterwards? Before the union in the United States, every state had the power to impose a tariff against every other state. After the union this power was taken away. If it was good before the union that each state should have a hostile tariff against the others and exclude the goods of the others, why should not the same principle hold good after the union? What is the reason that the different states do not now need protection against each other? When Alsace and Lorraine were French provinces they had free trade with France and a tariff against Germany. After they became German, they had a tariff against France and free trade with Germany. If it was good for them to have free trade with France before, why is it not good for them to have it still? These things show you conclusively that there is no scientific basis to protection, that it was instituted for the benefit of those who invented it, and that it was devised to raise money for the benefit of the few. The idea that nations should live at enmity with one another is contrary to all law and against the best interests of all people. If you are going to apply this principle, you must apply it to every division of the country. Take, for instance, the Dominion. If it was good for Nova Scotia to have a tariff against the rest of Canada before the union, is it not equally good for her to have that tariff now? If it was good for New Brunswick to have a tariff against the other provinces before the union, would it not be equally advantageous for her to continue that tariff? If each province required protection against the others before the union, why should it not have the same protection now? You can devise no system of protection for the Dominion that will suit all her people, any more than the same shoe will fit everybody in this country. Our productions vary so much that it is impossible to apply any system of protection which will satisfy all the requirements of all the people. The Secretary of State told us to-night that protection does not raise prices—that it encourages manufactures, but does not raise prices. If it does not raise prices how does it encourage the manufacturer? Does he mean to tell us that it encourages them without giving them anything.

When hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that their policy of encouraging an industry does not mean that the consumers of the products of that industry pay higher prices they are talking unadulterated nonsense. I do not see how you can encourage people unless you give them something with which to encourage them: and to say that you encourage them without giving them anything is simply to state an absurdity. I wonder that a gentleman who talks so well as the Secretary of State would talk in a way that he knows is at variance with common sense. The hon. Secretary of State would lead us to believe that trade is aggressive—that foreign trade is forced on us whether we like it or not. That is not the meaning of foreign trade. For every seller there must be a buyer and you cannot buy anything unless you find some one who has that thing to sell. You neither buy nor sell unless it is to your advantage to do so. People do not manufacture goods in order to slaughter them. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about the slaughtering of goods in 1878. They talk about the slaughtering of furniture, but there is more furniture brought in now than there was in 1878. And they pay the duty on it. And yet you say you are shutting out the goods and protecting the people. You are preventing your own people doing what they want to do. You are not protecting the people against foreigners; you are protecting the people against themselves. There is where the case is misunderstood, and there is one of the falacies of protection. A protective tariff is not raised against foreigners but against the people themselves. If importers bring in goods from abroad, why do they do it? Because these goods are demanded here and they bring them in even though there is a tariff. You cannot entirely prevent trade by means of a tariff and it would not be advisable if you could. What is the use of a railway system, what is the use of making large grants with a view to building up that system, if, on the other hand you try to destroy trade? What is the use of shipping if you try to destroy the exchange of goods? Civilized nations do not use their armies to close ports in time of peace, but only in time of war. And why do they do it? To prevent goods being brought in. And what nations do in time of war, is precisely what governments do in the time of peace, by their system of protection. Now, England opened the ports of China and the United States those of Japan. But this would not make any difference if the people did not want to trade. It did not compel them to trade, but it allowed them to trade if they wished to do so. It is as natural for people to trade as it is for the blood to circulate, and anything which is a serious barrier or a serious detriment to trade should not be allowed in this country. You cannot protect everybody in the country by any system of protection. Men of different nations trade with one another—for the same reason that men of the same nation trade with one another—because it is to their advantage. Goods will not be imported into any country unless they can be obtained more easily by exchange than by producing them directly; and hence, to restrict importations must lessen productive power and reduce the fund from which all revenues are drawn.

Now, I was a little surprised at the Secretary of State on another point. He rather sneered at the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) because he had introduced moral legislation in this House. The Secretary of State thought that was a very grave offence. I believe there are a great many people in this country who think quite otherwise, and I think it ill became a member of the Cabinet, who should be an upholder of public morality to sneer at any one who endeavours by legislation to promote public morality, no matter whether he may agree with the legislation that is introduced or not. Now, the hon. gentleman read from a certain pamphlet, and I will have to ask the indulgence of the House for a short time while I finish the quotation which he began from Mongrelien's history of the "free trade movement." I think the hon. gentleman left off before he finished the clause. I will finish it and he can add it to his own quotation at his convenience:

The prevailing convergence towards free trade principles simply proceeded from a conscientious recognition of economic truths. It was felt that the continuance of the existing prosperity could not be ensured unless our commercial policy were conducted in conformity with scientific principles.

I will read you a short extract on the effects of free trade upon the prosperity of England:

The way to proceed will be briefly to compare the state of the country in the year 1840 with its state in 1878. We select 1840 because it was one of the most prosperous years under the old protective policy. On the other hand, 1878 was a year of commercial depression, so that the comparison rests on the most favourable data for the old policy. If this change from that to a free trade policy had been inimical to the interests of the nation, the evil would manifest itself in the shape of diminished trade, diminished wealth, diminished prosperity and arrested progress. But if, instead of such a result, the trade, wealth, prosperity and progress of the United Kingdom should, under the new system of commercial freedom, have enormously increased—increased in a ratio far beyond that of any former period, and of any other country it must then be conceded that the provisions of the enlightened statesmen who effected the change, have been justified by the event.

Let us collect a few data for forming our judgment.

Population.—In 1840 the population of the United Kingdom was 26,487,000; in 1878 it was estimated at 33,799,000. Increase, 7,312,000. In the former year London contained 1,700,000 inhabitants; in the latter, 3,800,000. Increase, 2,100,000. So that the growth of London during the last thirty-eight years largely exceeded the total growth it had attained during the previous thousand years. In 1878 the emigration of British subjects to America, Australia, and all other places, comprised 112,902 persons. The number who embarked at our ports for those places was much greater, but it consisted largely of emigrants from Germany and other continental states, who took their way through this country for the convenience of passage. On the other hand, the number of immigrants in 1878 was 77,951, many of them being returned emigrants; so that, on the balance, the yearly exodus from the United Kingdom is much smaller than is generally imagined.

Trade.—In 1840 the foreign trade of the United Kingdom (combined exports and imports) amounted to £172,133,000, equivalent to £6 9s. 11½d. per head of the population. In 1878 it amounted to £614,255,000, or £18 3s. 6d. per head, a marvellous rate of increase! In the United States the proportion of foreign trade to the population is £4 13s. per head. In France it was in 1876 £8 3s. per head. In Russia it was in 1876 £1 9s. per head.

Hon. gentlemen would do well to read this book. I would particularly recommend the Secretary of State to read it all through, and I would also recommend him, when he reads an extract, to read it all and not allow his followers to fall into the error of believing that Great Britain, the motherland, is falling into decay. I was particularly struck with one point in the speech of the gallant knight who represents the city of Ottawa (Sir James Grant). I was much pleased with his speech as I always am pleased with his speech. He indicated that the National Policy was decaying and that now it was only fit to be used as a fertilizer. I thought the hon. gentleman had applied it to the best use that it had ever been applied to in its history. I could read page after page from this book from which I have quoted to show still further the marvellous growth and prosperity of England under its present fiscal system. Now, I cannot devote all my attention to the hon. Secretary of State. At any rate, so far as the tariff is concerned, he had very little to say about it. But a gentleman spoke last night who did speak of it and I wish to reply to some of the things he said. Hon. gentlemen opposite claim some credit for the change in the tariff last session, and claim that they are entitled to be called tariff reformers. Now, I prepared a table, and my table differs entirely from that produced last night by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). I cannot understand upon what basis he arranged his table, because I find that out of 75 changes that the Finance Minister proposed in his Budget speech, 63 of them were afterwards changed one way or the other. Out of those that were changed from ad valorem to specific, 31 were changed back again. I will read the list, so that the Controller of Customs, if he has the time, and the Minister of Finance, may look into it. I will show them where they can find the items, and I will give them the number of each, and I will show them how changes were made subsequent to the final passage of the tariff Bill:

So that 63 were changed back from the Budget list, and 31 were changed back from ad valorem to specific and ad valorem. These facts show that although the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) might have endeavoured to tell what was strictly correct, the list which I have read, I am quite satisfied, is correct. Out of 75 changes proposed in the first place, 63 were changed back again, a few were lowered, but nearly all were increased. Well, Sir, the Secretary of State, while he was decrying England, and running down her industries, speaking of the poverty of her citizens, speaking of the distress that prevailed there, was still obliged to send to old England, as a mark of compassion, I suppose, and bring out a private secretary. He did not give the situation to any of his friends from Hagersville, or Jarvis, or Caledonia, or Cayuga, but he went to old England, I suppose out of compassion to those poor people, who were starving by the scores and hundreds in the motherland. I just notice this in order to say that it is another thing that will perhaps excuse him to some extent in the motherland for the attempt he has been making to decry the glory of Britain :

The land that, girt by friend or foe,
A man may speak the things he will,
The land of civil government,
The land of old and brave renown,
Where freedom broadens slowly down,
From precedent to precedent.

I hope hon. gentlemen will think of that when they are going on with these tirades against the motherland. Talk about substantial aid! He has been stabbing every Minister. I believe he expects to get to the head, and he is going to kill them off. I would recommend the Controller of Customs to look out, because when he talks of substantial aid, what about stabbing in the back? I think the young man has been very discursive to-night. He has been harder on his friends than on his opponents, because every shot that he gave to his opponents, he brought it back like a boomerang upon every member of the Government. He told us about wheat. He says they saved $200,000 by their protection to wheat. Gracious goodness! Why did they let the farmers sell their wheat last fall for 40c. per bushel? If wheat goes down they are not to blame for it, but if wheat goes up, they claim all the credit. It is a very peculiar policy. I have seen great changes in the Tory policy. I remember when the Mackenzie Government was in power, and when the distinguished gentleman from South Oxford was Minister of Finance, a gentleman that thoroughly understands the finances of this country, and who is well versed in the finances of other countries, not crammed with figures, but knowing from practical experience whereof he speaks. I remember when he had that low tariff. They said it was a mark of incapacity, that no Finance Minister was fit to hold the position who would have a deficit. Time passed on, and hon. gentlemen opposite had a deficit in one year larger than all the deficits during the five years which the hon. member for South Oxford administered our financial affairs. Then it was deemed by hon. gentlemen opposite an evidence of statesmanship to have a deficit.

Truly they are departing from the old landmarks of the Conservative party. Formerly it was a cardinal doctrine that whatever was right; but it now appears to be that, when they are in, whatever is right, that when they are out whatever is wrong. That is about the manner in which they change their policy, that is about the way they apply it. Hon. gentlemen opposite are constantly speaking of the prosperity of the country and the great advantages which the people enjoy. The Secretary of State travelled around the country telling the people about the wonders he saw and how people in different places looked out of their windows to see him.

The hon. gentleman spoke of being at Listowel. In 1881 it had a population of 2,688 ; in 1891, ten years afterwards, there were of people to look out of the windows less by 200 or 300 than previously, the population being then only 2,597. In Bowmanville, where we were informed the people were delighted to see the hon. gentleman and his party, the population in 1881 was 3,550, and in 1891 it was 3,377. I think we should pass an edict and not allow the Secretary of State and his company to visit these places any more, for it appears their visits have been as bad as a pestilence and their demonstrations have driven more people out of these towns and cities than any pestilence which passed through them. But they are loyal ; and no doubt they will remain loyal so long as the salaries hold out. Put a Tory out of office and he will be a rebel the next day if he cannot get in again ; those hon. gentlemen talk much about honesty and truthfulness, but I recommend the members of the House and the people of the country to watch them. The Secretary of State has called upon me to do something which I would rather avoid. He read an extract from a newspaper in the village of Aylmer in regard to the distinguished member for South Oxford, and what that paper thought of him. I have here what a newspaper has said about the Secretary of State, and I think when he has introduced a system like that, he cannot blame me if I give him a little taste of his own medicine. I do not like to do it, but I will do it because I think it is my duty to do so, for he has brought it on himself. I will read from "Saturday Night," a Conservative paper published in Toronto, what it says about the Secretary of State. It is a Conservative paper, not published in the province of Quebec, and its editor was the Conservative candidate in Haldimand at one time, with the concurrence and consent of the hon. gentleman opposite. Now, I want to read what a paper, whose editor knows the hon. gentleman, says, in order to show the estimation in which that paper holds him. It is a pretty long piece, but it is worth reading :

The Manitoba school question continues to be the burning spot on the much hardened flesh of the electorate of Canada. There is no startlingly new phase of it excepting the election of Dr. Montague in Haldimand. His election is certainly a well-deserved tribute to his popularity, not to his principles, for he has none. His personality is exceedingly attractive to an audience composed of those who would rather listen than reason, and the belief that he is more than an average man lasts with those who never inquire, after listening, as to what they have brought away with them. Notoriously he is oratorical without being educational, eloquent mostly in the devising of statements that are misleading, courageous mostly when he has a majority of supporters, and up to date has shown his bravery of character almost entirely in doing wrong rather than in advocating right.

He is an evidence that it is easier for electors to follow men than principles. The elector of

Mr. LANDERKIN.

Haldimand is not perhaps aware that he has made his fight on other people's money. There is no man in the Ottawa Ministry who has been a more subservient political hack than Dr. Montague. Everywhere he has been the paid spouter, the tap through which the wind of the Ottawa Ministry has been squirted, and if any of his enthusiastic friends ever pause to examine the situation, they will notice that all his oratorical periods are paid for by some one who puts up his money in order to gain an advantage that the people of Canada, intelligently considering the question, would not grant. It is neither politic nor prudent, perhaps, to reflect upon this class of politician. He is omnipresent, because he has a pass or his railway fare is paid ; his powers of convincing the public are not hindered by thoughts of a neglected business or an ungrasped opportunity, yet he is the most dangerous quantity that could be injected into the already tainted blood of Canadian politics. If men of this sort are to be our rulers, we have a right to ask ourselves, how must we expect to be ruled ? Is mouth to be chosen in preference to principles ? Are audacity and indomitable cheek to be preferred to political virtue ? Is facility in changing one's attitude to be applauded, as we would laugh at and approve of the antics of the clown in a circus ? It has been Dr. Montague's good fortune to escape by his suave manner and exceeding good-fellowship the criticism of people who neither believe in him as a statesman nor approve of him as anything but a county heeler. It is quite possible that he may reach the highest niche in Canadian politics, for he has certainly proved himself able and willing to adopt any device necessary to hoodwink, mislead or betray those who prize the capacity of the mouth rather than loyalty and goodness of heart. That a man can be elected who is such a political hanger-on, while the issue was one of supreme importance to Canada, marks an epoch in our history which thoughtful men should pause and consider.

I think when the hon. gentleman reads that, he will ponder well before he again reads extracts from the scrap book he possesses. I think that people who live in glass houses should not throw stones, and the hon. gentleman invited me to read from his own newspapers. I sometimes read Conservative papers. I read the "Mail" the other day, which has been printing figures to show that there was some prosperity, and it recommended the people to go to the races to see that prosperity. I thought it was a very peculiar place to have to go in order to see prosperity, but the "Mail" made the discovery. I suppose this is one of the languishing industries that the National Policy has built up. I believe, however, that people raced horses even before the Secretary of State entered the Government and before the Conservatives were in power, but the "Mail" had not been able to see evidence of prosperity it saw that prosperity at the races. In regard to the tariff, there was no substantial relief given at the last revision made. The tariff is as oppressive now as it was then. The tariff makers have endeavoured to frame the tariff so that it will assist in perpetuating classes in this country. The protective tariff in England was the greatest obstacle to her progress : one tariff war cost $3 millions and another 33 millions, and it has cost more treasure and involved more loss to the people of Great Britain than almost any other cause in its history. It will be necessary to look at the tariff makers. We cannot get a tariff framed that will be in the best interests of the people of this country, unless we have men in power who believe that freedom is better than restriction. The Liberal party have as sound a platform on their fiscal policy as it is possible for any party to have. I shall read just one clause of the platform of the Liberal party, in order that the Government may have an opportunity of knowing our policy. It is this :

We, the Liberal party of Canada, in convention assembled, declare :

1.—FREER TRADE—REDUCED TAXATION.

That the customs tariff of the Dominion should be based, not as it is now, upon the protective principle, but upon the requirements of the public service ;

That the existing tariff, founded upon an unsound principle, and used, as it has been by the Government, as a corrupting agency wherewith to keep themselves in office, has developed monopolies, trusts and combinations ;

It has decreased the value of farm and other landed property ;

It has oppressed the masses to the enrichment of a few ;

It has checked immigration ;

It has caused great loss of population ;

It has impeded commerce ;

It has discriminated against Great Britain.

In these and in many other ways it has occasioned great public and private injury, all of which evils must continue to grow in intensity as long as the present tariff system remain in force.

That the highest interests of Canada demand a removal of this obstacle to our country's progress, by the adoption of a sound fiscal policy, which, while not doing injustice to any class, will promote domestic and foreign trade, and hasten the return of prosperity to our people ;

That to that end, the tariff should be reduced to the needs of honest, economical and efficient government ;

That it should be so adjusted as to make free, or to bear as lightly as possible upon, the necessities of life, and should be so arranged as to promote freer trade with the whole world, more particularly with Great Britain and the United States.

We believe that the results of the protective system have grievously disappointed thousands of persons who honestly supported it, and that the country, in the light of experience, is now prepared to declare for a sound fiscal policy.

The issue between the two political parties on this question is now clearly defined.

The Government themselves admit the failure of their fiscal policy, and now profess their willingness to make some changes ; but they say that such changes must be based only on the principle of protection.

We denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound, and unjust to the masses of the people, and we declare our conviction that any tariff changes based on that principle must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burdens under which the country labours.

This issue we unhesitatingly accept, and upon it we await with the fullest confidence the verdict of the electors of Canada.

Does that not explain our platform ? Is not that clear to the comprehension of any person who understands the language in which it is printed. Does it not state exactly what we want to arrive at ? We want to have a tariff arranged that will yield only revenue, and we do not want a tariff like the present one which gives one man an advantage over his fellow man. The Liberal party are contending for the policy I have read, and we know that we are right in our contention, and we know that the principle of protection is unjust and unfair. We will battle against it until we get a tariff purely for revenue only. That is the watchword of the Liberal party. Now, with reference to this Government, I think the hon. member from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) spoke about the shibboleths and shams that existed in it. Well, if it had not been for those shibboleths a good many of the hon. gentlemen opposite would not be on the treasury benches to-day.

I remember that our present Premier has been a gentleman of shibboleths ever since he entered the House. His shibboleth was the Protestant shibboleth. When I came to Parliament in 1872 the Government of Sir John Macdonald was in power, and I could not ascertain from anything the present Premier did or said, whether he was a Protestant or not. He was as dumb as an oyster about it then, but as soon as the Government was changed, he mounted the Protestant horse, and he rode that as lively as he could until the Mackenzie Government went out. He has put the horse away now. The other day, when he became Premier, he adopted another shibboleth, and became attached to another Order which was known as the Remedial Order, and there he left it. The leader of the House was also a gentleman of shibboleths. He was a prohibitionist when he came here, and I remember he lectured on temperance one evening in Parliament, and after the lecture his desk was covered with flowers. But I have never seen his desk covered with flowers since. He was then taken into the Government, and he suddenly discovered that prohibition did not prohibit, and so he laid his shibboleth on a royal commission. That royal commission of his has spent $120,000 trying to find out if whisky does intoxicate, and I do not think they have arrived at a conclusion as to whether or not prohibition does prohibit. They have published seven volumes, which taking the number printed, weigh about a ton more or less, and I do not believe there is a man, woman or child in Canada that will ever read a word of them.

Mr. CASEY. The proof-reader.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I do not know whether he read it or not, but at all events it will probably cost the country $150,000 to defer a question which the Minister of Finance wanted to avoid. Why, that royal commission has cost the country all the profits that the farmers have made. Now, the leader of the House has another shibboleth. He stood well behind the manufacturers. He held their brief, and they say he did just as they wanted him. Let him listen to what the Manufacturers' Association said about him at their last meeting :

It is gratifying to know that under the newly organized Government the interests of Canadian manufacturers will receive the very best consideration. * * * It was under these circumstances that the tariff committee entered upon their labours, having the counsel and assistance of many of the most experienced members of the association, the result of which was the embodiment of their views in a communication to the Finance Minister (a copy of which is here before you), which elicited from him a kindly letter, in which he alluded to it as a well prepared brief in which all the matters therein discussed had been done full justice. Perhaps it might be going too far to even surmise the effect these recommendations of your tariff committee to the Minister may have had in the final arrangement of the tariff ; but it is but an act of justice to the committee to direct attention to the large number of changes that were made in the tariff along the lines suggested in the recommendations, and that in many instances the language used in both are substantially identical. This is particularly noticeable as regards the iron schedule, the duties upon textiles, the duties upon drugs, chemicals, alcoholic preparations, &c., as well as upon an extended list of miscellaneous articles, and large and most important additions to the list of non-dutiable articles. It is also to be noticed that in many instances where the recommendations suggested that no changes be made in the duties upon articles therein enumerated, no changes were made.

A matter upon which your committee laid strong stress was that relating to drawbacks of duties on exports. It was shown that if Canadian manufacturers were to become exporters of their products, in competition with American manufacturers, the tariff conditions of Canada as affecting the importation of raw materials for manufacture into products for export, must as nearly as possible approach the tariff conditions of the United States. In frequent interviews with the Finance Minister your secretary urged that this policy be embodied in that of the Government, and this was finally done by an Order in Council, as a necessary supplement to the efforts of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to extend the export trade of the country. It is unfortunate, however, that the operation of this Order in Council has not proved as acceptable to some of our manufacturers as was hoped for and intended by the Government. In fact, in some industries it is working much harm, while in others it is calculated to nullify, and does nullify the benefit bestowed by the Government in the recently enacted tariff. It has always been the policy of the Conservative Government to encourage the manufacture of iron in Canada, and in addition to the inducements offered in previous legislation, the new tariff makes considerable and important extensions of such encouragement. It is contended by many manufacturers engaged in producing different forms of iron goods, that the Order in Council encourages the sending abroad for certain lines of such products which were previously made in this country. This is a matter that demands the immediate attention of the Government.

The association has just reason for congratulating itself upon the influence it possess in assisting to mould public opinion in the matter of affording tariff protection to our manufacturing industries, and in shaping the laws of the country in conformity thereto.

You see he had a brief from the manufacturers, and they say he filled the bill very well. It is said that there was a little conflict at the time of the formation of the Government ; but he had a shibboleth. He was not supposed to be such a giant as some other members of the Cabinet, and he was not likely to take upon himself the first position in the House. The old war horse of Cumberland had a son here, who was supposed to be a giant. The leader of the House is a reader of history and of fables, and he remembers well how Galapas was slain by Arthur. Galapas was a giant and Arthur was small ; but Arthur got the better of Galapas by cutting off Galapas's legs, and when he got him down on his stumps, he smote off his head. It appears that the shibboleth of the Minister of Finance had somewhat the same effect on the political destinies of the Minister of Justice ; and when he got him on his stumps, he despatched him with his shibboleths and his interviews with the manufacturers, who apparently had not much confidence in the Minister of Justice, and they agreed to the arrangement. I am very glad to see that the broil is settled, and that hon. gentlemen are united in harmony again, because if there ever was a time when this country required a united Government, it is now. I hope they will give up all broils and unite harmoniously and strive to conduct the affairs of this country in an honest and economical manner. I do not expect they will ; I am sure they will not. Why, Sir, a Government with a record like theirs cannot be expected to give us anything better. They did not dissolve Parliament. I do not know whether it was remorse for the past or fear for the future that prevented them ; probably it was both. But they did not dissolve. They made an attempt to dissolve. They travelled through the country, and the people went out to see them ; but I do not remember any places breaking down with the great numbers who went to see them. I believe they had brass bands, but the combines paid for them. The people were not very spontaneous ; I fancy that is the reason we have had a session, and have had the opportunity of listening to speeches from the hon. gentlemen. Now, I would like to call attention to a little of their past record. The Government have thrown away

On Tupper's "Dear Onderdonk".....	$ 1,118,000
On the Tay Canal, familiarly known as "Haggart's Ditch".....	476,000
On the Carquet Railway.....	240,000

Wasted, stolen or hoodled on the St. Charles branch of the Intercolonial Railway	1,500,000

These items, not adding up standing claim on the Langevin Block, amount to over $7,000,000. Then there was the Liquor Commission, $125,000, for the purpose of shirking and putting to one side the prohibition question. But I will stop here. I am getting tired, and I think the country is getting tired of these scandals, and I will not read any more of them. The hon. Secretary of State said something about sugar. He spoke of the sugar of Germany being sent into England. The Germans pay a bounty to the sugar refiners, which enables them to sell sugar abroad at a very low rate. When Lord Salisbury was Premier of England, the English importers brought from Germany into England some cheap sugar, and the refiners went to Lord Salisbury and told him that this was going to ruin their industry, and asked him to put a duty on sugar. They said to him, "The Germans can sell sugar cheaper than we can make it." Lord Salisbury asked: "Who is going to be hurt by that? If the people get cheaper sugar, they will have more money to spend on other things." And he would not put a duty on sugar. What did the English sugar manufacturers do? They manufactured goods into which sugar entered, and they shipped those goods to Germany and made more money by doing that than they would have made under any policy of protection. The Conservative Premier of England had sufficient backbone to stand up against any combine. When the Colonial Conference sat in this city, and one of the delegates suggested that sugar might be admitted free into Canada, the Minister of Finance appeared to be greatly shocked, he thought it would be a terrible thing if our people were to get cheap sugar. Now, when the times have been hard and the prices low, what have our Government done? They have tried to delude the people with the idea that they were developing trade with other countries. They subsidized a line of steamers to the West Indies, they have paid the subsidy for a number of years; and yet I believe, in spite of all this the trade is diminishing. They subsidized a line of steamers to Australia to the tune of $125,000 a year, for what purpose? To bring to Canada Australian products to enter in to competition with the products of the farmers of this country. The Australians can supply frozen mutton at 2 cents a pound to an unlimited extent; and the Government are taking the farmers' own money and using it for the purpose of promoting competition with their own productions. Now, I do not believe in that. I believe in freedom, but I do not believe in using the money of the people to bring in goods in competition with their own productions. I remember that when the Premier went to Australia with the view of establishing trade relations, the first inquiry the Australians made was about the condition of our tariff. They told him that it was impossible, with our tariff to get up a trade with this country. That is the obstacle hon. gentlemen meet wherever they go. Let them vote as many subsidies as they like, until they take down the tariff, and make it a reasonable tariff, they cannot possibly increase our trade with foreign countries.

If we had a lower tariff people could live more easily and employers could afford to pay higher wages. The protective tariff has lowered wages in the United States. As soon as the Wilson Bill came into force, the Carnegie works started up, and they have raised the wages of their employees 10 per cent. The lower tariff gives the people a chance, and that is the very thing that will help Canada. You may tinker at the tariff and reform it as much as you please; but as long as you maintain the protective principle, you prevent the welfare and prosperity of Canada. There is no use of the Secretary of State saying that he is in favour of Britain, while he supports a policy such as this. Our policy is a revenue tariff policy. We believe we shall live to see the same policy in Canada that they have in England, and when that is the case a prosperity will be assured to Canada such as no other land enjoys. We will have a future such as our great resources entitle us to expect. The only way to achieve that is by extending our commerce and not by striving to bribe people with us. Let us make it their interests to trade with us, and then that trade will develop. I will not take up any more of your time. I am anxious to see the policy of this Government changed. Look at the policy of England. Formerly it was protective. By whom was it changed? It was changed by Sir Robert Peel. If the present Government would follow his example and change their policy, they would do something that would endear them to Canada, that would contribute to the growth of Canada, and give our railways employment. What is the use of impeding the traffic of our railways and causing their revenues to fall off, from year to year, when they should be increasing. Give the railways a chance, give every industry a chance, and then hon. gentlemen opposite will be worthy of their high position. What are the names that adorn the commercial pages of English history to-day? They are Sir Robert Peel, Richard Cobden, and John Bright. Those names stand forth as the greatest in the commercial history of England and deservedly so, and England to-day is, in consequence of the policy these men advocated, greater than any nation in the world. People may carp, her colonies may growl, the Ministers in the Dominion Government may decry her resources and speak of her condition as one of decline and decay, but she is to-day the proud mistress of the world. She has more trade and commerce than any two countries in the world together; and so long as British intelligence and British spirit and British fair-play and justice continue, so long will Great Britain hold her present pre-eminence.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) The House need not fear lest, at such a late hour, I should intend to make a speech. No, Mr. Speaker, I have only a few observations to make and they will not be lengthy. The hon. member who has just sat down deemed it his duty to cause the House to laugh, and he succeeded in this. In fact, the Opposition were in need of being cheered up, for it was plain that anything but a feeling of liveliness was stamped on their features, after the hard, and so well directed, blows dealt them by the hon. the Secretary of State (Mr. Montague.) The hon. Minister had spread terror amongst them, and they were in need of being brightened up. They could not find a better man for such a task than the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin). I will just say a few words in reply to the speech we have just heard, and I will next refer to the tariff question. The hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) made a quotation which was found very humorous with respect to the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Montague.) He stated that if the quotation should be offensive to the hon. Minister, it was no fault of his. The hon. gentleman could have dispensed with it, for if we were willing to follow him in that line, we could quote the newspaper "Le Canadien," and I rather think the hon. leader of the Opposition would not find such quotations very humorous. So it is just as well to leave such things alone. The hon. gentleman stated he was quoting from a Conservative paper. Should this be the case, what would it amount to? There is no intelligent man in this country who does not believe that the hon. Secretary of State is popular.

Mr. LANDERKIN.

There is no important paper having anything like a circulation in Ontario that would dare to write such things after the election which has just taken place in the county of Haldimand. Any kind of national and religious prejudices were stirred up during that contest, and yet the hon. Minister was returned by a majority such as he never received in that county. All they could find was a little paper with no importance whatever, edited in a remote part of Ontario, a paper such as we call in our province a cabbage leaf, to abuse the hon. Secretary of State, and think it was very witty when it was only silly. The hon. member for South Grey thought he was playing a good trick by reading that extract to the House. The hon. gentleman also said: I am anxious to see the Government change their policy. He was wrong there. He is rather "anxious to see the Government unwilling to change their policy," for, in his opinion, should the Government decline to change their policy, he hopes his party will come into power at the next election. The gentlemen opposite are in hopes that the Conservative policy will be put aside at the next election and that they will cross to this side of the House. The hon. gentleman did not speak out his mind. Now, a few words in reference to the general discussion. For three weeks we have been discussing this protective tariff question, and although I have been following the debate very closely, I have not been able yet to make up what the fiscal policy of the Liberal party is; in other words, I could not understand what they mean by a tariff for revenue. After waiting weeks and weeks for explanations, likely to satisfy me and satisfy the country and this House, we had at last the good fortune to hear the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), who told us what a tariff for revenue was. He explained it in eloquent words. However, he was less clear-sighted than the other members of his party who have spoken so far, for he made statements to which they would not commit themselves. There is no common sense man who does not understand that a tariff for revenue is nothing else than a free-trade tariff, or free trade, pure and simple, that is to say, it means the doing away with customs and any custom barriers between our country and foreign countries. But all this is said and done for one single purpose, that of luring the voters. The Liberal party talk about the adoption of a tariff for revenue, and they keep that plank on their platform not only in order to win popular favours, but also to cause the people to believe that should this party come into power, we would have reciprocity with the United States. There is no one in the whole Dominion who is not in favour of more extended trade relations with the United States, providing fair, reasonable and honourable terms might be arranged for both countries. But, say the Liberals: We will let the Americans in with their goods and perhaps they will then grant us some concessions. But before allowing the Americans to come and sell their goods here, I would like to know whether the United States would grant us commercial advantages equal to those we would give her. During these last years, our Ministers went on several occasions to Washington for the purpose of negotiating with the American Government a reciprocity treaty on a fair basis. The Americans would never agree to it. These attempts were made by Conservative as well as Liberal Ministers, and they all came back without obtaining anything. I think the people in the United States would not give their consent to the repeal of their tariff in order to enlarge their trade with Canada or merely to please the Liberal party. Was the greatest President the United States ever had, one of the most distinguished men who ever occupied the position of President in the neighbouring Republic, Mr. Cleveland, the leader of the Democratic party, when he laid down his policy—oh! not a free-trade policy, but only a slight decrease in the duties on some goods—was he followed by his party? Although the President's platform was only partially agreed to, what has happened? In the election that followed, were not the Democratic party crushed to the ground wherever they had to come before the people? And we may say without any fear of being mistaken, that at the next general election, the Republican party will sweep the country from one end to the other, as never it did before. And they would have us believe that the Republican party, protectionist as it is, will remove the customs barriers and allow the gentlemen opposite, if we would let them into power, to make a reciprocity treaty to the whole advantage of Canada! When we had duties amounting to 17½ per cent, what amount of duty did the United States levy on goods imported from Canada? No less than 35 per cent, and even 100 per cent in some cases; we could not sell them the least quantity of almost all the goods they were selling us. Now, since nearly three years, that is to say since the beginning of the commercial depression, without the protective tariff made and kept up by the Conservatives, in spite of the Liberals, in what condition would our business stand to-day? Who will deny that all our cities, even our humblest villages in Canada, would have been overloaded with American goods of all kinds, grains, animals, carriages, agricultural implements of all kinds, offered for sale at low prices, in order to secure our money and take it away across the line, leaving us with our manufactures shut down, our industries ruined, our trade bankrupt, our banks if not bankrupt, at least doing no business whatever, our farmers unable to sell their goods, blue ruin in our towns as well as in our country-places, as was the case under the Mackenzie Administration? Who will deny this? Yes, Mr. Speaker, if Canada, without being too much affected, was able to get over the financial depression which caused such ruin in the country to the south of us, it was solely due to the wisdom, prudence and foresight of our Conservative statesmen. Even now, with a protective tariff, do not the American goods come to our markets? Have we not in Montreal big stores of carriages and furniture of American make? They pay the duties and sell at low prices their surplus goods, so as to compete with our own goods. Why is that, Mr. Speaker? Because there prevails in the United States a commercial and industrial depression, because the banks there are bankrupt and the manufacturers close their doors. They must sell their goods at any price, in order to have money and lay hold on our market. You can buy at half price goods which cost $1 in the United States, and which our manufacturers can sell at 90 cents, because the Americans are in this position that they have to sell in any case. They are in the position of the debtor who, seeing himself greatly embarrassed, sells his stock at any price and tries to make some money. When he has succeeded, he pockets the money and says to his creditors: Do what you like with the rest, I keep what I have. Now, they say, and it is the strongest argument of the Liberals on the hustings: It is you, the people, who pay all these taxes and if you had no protective tariff, you would pay no taxes. The tariff is the cause of all this, and the Conservative party are leading you to ruin. The hon. member for Richelieu stated here, some days ago, that there had been last winter in Quebec and Montreal, meetings of labourers dying with hunger. And he added: Yet, they have the protective tariff which was to give them bread. Well, such a state of affairs is easily understood, and I am going to explain it at once. In the first place, a meeting was advertised in Montreal, and the party who advertised it has just been called a defaulter by the Liberals of the Montreal city council, for all the dirty little business of the Liberal party was done by him for a few dollars.

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) To whom do you refer?

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) I will give you his name in a little while; but if you want to know his name, just ask it of the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoliel) who thus qualified him, the other evening, at the city council. So they gave him a few dollars; he called a meeting at the corner of Ontario and Amherst streets; two persons went there, he himself and another. A fortnight later, after he had made much ado about the first meeting, saying it was too cold and people were too poor to get conveniently dressed to attend it, another meeting was called; it was attended by about fifteen persons. Fifteen persons he had picked up, from one hotel to another, bringing them with him. They did not consider themselves beaten, for the Liberals said: This is the time, we will soon have a general election, let us stir up the people. So a third meeting was held and the watchword having been given, this particular individual, who is not a labourer but merely a collector, having gone from house to house, he succeeded in bringing in a large number of people; they loudly cried that there was no work. But Providence, which always favours honest people, lent its aid to the Conservatives. Two days later, a big snow-storm, which lasted forty-eight hours, fell upon the city. The corporation made a call for all men of good will who were looking for work. How many came forward? About five hundred, the others being already at work were not willing to come and claim any other work. And yet it was said that the whole population of Montreal was without work or bread. Some time afterwards, it was advertised in the papers that the corporation was engaging some more people. How many came forward? About thirty-two. It is true there has been less work in Montreal this year, but the population was not without bread. Who, however, does not remember that five or six years ago, the Hon. Mr. McShane came to the City Hall escorted by about two hundred persons provided with shovels and picks and asking for work? We were then again on the eve of a local election, it was a good time to go rabbling. I stated a moment ago that the Liberals were saying to the people from every hustling: Do not trust the Conservatives, they deceive you; it is you who are paying the taxes, and the tariff they impose is enriching the manufacturers. But why should not the Liberals mention the goods on which farmers are paying taxes? I have often considered that question, and I have come to the conclusion that they are only paying such taxes as they are willing to pay. I will say why. What amount of taxes does the farmer pay on wheat, flour, cheese, butter, eggs, tea, coffee, in fact on anything which he uses on his table? None whatever. He does not pay a cent by way of taxes on the timber he uses in the building of his house or his vehicles, nor on his wood fuel. What amount of taxes does he pay on the leather with which he makes his boots and shoes and harness? Not a cent again. On what then does he pay taxes? The Liberals say he is paying some, it must be true, for they never lie. He does not pay any on wool or cloths such as are manufactured in the county of l'Assomption. On the clothes he wears from head to foot, he does not pay any duty to the Government; he can live twenty years without paying any duty to the state. The tariff now in force is therefore judicious and well conceived. It has made the fortune of Canada since the overthrow of the Liberals. Now, I will say when the farmer pays taxes: it is when he wants to drink whisky. It is proper that he should pay some then. The hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Bain)—perhaps he does not drink, perhaps he does belong to a society of teetotallers—has reproached the Government the other evening with having imposed an additional duty of from ten to twenty cents on whisky. Well, I believe the less whisky will the farmer, the workingman and ourselves drink, the better it will be for us all. The farmer who drinks whisky ruins his health, shortens his life and sometimes disgraces himself. If he wishes to wear fine clothes and a nice beaver-hat, let him pay taxes. But he is at liberty not to pay any. I will be told perhaps that he is paying duty on his sugar: it is true, but it only amounts to a dollar and a quarter a year, and he is satisfied with paying it, for he may now buy, for two cents and a half or three cents a pound, the common unrefined sugar that was selling at ten cents under the Liberal regime. And he may now buy for four cents a pound a superior grade of sugar which was then selling at twelve cents a pound. The farmer is satisfied with his condition. He well knows that if he should lose confidence in the Government and turn back to the Liberals, he would witness the recurrence of the hard times that occurred between 1874 and 1878. The manufactures would shut down and with a tariff for revenue, he would have to pay taxes to the extent of nine million dollars over what he now pays. Thirty-six millions are required to manage the public affairs. The Liberals acknowledge it. It is admitted by "Le Temps," their Ottawa mouth-piece. Here is what that paper said on the 20th May instant:

In our opinion, should Mr. Laurier come into power to-morrow, he should continue to these industries a reasonable protection against outside competition.

It is true the annual expenditure makes it an obligation for the Liberals to renounce for the present their free trade policy.

Further on, this paper adds the following significant words:—

Besides our pledged word, which would be violated, any sudden change in the fiscal policy would cause a commercial disturbance, the effects of which would surely be disastrous.

The legitimate industry has, therefore, nothing to fear from the coming of the Liberals into power, since in this respect they are one with the present Government.

The newspaper "Le Temps" continues in that strain, but I will read no more of it now.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) Read, read.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) You have got time to read the whole editorial. I will send you the file of the paper and you may read as much of it as you like. Now, they say they wish to establish a tariff for revenue, because it is the only chance we have to ever obtain more advantageous trade relations with the United States, and what are they telling us in connection with this? Just think of a people of five million souls trading with a people of seventy millions, what a god-send, what a good fortune it should be for us! It would be very nice, indeed, if the Americans should allow our goods to come in free, but would they do it? We would be willing that they would not be. And even were we to throw our doors wide open, they would grant us no advantage in return; on the contrary, they would seek to sell us at higher prices, after ruining our own industry. But let us consider this further and see if we could buy at cheaper rates if we had more extended trade relations with the United States. I have here the market prices obtaining in the state of New York on the 18th May, 1895. Let us see if our agricultural produce, for instance, would reach higher prices in the United States than they do now in Canada. On the 18th May, at Albany, New York State, cattle were sold for $6 or $6.50 per hundred pounds. Butter and cheese—and we all know the Americans could never sell their cheese at as high a price as we sell our own, because they have yet to learn how to make it as good—were sold at cheaper prices than our own butter and cheese. But there can be no doubt that if we had the trade relations referred to by the Liberals, the Americans would send their cheese here to injure our own; there can be no doubt either that they would ship through our country the worst part of their cheese, so as to be able to sell it in England as Canadian cheese, for the Canadian cheese realizes on the British markets from one to one and a half cents more than American cheese. At Albany, a good milch-cow sells at from thirty-five to forty dollars, and we all know that a good milch-cow cannot be had in Canada for that price. Butter is sold at from 18 to 20 cents a pound, and so on. Oats, from 33 to 35 cents, while at Montreal it is worth $1.08, or 54 cents a bushel.

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) Oh! oh!

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) The hon. member for Rouville ought to know that I was giving the price by the bag. I could quote the whole list of market prices, that is to say for such articles as are mentioned, but it would take too much time.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) How is it the Government sold their butter for 16 cents a pound?

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) I am coming to that, if you would only give me a chance. We are told by the Liberals on the hustings: But the protective tariff has caused an increase in the price of goods needed by the farmers. Thus the farmer is compelled to pay more for his agricultural implements. Such is the contention of the Liberals. They cannot bring any evidence in support of it, but they go repeating it so often that in the long run well-intended people are made by them to believe that there must be some truth in such statements. To make their statements appear true, they say to the farmers: Iron costs so much more, owing to the tariff of the Conservatives. It is iron that causes the increase in the price of your agricultural implements. All this is false. Manufactured iron is cheaper now than formerly, and you can have on the Montreal market nails for 2 cents, and manufactured iron for 2 cents a pound, or $2 a hundred pounds,—steel for 2½ cents, while under the Mackenzie tariff the cost of these same goods was larger than this. I took the trouble to consult one of our largest manufacturers, Mr. Moodey, of Terrebonne, in this respect. We all know that this gentleman manufactures agricultural implements and sells his goods all over Ontario, and in almost every city in Canada. Now, in 1877, a mower cost $80, and in 1895 the very same mower costs $45. An harvester, in 1877, cost $120, while in 1895, you can have it for $65. A horse rake cost, in 1878, $38, while in 1894 you could have it for $21. In 1878, a binder cost $275, while in 1894-95 you can buy one for $117. The same difference is to be found in the price of any implement used by the farmer in the cultivation of his land. Notwithstanding that, you will find Liberals who will say that the protective tariff of the Conservatives has caused an increase in the price of these goods. In 1877-78, these agricultural implements cost much more than now, and please observe, Mr. Speaker, that you had to buy them from the Americans. Our money went to the United States while now it remains in Canada, and is given to our Canadian labourers and mechanics. Notwithstanding the important fact for the farmers that these same agricultural implements are much cheaper than under the Liberal rule, thanks to protection, we keep our money in this country and we now supply the farming community with implements much cheaper than formerly. It was said in the county of L'Assomption that the tariff now in force had much increased the prices. In order to show the contrary, I beg to give a list of articles in use among the farmers. Let us begin by the tools and building material:

Articles.	1878.	1894.
Steel shovels	$ 1 56	$ 0 55

Let us now take articles of home consumption. We will find, to say the least, as large a decrease in the prices :

I may point out that a duty of 6 cents a pound on tea had been imposed by the Mackenzie Government, and was repealed by the present Government. The same decrease is noticeable in the prices of cloth, stuffs, cotton goods, wearing apparel and underwear, as shown by the following figures :

* Not manufactured in Canada.

I could go on giving figures such as these for a long while, but I think I have given enough.

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) I suppose it is for the same reason that the population of the county of l'Assomption has decreased in number ?

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) If the hon. member would wait a moment, I will come to that. Let us now see what the case is with shoes. The following table shows what the decrease was under a protective tariff :

Mr. JEANNOTTE.

Articles.	1878.	1894.
Boots and shoes (buff leather)—
Balmoral, for men.....	$2 28	$1 00 @ $1 25
do for ladies.....	1 25	0 75
do for children.....	1 10	0 50

I see that this enumeration causes some hon. gentlemen opposite to laugh, more especially those who are married. I must say I would not know these prices, had they not been given me by a merchant. And the married people among the hon. members ought to rejoice at the fact that the protective tariff has caused a decrease in the price of shoes, for I am told that women wear out a good deal of them. The hon. member for Richelieu, following the example of his leaders, rather made use of the great name of the Conservative leaders in order to excuse the policy of the Liberals. He stated Sir George Cartier was a free-trader. And in support of that contention, he quoted a few words from a speech delivered by this statesman on the 23rd December, 1871. If the hon. member for Richelieu had taken his quotation a few lines further, he would have found that the principles of the Conservative party are the same now as those professed by Cartier and the other Conservative leaders. Here is what Sir George Etienne Carter then said in Quebec :—

You cannot establish any traffic with foreign nations if they do not want any. The Quebec manufacturers often ask to be protected to the utmost. It is a preposterous proposition, as much so as are extreme ideas in connection with free trade. This last system compels you to pay to the Government by way of a direct tax the same duties as before. With unlimited protection you strike a fatal blow at the foreign trade. We have decided to impose a revenue duty that will give at the same time a sufficient protection, reserving our right to change our fiscal policy according to circumstances. Mr. Stephens asked us to protect the home production against foreign competition, but we must not go too far in this direction. Should we give an excessive protection to manufacturers, they could only dispose of their goods in their own country.

Such was the policy of Sir G. Cartier, whose loss we are still mourning. Such was the policy of the late Sir John Macdonald, of Sir John Thompson and it is the very policy we have now. We do not change. We are for a protective tariff that shall protect the farmers, the manufacturers and any other class of the community. If I were to follow the example of the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Landerkin) some one might feel sorry for it, but I will only quote the words uttered by the hon. leader of the Opposition on the 9th November, 1871, in reply to the Speech from the Throne :

It is now, Sir, a good many years since the great patriot whom we recently lost, the Hon. L. J. Papineau, casting about for a remedy for the ills of the times, summed up his policy on the subject in this simple precept: "We should buy nothing from the metropolis." My opinion is that this policy is even more urgent to-day than it was when first formulated.

It is a duty, especially for us Canadians of French origin, to create a national industry. We are surrounded by a strong and vigorous race, who are endowed with a devouring activity, and have taken possession of the entire universe as their field of labour.

I am not going to quote the considerations these words suggested to the hon. member for L'Islet, in "Le Canadien" of the 4th September, 1878: they are too offensive to the leader of the Opposition for me to repeat them. Very likely, had the member for Richelieu been aware of these offensive words of the hon. member for L'Islet, he would not have concluded his speech, the other day, by such a pompous praise of the leader of the Opposition. For my part, I am willing to admit that the hon. leader of the Opposition is worthy of compliments.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Before saying "hear, hear," the hon. gentlemen opposite had better read the observations made by the hon. member for L'Islet, to which I have referred: they might possibly change their opinion as regards the leader of the Opposition. Has protection increased or decreased our sales in foreign countries? Has the protective tariff established by the Conservative party had the effect of causing our imports and exports to increase or decrease? If it resulted in a decrease in our imports, then I say protection is a benefit for our country. But if on the other hand it resulted in their increase, then I say it is a policy that is far from being satisfactory. Let us examine a few figures bearing on that point. In 1878, we imported for consumption 2,071,513 bushels of oats valued at $565,141. In 1893, owing to the protective tariff, we only bought 44,264 bushels, representing a value of $19,886, or a decrease of 2,027,249 bushels and $545,255, which money remained in this country to its whole advantage. Now, what about wheat? We imported, in 1878, 1,519,703 bushels of American wheat and 311,706 bushels of American flour, while in 1893, we only bought from the Americans 9,069 bushels of wheat and 34,507 bushels of flour, or a difference in favour of protection, of 1,510,634 bushels of wheat and 277,199 bushels of flour. I say that under such circumstances the protective tariff is a benefit for the country and I prove it by these figures. It is unquestionable, therefore, that through such a tariff we have been useful to the country. I will give some more figures, Mr. Speaker. In 1878, we bought 110,228 bushels of rye, and in 1893, we only imported 302 bushels. In 1878, we imported 227,572 bushels of Indian flour, and in 1893, 65,495 only. In 1878, we imported 2,345,807 pounds of lard and in 1893, 147,885. In 1878, we imported 10,248,020 pounds of pork and in 1893, 3,862,546 pounds only. Now, a few words with respect to the cheese industry. It is only a few years old, and I fancy the Liberals still remember with what eagerness at the outset, they ridiculed the Conservative candidates who declared themselves in favour of proper measures to develop and promote the dairy industry in this country. These were called the butter and cheese candidates and they were made a laughing stock by the Liberals. However, the dairy industry has prospered; in 1894, we sold 5,334,621 pounds of butter valued at $1,045,538; and we sold cheese to the amount of $15,450,000 in round figures. In spite of the Liberals, this industry has ever since been and is still existing and prospering. We find them now laughing at, and throwing ridicule upon, the endeavours made by the Quebec Government to establish this industry on a firm basis. They have now called the Conservative party an agricultural machine. Whenever they have to deliver a speech, they never fail to refer to the Quebec Government as the agricultural machine of the province of Quebec. They even go to the length of dissuading the farmers from attending the agricultural conferences held through the efforts of that government, and listening to the good advice that may be given them by an honest government, such as the Quebec Government is, a government working in the interest of the province. The Liberals advise their friends not to attend these meetings which are so beneficial to the farming community. But the people who always clearly perceive the difference there is between the Liberals, who merely work for their party, and the Conservatives who have only in view the general interests of the country, are almost unanimously siding with the Conservatives. But, in spite of the propagandism made by my hon. friends the Liberals among the farmers to prevent them from attending these agricultural conferences, the farmers go there and are attentive to the knowledge which is imparted to them. They thus learn how studiously the Conservative party are exerting themselves to cause to be profitable to them the various farm industries. The hon. member for Richelieu himself tried, without succeeding, however, to throw ridicule upon the endeavours made by this Government to introduce our butter on the English market when he said: The Government has entered into the small butter business. Anything the Conservatives are doing in the interest of the farmers is ridiculed by the Liberals. It is their way of favouring the agricultural interests. I had the advantage on several occasions to attend these agricultural conferences and I had the pleasure to meet there good Liberals of the county of L'Assomption, honest people surely, who are intent above all to remain Canadians without troubling themselves much about being Liberals or Conservatives, but who want to judge by themselves the worth of the principles of the political parties. I may say that there is a considerable change, and my hon. friends opposite will experience it at the next election. The Liberals are going to be greatly disappointed, for many country voters are now reasoning the public questions, and the Liberal party will experience thereby a decrease in the number of their friends. Moreover, they will not be supported this time by an organization which was very useful to them at the last general election, they will not have the financial support they got from the Quebec tolls under the Mercier Government. This party is ruined and bankrupt, and the Liberal party will have no such funds at the next election as they had at the last general election. As several hon. members, more especially among the hon. gentlemen opposite, wish to address the House and have lengthy speeches to deliver, I will shorten my remarks. In 1890, the farmers who devoted themselves to the raising of hogs complained to the Government that the Americans were shipping pork here in too large quantities, to their great detriment. The Government increased the duties from 1 cent to 1½ cents on barrelled pork, and from 2 to 3 cents on bacon and ham. The following change has occurred. In 1890, we imported

	Quantity.	Value.
Pork	$17,185,794	$ 832,353
Hams and bacon.....	4,353,653	324,926
Lard	4,881,786	301,007
Total.....	26,421,233	1,458,286

In 1893, we imported the same goods to the following extent :

	Quantity.	Value.
Pork	$ 3,862,546	$ 272,460
Bacon and hams	670,155	76,008
Lard	146,885	12,620
Total.....	4,679,486	361,088

Or a decrease in the imports for these three years, of 21,741,747 pounds and $1,097,198. We were told by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), in an eloquent speech, that the population had much decreased since the last census. According to his statement, all the manufactures in Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were closed. I am willing to believe it; but it must be observed that since that time the Liberals have been ruling all these provinces. To induce the people to stay in the country, the Liberal Government of Prince Edward Island has passed a charming Act intituled "An Act respecting Taxes." In Nova Scotia the Liberals came into power in 1884; in 1883, the expenditure of the province amounted to $541,099; in

Mr. JEANNOTTE.

1892, it had reached $822,462. In 1884, the province had a debt amounting to $1,014,744. In 1893, it amounted to $3,142,922. In New Brunswick the Liberals came into power in 1883. In 1882, the expenditure was $614,236; in 1893, it was $696,000. In 1883, the debt amounted to $1,268,272; in 1893, it had reached $2,752,297. In Manitoba, the Liberals took the reins of office in January, 1888. In 1887, the expenditure was $520,190; in 1894, it had reached $632,000. In 1887, the debt was $2,229,106; in 1893, it had increased to $4,398,259. It is quite easy to understand why the people leave these provinces. The province of Prince Edward Island, which has suffered the longest Liberal rule, was, after making colossal and useless expenditures, after allowing boodling, compelled last year to pass an Act to impose land taxes. Does the hon. member for Queen's think that a land tax is a good way to retain the population in the province? Does he think the Liberals are welcome to complain that the people of Prince Edward Island are leaving the province? Following is the tax imposed in 1894 by the legislature of Prince Edward Island:—1. On any land not exceeding on an average a value of five dollars an acre, one cent per acre; 2. On lands valued at from $5 to $10 an acre, two cents per acre; 3. On lands valued at from $10 to $15 an acre, three cents per acre; 4. On lands valued at from $15 to $20 an acre, four cents per acre; 5. On lands valued at from $20 to $25 an acre, five cents per acre; 6. And lastly, on any land valued at more than $25 an acre, six cents per acre. And that under penalty of imprisonment. This tax also affects the lots not valued by the acre. Thus, any lot of the value of $250 pays a tax of fifty cents, and under an ascending progression, a lot worth from $500 to $1,000 pays two dollars, and a lot the value of which exceeds $2,500 pays a tax of $6. This Act goes further still; it imposes a tax on revenue of one cent in the dollar on any yearly revenue exceeding $300. Should the official collector have any doubts as to the valuation made by the owner, he is empowered to put him under oath and he can have the land valued by an appraiser selected by himself. This is how the Liberals treat the people and they next come here and bewail their fate, contending that the people are over-burdened with taxes by the Conservatives. It is true taxes were imposed in the province of Quebec, but is it not equally true it was the result of the bad administration of the Liberal party during the time they ruled that province? I hope no one will deny that. The hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau) referred to corruption which, he said, the Conservative party had indulged into on a large scale. He referred to the scandal of the Curran bridge and some other things. If there is a party who should not talk about corruption and scandals, it is truly the Liberal party. I do not say the Conservative party are quite faultless in this respect. Unhappily some such errors always creep in, but is it to be wondered at? Take the least of our municipal corporations, do not reprehensible things happen sometimes within them? On the other hand, the public are somewhat used to utter cries of scandal! for the least thing. You will find people crying out: Thieves! plunder! for the expenditure of one dollar or a dollar and a half they think excessive. In the least of our parishes where public affairs are nevertheless well managed, you will not fail to find people who, in connection with an expenditure of one hundred and fifty or two hundred dollars, made by the municipal council with the most scrupulous honesty, will cry out: Thieves! plunder! and boodling! Is it to be wondered at that the Conservatives, who have held power for at least 25 years, should be charged in the same way by their opponents? It will be found perhaps that some mistakes have occurred. Well, the Ministers are not made impeccable by the fact that they are Ministers; they belong to humanity just as they did before, notwithstanding their title of Ministers of the Crown. When we set ourselves to the bringing out afresh of the scandals that occurred under the Mackenzie Government, so as to compare them with those charged to the Conservative party, we were told by the hon. gentlemen opposite that it was ancient history, that it went back to years gone by. But we cannot charge the Liberals with anything else, for the simple reason that they are connected with past times, that their party belongs to ancient history. The Liberal party has been so long in opposition and the present Government so long into power, that we are compelled to go back to ancient history, in order to find out what happened at the time our hon. friends opposite were into power. The Liberal party through its wrong principles has stayed so long in Opposition that its administrative faults belong to ancient history. When the Liberal speakers are addressing public meetings, they try to have it believed by the voters that they are anxious for the public good, while in their inner souls they only wish to put their hands in the public treasury, and we all know what use they make of the public money when unfortunately it is put under their control. They promise to decrease the taxes, to decrease the expenditure and they know that such a cry may perhaps win some people over to their side, for there are hard times now and then and lands do not yield as much as one would like. But there is no political platform in all this. When we ask them what their policy is, they reply that their policy is that of Lafontaine, of Cartier, but they never mention that of their own leaders. I presume they never refer to it because it belongs to ancient history. The hon. leader of the Opposition, who speaks so well, who is delivering such fine speeches, stated when addressing a meeting in the county of L'Assomption, which I have the honour to represent, that he was following the policy of Sir Louis Hypolite Lafontaine, the great Liberal leader. In support of his statement, he said that the Liberal party it was who had abolished the seigniorial rights. Now, what is the truth? Papineau, the true Liberal leader, who was opposing Lafontaine, delivered a speech in the course of which he stated that those who were working for the abolition of seigniorial rights were mere seekers of popularity. As you see, there are many among the Liberals who resort to ancient history, notwithstanding the reproach they proffer against us. Examine the actions of this party, from year to year, and you will be satisfied they are always acting contrary to the promises made by them before their coming into power. They are always opposed to the people's rights when it comes to protecting the farmers and promoting national industries and they oppose any measure that may tend to that end. It is so in small things as well as in important matters. At L'Assomption, the hon. leader of the Opposition, referring to the past, qualified Lafontaine, "our great leader," while in Quebec he stated that when opposing confederation as he did, he was following his leaders, Messrs. Dorion and others, for he believed that they were right, but now that confederation has been established since 1867, owing to the Conservatives, Sir George Cartier is a great statesman. Whatever the Liberals may be doing, we are confronted with the names of the Conservative leaders. They know that our leaders are honourable men and that we, Conservatives, respect them not only after their death, but during their life-time. If they are worthy of such respect, if they deserve to be pointed out to the voters, to the farmers, to the habitant—it is a title I like to assume, for I have been and I am still a habitant—it is because, after all, the Conservative party and its leaders have worked for the progress of the country, although some of them may have been wanting in their duty. Who is it that has carried out all the great public works that are the admiration of foreigners, and even the Liberals, if not the Conservatives? When hardly a few years ago, they set to build the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Liberals went on saying: The Pacific, what a folly! It will not even pay the grease required to lubricate the wheels of their cars! It was hardly built that it gave a large revenue, and the Liberals then exclaimed: The Pacific, why! we knew ourselves it would be a fire affair, and when the Conservatives came into power, they took over our work half done. Yet, what had they done? A section by canoe, another by boat and the rest—

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) On foot.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) And the rest on foot. Now, I have done.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) What is the population of the county of L'Assomption, you have not told that yet?

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) If you will only wait a moment, I will say a word about that. I am now going to quote a few lines from a writing due to the pen of one of your good friends, one of the best bosom friends of the hon. leader of the Opposition. He will just tell us what the Liberal party is. It is quoted from "Le Canadien," under date 14th November, 1877. He was at that time opposed to the corruption. He called the Liberal party, the hypocrisy party. Perhaps he was mistaken:

The Liberal party has been termed the organized hypocrisy party. Never was a more exact word uttered; never was a stigma of shame more deserved. The Liberals have shown themselves to be hypocrites in anything. They cried out, "Corruption!" against their opponents, and the courts of justice have revealed to the country the incredible venality of these so-called pure people. They cried out: "Waste of public money!" and when in power they wantonly increased the expenditure.

I could quote much more; I have a whole collection of this kind.

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) Who wrote that?

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) It is quoted from "Le Canadien" of 1877, then the property of the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte). Are the Liberals protectionists? Some are. It was shown by them last year. When the tariff was discussed in this House, we found the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), a free-trader, asking that coal oil be protected. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) claimed protection for the manufacturers of biscuits and jellies. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) claimed the same thing for pork. The hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) wished the vegetables to be protected. The hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) claimed protection for beet-root sugar; the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) claimed it for the farm produce. And, what was the most surprising, even the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) had become a protectionist, so far as sheep were concerned. Perhaps it was something after his kind. The Liberals in this House and upon the hustings are incessantly repeating that protection has no other effect than causing the manufacturers to pocket hundreds of thousands and even millions of dollars, and that it is contrary to the interests of the consumer, of the poor people. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr.

Mr. JEANNOTTE.

Davies) has given a contradiction to his friends in the course of his speech. In the maritime provinces, he said, almost all the manufactures are closed. And do you know why? He, himself, has given us the information: It is because competition is too keen, prices are too low and manufacturers are compelled to sell under cost. It is the National Policy that brings about so much good to every class of the community. In fact, since the establishment of protection, the price of manufactured goods has decreased by at least 50 to 200 per cent. It is truly surprising to find the Liberals still opposing the good and advantageous National Policy for petty party purposes. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I must say that I have expressed this evening, not only my own opinion, but that of the voters of the county of L'Assomption, the great majority of whom are in favour of protection. At the beginning of this session, Liberal leaders of L'Assomption came up and met me here, urging me to call upon the Government to protect agricultural produce, such as butter, cheese, tobacco and beet-root sugar. It must not be presumed that they are protectionists only as far as one article goes. They are protectionists any way, because they read good papers; they closely watch politics, the growth of trade and industry, and they have come to the conclusion that without protection and with a simple tariff for revenue and free trade with the United States, Canada would be in a condition of great destitution. Hay, it is true, did not sell here at as high a price as in the United States, yet good hay sells at $8.50 in Montreal, and common hay at from $7 to $7.50, the same price as in the United States. They say our country places are in want, that destitution prevails therein. Yet, just go on Sundays at our church doors and you will soon feel that our people are not in want. The farmers come to the divine service in closed carriages, I could even say in rich carriages. Twenty-five or thirty years ago, how many closed carriages, fat horses and white harnesses were there in our country places? Now our farmers have very good closed carriages, although in my time—and I am not old yet, and I have been brought up in as easy circumstances as those I now see—there were very few carriages of this kind. In the parish of Mascouche there were hardly three or four closed carriages, but, on the other hand, every farmer had money in his pocket. The secret of such savings lied in that the farmers were expending very little. If the farmer nowadays, with the earnings he gets, did likewise, the situation would be quite different and most of them would have savings in hand. The farmers nowadays live and feed better than did the farmer in my youth. I wish to be well understood, and I say that if, in our country places, they lived with the same economy as thirty years ago, our people, without being rich, would be in easier circumstances than they are, for just think, that with the dairy industry alone the farmers in my county realized, in the course of last summer only, $101,995. In olden times our farmers had no such means of making money. Could the Liberals, who contend our country places are in want, explain how it is that formerly we borrowed money at a rate of interest of 8 or 10 per cent—and even then we could not always find some at such a rate—while now it is very easy to have some at 5 and 5½ per cent, at least in the county of L'Assomption? In that county money to loan is plentiful, and I may say I know farmers who could not place their money at such a rate, and who had to deposit in Montreal banks. I know something of it. Not so, by far, thirty years ago. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the kind attention with which this House listened to me, and I will now conclude.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) You forgot to explain how it is that the population of L'Assomption has decreased.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) You can do it, if you are only willing to take the floor after me. To sum up, I say that a protective tariff is a very good thing, and that it is making the fortune of this country. The farmers approve of it because it promotes the industries, and I think the public sentiment is in favour of such a tariff. The people declared themselves in favour of such a tariff at the general elections of 1878, 1882, 1887 and 1891. After 1891, several Liberal elections were protested, for many friends of the Opposition had unfortunately carried their elections through corruption. Their returns having been quashed, the people have pronounced anew, freely this time, and have sent them home and replaced them by Conservatives. The voters understood they were wrong when taking the money of the Liberals. I hope we shall have another session before a general election takes place. I hope so in order to utterly discourage the Liberal party. At the next election we will not have to meet the Liberal speakers holding in their hand a copy of the American tariff and reading it on the hustings, as they did in 1891, saying that it was the tariff established by the Conservative party. That was done in many counties, amongst others in L'Assomption, Montcalm and Joliette. The Liberal speakers said to the people: See the enormous duties the Conservative party imposes on you, and, if you pay such high prices for your goods, it is due to the Conservative party, which imposes such duties upon you. At the next election they will have no such means to lead away the voters. The people have their eyes opened and they follow the affairs of the country, and I feel satisfied the Liberals will have to stay in opposition for a long time yet.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. member for L'Assomption (Mr. Jeannotte) who has just taken his seat, has made a very fine speech, as one might say, in consultation, and a speech with which the hon. gentleman seems to be perfectly well satisfied. He has told us a great deal about the county of L'Assomption, but he forgot one thing. He forgot to tell us that the population of that county was reduced by 1,600 souls between 1881 and 1891. And as these were mostly young men who left to earn their living somewhere else, and the majority of whom were probably electors, it is possibly due to the loss of these intelligent men that the hon. gentleman was able to defeat Mr. Gauthier at the last election.

Passing from this speech to the remarks of the Secretary of State, I am compelled to refer with a feeling of considerable sadness to a fact which has been cited more than once in the course of this debate, and that is that the death of the last three Premiers has been a sad loss to this House and country. We were never more convinced of the sadness and the irreparable nature of that loss to hon. gentlemen opposite than while listening to the speech of the hon. Secretary of State. We all remember when on that side of the House they had good debaters. We all remember when their leader, whoever he might be, was able to make a speech which would command the attention, at all events, of his own supporters and had colleagues able to back him up. But now, when the leader of the House made his Budget speech, the benches behind him were scarcely more than half filled, while, on the other hand, when the leader of the Opposition made his statement, the House was thronged, and when the Secretary of State takes the floor, the seats behind him are filled with an enthusiastic audience.

What does this mean? It means that hon. gentlemen opposite have only one speaker amongst them—only one man who is able to enchain the attention of his own supporters—I was going to say followers, because they seemed to be rather his followers than those of the hon. gentleman who is supposed to lead the House. Hon. gentlemen opposite are in the position in which the Germans were nearly a hundred years ago when their country had been overrun by Napoleon for a term of years, and when, after they won the battle of Aspern, a patriotic poet of the day was able to say that the people were:

Shouting with lips all victory drunken,
No! Our Germany has not yet sunken—
She has yet one day, and yet one man.

That was the first victory in the long course of years over which the Germans were able to rejoice. In like manner the speech of the Secretary of State has been the first thing approaching a success on which gentlemen on the other side have been able to congratulate themselves, and with regard to which they have been able to shout with lips, not with victory drunken, perhaps, but at all events excited with the pleasure of being able for once to cheer one of their own speakers.

That was the first thing approaching oratorical success which we have had from the other side. And what kind of a success was it? Was it the kind of speech we have been accustomed to hear from hon. Ministers opposite? Far from it. The decadence in the style of that speech has been pointed out by the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin). It has been something most painful to the House. It was a speech that might do for the stump or a tea meeting or even for a camp meeting; but it was not one to be expected from that member of the Government who was to make the great oratorical effort of the debate on behalf of the administration.

It was a speech of the kind which the hon. gentleman's great predecessor, Cicero, once prepared in defence of a client. He was ill-advised enough to let his client see this speech after he had written it out, and before it was delivered. The client took it home and read it over and liked it very well. He liked it so well that he read it a second, a third and a fourth time, and then brought it back to the Montague—I mean the Cicero—of the day, and said: That speech is no good. I liked it the first time, but each time that I have read it over I like it less, and now I am disgusted with it. Such will be the fate of the speech of the hon. member for Haldimand to-day. But Cicero said to him: You fool, that speech will only be heard once by the court, and it will not be able to read it over again. The Cicero of that day was better off in this respect than the Cicero of to-day, because the speech of the latter will appear in cold print and be read by the people; and though it might do very well at a political picnic, it will not go down after a calm and deliberate reading. I should have thought that the hon. gentleman's experience on the platform and in the pulpit and elsewhere would have sufficiently educated his taste to prevent his making the mistake he did to-night. However well that speech might have done under these circumstances, it will not do here.

Yet it must be answered and gone into in some particulars. I had not the pleasure of hearing it all, but was able to cull a few gems, which may be taken as samples of the remainder and which show on what a slender base of argument, or rather on what an absence of argument it all rests. He repeated here, as he has repeated on the platform throughout the country, that the party to which I belong has had five policies in five years. Now, Sir, even the hon. gentleman himself knows better than that. Certainly the country knows better. Let me tell him that I remember the policy of this party for the last twenty-three years as a member of this House, and I can say with absolute certainty that during the whole of that twenty-three years the policy of the Liberal party has been what it is now, a policy of tariff for revenue only, combined with readiness to make a reciprocity treaty with our nearest neighbours. That has been during the time I speak of, and I believe, for years previous, the policy of this party. How many times has the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite been changed in that time? To say that we have had five policies in five years, because, according as circumstances changed one part or another of the policy has been brought into special prominence, is to use that suppression of truth which is equivalent to the suggestion of a lie which should be brought to the notice of the Minister of Justice, whom I see smiling at my attempt to use legal terms. The policy of the Liberal party has been the same as it is to-day for years before the Secretary of State was dreamed of as a factor in politics.

The hon. gentleman told us that the Democrats in the United States had not done what we prophesied they would do when they came into power; that they had not carried out the far-reaching tariff reforms in the fiscal policy of the United States which they had promised to carry out. And he said that this party would also fail to carry out the far-reaching tariff reforms which we now propose. Why was it that the Democrats failed to carry out their policy? Was it that they did not honestly try? By no means. The Representative House in the United States passed a measure of reform carrying out very fully the promises made by Cleveland and his allies on the hustings. But, Sir, those reforms were burked in the Senate, the house which is not responsible directly to the people. And burked by what influence? By the sugar trust, which bought a sufficient number of senators in that house in which the Democrats majority was small, to defeat the policy of the party. Sir, if it were possible to imagine for a moment that the great sugar trust of Canada, a trust as oppressive, as rich and as influential in proportion to the population of Canada as is the great sugar trust of the United States in that country—if it were possible to imagine that that trust could find a number of senators in Canada open to the same influence, then perhaps this party which is coming into power in Canada at the next election might find many of their reforms burked in the same manner as tariff reform was burked in the United States. But, unless that can be done—and I do not for a moment insinuate that such senators could be found, though I have no doubt that such a sugar trust could be found in Canada—there could be no prospect of failure on this side.

What has been the result of the failure of the Democratic party to carry out their policy? I say that that failure was not their fault but their misfortune : it was caused by the expenditure of sugar trust money, which money was wrested from the people and put into the pockets of the sugar barons. But whether it was their fault or their misfortune, the result was their defeat at the last election. It was because they did not carry out their policy of reform that they were beaten, and not because of the tariff reform they attempted. And the inference I draw from that defeat of that party is that they lost power, not because they had gone too far in the direction of free trade, but because they had not gone far enough.

Then, Sir, the hon. Secretary of State told us that the National Policy was at last doing some good to the farmers of this country. Well, it would be almost a sufficient answer to such an assertion as that to invite gentlemen opposite to go and tell it to the farmers. It is a common, proverbial, piece of cynical advice, "Tell that to the marines." But as the marines could not understand this particular information, we may invite the hon. gentleman to "tell that to the farmers." He says he has been wiring all over the country and has found out that there is a great deal of wheat still in the farmer's hands. He gave statistics from various places as to the quantity held by the farmers and the quantity sold since the rise in price. But he did not give us the authority on which these assertions were made.

He said he had sent telegrams and had received answers, but he did not tell us who had sent those answers. It is very natural to suppose—it is a thing we cannot help believing—that he sent to friendly sources for this information, that he sent to the people who, he knew, would give him the kind of estimate he required for use in this debate. He got the information he needed, but not necessarily the information which is correct. But, even if it were as he stated, the quantity of wheat accounted for by his various telegrams from Seaforth, Dunnville, Brampton and other places would be only a drop in the bucket of the total production of Canada. And then the hon. gentleman telegraphed to the Ogilvies in Montreal to get their estimate, and their estimate is that they are from one and a half to two million bushels of wheat still unsold in Ontario. The hon. gentleman says, surely the Ogilvies know as much about it as anybody else. I do not know that the Ogilvies do. I do not know that the Ogilvies know much more about how much wheat is in the farmers' barns than anybody else. They can find out how much is held by speculators, how much is held in small warehouses, how much is ready for them to purchase on the market. But I do not know what special means they have of learning how much is secreted by the farmers throughout the country. I say the Ogilvies are not in a position to be well informed on that point, but it is clearly to their advantage to create the impression that there is a lot of farmers' wheat still held in the granary ; and I say that the telegram of the Ogilvies to the Secretary of State was sent with the intention, and that it was read by the Secretary of State with the effect, of tending to reduce the prices of wheat throughout Canada. The scarcity of wheat is caused by local demand—so the hon. Secretary of State says. If it is not caused by local demand for use in Canada, of course the hon. gentleman could not pretend that the duty on wheat had raised the price. If it is caused by a scarcity for local demand, or rather by the opinion that such scarcity exists, the assertion that there are two millions of bushels of wheat still held by the farmers of Ontario must bring down the price to us in Canada. I charge it against the Secretary of State that, for the sake of appearing to make a point in argument, he has made a statement to the House which will undoubtedly have the effect of creating the impression that there is plenty of wheat yet to be marketed in Ontario, and which will have the effect—perhaps it was meant to have the effect—of making it easier for the Ogilvies to buy that wheat at a cheaper rate than they have been paying hitherto.

We will leave the hon. gentleman to settle that with the farmers. But we will take his conclusion. Suppose that the Ogilvies are correct and that a million and a half bushels have been sold at the increased price, making a gain of 15 cents a bushel to the farmers. The total of $225,000 is what the hon. gentleman says the farmers have made out of the National Policy. Well, Sir, if they have, it is the first time in sixteen years they have made anything out of the National Policy. And if you divide the $225,000 among the sixteen years of that policy, it comes to about $14,000 a year, which the farmers have made out of it. He says some of the farmers have had to hold this wheat three years in order to get this advantage. Why, if the $225,000 were spread over the three years, even, during which the farmers have had to hold their wheat, and pay interest, and suffer loss by rats, &c., in their granaries, it would be a trifling affair ; but when you spread it over the whole sixteen years during which the farmer has been sweated by the National Policy for the benefit of the monopolist's combines and during which time he has got nothing out of the National Policy, you will find he has only made $14,000 a year during that time. And that is the argument produced by the Secretary of State to prove that the farmers ought to support that policy. That, Sir, is the strongest argument he has brought forward for the farmer's support, and I am willing to leave it there, without any attempt to refute it further. I have taken his own figures and drawn the logical conclusion from them.

Then he told us that we have not felt the depression as much as we did in 1878. And to whom does he appeal to prove that? Does he appeal to the recollection of people who know what was going on in 1878? He was not in a position to know much about it himself at that time. He was only a boy then, and does not know of his own recollections how the depression did feel. He was probably in that bouyant condition of youth when everything seemed to be going happily as long as he had plenty of money in his own pocket, and he did not know what was happening to anybody else. But he does not appeal to the memory of those of us who were men in 1878. To what authority does he appeal to prove that we felt the depression more in 1878? To the London "Economist." The London "Economist" knows more about it than do the people of Canada. Well, I am willing to leave that whole question to those who were in business in 1878. Let us ask them whether they have not felt the depression more of late than they did in 1878. Take any line of business you please, except half a dozen or so of the highly protected monopolists who are undoubtedly reaping a large harvest just now at other people's expense, in spite even of hard times. Take the farmer, the small manufacturer, the importer, the merchant, the professional man, and we all know they are having harder times now than they had in 1878. I know of my own personal recollection that manufactures with which I was connected myself, and which were then prosperous, are now utterly extinct.

We have been told about wagon factories. There was one such in my county, in which I was a shareholder, and of which I was even president, and which in 1878, exported buggies to Australia, making a profit on them. That does not exist to-day.

An hon. MEMBER. Why?

Mr. CASEY. On account of the National Policy. My hon. friend from East Elgin (Mr. Ingram) denies it; but he does not know anything about it, while I do from my personal knowledge of the affairs of the company; so we will let his interruption go for a freak of ill humour and not attribute it to any thing else. There were many small manufactories in the county of Elgin, and in every other county, which were flourishing in 1878, but which are now extinct as the dodo, and which will never come to life again. And why? Because the great manufacturers, those who were in a position to take advantage of the monopolies, sold to them by the so-called government of the day, have frozen out the others, have consolidated the business in a few hands, have monopolized it, and have been able to combine and keep up the prices. That is the reason the small manufactories have died and the large ones have grown larger. The big fish have eaten up the little ones, and this beautiful economist, the Secretary of State, looks upon that as a proof of the prosperity of the country.

Chatham was spoken of. I am informed by those who know, that there are foundries dead in that town that were in full operation in 1878. I know that foundries which were in operation in 1878, in St. Thomas, are dead now, and their vacant buildings are lying there as proof of the blasting effects of this National Policy on all manufactures except those which are supported by sufficient capital to enable them to become a monopoly. I was also connected with a woollen factory in my county, which is now extinct. My hon. friend the member for Lanark (Mr. Rosamond) has licked that up along with a lot of other morsels. These little fish taste sweet. My hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) gave the names of several manufacturing industries in London which had gone out since the establishment of the National Policy, and as a result of it. I have proof which I have laid before this House more than once, from a founder in my county which has managed to survive, to show that the National Policy is costing him thousands of dollars every year in the manufacturing of threshing machines in which he used to compete, before the National Policy, with the United States manufacturers in Michigan, and used to do it at a profit; but now they cannot do it because it costs them too much to make the machines. We have proof of it in the person of Mr. Frost, of Smith's Falls, an intelligent manufacturer of agricultural implements, who has presented himself as a candidate in support of a revenue tariff policy, and he will testify that he believes that the National Policy is not good for the class of manufactures in which he is engaged. A foundry there, as my hon. friend besides me points out, has also gone up.

We might go on multiplying instances all over. The London "Economist" said, according to the Secretary of State, that Canada stood up amongst other nations like a tall chimney amongst the ruins of a manufactory. Well, we might accept the simile in this sense—the monopolies of Canada stand up like tall chimneys amongst the ruins of all other factories, and that is the one sign of prosperity we have got out of the National Policy.

Now, the Secretary of State went on to say that the United States felt the late depression more than Canada did. Well, how did that happen? The United States is a much more highly protected country than Canada. If protection causes prosperity and lessens depression, why did not protection keep the United States free from this awful curse? It was because the United States had a higher protection than Canada that they felt it worse than we did. I believe they did in many respects feel it worse than we did, simply because they had gone further in the policy of protection than we have.

Then again the Secretary of State grew very patriotic. He denounced the leader of the Opposition. Denounced him for what? Not for what the leader of the Opposition had said, but because some papers in the United States praised the leader of the Opposition for a speech he made at Winnipeg. He (the Secretary of State) said he did not want the applause of Yankee papers, he did not want to please the people in the States; that the policy of the Opposition always pleased the people of the United States, but he did not want their applause, he only wanted the applause of Canadians. Then what did the hon. gentleman say in the next breath? Why, he said: Look at what the Buffalo "Express" says about the member for South Oxford, and the leader of the Opposition. Why, said he, the Buffalo "Express" says that Canada prospers because she refused to listen to demagogues, and those demagogues, said the hon. gentleman, were the members for South Oxford and the leader of the Opposition. See the beautiful consistency of the hon. gentleman. In the first place, he did not care a bit for Yankee applause, he only wanted the applause of Canadians; and in the second place, he goes on to prove out of the mouth of a Yankee newspaper that our policy does not please the people of the United States, and that his policy does.

I charge, Sir, that the policy supported by the Secretary of State is a Yankee policy, root and branch. It was conceived in the United States and brought to birth here in Ottawa, with the assistance of a Yankee expert from Washington who framed the National Policy under the fostering care of Sir Leonard Tilley. It has been kept going since without the assistance of a Yankee expert. In what way? By the brains of the Government? Not in the least, Mr. Speaker. By the brains of such men as the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Rosamond), the junior member for the city of Halifax (Mr. Stairs) and other members of this House, and other gentlemen out of this House, who compose the manufacturers' combine and dictate the policy of the Minister of Finance, and who boast about it afterwards in the papers, and who send us copies to let us know how big they feel about the position they occupy. This statement was first made by me on this floor, it has been repeated a dozen or fifteen times since, repeated with proof, and the Minister of Finance has not had the audacity to deny one word of it, nor will he yet do so. For we have the proof under the hand of the combines that they prepared the brief, that the Finance Minister thanked them for giving it to him, and that he carried it out.

It is a Yankee policy, carried out in a Yankee manner, and the results are becoming rapidly the same as in the United States—corruption in all branches of Administration, the building up of classes at the expense of the masses, the enrichment of the few at the expense of the many, and, ultimately, such a state of political degradation throughout the country that it will be very hard to induce people to look upon matters from any other point of view except that of the almighty dollar in their pocket.

Then, again, the Secretary of State said that the leader of the Opposition had given out at Winnipeg that if the Liberal party came into power he would make up the deficit by levying a tax on raw material. The Secretary of State knew very well that the leader of the Opposition did not say that; he knew that even the incorrect report which appeared at the time did not make him say that. As the Secretary of State read it, it was that the leader of the Opposition said there would be a difference in the method of dealing with the taxes on raw material and the necessaries of life. That is a very different story—a difference does not necessarily mean an increase.

It has always been our declared policy, and it is the policy on which we are going to vote, to reduce or remove duties on raw material and the necessaries of life. But is that the policy on the other side of the House? The Secretary of State says it is; he declares that the National Policy is a policy of free raw materials. I wonder that even an hon. gentleman of his wide experience, of his tea-meeting experience and otherwise, was able to make such a statement. What is iron? Is iron a raw material or not? Is iron not the basis of more than half the manufactures of the country, and where is it more highly taxed than in Canada to-day? The tax on iron is a tax on raw material, imposed by Sir Charles Tupper in 1887 for the purpose of building up a large and prosperous iron smelting industry. That tax on iron has utterly and despicably failed in building up that industry, and the Secretary of State has been the man to prove to the House that it has been an utter failure in that regard.

For what has the hon. gentleman told the House on this subject? He has declared that the tax on this valuable raw material has not been sufficient to induce the establishment of huge smelting works in Canada. He said that a smelting industry is now being worked up in Kingston, and he stated how much the building would cost, how many hands would be employed, and the value of the output. But did he dare to tell the House that it was going to be built in consequence of the National Policy? He said "where did they expect to get the money to construct their plant? Largely from bonuses granted by Sir Oliver Mowat." Is that not a confession of the utter failure of the Tupper tax, and the utter failure of the tax imposed by the present Minister of Finance to start smelting works? It appears that capitalists could not be induced to think of establishing such an industry until they had been granted a bonus by the Ontario Government. Even so, I am informed on very good authority that the whole scheme has collapsed, that smelting works are not going to be erected at Kingston. Whether or not such be the case, the Secretary of State says that capitalists would not invest their money without the bonus granted by Sir Oliver Mowat, and thus the National Policy is not the author of the promised iron industry at Kingston.

Mr. DENISON. He did not give them enough.

Mr. CASEY. It is a pity that Sir Oliver Mowat did not take pity on the despicable failure of the National Policy and give iron industries double or treble the amount he did to enable them to start. Of course, he should have done that, and then have given all the glory to the National Policy.

As we are talking of bonuses, has it been noticed how many places visited by the Secretary of State were giving large bonuses in order to encourage manufacturing industries? No doubt the House noticed the little passage at arms between the Secretary of State and the member for Huron (Mr. Macdonald) regarding industries at Wingham, where the industries were not very prosperous, whereupon the Secretary of State pointed him to the fact that he had voted for a bonus to some industries there to keep them going. I do not believe the Secretary of State saw the effect of that argument on his case. He has been proving to the House by voluminous statistics, and enormous expenditure of lung power, that in a great many towns in Ontario, manufacturing industries already in existence could not have been continued except for the fact that the people of those places had put their hands into their pockets and enabled them to survive in spite of the National Policy. Bonuses are being given sufficient to make up the loss sustained by the National Policy, and the Secretary of State is childish enough to use that as an argument in favour of that policy. I do not know that anything stronger can be said in regard to the hon. gentleman's speech than that.

The Secretary of State asked "are we to give up all hope of establishing an iron industry." I do not think we need do so. On one condition we may hope to have such an industry established, and that is to abolish that policy under which we have been trying to start for sixteen years and have failed. We remember the time when an iron industry was flourishing within four miles of this spot, and when its products were being sold as far off as India, during 1878; and yet it is so dead to-day that very few people know that the industry existed. Do away with so-called National Policy, which has made it impossible for the iron industry to exist, and we may have such an industry again established, but not till then.

But I will not discuss the hon. gentleman's speech any further. He has given us a quotation which shows that however inexperienced he may be in the marshalling of facts, he is an expert in the use of the boomerang, and as a man dealing largely with historical records in England, 400 years old, it was likely that he would use the weapon of the Australian savage rather than a modern arm of precision. He used a boomerang and the boomerang was this: "One smoke stack is worth more than a ten acre field full of men who can talk, and talk, and talk." I am glad he used that boomerang, because it is time, Sir, that we had less of these men who can talk, and talk, and talk, and more men who can do and act.

Mr. DENISON. Stop right now, then.

Mr. CASEY. My friend opposite thinks that I am throwing a boomerang also. I would point out that the long speeches have been very largely on the other side of the House. The speech of the Secretary of State, who has never done anything else but talk, occupied over three hours, I believe, and as I have not been speaking for more than half an hour I do not think that I need be afraid of the weapon in question.

When the Secretary of State was on his starring tour at St. Thomas, in a moment of weakness, he said something that was true and was sound political policy. He told us at St. Thomas frankly: that the system of collecting revenue in England was one which undoubtedly graded the burden of taxation according to the wealth of the persons who paid. True, he told us that it was not a scheme that was suited to Canada, but he admitted that the English system graduated the payment according to the wealth of the individual, and that I submit, Sir, is a very fair way of raising a revenue.

On that trip to which I have referred, he and his present leader, whom he bids fair to supplant very rapidly if he goes on doing all the talking for the other side of the House, tried to make us believe that they were the farmer's friends. They asserted that under their Administration, natural products of all kinds were being exported more largely and at greater profit than they used to be. I can show that the contrary is the case, and in order to do so I may have to refer to the Year-Book, which is looked upon as a campaign sheet of the Government; but if I can prove points against hon. gentlemen opposite out of their own campaign documents, I have no objection to doing so, and I will give the figures for what they are worth.

The Year-Book tells us that in the years of revenue tariff during the Mackenzie regime, the exports of agricultural products for these five years were as follows in round numbers:—

1874	$ 19,590,000
1875	17,258,000
1876	21,139,000
1877	14,688,000
1878	18,008,000

Total 90,683,000

Average, $18,136,000.

In five representative years of the National Policy they were:

1887	$ 18,826,000
1888	15,436,000
1889	13,414,000
1890	11,908,000
1891	13,666,000

Total 73,250,000

Average, $14,650,000.

Or $5,486,000 a year less during the five years of high and mature protection than they were during those so-called hard years of revenue tariff when the Liberal Government was in power. Notwithstanding, that the farming population of the country had increased in that time about 500,000, yet the export of agricultural products had decreased by about three millions and a half a year as compared with the years of a Liberal Administration in Canada.

Let us take the products of the forest and compare them in the same way. The products of the forest from 1873 to 1877 inclusive, averaged $7,700,000 a year, and during the five years, from 1885 to 1889, when high protection was in force, these products of the forest averaged $4,742,000 a year, or $2,958,000 less than they had been under a revenue tariff. The particulars are as follows:—

1874	7,417,000
1875	8,073,000
1876	6,030,000
1877	8,242,000

Total 38,345,000

Average, $7,669,000.

1886	4,926,000
1887	3,574,000
1888	5,091,000
1889	5,189,000

Total 23,767,000

Average, $4,742,000.

Let us look at the position of the farmer from another point of view. Let us consider the diversion of population from the farms to the cities. In 1871, the rural population was 2,949,000, and the city population 686,000. In 1881, the rural population was 3,312,000, and the city population was 912,000. The rural population had increased in these ten years 363,000, and the city population 226,000. In 1891, the country population had only grown to 3,443,000, while the city population had grown to 1,390,000. In other words, the country population had only increased 131,000, while the city population has increased 478,000. This is the state of things which the Minister of Finance declares to be good for the farmer. He says that every man who leaves a farm and goes to the city increases the home market, and thereby makes prices better, and the demand larger for the products of those who are left behind. He says the desolation and depopulation of the farms in the interest of the cities is a sign of prosperity for the farmer. Now, we will ask him whether he considers in the same way that the death of the small manufactories for the advantage of the large ones is a sign of prosperity? If he will maintain that, he may, perhaps, maintain the other; but if the matter is left to the average farmer, I think he will agree with me that depopulation is a sign of distress and ruin—that people would not leave the farms and go into the cities if it had not ceased to pay to be a farmer. We find that while the farming population has only increased 131,000 in the last ten years, the acreage has very largely increased, showing that the farms are being depopulated for the benefit of the cities. I know it is so in the district where I live. Many farms which, in 1878, were owned by prosperous farmers are now held by loan companies or other mortgagees, who are waiting for an opportunity to sell them at some figure which will satisfy the mortgage.

I have spoken of the exports of agricultural produce. I did not refer to the exports of animals and their products. These have, undoubtedly, increased largely during this time, but I do not think the most blinded friend of protection will pretend that a policy which increases the cost of feeding cattle will increase the profit of the farmer who feeds and exports them—that a policy which taxes some kinds of grain which are grown more cheaply in the States than here, will assist the farmer who wants to feed cattle for the British market, or that there is anything at all in the National Policy which tends to increase the exports of animals and their products, or to cheapen their production.

Even the exports of manufactures do not flourish under the National Policy. You would think that here, if anywhere, the beauties of the National Policy would show forth; but if we go back to 1873, I find that in that year we exported $24,460,000; in 1874, $22,816,000; and in 1875, $20,025,000, an average of $22,700,000 worth of manufactures for the three years under the revenue tariff, while in 1885, 1886, and 1887, under the National Policy we exported only $19,256,000, $18,959,000, and $19,999,000, respectively, an average of $19,403,000, something over $3,000,000 a year less in those three years of protection than we did in the three years under a revenue tariff. I must admit that these amounts include what would not, legitimately be called manufactures, such as sawn lumber; but as these are included in both periods, the comparison is fair, and the fault of classification is with the Government campaign sheet and not mine.

Let us look at some other statistics in this wonderful Year-Book. We find that the average protection afforded to the farmer on food and animals, which includes breadstuffs, and animals and their products, in the years 1877-78, was 27½ per cent, while in the year 1892-93 the protection afforded by the National Policy, which is said to be so good for the farmer, was only 21½ per cent. These are startling figures, but they are from the Year-Book, and, therefore, the Government must admit their truth. As a matter of fact, in the last two years, the farmer has had 6 per cent less protection on breadstuffs and animals than he had in 1878. Now, hon. gentlemen tell us from day to day that if we had the tariff of 1878, we would be swamped with Yankee products, such as Yankee beef, Yankee pigs, and that sort of thing. Sir, the tariff hog is the worst import we have ever had from the United States, and it would take something more than a duty to keep him out.

Taking the whole course of the duties since that time, as classified in the Year-Book, the duty on crude articles, that is, on raw materials, has grown 9 per cent since 1878. Yet the hon. Secretary of State said to-day that the National Policy is a policy of free raw materials. Partly manufactured articles, which enter into the production of other manufactures, are taxed 10 per cent more than they were under Liberal Administration. Articles manufactured ready for use are also taxed 10 per cent higher; and luxuries are taxed only 13 per cent higher. That is not all, Sir. The percentage of dutiable goods has increased by a very considerable figure.

I find also in the same Year-Book some figures about imports from Great Britain and the United States which may be useful here as showing that the present tariff is hostile to trade with the mother country, and favourable to trade with the United States. The figures are for periods of five years each:

IMPORTS FROM GREAT BRITAIN.

1873-77	272,222,000
1878-82	197,017,000
1883-87	222,440,000
1888-92	208,402,000

So that in the last five years they were $15,000,000 less than they were in the first five years of confederation. Now, turn to the other side, and look at our imports from the United States:

Mr. CASEY.

IMPORTS FROM THE UNITED STATES.

1868-72	$ 141,295,000
1873-77	250,207,000
1878-82	206,597,000
1883-87	243,641,000

So that they were $117,000,000 more in the last five years than they were in the first decade after confederation, while our imports from Great Britain were $15,000,000 less. This tariff in its actual operation is hostile to trade with England, and favourable to trade with the United States.

I want to call your attention to another comparative view of our export and import trade. I contend, and I think it cannot be successfully combated, that the measure of our profits on foreign trade is the excess of our exports over our imports. For many years the protectionists used to say that the measure of our prosperity was the excess of exports over imports, but I think no intelligent man now will pretend to adhere to that exploded theory. It is quite clear that what we export buys what we import. All trade is ultimately barter. The only means we have of obtaining imports is by the sale of our exports. Therefore, we buy what we import with what we export, and if our imports are of greater value, the difference represents our profit. And so I hold that the increase of imports over exports in any year shows what we have made in that year's trade. I will give the exports, in the first place, per head of the population, for that is the proper way to look at it. Our exports may be larger now to a certain extent than they were in some series of years—larger in the gross, and yet much less per head, and I will give you some tables to show what they have been per head. Our total trade per head was as follows:—

In—
1872	$53 74
1873	59 87
1874	56 88
1875	51 70
1876	44 10

Take next the figures per head, beginning with 1885, ten years after the close of the revenue tariff period:

In—
1885	$43 68
1886	41 35
1887	43 67
1889	43 16

In other words, the average export per head in the five years of a low revenue tariff was $53.25, while in the five years of high tariff it was only $42.94 per head. The beneficent operation of the National Policy has reduced our total trade by something over $10 a head in that time; and yet the Minister of Finance has been going all over Ontario comparing individual years—1879 with 1893, for example—and saying that because our total trade in 1893 was greater than it was in 1879, we are therefore more prosperous.

I have shown that in the later years of the National Policy the profits on our local trade was $10 per head less, or in the neighbourhood of $50,000,000 a year less for the whole of Canada than it would have been if the rate under a low tariff had been maintained. Now let us take the exports and imports separately and see what our profits were :

In—	Imports.	Exports.
1873	$ 34 89	$ 24 48
1874	33 52	23 36
1875	31 66	20 04
1876	23 60	20 50
1877	24 75	18 90

Showing a difference of $44.52, or an average per year of $7.42. For the first three years the average gain per head was $10, and the average profit, therefore, to the whole population of Canada was over $40,000,000. For the whole of that period, the average profit per head on our foreign trade was $7.42. For the years from 1879 to 1893, the corresponding period under protection we find that the average profit per head was only $3.93. So that, comparing the years from 1879 to 1893, under protection, with 1873 to 1878, under a revenue tariff, you find a difference of about $4 per head, in our national profit on our foreign trade, or $20,000,000 on our present population, to the debit of the National Policy.

Next, instead of taking figures per head, let me give you a few lump sums. From 1872 to 1875 we exported to the extent of $288,719,000, and imported to the value of $482,245,000, making a profit during those three years of $193,526,000 on our foreign trade. In 1880 to 1883, the earlier years of protection, we exported $338,682,000 worth, and imported to the value of $389,178,000, showing only a profit of $50,496,000. So that we lost by the National Policy, in those three years the enormous sum of over $140,000,000. Now, the absolute volume of our total trade, without regard to population, was much larger in some years under a revenue tariff than it has been for many years under the National Policy. In the three years from 1872 to 1874, our total trade was $635,366,000, or an average of $212,183,000 per year. From 1885 to 1887, inclusive, our total trade was only $590,262,000, or an average of $196,754,000. In other words, it was 15½ millions less each year from 1885 to 1887 than in the early years from 1872 to 1874, and yet the Finance Minister has been boasting on platforms all over Ontario that the National Policy has increased the volume of our total trade. This is a statement at variance with the facts, and which we may attribute to his ignorance, since we cannot attribute it to any intention to deceive.

Let us come to the question of farm products, which was referred to by the hon. member for L'Assomption a little while ago. Let us take up what are known as hog products—bacon, hams, pork and lard. We find that we exported more of these articles in 1874—twenty-one years ago—than we have any year since. We exported $2,120,770 worth in 1874, and the highest year since was 1893, when the export amounted to about $1,000 less. The total for the years 1874 to 1877 was $5,904,848, and from 1888 to 1893, $2,381,709. In other words, with an interval of nearly twenty years between, there was a reduction of 3½ million dollars in three years export of hog products. Yet the Minister of Finance, the Secretary of State and the hon. member for L'Assomption, and the gentlemen who collaborated with him in making his speech, all tell us that the National Policy is doing great things for the Canadian hog. Yet, the loss in that period, after fourteen years of the National Policy, was $3,500,000 for the whole period, or $861,000 a year.

The census figures have been so fully dealt with that I will spare the Houses that subject.

Now, my hon. friend the Finance Minister began his speech by attempting to show how the deficit occurred. I am only going to deal with the beginning of his speech, not to go all through it. He said the deficit occurred owing to lack of money. That is a statement that we could accept. I think somebody must have told him that. But when he began to inquire how this lack of money occurred he wandered into statements and arguments that were more doubtful. He said :

It will be noted that the decrease was pretty generally spread over the list of imported articles, the increases being not nearly so extensive in their scope.

Now, as a matter of fact, the important decreases in the customs revenue were in a few lines as the hon. gentleman gave them himself. Here are his own figures showing items of loss of revenue on imports :

Iron and steel and manufactures thereof	$421,683
Woollen manufactures	432,515
Cotton	156,775
Coal and coke.....	147,860

Total.....$1,158,833

Out of a total of $1,793,915, which he said was the decrease in the customs revenue for the year. In other words, two-thirds of the total loss in revenue occurred in these four articles, the production of which in Canada is of the nature of a monopoly. This shows a reduction in revenue, but it does not show a reduction in taxation upon these articles by any means. It shows that the monopoly sought to be enforced under the protective system was taking effect more extensively from year to year ; in other words that the people of Canada, instead of being taxed on these articles to supply the treasury as they used to be when they imported them, were taxed for the benefit of the monopolists. It was not a reduction but a diversion of taxation.

Then the hon. gentleman went on to argue that if the sugar tax as it stood in 1890-91 had been kept on, we should have received $4,900,000 on that account on the 310,000,000 pounds imported, and that we should not have had any deficit. But, Sir, in the first place, the treasury did not lose the total amount of taxation taken off sugar, because the hon. gentleman put on other taxes which he said at the time he anticipated would nearly counterbalance his loss on sugar, and they did counterbalance that loss to a great extent. But, though they were not getting any revenue from sugar the people were paying about $1,800,000 yearly to the sugar barons—to the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs), who is connected with this industry, and to the Redpaths and Drummonds, of Montreal, and a few other sugar barons. This was paid really as taxation, but the revenue arising from that taxation, did not go into the treasury. But what is the Government now doing? When the deficit has gone beyond their control they have to return to the tax on raw sugar which they took off in 1890, and they have levied the tax in such a way that while it will cost the people over $3,500,000, only $1,550,000 will go into the treasury. They have been compelled to adopt the policy of a revenue tariff, but they have done it in such a way as not to diminish but rather to increase the tribute paid by the country to the manufacturers; for, the increased tax on sugar being about $1.14 a hundred as against 64 cents a hundred, which it has been, will utterly exclude foreign sugar and leave the sugar monopoly very much firmer than it was before.

Now, Sir, if the hon. gentleman's theory was sound, to the effect that we lose nothing on account of the deficit, because we have $4,900,000 in pocket, which we have saved on the sugar taxes, the interest on which amount would pay the interest on the deficit, why does he not carry it further? Why not knock off a few more taxes? Let us have a chronic deficit of $10,000,000 a year and tell the people: "Never mind; you have a deficit of $10,000,000, but you have the money in your pockets, and the interest on that will pay the interest on the deficit. Let us have a deficit of the whole amount of the necessary revenue. The money will be in the people's pockets. For every dollar that the people do not pay in they will have a dollar left with them." But this is not the policy the hon. gentleman has been pursuing. He is levying duties which take the money from the people without putting it into the public treasury, and then, to meet the absolute necessities of the revenue he is putting on revenue taxes such as this tax on raw sugar. Then again, Sir, there is a fallacy in the hon. gentleman's argument which he has not thought of. He imagines that the people would have gone on importing as much sugar even though these duties had not been taken off. This is not a fact, but it is a sample of the hon. gentleman's reasoning.

I wish to call attention also to the mistakes in a table which the hon. gentleman read to the House, and I will ask the House to inquire whether the other statements he made may not be as delusive as this one. He stated that the exports from 1874 to 1879 fell off $18,000,000. Now, the hon. gentleman may possibly be right, but the Year-Book, which he will not deny is an authority, said that the exports fell off only $14,000,000. So that the hon. gentleman and the Year-Book are at variance to the extent of $4,000,000. I confess that I am rather surprised that the hon. gentleman should be so moderate in his error. Then he says that the imports during the same time fell off $46,000,000. But the Year-Book says that they fell off only $36,000,000. In this particular he has gone $10,000,000 beyond the Year-Book. I hope he will be able to settle this with the Year-Book and with his conscience.

Again, the fact has been alluded to by more than one speaker, that gentlemen on the other side are anti-English in all their speeches, and in all their arguments they have been trying to prove that England has gone to the dogs. They have been shouting, "Look at England; she is the only free trade country in the world. Why has she not had the sense to fall into line with every other country, and be protectionist?" I say, because it has paid England not to be protectionist. It has paid England to be a free trade country, to become the entrepot, the storehouse, the warehouse, the workshop, the great market of all the world. Whoever has anything to export, sends it to England. Whoever wants to buy anything goes to England to get it, and that is purely in consequence of the fact that England is a free trade country.

The Secretary of State has been going around the country telling us that it was because England for four hundred years was a protectionist country. Tell that to the marines, but not to the marine service of England, not to the marine service of the world. They know why England has gone on by leaps and bounds in prosperity. They know why the United States, in its foreign trade, has fallen behind; they know why Canada is falling behind.

Let us compare the general result. Free trade England has a Minister of Finance. He may not be as able as the Minister of Finance we have here. Sir William Harcourt may not be able to rank with the Minister of Finance of Canada, but he has one advantage over him at all events, he has been able to produce a surplus this year, while the Minister of Finance of Canada has been able to produce already a highly creditable deficit. Why is that? For the simple reason that protective taxes do not yield revenue, and it has required this severe lesson to drum that fact into the head of the Minister of Finance and compel him to resort to a revenue tax again when money was absolutely required. Revenue taxes do yield a large revenue year after year, which you can build upon, and direct your expenditure accordingly. Protective taxes do not yield a revenue, they are not meant to. They are only meant to yield a revenue to the monopolists, not to the country, and they carry out their purpose admirably. Therefore, while free trade England has a surplus, protectionist Canada has a deficit, protectionist France has a deficit, protectionist Germany has a deficit and in the protectionist United States, things are looking extremely blue indeed, in regard to their finances, although I have not at hand the figures to show how their usual surplus is decreasing from year to year.

Now, Sir, I will ask the House, late as it is, to listen to a few comparative figures as to the growth and prosperity of England while she has been under free trade. They say: Look at that free trade country. I, too, say: Look at her, and I am willing to allow the principle of free trade to be judged by the result. Of course I am speaking of England. Nobody is proposing to introduce into Canada free trade in the full English sense. Let me give some figures from Mulhall, the well known statistician. The population in England, in 50 years, has grown 42 per cent, but her wealth has grown 124 per cent, three times as fast as her population. Her trade has grown 472 per cent, ten times as fast as her population. Her shipping has grown 583 per cent, more than eleven times as fast as her population. Her manufacturers of woven things of all kinds, have grown 206 per cent, or five times as fast as her population. Her hardware trade has grown 412 per cent, ten times as fast as her population. Her mining has increased 276 per cent, more than six times as fast as her population. Her use of steam power has grown 1,040 per cent, as against 42 per cent of increase of population. Her banking has grown 572 per cent, and her revenue 73 per cent.

Agriculture alone, of all the interests in England, although it prospered for many years after free trade, has for the last few years, been slack; and this is one of the points that is most relied upon by our opponents as showing that free trade is not always good for the agriculturist. Now, Sir, I say it is not free trade that has reduced the position of the agriculturists of England for the last two years. It is the vast development of agricultural production all the world over, a cause that has operated in Canada, and the States, and Germany, and France, and everywhere else as well as in England. But in addition to that, there is a special cause that has been operating in England to keep down the agriculturist, and that is the monopoly in land enjoyed by the landlords. Rents have been fixed in England in the days when farm produce was high; those same rents are being paid to-day when farm produce is low, and the result is that until those rents have been modified to suit the changed condition of the agriculturist in England, that interest cannot be prosperous. It will startle Canadian farmers to know that in 1873, as shown by the report of a commission, the average rental of land in England was £3 per acre, 19s. in Scotland, and 13s. in Ireland; in other words, from $3 to about $15 per acre in the three Kingdoms, $15 in England, nearly $5 in Scotland, and over $3 in Ireland. Many of those leases are still existing. It would startle the Canadian farmer, who complains of low prices, to know how his English competitor is held down by that land charge, and that land charge has produced a monopoly in land, which, however, is no more galling than the monopoly of manufactured produce under which the Canadian farmer suffers.

Now, to show that England is not shut out of foreign markets, as is claimed by people on the other side, and is not compelled to force her trade at the point of the bayonet on unwilling savages, I will call your attention to the fact that she does not force it on her own colonies. During the last fifty years England's trade with her colonies only grew five times; her trade with the United States grew over five times; her trade with France over nine times; her trade with Germany over ten times, and her miscellaneous trade grew more than five and a half times. The aggregate trade of Britain with the world was $90 per head in the last year of which we have statistics; the trade of France was $45 per head; the trade of Germany, $35 per head; and the trade of the United States only $25 per head. The whole trade of Great Britain and her colonies is about one-third of the total trade of the world. That does not look as if England's trade was being seriously menaced or much injured by the competition of protected countries. The shipping trade of England has gone on increasing largely in comparison with that of other countries. In 1840, the proportion of British shipping entered in British ports was 68 per cent of the whole; in 1885, it was 73 per cent of the whole.

I will pass over the figures of the different kinds of textiles, but I wish to give you the figures of bank capital and deposits, which are a fair subject of comparison, because the savings banks in England are really for the working people, and their progress really shows the increased prosperity of that class. There were 10,000,000 depositors in England in 1887, who had $800,000,000 at their credit, or $80 per head. That shows that the ordinary depositor there is the workingman. The savings bank deposits have grown fourteen times faster than the population, under free trade in Great Britain, which shows that the average depositor has grown fourteen times richer than he was fifty years ago. How does that compare with the United States and with other protected countries?

The bank capital and deposits in England, in fifty years, have grown over 300 per cent; on the continent they have grown 312 per cent, and in the United States, only 250 per cent. Hon. gentlemen opposite have boasted of the progress of the United States in many directions. Mulhall, from whom I quote all these figures and whose accuracy has never been questioned, says "the only point on which the United States has surpassed England is in regard to the increment of wealth, caused in a great measure by the enhanced value of western lands." The wealth of the United States grew in thirty years 89 per cent, as against 38 per cent in Great Britain. The trade of Great Britain, however, increased 200, as against 50 per cent in the United States; steam power increased in England 144 per cent as compared with 33 per cent in the United States; banking increased 130 per cent in Great Britain, compared with a decrease of nearly 5 per cent in the United States. That does not look as if the old country was going to the dogs very badly.

I have a large number of other figures, which would be useful and instructive though perhaps not interesting at this hour of the morning, and I pass them over; but I want to urge on the House in conclusion some words of wisdom from an hon. member to whom we always listen with amusement and interest, I refer to the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), an hon. gentleman who is gradually making for himself a name in poetry as well as in romance, and who is rapidly earning for himself the title of the Walt Whitman of the Prairies. That hon. gentleman, though a loyal supporter of the Government, has sometimes in a moment of frankness spoken of the Administration and its methods, both on the floor of this House and elsewhere, the last occasion being at the late meeting of the Royal Society in Ottawa, and I extract a gem or two from a poem read by the hon. gentleman before that distinguished society. He cries:

Let the wolf howl,
Look to the west,
And note the giant's strides;

We have looked to the west and have even watched the strides of the giant. We have taken his advice in this respect. We have heard the wolf of national and individual poverty howling at our doors, and when we hear him howl again, we will look to the giant of Assiniboia and take courage and mark his stride. Also note what he further said about the political management of Canada:

Mr. CASEY.

Then turn from feasts of hell,
From mumbling bones of faction,
And sweep back to obscure night
The bat-like lives,
Whose wings are made in dark corruption's loom.

Bestial mediocrities,
Whose eyes blear at the light,
And through the sacred edifice of our hopes,
Wherein they snugly build,
Hold erring flight,
And mock the spirit of the mighty fane,
And stain with ordure
The altar-cloth of Liberty.

It is a great shame to allow bestial mediocrities to stain the alter cloth of liberty in that way. I agree with the giant of Assiniboia that it is time for us to scare them away. He proceeds:

O, Canada! My country!
What is there thou mightst not do
If truth and honour guide thy steps?

I admit it. If truth and honour guided our steps, what a country this would be? No one would have to speak of blue ruin then. He continues:

Arise! To-day, thy need is men,
Men full of all lore,
And master of that too,
Men of brain, and heart, and will,
Men who scorn base lucre's lures;

Men who will not look at boodle or touch it with a ten foot pole, who will not listen to the suggestion of the slightest bribe—these are the men we want. He goes on:

Men of such breed, where are they?
Factions which keep thy pocket lean,
And torture fact—

This was prophetic of the speech of the Secretary of State:

And blind thine eyes to truth,
Repress the wise,
But many a one, true as the great of old,
Is thine.

We thank him for the information. We thank him for the assurance, but we want to ask him one question—who are the other men?

Awake! Thou drowsing child of destiny,
Awake! Escape from clinging phantasms,
Soar free from shams and shibboleths,
To find thy kingly men—thy greatest need,
Thy first of duties;
To hear, and harken to the voice of truth.

Mr. Speaker, I can only hope that the House and the country will re-echo these wild warblings of the Walt Whitman of the prairies.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 100) to incorporate the Dominion Trusts Company.—(Mr. Taylor.)

Bill (No. 101) to incorporate the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Church of England in Canada.—(Mr. Taylor.)

SUPERANNUATION ACT.

Mr. FOSTER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 102) to amend the Superannuation Act. He said: The Bill is a short one.

It proposes to amend the Superannuation Act in two or three particulars, the principal of which I will give. The first section will give power to the Governor General in Council, at any time, on the recommendation of the Treasury Board, to declare that the Act shall not apply to any class of officers, clerks, employees or servants herein above designated, and thereafter the Act shall not apply to any appointments from that date. This gives the Governor General in Council, on the report of the Treasury Board, power to decrease the classes to which it may be applied but not to increase. Then the next principal amendment is in the third section. The limit in that section is ten years. After a person has served ten years, superannuation may apply. It is proposed to raise the limit from ten to fifteen years. Under the law as it now is, if a clerk has not been in service ten years, he may be given a retiring gratuity in proportion to the years of his service. The law is not changed in regard to that, except that the number of years will be raised from ten to fifteen. The next principal amendment is in the matter of abatement. So far as all who belong to the Civil Service are concerned, from and after the time of the passing of this measure, the abatement will be made equivalent to the abatement in the Civil Service Superannuation Act, number two, so called, which was passed two or three years ago, thus putting all civil servants upon the same basis, so far as abatements are concerned. The House will remember that in discussing the Superannuation Act, number two, the abatement which was then adopted for all who entered after that date was considered sufficient to carry the burden of superannuation, with the arrangement which was made that the sums of money remaining from time to time in the hands of the Government should be added to by a rate of interest at 6 per cent.

Mr. LAURIER. While I do not desire at this moment to enter upon any discussion of this Bill, I must at once say to the hon gentleman that the main feature of the Bill is one which I think ought not to commend itself in any way to the approval of this House. If I understood the hon. gentleman aright, the main feature of the Bill is to give the Governor in Council the power to apply the Act or to prevent it from applying to a certain class of civil servants, a class which he has not defined at all or even mentioned. I must say to the hon. gentleman that I view this departure from the existing law with all the more suspicion because I hold that, as a rule, the Governor in Council should not be clothed with any power that at present appertains to Parliament, unless very grave reasons are shown for the change; and in this particular instance the hon. gentleman has abstained altogether from giving any reason whatever why there should be such a departure from the existing law. The hon. gentleman failed to give one single reason, even the shadow of a reason, why the existing law should be amended or the present system departed from in this particular. He stated simply that this was the wish of the Government but no more. I look upon the principle of this Bill as unsound, and I at once challenge the opinion of hon. members that the Bill cannot be looked upon with favour unless better reasons shall be given on the second reading than have been given to-day.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is quite clear that the Finance Minister has come to the conclusion that, owing to the agitation which has been kept up on this side of the House in opposition to the objectionable manner in which the superannuation system has been managed by hon. gentlemen opposite, and owing to the strong expressions of public opinion throughout the country as to the abuses of that Act, something must be done if possible. He has introduced the Bill he has now brought before the House so as, if possible, to forestall the measure I already have on the Order paper affecting the superannuation Act. Had it not been for the manner in which the Government have abused the superannuation system as originally established, the public feeling of bitterness and opposition to the Act which has arisen would not have existed in the country to-day. The Act has been made to apply in many instances to people who are now travelling around the cities and towns of this Dominion and drawing large sums of public money and who have been removed from the Civil Service not because of incapacity or inability to perform their duties or because of age, but because their positions were wanted for other parties, possibly the relatives of Ministers. The people have become indignant at these abuses. The hon. gentleman wants to lengthen the minimum period of service, before superannuation can take place, from ten to fifteen years. I would like to know if he has eliminated the provision that enables the Governor in Council to add years to the time of service, a principle in the Act which has already been so flagrantly abused. Under the Act, as the hon. gentleman proposes, a man cannot be superannuated until he has served fifteen years. But under the old Act one could not be superannuated unless he had served ten years. But the hon. gentleman knows that there are dozens of men who have been superannuated who never served ten years, who, in some cases only served seven years. The Government took advantage of the provision giving them power to add years to the time of service, in order to bring some of these parties under the operation of the Act. We will take the opportunity to point out the weak features and objectionable peculiarities of the Bill the Finance Minister has introduced. And I want to tell the hon. gentleman here and now that no half-way measures in dealing with this question will meet the public sentiment as it is at this moment. The people of this country have set their teeth in determination that the system of superannuation shall be wiped out utterly; they are not going any longer to permit the existence of a system under which 551 men are now on the superannuated list drawing $263,000 a year, a clear annual loss to the people of $200,000. And the Finance Minister might as well recognize that at once and agree to the absolute abandonment of the system, leaving the civil servants to provide for themselves. Now, Sir, the Finance Minister overloaded a return I asked for on this question in order, I have no doubt, to delay the second reading of my Bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Order.

Mr. McMULLEN. I want now to intimate to the Finance Minister that if he wants to keep faith with the House on that question he will hasten the submission of that return, so that we may proceed intelligently to the discussion of the whole matter, when we reach the second reading of that Bill. I want him therefore to see that that return is laid upon the Table of the House before he moves the second reading of his own Bill, for we shall not be in a position to deal intelligently with the superannuation system unless we have the operations of the Act laid before us in such shape that we can judge how it has been applied during the twenty years it has been in force. Had the Government, in the first place permitted the continuation of the deductions from the salaries of civil servants for the benefit of the superannuation fund, there would have been a very respectable sum to the credit of the system. But, Sir Leonard Tilley, in his desire, no doubt, to favour the Civil Service, reduced these deductions by one-half in 1873. And the result is that abuses have been multiplied down to the present time and the fund has run behind, until the people of this Dominion have been called upon to submit to a clear loss of $240,000, which sum has been sacrificed under the operation of this system. The facts, no doubt, will be shown when the return comes down, and I again would say to the Finance Minister that, in justice to the House, it is right and proper that that return should be laid upon the Table before he moves the second reading of his Bill, in order to enable every member of the House to form a clear, intelligent opinion with regard to the application of the Act in the past and with regard to the propriety of this House giving its sanction to the Bill the hon. gentleman has introduced.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it would be as well if the Minister of Finance should explain to us what he means by this remarkable clause giving the Governor in Council power to exempt certain classes.

There is no doubt, as my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Laurier) pointed out, that it is an invidious power, and a power that the House should not place in the hands of any other body. Nor is this a case in which by any possibility there can be urgency. I cannot understand, therefore, why the hon. gentleman proposes this course. If the Government want to make a rigid rule in this matter, I can see very good reasons indeed for doing what I have many a time and oft contended was the proper course to be pursued with respect to the Civil Service; namely, divide them into two classes, one composed of men of superior qualifications and ability as to whom it should be a question whether superannuation or pension should be granted, and the other composed of writers, copyists and others making up the larger portion of those employed by us who do merely clerical work. No bank I have heard of would pay for the work done in our departments anything the amounts the Government of Canada are now paying. Within the last fourteen or fifteen years the expenditure for civil government has been as nearly as possible doubled—quite doubled, if you take into account the increase in superannuation allowance. But the point I would like to hear discussed by the Finance Minister—and it is one that can well be stated on the first reading of the Bill so that we might have full opportunity to consider it—is his reason, if he has any, for proposing to give power to the Governor in Council to select a certain class, and what possible reason there can be for not coming down to the House and the Parliament generally with a well defined scheme under which this class should be exempted from the provisions of the Act.

Mr. FOSTER. I may say to my hon. friend that the principle involved in that clause is already, to a certain extent, embodied in the Act now on the statute-book, giving certain powers to the Governor General in Council in the way of interpreting it, and deciding to what classes it belongs. The idea cannot be expressed any more simply and plainly than it was, I think, when I introduced the Bill. The object is that if, at any time, upon examination of the services, there be any classes of employees to which it is thought the superannuation system thereafter should not be applied, the Government shall have power to diminish the extent of the application of the superannuation so far as that class is concerned. I shall be prepared, when we come to the second reading, to give to the House, probably much more definitely than I can now, the information on this and all other questions which my hon. friends so much desire. With reference to the return spoken of by my hon. friend opposite, I do not suppose he meant to threaten us with dire penalties if the return is not down. All I can say is that I have two clerks at it all the time, and it is being pushed forward with all possible speed, except on Sundays and the darkest part of the night. It will be brought down as soon as possible.

Mr. LAURIER. I have no doubt the Government is putting on all their speed, but their speed is very slow.

Mr. FOSTER. We have gone all very well the last fifteen years.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CONFERRING IMPERIAL HONOURS ON CANADIANS.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Whether His Excellency the Governor in Council makes any recommendations to the Imperial Government with respect to the conferring of Imperial honours on Canadians? If not, do such recommendations emanate from His Excellency, personally?

Mr. FOSTER. In answer to the hon. gentleman, I may say that some years ago Parliament anticipated some such request as this for information, and made provision for it in that it supplied members of Parliament with copies of Parliamentary Government in the Colonies, on pages 314 and 315 of which will be found Lord Elgin's despatch to the Colonial Secretary, then the Duke of Newcastle, which will give to the hon. gentleman full information. I hope it will be very helpful to him in the question which he has entered.

Mr. LAURIER. I would remind the hon. gentleman that Lord Elgin laid down many rules which have been discarded by this Government many times over.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that, however, has not been discarded. I imagine the Imperial Government stands by the constitutional usage in the bestowal of its honours.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The Government has not answered my question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. There can be no discussion upon a question after it has been put. The Government may answer it or not, as they choose.

Mr. CASEY. Do you rule that a question can be answered or not, just as the Government choose?

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that is the rule, the Government may refuse to answer if they choose. At all events, I am quite clear upon the point that there can be no discussion upon the question.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I desire to ask your ruling upon one point: Whether it is within the province of a member of this Parliament, as it is of the Imperial Parliament, to ask supplementary questions directly involved in, or arising out of, the main question submitted on the paper? That is the usual practice, and it is carried on very extensively in England, and is necessary to the proper discharge of their duties by members of Parliament; and if you rule in my favour, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman the supplementary question as to whether there was a despatch or not.

Mr. FOSTER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Those questions are excluded out by the rules; they are supplementary questions.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The practice is constant.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is entirely a matter of consent.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will invite the Speaker's ruling on the point, and if he decides in my favour, I will put the supplementary question as to whether there is or is not a despatch emanating from the Home Office?

Mr. SPEAKER. That is not a matter that comes under the point of order.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I propose to ask the supplementary question.

Mr. SPEAKER. What I think the hon. member ought first to do is to ascertain whether it would be in order to put that question or not. The question ought first to be determined by the Chair as to whether a supplementary question can be put.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I place myself entirely in your hands on that question, and I ask your ruling upon it.

Mr. SPEAKER. The rule in our House is this:

Questions may be put to Ministers of the Crown relating to public affairs, and to other members relating to any Bill, motion or other public matter connected with the business of the House, in which such members may be concerned; but in putting any such question, no argument or opinion is to be offered, nor any facts stated, except so far as may be necessary to explain the same. And, in answering any such question, a member is not to debate the matter to which the same refers.

On the same point, Mr. Bourinot lays down this rule:

The answer to a question should be brief and distinct, and limited to such explanations as are absolutely necessary to make the reply intelligible, but some latitude is allowed the Ministers of the Crown, whenever they may find it necessary to extend their remarks with the view of clearly explaining the matter in question. When the answer to a question has been given, it is irregular to comment upon it, or upon the subject thereby introduced to the House; the necessary consequence of which would be to engage the House in a debate when there was no question before it at all.

I may say with reference to the ruling asked for by the hon. member for Queen's, that I think when a question has been put and the Government has either answered or declined to answer it, that should end the whole matter with reference to that particular question.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to place this presentation of the case before you with reference to the point of order. The Government have neither given an answer to the question nor declined to give an answer. It is the custom in England, if a question is asked, for the Government to answer that question or decline to answer it. On grounds of public policy, or because the answer of the Government is likely to embarrass it in any way, or to disclose facts that it is necessary to conceal, the Government is warranted in declining on that ground to answer the question. But in this case the Government have treated the question with contempt.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to say—

Mr. SPEAKER. Of course the hon. gentleman as an old parliamentarian is aware that he cannot go on discussing the question when a point of order has been raised.

Mr. CHARLTON. I was not permitted to finish my statement. I wish to speak to the point of order. My point of order is this: A question has been put to the Government by the hon. member for East Grey; that question has not been answered by the Government; the Government have not declined to answer it; the statement made by the Government was an evasion of the question. That is my point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. Of course there may be two opinions as to whether a question has been answered or not. It may be that the answer is not a satisfactory one to the hon. member who asked it; other hon. members may think it is a satisfactory answer. Thus there may be a difference of opinion, but it is not the part of the hon. member who asks the question to say that the answer given is not a sufficient one. What was the question asked:

Whether His Excellency the Governor in Council makes any recommendations to the Imperial Government with respect to the conferring of Imperial honours on Canadians? If not, do such recommendations emanate from His Excellency personally?

I venture to say that my hon. friend has not read the citation which I gave, and if he will read that citation he will find it is an explicit answer to the question.

Mr. LAURIER. No.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I read that before you were born.

Mr. SPEAKER. Whether the Finance Minister has given a satisfactory or an explicit answer to the question it is not for me to determine. Under our rules the Chair has no power to go further than the rules indicate, that is to say, when a question is put the Government answers as it seems to them fit, and, as I have already stated, under our rules no debate can take place.

CUSTOMS VALUATIONS.

Mr. CASEY asked, (a.) What are the names of all persons, not members of the Civil Service, appointed as agents by the Government, or the Department of Customs, to collect information as to the classification, or value for duty of various classes of merchandise, or consulted by the Government or department, as experts in regard to such classification or value? (b.) What class, or classes, of merchandise does each deal with? (c.) In what country, or countries, does each act? (d.) What pay, or allowance, does each receive? (e.) What was the occupation of each at the time of appointment or consultation? (f.) Which, if any, continue to do business as manufacturers of the same classes of merchandise in regard to which they collect information, or are consulted, or of similar merchandise, or as the agents of such manufacturers? (g.) Are all collectors notified of the classifications and valuations fixed by the Government on the basis of such information or advice, as soon as they are decided on, so that such valuations may be uniform throughout the Dominion?

Mr. WALLACE. I do not know that any individual is so employed at the present time who is not a member of the Civil Service. It is only when an important question arises at a time when our regular staff is fully occupied, or when a question is so technical in its nature as to render advisable the employment of one technically qualified to make the investigation, that individual might be employed temporarily in this connection. Questions b, c, d, e, and f, I presume require no answer, as no such individuals are employed. All collectors are notified by departmental memorandum of the valuations fixed on the basis of information, as soon as such values are decided upon on receipt of report of investigation, and thus uniform action is ensured throughout the Dominion in respect of entries of goods so referred to.

Mr. CASEY asked, Is the Government aware that a Board of Experts has been for some years in operation in the United States for the purpose of dealing with questions and disputes between collectors of customs and importers as to rates of duty, classification and value for duty, &c., and of acting as a Board of Reference in matters of seizures; and that it appears to have well fulfilled its purpose of insuring to the Government the full customs revenue intended by the Customs Act, of securing uniformity in valuation for duty, and of affording satisfaction to importers as is alleged in the petition of certain merchants, importers and manufacturers of Montreal, lately presented to this House? Is it the intention of the Government to grant the prayer of that petition for the appointment of a similar board?

Mr. WALLACE. As to the Board of United States Appraisers, the Government is aware that a Board of Customs has been for some years in operation for the purpose of hearing and considering questions as to duty where difference of opinion arises between the customs officers and importers. The latter part of the hon. member's query on this subject is a question of fact which is not strictly within the purview of the Government. As to the intention of the Government to institute such a Board of Customs, the Government have come to no decision on the subject.

VENTILATION OF THE CHAMBER.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I want to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works, who has charge of this Chamber, to a matter of some consequence to the health of members. The ventilation, as the weather becomes hot, grows worse and worse. It was very bad last night, although it may be accounted for by various causes; but if the thermometer keeps at its present range we will all be put to unnecessary inconvenience unless the Minister of Public Works can devise some means of giving better ventilation to the Chamber. A year or more ago I asked the hon. gentleman to see if any means could be devised for improving the ventilation by the introduction of a system of ventilating fans, which would more or less purify the air and keep it in motion during the hot weather. By the expenditure of a few hundred dollars much comfort might be given to hon. members who have to spend many hours here.

Mr. OUIMET. There is no objection to trying the plan suggested by my hon. friend, but I can tell him that during these hot days, and especially when as last night 3,000 or 4,000 people were assembled to listen to the Secretary of State, it is quite impossible to keep the Chamber cool. Nothing can be devised to improve the present system of ventilation. This is carried on by a system of pipes placed at different points, the foul air there being drawn down from underneath and fresh air introduced through the walls or from the roof. Another difficulty arises from the fact that the temperature that will suit one hon. member will not suit another. All necessary means are provided for bringing in fresh and cool air, but ventilation which is felt to be a benefit by one hon. member is considered to be a nuisance by another, and of course those who are sick or in feeble health must be first considered. I suggest that there should be certain hours during the day when it would be understood the Chamber would be unoccupied, so that the employees might be able to open every door and the full volume of fresh air sent into the Chamber. This rule ought to be observed especially between 6 and 8 o'clock in the evening.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think the Minister of Public Works has tried the experiment of ventilating fans.

Mr. OUIMET. We can do that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I speak with knowledge that they have been very effective in smaller chambers. I am aware that when the House is crowded the viciousness of the original construction is so great that it is utterly impossible to ventilate this cockpit here.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I agree with the Minister of Public Works that it is difficult to ventilate the Chamber from windows, because some members may object to the draft. I remember some years ago being in a large hall in London, and after the audience had been there for some time, part of the roof was taken off to ventilate the room. I do not suppose that could be done here, but we could do the next best thing and raise the artificial glass roof overhead.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You have been raising the roof for a fortnight.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) After we sit here for some hours the foul air arises, but cannot get beyond the artificial roof, and if an arrangement could be made that a portion of the glass would be open from time to time, it would allow the foul air to escape.

Mr. OUIMET. The theory is that the foul air is the heaviest and comes down to the floor, and has to escape from underneath. If it is as hot as it is to-day outside, there will be very little good from introducing hot air from the exterior, as far as the coolness of the atmosphere is concerned.

Mr. CHARLTON. Last session the Minister of Public Works promised that he would have some of his officers inspect the ventilation system of the Ontario House of Assembly, which has been newly built and which is furnished with all modern appliances for ventilation. Has the hon. gentleman kept that promise?

Mr. OUIMET. I think my chief architect looked into the question and I will let the hon. gentleman know later on.

P.E.I. RAILWAY TIME TABLE.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have received a couple of telegrams stating that the time table on the Intercolonial Railway, between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, has been entirely changed within the last few days. I would like to ask the Minister of Railways if that is so, and what the changes are?

Mr. HAGGART. There has been no change in the time table as yet, and no change will be made until it is submitted to me. I believe that a new time table is to be submitted to me next Tuesday, but what it is I do not know at present. I will send it to the hon. gentleman as soon as possible.

REPORTS.

Annual Report of the Department of Public Works.—(Mr. Ouimet.)

Abstract of Statements of Insurance Companies in Canada, for the year ending 31st December, 1894.—(Mr. Foster.)

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Mr. LISTER. I desire to call the attention of the Government to the irregularity of the meetings of the Public Accounts Committee, which is probably the most important committee of the House of Commons. As a matter of fact it was not organized until some three or four weeks after the House had been in session, and there have been only three or four meetings since. The work is of a very important character and unless we have more frequent meetings, it will be utterly impossible for us to get through any substantial portion of our business. The effect of the delay, whether intentional or not, is to burk inquiry before that committee. I do not charge the Government with intentional delay, but so far as the effect is concerned, they might just as well intend to do it. I trust the chairman of that committee, and the Minister who attends the meetings, will see that it is called at least twice a week. We have only two short hours a day in the committee, and unless more frequent meetings are held, it will be impossible to accomplish anything.

Mr. FOSTER. The Public Accounts Committee did not meet recently because of the holidays that were taken by the House. It might have met to-day, but there was an important meeting of the Banking and Commerce Committee. I believe it has been called for Tuesday next. I am not disposed to say that two meetings a week are too frequent.

Mr. LISTER. We will have a month after that; and that will be about eight hours' work.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. McMULLEN. When may I expect the return ordered on the 26th of April regarding allowances made to Hayter Reed? It should have been here before this time.

Mr. DALY. The return requires information running over a great number of years, and it is being prepared. Clerks were put to work on it immediately after the motion passed the House, and the hon. gentleman may expect it at the end of the week.

Mr. MULOCK. When will the Order of the House passed on the 26th of March last, with reference to the correspondence between the Canadian and Imperial Governments respecting the cattle embargo, be complied with? I have more than once asked the Government the reason of the non-production of that report. I also, at an early stage of the session, called attention that an Order of the House of a previous session had not been complied with. In 1892 or 1893, I forget which for the moment, a return was ordered as to industries in the county of York. It has been frequently promised, but never has been brought down.

Mr. FOSTER. When the Secretary of State comes into the Chamber I will call his attention to the matter.

THE DOMINION CENSUS.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Before the Clerk calls the Orders of the Day, I desire to call the attention of the Government and of the House to what seems to me to be a contempt of the rules and rights of the House; and, if it is necessary to a discussion of this subject that I should move the adjournment of the House, I make that motion. More than two years ago, I moved, in this House, for a return, and I stated that my reason for that motion was to show the gross inaccuracy of the census which had been made, and upon which hon. gentlemen were relying for the discussion and settlement of many questions of great public interest and importance. The whole of that session went by without that return being brought down. Last session I again called the attention of the Government to the subject, and a promise was given that the return should be brought down; but, although the Government's attention was frequently called to the subject, and the promise to bring down the return was frequently made, no return was brought down. When we met again in this the third session from the time the return was ordered, I again called the attention of the Government to the fact that no such return was brought down, that the order of the House was disregarded, in fact, that the Government were guilty of a contempt of an order made by this House. Now, Sir, this matter has become one of so grave importance, that it has become a question whether this House has any rights that the Government are bound to respect. I hold, Sir, to the ancient views of our constitution in that respect. As a member of this House, as a citizen of a free country and a free people. I stand up as an advocate of the rights of those people ; and, if they are to be taken away, they shall not be taken away by a silent pretense at acquiescence on the part of the Government, or by a silent determination not to comply with the order of the House. If that course is to be adopted, Sir, I intend that hon. gentlemen who sit behind the Government and support them shall make themselves a party to the destruction of this right which belongs to us as a free people. Sir, the Government, as trustees of the people under the Census Act, employed friends all over the country for the purpose of taking the census in accordance with the law. That work was not properly done. Whether the officers of the Government in the departments here were the parties to that inaccurate discharge of that important work, which has rendered the whole of the expense involved unnecessary and improper, it will be a matter for us hereafter to inquire. Large sums of money have been taken from the treasury by the Government, with the consent of Parliament, for the discharge of that work. Now, Sir, when we know, and when it has been brought to the attention of the Government over and over again by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Borden), by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), by myself on one or two occasions, and by other members of this House, that this work has not been properly done—

Mr. DALY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I understand that we had your ruling the other day that the motion to adjourn the House had been abused, and that no hon. member of the House could make a motion to adjourn except in a case of urgency. The hon. gentleman is now discussing the census. I do not know that it is a matter of urgency that the hon. gentleman should take up the time of the House discussing something that occurred some years ago.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. With respect to the question of order raised by the hon. gentleman, I can conceive nothing more urgent than the fact that an order of this House passed two years ago has been deliberately disregarded by the Government, and nothing more requiring the immediate attention of the House or meriting a motion for adjournment.

Mr. FOSTER. That might be very true if the hon. gentleman had confined himself to what he calls a deprivation of the rights of the House ; but the hon. gentleman, under cover of that, went into a discussion of the question whether the census were properly taken, and attacked the Government on that ground.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker, I deny that any statement I made—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Mr. DALY. Mr. Speaker, I would like your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER. With regard to the point raised by the hon. Minister of the Interior, I am afraid that I was not fully understood when I spoke the other day. I first drew the attention of the House to the practice that prevailed in England, and to the fact that a standing order had been adopted in 1832, if I rightly remember the time at the moment, in consequence of the abuse of the privilege of moving the adjournment of the House. What I stated then, and I have to repeat it again to-day, was that under our rules a member might move the adjournment of the House, if he is so disposed, and bring up any question he chooses. Of course, I have my own idea as to the propriety of adopting that method of bringing a question before the House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker, what I say now is in perfect accord with what you ruled a few days ago ; I desire to pay every respect to your ruling, and I acquiesce in the rule you laid down. But I submit that there could not be a matter of greater importance than the one I am now bringing to the attention of the House. If there ever was an occasion when this privilege might be invoked for the purpose of discussing an abuse, it is on an occasion like this. I have pointed out that the accurate taking of the census is a matter of great importance, upon which this House ought to have an opportunity of being fully informed, that I moved for a return with the view of furthering that object, and that the Government have deliberately withheld from the House the information for which I asked and which the House ordered on that occasion ; and I say, Sir, that the Government are guilty of a contempt of the rules and rights of this House in the course they have taken. What I asked for was a return that would have shown that the census was grossly inaccurate, that it was used for the purpose of supporting a series of propositions which it would not support, and that it was, to all appearances, made inaccurate in order that it might be employed for the purpose for which it is now being used. Well, Sir, I think this House has a right to insist upon the orders which it makes being strictly obeyed, and obeyed within a reasonable time ; and if the Government are not disposed to bring down the information for which I asked, after nearly three sessions have gone by, I give notice that I shall submit to this House a motion censuring the Administration, and in that way shift from their shoulders to the shoulders of their supporters in this House the responsibility for the gross and improper manner in which the rights and liberties of the people have been violated. If the Ministers had said, " We will not obey the order of the House ; we will not give the information for which you ask ; we know the purpose for which that information is asked, and we will take care that it is not obtained so as to be used for that purpose ;" that would have been a bold and courageous course. The rights and privileges of this House would have been boldly set aside, but the Government, without having the courage to take that course, do precisely the same thing by their dilatory proceedings. I submit that we are entitled to the information which I have asked for, which the Government have again and again promised, but which promise they persist failing to carry out. This is a matter of the very first importance, and, therefore, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think my hon. friend has grown, perhaps, much warmer than he expected to when he began, and I shall show the House, before I am through, that my hon. friend from Bothwell has, perhaps, not been quite so fair this last couple of weeks with regard to the Agriculture Department as he has been in the past. I promised, a couple of weeks ago that these returns would be hastened as quickly as possible, and I took it in my hands to see that that promise was carried out. In most of the departments there are no returns standing out at present, and that all returns are being expedited is evidenced by the fact that in the last three or four days, no less than fifteen have been laid upon the Table in answer to motions on the other side. As to the returns from the Agriculture Department, I have to say that I have urged the very greatest possible speed, and they will be brought down at the earliest possible day. To show the great importance of these returns, and the great anxiety which hon. gentlemen opposite exhibit to have them, I may state, as an evidence of their anxiety, the fact that a return, concerning the non-delivery of which my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) has complained this afternoon, was laid on the Table yesterday, and he can see it at any moment on application to the Clerk. It was a return moved for on the 26th March, and laid on the Table yesterday. I say again that we are expediting these returns as quickly as possible, and I give my word that no time shall be lost in presenting them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Considering that these returns were moved for three years ago, it is no answer to the hon. gentleman to tell us that he is now hastening their preparation. It is disgraceful conduct on the part of the Administration to delay the returns in this manner, and the House is very forgetful of its rights if hon. members allow themselves to be insulted in this way by the Government. The Government ought to be made aware of the fact that they are the servants of the House, and if they are not prepared to act as such, they should quit their places. It is the plain duty of every member of this Parliament to insist that when a return is ordered by this House, the Government should bring it down in reasonable time, or give some better excuse than has been given by the Secretary of State for the non-production of returns ordered three years ago.

Mr. MARTIN. There are two returns that I moved for last session and which this House ordered, and which are not yet brought down. If the Government do not intend to give the information asked for, they should say so at the time when the motion is made. The matters which I brought before the House were matters which I have no doubt the Government desire to hide from the people. In the first place, I asked for a return showing the expenses to the country of the Ministers who had perambulated the country in search of information with regard to the tariff. That motion was passed without any opposition. After waiting a reasonable time, I asked the cause of the delay and was informed that the return was in course of preparation, and would be brought down in a few days. After a month or two I was told at length that the Government had decided not to give the information. I also moved for another return showing the expenses of Canada at the Chicago Exposition. That motion equally passed without objection ; but although, in answer to repeated inquiries, I was always assured that it was in course of preparation and would be brought down in a few days, it has not been brought down, so far as I know, unless it is among the batch of returns to which the hon. Secretary of State refers as having been laid on the Table within the last day or two. I understand that the Government do not desire to have any discussion as to the expenses at Chicago. It is well known that they were grossly extravagant in their expenses. The returns we have had as to the expenses of the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) have thrown some light on that question ; but if the Government are ashamed of their expenses and were not prepared to give full disclosures, why did they not tell the House at once that they would not give this information ? They took, instead, the other course which is neither straightforward nor honest.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MARTIN. I certainly do not intend to use unparliamentary language.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must withdraw the word "dishonest."

Mr. MARTIN. I did not say dishonest.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman said the Government were not honest.

Mr. MARTIN. I withdraw the word if it is not parliamentary; but I charge the Government with not having met the Opposition in a manly and straightforward manner.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MARTIN. Do I understand that hon. gentlemen opposite do not like to have their conduct in this matter criticised? In fact, it will not bear criticism. This is not a party question at all. It seems to me that when the House passed a motion, without any objection on the part of the Government, the refusal to carry out the order of the House is something for which every member of the House, irrespective of party, should bring the Government to account. The Government have agreed, on the order of the House, to give certain information, they keep promising that the return is being prepared, but fail to bring it down. It is very difficult to get the parliamentary word to apply to that course of action, especially when it transpires afterwards there has not been even the commencement of an effort to prepare the same. A Minister gravely informs the House that the return is being prepared, and will be brought down, and all the time the Government never intended to bring it down.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I can hardly rule that the language is entirely unparliamentary, but I think the hon. gentleman might omit the statement that the Government did not intend to bring the returns down. He cannot possibly know that the Government did not intend to bring it down.

Mr. MARTIN. I can only judge, Mr. Speaker, by what occurred; and, if I find a motion passed here early last session, and, after asking on a number of occasions for that return and being told that it is in course of preparation, and if I find the second session long advanced and the return not yet before us, I have a right, I think, to come to some conclusion with regard to the matter, and the only conclusion I can come to is the one I have stated. I must support the contention of the hon. member for Bothwell, as a member of this House—not as a Liberal or a party man; and it does seem to me that hon. members on the other side of the House should take as much interest in this matter as we on this side do. If the information asked for ought not to be brought down, let the motion calling for it be contested, and let us understand the position we occupy. But once the resolution is passed, it is the duty of the Government to bring the return down as soon as it is possible, under the circumstances, to get it ready.

Mr. MARTIN,

Mr. McMULLEN. I want to say a word in reply to the hon. the Secretary of State as to what he said with regard to the number of returns laid on the Table of the House yesterday. If the Secretary of State would distinctly intimate the returns he was laying on the Table, so that members who are interested would understand what they are, it would save a great deal of trouble. The hon. gentleman, when he has anything peculiarly pleasing to himself to announce to the House, has lung power enough to make himself heard. He certainly could afford to throw a little effort into the announcement of the returns he brings down, so that hon. members might understand what the papers are that he is laying on the Table. My hon. friend from York (Mr. Mulock) would not have been under the necessity of calling attention to the delay in bringing down the order he had moved for, if the Secretary of State had done as I now suggest. I have noticed that since the hon. gentleman assumed the position he now occupies his voice is sometimes almost inaudible, but if he would accept the suggestion I make, much trouble and annoyance would be saved.

Mr. FRASER. I made a suggestion which I think ought to meet with the approval of members on both sides. Very often a member is not present when the return in which he is interested is brought down. I think the officials are not so overworked but that, when a return is brought down, they could notify the member who moved for it of that fact.

Mr. OUIMET. I may be able to assist the hon. gentleman by referring him to the Votes and Proceedings, which are published every day, in which, if he gives himself the trouble to read them, he will find mentioned every report as it is laid upon the Table. For instance, take No. 27, being the Votes and Proceedings of yesterday, and the hon. gentleman will find:

Sir Adolphe Caron laid before the House, by command of His Excellency the Governor General.—The Report of the Postmaster General, for the year ended 30th June, 1894.

And so with the others.

An hon. MEMBER. These are reports, returns are not mentioned.

Mr. OUIMET. Yes; they are all there.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). During the last few years, I have obtained the order of the House for the return of papers in several instances, but I have never been so fortunate as to have a single one of those returns brought down, unless the return I asked for the other day has been laid upon the Table very lately. The information that we ask for one year, may not be of equal importance for the transaction of the public business for the next year. The hon. gentleman has not explained the bringing down of returns two or three years late. For my own part, as I say, I have never yet received a single return I moved for. That indicates negligence or carelessness on the part of the persons having these matters in charge.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. Secretary of State told the House with regard to a return of the census of the city of London, moved by the hon. member for Bothwell three years ago, that it was being pushed, and he hoped it would soon be ready. If that is so, the statement itself shows that for three years it has not been pushed, or it would have been ready before now. The action of the hon. gentleman may be very proper; but if it is, in the absence of any explanation or excuse for what has passed, his action is the most complete condemnation of the course of the Government for the last three years. Does not the hon. gentleman see that? He has not offered the House the slightest explanation or excuse for the delay that has occurred.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have already informed the hon. gentleman that the preparation of these returns sometimes involve a great deal of work. The return asked for by my hon. friend from Bothwell is one of these.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Would the return take more than two hours' work of a couple of clerks?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I rose for the purpose of explaining—

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask the hon. gentleman that question.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The selection of these figures from the census returns, I was going to say, involves a great deal of labour. Let me give an example of the work necessary in preparing these returns. There is in preparation now a return which was moved for by a member of the Opposition in the Senate, which involves the selection of material covering 300 pages of foolscap and the copying of two ledgers each covering 600 pages of accounts. The preparation of such returns involves a great deal of work, which cannot be done in a day; and I say that the department is expediting this work as much as possible.

Mr. LANGELIER. I think I can give the explanation which the hon. gentleman has not been able to give of the long delay that has taken place in the preparation of this return. It is being prepared in a department presided over by a Minister who boasted that when the constitution was in his way he was quite ready to jump over it, if the purposes of his party demanded it. The preparation of this return was not in the interests of his party, I suppose, and finding the constitution which lays upon him the duty of preparing it, to be in his way, he simply jumped over it.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not understand that this is a party question in any way. We are all, as members of the House interested in this, and if there were any instances in which unreasonable delay had occurred in bringing down returns ordered by this House, of course it would be a gross delinquency in the department by which the work should have been performed. We cannot have any feeling as supporters of the Government in favour of unreasonable delay. I must say, as a member of the printing committee, that I have known cases of returns moved for, sometimes no doubt by members on the Ministerial side of the House, which, when the question of printing them came up, were found to be so voluminous that they must have involved a great deal of labour. Again and again it has been decided in such cases not to print the return, and, sometimes, we discovered that even the member who moved for it did not require even a copy. However, Sir, the principle is one which goes to the root of parliamentary efficiency. I quite agree with the general statements of the hon. member for Bothwell. I know nothing of the merits of the particular case involved, but undoubtedly the hon. gentleman is correct in his statements as to the absolute right of this House to call for returns, and as to the gross disrespect that would be involved in refusing to bring down such returns or delaying them unreasonably. It would be a fatal blow at the efficiency of Parliament that would be dealt by a policy of that kind. There can be no doubt that the general principle stated by the hon. gentleman is sound, and it is one that the Conservatives of this House, as well as the Liberals are deeply interested in. It is not to be supposed for one moment that only members on the Liberal side of the House will move for returns which there might be some indisposition on the part of the Government to bring down, or in regard to which there might be some misapprehension, or some worse motive, for refusing to bring them down. It is a weapon for the good of the public that hon. gentlemen in this House should not surrender for one minute, and when a member of the House moves for returns and they are ordered, they must be brought down within a reasonable time. I know nothing whatever of the merits of the case referred to by the hon. member for Bothwell, but the general principle he has laid down is one that every member of the House who cares for the efficiency of the business of the House, or for his own standing or self-respect in it, must entirely endorse.

Mr. MULOCK. With regard to the returns laid upon the Table of the House yesterday by the Secretary of State, I may say that while urging its production, I have been in the habit of examining the Votes and Proceedings to see if it had been produced.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It was produced late last night.

Mr. MULOCK. I was in the House about the time the Secretary of State was speaking, and did not call his attention to it because I knew he was otherwise engaged, and I did not wish to disturb him. I desire to call his attention to the fact that the return itself is almost entirely composed of printed documents from the Imperial Government, and since the whole work devolving upon his department does not involve more than a couple of hours' work by a typewriter, it does seem to me that the month taken up in the preparation of that return, was rather spinning it out. There are nineteen letters of about a folio apiece, making about twenty folios altogether. Of course, the Government have an army of clerks and sessional writers who have really had but very little to do since the House met. Now, if the Secretary of State claims such credit to himself for complying with this branch of my request, would he be good enough to explain why he did not at the same time produce the other return ordered some three years ago, and which has been promised several times. Remember that it is about as bad to tell an untruth as to break a promise, and the Minister covers one branch of the subject by a pledge; now don't let him endanger the other side of it by breaking the promise. He has promised me and promised the House to bring it down, and the return in respect of which he is in default, is a very trifling one in volume, namely, the number of industries in certain districts. There are said to be only a very few of them at best; so, whilst I am willing to express my gratitude on receiving this small contribution, I will reserve a portion of it until he has fully complied with the order of the House and carried out his own pledge.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend has been so grateful, and has smiled so seductively, that I will bring down the other one as quickly as possible.

Mr. LAURIER. There is no question of gratitude here at all, it is a question of debt. When an order of this House has been passed, the Government is entitled to no gratitude at all when they bring down that return as speedily as possible. If they see any objections why a return should not be given, let them say so, and the return will not be ordered; but the moment it is ordered, it is their bounden duty to bring it down to the House as quickly as possible. The Secretary of State said a moment ago that these orders were discharged as promptly as possible.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I said, recently. I do not know anything about it previous to the time I took charge of the department.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman says that since he has taken charge of the department he has been complying with this duty, but he cannot say that previously the Government complied with their duty so far as his department is concerned. I am willing to give this credit to the Government, that on many occasions returns ordered by this House have been promptly brought down; but there are other occasions, and other subject matters, where it is almost impossible ever to obtain returns which are ordered by this House. One of these subjects is that mentioned by my hon. friend from Bothwell. It appears that whenever a return is asked for concerning the census, it is almost impossible to get it complied with. Now, with regard to a subject of this class, we were told some weeks ago that, upon a return being ordered, the Minister had correspondence with the department and he was told that the return would not be complied with, that the papers could not be copied because there was no money in the treasury for such a purpose. Sir, what conclusion must we draw from that but the conclusion which was drawn by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), that in such cases the delays are intentional? It cannot be otherwise. Will any one tell us seriously that when an order of the House has been made and has stood for three years, that it was not possible for the Government of Canada to comply with the order on the ground that there was no money in the treasury for that purpose? The conclusion is irresistible that the Government did not want, for reasons of their own, to bring down the papers. The hon. gentleman a moment ago objected to this inference being drawn, but he knows that there is such a thing as circumstantial evidence, that circumstantial evidence has convicted many a man upon grounds not more forcible than those now urged against the Government. It is a breach of duty on the part of the Government; and though my hon. friend from Bothwell took an extreme course in bringing this matter before the House by moving the adjournment, still he was within his right. Let me quote the opinion of Dr. Bourinot on this subject:

Every care should be taken by the department or officer whose duty it is to furnish the return, to have it strictly in accord with the terms of the address or order. If a person neglects to furnish a return or frames it so as to mislead the House, it will be considered a breach of privilege, and he will be reprimanded or more severely punished, according to the circumstances of the case.

Mr. SPEAKER. Before putting this question, I desire again to express my opinion with regard to the inconvenience of this mode of bringing up a discussion. I am, of course, in the judgment of the House in dealing with this matter, but I may point out that there are other ways in which a question of this kind might be raised without moving the adjournment of the House.

In the first place, a motion might be put upon the paper censuring the Government. Then there is another way in which the matter might be brought up without any notice at all, that is, on going into Committee of Supply. On this point Sir Erskine May says :

The ancient constitutional doctrine, that redress of grievances should be considered before the grant of Supply, is maintained by the usage which sets aside the rule of relevancy when the question is proposed that the Speaker do leave the Chair for those committees.

That, to my mind, is conclusive that a question of this kind for the redress of a grievance, should more properly be discussed on moving the House into Committee of Supply.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

OBSERVANCE OF THE LORD'S DAY.

House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 2) to secure the better observance of the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. CHARLTON. The Bill, when under consideration in Committee of the Whole a few nights ago was dropped from the Order paper by the committee rising without reporting progress. The committee was thin, the majority was a small one. I did not consider the decision arrived at at that time indicated a decision of the whole House, and I accordingly moved that the Bill be reinstated on the Order paper. That motion gave an opportunity to the House to express its decision, if it chose to do so, and have a decision taken, and if a majority of the House voted against the reinstatement of the Bill on the Order paper, that, of course, would settle its fate. I have noticed, in the course of the discussion on this Bill, in sessions past, that there is a proneness on the part of hon. members to kill the Bill when their names do not appear on the division list, and there is reluctance on the part of some hon. members to appear on the records of the House as opposed to the measure. I regret that this is the case. I should much prefer to have members, when hostile to the Bill, express that hostility in a way at once, frank, and one which would give the country to understand what position they occupy. I have been actuated by the reasons I have mentioned in moving for the reinstatement of the Bill on the Order paper. I now ask permission very briefly to present some remarks with respect to the features of this Bill, and to allude to some objections made with respect to its terms and provisions as it is now submitted to the committee. It has been asked, why the Bill was not introduced on this occasion in the form that it left the House last session when it was sent to the Senate. The circumstances of the case connected with the discussion of this Bill and its provisions are briefly these: The Bill, although it occupied on the Order paper the same position as it does now, was shut off by a motion made by an hon. member with respect to the Manitoba question, which was debated for several successive days, and when the Bill was finally reached and the House went into committee, it was the last occasion on which it could have been considered in committee. The opposition took the form of numerous, and, in many cases, absurd amendments; it was so shorn of its provisions and so mutilated that it had very little to commend it to the friends of the measure except the fact that the House of Commons had recognized the principle of the Bill. The first clause, that with respect to the publication of newspapers, was cut down to a bald provision prohibiting the sale of Sunday newspapers. There was no prohibition of publication, or punishment of proprietors or those engaged in issuing Sunday newspapers, and the section would only reach the newsboys who sold the paper. The Bill, so mutilated, was refused consideration by the Senate, and the courtesy was not extended to it of referring its consideration to a committee. It would not be reasonable to ask me, as promoter of the Bill, to confine myself to the shorn provisions as it left the committee, and I claim that the provisions of the Bill now under consideration are proper and just provisions, and such as will commend themselves to any actual friend of the principle of Lord's Day observance. I ask permission briefly to review these provisions. The first section is with regard to the publication of Sunday newspapers. That section might be lightly amended with advantage. It might be well to make exception in favour of the circulation or distribution of religious papers distributed in churches, Sunday schools and religious meetings. Any provision of that character which would improve the character of the measure I would most gladly accede to, but I would not accede to an amendment to cut out of this section everything it contains except the one bald provision which was retained in the Bill of last session, that merely with respect to the sale of newspapers. With regard to the second section, that applying to the closing of the canals, if it is done at all, it must be done under the authority of the Dominion Government. Abstinence from work on the canal on the Lord's Day can be secured in no other way. This section rests on the assumption that legislation must emanate from this House and that legislation for that purpose is proper. These two sections received the approval of the leader of the House and Premier last session. Sir John Thompson, who was willing they should pass. He gave them his support and his vote, and they did pass under the circumstances I have mentioned, and in the mutilated condition to which I have referred.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What sections?

Mr. CHARLTON. The sections with respect to Sunday newspapers and the closing of the canals.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. But not as in your Bill.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, as in my Bill.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No.

Mr. CHARLTON. Not as in the Bill that went to the Senate.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not as in the Bill before the committee.

Mr. CHARLTON. Not, perhaps, in the same phraseology, but practically the same. The third section is with respect to railway traffic. It is not attempted to go far in that direction; it was felt it was not possible to go very far. It does not attempt to regulate through passenger or freight traffic, because it was held by the special committee by whom the Bill was considered that nearly all the Canadian lines had American connections, and depended upon the American roads for a large part of their passenger and freight business, and so it was impossible to make any arrangement with them as regards through freight and through passenger traffic, unless concurrent action was taken by American roads. The Bill, therefore, provides that local freight and local passenger traffic and mail trains shall not run on the Lord's Day, and it contains a proviso that through freight business shall not be prohibited until such time as the American Congress make concurrent regulations and provisions so that similar provisions may be enforced in both the United States and Canada. The interests of the railway companies were carefully guarded in the special committee to which the Bill was referred three or four years ago. As regards this third section, no objection was taken on the part of any railway man in Canada, but it was substantially approved by the railway men. Sir Joseph Hickson did make some suggestions, and they received the attention of the committee, and were embodied in the Bill. With respect to the fourth section relating to excursions on the Lord's Day, I do not consider that a matter of so much importance as the subjects covered by the other sections. This is the section which arouses most opposition from my fellow-members from the province of Quebec, and it is a section I would not particularly insist upon. I think it is important that the first three sections should pass, and I would be perfectly willing to waive the fourth section for the purpose of removing objections that exist as regards the Bill. I would be perfectly willing to accept, during this session, the arrangement arrived at with the leader of the House and Premier last session, and take the two first sections from the others. I consider the third section of this Bill entirely unobjectionable, and there never has been an objection raised to it by the parties interested. With the statement, that I would be glad to receive the recognition of the House as to the principle embodied in this measure, by the sanctioning of the first two clauses of this Bill, with regard to the Sunday newspapers and the closing of the canals, I submit the Bill to the committee, soliciting fair and impartial consideration of the measure.

Mr. MASSON. When this matter was before the committee last session, several amendments were suggested to the first clause, which I think it would be well for the promoter to adopt now. If these amendments were accepted, the clause would read as follows:—

Whoever shall, in the capacity of a proprietor, publisher or manager, engage in the publication or issuing of any newspaper, journal or periodical, for the purpose of sale or distribution, either by carrier or through the mails, upon the Lord's Day; and whoever shall engage in the sale of any newspaper on that day, shall be deemed guilty of an indictable offence; but nothing in this section shall be held to prevent the distribution of religious publications at churches, Sunday schools or at religious meetings.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am perfectly willing to accept the proposal made by my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Masson), and I think they would improve the clause. I would suggest to retain the word "Lord's Day," in the 16th line of the clause of the Bill.

Mr. MASSON. I do not see any objection to that.

Mr. FRASER. While approving of the principle of the Bill, I think, perhaps, that the punishment provided is just a little too harsh. If a boy sells a newspaper, I do not think that he should be subject to an indictable offence. I think it should be summary conviction for the first or second offence.

Mr. MASSON. In all towns and cities where these papers would be printed or published, there is generally a police magistrate who could deal summarily.

Mr. LANGEЛИER. I do not see what object can be served by the passing of this clause of the Bill. I remember that, last year, the promoter of the Bill (Mr. Charlton) said a good deal against what he called Sunday newspapers, and which he considered as the cause of grave immorality. I do not know that there are any such papers in the province of Quebec. At all events, if there is any harm in those papers, it would not be prevented by this Bill, for the simple reason that these so-called Sunday newspapers are not prepared or edited on Sunday. Some of them from New York reach Quebec on Friday or Saturday, so that this Bill would not prevent them coming into the province of Quebec and doing the harm which the promoter of the Bill pretends they are calculated to do. There are newspapers sold very largely in the city of Quebec on Sunday, but they are not published on Sunday. The Saturday editions of "La Presse" and the "Star," of Montreal, reach Quebec by the Saturday night mail, and are distributed and sold on Sunday, but they are not Sunday newspapers. There is another objection to this clause of the Bill. It would punish, I suppose, the sale of newspapers on board trains on Sunday. We have in the province of Quebec several trains that run on Sundays, and of which no one has ever complained, and it would be a revolution if the promoter of the Bill intended to stop those trains. There has been for fifteen years a train running from Quebec to Montreal, and another from Montreal to Quebec, on Sunday afternoons. I do not know that there is any railway train in the province which gives better and more suitable accommodation to the public, and especially to the working classes of Quebec and Montreal, than that Sunday train. At this very time of the year that train is crowded by respectable workmen from the city of Quebec, who, with their families, go to spend a few pleasant hours in the country. They have not the means of those people who are so strict about Sabbath observance, to hire carriages, and they have no other mode of enjoying the fresh air and the beauties of nature than by availing of the running of this train. In my view of the observance of the Sabbath, you cannot find it anywhere better observed. I do not believe that Sunday should be a day of sadness for the people. It was not originally a day of sorrow, but a day of joy and peaceful and quiet rest. These people who leave the city of Quebec for the country do not drink, nor do they cause any trouble. They go quietly into the country with their families, whereas if they remained in the city, they would be deprived of the advantage of fresh air, and might be subjected to other temptation. You will find every one in Quebec and Montreal say that nothing is more conducive to the morality and good health of the working classes than these Sunday trains. There is a train on the Intercolonial leaving Halifax on Saturday afternoon, which runs through to Montreal without stopping. That train passes Quebec about twelve o'clock on Sunday, and if this Bill were passed in its present shape, the newsboy who sold papers on that train for the accommodation of passengers, would be liable to a criminal indictable offence.

Would the passengers on board that train be better, morally and religiously, if they are left idle, because the newsboy who wants to sell a newspaper to them is not permitted to do so, on pain of being brought before the Court of Queen's Bench for an indictable offence, and being fined? I think this clause, so far as it prevents the selling of a newspaper on Sunday, should be struck out. Every Sunday one can see small boys, some of them supporting their mothers who are widows, by the little money they make selling the Montreal "Star." I am not interested in pushing the sale of the Montreal "Star," which is a Tory paper; but I cannot see any justice in preventing newsboys selling papers, when they do no harm religiously or morally, thereby assisting their families and accommodating a good many people who do not think there is any crime in reading a paper on Sunday. I have no objection to prohibiting the publication of newspapers on Sunday; I do not think that would injure anybody, because I do not think that any paper in the province of Quebec is published on Sunday. I do not see any objection, either, to the second clause, providing for the closing of our canals on Sunday. They belong to the Government, and the Government are at liberty to stop the use of the canals on Sunday or on any other day. That would not interfere with the observance of Sunday as it is understood in the province of Quebec. But I would oppose most strenuously any Bill calculated to compel the citizens of the province of Quebec to observe Sunday as it is observed in Ontario. The people of Ontario may think their way of observing Sunday is the best; we may think our way is the best. We have as much right to our way as they have to theirs. I think this matter should be left to the legislature of each province, which understands the wishes and even the caprices of its own people. You will not find two countries in the world where Sunday is observed in the same way. The promoter of this Bill stated some time ago that Sunday observance Bills had been passed in France, Belgium and Germany. If he has visited those countries, he must have seen that the observance of Sunday in them is not the same as he provides for in this Bill. I have been in some of those countries, and I know that the people there would be very much surprised if they were told that their Sunday laws had been quoted to justify preventing the selling of a newspaper on a railway train on Sunday, because their laws have no such intention. The strict observance of Sunday has been greatly departed from even in the country which has been 'par excellence' the home of strict Sabbath observance. I spent two Sundays in London when you could not see a vehicle running on Sunday afternoon; but if you go to London to-day, you will see as much activity on the streets on Sunday afternoon as on a week day. The people have come to believe that there is no harm in using cabs and omnibuses on Sundays, and you will find these crowded with people going into the country on Sunday afternoon. I observed the same thing in Scotland. Every Sunday there are some twenty railway trains running between London and Brighton, and nobody seems to think that there is any violation of the laws of morality or religion in allowing them to run. Between London and Glasgow there are about a dozen railway trains running on Sunday. I do not think we should go back to the kind of Sunday observance which has been departed from in the countries where Sunday has always been most strictly observed. This Bill goes much too far. I do not see any objection to its preventing the use of our public works on Sunday: that is done by the Sunday laws of France, Belgium and Italy: but they do not prevent individuals observing Sunday as they choose. I do not think any man has a right to impose upon me his social habits or his method of observing Sunday or any other day of the week.

Mr. MARA. Whilst the committee are, I believe, almost unanimous in their desire to see the Lord's Day observed as a day of rest. I believe the large majority are opposed to this Bill, because they believe that the matter can be best dealt with by the provinces, and that the Bill is an interference with provincial rights. In British Columbia the leading daily papers are published six days in the week; but they elect to publish on Sunday instead of on Monday, the object being to enable the employees on the papers to observe the Sabbath as a day of rest. Every member of the House knows that the work involved in bringing out a daily paper is done on the day previous to the day of publication; that is, the work of a paper published on Monday has to be done on Sunday, whereas the work of a paper published on Sunday is done on Saturday, and the employees have Sunday to themselves. The Methodist Conference in British Columbia met two weeks ago, and took up the question of Sabbath observance, and adopted a very strong report upon it, and I will show what they considered should be contained in a proper Lord's Day Bill. The report states:

One of the last acts of the session was the adoption of a strong report urging special legislation to enforce Sabbath observance by making it illegal to conduct Sunday excursions by rail or boat, to participate in fishing, boating, bicycling, or hunting on the Sabbath, to ride in public conveyances, such as hacks, buggies or sleighs, for purposes of pleasure, or to operate or patronize Sunday street cars.

Here is a report from the British Columbia Methodist Conference, held in a city where papers are published on Sunday, where in all probability those clergymen read the Sunday papers, and yet they make no mention in their protest of those papers. If a body that takes so much interest in the observance of the Sabbath does not think it necessary to protest against the publication of papers on Sunday, why should this House do so and thus interfere with the rights of the people of British Columbia? British Columbia has the power to suppress these papers if it likes; and when I state that for twenty-five years the leading papers are published there on Sunday, this House may well take the ground that the people of that province are in favour of Sunday papers. Our people will certainly think it an interference if we say, you shall not publish your papers on Sunday but on Monday. For these reasons, I move that the first clause of the Bill as amended last year, and which better meets the views of the people than the present one, be substituted for one clause.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The amendment before the committee is that of the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Masson), and that amendment must be disposed of before any other can be made.

Mr. CHARLTON. The section which the hon. member for British Columbia has moved in amendment is entirely inadequate to meet the great evil of Sunday newspapers. The Sunday paper nuisance is something about which my hon. friend knows nothing. In the case of the Victoria "Colonist" and other papers published in British Columbia on Sunday, the work is done on Saturday night, and there is a degree of order about the issue of the papers, and the character of the papers is such that the evil is minimized there. But that was once the case in the United States. The first Sunday newspapers issued paid a certain degree of deference to religious opinion. At first they contained some columns of religious homily, a sermon or two, and were in a sense unobjectionable. But they speedily deteriorated. The class of people who demanded Sunday literature did not want that kind of literature, and you will not find one Sunday paper published in the United States which has the desirable characteristics of those published in British Columbia. It is freely admitted that they have the very worst influence on society. They are filled with a class of reading matter that is utterly pernicious. And they destroy not only the sanctity of the day, but completely neutralize the religious sentiment of the country. Nearly every public man in the United States recognizes that the Sunday newspaper is the most potent engine for evil that exists in that country. Thirty years ago the United States was a Sabbath respecting country, to-day it is fast becoming a semi-infidel country. No sooner is a question raised between morality and the observance of God's law on Sunday then every one of these papers will be on the side of the wrong. The great bulwark of the opening of the Chicago Fair on Sunday was the Sunday newspaper. It is the enemy of every religious movement in the United States. I do not look on this as a religious question. I do not propose to say that any man shall entertain any religious views of any kind or shall go to any church, but I propose to ask that laws be enacted which will prevent the sanctioning of such influences as are detrimental to the nation's good. This is avowedly a Christian nation. Our Queen is styled the Defender of the Faith, and Great Britain has Sabbath observance laws, thirty or forty in number, on her statute-books, so that we have precedents to warrant this action. If a man wants to observe the Sabbath, I want to secure to him the right to observe it. I do not want to compel him to do so, but to secure to him a right of the utmost importance. The hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Langelier), travelled through the whole of the Bill, and made a speech with regard to Sunday excursions which had no bearing on this clause at all. I am willing to drop that portion of the Bill. I admit that there may be circumstances in Quebec which have caused me to modify my preconceived views with regard to Sunday trains, and perhaps I am willing to say they are not strictly correct, but as regards Sunday newspapers, not as they exist now in British Columbia, but as they will exist when the process of evolution makes them like their American brothers. I say they are a crying curse and instrument of evil.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What is the name of one of the worst of their Sunday newspapers?

Mr. CHARLTON. I presume the "Police Gazette" is a pretty bad one.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is that a Sunday paper?

Mr. CHARLTON. It is published on Sunday and other days.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I did not know—I never read it.

Mr. CHARLTON. The Chicago "Sunday Times."

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Do you read those newspapers?

Mr. CHARLTON. I once in a while examine them to see what their character is, but I never read them as an ordinary reader.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. You never read them?

Mr. CHARLTON. I take such a newspaper, go through its table of contents and try to learn the character of its articles. I want to find out if that newspaper contains healthy reading for my family and the public, or not. Before I denounce a paper I want to know what its character is, and I can only ascertain its character by examining it.

Mr. BERGIN. May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. CHARLTON. Certainly.

Mr. BERGIN. If I am asked what is the character of the New York "Sunday Herald" and the New York "Sunday World," what answer am I to give to my questioner?

Mr. CHARLTON. Semi-respectable.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And the "Tribune" the same?

Mr. CHARLTON. Perhaps hardly as bad as the others. I wish to quote a few words bearing on this question which, I am sure, will have some weight with my hon. friend from Quebec (Mr. Langelier) and perhaps of some other hon. gentlemen. A paper was furnished by Cardinal Gibbons at the meeting of the Sunday Rest Congress in Chicago two years ago. I would be glad to give you the whole paper, for it is most admirable. I propose also to quote from the deliverance of the Plenary Council in Baltimore:

A close observer cannot fail to note the dangerous inroads that have been made on the Lord's Day in our country within the last quarter of a century. If these encroachments are not checked in time, the day may come when the religious quiet, now happily reigning in our well-ordered cities, will be turned into noise and turbulence; when the sound of the church-bell will be drowned by the echo of the hammer and the dray; when the Bible and the prayer-book will be supplanted by the newspaper and the magazine; when the votaries of the theatre and the drinking saloon will outnumber the religious worshippers, and salutary thoughts of God, of eternity and of the soul will be choked by the cares of business and by the pleasures and dissipation of the world.

It is quite evident that the Cardinal is not in favour of Sunday newspapers. And the Plenary Council makes reference to the condition of things which my hon. friend from Quebec speaks of as existing in European countries, and which I infer from what he says, he thinks preferable to the condition of things here. I read from that portion of the deliverance of the Plenary Council relating to the Lord's Day:

In travelling through some European countries, a Christian's heart is pained by the almost unabated rush of toil and traffic on Sunday. First, grasping avarice thought it could not afford to spare the day to God; then unwise governments, yielding to the pressure of mammon, relaxed the laws which for many centuries had guarded the day's sacredness—forgetting that there are certain fundamental principles which ought not to be sacrificed to popular caprice or greed. And when, as usually happens, neglect of religion had passed, by lapse of time, into hostility to religion, this growing neglect of the Lord's Day was easily made use of as a means to bring religion itself into contempt. The church mourned, protested, struggled, but was almost powerless to resist the combined forces of popular avarice and Caesar's influence, arrayed on the side of irreligion. The result is the lamentable desecration which all Christians must deplore.

And Archbishop Ireland, in an address which I had the pleasure of hearing, and which was delivered at the last Session of the Sunday Congress at Chicago, said :

Give Sunday to the labourer to make him feel that he is a man. He feels not his manhood while stooping beneath the weight of machinery. The hard labour by which modern industries are supported is slavery. Let there be one day in the week the sunrise of which says to the labourer, "Thou art a free man; thou art independent. To-day, at least, thou art the equal of thine employer, the equal of the highest and the richest in the land." Let there be a day in the week when he puts aside the habiliments of toil, and with a vesture which, if it tells of the struggles of poverty, is at least neat and tidy, he goes out into the fulness of God's sunshine, looks up to the skies, hears the birds sing, talks with his fellows as a free man, so that, when he returns to toil, he will take with him the memory of a joyous Sunday, and will in the midst of toil be a free man, owning his own soul, knowing that he is an independent child of God, and is entitled to the same immortal destiny as the highest and best of his fellows.

I commend these extracts from addresses by Cardinal Gibbons, and Archbishop Ireland and from the deliverance of the Plenary Council, to the consideration of my hon. friends. Of course I do not need to say that the prelates and ministers of Evangelical churches are of the same mind, and it is unnecessary to recount the names of eminent philanthropists, politicians and other public men who take the same view. The object of this Bill is not to compel certain religious observances, not to force upon the people one set of opinions, but to permit these observances, to permit liberty of conscience, and to prevent corporations and other employers who do not recognize the rights of men from forcing men to work upon the Lord's Day. The particular section which we now have under consideration is for the purpose of excluding from this country an influence which will prove most detrimental, most disastrous in its effects upon the future of Canada, if it is permitted to gain a foothold here. We do not need to speculate as to what the character of the Sunday press will be. We have an example in the country alongside of us, which started with very much the same conditions as we have to-day. What the outcome of the experiment there is shows us what would be the results here. This Sunday newspaper is a violation of the law of God. It is an insult to the fourth commandment. It has no excuse for existence if there is a moral law, and it must necessarily show itself in opposition to every religious influence. It has done so in the United States, and it is inevitable that it must do so. As it has been in the past in the United States, so it will be in the future in this country, if the Sunday newspaper is allowed to gain a foothold here. And, apart entirely from sentimental or religious considerations, the statesman, the citizen who desires the well-being of the state, must recognize that popular institutions rest most securely upon religion and public virtue; and it should be our care, as the chief legislature in this Dominion, to enact such legislation as will ensure, so far as lies in our power, the continuance and perpetuation of public virtue and of respect for the great Ruler of nations. For this reason, I believe this section is a necessary and salutary section, and the influence of it, if it is enacted, will be beneficial to this country.

Mr. BERGIN. I am quite in sympathy with the object proposed to be attained by the promoter of this Bill. I desire as much as any man in this House to see the Sunday properly observed in this country. And the hon. gentleman has shown that he is sincere, perfectly sincere in the object he has laid before the House, by consenting to withdraw all the sections but the first and the second. No man in this House has a greater objection to the Sunday newspaper than I have, but, the object being such as the hon. gentleman himself has said, to keep out of this country the Sunday newspapers of the United States, I at once ask myself: Is the first clause of the Bill likely to attain the object which the hon. gentleman says he has so much at heart. And when I read the section I find that it does not contain anything which will enable us to keep the Sunday newspapers of the United States out of this country; I find that, so far from attaining that object, this Bill permits that Sunday newspapers, newspapers issued on Sunday in New York, or some other American city, to come in here and be sold in Canada. If these are not fit papers to be read upon a Sunday they are not fit papers to be read upon a Monday. My hon. friend says that the New York "Sunday Herald" and "Sunday World" are semi-respectable. Well, if they are only semi-respectable they are not fit to be read by Canadians. The only way to make these newspapers fit to be read in this country is to make them entirely respectable. I believe that if, instead of passing a clause of this kind, we passed a law prohibiting the sale, upon any day of the week in this Canada of ours, of the "Sunday Herald" or "Sunday World," we would put an end to the evil effect that these papers have upon the youth of this country. I am quite willing to vote for a clause that will prohibit the importation and the sale upon any day of the week of the New York Sunday newspapers, and then I think we will reach the root of the evil. I unite with all that he has said in condemnation of these papers.

Mr. MASSON. It seems to be the desire on the part of some members of the committee to charge this Bill with containing what it does not contain, and to ask that it should contain something entirely foreign from its object. Now, the amendment that I propose to the Bill will remove the objection taken to it by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Mara). It is not the work done in the newspaper office that is complained of, that is done out of sight of the public, and does not interfere with the manner in which the public desire to observe the Lord's Day. The Lord's Day is not made a day of traffic by the printing merely being done in a printing office on that day. I have striven to confine my amendment to that subject, and it will read: That whoever shall, as proprietor, publisher, &c., engage in the publishing of a newspaper for distribution on the Lord's Day. That is, that where the publisher or proprietor of the paper engages in issuing that paper with the deliberate intention of distributing it on the Lord's Day, he is brought within the terms of this Act, and then only. If it is to be distributed on a Monday, he is not brought within the terms of this Act, it is not intended that he should be. Now, I entirely agree with what my hon. friend from Cornwall (Mr. Bergin) has just stated about newspapers of an immoral character published in the United States and coming into Canada. I agree that they should be prohibited; and I think that steps should be taken to prohibit them. But that is not part of a Sunday observance Act, and, therefore, his objection is not well taken, when he says that this Bill which is attempting to deal with one subject, does not deal with an entirely different subject. The Customs Department has already authority to prevent immoral literature coming in, and that power might well be extended to stop a lot of Sunday newspapers that now come in, and coming in for the purpose of being distributed and being read upon the Lord's Day.

Mr. AMYOT. What paper is that?

Mr. MASSON. I do not know what paper my hon. friend referred to. The papers arrive on Saturday night, and they are called Sunday papers. It is not because the paper is called a Sunday paper that it is objectionable. It may be called a Saturday paper, but if it is printed for the purpose of being distributed on Sunday, that is what we wish to stop by this Bill. Whether it is called a Sunday paper or a Saturday night paper, if it is printed for the purpose of being distributed on Sunday, the object of this clause is to prevent that. As to the other objection, that the penalties are large, it can be dealt with when we come to consider the penalties. I do not think the discussion of this clause should be encumbered with that point. Let those who are in favour of Sunday papers being published on the Lord's Day, vote against the Bill entirely, vote against my amendment, and vote against the clause as it was introduced; but let those who proclaim that they are in favour of putting a stop to the distribution of Sunday papers on Sunday, vote in favour of the amendment and of the Bill.

Mr. AMYOT. I would like to ask the Minister of Justice, if he considers that we have authority to deal with the religious observance of Sunday, or if we have the right to deal with the civil obligation of observing Sunday?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think we have that power. While not saying anything in regard to the wisdom of exercising that power under the circumstances, I think we have the power to constitute the non-observance of the Sabbath in this manner a crime. That is what the mover of the Bill proposes to do.

Mr. AMYOT. Then, if I am not mistaken, we are asked to use our power to enforce the keeping of Sunday in the way proposed by this Bill as a religious obligation, and, if a man does not so keep it, he is a criminal. We are asked to use the majority of the members of the confederation to say to one section of the confederation, You must keep the Sabbath, or the Lord's Day, in the way that another section of the confederation may desire. Mr. Chairman, I think this would make us regret that we came into confederation at all. We never thought that we would meet with such intolerance here. We in the province of Quebec have our habits, our customs, our way of interpreting the laws of God for the keeping of His day; but we do not want Ontario, or any other part of the confederation, to impose their views upon us in that respect. We have got our civil and municipal authorities, we have our religious authorities, and to these we look to make laws for us on these subjects. We do not want Ottawa to go against our local authorities. I think it would be an abuse of power to make indiscriminately anything a crime which is not such in any one province. You might just as well say that if a man or a child picks up a piece of paper in the street on Sunday or Monday, it would be a crime. You might as well say that if a man eats an apple on Monday or Tuesday, it would be a crime. We have the power to create and punish a crime, but should we use that power in this case? If we make it a civil obligation to keep Sunday, we might as well go on and compel the people to attend the Sunday school. But we have no such thing in the province of Quebec as Sunday schools in most of the counties. We have our schools in the homes, we have our schools in the parish, and the catechism is taught in the church on Sunday and other days of the week. But we settle these things ourselves, and we don't admit the interference of the hon member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). If you begin by trenching upon our convictions by means of summary legislation, you take a very dangerous step towards depriving us of our liberties. The moral obligation of keeping Sunday is a matter of conscience, and I do not think the fathers of confederation ever intended that this Parliament should enforce that obligation. We come here as citizens, each one having his own convictions about religious matters, and we should not interfere with each other. If the hon. member for North Norfolk wishes to go on Sunday and preach in the Salvation Army Barracks, he is at liberty to do so, and I respect his convictions. If he likes to collect the people in a public park on Sunday, and then, by his fine voice and eloquence, create some pleasure, some amusement, and some fun for the boys, he is at liberty to do so, and we do not interfere with him. If we consider we are bound to go to mass on Sunday morning we are at present able to do so, and we do not want a law to prevent our attendance. If it is our right to prevent any one reading certain books or newspapers on Sunday it is our right to prevent a man going to mass, for the legislation is in the same direction. I deny in toto our right to interfere with the moral observance of Sunday by the people. This measure is an attempt to interfere with conscience and with religious belief, and Parliament would be abusing its power if it created crimes in this direction. Such legislation is pure intolerance. The hon. gentleman has been endeavouring to force his Bill on Parliament for many years. He knows exactly the sentiments and convictions of the people of the province of Quebec in regard to it, and he seeks to use the Protestant majority in this House to impose such legislation on the people. Such action is unfair, and, I repeat, intolerant, and it is improper that the hon. gentleman should introduce such a measure hoping thereby to secure a majority in his county, and this action is not such as we would expect from a man of his standing. I wish to put the position clearly before the committee. The hon. gentleman seeks to interfere with matters of conscience, and at the whim or caprice of the majority to impose certain views on religious matters on his fellow-citizens. This surely is not tolerance, and, in my opinion, such legislation would be unworthy of this Federal Parliament. If he is not seeking to interfere with the moral obligation, he must be dealing with a civil obligation. But have not the provinces the right to inquire into and deal with these subjects? If so, surely they are municipal matters, and, in that sense, come under the control of the local legislature. The hon. gentleman, if he will read the Confederation Act, clause 92, will find that municipal matters belong to the provinces. If such is the case, why does not the hon. gentleman leave these matters to be dealt with by the several provinces at their discretion? The hon. gentleman appears to consider himself wiser than the members of all the local legislatures. Does he believe that Providence has put all the brains into his head, and all the wisdom, intelligence, science and love of God necessary to preserve Sunday? If he does so, I am sure he would be convicted of committing one of the sins against which he preaches, namely, pride. Surely we must exercise some discretion and common sense in our legislation. What is the use of this Bill? If the hon. gentleman does not choose to drive on Sunday, let him stay at home, but let him not attempt to infringe on our liberty. If I desire, on Sunday afternoon to drive from Bellechasse, the county which I represent, into an adjoining county, I may do so. But if this Bill became law, I might be prevented. A friend might then ask me, Who prevents your driving? My answer would be, Mr. Charlton. Who is he? I would be asked. I would reply, He is the member for North Norfolk. I would then be asked, Is he charged by any religious body to enact the laws for the church throughout the Dominion, or who has entrusted him with that care? This committee should well understand the matter now under discussion. If we are to live together in this country we must not be intolerant, but respect the training and education of others, and not try to endeavour to force our views on others, and not bring into this Parliament delicate questions, expecting that the prejudices of others will give a chance for a certain Bill to pass, or hoping that, although the Bill has no chance to become law, it may give some personal popularity to its promoter. This measure represents bigotry, intolerance, fanaticism. It is unworthy of consideration by this Parliament, and I want its author to understand that if he goes any further it will become the duty of our fellow-members who are Protestants to stand up in our protection and vote down Bills which do not embody common sense. In the name of my province, I ask the protection of the Protestant members of this House against such proposed legislation.

Mr. FRASER. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) is altogether mistaken as to the purpose of this Bill, and he has made a speech which has as much to do with the question before the committee as the storm raging outside has to do with legislation. This Bill has nothing to do with the prejudices or religious feelings of any section of the community. It does not say that the hon. member for Bellechasse cannot worship just as he sees fit. The section under consideration simply covers the ground as to whether this House is in favour of selling papers on Sunday or not. I want the hon. gentleman to answer that question.

Mr. AYMOT. I want to settle the question for myself.

Mr. FRASER. Are there not public interests involved as well as the right of private judgment? The hon. gentleman himself assumes great power, for he seeks to decide a question affecting the whole community according to his individual judgment. The whole question is as to the publication of a newspaper, and whether it should be sold on the Sabbath, and whether such prohibition would be desirable in the public interest. The hon. gentleman has ascribed motives to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). Is that a proper position for an opponent to take? Is that charity and toleration? I am bound in discussing this matter, to assume the honest intentions of the hon. member for Bellechasse, and not ascribe motives to him. Let hon. members discuss this Bill on its merits. I submit it is bad taste to declare that because an hon. member introduces a Bill he is dishonest in his intentions, and is acting from improper motives. Must it not be assumed that the hon. member is acting in the interest of the country, and not from selfish motives? I am not myself as strict a Sabbatarian as I might be, but I believe in the complete observance of that day, and I attempt, so far as possible, to observe it; but I do not say I would impose my views as regards the observance of that day on others. This Bill does not attempt to do so. It simply says, here is an evil which is not in the public interest, either religiously or socially, and we will endeavour to suppress it. He might go down to his county, and, on the Lord's Day he might go around and attempt to canvass. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman would do it, and he might be perfectly honest in doing it. The Bill does not attempt to deal with anything like that.

Mr. AMYOT. It does.

Mr. FRASER. No such thing. The hon. gentleman either misunderstands the Bill or he has not read it. There is no interference with the manner in which any subject of Her Majesty has heretofore observed the Sabbath. The Bill proceeds upon broader grounds, and while I am not fully in favour of the punishment prescribed, yet I am in favour of its principle. If the hon. gentleman thinks that the publication of a paper on the Sabbath is a good thing, let him say so. I do not think so myself, and, therefore, I am in favour of the Bill. There is no attempt to affect confederation, as the hon. gentleman says. The Bill does not force any man to learn his catechism if he wishes to attend a sabbath school, and what necessity was there for the hon. gentleman bringing that in?

Mr. AMYOT. The question is whether it belongs to this Parliament or not?

Mr. FRASER. Well, if the hon. gentleman argues that this is a good Bill, but that this is not a proper Parliament to bring it before, I can understand him. But how can he square his attack on the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) with that position? If it is all right for any citizen of Canada to start publishing a paper on the Lord's Day, and if the hon. gentleman thinks so, then he should say so.

Mr. AMYOT. Is it a provincial matter or not?

Mr. FRASER. That is another question, and if he has raised that point his argument would be legitimate. I think this Parliament has authority to pass this Bill, and thinking that, I shall vote for it as I would vote for it in a local parliament, if I thought it was within the jurisdiction of the local legislature.

Mr. BERGIN. My hon. friend (Mr. Masson) does not understand the position I take in regard to this Bill. But my hon. friend the promoter of the Bill thoroughly understands it. I am entirely in accord with him in the belief that we should put an end to these Sunday newspapers. The only difference of opinion between him and me is, as to whether the Bill will accomplish that object. If I cannot get an amendment that will carry out my view I will take this amendment. I want the principle of this Bill established, even though the method by which I would accomplish the object is different from his.

Mr. CURRAN. My hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Masson) in urging the mover of the Bill (Mr. Charlton) to go on with the Bill as it now stands, is advising him in a wrong direction towards arriving at the desired result. Last session we had a very long and serious discussion upon every interest affected by this Bill. We had the question of the printing of the newspaper on Sunday night for publication on Monday morning, and we also discussed the position of the British Columbia newspapers.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. BECHARD. This Bill has been introduced into this House several times, and I have never been favourable to it. I do not think that such legislation is required for the public welfare, or even for the welfare of the soul of anybody. There exists in the different provinces of this confederation, laws which provide for the keeping of good order and the prevention of all servile work upon the Lord's Day, and any one violating these laws, can, on the complaint of another person, be subjected to the punishment which is provided for. Now, Sir, as a citizen of the province of Quebec, for my part I am satisfied with the operation of the laws regarding the observance of the Lord's Day. My hon. friend wishes, I understand, to prohibit the reading of immoral literature on the Lord's Day. Well, Sir, I think that a man who wishes to read immoral literature can do it as well on Monday as on the Lord's Day. This Bill will not prevent such reading; and if he does not read it in newspapers, he can read it in books which have been published before. The observance of all virtues can be better inculcated in the hearts of people by persuasion than by force. I cannot believe that we can render men virtuous by act of Parliament. However, I want to draw the attention of the committee to this first clause. Last year this Bill was amended in several particulars and was then accepted by the House; but I notice this year that those amendments have disappeared from the Bill. I myself moved an amendment, which was accepted and passed by the House, as in addition to this first clause. I read here:

But nothing in this section shall be held to prevent the gratuitous distribution of religious publications upon the Lord's Day.

The amendment which I moved last year went a little further; it provided that nothing should prevent the ordinary distribution of newspapers and letters by postmasters on that day.

Mr. CHARLTON. This section will not prevent that.

Mr. BECHARD. I do not know whether it will prevent it or not, but the amendment is not here. My reason for proposing that amendment was that in the rural districts of the province of Quebec at least, many people who live four or five miles from their post office, and have not the opportunity to go to the post office every day, have been accustomed to get their papers and letters on Sunday. I hope this Bill will not prevent this.

Mr. CHARLTON. This clause refers only to Sunday newspapers. It does not bear on that practice at all.

Mr. BECHARD. If the practice of distributing letters and papers at the post offices on Sunday is not prevented by the Bill, I am satisfied with regard to that point.

Amendment (Mr. Masson) agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On section 2,

Mr. CHARLTON. The understanding was that the first two sections should be adopted,

Mr. BECHARD.

ed, and that the rest of the Bill should be dropped.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think the hon. gentleman stated that the second clause would be qualified as it was in the Bill which was adopted by this House last session. Perhaps I may mention what the clause was, as I have it under my hand:

No canal belonging to the Government of Canada shall be operated for traffic on Sunday, except between the hours of midnight of Saturday and six o'clock in the morning of Sunday, and from and after the hour of nine o'clock at night on Sunday. In the case of urgent necessity arising from the pressure of business caused by an interruption of traffic or by the approach of the close of navigation, the foregoing provision may from time to time be suspended or varied by order of the Governor in Council; but such Order in Council shall only continue in force for four weeks at most, from the making thereof, and may be made applicable to any one or more of the canals.

Mr. CHARLTON. That provision was suggested by the Premier last session and was accepted, and if the hon. Minister of Justice wishes it inserted, of course, I do not object. The responsibility of course rests with the Minister of Justice whether it shall be inserted or not.

Section 2 amended as proposed, and, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. CHARLTON. The tacit understanding, perhaps, was that no more of the Bill should be pressed this session; but I would like the Minister of Justice to give his attention to the third clause, to see whether it should not be enacted.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I suggested to the hon. gentleman who has charge of this Bill, and it seemed to meet with his approval, that, as this House adopted the principle of the Bill last year, and passed two clauses, I think, with penalty clauses added, the committee, having practically re-adopted these clauses, should rise, with the understanding that the principle involved in these two clauses should be considered and carefully drafted—because, with all due deference to the hon. gentleman, some careful revision of these clauses, even as amended, is required; and then I would bring forward the revised draft as an amendment to the criminal code, a Bill in reference to which now stands upon the paper in my name. There are several reasons for this course; and I am sure the committee will appreciate the one I have mentioned as a very important reason. The legislation which I am proposing relates to the criminal law, and as it certainly is advisable that the criminal law should as far as possible be found in the criminal code, any proposition in that direction should be in the nature of an amendment to that code. Another reason why this or any such amendment should appear in the code is that there is a section of the code, the 12th section, relating to offences against religion. There is a section in our Criminal Code, section 103, of part 12, relating to offences against religion, morals and public convenience, which provides :

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable, on summary conviction, to a penalty not exceeding $50 in costs, and in default of payment to one month's imprisonment, who willfully disturbs, interrupts or disquiets any assemblage of persons met for religious worship, or for any moral, social or benevolent purpose, by profane discourse, by rude or indecent behaviour, or by making any noise, either within the place of such meeting or so near it as to disturb the order or solemnity of the meeting.

That has been very carefully considered. We will avoid one great difficulty that presents itself in this Bill, and that is why the promoter, in the penal clauses of the Bill, has endeavoured to limit the offence and the penalty to something of the same nature as the penalty I have referred to. He makes by the first section this offence an indictable one ; and under the general section of the code, there would be a possibility of five years' imprisonment attaching to it as a penalty. No doubt it is not the hon. gentleman's desire that this should be considered so serious an offence. There are one or two other suggestions that I have to offer to the committee to show that the principle being adopted, the Bill requires very serious consideration and draughting. I might mention in the first instance, that the section first starts out by referring to the publication and issue of any paper, journal or periodical ; and in dealing with the offence only refers to a newspaper, leaving out publications, journals, and periodicals. There are some difficulties, I think, with regard to the expression "newspaper" itself. If the committee understand, as the promoter and I do, that after the revision of the two sections, so far adopted by this committee, is complete and the hon. gentleman's amendment is introduced, the House will, of course, be free to approve or condemn, add to or subtract, any phraseology used, and perhaps it would be the most expeditious course to move that the committee rise with that understanding.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Of course the second section of the Bill is one we have a perfect right to bring in. It relates to works that are under our own control and jurisdiction. We have the right to close the post office and everything under our jurisdiction just as any other proprietor has control of his own estate, but when you come to the first section, I am at a loss to see just upon what grounds you would make the sale of a newspaper—I am not now speaking of sealed literature, because that would be clearly within our jurisdiction as part of the criminal law—different from the sale of a yard of calico or any other article. That is a matter of police, which every city in the Dominion deals with under its municipal law, and when we propose to make it an indictable offence it seems to me you are confounding what a Christian community regard as a sin with what is really a crime. They are very different things. Whatever might be believed two or three centuries ago, everybody to-day acts upon that assumption. I rise to call the Minister's attention to the fact that if he undertakes to embrace the sale of a newspaper or any other article in the criminal law and make it an indictable offence, he is exceeding our jurisdiction. If you do not undertake to deal with it in the criminal law, you acknowledge at once that you have not jurisdiction. It seems to me a very serious matter to undertake to give yourself jurisdiction over any special subject by undertaking to embrace it in the criminal law. I sympathize with my hon. friend in his desire for a quiet Sunday. That is in the public interests, and so far as Ontario is concerned—I have not examined the statutes of the other provinces—that subject has been dealt with. The publication of Sunday papers would come within the provisions of our provincial statutes, but this is a proposal to give this House jurisdiction by making it a criminal offence—by putting it on the same footing as you would theft, or robbery, or any other crime.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In justice to myself and to be fully candid with the committee, I ought to state that there is a tacit agreement between the promoter of the Bill and myself. It is this : The promoter of the Bill referred to-day to members of this House taking the opportunity to vote against the Bill in committee where their names are not reported, and he supposed that they were afraid to vote when the Speaker was in the Chair on account of the odium that might attach to their conduct. I do not wish to conceal for a moment that I have always personally, when I had the opportunity, voted against the principle of the Bill. Not that I do not sympathize with the object of the hon. gentleman—we all do—but because I infinitely prefer to leave that matter to be dealt with by the local legislatures. I have never receded from that position. But seeing that this House last year adopted the principle of the Bill, notwithstanding the arguments used from the standpoint of the hon. member for Bothwell and myself, and again adopted the principle this session, it seemed to me right to wrestle, as far as I could, with the particular phraseology as an amendment to the criminal code. The House will then be free to consider the difficulty the hon. gentleman has just presented, but I do not wish to shut myself out from concurring in an opinion that may be adverse to the measure. This action of the committee is without prejudice to any action the House may take later on.

Mr. MONTAGUE. This Bill has been before the House a number of sessions, and I think it is rather surprising, to say the least, that the hon. gentleman who introduced it again does not seem to have taken means to meet the many objections which were urged against it in previous sessions, and urged, I think, very fairly on both sides of the House in some particulars. For instance, the difficulty has not been met in this Bill which arises with regard to British Columbia, where newspapers are printed on Saturday night and distributed Sunday morning. There is no newspaper set in that province on Sunday and distributed Monday morning, but all the work of making up the paper is done on Saturday. It appears to me it would be a very great hardship to the people of British Columbia to compel publishers there to abandon the practice they now follow. It seems to me to be somewhat of a hardship to compel these publishers in British Columbia to abandon the practice they have followed, as I understand it, ever since British Columbia was a province, and to compel them to publish their paper on Monday morning, thus causing the printers in that province to work on Sunday instead of working on Saturday night, as they do now in preparing the paper for Sunday morning.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It will not have that effect.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Undoubtedly it will. If the hon. gentleman understood the question as those do who live in that province and know the circumstances under which these papers are published, he would know that it would have that effect. The type-setting of the Sunday newspapers is done on Saturday night and the printers do not work on Sunday there being no newspaper issued on Monday. But if this Bill is passed they will have to do their typesetting on Sunday night for Monday's paper. There is another objection to this Bill and that is, as it seems to me, it does not come within a long way of attaining the object its promoter has in view, that is of protecting the Canadian family from the harmful influence of the Sunday newspaper and its literature. Now, the Canadian Sunday newspaper, as far as I have been able to judge—the British Columbia Sunday newspaper, and the Ontario Sunday newspapers—is not an evil sheet in that sense of the term. But there is a class of Sunday newspapers imported into this country from the United States filled with the most villainous sensational articles, articles that are undoubtedly of a character to poison the mind of youth. And yet, under this Bill these papers may be brought in from the United States without let or hindrance to poison the mind of the youth of Canada. These newspapers are dated Sunday and are sold upon the streets on Saturday night. Yet my hon. friend provides by this Bill that while a decent, respectable, moral, even religious paper shall not be published on Sunday, yet the Canadian family shall be permitted to be supplied with the most evil class of literature from other countries, known as Sunday newspapers. I think my hon. friend should have very carefully considered this measure, to see if he could not meet the objections against it time and time again by hon. members on both sides of the House with regard to these two points at least. I am quite at one with the object of the promoter of the Bill. I regard the education of youth in morals as the safeguard of the nation, and I would go as far as my hon. friend or any one else in order to attain that object. But I have not the remotest belief that this Bill will attain this object, and I think the hon. gentleman ought to consider it very carefully in order to find some means of meeting the objections.

Mr. CHARLTON. The first and second sections have passed the committee, and the discussion which is now taking place, is a little out of date. It would have been more opportune had it taken place before the committee took action upon these sections. There is no objection to the discussion taking place at a later stage, if the arrangement suggested by the Minister of Justice is carried out—that is for the committee to rise and report progress, these sections to become part of the Criminal Code, after being revised by the Minister, and to be considered again by the House without prejudice, as the hon. Minister says, to the provisions of the Bill. The House will have time to consider the matter fully, to correct any error and to put the clauses in such shape as to meet the objections raised, if possible to do so. I want to secure a workable Bill and one that will meet the wishes and expectations of the promoters. The suggestion of the Minister of Justice is an excellent one, and I was glad to concur in it, and with his assistance we will consider the suggestions that have been made on their merits.

Mr. CORBOULD. The hon. member for Yale (Mr. Mara) moved an amendment to clause 2, which is before the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Denison) Section 2 is carried.

Mr. CORBOULD. The hon. member's motion was an amendment to clause 2. That was after the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Masson) had moved his amendment. The amendment of the hon. member for Yale was an exact copy of the clause as carried last year, which would allow the papers in British Columbia to be published as they are at present, coming out on Sunday and again on Tuesday, but not on Monday. I have not heard the chairman put that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. (Mr. Denison). That is not before the Chair at all.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is in the exact language of the clause adopted last session. There is no objection to that ?

Mr. CHARLTON. I have an objection to it, but the whole question can be considered later on.

Mr. CORBOULD. The member for Yale moved his amendment after that of the hon. member for Grey had been carried.

Mr. CHARLTON. But that amendment is not before the Chair, and the committee had passed the clause.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Under the arrangement we have made, it can be considered just as well at another time.

Mr. McMULLEN. Before the committee rises, Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words in reply to the Secretary of State. The hon. gentleman admits that Sunday periodicals are published in United States and brought over and sold in Canada, and he states also that he is aware that there is great danger of the minds of Canadian youth being poisoned by literature of an immoral character being circulated in this way. But notwithstanding that fact neither the hon. gentleman nor any other member of the Cabinet has ever introduced legislation in this House to prevent a continuation of this evil. These hon. gentlemen are always ready to raise objections, to find fault, to offer objectionable criticisms to the Bill that has been introduced by the hon. member from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). The Secretary of State pointed out at length the objections he had to the Bill, but he wound up by saying he was in favour of the principles of the measure. I am very much afraid that if the Bill was relegated to the care of the Cabinet and its supporters it would be in the house of its enemies. This is quite clear from the manner in which the Bill has been treated by hon. gentlemen opposite. So far as the treatment accorded it by the Minister of Justice is concerned, I must say that it bears some evidence of fairness. But the manner in which the Secretary of State has dealt with the measure is not at all creditable. While he has admitted that he has been quite cognizant of this literary poison being distributed in this country for years past, he has never made a move in the direction of preventing it. He was, I think, at one time, a preacher of righteousness himself. He has fallen from grace, I am afraid. It is to be hoped that when the Bill comes up for further consideration it will be treated in the spirit of fairness, without attempts being made to pour cold water upon the whole matter and thus prevent legislation of this kind, in the spirit shown by the Secretary of State.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In answer to the Secretary of State—

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the hon. gentleman allow me a moment. I beg to say to the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) that I have no intention of replying to his little personal insinuations. I think this Parliament is above that kind of thing. But I may say that last session I moved a resolution in exactly the same direction as that I have presented this evening.

Mr. McMULLEN. You indulged in a little personal matter yourself last night.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I was going to say that I see no objection in the world to the printing and the work of a newspaper being done on Saturday night. But so long as we lay down a rule with regard to the observance of Sunday, I see no reason why newspaper men should not observe that rule precisely in the same way as any other section of the community. The work that is done on Saturday night for a paper may be done for a Monday paper, and I do not see any essential necessity for calling it a Sunday paper for Sunday circulation. But I have always been opposed, and am still opposed, to any recognition of a right of a party on a newspaper to do in respect of that paper, whether it be a Monday morning paper or any other, what you do not concede to any other portion of the community; and I think that is a sound rule. Something has been said with regard to my hon. friend's Bill making no provision against obscene literature, but I would say that that is already provided for by statute, and there is no reason why newspapers of that class should circulate on Monday any more than on Sunday. The prohibition is a universal prohibition, and therefore there is no object in including it in a Sunday Bill.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I did not say obscene literature, which is, of course, provided for in other statutes, but I said that no provision was made against sensational literature.

Mr. AMYOT. The question has now taken another direction. I was opposed to the Bill because, as was so well said by the hon. member for Bothwell, it was a Bill to define sins instead of offences against society. But now the question is as to immoral literature, and I am in favour of every criminal law to prevent immoral literature being brought into this country from the States or anywhere else. That is altogether another thing, and I would be very glad, if our laws are not stringent enough, which I doubt, that they should be amended. But that has nothing to do with a Sunday Bill. Immoral literature is as immoral on any other day of the week as on Sunday, and I approve of prohibiting the introduction or sale of it under any circumstances. But what I object to is this Parliament infringing upon the rights of a local legislature to make municipal laws, infringing upon the conscience of citizens by telling them what they shall avoid doing on Sunday when the thing is prohibited is not bad per se. That is what I do not want this Parliament to do. As to immoral literature, the Post Office Department has already the right to prevent its importation, and I know that a long list of immoral publications from the United States is given to the customs officers and they are instructed to prevent their importation. We have already the necessary powers to prevent these immoral publications coming in, but this should not serve as a pretext to infringe upon the rights of the local legislature to settle Sunday observance, which is a part of the powers of municipal law.

Committee rose and reported progress.

ENFRANCHISEMENT OF WOMEN.

House resumed further consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Davin :

That in the opinion of this House, the privilege of voting for candidates for membership thereof should be extended to women possessing the qualifications which now entitle men to the electoral franchise, and the motion of Mr. Laurier in amendment thereto.

Mr. FOSTER. I think when this resolution, with the amendment, was last before the House, I rose just before six o'clock to say a word or two about it. What I shall say now will be very brief indeed. The question is made up of two parts. There is the resolution of my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), which resolution I intend to vote for. I do not know as the question of giving suffrage to women has ever been exhaustively debated in this House, but it is a subject which every member has thought about more or less, upon which he has his own opinions, and in regard to which he may be able to advance his own arguments. I do not propose to go into any argument for the position I hold on that question. I am in favour of the resolution as it has been moved by my hon. friend, and I intend to vote for it. As I was challenged by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition to give the voice of the Government with regard to this question, I may say that we do not make this a Government question at all. It is a matter for the House to determine, and the members on our side are at perfect liberty to vote as they please, and to support or oppose this motion as they wish. But we cannot say so much for the amendment which was moved by the leader of the Opposition, and which shunts entirely aside the question as to whether, under any circumstances, women should have the right to vote. The hon. gentleman, under the guise of an amendment to this resolution, reopens the old and vexed question as to where the Dominion franchise resides. He brings up the old question of a Dominion franchise for Dominion purposes, or a provincial franchise for Dominion purposes, differing, of course, in every province, having no uniformity, and being, in many important particulars, as has been amply shown in this House, inadequate, as we think, to the necessities of a Dominion legislature. We say that the principle upon which a Dominion franchise ought to rest, is the principle of uniformity, so far as that can be attained; in other words, that it should be a franchise by itself. Therefore, as regards the amendment, there is a diametrical difference between my hon. friend and myself, and, of course, we cannot support the amendment. I do not think that at this stage, after the long sitting of last night, and in the extreme heat of this night, it is worth while to go into a lengthy discussion of this subject. I simply rose to state my own position upon the resolution, and the position of the Government upon the amendment.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the vote is taken, permit me very briefly to say a few words in respect of the arguments that were used against the position I took in this matter. Mr. Speaker, I put the question before the House in the coldest possible way, because I wished it to stand before the House in all its inherent practicability. I do not wish that my proposition should have any romantic advantages, if I may put it that way. My hon. friend here beside me, an excellent friend, declared that women differed from men, and that they were half angels. Well, if I may refer to an argument like that, I may say that the angelic intelligence is very much higher than the human. But I do not intend to make much reply to that kind of argument, except to say this, that when a woman has to pay taxes, when a woman fulfils the duties of a citizen, the tax-payer does not regard her in the light of an angel at all; he regards her in the light of a person having property, and having to pay taxes on that property. The aesthetic argument was made something of. The hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) took what might be called the married man's view of this question. He drew a touching picture of himself going back to his constituency in the heat of an election and finding a pair of handsome canvassers urging their political views on his wife. It was a touching picture. He seemed to think that we should have scattered over the country from Halifax to Vancouver a succession of these pictures, and every man who had a handsome wife would be in the same position, and I see from some digital indications on the part of one of my leaders that a member of the party to which I belong, an hon. gentleman who might be described as handsome and fascinating would have special advantages. I will deal with that argument, too, subsequently. What I want now to do is to get rid of alarm on the part of married men who have handsome wives. One would suppose those handsome wives never held kettle drums, or receptions, or visits from handsome men while their husbands were at business engaged in their ordinary avocation. As the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) knows, if a lady, married or single, is anxious for or susceptible to flirtation such as would alarm a married man, she will have her flirtation in defiance of gods and men.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not know so much about this subject as my hon. friend on my right (Mr. Amyot); I do not profess to be as deeply versed as some hon. gentlemen, but still I have not passed through the world altogether with my eyes closed.

Mr. AMYOT. So far as my experience goes, I repudiate this attack on the ladies.

Mr. DAVIN. So this argument presented by the hon. member for East Durham does not strike me as being at all a strong one. Then he came out with the aesthetic argument, the argument which might weigh on the soul of the hon. member for Bothwell, who yet has sympathy with this question. Women already vote for school trustees; they vote in municipal elections.

Mr. MULLOCK. Not married women.

Mr. DAVIN. No. This measure would give the vote to very few married women; it would only give votes to those who were fulfilling the duties of citizens.

Mr. LAURIER. That is a premium on celibacy.

Mr. DAVIN. You may look at it from that point of view if you like, but I do not believe that the chance of losing or gaining a vote would ever keep a woman from accepting an eligible offer. These personal questions, Sir, are very embarrassing. But, as a fact, it does not make the woman who votes at municipal elections or for school trustees, if fascinating, one whit less fascinating. History shows this. My hon. friend beside me (Mr. Amyot) must be familiar with the history of France, and know what a powerful part in the history of that nation women have played, and played partly from their intellectual power and partly also because of their powers of fascination, the intellectual conjoined with the personal charm, enabling them to play a great part, either directly as rulers, or as influencing rulers. One hon. friend, I think the hon. member for East Durham

(Mr. Craig) tried to rebut an argument of mine. Knowing what weight anything of scriptural argument has in a case of this kind with certain minds, I referred to the description of the ideal woman in the last chapter of Proverbs, and my argument was this. That clearly woman in the conception of that great writer must at that time have played a great part. The hon. member asked, Did she vote? Why, popular government did not exist then. But if he had gone back several hundred years in the history of the Jewish people, what would he have found? He would have found that in the very dawn of Theocracy, the Supreme Head of that Theocracy treats Miriam on the same footing as her two brothers were treated, Moses and Aaron. I speak it here with all reverence, that the God-head in dealing with the children of Amram in every way treated Miriam precisely on the same footing as the great law giver and as the great high priest, who were her brothers. She is treated as a representative person, as a ruler in that day. We come to a later period, to the time of the Judges, and we find Israel is reduced to a condition in which among 40,000 men there is not a spear, in which there is the utmost degradation and fear of the Philistines and the Canaanitish nations around. And who revived them and gave them subsequently peace for forty years? Deborah, who called Barak to fight against the hosts of the king of Canaan, led by Sisera. He said, "if thou wilt go with me then I will go; but if thou wilt not go with me then I will not go." And she said, "I will surely go with thee, notwithstanding the journey thou takest; shall not be for thine honour, for the Lord shall deliver Sisera into the hands of a woman." He thus agreed to go conditionally. The hosts of Canaan were scattered like the sands before the winds by reason of the valour of the soldiers of Israel under Barak, and Sisera fled. Again, we have an example of female thoroughness, and if we had lived in that period we might have found some excuse for what seems treacherous and cold hearted, when we read that Jael invited the great captain into her tent, and after giving him milk and butter and covering him up, she took a hammer and nail and drove the nail into his temple and he died, and the song as sung by Deborah is to celebrate the heroism of Jael. Well, Sir, here we have in the days of the Judges two women playing great historical parts. So in Israel, in those days long before representative government was dreamed of, we find women playing very important parts. That establishes their effectiveness. At the present time in Austria women vote. In Bohemia they vote, but in the capital of Bohemia I do not think they vote. In despotic Russia they vote for members of the assemblies. Of course, the people there have not popular government as we have it here. It is a government of despotism. but they have assemblies, and the women of Russia do what the women in free England, Canada and the United States cannot do, they vote for representatives in those assemblies. Not only so, if a woman's husband is dead and she holds property she may become a member of the Mir, the village council, and take part therein. Now, Mr. Speaker, I cannot help thinking that the argument that seems to be made very little of by the hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean) had a great deal in it. I just referred in passing to the literary power that women in the past and in the present have displayed, and my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) said: Well, women have written novels, but the novel of the "New Woman" is not a very good thing. Well, Sir, my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) is a member of Toronto University, and I was surprised to hear a graduate of that university, and who must, of course, be familiar with English literature, express the opinion, that the only great contribution that women have made to English literature is the modern novel, or the woman's novel. Why, Sir, a woman is actually the morning star of the rise of the romantic period in England; a much maligned woman, a woman of great genius, but who has been pilloried by Pope in a few pungent lines. If any one thoroughly familiar with English literature hears her name, he will know that though Alexander Pope was a man of great genius, yet he was a man, like many other men of genius, who could stoop to the very pettiest and most peevish utterances. And this woman, a woman of rare and powerful genius, was the author of a novel whose principal character was the forerunner of the ideal man of Rousseau which created such an impression upon the whole of Europe and upon the civilized world, not only from a literary point of view but from a political point of view as well. Sir, we find in the troubled times that took place in England between the fall of the first Stuarts and the Hanoverian period, that just as the romantic school in France rose in the hotels and in the salons of the brilliant women of Paris, so, in the salons and the drawing-rooms in quiet out-of-the-way places remote from the political storm, where exquisitely cultured literary people met, the romantic school was nurtured that ultimately culminated so powerfully in England. And we have not merely the lady I spoke of who is, as I say a woman of great genius and much maligned, Mrs. Aphra Behn, but we come to Mrs. Ratcliffe, the founder of that school which attained its supreme expression, not in prose but in poetry. If I am not taking up the time of the House too much from the grave matters of the tariff, let me say this: That the character that runs through all Lord Byron's poems, with the exception of one great poem, and the character of man he himself aspired to be—that character is the creation, not of Lord Byron himself, great and magnificent as his genius was, but of Mrs. Ratcliffe. The point I make is this, Sir: that the highest expression we have of the power of man is its power of creating thought, its power of throwing out its creations and giving "to airy nothing a local habitation and a name"; and which becomes a power, as we saw in the case of Rousseau, that acts like dynamite in undermining old and rock-founded institutions and blowing them to pieces, and leaving hardly a trace behind. If you can show that women have genius of that sort, you prove incontestably that they have the right to rank with men. I have not referred at all this time to such cases, as women who played leading parts as rulers, or the advisers of rulers, or the advisers of great literary men. If you have to refer to cases of that sort, if you can only show that women have played a great part in the creation of any one literature like that of England, you establish such a position for them, that in a case like this, you cannot refuse them the right that they may claim, without establishing, either their unfitness, or that they would be a danger to the state. I will not take up the time of this House by referring, as I might, to similar instances of their creative power in Greece. In fact, in every literature I might do the same; but I will only say this, echoing an illustrious member of the same race as my hon. friend (Mr. Anyot), A. Dumas fils, who says, speaking in the Academy, speaking in that proud Academy: Here we are accustomed to quote Madame de Sévigné and Madame de Stael, but were either of them living, we would not allow them within these walls. I suppose that Dumas would have been ready to say: There is not an immortal who sat within these walls the superior, hardly any the equal, of Madame de Stael. Some were not fit to wipe her shoes.

Mr. MULOCK. The member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) will tell you all about shining shoes.

Mr. DAVIN. If I go to Toronto at all, I ought to go to the Vice-Chancellor of the University. The fact is, however, that if I were looking for advice on literary subjects, I doubt if I would take the advice even of the Vice-Chancellor of the University of Toronto. I shall not further trespass upon the time of the House, but will say that there has been no arguments brought forward to overturn those which I have ventured to present. All history shows that the aesthetic objection is of no avail; all history shows that women are capable of practical affairs, capable of managing great businesses, capable of ruling, capable of playing great political parts just as well as men. The hon. member for East York (Mr.

Macleay) says: they have written bad novels, and, therefore, you must not give them the franchise. If that be so, in the name of Heaven what will you do with the brilliant author of the "Woman who Did"? What will you do with men who write bad novels? You are illogical if you do not disfranchise them. If you refuse to enfranchise a woman because she writes a bad novel, then you ought disfranchise a man for the same reason. In regard to the amendment of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, I must say that it is a dangerous amendment to my motion. I do not thank him for it as showing any sympathy. He only uses my motion to raise a very large and important question. It is a question that we have settled in this House, and I think myself it is a question that we can never allow to go from beyond our authority, namely, what power shall send us here. I do not think we can allow any minor bodies to tell us the rock whence we shall be hewn and the pit whence we shall be dug. Mr. Speaker, of course I cannot support the amendment of the leader of the Opposition, and what I do hope is, that he will withdraw that amendment, and that he will give me that gallant and generous support, which one so entirely the favourite of the fair sex ought to accord this Bill.

Mr. EDGAR. I think the hon. member, who is so distinguished for his gallantry and devotion to the fair sex, has placed the cause of the ladies in a very unfair position before this House. I do not refer to the eloquence with which he advocated it, for nothing could exceed that; I mean the position in which he has left it for his fellow members to vote upon it. In the first place, does he not know that by bringing this motion here he prevents a very large and respectable minority in this House, who believe in provincial franchises, from voting for it? He prevents us conscientiously voting for it, when we believe that electoral franchises of all kinds should belong to the provinces. Not only do we believe that, but it was perfectly apparent last session, from the introduction of a Bill on that subject by Sir John Thompson, that he at any rate, as leader of the House and leader of his party, had arrived at the same conclusion. Now, Sir, I say it is unfair to the cause which the hon. gentleman is seeking to promote to place it in such a disadvantageous position before the House. Then, I think that in another way the hon. gentleman has made a great mistake. He has announced to the House that he wishes to confine the franchise to spinsters and widows; and a great many members of this House, I am sure, would think that a much more reasonable proposal than the granting of the franchise to married women. But, Sir, the resolution of the hon. gentleman grants it to married women as well—to every woman who has the property qualification. Allow me to read the resolution, and I would like to ask the hon. gentleman to kindly explain how it can mean that it is only applicable to spinsters and widows:

That in the opinion of this House, the privilege of voting for candidates for membership thereof should be extended to women possessing the qualifications which now entitle men to the electoral franchise.

Cannot married men vote?

Mr. DAVIN. Yes.

Mr. EDGAR. Then, under the resolution, married women can vote.

Mr. DAVIN. If they have the property.

Mr. EDGAR. Exactly what I say. The hon. gentleman has made a proposal here—

Mr. MULOCK. The only proposal he has ever made.

Mr. EDGAR. Well, I do not think his proposal will be accepted. However, it is perfectly clear that the hon. gentleman's speech is on one line, and his resolution on an entirely different line; and I am very doubtful indeed if the leader of the House, when he reads this resolution and sees what it means, is going to vote for it. I do not think that is what he has in his mind at all, when he says that personally he is in favour of the resolution.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly it is.

Mr. EDGAR. I do not think the hon. gentleman means that married women should have the franchise, because the arguments addressed to us by the hon. member for West Assiniboia are to the effect that it would be only reasonable to give women for elections to this House the same franchise that they have in the province of Ontario in municipal matters and in the election of school trustees; and in those cases married women cannot vote, no matter how much property they hold. Therefore, I think the hon. gentleman has put this question into a very unfortunate shape in this House, and I am afraid that his proposal will not be accepted.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not wish to vote on this question without giving some reasons for the vote I intend to give. I have no doubt that there are in Canada a great many ladies who could as ably and intelligently discharge the duties of electors for the Dominion and the local legislatures as a great many men, and perhaps a good deal better. I was very much amused at some of the closing remarks of the hon. gentleman who moves this resolution. When a member of this House introduces a Bill, it is customary for him to state the reasons why he offers it, and in closing his remarks to answer the objections raised against it. In this case the hon. gentleman has wandered all over creation and gone back to the ancient centuries to gather some additional reasons why we should adopt this measure. If my hon. friend, in place of taking under his wing the entire fair sex of this Dominion, would centralise his affections upon one and stick to her, he would accomplish more, and, no doubt, do himself a very great kindness: and it would unquestionably be a source of relief to all the others to know that they would not be asked to enter into such a contract. Now, with regard to this question, in my humble opinion, there are a great many ladies who can intelligently discharge the duties of voting. In Ontario the ladies now have the right to vote in municipal affairs—

Mr. SPEAKER. I would draw the attention of the hon. member—he may not remember it—that he has already spoken on this motion.

Mr. DENISON. As the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) has pointed out, this resolution would permit married women who have property qualification to vote; and this would, perhaps, cause discord in the family, if both the husband and the wife possessed property. Either the wife could record her vote on the same side as her husband, as a good wife ought to do, or else, they might vote on the opposite side, which would cause discord. But for that there might be some arguments in favour of the proposition. I believe that in municipal matters it is a very good thing to allow spinsters and widows to vote, because in that way they are looking after their own property interests, and also in school matters, for in the case of widows they are looking after the schooling of their children. But as the resolution would allow married women to vote, I shall be obliged to vote against it.

Mr. CHARLTON. Before this question is put to the House, I wish to say a few words in explanation of the vote which I shall feel myself bound to give. As a friend of women suffrage, and I avow myself to be so, I have felt somewhat pained and somewhat indignant at the flippant manner in which my hon. friend from West Assiniboia discussed this question.

Mr. DAVIN. Flippant?

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, flippant; and I am sure that the intelligent women of this Dominion who seek for electoral privileges, feeling that they have a right to have a voice in the affairs of the country, will not thank the hon. member for the manner in which he has presented their claims. I have always felt that women possessing the property qualification ought to have votes, and that in voting they would strengthen that element of the electorate which seeks to promote the best interests of the country, especially upon all moral questions. Holding these views, I feel it due to myself to explain why I shall vote against the resolution. I shall vote against it, Sir, because I have frequently taken the stand in this House against the Dominion Legislature fixing the terms of the franchise in any way whatever. I have introduced a Bill this session condemning the Electoral Franchise Act, and affirming the principle that the terms of the franchise should be fixed by the provincial legislatures. Holding that view, it is impossible for me to vote for this resolution. While I may be, and am in favour of woman's suffrage to a certain extent, I do not believe that the legislation granting that privilege should emanate from this House. I do not believe that this House should deal with the question of suffrage at all. It is one that pertains to the jurisdiction of the province, and therefore I shall vote against the resolution.

Mr. McDONALD (Victoria). The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is not quite so fair as he would wish this House to believe. He says he is in favour of woman suffrage, but at the same time is opposed to it simply because the resolution proposes that it should be granted by this House. I am opposed to the franchise of the different provinces and more particularly that of Nova Scotia, for I believe it would be almost impossible to imagine any country having such a franchise and such a method of making up electoral lists. While apparently it is quite fair, yet under it the most unfair lists imaginable are made. In the first place the assessors are appointed by municipal councils. The councillors are very prominent ward politicians in almost every instance, and the assessors whom they appoint have also great power and discretion in preparing the lists, under the provincial franchise Act. For instance if a man is assessed at $149 real estate, there is no way by which you can get his name upon the lists, but if he is not assessed at all he can go before the reviser and have his name put on by proving that he owns real estate worth $150. There are many similar anomalies. Then the final revision is made by the sheriff, who is appointed by the local government and holds office at pleasure. It is very amusing to see how those lists are revised by the sheriffs. They are deposited on or before the 18th March, and very often are not deposited until the very last day. In the county I represent, this year they were not deposited until the last day. The sheriff commences his revision by law on the 20th and completes it on the 31st March, which gives him exactly about ten days to revise the lists for the whole county; and when you come to consider that the shiretown is over 110 miles from the extreme end of the county, you will find it is almost impossible to have the lists revised except for localities immediately adjoining the shiretown where the sheriff holds office. Notices have to be given to the parties objected to, and notice must also be given of the parties whose names are to be added. I am not finding fault with any particular sheriff, but I remember one instance when a man went in and succeeded in getting a name on the list. Two or three days later another party came in and gave evidence to strike the name off. This party said: But what is the use, to-morrow you will have two or three men on the other side who will give evidence in favour of having the name put on again. The sheriff said: I will send you word in that case and you will have a chance to bring in two or three witnesses to corroborate what you said. There is no special day fixed for the hearing, and in this way a great deal of injustice is done. Men holding office under the Dominion Government, particularly light-house keepers, men working on the railways and in the customs and Inland Revenue Departments—are very often left off the list. At one time it was proposed that any person holding any office under the Dominion Government should not be allowed to sit as councillor, and if the electoral lists were entirely left in the hands of the provincial authorities, they would manipulate them in such a way that it would be impossible to have anything like fairness. I know of a case where a sheriff, in dealing with an electoral list, had a charge laid against him by a certain party of incivility. The local legislature was sitting at the time, and a day or two before its close, a Bill was quietly put through the House, without anybody being properly aware of its purport, providing that when a charge was laid against a sheriff, the local government need not appoint him as returning officer at the elections, and this particular sheriff was deprived of that duty and its emoluments. It may have been that the House understood that if any sheriff were guilty of malfeasance in office or anything of that kind he should not be appointed and did not understand that the Bill was aimed at one particular sheriff. This House would commit a great mistake if it were to place the making of the lists in the hands of the provincial governments, for these governments use all devices and means in having the lists made out to suit themselves, and if a sheriff does not carry out their behests he can be punished, and this possibility is always before his eyes. Although I am not very strongly in favour of the resolution of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), I think there is every reason for giving it fair degree of support. We know that in the debates that took place in Great Britain it was pointed out that they were continually descending in extending the franchise, and it was thought that they might make a lateral extension rather than a perpendicular extension. We know that a large number of women are successfully engaged in business to-day. In the city of Halifax, at one time the principal dry goods merchant was a lady, and, to-day, one of the largest ready-made clothing establishments in that city has at its head a lady, who conducts the business very successfully. Women are taking the places of men in a great many occupations in the country. The last census of the United States shows that in hundreds of positions of emolument and trust throughout the country, women occupy the places formerly occupied by men, and the same is true of Canada. This being the case, I do not see why the franchise should not be extended to women. For these reasons I propose to vote against the amendment and support the proposition of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin).

Mr. McISAAC. I have no wish to take up time, but the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McDonald) has made some statements which, although they do not, in my opinion, relate to the Bill under discussion, call for some notice. He has taken occasion to make an attack upon the Government of Nova Scotia, and he endeavoured to impress this House with the belief that the voters' lists in Nova Scotia are made up under the control of the Government of that province. I desire to tell this House that the government or legislature have no control directly or indirectly over the preparation of those lists. The lists are made up by officers appointed by the county councils of the various municipalities, whose members are directly elected by the people. My hon. friend has referred to the fact that the Court of Appeal in case of dispute as to the names to be put on or struck off the lists is the sheriff of each county, and the arraignment he has made is against the sheriff of his own county. I understand.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). There are other counties.

Mr. McISAAC. Yes, the counties of Inverness, Colchester and Digby, for instance, whose sheriffs, constituting the courts of appeal in these counties, are Tories, and in all the other counties the sheriffs, from the nature of their appointment, being during good behaviour, as well as for their good standing in other respects, to say the least of it, compare very favourably with the revising barristers. The sheriff in the hon. gentleman's county (Victoria) is a Conservative, not only a Conservative, but he is the hon. gentleman's own brother-in-law. Now, Sir, the Court of Appeal in the county of Victoria, which court has been established by the local government is presided over by a partisan and brother-in-law of the hon. member. What better court does he want? Yet he seeks to impress this House with the belief that the lists are made up under the control of the government and legislature of the province. The hon. gentleman tells the House that a Bill was smuggled through the Nova Scotia legislature, the object of which was to take away from the sheriffs in some counties the right to act as returning officers in some cases. That Act, Mr. Speaker, is one which will commend itself to the sober consideration of any legislature. When any charge is preferred against a sheriff, whether a Conservative or a Liberal, is it not right and just that, if he is not deemed fit to discharge his duties of sheriff on account of malfeasance in office, while these charges are being investigated that he should not be permitted to act as returning officer for any particular county? This Bill, the hon. gentleman says, was smuggled through the legislature of Nova Scotia. What does he mean, Sir? Could any stronger charge be made against the hon. gentleman's friends in the legislature than that? What is the use of a Conservative Opposition in Nova Scotia if they permit Bills to be smuggled through against the interest of their own party or of the province generally? I say that no Liberal in Nova Scotia, in the legislature or in the press has ever made a stronger attack upon the friends of the hon. gentleman than he himself has made. What are they good for? Why do they not resign and go home, leaving their places to better men, if they can do no better than to allow such Bills to be smuggled through the House? Sir, this Bill was not smuggled through the House. I was in the legislature at the time it was passed. It passed its first, its second and its third reading in due form, and was fully discussed. If it did not receive adequate consideration on the part of the Opposition, they should, as I say, resign and leave their places to such men as the hon. gentleman who was himself at one time a member of the local opposition in that province, if they have no eyes to see and no ears to hear. In conclusion, let me say that the arguments adduced by the hon. gentleman have no relevancy to the Bill under discussion. If this subject is left to the control of the province, it simply means that it is handed over to the municipal councils elected by the people themselves; it is removed from any direct or indirect control by the legislature or government of the province and the Dominion—in fact, it is placed in the hands of the people themselves.

Mr. GILLIES. I am certainly very much surprised at the attitude assumed by the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat. That an hon. gentleman, coming fresh from the legislature of the province of Nova Scotia—

Mr. DENISON. Too fresh.

Mr. GILLIES—too fresh, as my hon. friend from Toronto just suggested—a legislature that in days gone by has had every reason to boast of the men who have formed its membership—should take the position taken by the hon. member, is a matter for surprise indeed. The hon. gentleman has attempted to give this House an insight into the manner in which the lists are made up in the province of Nova Scotia. He attempted to show, but in a very lame manner indeed, I am sorry to say, the method pursued by the authorities in making up these lists. He would have this House believe that the Government of Nova Scotia exercises no control whatever over the making up of those lists; but in a few words, I think, I can convince this House that the contrary is the case. What, Mr. Speaker, is the formation of the court that makes up these lists? In the first place the court of appeal in these cases is simply the sheriff of the county, and that sheriff is appointed by the local government and holds office during their pleasure. Could there be a more partisan or more one-sided court than this? Yet this is the tribunal that hon. gentlemen opposite want established to govern the franchise that will elect members to this House. With the Dominion lists it is different. These lists are made up by the revising officer, who holds his office not during pleasure, but during good behaviour, and can only be removed from office by joint vote of both Houses of Parliament. Now, Mr. Speaker, it would be a retrograde step entirely on the part of this Parliament to vote for the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition. It would destroy the uniformity of franchise in elections for members of this House. Why should not the franchise upon which a member from the province of Nova Scotia is elected be the same as for one from the province of New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island, or Manitoba, or British Columbia? Why should I from Nova Scotia come here under a different franchise from that which sends here any of my hon. friends from other provinces? If you go back to the provincial franchises as they now prevail in the different provinces, what do you find? In the province of Nova Scotia with which I am most familiar, we find that every individual holding a position of emolument from the federal authority, is disqualified from voting for members for the provincial legislature. No matter how high an individual may be in the municipality, no matter what property he may hold, no matter what rates he may contribute to the municipal treasury, no matter how eminent he may be in the community, yet if he holds a position of lighthouse keeper, or any petty position whatever, bringing him a salary of $500 per year, he is disqualified from voting for a member of the provincial legislature. And you would have that system prevail in electing members to this House? Sir, I will cite a single case from the county I have the honour to represent, which will go far to show the monstrous injustice that is perpetrated by the Act that was passed by the friends of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. There was a case of one of the very best farmers in the county of Richmond, a man that stands eminently high in the community in which he lives, a man that owns a large property, a man that contributes largely to the municipal treasury, a man that has lived for years and years in the county, and simply because he holds a small light-house, he was disfranchised and made incapable of voting for a member of the local assembly. And yet you would have that system prevail in electing members for this House. Though I am not at all in agreement with the motion of the hon. member for Assiniboia, I prefer to vote for it than to vote for the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition. If I were forced to choose between them, I would prefer the motion of the hon. member for Assiniboia with all its deformities, in my opinion, rather than to take the backward step proposed by the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) As it is late, and after the long sitting we had yesterday, this House is tired, and as I have some observations to make in connection with this important question, I move that the debate be now adjourned.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend wishes to carry on the debate still further, of course, like every other member, he should have the opportunity to speak, and we will adjourn the debate. But if my hon. friend is not anxious to continue the debate, I may say that I had made an arrangement by which a vote could be taken. Therefore I will just leave it with my hon. friend to decide for himself. The reason I suggest an adjournment or a vote is because of the late sitting of last night.

Mr. DUPONT. I intend to speak upon this question.

Motion agreed to ; and debate adjourned.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to ; and House adjourned at 10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 31st May, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 104) to amend the Civil Service Act (from the Senate).—(Mr. Foster.)

Bill (No. 103) to amend the Copyright Act (from the Senate).—(Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.)

QUESTIONS PUT BY MEMBERS.

Mr. SPEAKER. In reference to the matter which was referred to by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), and which was reserved for further consideration, respecting questions put by members, I find that in the British House of Commons, the practice is as stated by the hon. member for Queen's. I will read what Sir Erskine May says with regard to it :

An answer should be confined to the points contained in the question, with such explanations only as renders the answer intelligible, though a certain latitude is permitted to Ministers of the Crown ; and further questions, without debate or comment, may, within due limits, be addressed to them, which are necessary for the elucidation of the answers that they have given. The Speaker has called the attention of the House to the inconvenience that arises from an excessive demand for further replies, and, to hinder the practice, he has occasionally felt it necessary to call upon the member in whose name the next question stands upon the Notice paper, to put his question.

It will thus be seen that although the practice is permitted in England of putting further questions arising out of questions upon the Notice paper, the limitations are very strict, and the limitations respecting the introduction of debatable matter are absolute. My own experience in regard to the practice in this Parliament is that these supplementary questions are not put here. I have never known supplementary questions such as are spoken of in the quotation I have just given to be put here ; and, after careful consideration of the whole matter, and taking into consideration the fact that the facilities for putting questions upon the paper are very great—on three days of the week questions put by members come first in the order of business—I have come to the conclusion that it would not be wise for us to depart from the practice that has prevailed heretofore. Then, with regard to another matter, the point raised by the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) respecting answers given by Ministers to questions put upon the paper, I think it would be just as well to set the matter at rest at once, and to do so. I will quote the decisions of Mr. Speaker Peel :

The Prime Minister being asked if he adhered to the statement made by the Secretary of State for India, declines to answer such a question, which he thinks ought not to be put, and Mr. Speaker being appealed to by the hon. member who put the question—

Mr. SPEAKER. It is entirely within the discretion of the First Lord of the Treasury to decide what answer he shall give.

Then, on another occasion he says :

It is entirely within the discretion of a Minister of the Crown to give to a question any answer which he thinks right. It is for him to judge what answer should be given. No question of order can arise on this point.

Upon another occasion he makes the same ruling :

It is within the discretion of a Minister, whether he can answer, and in what way, a question put.

THE MARKLAND MORTGAGE.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, on Monday next, to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to authorize the Minister of Finance to execute, on behalf of Her Majesty, a release and discharge of a certain mortgage given to Her Majesty in 1858 by the Hon. George H. Markland upon certain properties in the city of Kingston, which were sold in 1862 under the said mortgage, and to convey the properties so sold, freed and discharged from the said mortgage, to the persons entitled thereto, on payment of such part of the purchase money as now remains unpaid, either with or without interest, and on such other terms and conditions as the Minister deems expedient in the public interest.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has the Minister of Finance got that mortgage in his custody? Because it ought, I think, to be laid upon the Table.

Mr. FOSTER. I have not it with me here. All the papers in connection with the matter will be laid upon the Table. The hon. gentleman was not present the other day when I introduced the Bill. On looking over it, it will be seen that we must proceed by way of resolution first.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is the Bill printed?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And is the mortgage attached?

Mr. FOSTER. Not attached to the Bill. I promised, on introducing the Bill, to bring all the papers down.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think that in a Bill of that kind the full text of the document should be set out. It is very awkward to have such a document laid on the Table just when the hon. gentleman is proceeding with the second reading. It ought to be in our hands some time in advance.

Mr. FOSTER. I will bring the papers down before the second reading.

Mr. MULOCK. This resolution, if carried, settles the whole principle, as I understand it.

Mr. FOSTER. I am only giving notice for Monday next.

Motion agreed to.

SALARIES OF JUDGES.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, on Monday next, to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to amend the Act respecting the judges of provincial courts, and to provide that the salaries of the judges hereinafter mentioned shall be as follows:—

Mr. SPEAKER.

Two judges of the Circuit Court of the District of Montreal, each $3,000 per annum;

Five County Court judges in Manitoba, each $2,000 per annum during the first three years of service, and after three years of service, each $2,400 per annum;

The local judge of the District of British Columbia, $1,000 per annum.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether here is any addition to the number of judges, or whether this is a re-arrangement of salaries?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is no addition to the number of judges, this is only done in order to incorporate these appointments in the general statutes, which was overlooked. The salaries have been voted in the Estimates each session, and this practice will be followed this year. But this will bring the salaries of these judges under the same procedure as other similar salaries.

Mr. DENISON. Is it contemplated to increase the salaries of the judges in Ontario?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I may say that it is not contemplated to propose increases in the salaries of judges this year.

Mr. BRODEUR. I understand that I shall have an opportunity to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that one of the judges—

Mr. SPEAKER. I draw the attention of the House to the fact that no discussion can take place under this motion, but a discussion may take place when a motion is made to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BRODEUR. The question to the Minister of Justice is this, whether he is aware that one of the judges of the Circuit Court of Montreal, for whose salaries he is going to provide, died some time ago? I think it would be in the interest of the district of Montreal that the new judge should be appointed as soon as possible, because I may say the other judge is sick, and a great deal of inconvenience has resulted.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that expedition should obtain, and in a short time I hope that the appointment will be made.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Who is going to receive the appointment?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Ask me in a month.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—DELAYED RETURNS.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. BRODEUR. Before this motion is carried, I desire to draw the attention of the House to the fact that some years ago I asked for a return concerning a dismissal of a postmaster in my county. That return was ordered four years ago, and I call the attention of the Postmaster General to the fact that the papers have not yet been brought down. I understand that they could be produced if the Postmaster General were willing. I may say that in 1892 I had a motion carried in this House calling for the production of all petitions, correspondence, vouchers and inspector's reports concerning the dismissal of that postmaster. That motion was carried without any objection on the part of the Postmaster General. Towards the end of the session of 1892, I again called his attention to the fact that this return had not been brought down, and the only answer I received was that the papers had been lost. I thought at that time that this answer of the Postmaster General was perfectly correct, but I understand now, from information which has been conveyed to me, that the answer of the hon. gentleman was erroneous; that in fact the papers have never been lost, but that they have always been and still remain in the hands of the Postmaster General. The other day I asked the hon. gentleman "when will the said papers be brought down?" and the Postmaster General answered:

In answer to the hon. gentleman I may say that the papers referred to in his question, have disappeared from the office of the Secretary of State, and have not yet been recovered. I have already had the honour to give the same answer to the hon. member. The only paper in the Postmaster General's Department is the inspector's report, which is confidential.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I am in a position to say that the information given to this House by the hon. the Postmaster General to the effect that these papers had been lost, is quite erroneous. The most important paper that I asked from the Postmaster General was a voucher, that is to say, an envelope on which that dismissal took place. That envelope has always remained in the hands of the department, and the Postmaster General has got that envelope in his department to-day. I do not know why, when this House has ordered the production of these papers and of these vouchers, they have not been already laid before the House. I know well that some years ago the same information was given to me; I was then informed that these papers were lost. But, Mr. Speaker, I had occasion to issue a subpoena against the Deputy Postmaster General, and he produced those papers, and among them the envelope in question. I must say further that at the same time a letter was sent from the department to my adversaries in that case, in which they were told that if they wanted those documents they could have them when they wished. Therefore, Mr.

Speaker, these papers are refused to members of this House when they have been ordered, and the Postmaster General says that he cannot produce them because they are lost, but at the same time he conveys information to my adversaries that he is willing to let them see these papers whenever they wish. It is a very curious position. I was greatly surprised the other day when the Postmaster General told me that these vouchers and this envelope were lost, although the envelope had been produced in court some time ago as an exhibit, and although it is still in the hands of the Government. But there is more than that. The hon. gentleman says he cannot produce the inspector's report because it is confidential. Well, in 1892, a motion was carried in this House that the report should be brought down. I admit there was no discussion at the time, and perhaps it was owing to the terms of the order not being sufficiently explicit, that the Postmaster General did not produce that report. But last year we had a discussion upon that subject, and it was decided by the House that the Government should produce that inspector's report. I may say that Sir John Thompson himself, then leader of the House, spoke on the question, and said that usually it was better not to produce before the House inspectors' reports, but that as it was alleged in this particular instance that the inspector's report was not strictly true, it was certainly well to produce it. The hon. member from South Oxford had previously said that these reports should have been produced, and Sir John Thompson used this language:

I quite admit that there may be cases in which even confidential reports should be submitted to Parliament, especially if such confidential reports have misled the action of a public department.

After this admission by Sir John Thompson, the motion was carried; consequently the Postmaster General now has no right to say that he will not produce this report when his leader last year admitted that it ought to be produced. But there is more than that. Last year a motion was carried according to which, not only that report should be produced, but also all the documents in the case of Loisselle and Guillet, a case which was decided some two years ago in Montreal. That motion was carried at the instance of Sir John Thompson himself, who said that these papers should be brought down. Yet the hon. Postmaster General told me the other day that those papers were lost, and that he did not have them in his possession. Well, Sir, I am in a position to state the contrary; I am in a position to say that the papers concerning the case of Loisselle and Guillet are in his possession. I went to Montreal last week, and inquired from the Prothonotary, who told me that the papers had been sent to the department, and I know that they are now in the hands of the department. Under these circumstances, it is strange indeed, that the Postmaster General should tell a member of this House that the papers had been lost, and that he is unable to bring them down. This House, having ordered the production of these papers, which are very important documents, I do not know why they have not been produced, and I do not know particularly why the Postmaster General should inform the House that these papers have been lost, when the envelope, at all events, appears to be in the hands of the department, and when it appears that other parties have seen the papers. What is the object of the Government in delaying the production of these documents? The object of the Postmaster General, I understand to be, is to prevent the truth becoming known concerning this individual. In 1891 the Minister of Railways declared in this House that the postmaster had been dismissed because a registered letter had been improperly detained and the post-mark altered. This was a very serious offence if the charge was true. We endeavoured to have the inquiry made by the Government but it was always refused. New legal proceedings were taken before the court, and these ended in the man being proved entirely innocent of the charge laid against him by the Government, and the Minister of Railways in this House. There was no foundation whatever for the charge, and last year the Postmaster General was obliged to admit that the man was not guilty, and should not have been dismissed for the reasons given. It was proved by the document, which the Postmaster General will not now produce to this House, that the charges made by the Minister of Railways were entirely erroneous, especially that complaint had been made by a man named Guillet. He came into court and declared positively that he had never made any complaint as had been stated by the Minister of Railways. Under these circumstances, I think it is the duty of the Government to produce these papers; I think the Government is bound to produce them, because there is an order of the House to that effect. The fact of having disregarded this order, and failing to fulfil the order of the House will, I suppose, induce the Government to produce the papers immediately.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I have to acknowledge the courtesy of the hon. gentleman in writing me previous to the meeting of the House this afternoon that he was going to bring up the question which he has just submitted to the House. But if I do acknowledge his courtesy in having given me notice, I have to challenge his statements as not being absolutely founded on facts. I told the hon. gentleman that the papers had been transferred from the department over which I now preside to the Department of the Secretary of State, when my friend, Mr. Chapleau, occupied that position. The papers which were so transferred have not been recovered. I also told the hon. gentleman, and it was a fact known to every member of the House, that the reports of our inspectors are confidential, and there is an Order in Council, which is known by those gentlemen who have been in Parliament for a number of years, preventing these reports being brought down and laid on the Table of the House.

Mr. BRODEUR. Does the hon. gentleman state that the envelope is lost?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I will answer the hon. gentleman fully, if he will permit me, and I will go into every matter submitted. The reason for passing that Order in Council is quite obvious. These reports are brought down for the efficient administration of the department by the Postmaster General, and it is necessary that the most confidential information be conveyed by the inspectors, who are selected for the purpose of going from one end of the Dominion to the other to investigate every important and intricate question, and submit it to the department, and that this information should be as full and complete as possible. If these reports were submitted to Parliament and discussed and criticised, it would become impossible to get inspectors to submit them in such detail as to enable the Postmaster General to efficiently administer his department. As to this report, we have the report of the inspector in the department. The hon. gentleman cannot point to a single case when the question was brought up—and it has been brought up on more than one occasion—when I stated that the report was not in the department; and I believe that the envelope is in the hands of the department, but I would not be positive. I received notice from the hon. gentleman as I was going into Council, and I say that I believe that the envelope is in the department, but I am not positive. If it is, I have no objection to bring down the envelope, and submit it to the hon. gentleman, and lay it on the Table of the House. But the hon. gentleman knows very well that in the case of Loiselle vs. Guillet, one of the contentions of the counsel for Loiselle was that the report of the inspector should be produced, and the court ruled that the report should not be produced, for the reason I have already stated to the House, that it was a confidential document. If, when the man was on his trial, the court decided that the confidential nature of the report was such that it should not be brought down, I do not see how the hon. gentleman can ask me to break the rules and precedents that have invariably been followed in the department over which I now preside, and produce that report. The hon. gentleman knows, and he has so stated, that this matter took place before I was Postmaster General. But I am prepared to take the responsibility of my predecessor's action, for I consider the course he followed was as unobjectionable as the course which I am following to-day. A colleague, a member of the Government asked him to send over the record and it was sent over. These papers, as I have told the hon. gentleman on more than one occasion—because there is no reason why I should try to hide them from the hon. gentleman—would be produced if they were available; but they were sent over to the Department of State, and my deputy informs, and has informed me on several occasions when the matter was brought up that the papers were never recovered. I am giving the hon. gentleman the information I have been able to gather from my departmental officers, who are responsible for looking after the documents and official record, and they tell me the papers are not in my department. The only document in possession of my department in relation to this case is the report of the inspector, which, following the precedents and practice established in previous years, I refuse positively to bring down. As to the envelope, I will not pretend to give any official information in regard to it, because I am merely speaking from recollection, but I think it is in the department, and if it is, the hon. gentleman is very welcome to it. Outside that, we have no information that I could convey to hon. gentlemen. In my opinion it was rather strange that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Brodeur) should say that he has information from my department which led him to state that the Postmaster General refused to convey information which he has communicated to parties who were opposed, or hostile (I forget the exact word he used) to the clients whom the hon. gentleman represents. That is an unwarranted statement for the hon. gentleman to make, and he should have been better informed before he did make it. I state here upon my responsibility as Postmaster General, and from my place in Parliament, that all the documents which could be produced—outside of the report of the inspector, which could not be produced—have disappeared. It looks as if the hon. gentleman has been seeking information in my department in a way in which he should not try to get it. He should not have stated that my object in refusing these papers was to protect some people. The circumstances of the case arose before my time as Postmaster General, and I know nothing at all about the original quarrel. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Brodeur) makes the broad statement here, that he has been enabled by means which he has not qualified, and which I would not like to qualify, to get information from my department which places me as head of that department in a position which I certainly would not like to occupy before the House. I say again to the hon. gentleman, that if the envelope is in the possession of the department he may have it; but I will not bring down the report of the inspector, because it is my duty to refuse it.

Mr. BRODEUR. The papers have been sent from Montreal to the department to be filed there.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman states so, but that is not an absolute reason why I should consider that the information I get from my officers is not to be credited.

Mr. LAURIER. The reasons given by the Postmaster General why this order, now three years out, has not been complied with, are, to say the least, very extraordinary.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I have given the hon. gentleman the reasons.

Mr. LAURIER. I will discuss the reasons given by the hon. gentleman. Three years ago the House ordered the hon. gentleman to bring forth certain documents. He says that so far as he was concerned, he complied with that order by sending the papers to the Secretary of State's office, and that there they disappeared and were lost. That is the reason he has given why the order has not been complied with ever since that time. Does he not see how hollow that statement is?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No.

Mr. LAURIER. Well, here is the order of the House:

Copies of all petitions, correspondence, vouchers, depositions, inspectors' reports and documents whatever, respecting the dismissal of B. Loïselle, Esq., postmaster of the parish of Angèle, county of Rouville.

This ordered the Postmaster General, not to give the original document, but simply to send copies. He sent the copies of his official correspondence to the Secretary of State, and now he tells us that those copies have been destroyed or lost. What does it matter if the copies have been lost.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I say the originals have been lost.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman had no business to send the originals to the Secretary of State's office. He told us a moment ago that the papers have not been lost in his office but lost in the Secretary of State's office. The papers which were lost in the Secretary of State's office were simply copies and the originals remained in his own department. Why, then, had not the hon. gentleman new copies made for the House? Does he not see that his answer will not do? Does he not see that there is something beyond that?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No.

Mr. LAURIER. Does the hon. gentleman pretend that he sent the original papers to the Secretary of State?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes, I did.

Mr. LAURIER. Well, the hon. gentleman had no business to do that, and if he did do it, he did not comply with the order which was for copies and not for the originals. If the hon. gentleman has deprived his office of these original documents, he has done what was never done before. He has done what his duty did not call upon him to do, and, moreover, he has done what his duty forbade him to do. If the hon. gentleman did not keep the originals in his office he was derelict in his duty. The statement that the papers have been lost in the Secretary of State's office is a shallow and a hollow explanation to give why the order of the House has not been complied with. The House cannot be satisfied with that answer. Then, the hon. gentleman tells us that after all, one part of the correspondence may be in his office yet; it may be that the envelope is in his office, but he is not quite sure. How is it that he is not sure? He had notice that this matter would be brought up in the House, and yet he can only surmise as to whether that original document was in his office or not. The hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) took exception to the strong language which was used by my hon. friend (Mr. Brodeur), but the explanation he has given is another illustration that in this case, as in many others, though an order of the House is passed, and though the Government had not the courage, at the time, to resist it, yet they evade it by not obeying the order.

Mr. HAGGART. If there is any blame in this matter, it rests upon me and not upon the present Postmaster General. When that order of the House was passed, Mr. Chapleau was Secretary of State, and he sent over for the papers in reference to this particular case. The original documents were sent over, as is done every day. When a Minister asks his colleagues for particular papers, the original papers are sent over to him, and that is the practice in the departments. Some way or another, the papers were mislaid in the Department of State, and from that day to this we have not been able to get the original papers from that department. Mr. Chapleau did not know what became of them; but the fact is, that the documents never came from his hands back to the Post Office Department.

Mr. BRODEUR. I have seen them in the courts of Montreal since.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken.

Mr. BRODEUR. I have seen them myself.

Mr. LAURIER.

Mr. HAGGART. I remember the circumstances, and I have been informed by the deputy, who is outside now, what documents did go down to Montreal. The report of the inspector was sent down and the Deputy Postmaster General refused to show it in court, and he was authorized by the judge who presided at the trial not to show the documents, as they were confidential. The only document that is at present in the possession of the Post Office Department is the report of the inspector; the original envelope, as the hon. gentleman states, which I do not see any possible objection to showing; but the report of the inspector is regarded in every department as confidential, and is never brought down, even although an order of the House is given, because the reservation is always that if the report is ordered by the House, and the Government thinks it is confidential, they have always a right of retaining it, and have always exercised that right hitherto.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has made a statement which I do not think is altogether accurate, and I will read the order of the House from which he will see that it does not warrant that statement:

Copies of all petitions, correspondence, vouchers, depositions, inspectors' reports and documents whatsoever.

Now, whatever may be the inclination of the Government—

Mr. HAGGART. Let me ask the hon. gentleman before he proceeds in what particular am I in error?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I will state to the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman says that even though the House has ordered a report to be brought down, the Government have a right to keep back that report. I deny any such proposition. The Government are subordinate to this House, and while they may urge the confidential character of the report as a reason for not agreeing to such an order, if the House nevertheless disregards the reason assigned by the Government and makes the order, it is the business of the Government to comply with that order. Now, why did the House make this order? My hon. friend, when he made the motion on the first occasion, showed that the inspector had made an improper report. The inspector was charged with being a conspirator with certain parties in the constituency for the purpose of removing this man from office; and in the face of such a charge, the Government had no right to refuse to bring down the report of the inspector. Why should that report be withheld? If the inspector, instead of discharging his duty faithfully, entered into such a conspiracy and made a false report to the Postmaster General for the purpose of giving the Government a pretext for the removal of this man from office, it was the duty of the Government to bring down that report and allow the facts to be disclosed, in order that the inspector might have an opportunity of defending himself, or that the Government might be called upon by the House to remove him from office. Why, Sir, if the rule just laid down by the hon. Minister of Railways were a correct rule, it would be in the power of the Government to make any officer of any department a conspirator for the removal of some political opponent from office. I do not say that that power would be used; but in this case the charge was that this man did so act, whether with or against the advice or intention of the Government is a matter of no consequence. What is of consequence is that that charge was made against him, and it is because of that charge that the Minister of Railways as Postmaster General did not resist the order of the House. Now, Sir, the order of the House is perfectly clear: it is that all papers shall be brought down, and amongst those papers it specifies the report made by the inspector. Now, the hon. Postmaster General of to-day says he will not bring down the report of the inspector. Does the hon. gentleman intend to set at defiance the order of the House? Does he intend to set himself above Parliament and to say that although Parliament has made this order, he will not obey the order? Is that the position he takes? If it is, we ought to know it.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Would the hon. gentleman permit me to interrupt him for one moment? I do not at all contend that I may disobey the order of the House, but I contend that the order of the House would not ask me to bring down a document which is considered to be confidential; and the reason the inspector's report has not been brought down is that an Order in Council was passed removing such documents from among those which were to be brought down to the House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I must again remind the hon. gentleman that the charge was that the inspector had become a conspirator with other parties for removing this postmaster from office, that he prostituted his office and abused the trust committed to him; and it was because that charge was made that this House decided that the inspector's report should be brought down. The question of the confidential character of documents is a question of policy. If the House, for any reason, considers that such a document ought to be brought down, it orders it. If the Government think it ought not to be brought down, they resist the motion for the order; but if they are beaten on the motion, the document will nevertheless be produced. The Government did not think proper to resist the motion for this report; they assented to the motion, and having done so, they have no right to refuse the production of the report.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I cannot bring to this discussion any lengthy experience in Parliament; but I can refer, and, I think, with some relevance, to my experience since 1883. There has been an understanding, both tacit and expressed across the floor, in connection with returns with which I have been particularly concerned, that when a general order for papers was passed, such papers or despatches as were of a confidential nature would not be included. In this very session, if I mistake not, certainly in other sessions when I was connected with the Department of Marine and Fisheries, that was the understanding.

Mr. LAURIER. Stated at the time.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And stated at the time, as the leader of the Opposition says. If the House thought well, the order was so made as to cover every document in the hands of the department, with the understanding that as a matter of course confidential despatches could not and would not be brought down.

Mr. MULOCK. That would be limited to the particular motion.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That was limited to the particular motion. I say that while in some cases that understanding was expressed, and they might differ in that respect from cases in which no statement was made, the practice has been that papers of a confidential character would not be brought down unless specially referred to. If the House desired to depart from that practice, it would state in the order the reports of officers, confidential or otherwise. But this question which the hon. member for Bothwell has raised, can, I think, be summarily disposed of by referring to the discussion that took place in reference to this very report. When the present Minister of Railways and Canals was at the head of the Post Office Department, and at the very time, in 1890, I think, when this subject was mooted and this order was moved for, he stated that he could not bring down the reports of inspectors because there was an Order in Council which made these confidential documents in the interest of the public service, and such as should not be laid before Parliament.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Not in this case.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I thought it was in reference to this case, but in 1890, the hon. gentleman will find, on consulting "Hansard," that the Postmaster General then laid down the rule that the reports of the Post Office inspectors were considered as confidential, and my recollection is that no one disputed that fact. This rule has obtained ever since we had a government. It is a rule of common sense which commends itself at once. The reports would be of very little value if the officer reporting, in connection particularly with charges of fraud, knew that his report was liable to be laid before Parliament. Until the House reverses the rule that has always obtained, hon. gentlemen opposite have no reason to complain. I think it will be a long time before they will see that rule reversed, and until we do, until this House decides that such reports are not to be considered secret and confidential, my hon. friend the Postmaster General cannot be assailed for not producing them. I referred a moment ago to the session of 1890 when a similar motion was made with reference to a post office at Pierreville, Quebec. The Postmaster then said, without any demur on the part of the hon. gentleman :

There is no objection to bring down all the papers which are usually brought down, but the reports of the inspectors are generally printed as confidential.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Strike out the words, "and report."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Hon. gentlemen certainly, to some extent, make a point, but it is only a technical point. It is a very narrow point, that because the safer course was adopted in that particular instance, that because the word "report" was struck out, they make a case. Against that I set the uncontradicted statement of the Postmaster General that these reports were confidential. Against that I set the practice that has obtained, and which did obtain in that case, against bringing down that class of reports. It is the same practice that obtains, for instance, with regard to confidential despatches between this and the Imperial Government. Whether there is or not an open understanding across the floor of the House, no Government, even if the papers were ordered in general terms, would hesitate for a moment in refusing to bring down secret despatches between it and the Imperial Government. The Governor General himself is forbidden to allow these papers to be laid before the House. He is expressly directed not to do that, and that position has never been challenged on the floor of this House.

Mr. LISTER. I do not see that the remarks of the Minister of Justice have strengthened the position which the Government has taken in this matter in the slightest degree. What are the facts? It appears that at the time this order of the House was passed, the Order in Council referred to by the Postmaster General was in existence. It was then his duty to have refused to produce the inspector's report if he ever intended to refuse it. The charge was made that the inspector was a party to a conspiracy for the purpose of injuring an official of this country. In order to substantiate that charge, my hon. friend asked that all the papers should be laid before the House. The Government at that time might have refused to bring down what they considered a confidential report. The Minister of Justice at the time, who was also leader of the House, was aware of the object, and after considering the circumstances concluded that while it might not be expedient in many cases to produce such confidential reports there were cases in which the production might be necessary and expedient. It was admitted then by the Government that the report of this officer was one of those cases. I am told that after the vote of the House had passed, the Postmaster General said that that report would never be laid before Parliament, and three years have elapsed without our having obtained it. What are the facts? A man is appointed postmaster, a conspiracy is hatched for the purpose of depriving him of his position and ruining his reputation and character. The Government stand by the conspirators and refuse to bring down evidence that will vindicate the reputation and character of that man. Is it possible to imagine more contemptible and disgraceful conduct? You have dismissed the man upon evidence that will vindicate the reputation on a report that was not founded on truth or fact, and when evidence is brought to show that this man was not guilty of the charge made against him by the inspector, you refuse to restore him to his position, and you refuse to give him the commonest justice that would be accorded to any man in a free country—the right to establish beyond doubt his innocence of the charge made against him. Could any conduct be more contemptible or disgraceful? Why, if such reports as this be considered confidential, the greatest tyranny and despotism may be exercised by the Government. It is within my knowledge that in the case of a post office, within a hundred miles of Ottawa, of which the postmaster is a son of a member of this House, where the letters were regularly opened, where the report of the inspector had sustained the charge, yet the Government refuses to dismiss this postmaster. They refuse to produce the report of the inspector which establishes his guilt. Not only that. In that same post office, letters have since been opened and read and resealed. An investigation is taking place again, but in spite of all that can be done the Government retain that postmaster who is practising law, who does not attend to the office at all, and who, rumour says, is not receiving the emolument of the office. That is the way that injustice may be done to some and wrong and improper dealings of others are covered up, under the excuse that there is an Order in Council stating that these papers are confidential and ought not to be laid before Parliament. If the contention of the Government is to be sustained, what will be the position? They may pass an Order in Council in secret conclave, and say: we will not bring down any papers at all. And when we ask for them, they may deny Parliament the right, by saying, Why, there is an Order in Council; we are not bound to bring down the papers at all. Sir, the Government are the servants of the people of this country; they are bound to obey the commands of this Parliament. Parliament has ordered that these papers shall be brought down, and it is the plain and manifest duty of the Government to bring them down. Why, what a trumpery excuse the Postmaster General raises here—“These papers have been lost”——

Mr. BRODEUR. They are not lost.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. They are lost.

Mr. LISTER. My hon. friend here says the papers are not lost, and he has seen them in the office in Montreal. But if that be held good, how easy it is to have papers lost. All that is necessary is that one Minister should send a note over to his colleague: “Send me the papers”; and they may be lost in that department, and there is no redress. These papers may be lost. It is extraordinary they were lost. Mr. Chapleau—I do not know whether he was a friend of this postmaster, or a friend of the people who are persecuting him—intervened, what business had he with the papers, what right had he to have them? The Minister of Railways was then Postmaster General: he was the custodian of these documents. Mr. Chapleau had no more right to them than I have. He had no right to poke his nose into the business of the then Postmaster General. He wrote to the Postmaster, and the Postmaster General with remarkable simplicity sent them over; and the next time they were asked for, the papers were ‘non est.’ In the meantime, some unfortunate man who had lived, for aught I know, creditably in the town or section of the country where he had his home, finds his reputation wrecked and himself dismissed from his office and disgraced in the eyes of the public—this is all proven in a court of justice—and another man placed in his position. And the Government, instead of trying to make some restitution, instead of even affording the means to have the charge made against him cleared up, which can be done by the production of the papers my hon. friend asked for, refuses even to give him this small measure of justice. The answer of the Postmaster General cannot be supported from any point. It is a trumpery excuse the hon. gentleman gives to this House, and, as my hon. friend says, he has a copy of the record. Sir, the late Minister of Justice agreed that these papers should be produced, and I do not think the Government, two years afterwards, should repudiate the promise of the then leader of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think a word or two should be said further on this subject. So far as I understand the custom of Parliament, and so far as I understand the custom of the departments, the rule hitherto has been that if a Minister objected to produce any particular documents, he gave notice at the time the motion was presented. But, behind this, Mr. Speaker, there are circumstances which, I think, lead to a more important principle. I quite agree with the contention of the Minister of Justice that, in ordinary cases, reports of this kind should not be produced. But there are exceptions. They should not be produced without cause, without clear cause being shown. But when cause has been shown, then, I contend, there is no sufficient ground or reason for the Government refusing to produce the documents. They are official documents, after all is said and done. The Minister takes action upon them upon his responsibility, and it is laying down a very dangerous principle to say that no confidential reports shall see the light, even when there is strong prima facie grounds for suspecting—as there appears to be in a case of this kind—that the inspector has been a party to a conspiracy to injure one of the officials under him. Where a charge is made against an official, such as is made in this case, I submit that there is most ample grounds for bringing down his reports whether confidential or otherwise. Now, in this case, not only has the charge been made, but, so far as I recollect the circumstances of the case—and the Minister of Justice can correct me if I mistake them—it was proved in a court of justice that the ground on which the then Postmaster General had justified the dismissal of this postmaster were wholly and utterly unfounded. Sir, if any possible circumstances can justify the production of a confidential report, surely they may be said to exist in this case. We on this side do not ask, and have never asked, that confidential reports should be brought down indiscriminately; but, when such statements as my hon. friend has made have been made, and when it was known that the inspector in question was charged with the gravest violation of his official duties—or, to put it on the lowest ground, was charged with having acted most grievously in error—then, Sir, I must say that when an order of the House has been passed declaring in so many words that this report should be brought down, there is no possible excuse that I can see for disregarding that order.

Mr. FORBES. While you are on the subject, I would like to know whether it is possible for any—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Wait, wait.

Mr. FORBES. It is in the same line.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I only intervene in the debate at the present time—because it is almost impossible to supplement the forcible arguments that have been presented to the House already—because it seems to me desirable to call the attention of the House to this fact—that we should not be entering upon a discussion of this matter at all. It seems to me rather beneath the dignity of Parliament that we should be called upon to discuss a second time whether we should have these papers or not. This matter was brought up by my hon. friend, who recited the facts. The Postmaster General took objection, contending that, under the circumstances, he ought not to be called upon to produce this report, because it was a confidential report. The question whether it was of such a confidential nature that it ought not to be produced was the subject-matter of discussion for over an hour. The then leader of the House, the late Sir John Thompson, said he would not go so far as to say that all confidential reports should be withheld; there were some which should be withheld and some that should not. These are his words:

I quite admit that there may be cases in which even confidential reports should be submitted to Parliament, especially if such confidential reports had misled the action of a public department.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have not seen the discussion. Was it distinctly understood that confidential reports—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is the point I am leading up to. I want to show that we ought not to be discussing this matter, because we have passed upon it, and that not upon a formal motion only, but after a thorough discussion upon the very points of the introduction of this very inspector's report. When the late Sir John Thompson laid down that rule, my hon. friend followed in support of the proposition that this was a report which, under the circumstances, should not come within the category of confidential reports to be withheld.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the hon. gentleman reading from?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) From the debates of last year.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. But when the order passed, there was no discussion at all, as I understand.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am coming to that. If I understand it aright—I may be wrong—after that, as I want to point out to the Minister, the discussion took place on this question. Is this a report of such a character that it should be withheld because reports are generally considered confidential, or are the facts such that it ought to be produced? That question was discussed, it was threshed out; the Postmaster General took one view, the House took another; and before the debate ended the hon. gentleman moved a sub-amendment, if I understand it aright, to include this identical document. The original motion ran in this way:

For copies of all correspondence, reports, or judgments in relation to the dismissal of B. Loisselle, postmaster at Ste. Angèle de Monnoir.

That was amended by adding the following words:—

And a copy of the record, depositions, declarations and pleadings in suit brought in Montreal, of Loisselle vs. Guillet, and the inspector's report.

That is found on page 2754 of the Debates. Now, mark me, that was decided by the House after the demand was made by the hon. member, after a discussion had taken place across the House between the leading members as to what should be considered confidential and what should not, after the question of this particular document had been thoroughly threshed out, as to whether it should come within the category of those which should be withheld; and then it was unanimously agreed to by the House, the Prime Minister and Postmaster General concurring, that this particular report should be brought down. Sir, it was so ordered, the question is 'res judicata,' passed upon, settled, finally determined by this House; and I may echo the hon. gentleman's statement here that it is monstrous, it cannot be considered debatable for a moment, that a departmental officer of a government can, after a question has been solemnly decided, after full discussion in the House, reverse that discussion in council. The thing is monstrous, it is intolerable. The Minister of Justice and the leader of the House, I am sure, won't commit themselves to such a proposition. We just stand in this position, that a document which was objected to being brought down on the ground that it was confidential, was ordered by the House to be produced, after thorough discussion, with the consent of both sides. Under these circumstances I say it was treating the House with marked contempt, a contempt that the House must resent, if this order is not obeyed.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think, in discussing even a matter of this kind, in which a return asked for some time previously has not been brought down, that there is any need of over-exaggerated warmth. For my own part this is the first time that I have listened to a discussion on the matter with any care. I do remember that the matter was brought up before, but it had entirely passed out of my mind. Now, the position that was taken by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice is a perfectly proper position to take, that confidential reports are not to be brought down and that they are not to be asked for, as a rule. That is something that is not only binding on this side of the House for the benefit of a government, but it is a thing which is binding upon the House for the good conduct of business generally. I think both sides of the House must agree with the position taken by the Minister of Justice that confidential reports are to be treated as such. It has often happened with reference to the Post Office Department that when returns have been asked for by motion that would involve the bringing down of inspectors' reports, if the motion was specifically objected to at the time on the ground that the report was confidential, the motion has not been pressed; or the inspector's report has been excluded from the motion, and the motion passed without calling for it. It has also happened that such a motion has passed without specific objections to the report of an inspector being produced, on the ground of its being confidential, relying on the generally expressed course of the House and the Government not to ask for or to produce confidential reports; so it might happen that a certain motion had passed which called for the report of the inspector to which at the time there was no objection entered by the Minister who had charge of the department, he thinking that it was not necessary to make the specific objection in that case, because it had often been made before, and was generally acted upon as a rule of the House. Now, I think this might have been the case—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No, that is not the case.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman will hear me through before he dissents. There is another side of the question which is brought up to-day. I have not had time to read that debate, but this much I am prepared to say, that if a specific debate arose, at that time or later, with reference to that specific subject, in which the report of the inspector was the subject of debate; if it were stated on one side of the House that that report was necessary in order to justice being done in a case; if the Government, seeing that position of affairs, agreed to the motion or allowed it to pass; or if it were passed without their agreeing, ordering that the paper should be brought down, without doubt that paper should be brought down. Now, I am yet without any other information than I have heard whilst this debate has been going on. My mind has been specially drawn to this subject by a statement of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) and a statement of the hon.

member for Queen's (Mr. Davies); and I have no hesitation in saying that if that motion were passed on a specific motion, and it were allowed by the Government, the order of the House with regard to it must of course be obeyed, and the report be brought down. But this whole discussion, so far as I and my hon. friends here are concerned, and so far as my information went, left out that point, which seems to be fairly well established, that the specific motion was made for a specific report and that it passed the House after discussion. If that be the case, I have no hesitation in saying that the report will be brought down.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am glad to hear the admission just made by the Minister of Finance with regard to returns ordered by the House. There is one thing that must not be forgotten—the prerogative of the House must not be invaded by the action of the Government in refusing to bring down reports when ordered by the House. It is the duty of the Government, when a return is asked for comprising any particular document, if that document is regarded as confidential or private, the Government should at the moment raise an objection and have that particular document or report eliminated from the order. The late First Minister took that course with regard to the case cited by the Minister of Justice. When he saw that the report was looked upon as a private and confidential document, he had the word "report" eliminated from the order of the House. But when the order of the House is granted for a return, it must be obeyed. I do not even admit that the contention of the Minister of Finance correct when he proposes to limit returns to the fact of a debate having taken place on the order. If an order of the House is secured for a return, that mandate has got to be carried out, under our system of government, and the House must not be asked to abandon its prerogative, its command, and permit the Government to say whether any particular item in that return shall be brought down or not. We cannot afford to permit the Government to encroach upon the rights of Parliament in this way, to sit in judgment on what particular return, or what particular document should be included in a return to be laid before the House. If the Government wants to present to the House any argument why any particular report should not be included in the papers to be brought down, the time to do so is when the order is moved for; but the order having been secured, no Order in Council or action by the Government should stand in the way of the return being presented to Parliament in accordance with this order. The Government should take the opportunity of reading up motions for returns. The Minister of Justice laughs at my suggestion. In my opinion, the Government require to read a great deal more than they do. They should make themselves more familiar with the proceedings of the House, and then they would not become involved in such serious difficulties, which indeed appears to be increasing daily. If they read the motions they would gather whether the returns would include any confidential papers; but I hold that when the mandate of the House has gone forth it must be obeyed by the Government, and the Government has no right to sit in judgment and decide whether a return ordered by the House should be brought down or not.

Mr. FOSTER. I put my promise hypothetically, if I found the statement of the case to be as was made out by my hon. friend, I have now before me the Votes and Proceedings, and I find the motion in amendment was carried, and that the order of the House was issued for that report. It will, therefore, be brought down.

Mr. SPROULE. It must be well understood by every old member of this House that a number of discussions have taken place on this very question, and, no doubt, it is equally well understood by every old member that there are always confidential papers which cannot, and will not, be brought down. In making motions for papers I always understand that such papers will be brought down as are allowable, and such as are not confidential. I believe it was for the purpose of having this well understood that the Order in Council was passed a few years ago, because there was a difference of opinion as to what papers should or should not be brought down, and the effect of the order was that hon. members should distinctly understand that confidential papers would not be brought down. In the case of every motion made, I always understand that whether the return would include confidential papers or not, it is distinctly understood that all confidential papers will be excluded from such returns.

Mr. MARTIN. It occurs to me that this matter requires a word or two of comment. We have a most extraordinary proposition to-day. I remember well the debate of last session on this subject. I remember when the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur) brought up the matter, and it appears to me most disgraceful that a postmaster should, on an ex parte examination of his affairs, be disgraced in the public manner in which this officer was disgraced, and that, after a great deal of trouble and expense, he should be obliged to go to the courts for the purpose of vindicating his character, and that having done so, he then found it impossible to obtain justice from the Government. I remember the stand the Government took at that time. The position taken by the Postmaster General was that the report of the inspector was confidential and would not be brought down, and the Minister of Justice to-day puts forward the same contention, that the report was a confidential document and should not be brought down. No one has disputed the general rule that a confidential report should not be brought down. But surely if any inspector lends himself to false charges against an official of the country, he is not to be protected. The object of the rule is not to protect an inspector and allow him to act as he sees fit; it never could have been passed for the purpose of placing an inspector in such a position that he could make any charges whatever without the fear of being brought before Parliament and forced to substantiate those charges: the object of the rule must have been in the interest of the public service and in order that an inspector might feel free to give every matter the fullest consideration and report to the department every fact that came before him. But when we find an inspector charged, as this inspector was charged, by the hon. member for Rouville last session and the previous session, with having used his position knowingly and designedly for the purpose of making false charges against this officer, charges which before the courts were proved to be false, while we must condemn the inspector, what must we think of a Government which backs up such action? We have the Minister of Justice taking the position that the Government should not divulge anything connected with this matter; we have the present Postmaster General stating that he will stand by the inspector. While the hon. member for Rouville has shown that the inspector has abused his position for his own purposes and made false charges, we find the Postmaster General taking the stand I have mentioned, and saying that he will not bring down the report. After these two debates have taken place, we find the Minister of Justice rising in his place boldly and attempting to justify the action of the Government behind the Order in Council, which it has already been clearly shown does not apply to such a case. Speech after speech has been delivered on this side of the House by the hon. member for Lambton, the hon. member for Bothwell, the hon. member for South Oxford, and the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., each hon. member repeating the facts, without adding any new facts, but dinging into the ears of hon. gentlemen opposite the grossness of the position they have taken. And what do we find at last? That the leader of the House is not able to justify the action of his colleagues, that he finds it necessary, after he had been told, not once but five or six times, by different members on this side of the House, that the Government occupied a false position, to condemn emphatically, first, the Minister of Railways as regards his action when Postmaster General, then the present Postmaster General, whom he condemned most emphatically, and to repudiate in the most plain and distinct manner the speech of the Minister of Justice, who has just taken his seat. This action is on a par with everything hon. gentlemen opposite have done. An hon. member of the Cabinet takes a certain position, which is not defensible, and is then backed up by his colleagues, and unitedly they refuse to assent to the force of the arguments put forward by this side of the House. But in this particular case we have an instance where the Minister of Finance is not able to withstand the justice of the case made out by the hon. member for Rouville. Every argument and every point that we have heard to-day were before the Government, and before Parliament three years ago. Again last session we had a long debate, lasting two or three hours, in which every one of these facts was brought forward, and in spite of that the Government defended the position taken by the Post Office Department. Again to-day, after address after address has been made from this side of the House, the Government have sat silent, and refused to do anything. It was only after making an appeal, time and again, that eventually the Minister of Finance repudiated the action of his three colleagues, and that is what I wish to compliment him for doing. It was a straightforward, honest thing for him to do. He admitted that the Government was wrong, and he promised to make it right at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. BRODEUR. I wish, Mr. Speaker, to make a personal explanation. I have asserted, a moment ago, that the inspector's report and the envelope had been brought down to Montreal in 1893. I have not seen the report, but I have seen the envelope, and the envelope has not been lost. I have asserted, also, that I have seen a letter coming from the department, in which it was said to the adverse party, that they were ready to put into his hands the document in question. I have seen the letter, and although the denial is made by the Postmaster General, I tell him these papers have not yet been lost, and that there was a letter issued by the department in which they admitted that the papers were in existence.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I repeat exactly what I told the hon. gentleman (Mr. Brodeur) and my statement will go as far as his, any time. The hon. gentleman is completely mistaken. From the information I have received in my department, the papers which I said were lost, have been lost.

Mr. BRODEUR. Which papers?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The only papers which we have are the report of the inspector, and, I believe, the evidence.

Mr. MULOCK. There is one point we cannot lose sight of. When this motion was presented to the House, and before the attitude of the late Prime Minister was known, we found various members of the Government astute to find many reasons whereby they should not obey the order in question. If there was one thing that endeared the late Prime Minister to the people more than another, it was the conviction in the public mind that at least he had a regard for justice. We always found him on the floor of this House sensitive to what was right, and when it was brought to his attention that an alleged injustice has been done in this case through a report of doubtful good faith, he at once said that the House should remove the cloak of privilege and lay the report before the country. That was a manly and honourable course, and was adopted by the House. This Government to-day has chosen to adopt a position antagonistic to that. The Postmaster General says that all these reports are confidential, and that even if the report was fraudulent, nevertheless, that justice must not be done by producing it. The Minister of Justice, the successor of the late Sir John Thompson, also resorted to fine points to endeavour to defeat the ends of justice.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. MULOCK. I will say, "calculated."

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman may be unfair, but he has no right to impute improper motives to me.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) had better withdraw.

Mr. MULOCK. I withdraw. I say that his attitude was calculated to interfere with the administration of justice. We cannot too strongly repudiate the inference that a practice had grown up in this House whereby the force of orders of this House were to be whittled away by understandings across the floor. I say as a member of this House, with as much parliamentary experience as the Minister of Justice—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No more.

Mr. MULOCK—as much, at all events, and as much regard for precedent, and as much respect for the order of the House. I say that there never has been any implied understanding that reports, and so on, were exempted from the order of the House, simply because they were reports of officials to heads of departments. The very point that the Minister cited has disproved his case. Speaking from his old position as Minister of Marine, he says that many despatches of a privileged nature were not supposed to be produced under an order of the House.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And were not produced.

Mr. MULOCK. I admit that it frequently occurs, and always will occur, that there will be exceptions to a sweeping order, but these exceptions are referred to at the time, and, moreover, the subject-matter under discussion must, to some extent, determine the exceptions when dealing with a general order. I can understand confidential despatches between the Government here and the Foreign Office being regarded as privileged, and it would only be necessary for the Minister to call attention to that fact, so that the Government might not be expected to comply with an order for them. But the very fact that it was necessary to make such an explanation, even in the speech of a Minister, showed that the general rule applied, and that an order of the House had to be obeyed. There is no plainer rule of law than that when something is stated it excludes any inference to the contrary: there can be no inference that an order of the House does not mean what it states. Now, Mr. Speaker, another extraordinary defence is offered by the Government for not complying with this order. If one defence is not good, they try another, and one of their defences in this case is that the documents have been lost. The order of the House is that all the papers and correspondence shall be produced, and is it not a pitiable state of affairs that documents belonging to the records of Canada upon which the reputation of people may depend, documents probably of vast importance in the custody of these gentlemen have been lost, and that they have to come before the House and the country and state that they have a reckless system by which these papers are bandied around from department to department, and are not forthcoming when required? Can there be any stronger evidence of the disregard of these gentlemen for their public duties? They have for months been neglecting their departments, and they have been systematically handing over the work of their offices to subordinates. Sir, the country will take notice of such administrators. The country has already passed judgment, to some extent, and no doubt it was a sense of their loss of the confidence of the people that caused them to reverse their recent decision to go to the country. My hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Lister), speaking a short time ago, alluded to the Government as having defied the people and being now independent of the people. We have complained heretofore of government by Orders in Council; but now we have a committee of the House repudiating the House itself, and stating that they defy our constitutional system of government. I am amazed that on the eve of going before their masters, the people, they do not take warning of the direction in which they are drifting and endeavour to some extent to make amends for past defaults. Meantime, I doubt if this matter should be allowed to rest here. If the Government say they cannot find these documents, is there no process by which the House could supplement their efforts, with the view of having them produced? It may be necessary for the House to lay down a rule for the guidance of these gentlemen. The hon. Minister of Railways says that it is customary, and hundreds and hundreds of times it has happened, that original documents have been passed from department to department, and have been lost. What can we do with these hon. gentlemen?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Commit them for the rest of the session.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not know what may be done to compel them to do their duty, but I have no doubt what will happen when they present themselves before the people.

Mr. DALY. The last speaker seems to have overlooked the fact that until the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), referred to the debate on this subject in 1894, none of the previous speakers on the other side of the House or on this side had knowledge of the fact that a motion was carried by the House last year for the production of this inspector's report, but the argument on both sides was based upon the supposition that the original motion of the hon. member for Rouville called for the inspector's report. Now, it would appear, from the fact of the inspector's report not being mentioned in the original motion of the hon. member for Rouville, and the fact of the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) moving an amendment to include that report, that the rule obtained when the original motion was made that the inspector's report should not be brought down; because, if it did not, what was the necessity for the amendment of the hon. member for Quebec Centre? Here are the proceedings as recorded on page 234 of the Votes and Proceedings of last session:

Mr. Brodeur moved, That an address be voted to His Excellency the Governor General, for copies of all correspondence, reports or judgments in relation to the dismissal of Mr. B. Loisselle, postmaster of Ste. Angèle de Monnoir.

Mr. Langelier moved in amendment thereto, that the following words be added to the said motion—"And a copy of the record, depositions, declarations and pleas in suit brought in Montreal of Loisselle vs. Guillet, and the inspector's report," which was agreed to.

So that if the inspector's report is to be brought down, as the leader of the House says it will be, it will be brought down in pursuance of this amendment, and not in accordance with the original order of the House. In view of this, a great deal that has been said on the other side of the House might have been left unsaid, and the charges that were made by hon. members against the hon. Postmaster General could not, I think, be held good.

(Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker, I would like to correct a statement of the hon. member.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am perfectly in order; I wish to correct a statement—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has already spoken.

Mr. FRASER. Perhaps I can do it. I think it is like shooting a dead duck to say anything more against the Government. The humiliation in which they stand is apparent to this House, and will be to the country. But I cannot allow the remarks of the hon. Minister to pass without saying that it must strike an ordinary mind that the Minister should have understood what the order of last session was; and the fact of that resolution having been passed shows that there was no attention paid by him to the previous order of the House. When an order of this House is passed, I should suppose that each department would take care to understand it and to see whether it referred to matters in that department or not. But no one could suppose that the Minister would fall back upon an outstanding Order in Council and feel perfectly safe in disregarding the order of the House. The Minister was bound to know what the order of this House was, and he should not present the spectacle of rising here and saying that he should not bring down the report, in view of the fact that the House passed another order last session that it should be brought down.

Mr. LANGELIER. It is quite evident that the Minister of the Interior did not listen to the speech of the hon. member for Rouville to-day, in opening this debate; for he mentioned the order passed last year, although, of course, he referred back to the original debate on the subject in 1892. Here is the original order, as passed in 1892:

Copies of all petitions, correspondence, vouchers, inspectors' reports, and documents whatsoever.

Mr. DALY. If the hon. gentleman will allow me to ask him—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; spoke.

Mr. LANGELIER. That was moved by my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), in the absence of the hon. member for Rouville. Then, last year, as the return had not been brought down, another motion was made by the hon. member for Rouville, and I moved an amendment.

Mr. DALY. Why was your amendment necessary?

Mr. LANGELIER. Not only the order of two years ago, but the order of last year was not obeyed; and the hon. Postmaster General stated most boldly that he would not obey the order of the House, because it was for a report which he called a confidential report, and a few moments ago we heard the ex-Postmaster General corroborating the position taken by the present Postmaster General by stating that he would not obey the order of the House either. I am very glad that that position is not taken by the leader of the House, who sat down very nicely on the Postmaster General and stated that the order of the House would be obeyed, and that the report would be brought down. These hon. gentlemen may be left to settle between themselves whether the Postmaster General will obey or disobey the leader of the House, whose place he wanted to occupy. But we have the promise of the recognized leader of the House—not recognized perhaps by the Postmaster General, but recognized by the House—that the report will be brought down, and we are expecting it from day to day.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Assistant Receiver General's Office, Charlottetown—Amount required to cover payment of the salary of the late T. Foley $ 81 67

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would ask the hon. gentleman, with reference to that office in Charlottetown, a question arising out of this vote. I see that he proposes to increase the vote in the general Estimates by $100 for that department. I quite approve of the course the Government took after Mr. Foley's death, in allowing the office to be administered by the Assistant Receiver General and two clerks. One of those is an appointment of late years. The other has been in the office since confederation. His salary is not a large one, and it has not been increased for many years. I wish to ask whether it is the intention of the hon. gentleman to increase the salary of Mr. Bruce Leitch?

Mr. FOSTER. When we come to the main Estimates, I will give the information required. This is just a supplementary.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I only wish to say a few words in favour of that official. I have known him for a great many years, and he is recognized by everybody as an exceedingly competent and painstaking official. While I am willing at all times to support any measure having economy for its object, I think that the services of a good, faithful, honest man, who has been twenty years discharging his duties faithfully from year to year, without ever having had a holiday, and whose work has commended itself on all occasions to the approval of his superior officer, with respect to whom there is no question of politics one way or the other, and who receives a salary on which he can but barely live, deserves consideration. We ought not to carry our desire to economize to the extent of keeping efficient officials below the salaries which they can live upon. I commend this case to the hon. gentleman as one well deserving consideration. I was in hopes, when I saw that $100 vote, that it was for Mr. Leitch, and it was for the purpose of putting the question that I rose.

Department of Customs—To provide for payment to Mr. W. D. Bales, messenger, of amount voted in Supply Bill for fiscal year 1894-5, for his salary at the maximum of the class, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act—(Revote) $80

Further amount required for sundries, being unused portion of vote for clerical and other assistance—(Revote)..... 750

Mr. McMULLEN. Why is the Civil Service Act set aside in this manner?

Mr. FOSTER. The amount was voted last year for Mr. Bales as a messenger in the Customs Department. But it was impossible to pay him because his name was not mentioned. Consequently he was deprived of the vote, and the object is to place the name of Mr. Bales there so that he may have what Parliament voted for the messengership he has in the Customs Department.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is the $750 for his salary also?

Mr. FOSTER. The vote for contingencies used to be in one vote. Two years ago we divided it under four heads—sundries, clerical assistance, printing and stationery, and I forget what the other was. This is simply to take a portion of the vote appropriated for clerical assistance, and which was not used, and supplement to that extent the vote for sundries which was exceeded. The total vote was not exceeded, and this is simply a redistribution.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The rule of law is that if more than an adequate sum is voted for the supply of any portion of the public service, it shall lapse. What the Minister proposes is to increase the vote for sundries by $750, and there is no object in explaining about clerical assistance and thus loading up an appropriation for the public service with expressions that are not required. It looks like undertaking to put upon the Estimates an apology for an appropriation. No allusion of that sort ought to be permitted. If a vote is more than adequate, it lapses, and that is the end of it; and if a sufficient sum has not been appropriated, you ask for more. There is no necessity of making excuses in the Estimates.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is perfectly right. As a rule I score all explanations out, and am quite willing to score this out also. This was simply a reason given to me why the vote was asked for. When contingencies were in one vote, there was no necessity to state what was required for each branch, but since we have decided to make separate headings, it has been found impossible to gauge exactly what each requires. I therefore move that the explanations be struck out.

Item, as amended, agreed to.

Department of Trade and Commerce—To pay A. C. Carleton for services as acting messenger, during the months of June, August and October, 1894.....$68 33

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to know if, during the time covered by this vote, he was engaged otherwise?

Mr. FOSTER. The regular messenger of the department at that time was away from Ottawa on account of the visit of the Intercolonial delegates, and this man was employed in his place.

Mr. McMULLEN. Was he previously engaged on the staff performing similar duties in another department, and was he performing two-fold duties in order to secure this additional pay?

Mr. FOSTER. No, he was a temporary employee during the absence of the regular messenger of the department, who went to Vancouver to meet the Intercolonial delegates and accompany them as far as Ottawa.

Governor General's Secretary's Office—further amount required for contingencies—

Printing $300
Sundries 500

Mr. McMULLEN. This requires explanation.

Mr. FOSTER. The explanation is easy. The printing was insufficiently estimated for, and $300 was necessary to make up the amount. There was also an insufficient estimate for sundries, and this estimate is almost entirely taken up with the cost of telegraphing, which has been very heavy in the Governor General's office.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What special printing is done in the Governor General's office?

Mr. FOSTER. The sum of $250 was voted, and $300 is necessary to make up a total of $550.

Mr. MULOCK. I have been trying to ascertain from the Auditor General's Report of last year how the expenditure for the Governor General's Secretary's office for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1894, compares with that of the previous fiscal year. I find on page LXX., the gross amounts for each of these years, but I cannot find the details.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Mr. FOSTER. I did not think that anything was omitted from the Auditor General's Report.

Mr. MULOCK. It seems to be pretty comprehensive, but I do not find these details. I do not find section E in this report that I have.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have it here. It covers one page only. Perhaps the hon. gentleman has missed it.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the Finance Minister tell me how the expenditure for the Governor General's Secretary's office for this year compares with that of last year?

Mr. FOSTER. For contingencies: the items voted this year were:—Clerical and other assistance, $1,400; printing, $250; stationery, $700; sundries, $11,150.

Mr. MULOCK. Is that more than the expenditure of last year?

Mr. FOSTER. I think it is about the same.

Post Office Department—Further amount required for contingencies—Clerical and other assistance..... $1,650

Mr. McMULLEN. Why is it considered necessary to ask a vote for this amount, in addition to that already voted?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. This amount is required to complete payment of salaries to extra clerks.

Mr. MULOCK. Will this facilitate preparation of returns, if voted?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am afraid that is a confidential one.

Department of Justice—To pay J. W. Hughes, for his services from the 1st to the 31st January, 1895, notwithstanding anything in "The Civil Service Act"... $ 77 50
 To pay Mr. F. H. Gisborne for extra services, notwithstanding anything in "The Civil Service Act"..... 150 00
 Penitentiary Branch—To pay Mr. H. B. S. Lane, in addition to his salary for acting as Accountant of Penitentiaries, from 1st May, 1894, to 1st July, 1895..... 200 00

Mr. GIBSON. What has Mr. Gisborne done to entitle him to this $150 as an extra amount?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In the case of Mr. Gisborne, I am asking the House for this small sum because of some special and confidential work done by him in connection with the Manitoba schools case. The work had to be done at the time promptly, and I called upon Mr. Gisborne to do it after office hours. He is an excellent officer, and not one of those who regard the hour for ceasing work very carefully, but is ready and willing at all times to work after office hours. This was not the first occasion he had been asked to do special work, and I ask the House to vote this amount.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. He is a very competent officer and a hard worker, and the amount ought to be paid to him.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He is a very good officer.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to know what duties Mr. Hughes performs?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Hughes was over age, and could not be appointed on the temporary staff at the rate of salary he was getting, and consequently his salary was voted each year by the House. When I came into the department in January, it was found possible to do without Mr. Hughes' services at the end of this month. So Mr. Hughes is not now in the service; but for that month I am asking Parliament to do as they did for a year or two before. He has not been in my department since January, and this is simply to square him up. The services that he has rendered to the department are over; and after that he was employed somewhere else; but he informed me yesterday that since 31st May, he had not been in the service.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You shunted him.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, I did not shunt him. I would like to have kept him at this rate of pay, but it was impossible for my officer to give the ordinary certificate in that connection. It was a technical employment, and he had not the necessary attainments.

Mr. McMULLEN. Was he occupying a position without any certificate?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, under a vote of Parliament each session. But I was not prepared to come to Parliament and ask for a special vote in connection with his services, as they were not of a technical character.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How long was he there?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think his name has been in the Estimates for about two years, speaking from recollection.

Mr. RIDER. I notice that Mr. Hughes is set down in the Auditor General's report, page H 3, as having worked 426 days at $2.50 per day. I find this includes Sundays as well. I would like to inquire if it is the custom of the department to pay for Sunday services?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The Sundays may have been in connection with some special work, to do which he may have had to run into Sunday. But I have no recollection ; of course, that was long before my time. Sometimes the officers of the department do have to work on Sunday.

Mr. RIDER. I notice all the Sundays are included here, and I wanted to know if that is customary.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Of course, the facts the hon. gentleman quote are not within my knowledge. He may have been paid at that rate, including Sundays, without his doing any work on Sunday, at the rate of so much a month, making so much a year.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is that the practice when officers are paid a per diem allowance?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think so. If he is employed by the day, Sunday is excluded ; if he is employed by the month, I think Sundays are included.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What was the nature of the services he rendered ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He was a copying clerk.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Was he a lawyer ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not much of a lawyer.

Mr. LANDERKIN. He is not required in the department ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not now.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) To what department did Mr. Hughes go after leaving Justice ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. To the Department of Militia and Defence.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If I understand the hon. gentleman, he is not employed now.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He informed me that he would not be employed on or after 31st May. But if I could possibly keep Mr. Hughes, I would. If his work was required, I would willingly take him on, but he could not be paid at a greater rate than $400 per year, without a special vote of Parliament. So if he comes back to me, it will be at that rate.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He has been shunted from the Justice Department to the Militia, and the Militia has shunted him somewhere else. I want to know where ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I should be very glad if I could induce a colleague to take him ; if not, I may take him myself.

Mr. McMULLEN. This is a serious matter. This man has been kept in the department in violation of the Civil Service Act.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. With the authority of Parliament each time, as I have already explained. I explained each time that he was being paid a larger amount than he could receive under the general law, and the sanction of Parliament was obtained for the amount.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice he has drawn at the rate of about $912.50 a year. Now, there are a great many employed in the Civil Service who passed examinations, taken out certificates, who do not receive as much as this man received ; and it appears he has not complied with the Act.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He would have been very glad to get $600 per year under the Civil Service Act, and be put on the permanent list.

Mr. McMULLEN. While he has not done that, he is paid largely in excess of those who have complied with the Act. Including Sundays, he is paid about $1,000 a year, while there are many in the service who have complied with the Act, who have the necessary qualifications, and who are not getting, perhaps, over $600 or $700 per year. Now, there must be some cause why this particular man has been kept in the Department of Justice, and has been transferred to the Department of Militia and Defence. I suppose, after he has served there awhile, and possibly the Minister finds that he has been loaded down with this man in his department, he will shunt him over to some other Minister. Possibly the Secretary of State will find him wandering into his department after a while. It is not right this thing should go on. Parliament should set its face against giving grants to men who have not complied with the Civil Service Act, but who are receiving salaries far in excess of those who have complied with the Act.

Mr. DICKEY. In reference to what the hon. gentleman says about the amount paid to Mr. Hughes, perhaps it is fair I should say that the officers of the department report Mr. Hughes to me as being a thoroughly efficient man and as having well earned the money that was paid to him, although personally I know very little about him. I was very sorry indeed to part with Mr. Hughes, and I did so because the appropriation at my disposal did not allow me to employ him further.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Mr. Hughes had not been in the Militia previously ? I do not understand he had any technical knowledge for that department.

Mr. DICKEY. No. The only qualification he had was that he was not a lawyer.

Mr. McMULLEN. We have been told this man has been paid $2.50 per day, Sundays included, for fourteen months, and we are now asked to consent to an additional grant of $77.50.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, the hon. gentleman does not understand me. Mr. Hughes, with the full knowledge of Parliament, has been voted a special salary each year, and he was retained in the Department of Justice up to 31st January. The time ran a little over the period for which his pay was voted; and I am asking Parliament to grant him $77.50 on the same terms as he was paid before.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Did he ever do any work at all?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He worked very hard. He is really an estimable man, a man of considerable experience, and an excellent clerk, and I would have been very glad to keep him, if I had had the work for him.

To recoup the vote for "Unforeseen Expenses," the amount transferred by Orders in Council to the credit of the Contingencies Appropriation of these departments:

Justice	$3,500
Marine and Fisheries.....	1,000
Agriculture	1,500

Mr. McMULLEN. I want to draw the Chairman's attention to a point that was raised last year. In going over the Estimates, there was an understanding come to that the items would be taken seriatim. Now, the Chairman reads over the whole, and asks the concurrence of the House for the whole lot. I think we should be asked for a separate vote on each item.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. We have tried for two years the plan of discussing item by item, but we have found that hon. gentlemen go over the whole list, so I have adopted the plan of allowing every hon. member to say as much as he likes on the whole vote.

Mr. McMULLEN. If the Deputy Speaker took item by item and confined the remarks of hon. members to the item under discussion, it would be better.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I have not been able to do that.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am sorry to hear the Deputy Speaker admit his inability to rule the committee.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It depends whom I have to rule.

Department of the Secretary of State—To pay Mr. G. de la Porte for services as an extra clerk in the Records Branch.. $62

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire an explanation of this item.

Mr. MONTAGUE. This amount is to pay an officer, who was not qualified under the Civil Service Act, he not having passed the necessary examinations, and, therefore, cannot be constantly employed without the authority of Parliament. This amount is to pay balance of salary. At the end of the present year his services will be dispensed with.

Mr. McMULLEN. How much per day did he receive?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I suppose this is a month's salary.

Mr. MULOCK. What did he do?

Mr. MONTAGUE. He is engaged in the Record Branch, but as I am reorganizing it, his services will not be required.

Mr. MULOCK. Then he has been an unnecessary charge. The hon. gentleman now promises to carry out economies. Why were they not made before?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The work in connection with the Record Branch is very much less than it was three or four years ago. Officers have been engaged in copying historical records, and the work from its nature has necessarily diminished. This is why I have been able to lay out a plan by which, on reorganizing the branch, economies will be effected.

Mr. MULOCK. What is the nature of that plan?

Mr. MONTAGUE. When the main Estimates for the department are up for consideration, I shall be happy to state it.

Department of Indian Affairs—To provide an additional amount in the vote for extra clerks and messengers..... $300
To pay Mr. S. Bray, D.L.S., for work in settling Indian reserve claims in the Pas Agency, and in surveying reserves in the same district..... 150

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should like an explanation of these items.

Mr. DALY. The first item of $300 has reference to a clerk, a permanent employee, who was removed last year, and his position taken by a messenger who was promoted. We had to supply the messenger's place, and had to pay the necessary amount out of the contingent fund. By the removal of this clerk and the promotion of the messenger we save $677 annually.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The Minister might give the committee some information with regard to the general increase which has taken place in this department, the expenditure of which has run up in a surprising manner during recent years. I find that when the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) administered the department. In 1878, there were at headquarters at Ottawa, eight officers, receiving salaries amounting in the aggregate to $9,350. The report of the Indian Department for last year shows that the number of officers had been increased to forty-six, and their salaries to $48,490, not taking into account $4,000 or $5,000 for outside services at headquarters. We can understand that in some departments there must necessarily be considerable increases, and in this department, perhaps, some increase might be allowed to pass. But, as the Minister knows, the Indian population is not increasing rapidly if there be any increase whatever, and it is past belief almost that it was possible to efficiently administer affairs at headquarters with eight officers, while forty-six are now required, and an extra amount is now asked for a special clerk. Why has the work increased so rapidly since 1890? No less than sixteen out of the forty-six officers have been appointed since that year. The Minister should tell the committee frankly where the extra work has taken place at headquarters. If we look to the outside service, we find a great increase there also; but for the present I confine myself to what may fairly come under our consideration at the moment, the increased number of officers and the large expenditure at headquarters at Ottawa.

Mr. DALY. It will be more convenient to discuss this matter on consideration of the main Estimates, when I shall be prepared to explain the increases that have taken place. For instance, at the time the hon. member for Bothwell administered Indian Affairs, not one-half the North-west Indians were under treaty, and the expenses of administration have necessarily increased since. I shall also be able to show in regard to increased expenditure that increased work became necessary, especially during the last four or five years. I do not think it possible that any Government could administer the department more economically, but I will enter into a full and free explanation on the main Estimates.

Mr. RIDER. In regard to the item of $150, I find by referring to the Auditor General's Report, F 3, that S. Bray is in receipt of a salary of $1,400 a year. That should be sufficient to cover his entire services, and if he is called away, another clerk has to do his work. It seems hardly right that he should receive additional remuneration.

Mr. DALY. Mr. Bray is an officer of the inside service, and was sent up to the northern part of Manitoba to settle some disputes among the Indians on the reserves, he being a Dominion land surveyor. He was engaged there four and a half months, he endured considerable hardships, and settled up a number of difficulties that had been engaging the attention of the department, and of the agent there. This amount of $150 was given to him for extra services rendered.

Mr. McMULLEN. This is only a repetition of expenses that have been incurred in almost every department, the payment of clerks for additional services, while those services really come within their ordinary duties. The Auditor General's Report shows 500 or 600 cases of officers who have received double pay in this way. Here is an officer receiving the ample salary of $1,400 a year. I am quite sure the Government paid his travelling expenses, even his Pullman car fares and other expenses connected with the trip, and yet it is now proposed to grant him $150 in addition to his salary of $1,400 annually.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Who was doing his work when he was away?

Mr. DALY. There was no person doing his work. Mr. Bray is a Dominion land surveyor in the employment of the department. Trouble had arisen amongst the Indians and it was necessary to subdivide the reserve. Had we employed an outside man, it would have been more expensive. Mr. Bray was not only a surveyor, but he had a knowledge of Indian matters and of the Indian character, and he was able to settle a number of disputes that had arisen amongst those people. He had necessarily to endure great hardship during these four and a half months, as it is a very inhospitable region.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What time of the year was it?

Mr. DALY. In the spring and summer months.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) One can hardly conceive that there would be much hardship then.

Mr. McMULLEN. The duties of this gentleman must be very unimportant when he could remain away from his office for four or five months. He must have little or nothing to do as the Minister virtually acknowledges. If the Minister has no stronger argument to present to the House to justify this vote, I do not think we should consent to it. We are urging upon the Government the necessity of cutting down expenditure and here is a case in which money could be saved. This man gets $1,400 a year, and is more than paid for his services, and in addition to that he is to get $150 as a gratuity. He travelled in luxurious style to the North-west, was over four months away, and got paid all his expenses. He must have reaped all the advantages to his health of inhaling the vigorous air of the North-west for the principal part of the summer, and now he is to get $150 extra. That is not right.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not want to say anything about this particular case because I do not know the facts. It does appear to me that taking a permanent official away from one of the departments and allowing him to do some work for the department in another part of the Dominion at a time of the year when it must have been looked upon as a holiday trip, and then paying him extra for it, is a vicious principle. From time to time it is within my own personal knowledge that the Marine Department has sent a man to the maritime provinces to do some little work, but I do not know that he has got extra pay for it. He gets his holiday and his expenses besides. That I do not object to, because the work has got to be done. It is a plum that falls to one or the other of the officers of a department. He is away on that trip while his co-employees are stewing in the heat of an Ottawa office, and it does seem to be an injustice that such an officer should receive extra pay in addition to his ordinary salary.

Mr. GIBSON. Is Mr. Bray a land surveyor in the employ of the department?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. GIBSON. Then he was discharging his ordinary duties for which he was paid his salary, and he is not entitled to this gratuity. He is sent to the North-west by the Minister to perform his ordinary duties, as he might be sent to any other part of the Dominion, and as he receives his pay for doing his duties nothing extra should be granted him.

Mr. DALY. Mr. Bray had no holiday in this matter at all, and if he had his choice he would have stayed at home. It was because of his knowledge of the Indian character that he was selected to go, and if he were not sent there we would have to hire an outside surveyor at a greater cost to do the work. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) spoke about his travelling in luxurious style in a Pullman car. Well, he only made the trip to Winnipeg in the train and he had to go the rest of the way in canoes. He suffered great hardship and was put to extra expense which the Government cannot recoup him for, and he saved to the Government a good deal more than the $150 we are giving him.

Mr. GIBSON. But he was away in the performance of his ordinary duties. Whether he liked to go to the North-west or not, he was obliged to go if the Minister sent him. That is no justification at all for giving him this extra money. I do not say that this gentleman did not do his work properly. He occupies the position of Dominion land surveyor, and if no one took his place when he was away, then it naturally follows that he had very little to do when he was in Ottawa.

Mr. LISTER. The explanation given by the Minister of the Interior may be entirely satisfactory to himself, but it is not so to others. This official receives $1,400 for his whole year's work, and whether he works in Ottawa, or whether he works in the North-west, makes no difference. The country is entitled to his services for the whole year. I do think that this giving of extra pay in such a way is a very vicious principle. If this gentleman is to be paid for what the Minister calls extra services, then every other official who is sent to Manitoba or Quebec or any other province, is entitled to say that he should get the same, or that the Government has treated Mr. Bray more favourably than they are treated. They may say: Our services are just as valuable in the scope of our duties as Mr. Bray's and we have as much right to ask additional compensation for duties discharged by us while outside of the departmental buildings. The principle is entirely vicious. When this gentleman takes his position, it is part of the contract with him, implied if not expressed, that his whole time is to be given to the Government; and all the compensation he is to receive for any and all the duties he discharges as a servant of the Government, is the sum fixed as his salary, namely, $1,400 a year. Then, what principle can the hon. gentleman invoke to justify such an expense as this? It is all very well for my hon. friend to talk about this gentleman's travelling in a canoe as a hardship at a season of the year when many people would like to do the same thing. To many men that is a very delightful mode of travelling, and I deny that this gentleman, in doing that, underwent any hardship at all. He was having a little summer vacation at the Government's expense. As well might we pay Mr. Speaker $1,000 a year extra for doing something that is within his duty as Speaker, as well might we pay the Minister of Interior an extra $1,000 a year in addition to the $7,000 he receives for doing something extra. If this man is not getting enough salary, increase it; give him $1,550 instead of $1,400; but do not pretend to give it as extra pay for extra work. The amount is small, and hon. gentlemen may think it is not worth while discussing it; but the principle underlying it is important. If this expense is justified in this case, then every public servant in every department who is employed outside of the department at any time will feel himself entitled to demand the same treatment. Such being the case, this item cannot be defended; and the Minister does not attempt to justify it. The excuse he gives is no justification at all. As the principle is vicious, we should see that it shall not be in the power of a member of the Government to say to some favoured servant: I will give you a nice little summer trip to the North-west, and the Government will pay you $150 and allow you three or four or five dollars a day for living expenses. Can the Minister of the Interior give any information to the House as to how much was paid to Mr. Bray for travelling expenses?

Mr. DALY. He was allowed what he paid for his travelling expenses. He has to account for every item.

Mr. LISTER. Can the Minister say how much it is?

Mr. DALY. I do not know how much it is. He was allowed his travelling expenses and a living allowance of one dollar a day.

Mr. LISTER. If the gentleman travelled in a canoe, he had, no doubt, two or three men to take care of him and to cook for him. We certainly have a right to ask the Minister to take us into his confidence and inform us how much was paid to this gentleman for travelling expenses and living allowances while in the North-west. I think he should let this item stand until he is in a position to furnish that information to the House.

Mr. MARTIN. I cannot agree at all with the suggestion that a gentleman undertaking a duty of this kind incurs a great deal of hardship. I am rather inclined to agree with the suggestion of the hon. member for Queen's, that Mr. Bray, in leaving Ottawa to spend four and a half months in the northern part of Manitoba, in the summer season, was taking a holiday trip. I cannot understand the statement of the Minister that Mr. Bray got a dollar a day for his living expenses. Of course there are no hotels in that district, and I understand that canoes and men and everything else, including provisions, were furnished by the Government.

Mr. DALY. Nothing of the kind; he had to provide his own provisions out of the one dollar a day.

Mr. MULLOCK. What about the attendance?

Mr. DALY. Of course that was supplied to him.

Mr. MARTIN. If the Minister compelled him to live on $1 a day, he has been very close and has treated this man very different from other officers when they go out on trips of this kind. My experience is that the department has been very liberal with its employees, and I think more than $1 a day must have been spent on this trip. A canoe trip in the hot season in Manitoba is a favourite method of spending the holidays; but whether it is hard or easy, a Dominion land surveyor is supposed to travel in that way. If he gets $1,400 a year as a Dominion land surveyor, which is a very fair salary for a surveyor, he cannot be said to have done anything to entitle him to additional pay, so far as we have any facts before us. The precedent is a very bad one indeed, and gives ground to the opinion in the department that there are certain favourites selected for work of this kind.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THE NOVA SCOTIA STEEL COMPANY, LIMITED.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 56) to amend the Act to incorporate the Steel Company (Limited).—(Mr. Fraser.)

(In the Committee.)

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There are some hon. members, who are not present, who desire to speak on this Bill, and I move that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Committee rose and reported progress.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 54) to incorporate the Ottawa and Aylmer Bridge Company.—(Mr. Robillard.)

THE LANGENBERG AND SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. McDONALD (Assiniboia) moved that the House resolve itself into committee on Bill (No. 55) to incorporate the Langenberg and Southern Railway Company.

Mr. MULLOCK. Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to a feature of this Bill. I called the attention of the committee to it, but with only partial success, and informed the committee that I would bring the matter to the attention of the House. The road is said to run over a prairie section of the North-west, across several ravines, and ultimately connect with the Manitoba and North-western Railway. I know nothing about the cost of the road. The promoters desire to obtain borrowing powers to the extent of $20,000 a mile. There was no evidence submitted to the committee, nor was any asked, as to the approximate cost of the enterprise. After some discussion, the promoters consented to a reduction of the bonding power to $15,000 a mile. They, at the same time, intimated their absolute lack of information as to the cost of constructing the road. There were no preliminary estimates, and so we were granting powers absolutely in the dark, and mortgaging this road, and in this way the earnings of the people, for all time to come, to the extent necessary to pay a dividend on $15,000 per mile. The time has long since passed when the Government ought to have had a policy with regard to the granting of borrowing powers to railway companies. I doubt if there is any question of greater importance to sections of our country than the question of railway rates. Our Railway Act provides that the Government cannot interfere to reduce the rates until the railway is able to pay its obligations to the bond-holders. That is a very proper provision if we are to keep faith with the creditors of these companies, but the public is interested in the reduction of rates, and consequently in the economical construction of the road, and they are specially interested in seeing that there is no watering of stock or bonds whereby fictitious capital is charged against an enterprise, and in that way becomes a charge upon the customers of the road itself. We have for years heard discontent in the North-west in consequence of the excessive rates. A commission has recently investigated that matter and reported that the rates are not excessive, but that finding has to be based upon more than one consideration. Not merely upon the relative rates in Canada and the States, but also upon the circumstance that the road is largely owned by creditors, and that they have the right to manage it as they see fit until their first claims are discharged. If, for example, the Canadian Pacific Railway's mortgage—its regular mortgage, outside its stock—were $50,000,000 less than it is, you would find the Canadian Pacific Railway lowering its rates. But, so long as it is necessary to pay interest upon all this nominal capital, so long must the rates be maintained at a comparatively high level. Up to this moment, the Government, in my judgment, has not taken the proper position in regard to this feature of railway legislation. What I contend is that in all cases where persons apply for corporate power for the purpose of building a railway, powers that practically create monopolies in the sections to be served, the Government should, in the first instance, satisfy themselves as well as they can as to the approximate cost of construction, and they should not empower promoters to issue bonds infinitely in excess of the cost, bonds which may be sold to contractors at 50 cents on the dollar, but which, in due time, are passed off upon the public, and rank as a charge at par value against the labour and enterprise of the customers of the road. Now, with regard to this particular enterprise, to illustrate the laxity with which this legislation is being granted, it was stated by an hon. member in the committee, and I think I have heard the statement elsewhere, though I cannot recall upon what authority, that the Canadian Pacific Railway authorities had stated that it would only cost about $7,000 a mile to build and iron, ready for running, the Hudson Bay Railway. Now, if that is the standard of cost of building a railway through a section of country like that, on what principle should we grant to this company as the committee was prepared to have done, borrowing powers to the extent of $20,000 a mile, over a section of country much easier for railway building, I fancy, than that over which it is proposed the Hudson Bay Railway is to run. The committee did cut the amount down to $15,000, but it had no data to go upon. The promoters themselves had no data to go upon, and this House is in no better position. And yet, no doubt, we shall, to-night, authorize this company to issue its bonds for $15,000 a mile, which amount may or may not be ample to meet the requirements of the case. I do not intend to move an amendment, but I think it is the duty of the Government to refer this Bill, and all Bills of a similar character back to the committee, and to advise the committee, and afterwards the House, as to the cost of the enterprise, before we authorize the company to bond the road in that way. This, I conceive to be one of the most important questions demanding public attention. It concerns not merely the passengers, but particularly the labour of those who furnish freight to the road, who, in the North-west particularly, are the farming community. This is a question that affects every customer of the road, whether he travels or sends merchandise over the road as freight. I believe that the people of Canada to-day are being taxed to pay interest on millions of dollars of fictitious capital which have been charged up against Canadian railways, because of the carelessness, the laxity and the indifference with which the House has, in times past, dealt with questions of this kind. I pressed this matter upon the attention of the Minister of Railways in the committee; I press it upon his attention now. He may say in an off-hand way that this road will cost a certain amount, that there are coulées to be overcome, and rivers to be crossed. But the Minister of Railways has not the first item of information: he has not a profile, he has not a preliminary survey. The promoters have not even definitely located the line, and they do not know any more than the average member of the public what the cost of the road is to be. And yet it is proposed that the House shall deliberately sanction this mortgage upon the labour of the people in this section of the country for all time to come. Is it guarding the interests of the people, to thus place an obstacle on the way of the development of the country? Sir, that is the way to retard the development of our country, and it is such lack of business capacity, as is shown in this matter that has kept the North-west an almost unpopulated country up to this moment. So long as this laxity continues, so long will dissatisfaction exist, and so long shall we find the surplus population of older lands avoiding our shores and seeking sections of the world where there is some business ability brought to bear in dealing with important questions like this. The Minister of Railways, I suppose, will pass it off in a light way, but, if he is going to address the House, on this subject, I ask him to tell us in businesslike fashion what this road is going to cost. Has he a single line from a surveyor about it? Does he know a single thing about the difficulties of construction? Why, Mr. Speaker, it is well known that the prairie section of the Canadian Pacific Railway cost, for construction, only one-third of what you are giving this company power to bond their road for. I do not speak of what the company paid for it. But what I mean to say is—Yes, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice says that that would not pay for the iron. The Minister of Justice has very little—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The Minister of Justice did not say one word to you or to the House.

Mr. MULOCK. All the better for the House. I say it is well known that the construction of the prairie section of the Canadian Pacific Railway did not cost over $5,000 a mile.

Mr. DALY. That is absurd.

Mr. MULOCK. It may be so in the hon. Minister's judgment, but I do not think he can give any evidence in support of what he says.

Mr. DALY. Yes, I can; I will give the evidence.

Mr. MULOCK. I am not speaking of what the company had to pay, but of what the road cost. Mr. Speaker, I know a case in point. As long as ten years ago, a road was to be constructed through one of the oldest settled parts of this province, and the contractor was paid $10,000 a mile for the purchase of the right of way, the grading, the ironing, the building of the stations—every bit of the work in connection with the road, with the exception of putting on the rolling stock. And I know that he did not lose any money by it. At that time, the price of rails was $50 per ton, and today the price is not half that. And yet we are giving power to this company in the North-west, where practically the right of way is free, to bond its road to the extent I mentioned. In this particular case it might be possible to give evidence that the road would cost $15,000 or $50,000 per mile. What I complain of is that we are absolutely in the dark as to the cost. My estimates may be wrong, you may find fault with them, but what I say is that we are entitled to have official information as to what the cost will be, as near as may be, and that we should, as a principle, take our stand upon the ground that we will not sanction the creation of charges upon public carriers such as railways are, involving the taxation of the people to any greater extent than is necessary in order to pay a fair dividend upon the capital which goes honestly into the construction of such enterprise.

Mr. AMYOT. If the evil which the hon. gentleman mentions is so great, so imminent, why did he not warn this House before? He has waited many years, he has allowed many charters to be granted by this Parliament, without warning us.

Mr. MULOCK. I have often objected.

Mr. AMYOT. Put it is always the same story. He complains that they are watering the stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Sir, if there had been no liberality shown towards the Canadian Pacific Railway, there would be no Canadian Pacific Railway to-day; and if there was no Canadian Pacific Railway, the lands in the North-west would have remained unsettled, and there would be no use of any railways there. If we were to be too severe in granting charters, we could not bring in capital from England, we could not build railways, we could not encourage these settlers who are there now, and we could not invite new settlers. I think that it is too late to complain at this stage of the Bill. The hon. gentleman should have complained before the committee where the Bill was first considered. At all events he now comes only with generalities. For my part I am ready to show myself liberal towards new companies who do their best to open the country and to bring in capital and settlers.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The speech of the hon. gentleman shows a very extraordinary notion of what is the public interest. We have in the North-west Territories an immense mileage and a very small population. We have thousands of square miles of territory within easy reach of roads already constructed, and that is, up to this moment, wholly unoccupied. The hon. gentleman, before there is an adequate population to make the railways that are already constructed paying enterprises, proposes further to increase the burdens of the country, and further to put impediments in the way of settlement, by extending the railway system in that section of country. Then, if the hon. member will look at the map and see the direction in which this road runs, he will find that after it reaches its connecting point with the Canadian Pacific Railway, the products and the traffic which would spring from a population residing along it, would have as far to go to reach the Montreal market as if a road were constructed in a straight line from the point from which they started. I cannot conceive anything more detrimental to the public interest, more at variance with what is the real interest of the country, than to undertake the construction of railways in that comparatively level country, running in a direction different from that which the trade of the country must ultimately take. Sir, that is what is proposed by this Bill. It seems to me that before this House or this Government undertook to grant any further railway charters, they ought to be satisfied by actual explorations and surveys, what is the approximate cost of the road proposed to be constructed. They ought also to know whether the parties who are promoting the enterprise are possessed of such an amount of capital as to make it to their interest to undertake the construction of the road. Sir, what have we been doing for years with regard to the North-west country? We have been giving railway charters to persons who are penniless; we have been practically making large appropriations out of the public treasury, or promises of large appropriations, to aid these enterprises, and we have enabled the parties to hawk these enterprises amongst the capitalists of New York and London. For what purpose? To promote the interests of the people who are likely to settle in that country? Not at all, but to make the largest sum possible out of the railway charters for themselves, and so, when it gets into the hands of parties who have capital with which to build the road, they find it burdened by hundreds of thousands of dollars of expense that has not gone into the construction of the road at all. I think it is time that an end was put to that state of things. I think that a more profitable use of the resources in the hands of this country can be made than by granting aid to exploit undertakings of this sort solely for the benefit of the parties who are to receive the charter, and who are seeking to make merchandise of it on account of the advantages attached to it. It seems to me that the hon. gentlemen who have promoted this Bill in the House ought to be here to give evidence, to give the House information, as to the parties who are in that country now, and who are to be accommodated by this construction. I say again that we ought not to build a mile of road in the North-west Territories where there are no settlers at the present time, until there is a fair amount of settlement along the lines already constructed. Why, Sir, if we go on in the way in which we have been going for some time past, what will be the result? At this moment we might place in the North-west Territories half a million of people within ten miles of the roads that are already built. If that be so, does it not become evident to any one that if you build a new line of railway, you are burdening the population, you are putting additional impediments in the way of settlement; that the charges for travel and for traffic must be proportionately greater in proportion to the number of miles that you construct in the country for a given population? And so, instead of assisting the settlement of the country, constant impediments are put in the way of actual settlement. I say that the House ought not to encourage incorporations of this sort without more evidence than we have at this moment before us, as to the necessity of the enterprise, its cost, and the proportion of the population existing there who are to be served by it.

Mr. TISDALE. I wish to say a few words in answer to the hon. member for York (Mr. Mulock). If he had taken the trouble to examine the papers filed under the rules of our committee, he would have found a lot of information which he now complains he has not seen. There is a regular plan, there is an estimate of the cost, of the capital stock, and how it is to be raised under the rules. If the hon. gentleman had come in to the committee yesterday at the start of the business, and had attended it throughout, he would not have made these reflections upon the committee.

Mr. MULOCK. Allow me to say that I asked, in the committee, the Minister of Railways, whom I considered the official authority, if he had any idea whatever as to the cost of this road.

Mr. HAGGART. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, I was not there at all. It was in reference to the electric railway.

Mr. MULOCK. I asked the Chairman himself for a statement, and he could not give a bit of information as to the cost. I asked the promoter, and he gave the same answer, and said he did not know what the cost would be, said he did not know anything about the cost.

Mr. TISDALE. I disagree entirely with the hon. gentleman, or else my memory is at fault. I know personally that these papers were filed there, and he could have examined them. The fact is that until tonight I did not take the hon. gentleman seriously, and I do not think the committee did so yesterday, when he came in and raised a discussion.

Mr. MULOCK. I was there at the beginning.

Mr. TISDALE. The reason why I feel it my duty to say something is because the reflections cast on the Minister of Railways are reflections on the Railway Committee. The committee is composed of members of both sides of the House, and they earnestly and carefully endeavour to carry out certain lines of policy, which the committee have adopted, not the Government. I did not understand until a little while ago that it was proposed to challenge the whole policy on which the committee has been acting. If the House is pleased to instruct the committee to adopt some other policy, we shall be quite ready to do so; but the hon. member for York (Mr. Mulock), in his statements in regard to the amounts for which roads have been bonded has not informed himself in regard to railways, otherwise he would be aware that $15,000 per mile was a small sum, and I do not understand how the company are going to get along with it. I will mention to the hon. gentleman two items which will involve an expenditure of $5,000 per mile. Rails cannot be laid down for less than $4,000 per mile, and ties for not less than $2,000 per mile. This will be apparent to the hon. gentleman if he will take the cost of rails and freight from Montreal, and in making this remark I am not only expressing my own views, but I have taken the trouble to make inquiries. Then, a certain amount of bridging has to be provided, for even in a prairie country more or less culverts have to be put in; also a certain amount of fencing must be done, and these items have to be paid out of capital. Then there is grading and track-laying. Again, the rolling stock has to be provided, and $10,000 per mile is a very moderate estimate for rolling stock, if the road is going to be operated independently.

Mr. MARTIN. $15,000 per mile is ample.

Mr. TISDALE. The rolling stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway cost millions, and that of the Grand Trunk Railway involved an enormous expenditure. The lesser roads, of course, have a much smaller quantity, and I will reduce the estimate to $5,000 per mile. Taking 100 miles of road, this would involve a large amount. $10,000 per mile would probably be excessive. It should be mentioned that the Railway Committee are called upon every day almost to enlarge capital stock of companies, not to reduce it. Companies are constantly appearing before the committee with too small capital, and we are compelled to put the capital at a larger amount in order to obtain a substantial guarantee that the road will be constructed. I speak with confidence when I say this, that the committee, representing both sides of the House, is anxious to provide every safeguard in the public interest. In regard to the road in question, there is no question about the responsibility of its promoters and the necessity of the road itself. Those seeking its incorporation are: Andrew Allan, Hugh A. Allan, Andrew A. Allan, James B. Allan, A. A. McKenzie and Charles McEachren, all of the city of Montreal, and Bryce J. Allan, of the city of Boston. Why is the road desired? Because a difficulty has arisen in connection with a road in which they invested some millions of capital, one of the few roads in the North-west in which a large amount of private capital has been invested. It is notorious that there is an issue between the bond-holders, who hold a large portion of the road, and other parties. This road is intended to give the promoters an outlet. The case is at present in appeal. If the decision is upheld in regard to the receivership, this will give another outlet and provide a cut-off, so that the balance of the road can be operated, and another connection made with the Canadian Pacific Railway, if the bond-holders are successful with their suit. Mr. Nicol Kingsmill appeared before the committee and furnished information.

Mr. MULOCK. He said he knew nothing about it.

Mr. TISDALE. $15,000 of bonded debt was so unusually small that no one had any doubt about granting it.

Mr. LAURIER. If it was so small, why did the committee reduce it by $5,000?

Mr. TISDALE. Mr. Kingsmill was asked if he thought the promoters could get along with that sum, it being stated that the committee usually granted $20,000. He replied that he thought they could, that it was a comparatively cheap country for railway construction, although it was not all level prairie, but was broken prairie. I am not one of those who would object to the adoption of a policy under which a less number of charters would be granted; but until the rules of the House are changed, this cannot be done, and in many parts of the country where there are no railroads, especially in the old provinces, the electors sometimes wish to build railways, and complain if charters cannot be obtained. I agree with the idea that possibly we chartered too many roads, but I claim that within certain limits we cannot refuse charters until some new policy is authorized by the House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does this road extend north-east and south-west?

Mr. TISDALE. I do not know the directions by the points of the compass, but it runs nearly north and south, and it is required for the purpose I have mentioned, and, as was explained by the promoters before the committee. If the Railway Committee are to have a new set of rules, very well; I am only making these remarks in justification of the course adopted under our existing rules. Until the discussion of yesterday and to-day occurred, I was not aware that hon. gentlemen were prepared to advocate that a less number of railway charters should be granted. I do not know a road except the Canadian Pacific Railway, that has been built of late years, but that the bonds have been sold at a large discount. If you get 80 cents on the dollar you do well, and you have to allow for that if you give a practical charter. The reason why it is not as dangerous as it might look is, that it is harder to get capital for railway schemes than it is likely that railways will sell their bonds too high on the market. That is the reason why the committee are generally moderately liberal. As a matter of fact we do consider the cost, but it is in a rough way. By looking at what our different railways cost we can get at a pretty safe estimate. In the prairie country we give from fifteen to twenty thousand dollars a mile, usually twenty, and in older provinces, from twenty thousand to twenty-five thousand, or even higher if it is a rough country. We do not require, nor until the rules of the House are changed have we any right to ask any further information. The change of policy advocated by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) will be a serious divergence from the rules upon which the committee have hitherto been acting. Until my hon. friend raised the point yesterday we have been going on the old lines, and if there is to be a change in the rules the House should say so.

Mr. LISTER. I think the hon. member for York (Mr. Mulock) is entitled to the gratitude of the House for bringing this matter to the attention of Parliament. I suppose there is no country in the world to-day, that has so great a railway mileage for its population as has the North-west Territories. They have a mile of railway for every eighty inhabitants, and from the statement made by my hon. friend (Mr. Tisdale) I take it for granted that the application for this charter, is in order to affect to a certain extent the lawsuit which is now pending between the bond-holders and the stock-holders of the North-western Railway in the Territories. The bond-holders are at variance with the stock-holders; litigation is pending, and if one of the parties is successful then this railway will be built for the purpose of giving it an outlet to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. TISDALE. Will my hon. friend allow me to correct him. There are forty-two miles of railway built beyond the point. In the meantime they have a joint understanding, but it is particularly in one ownership, and then there is 180 miles down the Canadian Pacific Railway. The forty two miles I speak of will absolutely be cut off unless we get the outlet.

Mr. LISTER. Will be cut off in case the decision in the lawsuit is in a certain direction. If the decision is in a certain direction a portion of the road will be cut out, and it will be necessary to construct the road provided for in this charter. Therefore, so far as this charter is concerned the object of it is to influence the litigation now pending. It is all very well for my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) to talk about bringing in capital. I expected that from the hon. gentleman. He seems to think that if we can draw capital into the country it is unimportant what becomes of the men who lend the money. As long as the money can be brought into the country under any scheme that schemers think proper to exploit, it is of no consequence at all if the capitalists of England and elsewhere lose their money, so long as it is spent in Canada. I am glad to feel that the expressions of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Amyot) do not find entire approval throughout the country. There is a large section of the people of Canada who do not believe in any such thing as that, but who believe that if a scheme is placed upon the British market, it should be an honest scheme, and that there should be a fair chance that the men who invest shall get adequate return for their money. This Government has been reckless in the extreme in granting railway charters. Go to any province in the Dominion, and you will find in almost every railway, a testimony of wrecked fortunes, and ruined families, through legislation passed in this House for the purpose of bringing, as it is said, foreign capital into the country. Take, if you will, the Albert Railway in the county of Albert. They thought proper to build a railway. They issued bonds, and they pledged these bonds to the banks, and a supporter of the Government got possession of these bonds and he went over to England and he secured to the men who bought them six years interest. But how is it paid? It is paid out of the capital received for these bonds, and after the six years expired, the men who invested the capital and received their interest out of their own capital, find that the whole thing was lost, that the railway was bankrupt, and that even the Dominion of Canada was one of its creditors to a large extent. Take the Caraqueet Railway, authorized by the legislature, and incorporated by an Act of this Parliament. These men go to England and exploit that railway on the English market, putting by a portion of the money received for the bonds to secure the interest for a certain number of years, and when these years expire the investors receive nothing. Their money is utterly gone, and the railway to-day is not paying its running expenses. Go to the North-west if you will, and the same story is to be told there. Only the other day, before the Railway Committee, we had an application from the promoters of a railway running from Dunmore, to be allowed to reduce their bonded indebtedness. They had issued bonds for a very large amount, the road was not paying, they were not able to pay the interest upon the bonds, and they were forced to come to Parliament to get an Act allowing them to issue new bonds for the purpose of reducing the interest charges upon the bonds which were outstanding. The bond-holders invested in good faith, believing they would have a fair return, but they find now that the company is unable to meet its liabilities, and they will gladly take the bonds the company propose to substitute for the bonds issued in the first place. The probabilities are that in the next few years, these bonds again will be in arrears, and if the road is not entirely insolvent, this company will be back again to Parliament asking power to reduce the interest on the bonds they have issued. Sir, the whole system of building railways in this country has been a system, in a sense I say it, of fraud. Men without a dollar of capital, mere schemers and speculators, who think that a railway ought to be built from a certain point to a certain point, come to this Parliament and ask for a charter. They have not a dollar to invest in it, they get subsidies from this Government, and I have no doubt that the next move in the case now before the House will be to ask Parliament to give them a subsidy for this road. Then they get authority to bond the road for a large sum, enormously greater than the cost of the road, because nobody will pretend to say that in a prairie country such as the North-west and the states to the south of it, that any road will cost $15,000 a mile to build and equip. They get authority to issue the bonds for a large amount, and then they go with these bonds and sell them to the English capitalists. Out of the moneys they receive from the Government subsidy and from the proceeds of the bonds which they sell in the old country for about 80 cents, when they are not worth more than 40 cents or 50 cents, they are able to build the railway, and it does not cost the promoters one single dollar. I believe that, with the exception of the Canadian Pacific Railway, all the railways have been built without the promoters putting one dollar of their own money into them. It is a national disgrace, it is something that is affecting the credit of Canada in England—the wildcat schemes which we are authorizing year after year for the obvious and manifest purpose of getting English people to invest their capital in them. They are merely trapped into investing their capital in these schemes. After building them out of the subsidies and the bonds, the promoters of these railways are able to place a handsome margin into their own pockets. These men are not doing this for the public interest, or the public good; they do it to enrich themselves. Point out if you can a single railway in Canada, with the exception of the Canadian Pacific Railway, into which the promoters have put their own capital.

Mr. TISDALE. I am prepared to assert that the Allans of Montreal have put $2,000,000 into this road.

Mr. LISTER. Do you mean to tell me that they have put in $2,000,000 in stock? I venture to say that they have not put in more than the amount that the statute requires to be paid before commencing operation. If they have put in $2,000,000 it certainly has not been in stock, but out of the bonds issued and sold, which they probably hold themselves. That is the way railways are built in this country, and I say we have a right, in the interest of our national credit, to see that the bonded powers given to these railways are not greater than they are fairly entitled to. We have a right to see, in the interest of the public, as my hon. friend from North York has said, that these roads are not burdened with debts which will compel their owners to charge exorbitant rates for transportation; because, as my hon. friend has stated, the Government have no power to reduce rates until the railways have earned a certain percentage of the cost. So that, in whatever way you look at the matter, I believe the time has come when this Parliament, before granting a railway charter, should satisfy itself that the proposed railway is a public necessity, and that its promoters are prepared to hazard a proportion of their own capital in the enterprise. If that were done, there would be some guarantee to the public that the road would not be extravagantly built, and that men should not be induced to put their money into an enterprise under conditions and circumstances that would afterwards turn out to be fallacious. I think the time has come when we should consider the enormous railway mileage in the North-west as compared with its sparse population. It is utterly impossible that the roads in the North-west can be operated profitably for half a century from the present time, unless population goes in there with greater rapidity than in the past. With a population of only 200,000 or 300,000, twenty years or more after that country has come into this Dominion, with an increase in the last ten years of only about 100,000, how long will it be before these railways can be run at a profit? It is the bounden duty of Parliament, before authorizing the construction of any more railways, to satisfy itself that they are required by the public, and that there is a reasonable prospect that they will make a return at all events to the bondholders who invest the money in them.

Mr. SPROULE. I agree with a great deal of what has been said by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). I think that for a long time this Parliament has given too great bonding powers to the railway companies that come here for incorporation. This is a matter that has been brought to the attention of Parliament before, and in the Railway Committee many members have raised objection to this custom; but it has gone on with a recklessness that is scarcely compatible with good management. Another matter to which the hon. gentleman referred is, I think worthy of consideration, that is, the very limited information which was given to the committee with regard to this railway. I was present when the discussion took place, and when the hon. gentleman asked for an estimate as to the cost of the road, its length, and its indebtedness likely to be incurred for its construction; but, so far as I heard, no information was given to the committee on these points, and the committee had either to go on the general principles of previous railway legislation or to go it blind. I was rather amused at the line taken by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). If I understand him correctly he argued that we should put obstructions in the way of the granting of railway charters; yet, if I remember correctly, only a few years ago the hon. gentleman advocated very strongly the passage of a general railway law under which any company might go on and build a railway. He was willing to have free trade in railway building at that time, while to-day he wants greater restrictions. I do not think the two positions are consistent with each other.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think they are.

Mr. SPROULE. The general opinion of the members of this House, I think, is that we are allowing a little too much freedom in the chartering of railway schemes. I think there is a good deal in the argument of the hon. member for North York that after we authorize these railways to incur a considerable bonded indebtedness, and then try to get a reduction in their freight rates, we are met with the statement that they are unable to pay 2 per cent on their indebtedness, and therefore they cannot reduce their rates. If that indebtedness represented the actual cost of the road, there would be no ground of complaint; but it is often made up largely of watered stock for which there is little or no value. Yet we go on giving these railways as heavy bonding powers as we do to railways in the lower provinces. The hon. member for South Norfolk said we give the railways in the older provinces bonding powers to the extent of $15,000 to $20,000 per mile. I think we give them more like $20,000 to $25,000 a mile, but that is through an undulating country where there are heavy cuts, and in some cases large sections of rock to be cut; but in the North-west, where there is little to be done beyond laying the rails upon the open prairie, we give equal bonding powers. I do not think it contributes to the credit of the country or the corporation to give these heavy bonding powers, because it must surely lead to extremes in borrowing money. If the bonding powers had some approximate relationship to the cost or value of the road, it would be a criterion of their value to those who invest their money in it how much they should advance. But if you give power to issue bonds to the extent of $20,000 a mile in a prairie country, and $20,000 a mile in these lower provinces, where it will cost ten times as much to get the right of way and three times as much to build the railway, that is no criterion of the value of the road, and those lending money are likely to be altogether at sea on this point. We ought to be much more careful in giving bonding power. When we reduced this $5,000 a mile, I thought we were going in the right direction, and I think we might safely have reduced it another $5,000.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not think there could be a better example of the justice of the point which the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) has brought before Parliament than this very railroad and its condition. This road is asked for on account of the troubles that have arisen between the stock-holders and bond-holders of the Manitoba and North-western Railway. The bond-holders of the original portion of the line, from Portage la Prairie to Langenburg, contend that their mortgage entitles them to have the earnings of that road applied in payment of interest on their bonds. The contention of the Allans, who hold the stock of the road, is that they have the right to distribute the earnings over the whole road, including the forty-two miles west of Langenburg, which are not covered by the bonds. The courts have decided up to the present, that the bond-holders are correct. The road their bonds cover is a valuable one, earning sufficient to pay the interest on their bonds, $15,000 per mile on the old portion of the Manitoba and North-western Railway. But here we have the promoters of this Bill coming to Parliament and asking for another outlet to their forty-two miles, so as to meet a probably adverse judgment of the courts.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER called attention to the fact that the hour for private Bills had expired, and the Speaker left the Chair.

Bill reported.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

To pay Mr. S. Bray, D.L.S., for work in settling Indian reserve claims in the Pas Agency, and in surveying reserves in the same district.....$150 00

Mr. McMULLEN. What allowance did he get for his expenses?

Mr. DALY. He got a dollar a day for his board.

Mr. MARTIN. We ought to have a full account of what this trip has cost. I understood the Minister of the Interior to say that an allowance was made to Mr. Bray of $1 a day for living expenses. That is very much below the ordinary allowance, which I think is $3.50 a day.

Mr. DALY. There is no allowance now. The rule now is they have to account for their ordinary expenses.

Mr. MARTIN. When there was an allowance, it was $3.50. If the hon. Minister has only given $1 per day, that must include only a very small part of what the $3.50 per day used to cover. On account of the principle involved in this claim of $150, I would suggest, if the item be not allowed to stand, that it be struck out, and I will take the opinion of the House on the question. If the Minister will bring down the information, I will allow it to stand.

Mr. DALY. I have given all the information we have. It seems to me that the hon. gentlemen who attack this item are rather inconsistent. A similar item passed this afternoon, with scarcely any discussion at all in connection with an allowance to Mr. Gisborne for extra services in the Department of Justice, exactly on the same principle as the allowance for extra services rendered by Mr. Bray. I have given even fuller explanations than were asked for or given on that item. I can only repeat that this gentleman is an officer of experience in the department, the work had to be done, he was sent to do it, and he did it faithfully. He started in June, and did not return until December. On his outward trip he had a very hard experience, having been caught in the ice, and it is nothing out of the way, under the circumstances, to give him this extra allowance. His duties are entirely in the inside service, and if we had not utilized him, we would have had to get somebody else. We sent him because of his experience and peculiar qualifications, and we made a saving in consequence.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What were the services?

Mr. DALY. He was four and a half months away surveying several Indian reserves in the agencies of the north-western portion of Manitoba, where a great many disputes had arisen amongst the Indians. There was a great deal of ill-feeling amongst them, and it was necessary to send some one to settle the dispute. This man did settle the dispute satisfactorily to all parties.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the hon. gentleman will look at the report of the departments, he will see that the Government have paid a surveyor for this service. There is a Mr. John C. Nelson, Dominion land surveyor, who is in charge of the surveyors of the Indian reserves in Manitoba, Keewatin and the North-west Territories, and who receives a salary of $2,190 a year. I would like to know why he was not sent to do this work. I would like to know why

Mr. MARTIN.

Mr. John C. Nelson has been brought down from the North-west Territories and whether he is engaged in the inside service or not, and what reason there was for bringing him away from the country where his duties lie, to Ottawa, and sending Mr. Bray at a considerable expense to that country?

Mr. DALY. The reason that Mr. Nelson was not sent was that it was necessary for him to remain to complete his maps and field notes in connection with surveys he had made. It was necessary that he should get through that work.

Mr. McMULLEN. A remark was dropped by the Minister of the Interior that I hope the Opposition will note. He draws attention to the fact that an item of a similar character was passed on a previous occasion without extended criticism, and urges this as a reason why this item should be treated in the same way. It is to be hoped that the Opposition will, in future, carefully criticise every item in these votes. Ministers are in the habit of offering such excuses. The Minister of Railways, in his trip through the west last year, in defending the expenditure on the Tay Canal, said that the Opposition raised no objection to the grant for that work. I hope the Opposition will note these things and will efficiently perform their duty. I endeavour to perform mine in criticising these items, and I do not think that I personally stand charged with the reproach that we do not criticise expenditures. The Minister has not yet given us all the information in connection with this item. I would like to know what sums, beyond the dollar a day, were granted to Mr. Bray during his absence for four and a half months.

Mr. DALY. Of course, he was paid his railway fare from here to Winnipeg, his steamboat fare from Selkirk to the head of Lake Winnipeg, and any hotel expenses he may have had in the city, and Pullmans and meals on the cars. That is all. Speaking from memory—it is some time since I saw the papers—the total expenses for the four and a half months amounted to $360 odd.

Mr. McMULLEN. That would be about $3 per day.

Mr. DALY. That includes railway fares, of course.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. Minister said he had to go a considerable distance in canoes. Had he any staff with him?

Mr. DALY. He had the usual staff, I suppose, chainmen and canoeemen—three or four men altogether.

Mr. MULLOCK. Are any of these expenses charged, directly or indirectly, against the Indian funds?

Mr. DALY. There are no funds to the credit of these bands, and the money was paid out of the usual sums voted by Parliament.

Mr. MULLOCK. My question has a wider application than the hon. Minister seems to understand it to have. Speaking generally of the expenses of the department, are any of them charged to the Indian funds? This item, if I understand the hon. Minister correctly, would have been charged against the fund of this band if it had not been used up.

Mr. DALY. They never had any.

Mr. MULLOCK. And having no way of charging it against the Indians, you behaved generously and charged it to the country.

Mr. DALY. It was paid in the ordinary way out of funds voted for these purposes.

Mr. MULLOCK. But there are Indian funds held in trust by the Government—lands and proceeds of lands and timber. The capital is held by the Crown, and, from time to time, interest is credited, as I understand. Now, is any portion of the expense of administering the Indian Department charged up against the funds of the Indians?

Mr. DALY. In connection with the services for the Indians of Ontario and Quebec, certain items are charged to what is known as the land management fund, which is made up of 10 per cent of the moneys realized from the sales of lands and timbers. This fund was started a great many years ago. The items chargeable to this fund include salaries of some of the agents, medical superintendence and so on.

Mr. MULLOCK. Can the hon. gentleman furnish the House with a detailed statement showing what items are charged against the funds.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman will find that information in the annual report of the Indian Department.

Mr. MULLOCK. Those reports will give the information for some years back?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I have heard it stated that 54 cents out of every dollar of the Indian fund goes to the staff and 46 cents to the Indians. I would like to know if that is the proportion of the cost of management?

Mr. DALY. No.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Will the report show what it is?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Those who have gone through the accounts tell me that is the proportion.

Mr. DALY. They are entirely mistaken.

Mr. LANDERKIN. We should have the facts before us so that we might know whether these moneys go to poor Indians or to the poor staff.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think this item ought to be struck out. Here is a man with a salary of $1,400 a year, who leaves his office for four and a half months, nobody taking his place, which shows that he has hardly anything to do, and he goes to the Northwest on work that properly belongs to him as a Dominion land surveyor. He goes there to survey lands for the Indians, and, as the hon. Minister says, to settle some disputes. We do not know but that these disputes might have been settled otherwise, for there are many Indian agents and many other employees of the Government in that locality. He goes up on a nice summer trip, and the hon. Minister asks us to vote this sum for him. It is an outrage on the country, and if such expenses came out of the Minister's own pocket, he would not pay a five-cent piece for this purpose, nor would any other business man. If this man's salary is not enough, raise it in manly, open-handed fashion, instead of trying to sneak a vote through the House—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DALY. If there is any sneaking about it, you are doing the sneaking.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If the word I use is out of order, Mr. Speaker, I beg to withdraw it. I say it is an outrage on the House—I do not think that is unparliamentary—to vote this money as a bonus to this gentleman who, according to the statement of the Minister, has had nothing at all to do. I dare say that he is drawing his $1,400 a year now; and if he could have left that office for four and a half months, he might have been dispensed with altogether.

Mr. McMULLEN. I want to say in reply to the Minister of the Interior, lest his denial should be taken as a rebuttal of the statements that have been made, that I went carefully over the Indian accounts last year myself. I had them ordered down by the Public Accounts Committee, and carefully went over every item of expenditure, and I am prepared to state that for every dollar out of the $700,000 and over spent last year on the Indians, only 54 cents of it ever reached the Indians in the way of food, pocket money, or clothing. The balance went into the hands of officials, and if the Minister is now prepared to challenge that statement, I am prepared to go over the accounts ending 30th June, 1893, and to prove my statement.

Mr. DALY. I am prepared to challenge the hon. gentleman's statement, because I remember that the hon. gentleman, sitting beside me here last session, told me that he had gone over all these accounts twice, and he knew no more about them than when he started. I do not say that to disparage the hon. gentleman, because he showed a lot of industry. But the hon. gentleman, and the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) and the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Landerkin) were talking about different things. The hon. member for Grey and the hon. member for North Norfolk had reference to the Indian Trust Fund. Perhaps the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) had nothing to do with the Indian Trust Fund at all. I do not dispute his figures; they may be correct, but I can hardly fancy they are. But the hon. gentleman had reference to an entirely different matter to that raised by the hon. members for Grey and North York. So far as the Indian Trust Funds are concerned, everything in connection with them, will be found in that Indian Report. There are no expenses attending their administration beyond the ordinary expenses of the department.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Minister is correct. My statement refers to the expenses on Indians in Manitoba and the North-west. On the occasion he refers to, I went over to speak to him for the purpose of ascertaining how the accounts were kept, because in looking over the Auditor General's Report I found that 28 agencies were reported, but when I looked over the accounts, I found there were 34. I went over and asked the Minister how it was there were accounts from 34 to 35, when in reality there were only 28 enumerated in the Auditor General's Report; and he kindly explained to me that the others were sub-agencies. After getting that explanation, I was able to go through the accounts and compile the statement made to the House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman stated this afternoon that there are a far larger number of Indians now under the superintendence of the department than there was in 1878. I can say to the hon. gentleman that he is mistaken; that there has been no Indian treaty made since 1877, and that the Indians of the North-west are nearly 5,000 fewer in numbers now than they were at that time. I wish to call his attention to these facts, without discussing them: that in 1878 there were eight clerks in the Indian branch whose salaries amounted to $9,350; that at the present time there are fifty-two clerks in the inside service whose salaries amount to $54,888. I wish further to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that in the Accountant's branch there were, in 1878, two persons employed, an accountant and his assistant, but to-day there are, I think, ten clerks in that department. In 1878 there were two clerks in the correspondence branch; at present there are seven in that branch. In 1878 there were two persons in the registry branch, and now there are ten. I call the hon. gentleman's attention now to these facts, when we came to discuss the main Estimates, I shall expect a statement from the hon. gentleman to show how each of these parties are employed. I do not hesitate to say that in my opinion there are at least four times as many persons in that department as can be profitably employed in it. I am speaking now of the Indian branch, and I think I will be able to satisfy the House and the country that it is so.

Mr. DEVLIN. The other day I put this question to the Government: Is it customary for the Government to allow permanent employees, who may be surveyors, to engage in work outside of the regular Government work? and the answer given to me was that such permission is not given. Now, I would like to know from the Minister of the Interior if it is within his knowledge that employees who are surveyors by profession, do, as a matter of fact, compete with outside surveyors in works that are not Government works.

Mr. DALY. It is not within my knowledge. I never heard of it; in fact, I cannot understand that it can be so.

Mr. DEVLIN. I have heard of it, and I bring it to the Ministers attention, because it has been brought to my notice through the complaints of those who allege that they suffer in this respect. I have heard that gentlemen who have good salaries as surveyors do outside work, and if I am not mistaken, one of the names mentioned to me was that of Mr. Bray. My informants complain that they have difficulty enough to obtain professional work at present, and that one of the causes is that gentlemen belonging to the Department of Interior compete with them for this very class of work, that they have actually taken contracts, if not in the city of Ottawa, at all events in the vicinity. I wish to inform the hon. gentleman that these complaints have been made, and they deserve his attention. Those who have worked hard and got through their profession have a right to secure contracts outside without being interfered with by gentlemen who are already well provided for by the country.

Mr. RIDER. It is the principle rather than the amount involved that justifies contention. I observe that $6 per day is paid, Sundays included. Such an item should not be allowed to pass unchallenged. An individual in receipt of $1,400 surely should be satisfied without having the privilege of making excursions through the country and adding to his salary, especially when it has been admitted that no inconvenience was felt in the department in consequence of his absence for four and a half months. If it is the custom of the department to allow Sundays to be counted, the practice should be stopped. In fairness to the committee, the Minister should allow the item to stand until further information is given.

Mr. MARTIN. With respect to the payment made to Mr. Gisborne, I do not think the suggestion of the Minister that criticism should have been indulged in on that item at that time, is likely to facilitate the passing of the Estimates. There is a considerable difference between the two cases. In the one case we accepted the statement of the Minister that the work performed by Mr. Gisborne represented extra services entirely apart from his regular duties. While as a general rule it is a bad principle to grant extra remuneration, sometimes it is proper that officials that do extra work should be remunerated for it. The case of Mr. Bray is entirely different, for it is not suggested he did his regular work at Ottawa. He simply gave his whole time to the Government on the work in which he was engaged in Manitoba, and received his salary of $1,400 for it. I move that resolution No. 171 be reduced by the sum of $150.

Motion negatived; yeas, 40; nays, 42.

Mr. MULOCK. On referring to page 15 of the Report of Indian Affairs, I find an account entitled Indian Trust Fund, and to the debit of that is an item of $225,318. What is the principle on which the expenditures are charged against the interest? Am I correct in assuming that there is a gross sum allowed for interest, and it is apportioned among the various bands, according to their rights in that fund?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. And that against the separate bands separate charges are made. So it may be that when you charge $250,000 odd against the gross amount before it is divided, you are deducting out of each band's allowance a proportion for the general expenses, and it is the residue of the interest which goes to the credit of the bands and is distributed, and is then chargeable with the items specially connected with the band. Is that the scheme of charging adopted? The sum of $255,000, I suppose, represents all the charges against that fund.

Mr. DALY. The statement made by the hon. gentleman is correct.

Mr. MULOCK. All the items we find charged against the sum of $255,000 are first charged against gross interest, and to the extent of their charge they reduce the interest of the various bands.

Mr. DALY. The particulars respecting the Indian Trust Fund appear in the report of the Department of Indian Affairs, and the hon. gentleman will find under Indian Trust Funds, "Returns C with subsidiary statements, showing transactions in connection with the fund during the year ending 30th June, 1894." If the hon. gentleman will take the subsidiary statements he will find the expenditure given under the head of each band.

Mr. MULOCK. Is it the total capital which appears on page 15 as credited up to each band, and the interest credited as part of the general interest on that account, except where specially accruing to any particular part of that band.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I take this opportunity of asking the Minister with reference to the reports that were to be sent to the different Indian bands. Some 300 extra copies were I suppose printed according to the order of the House last year. I asked the Minister how many had been sent to the Six Nations band and he told me some fourteen copies.

Mr. DALY. Yes, the chiefs.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I thought there would be a larger number sent to the Six Nations, and I was quite disappointed that only fourteen should have been forwarded. How many Indians have trust funds in the hands of the Government?

Mr. DALY. I should say, roughly speaking, about ninety bands altogether. Some of them of course have small amounts and others much larger. I cannot give the number of members in each band.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The Six Nations band has 3,500 members, and it appears to me that the number of reports forwarded is very small. I presume that many of the North-west bands have no use for the reports.

Mr. DALY. None whatever.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I would like the Minister to personally look into this matter and see if he cannot forward more copies to the Six Nations. My impression was that he would have sent 75 or 100. There must be fifty or sixty in the council alone, and I would like the Minister to forward a larger number.

Mr. DALY. I will do so.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Minister of the Interior has forgotten, I think, that he and I discussed this matter a couple of weeks ago, and he told me then when the figures were before him, that he had provided a much larger number for the Six Nations reserve.

Mr. DALY. Only fourteen copies were distributed at the time the hon. member (Mr. Paterson) asked me about it, but since then I think more have been sent out to the Six Nations reserve.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) is quite correct in stating that a larger number should be sent to the Six Nations than to the other bands.

To pay the Hon. Mr. Justice Crease, as local Judge in Admiralty, Exchequer Court, as salary from 27th November, 1893, to 25th March, 1895, at $600 per annum	$796 02
To pay the Hon. Theodore Davie, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of British Columbia, salary as local Judge in Admiralty from 25th March, 1895, to 30th June, 1895, at $1,000 per annum.....	268 49
To provide for additional amount required for judges' circuit allowances, British Columbia.....	500 00

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Justice Crease acted as judge in admiralty after the death of the late Chief Justice, and this is simply to pay him the salary that would have been paid to the Chief Justice had he lived. The other item is to pay the present Chief Justice as judge in admiralty at a higher rate than $600 a year, and I ask the House to vote that on this ground. Under the statute the present Chief Justice receives $5,000 a year as Chief Justice while his predecessor received $5,820. There is a deduction therefore, from the old salary of the Chief Justice from the date of the union up to the present time, of $820. We propose not to restore the whole amount of that to the Chief Justice, but we propose to add $400 to his salary as judge in admiralty thus making it the same as the judges in admiralty in the other provinces.

To provide for travelling expenses to judges holding weekly sittings of the High Court of Justice at Ottawa and London	$500 00
--	----------

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What do you want this for?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The Ontario Legislature arranged, for the convenience of the bar in the localities concerned, that the judges should have sittings at London and Ottawa, and it was therefore necessary to pay their expenses.

Mr. LISTER. The local legislature passed an Act providing for motions that could be made before a single judge, instead of going to Toronto, the judges would sit once a week in London and Ottawa, so that the profession in those sections of the country could make their motions there instead of going to Toronto. It is a great convenience to the bar.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Why not in Kingston then, as well as in London and Ottawa.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The local legislature has not so provided.

Mr. FRASER. I suppose that the Government will be ready to do the same thing in respect to other provinces.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman may rely on my being ready to try and get justice for his province.

Mr. MONTAGUE.

Mr. FRASER. All the business of the province of Nova Scotia is now done in Halifax, and I vote for this on the understanding that something similar to what is done in Ontario may be done in Nova Scotia.

To pay Chief Justice Casault part of salary as Senior Puisne Judge residing at Quebec, from May 27th, 1894, to July 23rd, 1894, at $1,000 per annum.....	$153 00
---	----------

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is this not provided for by statute?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Chief Justice Casault did not press for this. On his construction of the statute he did not think he was technically entitled to what he would have been entitled to under the law had he been acting for the Chief Justice on leave of absence. The late Chief Justice was dead when the present Chief Justice acted in his place and the statute did not provide for that. But had the then Chief Justice been absent and alive, Judge Casault would have been entitled to this allowance.

St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary—To pay guard W. W. Gibson the difference between $400 and $500 per annum, from the 1st April, 1894, until 30th June, 1895, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Penitentiary Act.....	$125 00
---	----------

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This officer commenced at $400 a year and after several years obtained a maximum of $500 as guard. He then resigned, but the officers of the penitentiary were most desirous of obtaining his return to the service, and in the interests of the service it was arranged to take him back. It was found that he would be obliged to lose the advantage of the $100 increase on returning, and this is simply to give him the salary he had previously. He is an exceptionally good guard and is so reported.

British Columbia Penitentiary—To pay Hon. Mr. Justice Drake for services as commissioner re investigation.....	$200 00
--	----------

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I shall not press this item, except with the committee's consent, for this reason. If they desire to discuss, as I take it we must discuss, the subject of the judge's report and the reorganization of the tariff, it will be a long discussion; it would occupy certainly the balance of this evening. If the committee will allow this small item to pass, about which there is no dispute, the discussion of the whole subject will come up on the item in the main estimates, when I shall be prepared to go into it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think we would prefer to take this separately, and not mix it up with the general items in the main estimates.

Item allowed to stand.

House of Commons—Further amount required to pay for expenses of revision of the voters' lists..... $40,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Why do you require $40,000 ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The vote given last session was $200,000. That was not the sum asked for by Dr. Dawson, the Queen's Printer, when he made his estimate. His estimate was that it would take at the lowest calculation $240,000, and it turns out that his estimate was very correct. The sum of $40,000 is required over and above the amount voted last year.

Mr. LISTER. Is that the total cost ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will explain to the hon. gentleman the items, and then he will see. Already there has been paid to the revising barristers $148,000, and it is estimated that there is due to them $12,000 ; this is at the ordinary rates. There are, besides, one or two cases in which revising barristers whose districts cover a very large tract of country have made small claims for extra allowances. These I have instructed the Auditor General to deal with on some fair basis, and decide what he believes to be right. It required for the printing of the preliminary lists, which are not printed in the Bureau, but at various newspaper offices outside, $35,000. The printing at the Bureau, together with the payment of the cost of printing a few lists at outside offices in the cities of Montreal and Toronto, total about $40,000. These items made up the $240,000. I have gone into the matter very carefully with the Queen's Printer, and he states to me that that will be the total amount.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This item is one which one would suppose the Minister of Finance and his colleagues would have taken every opportunity to avoid for the future ; but they do not seem to be taking any step in that direction. Last year the late Minister of Justice introduced a measure to supersede this expensive piece of machinery by providing another and wholly different system with regard to the voters' lists ; and the hon. Minister of Finance, while indicating his disinclination to face the serious expenditure that must be incurred from year to year if this system is continued, nevertheless insists upon its retention on the statute-book. Well, Sir, I am not going into a discussion of the impropriety of the measure out of which this enormous expenditure arises, further than to say that the hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches have indicated that, in their opinion, this country is not a unit and has not common interest unless those interests find expression in this Parliament. The hon. gentlemen have not only incurred an enormous expenditure in the preparation of these lists which would have been wholly unnecessary if a different franchise policy were adopted, but they seem to have increased the expenditure beyond what the statute warrants. I notice that they have in several instances appointed two revising officers for the same constituency. I call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that so far as I know there is nothing in the law, certainly nothing in the revised statutes of Canada, to warrant the adoption of such a course. It is true, where a revising officer is appointed for the whole of one constituency, he may be a revising officer for a part of another ; but to have two revising officers for the same constituency seems to me a monstrous practice, and one which finds no warrant whatever in the provision of the statute. The Secretary of State, I think it was, a few days ago, in answer to an inquiry, informed the House that in several constituencies in the provinces of Quebec there were two revising officers. So apart from the needless expenditure which the country is obliged to sustain in consequence of the retention of this measure on the statute-book, the expenditure is very much increased by the course which the hon. gentlemen have adopted. What does $240,000 mean ? It means the interest on a capital sum twenty-five times that amount. And for what purpose has the hon. gentleman incurred that enormous expenditure ? For the purpose of taking the preparation of the voters' list out of the hands of the municipalities, where it exists in the United Kingdom and in every other dependency of the Empire except Canada, and putting it in the hands of the appointees of the Administration. That is the condition of things existing, and the hon. gentlemen have not yet taken the first step towards a revision of the lists for the current year. There is not in the Estimates any estimate for the revision of the voters' lists according to law, although the law requires a revision every year. We know right well that there is on an average change 10 per cent by removal, expatriation, and various other ways, in the population every year, and yet the hon. gentleman has not taken the first step towards securing the right to vote to those who are entitled to go upon the lists, either because they have attained their majority or have become residents, or for other reasons.

Mr. FOSTER. There is a notice already given of a Bill respecting the voters' lists of 1895, and that Bill is down for a second reading. The whole of this matter must come up on the discussion of that Bill, and does not my hon. friend think that would be an opportune time to bring it up ? If we are to precipitate that discussion now, of course it must be engaged in on both sides.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We cannot have too much of a good thing, and I am so convinced that the hon. gentlemen are all wrong in this, that I wish to give them an opportunity of obtaining enlightenment.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend's intention is to take up the time of the House?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No, it is to call the attention of the country to the course hon. gentlemen opposite have taken. Every gentleman on the treasury benches except the Secretary of State and the Minister of Militia, were last year committed to a policy which this year they have repudiated. That policy was in the interests of the country, and the hon. gentlemen now find that the revision of the voters' lists cost $240,000, and that it ought to be done every year, and they dare not undertake to carry out the law. We will have an opportunity of discussing this subject upon the measure to which the hon. gentleman has referred, but I wish the House to remember that there is a large number of young men who have attained their majority and are entitled to go upon the lists, and who will not have the right to vote unless there be a revision. There is a large number also who have acquired the right to vote by coming into the country, and there are others who have gone from one constituency to another, and these will not have an opportunity of voting which they would have if the law were carried out. That is what I wish to bring to the attention of the hon. gentleman, and, when he proposes to put off the revision of the lists by the introduction of a Bill to amend the law, he is exercising a dangerous power. The hon. gentleman knows that the exercise of a dispensing power in England cost a sovereign his crown and drove him into exile, and he is undertaking to exercise a dispensing power and to say that the law shall not be carried into effect.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no dispensing power in this item.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There is $240,000 unnecessarily expended of the money of the people in this item.

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes, and the hon. gentleman dare not repeat that.

Mr. DENISON. There is $150,000 to pay the judges. Does the hon. gentleman advocate the doing of the work by the judges without pay?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would leave the municipal authorities to do the work, as it was done for seventeen years under the law of this country, and no person complained of his rights being interfered with. I call the attention of the country to the fact that the Government are expending $240,000 unnecessarily, purely for party considerations, and that they dare not continue this expenditure from year to year, although, if they maintain the system which they now have, the revision ought to take place every year.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Mr. FOSTER. As it is evidently the intention of my hon. friend to precipitate a long discussion upon an item with which it has nothing to do, and as it is evident we shall not make any more progress, and that the intention is we shall not, I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not object to the motion, as we have been sitting late for several nights, but I must object to the inference, that because my hon. friend raises a discussion which is absolutely germane to the item, he is wasting the time of the House. He is doing nothing of the kind. He is doing a service to the country in endeavouring to rid us, first of all, of the expenditure of a quarter of a million dollars which we cannot very well afford, and, in the next place, he has been doing his best to draw the attention of the country to one of the most outrageous measures ever put on the statute-books.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This is not the place to do it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. Minister finds this is an expenditure he cannot defend. Does he propose that the committee rise in the hope that when the committee meets again, there may possibly be a thin House, and he may get the item through? Is he not prepared to answer? Why does he take the ground that it cannot be discussed to-night?

Mr. FOSTER. I will tell the hon. gentleman why. We have not been asked for any information by the hon. gentleman who precipitated this discussion. This item does not refer to next year's work, but to work which has been done, and for which we have to pay. My hon. friend has drifted into the region of questioning the necessity of the Act at all, but that question is not germane to this item. It will properly come up on the second reading of the Bill of which I have given notice. Any details of this item which may be required will be given, of course, by the Secretary of State. The object does not seem to be to obtain information, but to provoke a debate on a question of principle involving the Franchise Act, and have a long discussion upon it. What I say is that, if we are going to go into that, it will be better not to start at this late hour. We are quite ready to discuss that question where it comes in germanely, and where an old parliamentarian like my hon. friend knows well enough it comes in properly. He knows what orderly business means, and where a discussion is germane and where it is not, and he knows that the debate he is seeking to provoke would be much better had on the second reading of the Bill than on an item providing payment for work done.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I know my duty in this House, and in the discharge of my duty I undertook the discussion of an item that is an extremely objectionable one. Sir, I am not repudiating an obligation which we have incurred, I am pointing out the impropriety of an act out of which the obligation arose. Suppose the hon. gentleman did not propose to introduce the measure. Suppose that no dispensing power was to be exercised in consequence of the charges accruing under this measure, would the hon. gentleman say we had no right to discuss the question on this motion?

Mr. FOSTER. In that case, the hon. gentleman would be within his right to discuss it. But he knows perfectly well that there is a Bill pending for its second reading dealing with this matter. He has no right to make suppositions contrary to the fact.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What is proper if the Bill had not come in is equally proper when this item comes before us.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There is a Bill to repeal the Franchise Act.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I know that quite well. And I intend to avail myself of the opportunity of discussing this question whenever that opportunity arises. I know my duty, and my responsibility to my constituents, and if the hon. gentleman had known his, this appropriation would not have been called for, and there would not have been this charge upon the revenues of the country.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Of course we are always glad to hear our hon. friend.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would like to hear the hon. gentleman give a precedent from the proceedings of the British House of Commons for the position he takes. If he finds any member on an item of this kind discussing what the law ought to be, and objecting to the law as it is, he will only have to look a little further to find that that member has not been very long in Parliament or occupies an insignificant place. No gentleman who has been in Parliament for one-half as long as the hon. gentleman would follow such a course, and it is very rare in this House for even a junior member to discuss the subject as the hon. member proposes to do. We had evidence this evening on the item with reference to an officer of the Department of the Interior how much progress the hon. gentleman wanted to make. When the hon. member for Bothwell follows the lead of these hon. gentlemen, by discussing on an item of this kind a subject which may be fully discussed on any one of three different measures now before the House, I think the leader of the House did well to put an end to that sort of thing. And I think the hon. member, on reflection, will be of the same opinion.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman is rather bumptious, and presumes a little too much on his position in undertaking to lecture me. If it were parliamentary I would say that the stool of the dunce rather than the chair of the critic belongs to the hon. gentleman; but as it is not parliamentary, I will not say that. Does not the hon. gentleman know—speaking of the British practice—that the whole policy of the Government on the subject of the navy, the propriety of building more ships, or the nature of the ships, is always discussed upon the Estimates? Does not the hon. gentleman know that the whole policy of it with regard to the army, the number of men to be maintained, the system to be followed in the different branches of the military service is discussed upon the Estimates? When the hon. gentleman undertakes to lecture me upon a question of this sort, a serious abuse affecting the interests of the country, a system which prevents the putting upon the voters' lists of the names of those who are entitled to vote, he would be engaged in better business and show better sense if he were to keep his seat until he is better informed. The hon. gentleman, no doubt, thinks he is well qualified to give advice on a matter of this sort, but he would better discharge the duty that appertains to his position as a Minister of the Crown if he would try and repeal the law and prevent such unnecessary and improper expenditure, than by undertaking to lecture those who are seeking to get rid of an abuse of this kind.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am glad to find from the language the hon. gentleman has used, which is language such as he seldom indulges in, that he has taken to heart the lesson I ventured to give him. As to what the hon. gentleman said concerning the army and navy Estimates, he knows perfectly well that it is not a case in point. When the Government comes down and asks for a large sum of money for the construction of ships, it is quite germane to that vote to discuss the wisdom of building more ships. But when the Government here comes down with a supplementary Estimate to pay for certain services provided for under an Act of Parliament the case is entirely different. The hon. gentleman will search in vain for the case of any member of the British House who is careful of his reputation taking up the time of the House in discussing the principles of a Bill of any general question of reform in connection with the navy, upon such a vote.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman is labouring under two apprehensions—or, I should say, misapprehensions. He is labouring, no doubt, under apprehensions, also, but they are probably more than two.

as the heat of the tone he adopts shows. He is under the misapprehension that the debate on the Franchise Bill has been stopped by the leader of the House. He will find that he is most grievously mistaken. The discussion upon the Franchise Bill and the necessity for abolishing it is going on. He is labouring under the delusion, also, that he has taught a lesson to my hon. friend from Bothwell, and that that gentleman has taken it to heart. When we find the hon. Minister under a delusion of that kind, we are inclined to handle him gently, for we know that he must be very tender and very soft and very susceptible to be so deluded. He talks about the practice in England, and undertakes to give my hon. friend a lesson upon that subject. I am afraid the hon. Minister's ignorance of what is the rule of debate in the British House of Commons is, as Mark Twain used to say, wide and comprehensive.

He is labouring under a third delusion, judging from his didactic tone, that he can fill his father's shoes, talk with his father's voice, and use his father's manner of addressing the members of this House. As I have had occasion to say, once before, as the old cock crows, the young cock learns; but I regret still to be obliged to repeat what I said two years ago, that, although the young cock crows very much after the manner of the old cock, his voice is still only the voice of a spring chicken. I am not alluding to the trouble in the hon. gentleman's chest, of which I am very sorry to hear, but to the manner in which he places his ideas before the House.

Sir, he has told us that the discussion of the navy Estimates and army Estimates in England is not a case in point, because these Estimates are for ships to be built in future. Did it never occur to him that supplementary estimates might be required while these ships were building? Does he not know that the whole policy of the Government in building these ships comes up in review on supplementary estimates? Does he not know that the Opposition have a right to say and do say to the Government, under those circumstances. Look at the amount of expenditure in which you have involved the country. We told you when you began to build these ships that they were going to cost twice as much as you estimated, and here we find our warning borne out by the facts.

Of course, the Opposition do say that whenever they get a chance; and the Opposition here have a right to say, and they have said, and will say, that the necessity of these Supplementary Estimates for carrying out the Franchise Act, shows that that Act was ill-considered, that it was oppressive, that it was expensive, that it was unfair, that it was an Act that never should have been put on the statute-book, and that it should be removed as soon as possible.

Mr. CASEY.

Why, Sir, how long is it since the hon. gentleman's late lamented leader had a Bill before this House to do away with this Franchise Act? Last session. It went through some stages, and why did it stop? Sir John Thompson gave the reason himself; he said, I wish this Bill to go through. I think it is a thing that ought to be done; but there is an influential and important minority of the party who do not want it put through this session; but I will see that it goes through next session. That was the position of the leader of the Government in regard to the Franchise Bill last year.

Sir, if Sir John Thompson had lived, we would now be discussing a Government Bill to repeal this Franchise Act and to substitute something which the Government considered better. Perhaps my hon. friend the Minister of Justice was among the important minority who objected to that repeal going through last session; perhaps he was one of those who thought it might be convenient that the lists for the coming elections should be made on the old plan rather than on a new and improved plan. Perhaps it may have been the Minister of Finance. It may have been the hon. gentleman who is now Secretary of State, and who had already then begun to have an influence in the councils of the party. At all events, Sir John Thompson was committed to the principle of repealing this Act, and yet the Minister of Justice, his successor in office, and in office alone, comes down to the House and says the Opposition have no right to discuss the Franchise Bill on an item for expense involved in carrying out that Act during the past year.

Now, Sir, there are several things that require to be discussed, even from the point of view of a Minister of Finance, in connection with this item, before it can be allowed to pass. One is the printing of the lists elsewhere than in the Printing Bureau. When the Printing Bureau was established, I believe it was made the law, speaking from recollection, that all Government printing should be done there, that the printing of the voters' lists in particular should be done. And yet we found, during the past winter, that the Government, in their reckless haste to be ready for an early election, in their haste to avoid the exposures of the financial incapacity, of the deficits, &c., that would be caused by a session, in their haste to go to the country on an unfinished record, ordered the printing of some voters' lists elsewhere than in the Printing Bureau. That is one reason why we should demand from the Minister of Finance an explanation as to how he justifies this breach of the law in having these lists printed elsewhere than where they ought to be printed. It will take the hon. Minister some time to explain that. He will also have to explain his selection of newspaper offices in which to have these lists printed. He will have to explain why some were given to the "Orange Sentinel," some to the "Catholic Register," some to the Methodist Book Room, some to the manufacturers' organ, some to the importers' organ, and so on. It will give him a little exercise to explain all these particulars, and I think we should have them before we pass this vote, even for the money that has been already contracted for and expended. Now, when the Minister has satisfied the curiosity which the House must feel in these respects, we shall be at liberty to go on further with the discussion of the general principle involved, and to prove conclusively that this Act should never have been put upon the statute-book, and that it should be repealed as soon as possible.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Speaking to the motion for adjournment, if the House had been sitting very late for a number of nights together, it might seem reasonable to adjourn early, as we did last night, but this being Friday night, and no sitting to-morrow, the motion to adjourn which was made at 10.20 o'clock, is something rather unusual. The House could have gone on at any rate for another hour very well. The reason assigned by the Minister for moving it is that a discussion has sprung up upon a certain item in the estimates, and in a manner somewhat peevish, and not becoming the dignity of the leader of the House, it seems to me, and in order to avoid a discussion, he moves, in a rather petulant manner, that the committee rise. Now, has he any idea that his motion will stop the discussion on this item? That is no reason to assign why the committee should rise and report. If my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is discussing a matter which is not relevant and which is out of order, the proper way, Sir, is to appeal to your ruling, and have it decided. But the Minister did not venture to do anything of that kind, because he knew very well that you would not rule in that direction, and that my hon. friend was speaking on a subject that was quite relevant. He could not take exception to his remarks by raising the point of order; therefore he adopted this other course. Now, I object to that. I object to it because it seems to bear upon its face an idea on his part that he could stop discussion of this most important matter. Now, as to whether a discussion is pertinent or not, remember that the Secretary of State has told us that $200,000 was voted last year for a revision of the voters' lists. That was granted. It was not granted without opposition on the part of those who sit on this side of the House, because they objected to the bill, they objected to the expenditure connected with it, and the wonder is that the hon. gentleman opposite did not also object. If you were to take the sum of $200,000 alone, it represents an additional to the national debt of between four or five millions; and when you propose another $40,000 for the same purpose, making $240,000 in all, it means that the maintenance of this Act is equivalent to adding $6,000,000 to the public debt of Canada, and at present we are not in a position very well to stand these additions. And when the hon. member for Bothwell finds that the House having granted, not without protest last year from this side of the House, $200,000 for this purpose, when he finds the Secretary of State asking for another $40,000 in addition, it seems to me that it was inevitable that the Minister should expect the Act itself, in its various bearings, and with its consequences, must come under review. As I said before, the Minister himself recognizes that it is legitimate, for the reason that he did not venture to take the point of order to the chair, but has taken this unusual proceeding of seeking to stop the business of the country in order that he might thereby stifle the debate. Sir, what will be accomplished if the committee do rise an hour or an hour and a half before the proper time? When the item appears again, this subject will come under review and be discussed again; but if it comes up to-night and was participated in on both sides, it could have been finished, it may be, so far as this item is concerned, and the business of the country would have progressed that far. The Minister says his object in moving to adjourn the debate was to promote more speedy legislation in the House; but can he not see that he fails entirely in that object, and that he has simply, through an exhibition of temper on his part, prevented the proper legislation of the House from going on? When the House resumes, the debate will start again at the point at which it has left off, and he will only have succeeded by his motion in taking an hour and a half's work off the House, and lengthening the session by that time. As one anxious to get through the business of the House in a fair way and leave the capital as soon as possible, I regret that the hon. gentleman has seen fit at 10.20 o'clock to make this proposition, because he became a little annoyed by remarks made by an hon. member who was perfectly within his right in making them, and who was simply discharging his duty in making them, and thus tend to lengthen the session.

Committee rose and reported resolutions.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to: and House adjourned at 10.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 3rd June, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 105) to incorporate the Ottawa Land and Security Company.—(Mr. McKay.)

REPORT OF COMMITTEE—LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. FLINT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the leader of the House if he can tell us when it is at all likely that the members of the House will be in possession of printed copies of the Report of the Royal Commission on the Liquor Traffic? I ask this question, because I have a notice on the Order paper of an important motion in which a large number of people are interested, as well as the members of this House; and I do not wish to proceed with that motion, in fact I shall not be prepared to proceed, until the report of the commission is in the hands of the members. Of course I shall have to proceed with the motion without that report being in the hands of members, if it is too long delayed.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I informed my hon. friend that the report, on presentation, was sent to the Printing Committee, but as the committee had not been able to meet, owing to the absence of the Senate members of the committee, I had sent it over to the printing department. I have since asked the Queen's Printer to facilitate the printing of the report with all possible despatch. I am not able to say when it will be ready, but if I can get the information I will inform my hon. friend to-morrow.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 56) to incorporate the Nova Scotia Steel Company (Limited).—(Mr. Fraser.)

THE LANGENBURG AND SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 55) to incorporate the Langenburg and Southern Railway Company.—(Mr. McDonald, Assinibola.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 8,

Mr. MARTIN. I would like to say a word or two more with regard to a point brought up on the previous occasion, concerning the bonding power. I was saying the other day that the litigation between the bondholders and stockholders in this road had developed the fact that there is a mortgage on the bonds amounting to $15,000 a mile, and the present shareholders are prepared to allow 180 miles to go—at any rate that is what I understand is put forward as the reason for passing this Bill. They say that if the litigation is decided in favour of the bondholders that they will want another outlet for their 42 miles which are not covered by bonds. It seems to me that fact is convincing proof of the justice of the criticism of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), in stating that this House should not allow so great bonding powers to these railways. It is admitted that the old railway, which passes through a fine section of country and has already developed considerable earning powers, is not worth more than the bonds that are against it, $15,000 a mile; and yet this company comes and asks to be allowed to bond a railway through a country in which there are very few settlers indeed.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

Mr. HAGGART. Is the hon. gentleman correct in his statement that there are only $15,000 of first bonds?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, there are $15,000 a mile against it, £3,000 of English money. If the suggestion put forward by the bondholders in asking for this legislation be correct, that the result of the litigation may end in their obtaining 180 miles of road, that seems to prove the justice of the criticism offered against giving so large a bonding power, and it seems wrong for this House to give to the same persons power to bond a railway through a very much inferior country for the same amount. If it be true that one section cannot earn interest on more than $15,000 per mile, how can a railway from Moosomin to Langenburg, through which country the soil is light, and there are only a few settlers, earn interest on $15,000 per mile? In nearly all these railways built in that portion of Canada, as in other portions of Canada, the interest of the promoters lies in the building of the railway as regards the money they can obtain on the bonds. Once the bonds are floated, the interest of the promoters is gone—they have no further interest in the railway. Whenever the money they can make out of the construction and the commissions which come out of the bonds is secured by them, the railway is abandoned to the bondholders; and the effect on the public is this, that a railway has been built through a section of country to serve that section, it is not possible to expect another railway to be built there, and the settlers along the line must pay sufficiently high freight rates to pay interest on the bonds, the real fact being that a very large proportion of the money realized on the sale of the bonds is not put into the construction of the railway. The suggestion made by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) is, that it is the duty of this House to protect settlers along the line of railway, because the moment such settlers petition the Railway Committee of the Privy Council asking for lower freight rates, the answer given is that the freight rates already charged are not sufficient to pay interest on the bonds. So the House should intervene, and refuse to sanction any railway bonding its properties for a larger sum than the amount put into construction.

Mr. LISTER. It seems to me that what the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) has said does not cover all the ground. A very important point has been altogether omitted. What are the facts as regards these roads? Here is a railway consisting of two sections run as one road. The owners have bonded a portion of the railway for $15,000 per mile. Litigation has arisen between the bondholders and stockholders. The owners of the road now say to the bondholders: You may bond a portion of the road for $15,000 per mile and realize on it as you may; so far as we are concerned, we will make another connection. Thus there is thrown on the bondholders a road on which they loaned their money, and the effect of this action is to cause them to lose the whole of their investment. I ask the promoter of the Bill whether the bondholders have been notified? As I understand, litigation is now pending between the bondholders and stockholders. The evident purpose of this legislation is to hold this Act as a sword over the heads of the bondholders, and it is a question for the members of this House to decide whether they will be a party to the scheme which would have the effect of destroying entirely the investment of the bondholders. I do not think we should sanction such legislation, at all events until the rights of all parties in the road have been legislated upon and decided by the courts before which their claims are now being litigated. Before this legislation is carried through this House, all the people who hold bonds and securities should have an opportunity of attending and opposing the proposed legislation, or, at all events, of asking Parliament to secure their claims as far as possible. This is one of those arrangements which we sanction so often. A number of men—and no doubt this was the case as regards this company—apply for and receive a subsidy in the form of a land grant, and they bond the road for a larger sum than it will cost, and subsequently when they find the undertaking is no longer profitable, and they cannot make an arrangement with the bondholders, they say, Very well, if you do not do so, we will apply to Parliament and obtain an Act to construct another road. If these are the facts, it would be entirely improper to pass the legislation now proposed.

Mr. HAGGART. I do not know whether this is a proper time or place to discuss the principle of the Bill. No objection, however, has been made to the principle of the Bill, either before the committee or in this House. The agent of the English bondholders, Mr. Rankin, in Montreal, is well aware of the legislation proposed, and no objection to the principle of the Bill was put forward in the Railway Committee. As to the amount of bonds which should be issued on these roads, and the principle on which the committee should sanction the issue, I think we should establish the principle laid down by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), that the committee should not sanction the issue of bonds in excess of the amount required for the construction of the road. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) has stated that $15,000 per mile is far in excess of the amount required. I have a statement of the cost of other portions of the road similar to this about to be undertaken, and the amount expended on the road in actual cash, exclusive of all charges for commission, discount, exchange or interest, is largely in excess of that amount named. On the first division, the cost exceeded $20,000 per mile.

Mr. McMULLEN. When was that built?

Mr. HAGGART. I believe it was commenced in 1882. The fourth division, covering 50 miles, includes very heavy work in the Bird-tail and Assiniboia valleys, and the actual cash expenditure was over $40,000 per mile.

Mr. MARTIN. That includes crossing the Assiniboia with a very expensive bridge.

Mr. HAGGART. That section now under consideration has to cross both the Assiniboia and the Qu'Appelle.

Mr. DALY. Oh, yes, this line will have to cross the Assiniboine River, of course.

Mr. MARTIN. It crosses the Qu'Appelle River, but I do not see how it crosses the Assiniboine.

Mr. HAGGART. The statement to me is that it crosses both rivers, and the plan shows it. Suppose they actually get $1 cash for each one dollar in bonds, it would not more than build the road, and I think the bonding powers asked by this company are very moderate. The engineer of my department estimates the ordinary cost of building a road in that section of the country, exclusive of these bridges, at from $12,000 to $12,500 per mile. That includes the rolling stock, and the building of the road, and the rails. These bonds generally realize about 80 cents on the dollar, which would amount to about $12,000 per mile, so that they are not asking any bonding power that is not absolutely necessary.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There are some features of this measure that the Minister of Railways has not discussed. The road from Portage la Prairie up to Yorkton runs in a north-westerly direction, and it is a continuous road. The bondholders control a very considerable portion of that road lying nearest to the Portage. Then you propose to begin at Langenburg and to build a road in a southerly direction, to cut off the northern portion already constructed, and to convert it into a portion of another road, which will make one continuous road of what you propose to build; not running in a straight line, but the southern portion diverging much further westerly than the present line. What will be the effect of that? The hon. gentleman knows that if you build a road from Langenburg, you turn away all the trade of the road beyond that point towards Prince Albert. You will cut off a large portion of the traffic from the road as it is now constructed, and render that portion between Langenburg and Portage la Prairie of comparatively little value. Ought Parliament to do a thing of that sort, and ought the Minister of Railways lend his influence as a Minister of the Crown to carry out such a scheme? The hon. gentleman from Grey (Mr. Masson) stated the other day, that I had changed my views with regard to this matter, and that I had formerly favoured the free construction of railways. Well, Sir, I believe it is the proper system, and I think so still. But, when I proposed that scheme to the House I provided that 10 per cent of the cost should be deposited with the Government as an evidence of the good faith of the companies which propose to undertake a line of road. People will not knowingly invest their money in a line of railway unless they can make a comparatively fair dividend upon their investment. But what the Minister of Railways proposes now is that the Government should lend its countenance and support to the construction of a road from Portage la Prairie to Yorkton, and render two-thirds or three-fourths of that road of comparatively little value by the construction of another line, if it be constructed. As I understand the matter, there is litigation at present between the bondholders and the stockholders of the road, and this is simply putting a weapon into the hands of the stockholders to compel the bondholders to surrender and yield to their terms. The Government ought not to lend itself, and Parliament ought not to be called upon to lend itself to a scheme of that sort. No one will pretend to say that this road is a necessity at the present time, or that it would be an advantage to the North-west Territories to construct it. On the contrary, it will render 180 miles of existing railway of comparatively little value, if it is carried out. Now, who would put any confidence in Parliament and in the proceedings of Parliament, if, after having put their money into a structure of that sort, they found Parliament lending itself to a scheme to render their investment comparatively worthless? That is what the Government are doing now. That is what they are asking Parliament to do, and I say that ought not to be done. I have no hesitation in saying that we would do a serious injustice if we were to intervene in the present litigation between the stockholders and bondholders, by a measure of this sort. If the bondholders were unreasonable, if they were acting in an unjust and unfair way; if the Minister of Railways had been called upon to arbitrate between the parties and they would refuse to agree to what was fair and reasonable, then the coercive power of Parliament might be invoked in this way to secure fair terms. But nothing of that sort has transpired, so far as we know. No information of that sort is before the House or the committee, and I think that, under existing circumstances, the hon. Minister ought not to lend his power in the House to the furtherance of this scheme.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman surely was not listening to my remarks. I did not discuss the principle of the Bill, and I stated that the committee stage was not the time to do that. I said that the parties who were most interested, if there was any objection to the principle of the Bill, were the bondholders on that section of the road next Portage la Prairie. They were offering no objection. They see no reason why the request of the owners of the other portion of the road should not be complied with. I think, therefore, it is superfluous for Parliament to step in, with a view to protecting interested parties who have no complaint to make themselves, and who do not ask the intervention of Parliament or of the Government.

Mr. McMULLEN. Were the bondholders represented when the Bill was before the committee?

Mr. HAGGART. The bondholders had the usual notice of the application for the Bill, as everybody else has. Messrs. Hanson Brothers, in Montreal, are the agents for the bondholders, and I am sure they must be aware of this legislation. If they had any objection to offer to the principle of this Bill, it was their duty to appear before the committee.

Mr. MARTIN. I would suggest to the Minister one consideration upon which we would be entitled to intervene, without the application of the bondholders. With regard to that portion of the railway which is mentioned as a branch from Langenburg to Binscarth, I suggest that it is against public policy that we should charter a line to parallel another line to which we have given a large subsidy. Binscarth might be considered the centre of the stock-raising district, and that is now supplied by the Manitoba and North-western Railway. If this road were built from Langenburg to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and then to Binscarth, it would be a competitor for the trade of the stock-raising district of Russell. Now, if we could be certain that that competition would result in the lowering of rates to the people of that country, I would have nothing whatever to say against it. But we know very well that that is not the fact in all cases of this kind; and we know that the Manitoba and North-western Railway Company are not at present in a position to give to the settlers along its line that degree of railway accommodation they are entitled to, because the traffic will not warrant it. That being so, is it judicious and proper for this Parliament, from its own standpoint, having devoted 6,400 acres of its land to the building of the first line of the Manitoba and North-western Railway, to sanction the building by these gentlemen of a parallel line from Binscarth to Langenburg? There is only one crossing of the Assiniboine on this line and I doubt very much if the Minister of Railways' estimate is not a good deal too high for the present cost of railway building in that country. I know that in dealing with the Northern Pacific we found that it was possible to build the road for a great deal less than that; and I am satisfied that considerably less than $10,000 a mile will cover the cost of building and equipping railways in the country through which this railway runs. At all events, the point taken by the hon. member for North York is that the committee should thoroughly investigate the question of cost before agreeing to the bonding power, and there has been no such investigation beyond the mere statement of the promoters as to the probable cost. Under the circumstances, there does seem to be a case for consideration whether it is judicious and proper on our part after having granted this large bonus of 6,400 acres per mile, much of which has been sold for from $5 to $7 an acre, to allow the same men who got that land grant, to build another railway alongside of the first one, when the present railway company are obliged to charge freight rates very much in excess of what the people in the district can afford to pay, in order to pay anything like interest on the bonds against the existing line.

Mr. DALY. I understand that the original objection to this Bill, as raised by the hon. member for North York, was that Parliament was giving power to this railway company to bond their line in excess of what was necessary to build the railway. According to the Bill as printed, the bonding privilege is limited to $20,000 per mile; the committee reduced that to $15,000 per mile. Now, it seems to me that the best evidence that we can get as to what is requisite to build a line of railway in that country, is furnished by the local legislature of the province of Manitoba, which has already bonused the Manitoba and North-western Railway. I find that as late as the session of 1893 that legislature passed an Act entitled an Act respecting Aid to Railways, in clause 4 of which power is given to a company called the Lake Manitoba and Canal Company, to issue bonds to the extent of $16,000 per mile; and by a prior clause the Government undertakes to lend the company $9,000 a mile, making this loan a second lien on the railway, after giving power to the company to issue $7,000 a mile of first mortgage bonds. This line of railway was to run from Portage la Prairie through the Dauphin district, where there are no obstructions to make the line expensive to build, such as the crossing of the Assiniboine in this case, but only the level prairie.

Mr. MARTIN. The Riding Mountain has to be crossed.

Mr. DALY. No, the line does not touch the Riding Mountain. It is an ordinary prairie line 125 miles long; and, according to the estimates, it was to cost $16,000 per mile. I also find that by an Act passed by the Manitoba legislature to incorporate the Melita and Northern Railway Company, to construct a railway from the international boundary to Melita in a westerly direction, bonding powers were given to the company to the extent of $25,000 per mile; and this was purely a prairie road. Now, it seems to me that if the local legislature and the Government of Manitoba, the members of which have a direct and immediate knowledge of the cost of building lines of railway in that country, have been willing to grant bonding powers to the extent of $16,000 per mile in one case and $25,000 per mile in another case, for railways exactly similar to this one, this Parliament may well be guided by the example of the local legislature. As has been shown by the Minister of Railways, it cost $22,000 a mile to build the first fifty miles of the Manitoba and North-western Railway. Since then the cost of railway building has been lessened; but in any case the cost of building and equipping will not be less than $14,000 per mile; and at $15,000 a mile the sale of the bonds at 80 cents on the dollar will barely realize the actual cost of construction and equipment. The hon. member for Lambton seemed to labour under the impression that this railway is to parallel the Manitoba and North-western, in which the bondholders are interested. Now, the bondholders have bonds on the railway for a distance of 180 miles, from Portage la Prairie to Langenburg, and as that railway runs through a good country, it is going to be a paying concern; and I cannot see how the construction of this railway from Langenburg to Elkhorn is going to affect the traffic from Langenburg to Portage la Prairie. It is all very well to talk about the rights of the bondholders; but the people who built the railway from Langenburg to Yorkton have rights as well as the bondholders, and it seems to me that the bondholders are attempting to squeeze out the men who put their cash into the construction of that line. If the rights of these people are guarded, I cannot see how that will effect the rights of the bondholders of the line from Langenburg to Portage la Prairie. They are getting to-day all the earnings of the railway afforded by the traffic between those two points, which was all that the company undertook to give them when the bonds were issued.

Bill reported.

MANITOBA AND NORTH-WEST LOAN COMPANY.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 53) respecting the Manitoba and North-west Loan Company (Limited).—(Mr. Denison.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland) moved that the following clause be substituted for clause No. 1:—

The company may hold such real estate as is necessary for the transaction of its business, or such real estate as, being mortgaged or hypothecated to it, is acquired by it for the protection of its investments,—and may from time to time sell, mortgage, lease, or otherwise dispose of the same; provided always that it shall be incumbent on the company to sell any real estate acquired in satisfaction of any debt within seven years after it has been so acquired, otherwise it shall revert to the previous owner or his heirs or assigns. Provided further, that any real estate acquired in satisfaction of any debt before the passage of this Act, and now vested in the company, may be retained for the term of seven years from the passage of this Act.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why did the Banking and Commerce Committee substitute that clause for the old one?

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). Because the Committee on Standing Orders reported that these amendments were not covered by the notice which was given and the petition presented to the House, so that the committee could not adopt the clause. The only way it can be inserted in the Bill is to move it in the committee of the whole House. The clause was considered by the Banking and Commerce Committee, and the form presented is the form in which they consider it should be inserted in the Bill. It is similar to the clause in all Bills of this character and to the clause in the

Mr. DALY.

General Company's Act, with this exception, that this company is allowed to retain for seven years any real estate it may now have. The reason the company ask that is because most of their investments are in Manitoba, and it is very difficult to dispose of land there at present.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I opposed this measure as being one foreign to our functions, when introduced some years ago, and I now again make my protest against legislation of this sort by this Parliament. Those companies are essentially local in their nature and character, and the security you undertake to enable them to acquire is, except in the North-west Territories, security under the jurisdiction of the local legislature. The whole system is vicious of encouraging companies to come here for incorporation and legislation of this nature. A company, when incorporated, is an artificial person, and may exercise the rights of any other person, so far as its franchise may permit, in any country where it is permitted to operate. Such companies ought not to come here for incorporation.

Bill reported.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 100) to incorporate the Dominion Trust Companies.—(Mr. Smith, Ontario.)

Bill (No. 101) to incorporate the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Church of England in Canada.—(Mr. Cockburn.)

THE FRENCH TREATY.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, When do the Government expect to bring into operation the several clauses of the French treaty relating to the importation of goods from that country? What has caused the delay in bringing the provisions of the treaty into operation? When does the Government expect to apply the provisions of the treaty to the several classes of goods named therein?

Mr. FOSTER. There is a Bill now before the House for second reading which it is necessary to pass before the ratifications can take place, and the treaty come into operation. Of course, that explains the delay—legislation was necessary. The treaty will come into operation as soon as the Bill is passed and ratification has taken place.

MAGOG WHARF.

Mr. YEO (for Mr. Rider) asked, What use has been made of the $2,500 voted in 1894 for Magog wharf?

Mr. FOSTER. Steps are now being taken, through the Department of Justice, to procure the transfer of the property from the present owners.

GOVERNMENT LAND IN IBERVILLE.

Mr. BECHARD asked. Has the Government land situated on the east side of the Richelieu River, in the county of Iberville, opposite Isle aux Noix, and containing some 195 acres in superficies, been sold? If so, on what date, at what price, and what is the name of the purchaser?

Mr. FOSTER. The property in question, consisting of 135 acres, 2 rods, 5 perches, was sold for $600 to Hiram Sewell Foster. Patent dated 16th May, 1894. The purchaser is no relation of mine, I may say.

Mr. LAURIER. Except a political relation.

Mr. FRECHETTE, for Mr. Lepine. How much does the letter-box carrying service, in Montreal, cost yearly? Who performs the service? When does the contract expire? Is it the intention of the Postmaster General to renew the contract without tender, as he did last time?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In answer to the hon. gentleman I beg to say that that service costs yearly $5,374. The contractor is M. P. Kennedy. The contract will expire on the 31st August, 1895. The authority for the renewing of M. Kennedy's contract has been given on the 21st March, 1895.

Mr. LAURIER. What Kennedy is that—Kennedy of the bridge?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No.

Mr. LAURIER. What is his name?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. His name is P. Kennedy.

J. EARL HALLIWELL'S PENSION.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Does J. Earl Halliwell, of Sterling, receive a pension? If so, how much, and for what service, and when granted? Is he now in good health? If so, will the pension continue? What is his occupation?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. J. Earl Halliwell, of Sterling, receives a pension. The pension is $280 per annum, on account of wounds received at Batoche on the 12th May, 1885, by a bullet entering in front of left shoulder joint. The pension was granted by Order in Council of 26th January, 1886. Mr. Halliwell's pension has been paid until now, on the receipt by the department of the required medical certificate showing that he still labours under the effect of above-mentioned wounds. The pension will continue so long as Mr. Halliwell has not recovered from the effect of the wounds. He was a law student at the time the pension was granted.

PHILIPPE S. BOURASSA.

Mr. RINFRET (for Mr. Choquette) asked, whether Philippe S. Bourassa, inspector of Weights and Measures for the city and district of Quebec, was suspended from duty between 1st January, 1894, and 1st January, 1895? If so, for what reasons; during how many months was he suspended; has he been reinstated in his position, and if so, since what date?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). In answer to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say that Mr. Bourassa was not suspended during the period mentioned.

LANGEVIN BLOCK—CLAIM FOR EXTRAS.

Mr. CHARLTON (for Mr. Mulock) asked. 1. Was any answer sent to the letter dated 29th November, 1894, to the hon. the Minister of Public Works, from Mr. A. Charlebois, respecting his claim for extras for work on the Langevin block? 2. Has the Minister of Public Works considered or dealt with such claim? If so, what has been the Minister's decision? 3. Has any money been allowed or paid in respect of such claim? If so, what is the amount, and when was it allowed, and when paid? 4. Has the Minister of Public Works made any report to Council respecting such claim, or the payment or allowance of any sum on account of such claim? 5. Has any Order in Council been passed respecting such claim, or any such allowance or payment?

Mr. FOSTER. The answer to each of these questions is a negative.

I.C.R.—SUMMER TIME-TABLE.

Mr. CHOQUETTE (for Mr. Carroll) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Railway authorities to change the time-table for the express trains on the Intercolonial Railway about the 20th June next? Is it true that the express train from Halifax, which used to reach Lévis, last summer at 11.30 a.m., will not, under the proposed new time-table, reach Lévis until 4.30 p.m.? Is the Government aware that the proposed change would be much to the detriment of the travelling public of the district of Quebec? Is it the intention of the Government to see that the said change shall not be made, and that the Halifax express shall reach Lévis, as it did last summer, at 11.30 a.m.?

Mr. HAGGART. It is the intention to put the summer time-table in force on the Intercolonial Railway on the 24th June, and it is proposed to change the time of the express trains. The time-table is not yet fully completed, therefore, I cannot say exactly the hours the Halifax express train will reach Lévis, but it will be some time in the afternoon. The attention of the Government has been drawn to the subject, which is receiving careful consideration. It is necessary that the Halifax express, which is a fast through train, should reach Lévis in the afternoon.

COLLECTORS OF CUSTOMS AS BROKERS.

Mr. FRASER asked, Does the Department of Customs intend issuing instructions to inspectors of customs to direct collectors of customs receiving less than $400 a year not to act as brokers in the ports or other places where they are collectors, in conformity with the rule of the department, as given in reply to the question put on the subject on the 20th May, 1895?

Mr. WALLACE. I may say that officers of customs have already been instructed from time to time, that they are not to act as customs brokers. The original regulation was to the following effect:—

Officers of customs are not, either in their own name, or in the name of, or in company or in partnership with any other person, to trade as merchants or as factors, agents or brokers for any person, in any goods, wares or merchandise whatever, or in any matter whatever, affecting the customs.

In the month of April, 1894, this was supplemented by an order addressed to all collectors, setting forth that:

There must, positively, be no charge made, or expense incurred of any kind beyond postage, if any, and the proper amount of customs duty.

Then, again, in the month of October, of the year 1888, the attention of customs officers was called by departmental instruction, to that regulation. If it be found necessary, the department will again issue a circular letter of instruction to collectors of customs calling their attention to the fact that customs officers are not allowed to act as brokers, except in the case referred to in my former answer—that of settlers crossing the frontier, when collectors have permission to make free entry of settlers' effects, but nothing more.

CARRIAGE OF MAILS FROM McINTYRE'S STATION.

Mr. FRASER asked, 1. At what date were the mails ordered to be carried from McIntyre's Station instead of Hawkesbury, on the route from Hawkesbury to Sydney, C.B.? 2. Was any payment made to the contractor, or any other person or persons, when such change was made? If so, what were the grounds for such payment?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The Port Hawkesbury and Sydney main route was replaced by the route between McIntyre's Station and Sydney on 15th December, 1894.

Mr. HAGGART.

No payments were made by the department on this occasion.

SAULT STE. MARIE CANAL.

Mr. LISTER asked, What are the names of the several persons appointed to the permanent staff of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal? When was each of such persons appointed, and what is the salary of each? Has the canal been opened for traffic? If so, when? How many vessels, including steamers, have passed through since the canal was opened? Has application been made to the managers of the Canadian Pacific Railway and Beatty line of steamers to pass through said canal instead of the one on the American side? If so, what answer, if any, has been received? Do such managers refuse to use the said Canadian canal?

Mr. HAGGART. (1.) Mr. Boyd, superintendent; Mr. Montague, electrician, and Mr. Taylor, electrician. (2.) Mr. Boyd was appointed on 28th May, 1895; Mr. Montague, 18th June, 1894; Mr. Taylor, 5th March, 1895. Mr. Boyd's salary is $150 per month; Mr. Montague's, $75; and Mr. Taylor's, $60. (3.) The canal has not yet been opened for traffic, and will not be until the channels through it approaching the canal at each end are proved by sweeping, to be clear of obstructions in the shape of rocks. (4.) One, the steam tug "Booth." (5.) Neither the Canadian Pacific Railway nor the Beatty line have applied to pass their vessels through the Canadian canal. (6.) The managers do not refuse to use the Canadian canals, so far as my knowledge goes.

MR. SUTTON AND THE ROYAL CANADIAN DRAGOONS.

Mr. CHARLTON (for Mr. Mulock) asked, Whether Mr. Sutton has recently been appointed to the Royal Canadian Dragoons? If so, when? Was he recommended for such appointment by Major General Herbert, or did the Major General refuse to recommend him? On whose recommendation was he appointed? Who were the applicants for the position? Were any of them graduates of the Royal Military College? If so, how many and what are their names? Where did Mr. Sutton reside at the time of his appointment?

Mr. WALLACE (in absence of the Minister of Militia). (1.) Mr. Sutton was recently appointed to the Royal Canadian Dragoons. (2.) By Order in Council of 1st April, 1895. (3.) There is no record in the department of any such recommendation. (4.) On the recommendation of the hon. the Minister of Militia and Defence. (5.) The records of the department show only the following applicants:—Lieut. Hon. Elphinston, Manitoba Dragoons; Lieut. R. Cockburn, 3rd Cavalry ; Capt. A. Sweatman, 10th Batt. (6.) None of these was a graduate of the Royal Military College. (7.) None. (8.) Mr. Sutton was a resident of Quebec at the time of his appointment.

CAP ST. IGNACE STATION, I.C.R.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, According to the new time-table on the Intercolonial Railway, is the Halifax express going to stop at Cap St. Ignace station, as requested for a long time past and badly wanted by the general public and business men? If not, why not?

Mr. HAGGART. The time-table is not yet fully completed, therefore I cannot say exactly the hour the Halifax express train will reach Lévis, but it will be some time in the afternoon. As it is a through fast express, it is not possible to stop at the numerous small stations along the line.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. This is a large and important station.

RECOMMENDATIONS FOR IMPERIAL HONOURS.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Whether His Excellency, in lately making recommendations to the Imperial authorities for Imperial honours, has acted on his own motion or on the advice of his Ministers?

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to say that it is presumed His Excellency acted in accordance with well-established principles in his recommendations for Imperial honours.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY AND SAULT STE. MARIE CANAL.

Mr. CHARLTON (for Mr. Mulock) asked, Has the Government any intimation to the effect that the Canadian Pacific Railway will not make use of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal (when opened for traffic) for their line of steamers? If so, what is the reason for their not so using it?

Mr. HAGGART. The Government have had no intimation of the kind.

CADETS AT ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE.

Mr. CHARLTON (for Mr. Mulock) asked, What is the total number of cadets now in attendance at the Royal Military College, Kingston?

Mr. DICKEY. Fifty-four, one being reported on sick leave.

No. 3. BATTERY, QUEBEC GARRISON ARTILLERY.

Mr. RINFRET (for Mr. Langelier) moved for :

Copies of all papers and correspondence in connection with the disbandment of No. 3 Battery, Quebec Garrison Artillery.

Mr. DICKEY moved that the words "not confidential" be inserted after the word "correspondence" in said motion.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

LAKE ST. JOHN RAILWAY.

Mr. DUPONT (for Mr. Lavergne) moved for :

Statement showing the gross earnings of the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway since the 30th day of June, 1894. Also, a statement showing the total expenditure of said railway from said period. Also, a statement showing the total expenditure of said railway from the same period on the following accounts respectively:—(a). Wages and salaries of employees. (b). Payments to the president as such. (c). Payments to the directors as such. (d). Payments for other working expenses. (e). Payments on construction account not included in above.

Mr. HAGGART. I can only assent to the motion on condition that I can only be expected to bring down what information asked for is furnished to my department. Some of it may not be under my control and my officers may not be able to get it.

Mr. SPEAKER. I suppose the House understands that the hon. Minister will bring down only such papers as are in his department in connection with this motion.

Mr. LAURIER. That includes all departments of Government.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, under the control of the Government.

Motion agreed to.

MAIL CONTRACT—MR. JOS. LAMONTAGNE.

Mr. VAILLANCOURT moved for :

Copies of the contract made between the Postmaster General and Mr. Jos. Lamontagne, on 1st July, 1894, for carrying the mail between Lake Etchemin and St. Rose de Watford; also, of all documents, correspondence, tenders and inspectors' reports in relation to the cancelling of the said contract, and of the new contract subsequently made by the Government, and of the tenders that preceded it.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I have no objection to the motion, but I beg to move in amendment :

That the word "inspectors" in the said motion be struck out, and the words "other than confidential" be inserted after the word "reports."

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

THOUSAND ISLANDS—SALE.

Mr. SPROULE (for Mr. Taylor) moved for :

Return showing the number of islands sold from the Thousand Island group, in the River St. Lawrence, during the years 1874 to 1878, inclusive, to whom sold, the price at which each separate parcel was sold, and the average price per acre for the total acreage sold. Also, a similar return for the years 1879 to 1894, inclusive.

Mr. FLINT. I move in amendment that the return be brought down to 1895.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

HURON INDIANS AT LORETTE.

Mr. LAURIER moved for :

Copies of all correspondence between the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, the chiefs of the Huron Tribe at Lorette, and Agent Bastien, since 1886.

Mr. DALY. I would say to the hon. gentleman that the compliance with this order would mean a great deal of work, as the correspondence is very voluminous, amounting to a thousand letters or more. If the hon. gentleman would indicate the particular correspondence he wants, there would be no difficulty in bringing it down.

Mr. LAURIER. As I cannot state just now what correspondence is required, I beg leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

DEPOSITS OF SAW-DUST, ETC.

Mr. FORBES moved for :

Return giving copies of all surveys and plans and reports of the Government engineers or officers, and including the report of chief officer Veith on any rivers in Nova Scotia, made with the object of ascertaining what rivers should be exempted from the operation of the Fisheries Act and amendment passed in 1894.

He said : This motion was put on the Order paper previous to the introduction of Bill No. 67 by the Minister of Marine for the further amendment of the Fisheries Act. My reason for doing so was the statement made in the Senate by the hon. Senator Angers, Minister of Agriculture, in answer to a motion of Senator Clemow respecting the same Act. Senator Angers said :

There was no objection to the motion being acceded to. And as it had been stated that interested parties, the mill-owners, had during recess been moving concerning the lumbering interests, especially at Ottawa, it was likely that some Bill would be introduced in this or the other House so as to modify the Act and save the lumbering interests in this section of the country, and also save some other interests on the St. John River.

It seems to me that since that statement the Government have introduced the Bill (No. 67), which practically repeals the legislation of 1894, in so far as that legislation took away from the Government the right to exercise their discretion in exempting certain rivers from the operation of the Act. The Bill now introduced really restores that discretion to the Government for the further period of two years. I think it will be necessary to have the documents for which I am now moving before us when discussing this Bill. It would seem that the Government intend only to exempt certain rivers, those in the vicinity of Ottawa and those near St. John, from the operation of the old Act prohibiting the deposit of saw-dust and other mill refuse in rivers. These returns will make it clear that there are other rivers, especially some in the province of Nova Scotia, entitled to the same privilege. I will not go into a discussion of the matter now, but would merely say that if the Government are going to make any exemptions at all, they should not show any partiality or favour. There are others rivers to which the exemption should equally apply as well as the rivers Ottawa and St. John. Especially is this the case in one or two rivers in Halifax and Lunenburg Counties, two in the county of Queen's, namely, the Liverpool and the Medway rivers, and one in the county of Shelburne. The two years notice that is to be given may be sufficient to enable the mill-owners to change their mills, but if any permanent exemptions are to be allowed, as indicated by Minister Angers, then, Sir, I claim that the above named rivers in Queen's and Shelburne must be exempt as well as the Ottawa and St. John. That is the notice given, as I construe section 2 and 3 of the new Act.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must not discuss the Bill.

Mr. FORBES. I do not intend to discuss the Bill, Mr. Speaker, but to point out the effect upon the community at large of what I understand, from the newspaper criticisms, are the proposals of the Marine and Fisheries Department. I gather that notice will be given, and occupiers and users of the rivers will, to a certain extent gather the idea that the Government intended to exempt the St. John and Ottawa rivers only from the operation of the Act. Therefore it is that I want to impress upon the Government the necessity of gathering all the information they possibly can and of being safely guided in the course they are taking in introducing and carrying through this Act. The motion which I am now making will result in bringing before the House the report of chief officer Veith upon nearly all the rivers of Nova Scotia, except a few which, I think, I shall be able to show he was not instructed to visit. It may be, when the report is brought down, and if when the Government have made themselves cognizant of the details of that report there is not sufficient information to be found, that the officer may be instructed to revisit the province of Nova Scotia with the view to the investigation of other rivers than those reported upon, with the object to get further light upon this important question.

Mr. KAULBACH. I am very anxious indeed that the request that has just been made by the hon. member for Queen's. N.S. (Mr. Forbes), should be granted and that the inspector should be authorized to inspect some of the rivers in the maritime provinces, particularly the La Have, in the county of Lunenburg, and supplement the same in his report. The La Have River has been a bone of contention for many years, the mill-owners there contending that their rights have been infringed upon. They contrast the treatment that has been meted out to them with that meted out to mill-owners upon rivers that have been exempted. The fact that upon other rivers owners have been permitted to continue running the saw-dust into the rivers regardless of results, while they on the La Have have been prohibited from doing so, causes them to feel that they have not been fairly dealt with. Why the St. John and the Ottawa should be exempted, I know not. The Ottawa River has been exempted for a number of years, but, as I have before this stated on the floor of this House, it should have been one of the first brought under the operation of the Act as a navigable river and in view of Parliament buildings, as an example for others. The La Have has a very large number of mills erected on its banks, and the industry of lumbering has been prosecuted successfully, barring the intervention of the Government, and with credit by the firm of Messrs. Davidson & Sons. But their operation has been interfered with so materially and to that extent that they in despair were almost inclined to abandon the industry; in fact, several years ago they abandoned their operations on the La Have and went into the county of Annapolis. Since then they have been driven to erect a furnace, at a very large expense, for the consumption of the saw-dust. But I am sorry to say that since then they have been subjected to the ordeal of six suits, as I understand, being brought against each individual member of the firm—eighteen suits in all. To me this appears very hard, to say the least of it; and I understand there was something like a hundred and odd subpoenas issued. I may say all this was done without my knowledge and contrary to my wishes, and had I been consulted in the matter, I certainly would have condemned so rash an act. My reason for complaining in this way is that the small millers are unable, from the manner in which the old mills have been constructed originally, to gather their dust. In fact the difficulty with them arises that at present the logs on their limits are all but exhausted; and now, at this late day if they are called upon to put up furnaces or else abandon their operations it will be a serious question for them which to do, that is if the Government insist that the law shall be carried out to the very letter, which I hope they will not. I am pleading now for the small millers on the La Have River and those upon other streams in the county of Lunenburg, and I feel satisfied that in justice to them, the matter should receive the very careful consideration of the Government, and not allow them to be dealt with in the manner the Government would consider they ought to deal with them, as in the case of the action against the firm of the Messrs. Davidson & Sons. I would ask that the Government instruct chief officer Veith to visit that section of the country and report upon the operations of the small millers, so as to have it embraced in his return.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I do not think I can say much upon this motion. There is no objection to its passing. Of course I am not in a position to discuss the Bill referred to by the two gentlemen who preceded me, but when the Bill comes up an opportunity will be afforded to discuss the whole question. It may be in order to submit copies of all reports that have been made. But I cannot say that the return will be delayed so as to have a new officer make an additional report.

Mr. TEMPLE. The hon. gentleman from Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach) has asked the question why the river St. John should be exempted from the law which was passed some time ago. I can tell him the reason. It is the boundary line between the United States and New Brunswick. The mills on the American side are allowed to throw all their saw-dust and other rubbish into the St. John, and therefore it would be useless to forbid our people on the river to throw their rubbish into the river the same as is done on the other side. If you allow one party to dump all their saw-dust and other rubbish into the river, there is no reason why others should not be allowed to do the same thing.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If that be the case, it is a reason for correspondence with the American Government on the subject. I do not think that the American Government can permit their people to throw saw-dust and refuse matter from the mills into the St. John River, and ultimately to destroy the navigation of the river, without any protest from the Canadian Government.

Mr. TEMPLE. Well, they do it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then the hon. gentleman has not done his duty if he has not pressed the matter upon the attention of the Government, with a view to its being brought under the notice of the American authorities. I think it would be a proceeding altogether at variance with the comity which one civilized state owes to another, to permit a practice of that sort. If that be so, it is important to know whether the matter has been brought to the attention of our Government, and whether they have had any correspondence with the British Minister at Washington in regard to this matter. Certainly, I think if we were to do anything on the great lakes which would affect their navigation or damage an American harbour, the American Government would not fail to protest against our conduct; and if the river St. John is being injured in the way the hon. gentleman has said, it is clearly the duty of the Government here to cause it to be brought under the attention of the British Ambassador, and to see what action the American Government are prepared to take.

Mr. GILLMOR. The truth is, that the saw-dust and other stuff that is thrown into the St. John River does not affect the navigation of the river at all, neither does it affect the fisheries. The St. John River is the boundary line only for a certain distance. Now, the St. Croix River is the boundary between the state of Maine and the province of New Brunswick, and the mill-owners on the American side have all along been in the habit of throwing their saw-dust and rubbish into the river. If there is any river in the Dominion of Canada which ought to be exempt, it is the St. Croix, because the mills on the American side have never ceased to throw saw-dust into that river, nor tried in any way to prevent it. I think the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will see that if there is any reason for exempting any river, the St. Croix should be exempted rather than the St. John. The same argument would apply to any portion of the St. John River which is on the boundary; but it especially applies to the St. Croix River, which, from its source to the mouth, forms the boundary between the province of New Brunswick and the United States.

Mr. KAULBACH. I only rise to comment for a moment on the remarks of the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Temple)—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member cannot speak again on this subject.

Motion agreed to.

SEIZURE OF THE FISHING FLEET OF NOBLE BROS.

Mr. LANDERKIN moved for:

Copies of all Orders in Council, letters, documents, papers, petitions, reports, commissions and evidence in reference to the withdrawal of the fishery license and the seizure of the fishing fleet and plant of the Noble Bros., on the Georgian Bay.

He said: In asking the House to pass this motion, I may be permitted to make a few remarks. I may say that I am not acquainted with the firm mentioned in the notice I have given; I have never seen them, I have had no communication with them at all. I am moved to ask for this address by what I have seen in the press, and by what I have learned from the evidence that was given before the commission that was appointed to inquire into the matter.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

I may state, however, that from what I have learned, the firm of J. & C. Noble have been engaged in the fishing business on the Georgian Bay between thirty and forty years. They have carried on a large business, and have been very successful in it. I understand they have something in the neighbourhood of $50,000 of capital engaged in their enterprises, consisting of tugs, vessels and steamers, such as are required for this service. I further understand that during all the years they have been in the fishing business there has never been a charge against them, a charge that was sustained. In carrying on their business they have always observed the fishing regulations, up to the time that this charge was laid against them.

Now, in 1894, some time in the middle of March, they applied for their license in the same manner as they have done in every other season. They sent in $280 to pay for their license, in order to enable them to carry on their business for the season. This is precisely what they did in every other season, as I understand, in which they were engaged in the fishing business. They had no intimation from the department that a license was to be refused them. They started out, as all the other fishermen on the Georgian Bay started out, in the pursuit of their calling, some time in the middle of April. They were fishing there as others were fishing, but the license had not yet been issued. They had not received their license, and no other fishermen in the Georgian Bay had received theirs. They considered that after their money was paid they could get a license. Another circumstance that made them more certain they would be granted a license was the fact that after they sent their cheque, the fishery overseer sent it back in order to get the bank exchange of $1.05. This was convincing evidence that they would receive their license, just as they had done before. But while thus carrying out the spirit of the law, and thus acting as other fishermen were doing, after they had started out to fish, the fishery overseer came along and seized four tugs belonging to them and, I think, nine skiffs; and at the same time there were thirty or forty vessels fishing near the same place, at Squaw Island and Byng Inlet. No other craft were seized at that time by the fishery overseer. All the crafts were allowed to go on fishing and the confiscation was confined to the boats of the Noble Bros., who had made application for license like the others had done. The tugs were seized and also the skiffs. They did not allow the Nobles to lift their nets, and which had been sunk in pursuit of their calling; the tugs were taken in charge by the fishery officer, and the skiffs were taken away. All the methods that the officer could apply to harness that firm, which had always observed the law, seemed to be put in force. The officers seized the tugs and offered them for sale, and also the skiffs, to the number of four or five, and during the whole of last season the investment of $50,000 in plant by the firm proved unremunerative. They were not allowed to carry on their business, they were not able to use the capital invested in the enterprise, but their business was hung up for the whole season. Not only so, but the men engaged by them to carry on operations during the season were also thrown out of employment by this seizure.

After a short time, the fact that this firm had been selected out of all the firms carrying on operations was commented on by the press. The leading papers of Toronto and the locality took up the matter, and although a breach of the law in the letter, though not in the spirit, had taken place, the punishment inflicted was admitted to be far in excess of the offence. It appears to me, in looking over the information I have obtained from the parties and from evidence taken by the commission, in June the commission was issued, and notice was not sent until 22nd July to the Nobles at Killarney, that an investigation would be held on 29th July, one week afterwards, and that they must attend with their witnesses before the commission. I understand there is no telegraph communication with the place where the commission was appointed to sit. The consequence was that the Nobles did not get the notice until about two days before the commission was appointed to sit, and their witnesses were then at different parts of Georgian Bay, so it was impossible for them to appear with their witnesses and answer the charges made. I think it would have been better if the department, in appointing a commission, had named a judicial officer of the bay, even for nothing more than the sake of appearances. I am not going to impute anything to the commission, but it was an unfortunate circumstance that a judge was not elected to conduct the inquiry. I desire now to read the evidence in regard to the circumstances under which the seizure was made, and why the occupation of the firm was stopped during last season. I will, at the outset, read the evidence of Charles Noble, one of the firm :

Charles Noble, Collingwood, was the next witness. He swore that he had been in business in Killarney for seventeen or eighteen years, and had fished before that for about fifteen years. The firm of which he was the member owned many boats. They had never been convicted of an offence against the fishery laws prior to the trouble in connection with these seizures, in the whole course of their business. They were summoned to Little Current in 1893, and appeared before Messrs. Tinkus and Dawson, justices of the peace. When witness arrived at Little Current, he found Elliott there to try the case ; there was no one else there. Witness asked if he could fetch in a magistrate. Elliott consented to this, and Messrs. Tinkus and Dawson sat on the bench. They opened the court with Elliott and the two magistrates on the bench. One of the magistrates wanted to know who was the prosecutor. Elliott went out to get his papers, and said that he was the prosecutor. The magistrate said that he could not both sit on the bench and prosecute. Elliott then declared the court adjourned for one week.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. From what is the hon. gentleman reading ?

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am reading from the evidence taken before the commission.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It does not appear to be evidence the hon. gentleman is now reading. Perhaps I may be wrong.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am reading from the statement under oath made by Charles Noble.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It sounds like a narrative.

Mr. LANDERKIN :

When the case again came up, Elliott had brought Mr. Burden, stipendiary magistrate of Sault Ste. Marie with him. Mr. Burden proposed to try the case without the aid of the other two magistrates, but they pointed out to him that he had no jurisdiction in the Manitoulin district, and dismissed the action against the Nobles, with $12 costs on Elliott. They gave a formal dismissal to witness. On the following Monday, Elliott, Burden and a constable came to Killarney, and between twelve and one o'clock in the afternoon, summoned the Nobles to appear before the magistrate at four o'clock of the same afternoon.

Witness refused to appear on the ground that they had been already tried for the same offence and acquitted. He showed Mr. Burden the record of the previous trial, and they did not appear. Elliott said he would find a way to make them, but he did not do so.

A week or two afterwards they received a letter, notifying them a fine of $270, including costs, had been imposed. Payment of this fine was never enforced. They, the Nobles, saw a solicitor, and appealed the case to the department. They had no reason to suppose that this conviction would be brought up against them, as the reason for refusing their licenses, or that any one would take their licenses. Witness heard from Mr. Long, that there had been a refusal of their licenses. He immediately went to Ottawa to see about the matter, and finding that the licenses had been refused, he immediately telegraphed instructions to have all fishing on licensed boats stopped.

In all his experience, he had never known the enforcement of the regulation that the fishermen must have their licenses before starting to fish. The licenses never came in hand in time for this to be done. The early part of the season was the best, and the boats usually went out about the 1st of May. Last year it was June when the licenses were received.

Witness said that at the time of the seizure he did not think there was a single license from Killarney to Byng Inlet. Joe Herty, Vale and Murray were in the Midland district. The boats of Doherty and Vale were taken to French River. Doherty's boat and license were never returned.

Witness sent a cheque to Jackson on the 12th April. He did not get it back until a month afterwards, when, finding that Jackson was carrying it around in his pocket, he asked him for it. He got back the $270 that he sent to Elliott about the 1st May.

On 15th May witness had a conversation with Jackson, who had since run away. This was by telephone from Midland. Jackson said that he had received the letter from Elliott, telling him not to recommend the Nobles for any licenses. Witness asked Jackson if he could let him have letter. Jackson would not let him have letter, but said that if he (the witness) went to Jackson, he would let him see the letter.

The firm to which witness belonged had $45,000 or $50,000 invested in the fish business. The seizure had been a heavy loss to them. Material seized was worth $7,000 or $8,000. The seizure had hurt their business very much in many ways. One station with ice-houses, &c., had been tied up, some men had been discharged, and others, who had been employed by the year, had been paid for doing nothing. The ice was all gone. They had built a new steamer 115 feet long a year ago to carry their fish, but owing to the seizure they could not find work for her to do, and so ran her at a loss. If they had been notified that they would not receive their licenses, they would have tied up and hired no men, so that they would have lost much less. Their loss, directly and indirectly, owing to the seizure was, roughly speaking, $25,000. That is, witness would not take that to have it done.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is the evidence of several other witnesses before that commission which I should read to the House, but which time will not permit. Mr. David Malcolm says :

David Malcolm was then called, and swore that he was captain of the fishing tug "Dalton McCarthy," and was fishing her at Squaw Island in May, when Elliott seized the Nobles' boats and those of men selling to them. The witness had no license either for the tug or for his own skiff, but he had instructed W. Clarke to apply for a license. He did not know of any licenses being in the party at Squaw Island. Elliott went on board the tug, and did not ask to see a license. Witness spoke to him about a license for his fishing skiff, and Elliott said he had one in the name of Matthew Bishop, which he could transfer to witness, and he transferred it to him. Witness had fished for sixteen or eighteen years, and had always gone out to fish before getting his license.

The following testimony was given by Mr. Albert Low :—

Albert Low swore that he was at Squaw Island at the time of the seizure. There were thirty or forty boats fishing there at the time. Of these, only five boats and two tugs were seized. The boats which were not seized did not all have licenses. Most of them, he thought, had. He knew that some of the Black Line boats had no licenses. Jack Malcolm stripped his boat because he expected it to be seized. The Black Line boats that had no licenses did not attempt to hide or go away. John McInness and John MacFarlane had told them that they had no licenses. He had heard that the Black Line boats had no licenses. He saw Dave Malcolm talking to Elliott in the fog-pilot house, and, when Malcolm came out, his brother Jack, who had stripped Dave's boat—which he was fishing—put everything back and went on fishing.

Dominic Rousseau swore that the boats went cut this year about the middle of April. On the 4th or 5th of May, he was in Mr. Clarke's office in Collingwood, and saw the receipts for the money sent him with Clarke's applications for tug licenses hanging up, but saw no licenses.

Mr. Fee, Clarke's book-keeper, told him that he had no licenses, and that he wished Elliott would come up and give him the licenses.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it appears that after this investigation the sale of the boats had taken place, but the sale of the tugs had not. It appears a decision was come to some time this spring to return the tugs to the Nobles, and I believe that was acted upon, and I believe that their licenses were renewed, although I have not any official information to that effect. However, I understand that they were again licensed. The Nobles gave, I am told, $7,000 bonds for the release of their seized property pending investigation; and when the Nobles went to look after this property in the spring, which had been in the hands of the Government officials all last season—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Which property? Do you mean the seized tugs?

Mr. LANDERKIN. Yes. The Government only returned two tugs and in a very damaged condition. Two compasses, value of each $50, were missing and several small articles. The Government sold five of their fishing boats, which, of course, were not returned. Two more fishing boats were detained at French River, and when application was made for these two boats, the customs officer said he had no orders to release them. Later on his store was burned and all the rigging belonging to these two boats was burned also. This officer permitted these two boats into strangers' hands during the season for trading purposes, and such little care was taken of them during the winter, that they are useless to the Nobles.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman, is, I presume, stating this on some information?

Mr. LANDERKIN. On information I received.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. On whose information does the hon. gentleman make that statement?

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am not in a position to make that statement. I have not got it from any of the Nobles, but from a party who appears to be thoroughly conversant with what he is talking about. Now, Mr. Speaker, it does seem singular that in this case, where these men were acting in good faith, and acting as all the other fishermen were: after they had made a deposit and sent in what was required in order to entitle them to have a license; it does appear singular, I say, that if it was the intention of the Government not to license them that they were not informed of it earlier in the season. It does appear as if a trap had been set in order to catch these men, because in some of the affidavits it is sworn that the fishery overseer had stated that he would ruin the Nobles if he possibly could. I have an affidavit here in which that is set forth, and it does appear that the department concurred with the officer in effecting the ruin, as far as the year's business was concerned, of the Nobles. Here is an affidavit made by Mr. Thos. Boyter :

Canada, Province of Ontario,
District of Manitoulin.

In the matter of the seizure of the tugs and nets of F. and C. Noble, of the village of Killarney, in the district of Algoma.

1. I, Thomas Boyter, of the town of Little Current, and the district of Manitoulin, fisherman, do solemnly declare :

2. That I am well acquainted with T. H. Elliott, of Sault Ste. Marie, fishery overseer for the district of Algoma ;

3. That in March, 1894, at Massey, in the district of Algoma, in Richard Boyter's shop, the said T. H. Elliott told me, when I asked him about a fishing license for fishing for myself and brother Robert, to apply for it myself direct to him at Sault Ste. Marie, saying as follows :—

"I will not grant any license through or to the Nobles, as I have been after the sons of B. S. for the last two years, and I have them where I want them now, and I am going to crack it to them."

4. And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath, and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act, 1893.

(Signed) THOMAS BOYTER, Jr.

Declared before me at the town of Little Current, in the district of Manitoulin, this 5th day of November, 1894.

THOMAS C. SIMS, J. P.

There is another affidavit to the same effect signed by W. Peters, which it is not necessary for me to read. It does appear that a deliberate trap was set to entrap and ruin these men who had so much capital invested in their business. Why should this be done? Why, in this age of the world, should any department of Government be in a position to destroy such a firm as this, who, for thirty-five or forty years have carried on business, and have never been convicted of an offence until they were led into this trap? I will give you an opinion of these men held by a newspaper published in the district of Algoma, and I believe the organ of the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Macdonell) :

After reading, in its Tuesday issue, the "Globe's" article anent the Killarney fishery troubles, one can scarcely avoid the conclusion that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries is a shallow-pated fool, inspector Elliott a knave, his witnesses perjurers, the convicting magistrate an ass, the investigating officer Wilnot a lunatic, and Noble Brothers martyrs to a foul conspiracy. The promised investigation should be held soon at any place most convenient for the fishermen and the accused, and by an officer above suspicion of complicity. Better far that all the fisheries be destroyed than honest men so slandered and wronged without the least opportunity for defending themselves. Not being possessed of all the facts, the "Pioneer" is content to wait for the verdict of the court. The "Globe" appears to hold all the evidence. Now, Sir Hibbert, lay on, and confusion take him who first cries, "Hold, enough." The "Globe" has made a charge against the Minister and his officers which nothing short of the fullest and most thorough investigation can remove.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). May I ask the hon. gentleman what paper he is quoting from?

Mr. LANDERKIN. The Algoma "Pioneer."

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). I repudiate it altogether. It is not my organ.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I have looked through its files, and it has not repudiated the hon. member, but, on the contrary, has been a very strong supporter of his during the present session. But I have no doubt that the paper will learn that it has been repudiated by the hon. member in this House. However, that was a very good article, and a very true article, if all the facts which I have gathered are to be verified by what we are yet to receive. Now, I move for these papers, believing that I am entitled to move for them. I move for them purely and simply on public grounds. I believe that if the departments have the power to crush out of existence men who are trying to do a legitimate business, that power should be taken from them. I think this act of the department can be said to be nothing less nor more than an act of despotism. I hope that many cases of this kind cannot be found in this country.

Having looked over the annals of the department, I do not know of any case in which a graver penalty was attached to a small offence. The Minister may plead that charges were made which were not investigated. If that is so, it is a reflection upon the Minister himself, and not upon the Nobles. If there was any charge against them, the officers of the department should have looked into it before. But when they could only find trumpery charges, they set a trap to catch them, and seize upon their tugs and vessels, while allowing other tugs to go on and do business in the same way. I feel it my duty to move for these papers, feeling as I do that if the Government possess such powers, they should be taken away from them.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat expects the motion to carry or not, but I trust that the House will not entertain it after I state that it would be quite irregular to bring down the papers.

Mr. LAURIER. Oh.

Mr. COSTIGAN. My hon. friend seems to be a little surprised at that, but he may not be after I state the reason. The hon. member speaks of an investigation having been ordered into this matter. That investigation has not yet been proceeded with, and until it is held, I think the case should not be dealt with here. In one respect I am sorry for that, because if I could deal with it I could answer many of the points raised by the hon. gentleman. I do not doubt at all the very deep sympathy of the hon. gentleman for these men. No doubt he feels that they have been very badly treated, and that the Government deserve very severe censure. That may be true, but I am not yet in a position to discuss the question, pending an investigation by a legal tribunal. The delay is not the fault of the Government or the Minister, or the department. The delay has been caused by the gentlemen with whom the last speaker has expressed such great sympathy, the Nobles themselves. After their vessels had been condemned, my predecessor listened to the appeal made by them, in which they assured him that if a rehearing were granted they could bring forward such evidence as would reverse the former decision, and induce him to restore the property. He consented to a rehearing, fixing the time and place. When the time for the rehearing was about to arrive, I was in charge of the department, and the legal advisers of the Nobles, Messrs. McCarthy and Osler, notified the department that they would advise their clients to appeal for a change in the arrangements for the rehearing. They took exception to the place, called Massey, as inconvenient to reach, and they also raised an objection that the rehearing was to be before a very prominent officer of the department. All these things were taken into consideration, and in order to give them every possible chance to make out their case, we agreed to a rehearing which they proposed should take place at Collingwood, perhaps before the county court judge. Where the rehearing will take place is under consideration by the Government, but I hope my hon. friend will not conclude that there has been unnecessary delay. We have another contention stating Collingwood would perhaps be a little inconvenient, because the fishermen who will have to give evidence live more in the direction of Killarney, which is a great deal further west. In view of the pending inquiry, Messrs. Noble Bros. asked us to release the property, pending the decision of the court, on their giving bonds, to the value of the property, to restore it should the court so decide. We thought that was a reasonable proposition. They gave bonds to the amount of $7,000, and the property was restored. Now, the evidence which the hon. gentleman read is not official evidence at all, but a statement of their case prepared by Noble Bros. They quote the evidence, and the evidence as quoted differs very materially from the official report. However, I do not want to discuss these matters now. I simply take the ground, which is just and reasonable, that as this rehearing will take place, and as the whole case must be decided by some tribunal, it would not be right or proper to publish any of the papers.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. LAURIER. If I rightly understood the remarks made before six o'clock by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Costigan), the Government refuse to grant this motion. The reason the hon. gentleman gave was that the matter was now pending before the department.

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is pending before a court of inquiry.

Mr. LAURIER. Why then not give to the House now the papers? Why should Parliament, which is the great court of inquiry, be less privileged than any other court in the land? The court of inquiry which is now sitting upon the case is simply sitting upon the case of Noble Bros., to ascertain whether or not they have been rightly convicted, but there is more than that pending before the public. We ought to know in what manner the department is administered. This case has been before the public a long time. It has found its way into the public press. It is in evidence that a certain officer of the department—I shall not criticise his conduct at present—acting under the power vested in him by the Fishery Act, refused to issue the annual license which has been issued, year after year, to the Noble Bros. Not satisfied with that, but for certain alleged contraventions of the Fishery Act by that firm, this officer, who is clothed with powers which are not vested in the highest judges in the land—powers which I do not at all traverse or even challenge—found that the Noble Bros. had contravened a certain provision of the Act and proceeded to convict them at once and to enforce the convictions.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, the conviction was by a police magistrate, and not by the fisheries officer.

Mr. LAURIER. The conviction was by a police magistrate upon the complaint of the fishery officer, and therefore the Noble Bros.

exercised the right of appeal which they have under the Act.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. They did not appeal. Instead of taking that course under the Act and appealing to the Minister, they did not question the legality of the conviction. What they did was to remonstrate against the severity of the department in holding this plant for that offence and proposing to sell it at public auction. They asked the Government to order an investigation into the reports of the officers, which, they alleged, had prejudiced the Government, and they asked this in order that the Government might be induced to lighten the severity of the sentence and enable them to get their property back. That investigation went on, and, as the hon. Minister stated, they did not appeal from the decision, and, as I understand it, at no stage of the proceedings did they question the validity of the conviction. They say the conviction was for a technical violation of the law, but a conviction legally made.

Mr. LISTER. Conviction for what?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. For fishing without a license.

Mr. LISTER. Before whom?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Before the police magistrate. Before Mr. Burden, if I remember aright.

Mr. LANDERKIN. But that was the year before.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am aware of that. I have every confidence in my recollection of the facts; for I have had to read reams and reams of papers about the case.

Mr. LAURIER. Well, what kind of inquiry is going on now?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I shall be delighted if the hon. gentleman will allow me to tell him.

Mr. LAURIER. Certainly.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The case being as I have stated, the Nobles pressed upon me from every quarter that the offence for which they have been convicted, of which they were technically guilty, was a small offence for so severe a punishment. My answer was: Your record on the files of the department is so bad that we have been endeavouring to take you in some violation of the law, to make an example for those engaged in poaching, so as to deter all that we believe you have encouraged. My information was that where they had not themselves openly violated the law, they had supplied the nets and, in some cases, twine for the nets and supplies, for fishing in districts very difficult for our officers to get into in order to enforce the law; and that they had in every way possible offered defiance to our regulations. One of these gentlemen came to the department with Mr. Long, an acquaintance of mine, and they discussed the case, of course, from their point of view, while I discussed it from the record that was before me, and, with great regret, I came to the decision that, with the record that I had before me, it was impossible for me to take their protestations of innocence. I could not put them upon any other plane than that of ordinary fishermen. Indeed, I don't think they were entitled to any better treatment. I was obliged to hold that they had not made out a case which enabled me to overlook the reports which were placed before me by the officers paid by the country. Then they pressed upon me that there must be some way of redress; they still insisted that these reports were false, that they had not the character ascribed to them, that I was misled, and that, if they were given an opportunity, they could show that all these reports and all the bad opinions formed of them were without foundation. As soon as possible—there was some delay, and they have discussed that a great deal in the papers, but it is all capable of explanation—as soon as possible, the report which I promised to make was made, recommending that a commissioner be appointed to hear and determine this case; and, as the hon. Minister says, Mr. Wilmot was appointed. Mr. Wilmot proceeded with the investigation. He made a mistake in the conduct of it—I do not hesitate to say so—but it was a mistake for which he might be pardoned, for this reason, that a counsel was sent, and, instead of assisting in the investigation, by the line which he adopted, he made it exceedingly difficult for one not skilled in legal matters to keep the proceedings strictly regular. Still, a great deal of evidence was taken. The counsel for the Nobles then asked that I should myself go all over this evidence, and sit in the case and take evidence, and that kind of thing, a request which I declined to grant. After discussing the case with the late Minister of Justice, who was leader of the Government, it was decided that the Nobles should be given an opportunity of having the case re-heard by Mr. Wilmot, who should be instructed to enable them to do what he had refused them the opportunity to do before, thinking that his instructions would not permit him to allow it—that was to have a specific statement, an itemized list, of the offences that were reported against them. They were not satisfied with that. They objected to Mr. Wilmot personally, first, because he was an officer of the department, and then, if I recollect aright, on the ground that he was technically unfit for that investigation. The matter was discussed and, as a result, as the hon. Minister has stated, this investigation is now going on before a judge. This is at the solicitation of the Nobles. As to bringing down the papers, a point was discussed this afternoon, and I would appeal to the hon. gentleman's sense of what is regular and right. The Minister tells me, since he has spoken, that, while objecting to bringing down the papers, the objection was based on the ground that if the order as it stands were complied with, the whole case of the department would be put in the possession of the parties who are proceeding practically against the Crown, and who, in case of a favourable outcome of the investigation, will no doubt make a claim for something. The objection to bringing down the papers will not cover all the documents. I ran my pen through a copy of the resolution, leaving it in the shape that would not be objected to. It would then cover Orders in Council, petitions, commissions and evidence, that is, the evidence in the unfinished inquiry. But the Government could not consent, at this stage of the investigation, that the "letters, documents, papers and reports" should be brought down, for the reasons I have explained.

Mr. LAURIER. I understand that the hon. gentleman objects to bring these papers down, but will he state his reasons for objecting?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I thought I had made myself clear. The reason is that we are in the middle of an investigation, and to comply with the order according to the terms of the motion would be to put in the possession of these parties the case for the Crown, giving them an advantage which justice does not demand and which would not be fitting. The case stands thus: As head of the department, I had formed a bad opinion of the Nobles as fishermen. I may be wrong; they say I am; they say: Give us an opportunity—and it is an exceptional opportunity to give—give us an opportunity to testify and bring witnesses, and we will show that your officers have falsified the documents, and that we are the victims of a conspiracy. With the opinion I have formed of their conduct, it is certainly wise not to make public confidential papers and other documents we have at this stage of the investigation, but only to bring them forward in due course as the judge may require—always remembering that we have offered, in this investigation, to give them opportunities to see the charges upon which these prejudices in the department exist.

Mr. LAURIER. It seems to me that the very reason the hon. gentleman has given why these papers and documents should not be brought down are the very ones why they should be brought down. If I understand the hon. gentleman aright, the complaint made by the Nobles was that they were the victims of a conspiracy, that their record had been falsified by the officers of the department, that they had been charged by the officers with offences of which they were not guilty. If such be the contention of the officers of the department on one side and the Nobles on the other, it seems to me that the ends of justice would be prevented if the Nobles were not placed in full possession of the facts they stand charged with at the present time. They cannot enter upon their defence successfully, especially when they feel so strongly that they are blamed unjustly and they are the victims of a conspiracy. It seems to me that, under those circumstances, they cannot make their defence successfully, especially when they feel that they are blamed unduly and are the victims of a conspiracy. It must strike the sense of justice of my hon. friend that they cannot successfully vindicate their character unless they are placed in possession of everything which pertains to this case, and of all the charges laid against them. How can they successfully vindicate themselves in any case where they are charged with having violated the law, unless they have an opportunity to make a defence to each specific charge? The hon. gentleman himself says that whilst he was at the head of the department, by reports that came from his officers—and he could have no other source of information—he was placed under the impression that they were systematically violating the law, and were not deserving of any sympathy. Then I appeal to him, I appeal to his sense of justice, and I appeal to the sense of justice of the House, that it is impossible for these men, when they come to him and say that they are wrongfully charged, successfully to vindicate themselves unless they know all the items of the charges against them. It seems to me that the reasons which induce the hon. gentleman now to refuse an order of the House for the production of these documents, are the very reasons why these documents should be made public, in order that the Nobles may have an opportunity of rebutting the charge: and if they cannot rebut it, that the officers of the Crown may be put in a position to make their allegations against these men. But there is more than that. There is not only the case of the Nobles, however important it may be in itself, but there is a great public consideration which this case suggests. It seems to me that it suggests the very important question whether these special officers of the Fisheries Department are not vested with altogether too large powers. This case shows that it is possible for an officer of the Crown, even though actuated by good motives, and much more if he is actuated by spite, to ruin the industry of any man. In this case these men, I am informed, have been for many years prosecuting their avocations and by their industry have been able to build up a large fortune. If we are credibly informed, they have invested, in that industry, in plant and vessels, no less a sum than $50,000. But by the action of an officer of the department, these men have been prevented for a whole season from pursuing their usual avocations, prevented from making use of the capital which they made by their own industry, and all this by the will of a single man. He may be wrong or he may be right, but it must strike my hon. friend that such an extraordinary power should not be vested in a single subordinate officer. There is no judge of a high court in the country who is vested with such power as that subordinate officer. The House has every reason to ask that the whole facts of this case should be put before us in order that we may be able to judge whether it is in the public interest that such extraordinary power should be placed in the hands of one individual, and whether the property and rights of any citizen should be at his mercy. I say there is reason to consider whether the power of these officials should be revised or, perhaps, abridged. Therefore, on the ground of public expediency, as well as on the ground of personal consideration to the Nobles. I say that the arguments which have been advanced why these papers should not be produced, in reality show clearly that they ought to be laid before the House.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I submit that the leader of the Opposition has totally misapprehended the facts of this case, although I attempted, but apparently without success, to correct him in regard to the facts. The hon. gentleman adverted to the large powers with which a fishery officer is vested, and alluded to the fact that these fishery officers can seize and hold property which is being used by a man who commits an offence against the Fisheries Act. My hon. friend seems to think, from the developments in this case and others, that there is great danger to be apprehended from too wide powers being given to these officers generally over the country. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is a consideration wholly apart, I submit, from anything connected with the case of the Nobles, because the fishery officer in this case did not exercise any one of those great powers. He only did what an ordinary constable does in case of need, he made a seizure. But all the facts in regard to the seizure, and in regard to the offence for which these men were properly, according to their own admissions, convicted in a court of law, and the testimony of the officer, were duly submitted to the police magistrate of that district, who found these men guilty, fined the offenders, and from that decision these men did not dare to appeal. According to their testimony, partially taken, and which is in the possession of the hon.

gentleman who made this motion, they had no case for an appeal. It was admitted that they had committed this offence; therefore, there is no danger, I take it, from the large powers exercised in the seizure. But what is the hon. gentleman's object in making this motion? What does the House of Commons want to do at this particular juncture, with the papers in this case? If the motion is made with no object, or an insufficient object, then I take it that the good sense of the House will not order the papers to be brought down. What is the object of the hon. member for South Grey? It cannot be to consider whether the Government, or the responsible Minister in that case, acted with due discretion, fairly or unfairly, or that his conduct should be considered in this House, because the time has not yet come when, in fairness to him, or in fairness to the Nobles themselves, that view can be considered by the House. The case is not ready for the House, and in this case, as in others to which I will refer, the time is not opportune for the production of these papers. Heretofore, when circumstances such as those to which I refer, have been mentioned in the House, it has not been unusual for the mover, unless he has some particular object which commends itself to Parliament, to ask leave to withdraw his motion, and bide his time, waiting till the whole subject has been threshed out. Now, these gentlemen have not indicated, my hon. colleague informs me, that they, who are the parties aggrieved, if any, are behind this motion. It is not suggested by the hon. gentleman who moves this motion that he is attempting to obtain discovery in this way so as to enable the Nobles to push their case in a judicial investigation. There is no other object apparent than that mentioned by the leader of the Opposition, who thinks that the powers of the fishery officers are too large; and, of course, the discussion involves the conduct of the Minister who was charged with the administration of the law in that particular case. As I say, the case is not in any sense ready for that consideration. If these papers were brought down showing an incomplete record, no one in this House would either condemn or approve the conduct of the fishery officer in this case. Now, I must say, without going into these papers, something in addition to the brief explanation I attempted to give the hon. leader of the Opposition, and which he kindly permitted me to do while he was addressing the House. I was met in the Fisheries Department by the difficulty that has met all my predecessors. If we were lenient, gross abuses occurred; and, as the fisheries showed signs of exhaustion in one place, the attacks were extraordinary in their number and their extent in other places. And complaint was made everywhere against the laxity and neglect of the department. Any one who has had much to do with efforts to keep in check the rapacity of some fishermen know how difficult the task is, and know the risk they will run. Unfortunately, I was brought into collision time and again, not with men who had accumulated $50,000 of capital, for I would have no hesitation in dealing with them, but with the poorest people of the community, fishermen possessing very little means, indeed, and whose living is most difficult to secure. Their boats and nets were destroyed, and reports were brought down time and again, showing that miles of nets in the Georgian Bay waters and in the western lakes had been seized, confiscated, and burnt. Boats belonging to the fishermen have been taken and destroyed, a steamer has then been put on, and, notwithstanding the severe methods adopted of necessity to prevent further violation and prosecution in connection with the Fisheries Act, months, even years have elapsed before I could ascertain that some effect was following a most difficult, and, I will frankly add, met a generally unpopular course. No pleasure was afforded the head of the department in showing severity in these cases. Rightly or wrongly, I believed it was my duty to act as I did, and I had the satisfaction of knowing that while the facts were notorious, and complaints were laid along that line, my action was not condemned in the House, but that among men engaged in the fisheries, and those who had studied the question, my conduct in that particular was highly commended. In the case of the Nobles I happened to have a little information on my own account. I happened to know this, for instance: If there ever was a reason which would have, in spite of my wish, somewhat changed my course, it was the fact that men of the highest position in the commercial world, in Montreal, Toronto, and Hamilton—men who were advancing money to the Nobles, and were behind them—represented to me as strongly as possible facts brought to their notice which seemed to mitigate the offence of the Nobles, and suggest that the course of the department should be less severe. I do not hesitate to say that I struggled to reach a conclusion which would have met their approbation, and enabled me to treat with those parties in a different way from what I did; but I met with reports, statements and facts in the records of the Department of Marine and Fisheries which made it simply impossible for me to do anything of that kind. The Nobles not only had the advantage of the advocacy of the people to whom I have referred, but the press almost unanimously took up the side of those men and published article after article, written in the absence of information, with this conclusion, that a very severe penalty, and one unduly severe had been imposed, and that the action of the department was despotic. In regard to these reports I will tell the House why I believed, at the time, I acted properly in the matter, as I believe now, and that these gentlemen were guilty of a great deal more than hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken of them ever heard of. While one of the Nobles, in company with one of the Longs, of Collingwood, was discussing his grievance with me in my office, and having admitted to me that he did become aware of the fact that in recent years the department had become very stringent, indeed, in regard to the necessity of fishermen having first a license before they engage in fishing on the lakes, he stated that he and his partner only learned of that fact during the preceding fall. He represented that they supposed that the payment of the amount of the license fee, and obtaining a receipt for that payment, would be sufficient authority to go on with the fishing. While he was making out his case, I asked him particularly as to the month when he did become aware of it. He told me in November, I think, but, at all events, in the preceding fall. We were then in the spring of the following year, and while sitting there a telegram was placed in my hand from an officer of the department in the district, stating that the whole of the tugs belonging to the Nobles had just been caught out fishing without a license.

Mr. LISTER. They had paid their license fees.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, but they had received no license, and the gentleman sitting in my office had just informed me the Nobles had become aware that a license was necessary and that a receipt was no good, in the fall; but, nevertheless, their boats had gone out without the owners having a license, but simply holding a bare receipt. Speaking frankly, I admit that that incident did prejudice me against them, and confirmed, if I wanted confirmation, the report in my hands in regard to their operations. Other means were taken to ascertain the truth in this matter, and with the means at my disposal I became confident that those gentlemen were guilty of all that had been charged against them, that they were poachers, and not fishermen, and had been engaged for years in setting at defiance our laws and regulations; and, under these circumstances, I would have been recreant to my duty, and, in every sense, unfit to discharge my duty if I had not held a firm hand. Even then, when those men persisted, against all the information I held, against the incident to which I have referred, in not seeking for an appeal from the conviction, in asking for an investigation, I did not hesitate to say that, under the circumstances, it could be granted, and I took the regular course to have an investigation offered them. They have had eminent counsel, they have them yet. Those eminent counsel have made no formal demand for these papers, and they are not said to be behind this motion asking for the papers as necessary; but even if they pleaded for them, I certainly would say that, so far as I am concerned, guarding the interests of the department, and of the fisheries, I would submit to this Parliament or to any court or tribunal invested with authority, whether this was the time to produce these secret and confidential documents and papers that would afford assistance to counsel representing the parties. If the hon. gentleman wants to be seized of the facts, the Government will furnish all the papers with the exception of those documents which I may term confidential, the reports of officers, some of which are of the strictest confidential character, and should not, in the interest of the country be brought down at the present time. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries authorizes me to say that, in opposing the motion in its present terms, he had, as I have now, reference particularly to those documents which I have mentioned. That is to say, we are willing to assent to an address asking for copies of all Orders in Council, petitions, commissions and evidence in reference to the withdrawal of the fishery license. The word evidence, of course, there is referring to what we have said across the floor of the House to-day: that unfinished Wilmot investigation. I wish to leave out the words "letters, documents, papers, reports," because these are now in the hands of the counsel in the case. It is perhaps fitting I should make a passing reference to some of the authorities to show we are not departing from the practice adopted in this Parliament, and in the English Parliament. Dr. Bourinot, at page 337 of his book, says:

There are frequent cases in which a Minister refuses information, especially at some delicate stage of an investigation or negotiation.

And again:

Sometimes the Government may be obliged to withhold all information at the time, or they may be able to put the House in possession of only a part of the correspondence.

And then again, at page 341:

A sound rule generally observed by the House is, that proceedings before a court of justice are not given except for public purposes, and still more is this the rule when a case is pending and the ultimate decision not yet reached.

Mr. LAURIER. He says for public purposes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes. I take it that it won't be said here that there is any great public purpose involved, or that the case is ready for that. Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I move in amendment that the words "letters, documents, papers and reports" be struck from the motion.

Mr. LISTER. Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised at the Minister of Justice being somewhat rejoiced at getting out of the position of Minister of Marine and Fisheries, from the story he has given to the House this evening. I have no doubt that the utterance of the hon. gentleman is perfectly correct, that he did administer his department with very considerable firmness, in fact a good deal more firmness than those particularly interested would have liked to have seen; and I may say that occasionally, the hon. gentleman, in his desire to enforce the law as he understood it, worked great injustice indeed on a great many fishermen of this country. The hon. gentleman tells us that he objects to bring down these papers because the case is sub judice, because there is an action pending and no decision has been arrived at, and that the production of the papers might prejudice the case for the Crown. I take issue with the hon. gentleman and say: that no action is pending at all. What is proposed to be done by the Government is, to reopen the investigation directed by the Government, before a commission to be appointed by the Government.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. At the request of the parties concerned.

Mr. LISTER. At the request of the parties interested. As a matter of fact what is to take place here cannot be looked upon in the light of a trial in any way at all, and I am somewhat surprised that the hon. gentleman should have taken objection to bring down papers, that he would have been compelled to bring down under an order for discovery, had he been a party to a civil action in any court of this country. It cannot be pretended at all that if this was an action between individuals, that one party to the action could not compel the other party to produce every paper in any way relating to the subject-matter of controversy. So far as this matter is concerned therefore, the hon. gentleman wants to take the extraordinary position of saying: While we have acted in an exceptionally severe manner towards these men, while we have invoked the law in all its power—and it is powerful, and more than it ought to be in a free country, while we have almost ruined these men, suddenly seizing their fishing appliances, and prevented them following their avocations for a whole year at an enormous loss; while we have done all this injustice to these men, who have applied for a rehearing—and there must be good reasons for the application, or the Government would not concede to the request that they made that the case should be reheard—then, I say, in all honesty and justice to these men, every atom of evidence that the Crown has in its possession affecting this case, should at once be laid upon the Table and be accessible to the Nobles, and to every person else. The Minister of Justice is, I think, taking a narrow position to say, that in a case between the subject and the Crown, the evidence which the Crown has in its possession shall not be seen by the person against whom the Crown is making the charge. Surely the persecution which has evidently existed in the past is not to be continued; surely these men are not to be pursued in the way they have been in the past. These petty officers throughout the country, clothed with a little power, use it in the most tyrannical manner possible. They go to work, and without a moment's notice they seize $20,000 or $30,000 worth of a man's property. They throw hundreds of men out of employment who are working for these people during the whole year. They deprived this company of the profits which they would have made if they were allowed to follow their employment. This officer does that, and the persecuted man says: Give me a fair trial, give me a fair hearing; and the Government send up, whom? An official from their own department, a decent man enough I have no doubt, but as narrow as a pine board. He goes up there, and the evidence will show what took place. The hon. gentleman says: These men have been convicted before; and remember he is the judge. No matter who was appointed to report, the Minister of Justice is the judge and the court of last resort, and he to-day admits that he has prejudged the case. He says that he has a bad opinion of the Nobles as fishermen, and that the Nobles have a bad record for poaching, and we may almost conclude that before the case is tried the court of last resort has decided that the men are guilty. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) tells us here that these men had been convicted. But the evidence before Mr. Wilmot shows that they had been summoned and that they had been acquitted, not convicted.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I trust the hon. gentleman does not wish to misrepresent me. I was careful not to refer to a conviction.

Mr. LISTER. Yes, you did.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman misunderstood me. I charged these men with having a bad record as poachers. The only conviction to which I referred—

Mr. LISTER. Was your own.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER—no, but that of the police magistrate in this case, from which there was no appeal, and under which the tugs became the property of the Crown.

Mr. LISTER.

Mr. LISTER. Well, I hope that there is no Government, which will enforce such a judgment as that. It is clear beyond peradventure that this petty fishery officer of the Government had differences with the Nobles for some time before. It is perfectly clear from the evidence taken before Mr. Wilmot, that there was anything but good feeling between these men and the inspector, and that the desire of the fishery inspector was to get these men out of the business. What does he do? He had a summons issued and they are called upon to appear before the magistrates; the fishery inspector himself, and two other magistrates, for by the statute he has the power of a magistrate. At all events, the trial took place; evidence was heard; and the result of that trial was that Noble Brothers were discharged and the prosecutor was ordered to pay $12 costs. What next do we hear? Remember, the Nobles had a right to suppose that having been once tried for this alleged offence and been acquitted, there could be no second trial. It is the generally received opinion that when a man is once acquitted on a charge, that ends the prosecution on that charge; and it is not pretended by the Government that any offence was committed between the time of the trial by the magistrates and the time the new information was laid before Mr. Burden. This man, however, goes quietly before Mr. Burden, the police magistrate, and obtains a summons calling upon the Nobles to appear again to answer to a charge upon which they had been tried and been acquitted. They did not appear, and the police magistrate imposed a fine against them in their absence. Now, what was the crime these men were convicted of? They did not imagine that the Government would think of enforcing such a penalty as that. The Government never attempted to enforce it, and nothing was done until the spring of 1894. Then, what was done? Why, these men did just what all the fishermen of this country have been in the habit of doing; they made application for their license in proper form; they paid their license fee to the fishery overseer; he gave them a receipt; after that the issue of the license is a mere matter of form.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No. The hon. gentleman is wrong in saying that the subsequent proceedings is a mere matter of form. First, it is against the law, and second, it is against the written instructions.

Mr. LISTER. But as a matter of practice, I know perfectly well that in my own district when the fishermen receive the certificate of the fishery inspector, they consider the issue of the license a mere matter of form, and that it makes no difference whether it is issued in one month or in three months. Having paid their money and received their receipt, they believe that they have the right under the law to go on and fish.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. They have not, though.

Mr. LISTER. What did these men do? They paid their money, $280. to the overseer, and they received a letter which came through the overseer, no doubt from the department, telling them that they were $1.05 short: that is to say, that they ought to have paid $281.05 instead of $280. That was two weeks after they had paid their money, and received their receipt from the license inspector. The inspector never intimated by a word or an act that they were to be refused their license. They paid the $1.05, received their receipt for that payment, and believed that they were authorized under the law to go on and pursue their avocation. Their fleet left. Hon. gentlemen must remember that in these northern lakes it is important to the fishermen to get their fleet out as soon as the season opens and they are entitled to commence fishing. With that object in view, two weeks after the $1.05 was paid to make up the deficiency these men went to the fishing grounds, with the full knowledge of the inspector and without one protest from him or any intimation that they would not be permitted to fish, or that they are violating the law in any way. No warning was given. They went out as they had gone out every year before; and what do we find? This precious inspector follows them up and seizes nearly all their property and fishing plant, amounting I believe to about $8,000 in value. What was the effect of that? These men were fishing themselves; they also employed men who fished and sold them the fish, and whose livelihood depended upon their carrying on their business. These men were all thrown out of employment. The Nobles' property was taken down to Collingwood or Owen Sound and tied up. Their whole operations were tied up for the year 1894. A harder case, a greater act of tyranny on the part of an officer, it is impossible to conceive. They applied to the Government. My hon. friend seems to think that every fisherman was trying to cheat the Government out of something. He constituted himself the custodian of the public rights, and looked upon every fisherman with suspicion. They came to the Government, but got no relief: the Government would not do nothing. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries had made up his mind that they were a bad lot, that they were pirates and poachers entitled to no consideration. After a long time and much consideration, however, he sent the commissioner, Mr. Wilmot, up to hear these men's complaint. The evidence is there. It is a comedy on investigations: a more ridiculous proceeding it would be difficult to imagine. After he has reported, still nothing is done. The elections are coming on. It was thought they were going to take place this spring, just before fishing time. The Minister of Justice gets out of the office of Minister of Marine and Fisheries and puts my hon. friend into it. Well, I am sure that while my hon. friend is the present Minister of Justice may be rigid in his ideas of duty, the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries will probably be the other way. What do we find? Why, Sir, as soon as the Minister of Justice leaves that office and takes another portfolio, they make up their mind to give these men another trial; and now they propose to appoint somebody, they do not know whether it is to be a county court judge or somebody else, to give the Nobles a re-hearing; and, in view of the fact that the case is to be re-heard, it is asked here that all the evidence and all the papers involved in that investigation shall be laid upon the Table for the information of everybody. This is a matter not affecting the Nobles alone. Yes. It affects every fisherman in this country, and we have a right to know whether the department, over which my hon. friend presided, acted honestly and fairly in the determination at which they arrived. But an election is coming on, hon. gentlemen are trying to make things sweet in a good many ways, and so they say to the Nobles: We will fix this all right for you, we will appoint another commission, and perhaps that may be more moderate in its report than the one which has taken place.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Did the hon. gentleman hear the statement made that this re-hearing was decided on long before I took charge of the department? It was agreed to before the change of portfolio.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The elections were not coming on then.

Mr. LISTER. Yes, they were, if you had had your way. At all events, this is clear, that whether it was before my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) left the Department of Marine or not—and he has not left it a very long time—it was decided that there should be a re-hearing of this case. That is not the only change my hon. friend has made. He has been constantly changing. He has been putting forward peculiar views as to the fisheries of this country. The policy of the department has been very uncertain and very trying indeed to the men who are engaged in the business. First, he says, pound-nets, are a bad thing, we will have no more; seine fishing is the right thing. Then the policy is changed. They say, seine fishing destroys the fish entirely; we must do away with it altogether; pound-nets are the right thing. Mr. Prince, in the department, advanced the peculiar theory that fish kept to their old run-ways, that Canadian fish never went into American waters, and that American fish never got into Canadian waters. That was his view, and my hon. friend, when it was pointed out that American fishermen fished at all seasons of the year said: It makes no difference, Canadian fish never go over there; all we have to do is to protect Canadian fish, and they will multiply and keep on our own side of the line. Acting under Mr. Prince's ideas, my hon. friend said: You shall not fish with seines, or pound-nets or anything in river St. Clair, Lake St. Clair, Detroit River, and a portion of Lake Erie. Now, the fishermen of that section, after being deprived for a full year of the means of making a livelihood—their net and seines soon destroyed; themselves driven out of the business altogether—are told now that this policy of the past is all wrong and they may fish whenever and wherever they like, with seines or pound-nets or any other kind of nets, and there will be no more close season. That is pretty hard for these people whose nets have been destroyed. They may now enjoy the same rights as the fishermen in the United States; they may fish the whole day and every month in the year. The Government have gone a-fishing. According to what has been published in the press, the Government imposed these regulations in the hope that they would get the Americans to fall into line and agree as to a close season and mode of fishing, but having failed to accomplish that, they will let our people fish just as much as the Americans.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I would not advise my hon. friend to fish in the close season.

Mr. LISTER. Perhaps my hon. friend has changed the thing again. Very likely there has been a change in the last few days, but the news was different two weeks ago, much to the rejoicing of the fishermen on the lakes. They are buying new nets and getting ready to go fishing again, but it is quite possible that in the last few days the Minister has again changed the regulations. What is the position? The department has deprived the Messrs. Noble Bros. for a whole year of their property. It has entailed an enormous loss upon these people, and the Government still harass them by holding these investigations, which ought to have been held long ago, and which, I really believe, amount to very little. These people were never convicted except on one occasion, and then when they were not present, and I say my hon. friend has no right to go back to the records. If they were guilty, try them; but you have never tried them except that one occasion and that should be the beginning of the evidence.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. They were guilty.

Mr. LISTER. But they were tried in their absence, without an opportunity of pleading; and, as a matter of fact they had been tried before three justices of the peace and acquitted. If these men had been violating the law for all these years, surely it was the duty of the Government not to have let that violation go on. The Government should have prosecuted them. Having let them go on, the Government have no right to go behind the conviction and inflict unduly severe penalties for what occurred years before.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has several times said that the fine was imposed in the absence of these gentlemen. I am quite sure the hon. gentleman must be referring to another case. The fine was not $250. One part of their case is that the fine was only $5, and that therefore the magistrate took a lenient view of it. The fine that led to this confiscation was the fine of $5 by the police magistrate.

Mr. LISTER. There were two summonses, first when the inspector brought the charge and two magistrates dismissed it with costs against the inspector. Then another summons was issued before Mr. Burden, and I understand that summons was made returnable on the day it was issued. The defendants did not appear at all, and in their absence Mr. Burden fined them the amount I have stated.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Well, I have in my hand the pamphlet which they have circulated, with the name of their counsel on the back of it. And in that they say:

During the following month two charges were made against them for fishing without a license. They were brought before police magistrate Burden on or about 24th June, 1894, when one of the charges was withdrawn, and upon the other they were fined $5.

Mr. LANDERKIN. And confiscation followed the fine of $5.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes; that is the bottom of their whole trouble.

Mr. LISTER. At all events, the amount of the fine is of very little consequence. The point I make is that the Government should not go back of the fact, that they should not use anything that took place anterior to the conviction; that the conviction ended all wrong-doing up to the time it took place; and that if these parties observed the law subsequent to being convicted, they should not be held answerable by the department for anything that occurred before the conviction. The hon. gentleman said in his speech that they were a bad lot, that they were poachers and all that sort of thing, and that he had formed a very bad opinion of them. The hon. gentleman himself is the court of last resort, and I think it is of questionable propriety for him to make a statement that he has prejudged the case. All a commissioner can do is to take the evidence and make recommendations and submit the whole to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and that Minister, no doubt, will refer it to the Minister of Justice. Now, Mr. Speaker, the question is whether these papers should be brought down. As I said before, all the fishermen of this country have an interest in this vote. We have a right to know in their interest, whether the law is fairly administered by the fishery officers and the department—a law that may be enforced tyrannically if the officers are not judicious and careful, a law which I have no hesitation in saying, within my own knowledge has often been harshly enforced. All that is asked for is that these papers shall be brought down, which can do the Crown no harm, which will give the House an opportunity of seeing what material the Crown has acted upon in ordering the investigation, and in bringing down which the Government will do no more than the humblest suitor would be required to do in an action against any other citizen.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat evidently rose for the purpose of saying one word for the "poor persecuted Nobles" and two for himself. In speaking of the elections coming, he evidently prepared his campaign material for the benefit of the fishermen of his constituency.

Mr. LISTER. There are not thirty of them, so that does not amount to very much.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). Sir, if the discussion ended here, no doubt the impression would be left upon the minds of hon. gentlemen on both sides that the Nobles were a very much abused and a very much injured people. The hon. gentlemen who have discussed the subject on the other side have not studied their brief as carefully as they might have done. The brief, is contained in a pamphlet issued by McCarthy, Osler, Hoskin and Creelman, one of whom appeared on behalf of the Nobles at the investigation which took place at Killarney before Mr. Wilmot, which has been so often referred to in this debate. No doubt every hon. member of this House, at least every hon. member from the province of Ontario received one of these pamphlets. If you will compare the speech of the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) with the pamphlet issued by these gentlemen, you will find it almost identically the same.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). If necessary, I will give you long quotations from the pamphlet that will appear in "Hansard" as spoken by the hon. member for South Grey. Do not let us lose sight of the fact—a fact which I am almost sure hon. gentlemen on the other side would have had the manliness to admit had it entered into their heads—that the desire—I will not say the desire but—the result of the discussion carried on by gentlemen opposite has been to leave on the minds of the members the impression that the Nobles were persecuted, that the department of Marine and Fisheries was defendant in a case, that a trial or action was pending. Now, Sir, I will venture to say without fear of contradiction, there is no action pending. As the Minister has shown, an investigation has been ordered. For what? Not to exonerate the Department of Marine and Fisheries from any blame in the matter, but to enable the Nobles—these "persecuted" people—to come forward and show why they should not be punished to the extent that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in his judgment considered they should be punished. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman who has just left the Chamber (Mr. Lister), made a few statements that are contained in this pamphlet that will be found to be not borne out by the facts, when the papers come before the House. With reference to the fishing in 1894, the statement was made boldly there that these men went on fishing with the full knowledge of the fishery officer. Sir, I deny that statement, and that statement cannot be maintained. I shall prove later on how the information came to the department, how the information came to the officer, and the result of the information that came. Now, Sir, with regard to the bad feeling alleged to exist between the overseer and the Nobles. I, for one, believe in giving every officer of a department of the Government, as he is not able to appear and defend himself, the benefit of every doubt until he is proven guilty. There is not one tittle of evidence, even in the garbled account contained in this pamphlet to show that there was any ill-feeling whatever between the Nobles and fishery overseer. Sir, the reverse is the case, as shown by a document which was seen by myself and which passed into the hands of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries from the hands of the Nobles, while they were in Ottawa, stating plainly that they had no fault whatever to find with the fishery officer, that they considered that he was only doing his duty. If I am not correct, when the papers come down, this document will not be there. I was shown it by a gentleman who had taken a great deal of interest in the matter on behalf of the Nobles, Mr. Long. Now, let us consider what led up to all this trouble. In 1893 the Nobles, as I say, were charged with aiding and abetting illegal fishing. The consequence was, as the hon. gentleman said, and as this pamphlet also states, in 1894 they sent an amount of money to the fishery overseer to cover the issuing of their license. That is the usual 'modus operandi' of getting licenses. He (Mr. Lister) endeavoured to make a point by stating the fact that they were called upon again to pay a small amount; that small amount was the bank discount on the amount. The fishery overseer does not keep that money. His duty, which is according to the practice, is that when he receives money for licenses it is immediately forwarded, with the application, to the department of Marine and Fisheries, who acknowledge the receipt of the money. Now, I will venture to say this, that the fishery officer, of his own accord, never called upon them to augment the amount by $1.50, but the fishery officer was called to account by the department for being short of that much money, that should go to the department in full; in other words, he required to have the bank discount as well as the full amount of the license. Well, so far so good. That account came to the department. The licenses were not issued. The hon. gentleman from West Lambton was not correct in his statement about the number of cases tried. The first case was in 1893; the next two cases were in 1894. Now, the Nobles, instead of waiting to get their licenses—and I may say that it is not the practice, as stated here, that if a fisherman pays his money and gets a receipt for that money, he feels that he is justified in commencing to fish.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether others in that same district did not pay in money, and did not go to the ground and fish, after payment, but without receiving a license, and did not do so without being disturbed by the department.

Mr. MACDONELL. Not to my knowledge, in any part of the district. The hon. gentleman asks me, Did any others pay their money, and get their receipts who did not get their licenses, and went fishing, but were not fined? None that I know of. I was going to say, as the Minister of Marine stated this evening, that there has undoubtedly been a great deal of difficulty experienced in enforcing the fishery laws and regulations. Any hon. gentleman in this House who will take the trouble to read the report that was very carefully made, and the evidence which was very carefully collected by the commissioners in Ontario, and printed and distributed in this House, will find that invariably every honest fisherman gives his evidence against anything in the shape of illegal fishing, in the shape of fishing during the close season, or, in fact, anything that gives one fisherman an undue or unjust advantage over another. Now, Sir, the fishermen on Georgian Bay were all warned a year before this happened that until the licenses were issued by the department, they had no right to fish. Let me say here that the responsibility for issuing these licenses does not rest on the fishery overseer, but upon the department, and until the department sends that license to the fishery overseer, whose duty it is to endorse the license, showing that he received it, unless the fisherman has got that license, the receipt is not worth a cent. Now, these licenses were not issued. But did they fish? Now, there is no question but that they did. In fact, before the seizure took place, on the 6th or 8th May, 1894, one of the Nobles came to Ottawa in company with Mr. Long to see the Minister of Marine and Fisheries with regard to his license. He came to me and asked if I would assist him with the Minister, and I offered to do anything I could to, smooth the matter over. Now, at this time there had been no seizure made. The gentleman was here a number of days, and during the time he was here, let me mention this fact to show that you are pleading for men that are not at all innocent, that when you are making a plea for these people you must recognize the fact that they went into it with their eyes open, knowing perfectly well what they were doing, knowing perfectly well what the result would be; but they did not know the extent to which the Minister was likely to punish them—at the very time we were begging these men off from the pains and penalties of their offences committed the year before, this gentleman told individual members of this House that their boats were out fishing, that they were going to fish anyway, and they did not care for the department. Well, what was the result? When we tried to assist them we were met with just what the Minister stated this afternoon, we were met with the statement that notwithstanding the fact that we came here to beg these men off for what they did, their boats were actually out fishing then in Georgian Bay.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And everybody else?

Mr. MACDONELL. I say that throughout the whole constituency, the rule is just as I have stated, and if any man fishes otherwise than according to the rule, he is liable to be punished any minute; and I venture to say that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries does not let his officers off very easy if they fail to enforce the law. Now, Sir, if these men knew that they were doing wrong, what is the howl from the other side for? Would you come to this House and ask to have the papers laid on the Table with reference to a criminal trial that was pending in the country? Would you ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to bring these papers down and lay them on the Table, including reports that he had received from his officers? Now, in dealing with this question, let me say one word with regard to the so-called new trial, as one member spoke of it, or an action pending. What is that? That is merely to enable the Nobles to come forward and show that they have not been guilty of offences in the past, that they are not guilty of any offences before 1893 and 1894. Now, to my mind, that is a leniency, it is a concession on the part of the department, to grant such an investigation.

That was the investigation that Mr. Wilnot was sent to hold; that is the investigation that took place before a judge. It was for the purpose, not to exonerate anyone from blame, but to enable the Nobles themselves to show that they were not guilty previous to this time, and that consequently the Minister of Marine and Fisheries would be more lenient with them than he intended to be in the first place for having committed a flagrant act for which they were prosecuted and convicted, and for which they have suffered pains and penalties. Now, I do not think any hon. gentleman would ask to have the papers brought down if they referred to any other subject. But the subject of the fisheries is a favourite one for hon. gentlemen to blow themselves on occasionally. It is also a subject upon which there is a good opportunity to find fault with the Government, to find fault more particularly with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Now, let me say that personally I would have been most happy to do anything I could for these men. All this fishing took place in my own constituency; although the Nobles lived at Collingwood, they were fishing there, and I would have been most happy to do anything I could for them, particularly when I heard that they pleaded guilty and threw themselves upon the mercy of the court.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONELL. Pardon me, you refer to an entirely different plea altogether. The case the hon. member for South Grey speaks about when they threw themselves on the mercy of the court, was an entirely different thing. He refers to a statement in this pamphlet that the police magistrate induced them to plead guilty with the promise that if they did so he was going to recommend the Minister to fine them slightly. They go on to say that the magistrate deceived them, and the consequence was they got the full benefit of the law. What I refer to is where they pleaded guilty before the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in Ottawa, and threw themselves on the mercy of the Minister, and made the statement in writing that the officer, who is so much abused in this pamphlet, every page containing, I am ashamed to say, if not a falsehood, a very serious misrepresentation of the facts, only did his duty, and they had no fault to find with him. All the fault found cropped up afterwards; it cropped up afterwards, when they were fined for fishing without a license in 1894, and their plant was seized and tied up, as has been stated in the House to-night. With regard to the whole case, no doubt an effort has been made in a certain portion of the press to create sympathy for the Nobles. There has not, in any one paper, appeared an article explaining the true facts of the case. The statements made by the "Collingwood Enterprise," for instance, a quotation from which the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) read, and which were copied into a paper in my constituency, I repudiate entirely, irrespective of the paper's policy. But could we for one moment upon the evidence offered by a newspaper condemn an officers conduct, because, let me remind the House that this fishery officer cannot rush into print to defend himself, he is an officer of the Government, and has to bear the abuse heaped on him, undeserving though he may be of that abuse. If there is any responsibility resting on the shoulders of any individual, it is on those of the individuals who have been punished for the offence of illegal fishing. The officer only carried out the orders of the department; he had nothing to do with inflicting pains and penalties on the Nobles, that responsibility rested with the Minister. As the Minister of Justice has said, he was determined to stamp out illegal fishing, and he took effective means of doing it, because, since that time I have not heard this year, nor during the latter half of last year of one case where it was necessary to prosecute any fisherman for illegal fishing. It is not always fishermen who fish illegally—every man feels he has as much right as another. It is a question of policy with respect to the fisheries. If we are going to destroy an industry, which brings into my constituency half a million dollars, by throwing open the fisheries at all times and seasons, and to every one who chooses to come there and fish, well and good. If that is going to be the law of the land, it is only a question of time when the Great Lakes of the west will be as much depleted as Lake Ontario is to-day. In the interest of our own people, the fisheries should be protected, and illegal fishing should be stopped, whether it is illegal for the parties not taking out a license, or whether it is from fishing in close season, the latter being by far the worse of the two, but if individuals are guilty of these offences, they should be punished. There is a law to punish smuggling, another to punish illicit distillation of spirits, and also a law to punish illegal fishing, and any one found guilty of the last-named offence should be punished; and it is not the part of members of this House, whether they sit on the right or the left of the Speaker's Chair, to show sympathy for individuals who have been punished for an illegal or irregular offence.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I dissent from the course taken of mixing up the general question of the protection of the fisheries with the particular action taken with regard to the Nobles. There is no member in this House who stood by the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries in his attempt to protect our fisheries in the Georgian Bay more faithfully than myself, and I say, with a full knowledge of the circumstances, that as regards the vest extent of coast with which I am concerned, so far from having been harsh or severe in dealing with the fishermen, the hon. gentleman endeavoured to carry out the law in a spirit which I think under the circumstances, was most creditable to his heart as well as his head, and the instances in which he dealt with the parties with severity, if he ever did deal with them severely, were cases where severity was certainly necessary. But the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Macdonell) has entirely destroyed the whole case which the Minister of Justice built up, because the Minister said he could not produce certain papers because this case is 'sub judice' and a prosecution is going on. The hon. gentleman for Algoma says there is no prosecution whatever; and, of course, if there is no prosecution, the reason given by the Minister for the nonproduction of the papers cannot exist. I am not going to enter into the vexed question of the rights or wrongs of the Nobles, I am only going to say this, that, having a very friendly feeling towards the late Minister of Marine with respect to the administration of his departmental affairs, having watched his course in the past, which I believe generally was one most useful to the country, and, knowing also the very great personal unpopularity which was cast upon him, in view of the statements of the hon. member for Algoma that there is no case to be tried, it would be better in the interest of the public, of the country and of the fishermen, that all correspondence in relation to this matter should be made public. If it was a case where there was criminal prosecution going it would be improper for this House to constitute itself a court, and to a certain extent try the case before it was submitted to a jury. But that does not appear to be the case. It appears that these men asked for an investigation in their own interest, and, therefore, it cannot be said that the Crown has any case to defend, and, therefore, the rule that would apply to the one case does not apply to the other, and so I would be very much pleased if the Minister of Justice would allow the papers to be laid before the House. Such a course could not prejudice the case of the Crown, because it has no case; it could not benefit the Nobles, because if their contentions were not valid, the production of the papers would do them no good. Such a course would, however, tend to clear up a vexed question and put an end to all this discussion and recrimination, and the public would then understand whether the action of the officers of the department was correct or not. I should, therefore, be exceedingly pleased if the Minister would agree to produce the papers; if not, I shall feel bound to vote against the amendment.

Mr. O'BRIEN.

Mr. SPROULE. I cannot understand the view of the case taken by the member who has just taken his seat (Mr. O'Brien), because it is quite clear that if the papers were produced and the Nobles were able to prove that they had not in any way violated the law, or, at all events, not to an extent which would justify the seizure of their property, the natural result would be—and I am creditably informed that such is their intention—to enter an action for damages against the Crown. That, in my opinion, is a very strong and justifiable reason why the Government should not give away their case at this stage by supplying the papers.

Mr. O'BRIEN. There is no question as to the guilt of the parties, and, therefore, how can there be a case against the Crown? The question is simply whether the Nobles were dealt with severely or not; there can be no technicality as to their guilt.

Mr. SPROULE. Their aim is to enter a case against the Crown for compensation.

Mr. LAURIER. Why cannot we have the evidence?

Mr. SPROULE. With equal justice the evidence in every case before the court might be asked for. If it is submitted in this case, why should it not be submitted in any case brought against the Crown. It seems to me the same rule should apply in both cases. I am surprised that the member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) should have made this motion, because I am told by friends of the Nobles that it is not done at their instance, and that they do not want it done. They believe that the course of justice is being pursued at the present time, and that ultimately they will get redress so far as the circumstances will justify it. I presume that the action of the member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) is taken for the purpose of making political capital out of this matter, and of drawing to his side the friends of the Nobles who feel that they have been injured. There were a great many men employed in these boats who would have gone out fishing had the licenses been given, and they feel aggrieved no doubt that they were thrown out of employment and deprived of their means of earning a livelihood. It was a great hardship to them, and although they are not responsible for the acts which prevented these persons receiving their licenses, still all the same they feel aggrieved. I do not think that the interest of the Nobles can be best served by the course of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Landerkin). In fact I am creditably informed by their friends that they are against it, and that they have counselled the hon. gentleman not to push the notice as he has done to-night. With one or two remarks of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) I cannot agree. He said, that when these men paid their money and got their receipt they believed that they had a perfect right to fish, as the licenses would come afterwards as a matter of form. Now, Mr. Charlie Noble himself, admitted in the presence of the Minister that he did know that the regulations had been changed. Up to a certain time the practice had been that when the money was paid, they commenced to fish when the season opened, although they might not get a license until June. The department changed the regulations and made it compulsory on each boat to carry its license when fishing, and the Nobles were notified of that, and they have admitted they knew it. That being the case, I cannot see that there is any reason for the statement that they went out ignorant of the regulations, and that there should be more leniency shown them on that account. Mr. Noble admitted himself in the presence of the Minister that he knew of the change in the regulations the fall before. He admitted also that after he paid his money, that he was told before his boats went out that he was not likely to get his license. When that information came to his knowledge he came down to Ottawa to intercede with the department in hopes he might induce them to give him his license, and on the very day he was here, and when we were pleading on his behalf in the office, a telegram came from the fishery overseer saying that his boats were out fishing in the Georgian Bay. He could not have done it in ignorance, because he admitted that he knew it. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) said that Mr. Noble should not be held answerable for anything that was done before the act upon which the conviction took place. Is that the course followed in a court of justice? When a judge is passing sentence on a prisoner with a very bad reputation, does he not take that into account, or does he make his sentence less severe on account of it. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) who is pleading before the courts every month in the year; would he not insist upon that consideration being taken into account, if he were prosecuted on behalf of the Crown, as he does from time to time, and would he not insist upon the bad record of the prisoner being placed before the judge before sentence was rendered.

Mr. LISTER. The sentence was given.

Mr. SPROULE. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister) say, as he said a few moments before that the court should not take cognizance of the previous record of a prisoner whether it was bad or good.

Mr. LISTER. Will the hon. gentleman excuse me for interrupting him. What I say is, that the sentence was imposed—that was for the judge who tried the case—and now you have no right to go back on it.

Mr. SPROULE. The words of the hon. gentleman were: They should not be held answerable for anything done before the act upon which the conviction was had, and that the courts should not take cognizance of it. As one who lives on the shores of the Georgian Bay, and as one who has had a good deal to do with the fishermen for the last fifteen years, I know that I have been spoken to dozens of times by fishermen with regard to the reputation of the Nobles, and I merely give this as a justification for the seeming harsh course which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries adopted in this case. When I have been endeavouring to get these men off time after time, it has been said to me: Why take the Nobles part, they are perfect outlaws; they fish with nets that are larger than the law allows; they fish out of season, they violate the law in every way. They say: You cannot prosecute them because they are so strong and have such powerful influence at their back, the department is afraid to prosecute them, but they pile on to us because we are individually alone, and we cannot bring that force to bear against the department which they can. They will punish us severely as they have done time after time but on the other hand these influential men are let off. The Nobles were said to be guilty of violating the law almost every month in the season. I am not saying that it is a fact, but it was alleged to be a fact that they were perpetually violating the law, and that punishment was not meted out to them the same as it was to small offenders. The fishermen on the Georgian Bay spoke of it as a common thing when they had any dealings with their members. When we interceded in their behalf we have it constantly thrown in our faces, that these men were so strong, that they intimidated the inspector, that if the inspector dared to enforce the law they would get him out of the way by affidavits or complaints against him, or in some other way they would dispose of him. I am told by fishermen in the Georgian Bay that they threatened to intimidate the inspector, and they also told me that the inspector dare not do so and so, because these men were too powerful and would insist on him being displaced if he did his duty. I have had a little to do, Sir, with pleading in the interests of the Nobles. I feel still that the measures taken in the case were perhaps harsh, not so far as they affected directly the Nobles themselves, because I believe that the offences demanded severe punishment, but on account of the fact that so many innocent men who had not violated the law, but who were fishing in their boats, were punished, by being deprived of the means of earning their living. I did everything I could in their behalf, and when the Minister of Marine refused to give back these boats I carried the case to the late Premier, Sir John Thompson. I asked him to go over the papers in the department, and if possible to find some reasonable excuse for at least making the punishment less severe. The late Hon. Sir John Thompson at my request went over these papers. He sat up from early one night until 1 o'clock in the morning examining them, and he promised to give me a reply, and after a close study of the case he said: I do not see how any man at the head of a department, having regard to the proper discharge of his duty, could have done otherwise than what the Minister of Marine has done. I cannot, nor would not, recommend any other course than what he has adopted, and he concluded by stating; I am ashamed to say that their record is a very bad one, and I cannot recommend the Minister of Marine to do otherwise than what he has done. That statement coming from the source it did, coming from a man who was disinterested, from a man who was always ready to meet us half way so far as he could and to show leniency and mercy where there was any justification for it; I say that the statement coming from that source made me feel like not pressing the case as strongly as I had done before.

Mr. LISTER. It was a very improper thing for you to do.

Mr. SPROULE. What was improper?

Mr. LISTER. To appeal from the Minister of Marine to the Prime Minister.

Mr. SPROULE. I suppose I have intelligence enough to do what I was sent here to do by my constituents without any advice from the hon. member for Lambton, notwithstanding that he may imagine himself a great authority. I say I did it in the interest of those parties who were not guilty of any violation of the law, but who were dependent for their living upon the parties who were charged with violation of the law; and I did it with the consent of the Minister of Marine, who said he was perfectly satisfied that I should appeal to any authority and if any authority connected with the Government thought he was dealing harshly or unfairly with them, he would be willing to reconsider the case; and I believe it was largely through the intercession of friends of the parties that the Minister decided to reconsider it. It was reconsidered. The Nobles asked to have the venue changed, and to have the case tried at Collingwood. I understood that that was granted, and no change more favourable to them could have been made, because Collingwood was the base of operations of the business men who handled their product, and the place where the men lived who were thrown out of employment. But even after that request was granted, I believe it was not satisfactory to them. They then asked that the case be tried at Killarney. I believe, because that was their home. I do not say that it would have been wrong had the Minister of Marine and Fisheries granted that request. I only state these facts to show that he was disposed to do what was fair in every step he took in this matter, and was not disposed to be arbitrary or overbearing or tyrannical, as the hon. member for Lambton alleges. I have read that pamphlet bearing the name of the firm of McCarthy, Osler & Creelman, and it appears to me to be a curious document, because, while that name of the firm is printed upon it, it is not stated that the pamphlet is endorsed by them or that it is their plea; but it appears to me to be intended to carry the force of the firm's name without the firm being responsible for what is contained in it. From my own personal knowledge, I can state that many of the things stated there as facts are absolutely incorrect. Therefore I do not set as much weight by that pamphlet as some hon. gentlemen who may not be so well acquainted with the facts as I am. Now, I do not want to urge a rigid application of the law to these men. I still feel in their behalf, and I am sorry that the matter has been brought before this House, in a way that may prejudice their case, in view of the fact that the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries is going on, with the best intentions in the world, to have a re-examination, and to give the accused every opportunity to bring forward all the information they can to justify or condone what they have done, or to prove that they are not as bad as they are represented to be. No doubt full consideration of the case will take place in the department, and justice will be done to them; but I believe that everything would have gone on more in the interest of justice and the interest of the Nobles themselves if this motion had not been made. I cannot see why the department should, in the interest of justice, give up the papers, nor do I believe that to do so would serve the purpose of the Nobles; but I believe that justice would have been done without this row being made in this House, and without this attempt to make political capital by the hon. gentleman who has moved this motion.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Mr. Speaker, before the question is put, I would like to say a few words. The Minister of Justice did not appear to understand what I said about the object I had in moving for these papers. I told him that I was not moved by the Nobles, for I did not know them; they were no part of my concern in the matter. I merely wanted to find out, when a simple fine of $5 was imposed on them—for it must have been a small offence that carried so small a fine—whether the Department of Marine and Fisheries had the power to confiscate the property, the vessels and the plant of those people to the extent of $8,000 or $10,000 and throw them out of employment, and other men with them. I thought on public grounds that it was my duty to bring the matter up. I was not thinking of the Nobles; I was thinking of the principle involved. The hon. Minister of Justice told us of the difficulties he had while in that department. He said that he had to meet influences all round opposed to him; he said he had the press against him. But the hon. gentleman told us a little while ago that he did not believe in the press; and he naturally thought that when the press was against him, the press was all wrong and was making false representations of the case, so he could not be governed by the press. Well, hon. gentlemen opposite get up and make charges in the House against the Nobles. They say the Nobles are pirates; the Minister of Justice said that. They said they were poachers; the Minister of Justice said that.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I did not say that they were pirates; I said they were poachers.

Mr. LANDERKIN. In the press it was said that he spoke of them as pirates; it was a Conservative paper in Toronto, the "News," that said that. It appears that they can make these statements against the Nobles, and when we ask for the papers on which they base these allegations they decline to give them to us. If they want to abuse and blacken the Nobles, let us know on what grounds they do it. If spies and informers are brought up there, and lay before the department reports against the Nobles, they have a right to know it; they want to know those by whom they are slandered. Let them know the charges; and then they can face them. I do not think the hon. gentlemen who have made charges against the Nobles in this House have acted as they ought to act. They should bring down the papers and let us see on what they base those statements. I know nothing against those men. It appears from what the hon. member for Algoma says that he has seen some of these papers; he made the statement that he had seen them.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). I stated distinctly that I saw them with the Nobles themselves.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I understood that the hon. gentleman stated that he had seen a paper containing some allegation against them, and that it was in the department.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). Pardon me. I did not say I saw a paper containing an allegation against them. I stated that I saw a paper in which they stated that the fishery officer was not to blame, and that they had really had no cause of complaint against him. I stated that in answer to the charge made against the fishery overseer of being overbearing and tyrannical.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The Minister of Justice says that he is satisfied that they are guilty, from reports that he has received. It is not from evidence taken from the department, but from reports carried into the department, perhaps by rivals in business.

The hon. Minister of Justice knows that in business you oftentimes meet men who do not act fairly. There is another company which, I understand, was carrying reports to the detriment of this company.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What company?

Mr. LANDERKIN. I think it is the Black Line.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I never heard of it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I had the name in the reports. It may be the blackmail company for all I know, but it is a company with something black about it apparently, and it may be sending in these stories to the department. I do not know anything about that personally, but I have seen it stated in the papers which were given to me. If the Noble Bros. are poachers, if they are guilty, if they are criminals, as the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Macdonell) and the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) say they are, why did the Government renew their licenses? Is there any evidence in the department to show that they are criminals, poachers and pirates? Are they the kind of men to whom the department grants licenses? When the department grants a license to them, that must be an evidence that the department does not believe in these charges. It must be an evidence that the Minister of Marine does not believe the charges.

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is no evidence at all.

Mr. LANDERKIN. There is no evidence?

Mr. COSTIGAN. That is no evidence.

Mr. LANDERKIN. If there is no evidence, what ground can there be for refusing to give us all the papers.

Mr. COSTIGAN. There is no use in answering the hon. gentleman when he misconstrues.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The hon. Minister of Justice and the hon. members for East Grey and Algoma can stand up and make charges against these men.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not make a single charge against them to-night. I said it was alleged—that is the hardest word I used—and therefore it is not to be wondered at that the Minister of Marine assumed there was something wrong.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You said you knew the men.

Mr. SPROULE. But not that they violated the law.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). What I said, and I said it so distinctly that all could hear, was that they were guilty of illegal fishing and punished accordingly.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that when he found out that they were criminal he rushed to their rescue, he took them to his bosom, and they found in him a friend. It is singular, if those men were so bad, that so much influence should be brought to bear with the Minister of Justice to have the case dropped, and let them go on with their business. They cannot be so bad as they are painted by hon. gentlemen opposite. They seem to have friends and to have done a square business with the people, or they would not have respectable men backing them. I have brought this matter up because I do not think the department should have such large powers. I do not think the department should have the power to lock up any man's business as they did the business of this firm. The action of the department did not apply only to the Noble Bros., who were large dealers, but to some others who were small dealers—those who had skiffs; I think nine of them—and they lost the skiffs that belonged, not to the Noble Bros., but to themselves. The evidence shows that every one fishing at that place on that day was in the same position as the Nobles. I read an affidavit to-day, and there are five other affidavits of the same nature—and according to it all those who were fishing at the same place—some thirty tugs and skiffs—were in the same position. This shows there was an invidious distinction, and a desire to injure the Noble Bros., and let the others go. I brought up this case, as I do every case in which I think an injustice has been committed against anybody. It is my duty to do so, whether hon. gentlemen opposite like it or not. I have thought it my duty to move in this matter with the view, if possible, of lessening the penalty that may be attached to the offence, which, after all, was not an offence against the spirit of the law, even if it were against the letter. I therefore have moved that all the papers be brought down.

Sir JAMES GRANT. I cannot allow the present opportunity to pass without offering a few observations on this very important subject. I have listened to the statement of the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Macdonell), and I must say that a more succinct, comprehensive statement could not possibly be made. I have no desire to re-discuss the question, inasmuch as it is so clear now that we should lose no time in coming to a positive decision. During the past two years I have taken a considerable degree of interest in the whole question of the fisheries of Canada, inasmuch as I believe there is no more important department under the control of the Government. We know perfectly well that our fisheries are very extensive and important, and growing in importance, and that the great aim of the

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma).

Department of Marine is to guard and develop the best interests of the country by exercising strict supervision over individuals who are violating the laws of the country. With reference to this question of the Noble Bros., I know perfectly well that these gentlemen have carried on a very extensive trade in the upper lakes, having had, in fact, free access to those lakes for many years, without any particular care being taken as to the means by which they were acquiring a large fortune in the fisheries of western Canada, in which they are so largely and deeply interested. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that at no time in the history of our country have we had a gentleman in Canada with more comprehensive knowledge, both practical and scientific, as regards the fisheries, than Prof. Prince, who was brought in here, after the most careful inquiry in Great Britain, as to who was the individual most desirable to bring into Canada to look after our fisheries. Lord Kelvin, the present president of the Royal Society of Great Britain, Professor Huxley, and other gentlemen who know the great importance of this department of Marine and Fisheries of Canada strongly advised the appointment of Professor Prince. Since that gentleman came to Canada, in every subject he has investigated for the department he has been the means of advancing most materially the best interests of this country. I have no desire to detain the House by going into details, but we know that in the lobster fishery, in the oyster fishery, in the question of the use of seines, in the St. Clair fisheries, in every single, solitary instance his labours have been of great material benefit to the people of Canada. If we turn to the fisheries of Scotland, we find that under the laws made by the British Parliament, and carried out by their officers, the salmon streams are a source of large revenues. That may well be a lesson to us; and we must all know the importance of guarding our fisheries. If people are to be allowed to fish when the fish are spawning, the injury will be a great and lasting one to the whole country. The law must be enforced, those who break the law must be fined in order to protect the fisheries of the Dominion. I am very glad, indeed, that this discussion has taken place. There has been a full expression of opinion. This is not a matter of politics, but of right and justice. I, for one, do not think that any members of this House have a right to make political capital out of our fisheries. We want right; we want law; we want justice. We know the energy that is displayed by the gentlemen who preside over the interests of this country in guarding the great revenue accruing to us through those fisheries; we feel confident that they exercise a just discrimination in the administration of the law, and they have a right to expect our support in carrying out the laws in their entirety.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have listened to this discussion with considerable interest, and have come to the conclusion that our fisheries regulations have been carried out with a great deal of laxity. From what has fallen from the lips of the hon. member for Ottawa (Sir James Grant) it is quite clear that for years and years the fishery regulations have been carried out as he says he knows, so far as the Georgian Bay is concerned, with a great deal of indifference. I have been asking myself who was the Minister of Marine and Fisheries prior to the gentleman who now occupies that position? It seems the Minister of Justice filled this office for a short time. It appears that he undertook to enforce the law, rightly or wrongly. If he undertook it with the desire to punish those who were guilty, he deserves credit. But the hon. gentleman who was his predecessor must have winked at the illegal fishing, he must have allowed the law to be violated, and these abuses to accumulate for years. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if this is a repetition of the Fredericton bridge experience? I wonder if it was under the management of the same individual that all these wrongs were allowed to go on from year to year, with nothing done to enforce the fisheries regulations, until the present Minister of Justice happened to be appointed Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has virtually confessed that this trouble has been in existence for many years. He says that those who were doing a smaller fishing business pointed to the fact that the Nobles were permitted to fish in violation of the law, that they were fishing as they pleased, and had never been interfered with and never punished. For what reason? Presumably because they had influence at court. It appears that they were related to men who happened to have a good deal of influence, and I suppose that influence was exercised. Well, Sir, this is another evidence of incapacity of hon. gentlemen opposite in the management of the affairs of the country. Every department shows want of efficiency. This is only another case added to the list. Here in the Department of Fisheries we find abuses that have been in existence from month to month, and from year to year, affording the clearest evidence of the inefficient manner in which affairs have been managed. This case undoubtedly evidences want of proper action on the part of the Government. The Minister of Justice says that a commission was appointed to take evidence. When the commissioner went into the case, he proceeded wrongly. His report and the evidence submitted were virtually of no use. The hon. member for East Grey evidently lost confidence in the department. He himself, by the statements he made, vitrually corroborated my conclusion. He says that he himself was in such doubt with regard to the capability of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to handle this affair that he took it out of his hands and went to the Minister of Justice.

Mr. SPROULE. I wish to correct the hon. gentleman. I made no such statement. I said that the Nobles, believing that the Minister was prejudiced against them wished to have their case presented to the Premier, and I did it at their request and with the consent of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am quite prepared to accept the statement the hon. gentleman has made. The statement the hon. gentleman has made is this: The matter had been before the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who had given it his best time and spent his best ability upon the consideration of it, and yet had been unable to reach a decision satisfactory to the hon. member himself and to the Nobles; and the Minister was so willing to get rid of the trouble which he did not feel capable personally of handling that he said to the hon. member: Take it to the First Minister and see if you cannot get some solution from him. This goes to prove the statement that I have made that incapacity rules in every department; that there is not a man capable of performing the duties of his position.

Amendment (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) agreed to on division; and motion as amended, agreed to.

PRAYERS.

CRIMINAL CODE, 1892.

Mr. LAVERGNE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 106) to amend the Criminal Code, 1892. He said: The object of this Bill is first to amend section 3, to change the numbering and lettering of paragraphs in the French version, to make them correspond with the English version. Curiously enough, there are about 50 paragraphs in the clause, and no two as regards numbers and letters in the French version corresponding paragraph B is a definition of the words 'Attorney General' in the English version; in the French version it is a definition of an indictment. Paragraph C in the English version is the definition of 'banker'; in the French version it is a definition of a 'testamentary instrument.' Paragraph D is a definition of 'cattle' in the English version; in the French version it is a definition of an 'officer of the peace.' In fact not two out of these 50 paragraphs in the French version correspond with the English version. This clause is one which is very often cited, and if the judge and the parties in the case have not in their hands the same version it is very misleading. The object of the amendment is simply to carry into effect a comparison of the two versions and make them identical. The second clause which is proposed to be amended, and it is a most important one, is section 785. This section gives jurisdiction to certain magistrates in the province of Ontario—for instance, to the police magistrates and stipendiary magistrates in that province to hear cases which come under the jurisdiction of the court of the general sessions of the peace. The amendment I propose is to give the same jurisdiction in the province of Quebec to the district magistrates and to the police magistrates. The court of the general sessions of the peace in the province of Quebec only sits in Montreal or Quebec, and when we require to have such court sit in any other district a proclamation is required, and the court of general sessions of the peace in those districts is to be presided over by a judge of Superior Court, or by two justices of the peace. These justices of the peace are never qualified and never sit. These proclamations, in fact, have never been issued. The object of the amendment proposed is that that clause 785 should apply to Quebec as well as to Ontario. This gives the option to the accused or defendant to take his trial before the sitting magistrate in summary trial, or for an offence over which the court of general sessions of the peace has jurisdiction. This proposed amendment is very important in this way, that it will remove a great many inconveniences and save much expense. We are obliged in some of our districts, not having this proclamation issued or any qualified justice of the peace, to take a jury trial in these cases, which is very expensive, and moreover sometimes when the calendar is not very heavy we have no criminal term for one year or eighteen months, and the accused have to be kept in jail or bailed, sometimes for a period of over twelve months, and sometimes after being admitted to their personal bail they are released without trial; whereas if they were able to obtain prompt trial, with their consent, before a district magistrate or a police magistrate most of the business could be done in this way to the great convenience of all the people. There are also two other amendments proposed in this Bill, which are of a somewhat more technical character. I propose to amend section 195 so as to make it correspond with section 783 (f). The same applies to section 263 (b) so as to make it correspond with section 783 (e). Section 783 gives certain jurisdiction over certain offences. We propose to make this section correspond with section 263. The Minister of Justice, I think, will agree with me that this will prove very useful legislation. Section 785, if amended so as to place the province of Quebec on the same footing as Ontario, would effect a large saving, and this interpretation clause to which I have referred is a necessity. This amendment should be carried out at once.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. FOSTER moved :

That Government Orders have precedence on Thursdays for the remainder of the session, after questions to be put by members; and that the Order of Thursday be made the Order for Wednesdays; the hour for Private Bills from half-past seven to be continued.

Mr. CHARLTON. I would suggest to the leader of the House that on this occasion we adopt the same course that has been pursued heretofore, namely, make the order of business for Thursday apply to Wednesday. If this is not done, Public Bills and Orders will have a very small share of the time of the House; but if this is carried out, then Public Bills and Orders and Notices of motions will have their fair proportion of the time. This course was followed last session and the previous session.

Mr. LAURIER. Before this question is put, and before the House is called upon to decide to give an additional day to the Government, we are entitled to receive from the Government some information which has not yet been given to the House. The motion proposed is the usual one when we have reached a certain stage of the session, and it is submitted with a view to hasten the day of prorogation. But on this occasion, before the House is asked as to whether or not the time has come to give the Government this additional day; the time has come also when the Government should tell us whether or not they are to introduce new legislation, or whether we have now before this House all the legislation which they intend to bring forward. It is time for the Government to tell the House whether or not we are going to have the grant to the Hudson Bay Railway. An Order in Council was passed about three months ago, and after three months' deliberation over it, and after the House has been for six weeks in session, we are entitled to know whether the Government is to ask the House to concur in that undertaking. The hon. gentleman must admit himself that the demand which I now present is not at all unfair or unreasonable. Nay, more, I think the House, at this time, has a right to know what are the intentions of the Government, before we can be asked to depart from the usual method of proceeding.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman gives a novel reason as to why he would be inclined, on certain conditions, to refuse to give the Government an extra day; the reason being, so far as you can infer it, that if we do not have very much more business than is now on the Order paper, he would be willing to grant an extra day to the Government; but if we did have more business, he would feel disposed to deny the extra day to the Government. Thus, his conclusion would be that the less business we have the more time he would give us, and the more business we have, the less time we should get. I am able to satisfy my hon. friend's curiosity in part. Looking over the Order paper, I think I may say that nearly all the important ordinary legislation that the Government has proposed is now on the Order paper, and before the cognizance of the House. There may be one, or two, or three, minor amendments to Acts which are yet to be brought down. Under the notices that are on the paper for the Bills which are before the House for second reading, I think I may say that all the important ordinary legislation that the Government proposes is there.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And about the extraordinary legislation?

Mr. FOSTER. With reference to some matters which have been discussed, particularly in the House, I am not prepared to give definite information with regard to all of them. I may say, however, with regard to one, that the Government does not propose to place any proposition before the House involving legislation with reference to the Chignecto Ship Railway. With reference to the Hudson Bay Railway, I am not in a position to definitely say what particular course the Government will recommend. Outside of that, I think my hon. friend's curiosity is entirely satisfied, and having gone so far, I am sure he will not be unreasonable in dissenting to the Government taking an extra day. We have not pushed this matter unduly. I find that last year the House met on the 15th of March, and the Government took Thursdays on the 3rd of May, forty-nine days after the opening. This year it so happens that if Thursday is granted, it will be exactly forty-nine days since the commencement of the session. In 1893 the House met on the 26th of January, and the Thursday was taken on the 2nd March, a period of thirty-five days intervening. Under all these considerations, I am sure that we have not unduly pressed for the extra day, and the state of business is such as to warrant the Government in asking for it. I have no hesitation in adopting the suggestion made by my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton), as it will give the Public Bills and Orders a better chance.

Mr. LAURIER.

Mr. SPROULE. If the House grants this motion, there ought to be something done to dispose of one or two Bills on the Order paper. There are now twenty-eight Bills on the Orders, many of them very important, and which ought to be passed, but which clearly will not pass if the Government take another day in the week, unless something is done. The Sunday Observance Bill and the Seduction Bill of the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) are the first Orders on the paper. I have been here for many years and the general custom has been that at the commencement of the session these two Bills are put first on the Order paper, and they stand there, week after week, consuming the whole time of the House. Every day we reach Public Bills and Orders the whole time is taken up by one or other of these Bills until the session is so far advanced that the Government take an extra day, and the rest of the public Bills must stand. I think those Bills ought to be disposed of in some way, so as to allow us to deal with other public Bills which are of quite as much importance to the country.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman's strictures on those two Bills are most unfair and unwarranted by the facts. The Bill which stands first upon the Order paper this year stood there first last year, but the consideration of that Bill was interfered with in consequence of the rule of the House which permits a notice of motion to take its place at the head of the Order paper, under certain circumstances. Last year a notice of motion usurped the place of this Bill for six or seven sittings, and the Sabbath Observance Bill scarcely received the consideration of this House at all. This year the Bill has not taken up more time than it is fairly entitled to, and it is now practically out of the way, because it is placed under the care of the Minister of Justice, who is to give the first and second sections, which passed the committee, his consideration, and propose them as amendments to the Criminal Code.

Mr. SPROULE. It is on the Order paper yet.

Mr. CHARLTON. Under the rule I have referred to, the notice of motion of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) takes the first place on the Order paper, and that motion has already consumed two or three sittings. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) wishes to make any regulations which will facilitate the consideration of Public Bills and Orders, let him move that the notices of motion should be put in their proper place on the Order paper. The second Bill of mine on the Order paper is a most important Bill, but it has not yet received any consideration at all. I have suggested to-day that the order of business for Thursdays should be applied to Wednesdays, so as to give Public Bills and Orders more time.

Mr. SPROULE. I think that was quite unnecessary, under the circumstances.

Mr. LAURIER. Coming back to the question which I put to the Minister a moment ago, I must say that for my part I am greatly disappointed at the answer he has given. He has told us that he does not propose any legislation in connection with the Chignecto Railway this year, but I submit that it is time we should know whether or not he is going to proceed with the Hudson Bay grant. Until he gives us that answer, I am not disposed to agree to any relinquishment of the rules of the House.

Motion agreed to.

QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY—STATE
FESTIVITIES.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to make a suggestion. Their Excellencies proposed to dispense very generous hospitalities on the Queen's birthday, largely amongst the members of the House on both sides, and, owing to the holidays that came at that time, they were postponed. As they are to take place to-morrow evening, I would like to make a suggestion, and put it in the form of a motion :

That when Mr. Speaker leaves the Chair at six o'clock to-morrow, Wednesday, the House shall stand adjourned until the following day at three o'clock.

If this motion carries, it must be by general consent, as notice has not been given of it.

Motion agreed to.

PROTECTION OF TOBACCO.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to remind the Controller of Inland Revenue that last session I drew his attention to the fact that foreign leaf tobacco was entering Canada without paying duty. The hon. Controller stated that during the vacation he would look into the matter and be ready to give an answer this session. I want to know what steps the Government have taken, or what decision they have arrived at ?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The only answer I can give to the hon. gentleman is that the Government are still considering that question. I may say further, that while the Government are pretty strongly committed to the doctrine of protection, the Canadian producer of tobacco is protected to the extent of 400 per cent as against imported leaf; and, so far as I am concerned, though very strongly in favour of the doctrine of protection, I am not disposed to give any further protection to that article.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman should confine himself to answering the question.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. FORBES. I would like to ask the hon. Secretary of State when the return ordered by this House in 1893, in 1894, and again in 1895, in regard to the industries of the counties of Queen's and Shelburne, N.S., will be brought down?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Two men in the Department of Agriculture are working all the time preparing these returns, and there will not be a moment's delay in bringing them down. I shall have some returns this week, and some more next week.

Mr. McMILLAN. I would like to inquire when the report of the Dairy Commissioner will be brought down. I thought it was going to be included in the report of the Experimental Farm, but I see that the two reports are to be published separately again.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Not very long.

SUPPLY—PERSONAL EXPLANATION—FREE LUMBER AND SAW-LOGS.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. CHARLTON. Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to a matter that once engaged the attention of this House, and has provoked considerable discussion in the country. It is a matter pertaining largely to myself; and, but for the attention that has been given to it by Ministers, by Conservative members of the House, and by the Conservative press, I should not have felt warranted in obtruding it upon the attention of the House at this time. But, under the circumstances, I feel bound to take the course I am taking at this moment. About one year ago, on the 13th June, last year, a very bitter attack was made upon me, without notice, by a member of this House. I was called upon, on the spur of the moment, to refute, to the best of my ability, that attack. Owing to certain circumstances, my course in doing so was, to some extent, embarrassed and constrained. The Wilson Bill, which placed Canadian lumber upon the free list, was, at that time, pending before the United States Congress, and, owing to that fact I, perhaps, withheld some statements that I might otherwise have deemed it proper to make on that occasion. After stating the circumstances, I take this opportunity—the first one that has occurred since the opening of this session—to refute some of the charges that were made upon that occasion, and previous to that occasion, and that have been subsequently made against me. The Conservative press has paid me a good deal of attention. Conservative members have also paid me a good deal of attention. Allusions have been made to the circumstances by members of this Government since the opening of the session, and not many months ago a member of the Government—not at that time a member of the Cabinet, but one who has subsequently become one—within my own riding, at the town of Tilsonburg—I refer to the Secretary of State—made an attack upon me. I was not present, but I am informed that he assured my constituents that I was a traitor, that I was unworthy the confidence of any constituency in Canada, and that there was not another constituency except the one I represented which would so far disgrace itself as to choose me for its representative. Under these circumstances, I ask the indulgence of the House while I now refute some of the charges made against me in connection with the long struggle to secure concessions from the United States Government with regard to their lumber duty; and I propose to make some statements which, I think, will exonerate me from the charges that have been made against me.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I have always been in favour of reciprocal trade with the United States, that I have always considered that question the most important fiscal question which could engage the attention of the Canadian people. I have always felt that if we could not get a broad, comprehensive measure of reciprocity, we should be thankful if we could obtain a portion of it. I have acted upon the assumption that any citizen of Canada who was able to use influence, directly or indirectly, in the direction of securing trade concessions which would be beneficial to this country, and who did so, was acting in a patriotic manner that ought to commend itself to all his fellow-citizens. Now, whatever action I may have taken, the purpose that I have had in view has always, I imagine, been apparent, and the result of that action has in no case been detrimental to the interests of this country; and if, in connection with the negotiations for free lumber, I have been able to make use of the argument that a concession on the part of the Canadian Government of free logs and the abolition of export duty was a matter of sufficient importance to induce the American Government to place upon the free list the long list of articles now put upon that list under their wood schedule, I hold that the arguments used for that purpose, resulting in the practical exchange of free logs or free lumber, were something very greatly in the interests of this country.

Mr. Wood (Brockville).

The conditions of the McKinley Bill, some five years ago, were accepted by this Government; but although the conditions of that Bill was accepted by this Government, obloquy was thrown upon me because it was asserted that I had some connection with the negotiation of those conditions. The conditions of the Wilson Bill were accepted by this Government; and yet, although the Government gladly accepted these conditions, an attack was made upon me less than a year ago in this House, and I have been attacked by Conservative newspapers and orators since for having been the instrument of obtaining the very thing which the Government were glad to accept. I feel a deep sense of injury and wrong in connection with the course which the Conservative press and Conservative politicians have taken towards me.

The existence of an export duty on logs excited a very strong feeling of hostility in the United States. That feeling was attributable to several causes. The Americans are not in favour of export duties primarily; their constitution prohibits such duties. Every American believes that an export duty is a bad kind of fiscal policy 'per se.' The export duty on logs, it was discovered by Americans, some years ago, was most unfair in its application, for the reason that while they were debarred by their constitution from imposing an export duty on logs, Canada was imposing an export duty, and during the time that was being done, while we were exporting at the rate of 3,000,000 feet to the United States, we were importing at the rate of 8,000,000—or, our exports were only three-eighths of our imports. When the Americans discovered that the balance of advantage from the importation of logs and their manufacture into lumber was so largely in favour of Canada, that was an additional reason for dissatisfaction on their part with the existence of the export duty; and in consequence of that dissatisfaction, those who sought to obtain free lumber found standing, as a lion in their path, this feeling of resentment on the part of those specially interested in that trade, because of the imposition of a duty which every American conversant with the matter felt to be in the highest degree unfriendly and unfair. When the Mills Bill was under consideration in 1888, the condition made in the Bill was that lumber should not be placed upon the free list in the case of any country that imposed an export duty. I have always believed and acted upon the conviction that an export duty, that discriminating duties, that such a motion as the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Macdonell) has now on the Notice paper to compel the Americans to peel the bark from their logs in order to increase the cost of getting them out—I have always been convinced that all such restrictions were calculated to promote nobody's interest particularly, except a few parties directly interested, and were calculated to put the two countries further asunder, and render more difficult the securing of any trade concessions from the United States. For that reason I have always been opposed to an export duty. I first began to operate on this question by endeavouring to convince my fellow lumbermen that an export duty was not in their interest. Time was when an export duty was asked by the great majority of lumbermen. I believe that some three or four years ago a delegation of Ottawa lumbermen waited upon the Minister of Finance and asked for an increase of the export duty. Gradually these men came to see that the imposition of this duty stood as a bar against their obtaining from the United States that which we all desired, namely, the free admission of Canadian lumber, and, consequently, the lumber trade, of Ontario, at least, was opposed almost to a man to the continuance of this export duty. This better state of feeling having been obtained among the lumbermen, the road was open for negotiations that might be prosecuted with the certainty that our own people were prepared to recommend the removal of this obnoxious impost.

The McKinley Bill was under consideration in the year 1890. In the House of Representatives it was proposed that any country which imposed an export duty upon logs should have the amount of that export duty added to the import duty upon the lumber received from that country. The condition of affairs as relating to our obtaining concessions was in a most unsatisfactory shape. I was in Washington during the discussion of that measure. I am perfectly free to confess, that I went to Washington, to see if anything could be done on behalf of the lumber interests of Canada. I sounded many members of the Finance and Ways and Means Committees of the Senate and the House as to their views on this question, and urged the advisability and propriety of freer trade relations and more friendly trade conditions between the two countries; and I assured these men that, in my belief, the export duty, which was universally cited by those in favour of high duties as reason for refusing the demand for free lumber, could be made to stand aside. Well, an arrangement was made; and, so far as I know, I was the only Canadian connected with that arrangement. I was directed to Senator Philetus Sawyer, of Wisconsin, who, I was told, was the authority in the Senate upon all lumbering matters. The result was a suggestion that if the Canadian Government would promise to remove the export duty, the American Government would reduce the lumber duties from $2 to $1 per thousand; and I was authorized to say to the Government here in Canada that if that promise were made a reduction in the lumber duties would take place when the McKinley Bill left the Finance Committee of the United States Senate. I came to Ottawa and saw Sir John Macdonald and placed this proposition before him. He looked upon me, evidently, with some little distrust—

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. Some hon. member says "hear, hear"—and failed to realize that this proposition covered something of very great advantage to Canada. I then looked around for some Conservative member conversant with the lumber trade and of high respectability and great influence, and I naturally, Mr. Speaker, selected yourself. After a conference we arranged an interview with Sir John Macdonald. The subject was presented to the right hon. gentleman by both yourself and myself, and Sir John Macdonald, after hearing the case stated, fell in at once with the idea, said that it was a good one and would redound to the advantage of Canada. He said also that Canada would agree to it, and he suggested that you, Mr. Speaker, should put a notice of a question upon the paper, and it would be answered. And here is the question on page 616 of the Votes and Proceedings of 1890, under date of 7th May :

Mr. White (Renfrew)—Inquiry of Ministry—Whether, in the event of the United States Congress reducing the import duty on sawn lumber to $1 per thousand feet, the Government will remove the export duty on pine and spruce logs? That question was asked in due course, not by yourself, Mr. Speaker, but, in your absence, by the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Bryson), and here is the report in "Hansard" of 1890, vol. 2, page 4662 :

DUTY ON SAWN LUMBER.

Mr. BRYSON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, with the permission of the House, I would like to ask a question which has been put on the Notice paper by the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. White). The question is this : Whether, in the event of the United States Congress reducing the import duty on sawn lumber to $1 per thousand feet, the Government will remove the export duty on pine and spruce logs? It is very important that this question should be answered at the present moment.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will answer that question. In the event of the United States Congress reducing the import duties on sawn lumber, the Government will remove the export duty on pine and spruce logs. I will take an opportunity of conveying that decision to the proper quarters. Now, Sir, there was a culmination of negotiations originated at Washington. It was a proposition, in point of fact, of the American Government, an informal proposition, which was laid before the Government by yourself, Mr. Speaker, and answered by the Prime Minister, that the United States Government would reduce the duty on sawn lumber to $1 per thousand feet, on condition that Canada should repeal the export duty on pine and spruce logs. When the McKinley Bill became law it was found that the duty was removed from pine lumber only, but the same condition was attached—that the export duty should be removed from pine and spruce logs so that we could not be required to take advantage of it, as the terms of the arrangement had not been fully complied with. I felt not a little incensed at this result; I felt that the American Government had not kept faith, and I withdrew from the whole affair and had nothing more to do with it. But Sir John A. Macdonald was interviewed by lumbermen of the Ottawa valley. I do not know whether you took any part in that, Mr. Speaker, or not, but he was interviewed by Mr. Booth I believe, and also by Mr. A. H. Campbell, of Toronto, a prominent lumberman and a prominent supporter of his own, and pressure was brought to bear upon him to accept the proposition even although the duties upon spruce lumber were retained, and to accept the condition made under the McKinley Bill and remove the export duty upon both pine and spruce logs for the consideration of $1 per thousand feet reduction upon pine lumber. Sir John Macdonald decided to do this and the export duty was repealed. This incensed the representatives of the spruce interests, who felt that the pine interests had sacrificed them for their own advantage. But the trouble was that the American Government had not carried out the agreement, while the Canadian Government had seen fit to accept the half loaf and remove the export duty. As to this McKinley concession, whatever it amounted to, I freely acknowledge I was connected with the matter. In all human probability, so far as the initiation of these negotiations was concerned, I alone was connected with the matter. I accept all that responsibility. But when the Government accepted the proposition they assumed the responsibility and I must be exonerated from blame, and they are estopped from calling me a traitor because I was found in Washington seeking to advance Canadian interests.

Then with regard to the Wilson Bill. We remained under the McKinley Bill from October, 1890, up to last year. The Wilson Bill was introduced late in 1893. That Bill received exhaustive discussion and consideration in the Ways and Means Committee. It finally emerged from that committee and was referred to the House of Representatives, and passed that House early in February, 1894. It then went to the Senate. It was under consideration in the Senate, when I happened to be in Washington. I arrived in that city on the 25th day of February, 1894, and I remained there until the 1st of March. I found after my arrival there that this measure, which, in its provisions, as it left the House, was in the highest degree favourable to Canada, was in danger, in consequence of some mistake, or some disagreement, or some bad feeling about the export duty proviso. Now, Sir, here are the articles from which it was proposed to remove the duty, and when I read the list hon. members may judge whether it was or was not an advantageous thing to Canada to seek to secure the passage of that Bill and seek to retain the list of these free lumber provisions. These provisions are contained in the Wilson Bill, paragraphs 673 to 683, and they are as follows:—

673. Firewood, handle-bolts, heading-bolts, stave bolts and shingle bolts, hop poles, fence posts, railroad ties, ship timber, and ship planking, not specially provided for in this Act.

674. Timber, hewn and sawed, and timber used for spars and for building wharfs.

675. Timber, squared or sided.

676. Sawed boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, rough or dressed, except boards, planks, deals, and other lumber of cedar, lignum vitae, lancewood, ebony, box, granadilla, mahogany, rosewood, satinwood, and all other cabinet woods.

677. Pine clapboards.

678. Spruce clapboards.

679. Hubs for wheels, posts, last blocks, wagon blocks, oar blocks, gun blocks, heading, and all like blocks or sticks, rough hewn or sawed only.

680. Laths.

681. Pickets and palings.

682. Shingles.

683. Staves of wood of all kinds, wood unmanufactured: Provided, that all of the articles mentioned in paragraphs six hundred and seventy-three to six hundred and eighty-three, inclusive, when imported from any country which lays an export duty or imposes discriminating stumpage dues on any of them, shall be subject to the duties existing prior to the passage of this Act.

Now, here was a list of Canadian dutiable exports, that amounted annually to over $13,000,000; and the proviso that it was intended to put in with regard to this matter, in the House, was the same old proviso that had been contained in the Mills Bill, that any nation that wished to avail itself of the privileges gained by this exemption from duty of this list of articles, should be debarred from imposing an export duty upon any of them. That was the provision which it was intended to incorporate in the Wilson Bill. By some clerical blunder, the Bill left the Committee of Ways and Means and went through the House with the provision, that if any country imposed an export duty on any article in that list, then the United States should restore that article to its original condition under the previous law, the result of this would have been that farcical condition of things which I have described, that in case of an export duty on logs being imported, all the United States Government would be able to do would be to restore the logs to the position they occupied before the passage of this Bill, which would debar the United States from reaping any of the advantages whatever which it was designed to reap with reference to the export duty proviso. This Bill came to the Senate; and, as I say, I reached Washington on 25th February. The Democratic caucus of the Senate commenced on the 26th February, and it continued until the first day of March. The Michigan lumber interest had supposed that it had secured its purpose in the provision of this Bill as it left the Committee of Ways and Means; but that interest had discovered that it was mistaken. The Bill was under discussion in the Senate caucus, and the Michigan influence, which was a potent influence in this respect, was in a state of dissatisfaction, and the suggestion was made to strike out the whole free lumber schedule altogether, and to leave the matter to be adjusted by subsequent negotiation. The Senate was in this position: While there was an overwhelming Democratic majority in the House, there was a very narrow Democratic majority in the Senate, I think a majority of four only; and the various interests, such as those opposed to free coal, those opposed to free sugar, those opposed to free iron ore, and those opposed to free lumber, if they combined in what the Americans term a log-rolling arrangement, could carry any arrangement they pleased. On Tuesday, the day after the Senate caucus met, Senator Morgan, of Alabama, who was a member of the Behring Sea Commission, and is a very influential member of the Senate, made a speech against free lumber, and it was evident that while Michigan was wavering, and just about to veer round and throw its influence against free lumber, the lumber states of the south were only seeking an excuse for throwing themselves against this feature of the Bill of their own party, and of their own Government. Now, the states opposed to free lumber were Maine, Minnesota, and Wisconsin; the other lumber states of the union were North Carolina, South Carolina, Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas and Arkansas. All these states were interested in lumber, all these states were large producers of lumber, all these states naturally were not well affected to the free-lumber provision of the Bill, and the same was true with regard to Oregon and Washington. Well, Sir, the position of the matter at Washington was one where the free-lumber provision of this Bill was in the most critical position, and the prospect was that it would be thrown out; and as free coal, free iron, and free sugar were thrown out, it seemed almost certain that this feature of the Bill, in addition, would be sacrificed by the combination of a portion of the Democratic members of the Senate opposed to these provisions. Now, Sir, the Michigan members, as I said, were wavering as to the position they would take in regard to this matter. One thing was certain, that they would require absolutely that that Bill should be amended in such a way as to protect them in the way that it was supposed it did protect them when it left the Committee of Ways and Means; and without the insertion of the last of the paragraphs that placed the various articles of lumber upon the free list, without the insertion in that paragraph of a proviso satisfactory to the Michigan men, the fate of the Bill was a foregone conclusion. If they pronounced against the Bill, if their demands were not satisfactory, if their wishes and their views were not met, their hostility would settle the fate of the Bill; and, in order to secure the passage of the free lumber provisions of the Bill, it was necessary to incorporate in that Bill then and there an export duty proviso, unequivocally positive, that could not be mistaken, that would assure the Michigan men that if these $13,000,000 worth of lumber products were placed upon the free list, their interests should be protected by making it contingent upon the definite provisions that logs should be exempt from an export duty. Now, what was to be done? There was the position of the matter, there was this caucus in progress, there was the certainty that negotiations were going on in that caucus of the Democratic party with a view to purge the free lumber provision. It was known then that sugar, and free iron ore, and free coal had gone; it was supposed that lumber was almost certain to share the fate of these other three articles. Something must be done then and there, or free lumber, and the privilege to import $13,000,000 of our products into the United States market free of duty, was gone. Now, what would the Minister of Finance have done under the circumstances? Would he have refused to make a suggestion that would secure the passage of these free-lumber provisions? Would he have refused to make a suggestion that would have averted the disaster that threatened this country in the prospect of this provision being lost? Well, if he would not have done so, he would not have acted very much in the interest of Canada, I imagine; and what I did do, Mr. Speaker, was to suggest to some members of Congress that this difficulty could be averted, that there was no necessity for standing that matter aside, that the United States Government could just leave the articles enumerated in these eleven paragraphs, from 673 to 683 inclusive, upon the free list, and they could insert a proviso providing for the placing of these articles upon the free list, under conditions that either would secure from Canada the free exportation of logs, or would leave with the Canadian Government the choice of putting on an export duty and losing the free-lumber provision. That was done, and I do not deny it was done. I do not deny that I had something to do with the arrangement. I do not deny that I talked this matter over with members of the Committee of Ways and Means, I do not deny that I talked this matter over with a sub-committee of the Finance Committee of the Senate, Senators Voorhees and Vest; I do not deny that I was instrumental in getting that proviso so amended that we saved free lumber. It was all referred to the Government of Canada. That Government was free to approve and accept the arrangement, or to disapprove and reject it, and if they had not approved it, but had rejected it, there would have been reason for casting obloquy upon me. But when the arrangement was made, when the proviso was accepted, when the proposition was endorsed by this Government, who gladly accepted the arrangement, and not only gladly accepted it, but subsequently made sacrifices to retain this very arrangement that was made upon that occasion. I hold that no blame can attach to me for having been instrumental in making the arrangement. I might go more exhaustively into this matter, I might explain the various steps in the laborious efforts I made to save this free-lumber provision, in going from one member to another, interviewing this man and that man, and seeking to impress the Treasury Department in favour of that view. I might do this, but it is unnecessary. Suffice it to say, that the proposition was adopted by the Senate Committee of Finance, and the adoption of that proposition secured the retention in the Wilson Bill of the paragraphs that place the articles I have read upon the free-lumber list. Now, Sir, free lumber having been saved, the essence of the arrangement having been free logs on the one hand, for free lumber on the other, and that arrangement having been accepted by Canada, as it was subsequent to this time—it was not until some time in August when the Bill finally passed—I think that if all the circumstances had been known, all impartial men upon the opposite side of the House would have said that the attack made upon me in this House on the 13th June last, was unwarranted and unfair. And it did strike some individuals as unwarranted and unfair. I will take the liberty of reading some letters I received not long after this time from men conversant with all the circumstances connected with the insertion of the free-lumber clauses in the Wilson Bill, in order to show the House and the country what opinion is held by men out side of the House, and by those in influential positions, and best competent to judge. The first letter I will read is from a gentleman who appeared before the Privy Council in this city in December last, in relation to the boom duty question, and urged that question here, and I think impressed the Privy Council with his absolute and eminent fairness—I refer to the Hon. Thomas A. E. Weadock, member of Congress for one of the Michigan districts, and a resident of Bay City, who wrote on 20th June, as follows :—

Washington, 20th June, 1894.

Mr. John Charlton, M.P.,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Sir,—I notice that the Conservative press of Canada has been severely criticising you upon your alleged course in regard to free lumber. I am very certain that without the export duty proviso in the Wilson Bill, lumber ought not and would not be free. Without the reciprocal arrangement of free lumber for free logs, that is free of export duties, a feature of the Bill, Michigan members would have opposed it, and it would not have passed the committee. The lumber states would have preferred retaining at least half the present duty, and with the parties so nearly tied in the Senate, you can see how close a call free lumber would have had. As it is, I think Canada has the best of it, and in rendering any service toward securing free lumber, you have done your people a service. It may not be perceived, however, by those who will not see.

I remain, sir, yours sincerely,

THOMAS A. E. WEADOCK.

I desire next to read a letter from the Hon. J. R. Whiting, a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, and a member of Congress for Michigan. It is as follows :—

Washington, D.C., 21st June, 1894.

My dear Sir.—I note a disposition to criticise you because of the clause in our Bill to require free logs from Canada as the price of free lumber. I can say this : A free lumber Bill was defeated in the last Congress through Michigan's protests, joined to those of California and the South. Michigan interests in free logs from Canada reconciled her to free lumber, deny this and her opposition will be aroused at once.

Yours truly,

J. R. WHITING.

To Hon. John Charlton.

This letter was written when the Bill was pending. The next letter I read is from Senator Voorhees, chairman of the Senate Committee of Finance, as follows :—

Washington, 13th July, 1894.

Dear Sir,—My attention has been called to some attacks upon you in the Canadian journals, based upon the assertion that you suggested the export duty proviso in the wood schedule of the Wilson Bill. The attack seems to me so unfair that I take the liberty of writing to say that the proviso is understood to have secured the support of the Michigan members for free lumber. It is not unlikely that the active hostility of Michigan would have defeated free lumber, and without the export duty proviso, that hostility, there is little reason to doubt, would have been vigorously applied.

Very respectfully,

D. W. VOORHEES.

Hon. John Charlton, M.P.,
Ottawa, Canada.

One other letter I desire to read, and it is from a gentleman very largely engaged in the lumber interests, whose responsibility will be vouched for by the fact that he was Democratic candidate for Governor of the state of Michigan last year—the Hon. S. O. Fisher, former member of Congress, who is also conversant with this matter. It is as follows :—

West Bay City, Michigan, 20th June, 1894.

Hon. John Charlton,

Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—I notice that the Conservative press of Canada is engaged in criticising you in a manner which evinces, either ignorance of the question under consideration, or a desire to place your alleged course on the export duty question in a false light before the people.

There are two or three points in the free lumber question that should be kept in mind when dealing with the matter. One of these points is, that if Michigan had joined its forces with those of Maine, the lumber states of the South and other lumber states, free lumber would have been lost in the Senate ; just as free coal, free ore and free sugar were lost. Another point is, that unless proper provision had been made for making free lumber depend upon the absence of all export duties in Canada upon logs or other forest product, Michigan would have thrown its entire influence against free lumber, and would have secured its defeat in the Senate. Such being the case, whoever can claim the invention of the export duty proviso of the Wilson Bill, can logically claim the credit for free lumber ; for, without that provision, free lumber could not have been carried. If the Wilson Bill carries and the Canadian Government believes that Canada is not getting enough under the reciprocal arrangement, which practically offers free lumber for free logs, it will not be necessary to accept this, for they are quite at liberty to impose as heavy an export duty as they please, surrendering in doing so the privilege of free entry into the United States for all kinds of lumber and forest product.

Very truly yours,

S. O. FISHER.

There are some other matters referred to in this letter of a personal character which I do not read. On the 19th July, while the Wilson Bill was still pending and while the attack on me was still being carried on in the press of the country, the lumbermen of the Ottawa valley held a meeting, which I attended, and I laid before my brother lumbermen a full and frank statement of all I had done in regard to this matter. They understood my motives perfectly well ; they understood the value of the consideration obtained in the Wilson Bill for free logs, and in the course of that meeting the following resolution was adopted—I may say that the chairman of the meeting was Mr. Booth of this city, one of the most prominent Conservatives of this country, and a good many attending the meeting were Conservatives :

Resolved, That this meeting is of opinion, that a fair measure of reciprocity in the trade relations of Canada and the United States would be in the interest of both countries ;

That, in the matter of the lumber trade, if such an arrangement should embrace the reciprocally free exchange of logs and lumber between the two countries, it would be of mutual benefit ;

That, in so far as Mr. Charlton has been able to contribute towards the securing of such legislation, he has acted in the commercial interests of Canada.

This was the deliverance and decision of the meeting of the lumbermen held in Ottawa on 19th July last.

I will not trouble the House any more with documentary evidence, but I will go back for a few moments to an episode which will throw further light on this subject—I refer to the log boom and chain duty, which had been imposed. I think, in the fall of 1893, and which upon the representation of the Michigan lumbermen had been set aside with the understanding that the Michigan lumbermen would provide themselves with Canadian booms and chains in the winter of 1893-94. Those lumbermen knowing that lumber was placed on the free list in the Wilson Bill and having good reason to believe that the Bill would pass, did not desire to incur the very large expense necessary to throwing away the American booms and chains and substituting Canadian articles in place of them. On 10th May, an order was issued from the Customs Department here, informing the collector at Sault Ste. Marie that this duty was to be enforced at all the outports under his jurisdiction. I received word of this order having been sent, and the same afternoon I made an arrangement with the Controller of Customs to have an interview with him on the following day. I saw that the issuing of that order was made at a most inopportune time, that its influence on the fate of the free lumber provisions of the Wilson Bill could not be otherwise than unfavourable. I saw a few of my lumbermen friends in Ottawa and they all agreed that it was a matter of the utmost importance that this order should be set aside, and that the interpolation of this vicious duty at a time when the free lumber provisions of the Wilson Bill was struggling for existence in the American Senate, was something to be deprecated. A large delegation of the most influential lumbermen in this city had an interview with the Controller of Customs, but they could do nothing with the hon. gentleman. He in effect told us, that the Americans always put the knife into us when they had the opportunity, and he was going to put the knife into them. He could not see any reason for withdrawing the order, and he stood upon his right to issue it. I told him that we would take occasion to have an interview with the Premier, and he said we had better do so. That same evening I arranged an interview with Sir John Thompson for the following day, Saturday, May 12th, and Mr. Booth, the Hon. E. H. Bronson and myself, called upon Sir John Thompson and took pains to set before him very fully, the effect that we thought this inopportune order would have, and the necessity for its removal. We had a long talk about the general character of the export duty provisions, and about the export of American logs to the Canadian mills at St. John, and the fact that the balance of export had been, and was still, on the side of Canadians. The Premier seemed very much impressed with our representations. He said he would refer the matter to Council that afternoon, and we left with the impression that the boom duty was to be rescinded. On Monday morning I received in my mail a letter from a friend in Bay City, Michigan, saying that a deputation consisting of S. O. Fisher, ex-member of Congress, and subsequently a candidate for Governor of the State, Col. Bliss, also an ex-member of Congress, General Alger, ex-Governor of the State, and of other leading capitalists, was leaving for Washington the Sunday night following the date of the letter, and without using the somewhat vigorous language of the letter, the object of their visit was stated to be an attempt to break up the free lumber provisions of the Bill and have done with the whole thing, so much were they incensed at the issue of the Canadian order. I intercepted Sir John Thompson on his way to his office that morning, and I showed him the letter and stated that it was of the utmost importance to the lumber trade of Canada that prompt action should be taken. I told him that the Michigan delegation would not reach Washington until that afternoon, and that if they could be met with a telegram from Ottawa, that this order had been set aside, the mischief they would otherwise do might be averted. Sir John Thompson said: I will see you when the House meets and let you know whether or not to send the message. After prayers, on Monday, May 14th, Sir John Thompson crossed the floor of the House and asked me, if I would be kind enough to send the message to the delegation at Washington, that the boom duty would be left in abeyance: or rescinded, as I understood it. That message was sent. It was not sent by me. It was sent by the Customs Department at my suggestion and request. It was sent to one gentleman belonging to this delegation at Washington, in care of Thos. A. Weadock, of the House of Representatives, and another telegram was sent to the president of the Michigan Log Towing Company, of Bay City, Michigan. Another message was sent to the collector of customs at Sault Ste. Marie, and the Government used the utmost haste, and took the most effective measures to convince the Americans that this obnoxious duty, which the Controller of Customs had sprung upon them, was set aside.

Mr. WALLACE. It was not set aside.

Mr. CHARLTON. Well, it was set aside for the time being. It was left in abeyance. The impression conveyed to them was, that if this matter was left in abeyance, when the Wilson Bill became law the trouble was ended. I learned afterwards, Mr. Speaker, that the delegation at Washington received this telegram, through Mr. E. T. Corrington, one of its members and that they were not fully satisfied with its purport. Through some delay the telegram was not received until Tuesday morning. In the meantime they had assembled the Michigan delegation of the House of Representatives, and of the Senate, who all agreed in determining that they would sweep free lumber from the Wilson Bill, that they would have no more tinkering with the Canadian Government which had shown such bad faith in the matter, and that they would leave Canadians to pay duty on lumber, and they would pay the duty on the boom sticks. They had gone to the State Department and had requested the authorities to procure an interview between themselves and Sir Julian Pauncefote, and after some little hesitation, Mr. Adee, one of the assistant secretaries of state wrote a carefully worded note to the British Embassy. In the course of three-quarters of an hour Mr. Goschen came to the State Department from the Embassy and expressed regret that Sir Julian Pauncefote was indisposed and not able to meet the delegation. They discussed the matter, and the Michigan delegation found Mr. Goschen quite capable of understanding the whole question. If their statements are correct, he pronounced it a worse than absurd order, and he went back to Sir Julian Pauncefote, and returned in the course of an hour and stated: that although it was not an ordinary course to pursue, yet the British Embassy would wire the authorities at Ottawa, that that order had better be set aside. That is what is stated by the Michigan delegation. I do not know whether my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) or the Secretary of State ever received such a telegram from the British Embassy or not. That was the nature of that feature of the boom duty impost. The Government left the duty in abeyance. They did it at the solicitation of the Ottawa lumbermen of whom I was one, and the Government employed me.

Mr. WALLACE. Oh.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, sir, and I have a copy of the telegram here. The Government employed me to communicate with the Michigan delegation at Washington to avert the evil consequences they feared would result from their visit to that city, and which might upset the free lumber arrangements. Matters ran on without a hitch, and the boom duty was not imposed until after the passage of the Wilson Bill. When the Wilson Bill had become law, and when we had secured the great advantages that that Bill conferred upon us, by the comparatively paltry concession of refraining from putting an export duty on logs, then this magnanimous and chivalrous Government, imagining that the danger they would bring upon their head by unfriendly action, was passed, proceeded to enforce this order again. They were not aware, I presume, that the Michigan delegation had received the pledge of the United States Treasury Department, that if the Canadian boom duty were imposed, it would be considered pro tanto an export duty, and the whole of the advantages secured by the Wilson Bill would be swept away by one stroke of the pen. They thought that they might then with impunity impose this duty on booms. A Michigan delegation came down here about the 1st of December, and their spokesman, Mr. Weadock, pointed out to the Government that this duty might be—he knew it would be—considered pro tanto an export duty, and that the consequences might be most serious to the Canadian lumber interests. After due consideration the Government made up their mind to back down and in order to cover their retreat, they had a series of negotiations by which they professed to be very anxious to have the American Government declare they would not impose an export duty upon boom sticks, a duty which they had never imposed and which they never thought of imposing at all. This is the history of the transaction up to the final removal of this pet boom duty by the Government, a duty which they had clung to with much tenacity. They imposed it in May and dropped it because of the serious consequences that threatened them. They dropped it under the advice of a level-headed, common-sense Premier. They resuscitated it again by the action of my hon. friend the Controller of Customs, and they ignominiously backed out of it afterwards, when they ascertained the serious consequence likely to attend it.

Now, Sir, let me, in conclusion, ask what I have done—where the Government have availed themselves of the fruits of my efforts? They condemn me without stint; their press has condemned me; their orators upon the stump have condemned me. They have rung the changes upon me as a Yankee, as an annexationist, as a traitor—

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. My hon. friend says, "Hear, hear"; and what have they taken at my hands? They have accepted the proffered reduction in the McKinley Bill to $1 a thousand upon condition of their giving up the export duty. That arrangement, which I initiated, they accepted promptly, and then they called me a traitor. They accepted the provisions of the Wilson Bill, made in February, 1894, which I had more or less connection with; and having accepted those provisions, with all the conditions attached, and having accepted them thankfully, they set aside the boom duty order in May, 1894, for fear that they would lose them; and all the while they called myself, who had been instrumental in getting them the concessions, a traitor. They accepted the privilege, and sacrificed their boom duty, knowing that it would tend to save the free-lumber provision; but they could not forego the opportunity of putting the knife into a hated political rival. They then asked my services to avert the hostile action of the Michigan delegation at Washington; and there are two telegrams in the hon. gentleman's department, of which I have copies in my hand, practically sent by myself, which were sent on the 14th of May, 1894, to secure the object which the Government sought, namely, the averting of the disaster which would have been the result of the Michigan delegation in both Houses of Congress going against the free-lumber provision of the Wilson Bill; and then, after waiting until the Wilson Bill became law, they, with infinite meanness, came around and put into force again that boom duty order. Had they adhered to that position, the whole of the advantages that were secured to Canada under the Wilson Bill—the free admission of the articles which it took eleven paragraphs to enumerate, and which covered $13,000,000 worth of products—would have been swept away by a Treasury Department ruling because their boom duty order would have been ruled by the Treasury authorities at Washington to be 'pro tanto' an export duty. After having been instrumental in securing these things, and having the fruits of my efforts appropriated by the Government, I have been persecuted, maligned and traduced by that Government and by their followers; and I here record my assertion that in all the discussion relating to this matter, the course of the Government and its supporters towards me has been unfair, petty and malignant and utterly devoid of the first principles of political honesty.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, the address of the hon. gentleman reminds me very much of the play of Hamlet with the principal character stricken out of the play altogether, in this, that no charge has ever been made against the hon. gentleman, so far as I am concerned, or so far as I have heard by any one else in this House, or by a Conservative speaker outside of the House, in reference to any part taken by the hon. gentleman in securing the free admission of lumber into the United States. The charge against the hon. gentleman was in reference to another point which he has been very careful to avoid to-day, and which he avoided in the debate which took place on this matter last year. Now, what is the position of matters in reference to lumber? Previous to the passage of the Wilson Bill, there was a duty chargeable against sawn lumber going from Canada to the United States of $1 per thousand; and hon. members of this House, I myself among the number, asked from day to day that the Government here should place an export duty on logs, to prevent the export of the large quantity of logs, valued by the hon. member for North Norfolk at some $5,000,000 a year, that were being taken from this country to the United States, so that the manufacture of them might be carried on in this country. I believe that the time had been reached in the history of Canada when the Government had almost decided that an export duty should be imposed so that the manufacture of those logs should be confined to this country. The Government, I believe, had very serious doubts as to whether or not that duty should be imposed. At that time the Wilson Bill was being formulated in the United States, and it was, I will admit, a most favourable Bill for the lumber interests of this country, in this, that it afforded the people of this country an opportunity of exporting not only their lumber, but other products of the forests, to a very great extent, and on much more favourable terms than had theretofore been the case. Now, the hon. member for North Norfolk was interested in the export of logs. In the first place, he was not the owner of a saw-mill in Canada. He was the owner of a mill in the United States, not a saw-mill, I grant, but a mill which made it vastly to his interest that saw-logs should be taken to that part of the country. He was the owner of and interested in tugs towing logs from this country to the American side; I think he will not deny that. He was also interested in timber limits on the north shore, the logs from which were being sold in the United States; and it was for that reason, and that reason alone, I claim, that the hon. gentleman took the stand that he did. It was not the first stand he took on this question, because four years ago he went to the United States and impressed upon the lumbermen there the duty and necessity of the American Government placing such a high import duty on lumber that it would terrify the Canadian Government against placing an export duty on logs. The hon. gentleman, I am sure, will not deny that, because he was reported at the time. At a meeting held, I think, in Buffalo, he said this:

It is the addition of the log export duty to the lumber duty our American lumbermen need to bring about.

There was then a duty of $2 on lumber going from this country to the United States, and the hon. gentleman wanted to have the United States statutory enactments so framed that, in the event of an export duty being imposed on logs going from Canada, the United States import duty on lumber should be increased by the amount of that export duty. That was the stand the hon. gentleman took then.

Mr. CHARLTON. If I may be permitted to make an explanation, I would like to say that I never attended a meeting in Buffalo, and that I never advised such a course as the adding of the export duty on logs to the import duty on lumber. I may have referred to it as something talked of or probable; but the hon. gentleman is mistaken in saying that I advised it.

Mr. BENNETT. It was at Tonawanda. I have not the report by me, but I have it in my possession, and I think the hon. gentleman will not deny that he attended a meeting at that time. If it is simply a question of the place, that does not matter.

Mr. CHARLTON. No, it is not only a question of place. I deny the gravamen of the charge. I never gave any such advice.

Mr. McMULLEN. Hear, hear: take it back.

Mr. BENNETT. No, I do not take it back; and in proof of the assertion, I may say that I made the charge here two years ago, and the hon. gentleman did not deny it then. This was the point at which he arrived last year. The Wilson Bill was being framed, and it was, as I say, a measure most favourable to the interests of Canada—not only to the exporters of white pine lumber, but the exporters of spruce, wood pulp and other articles produced from the forest: and it was when the Wilson Bill was about to pass that the hon. gentleman made the interference, the wrong and bad interference, so far as Canadian interests were concerned, that he was charged with last year, and that he denied having made. This circular was in the possession of the Treasury Department of the United States, and when the hon. gentleman was charged with it last year, he had not even the frankness to admit that he was the writer of the article addressed to Secretary Carlyle. I do not know whether he proposes to admit it to-day or not, but this I do say, that there was an article written by one John Charlton, of Michigan, and I charge the hon. member for North Norfolk with being the writer. If he wishes to deny it to-day, then he will go a step further than he did last year. If he admits it, well and good. But whether he denies or admits, the public will believe that he was the writer. What was the position of the Wilson Bill as it stood? It contained the provision of the Mills Bill, according to the letter written by John Charlton, of Michigan, to Secretary Carlyle:

Provided, that if any export duty is laid upon the above mentioned articles, or any of them, by any country whence imported, all said articles imported from said country shall be subject to duty as now provided by law.

Then John Charlton, of Michigan, goes on to say:

The McKinley Bill also contained, as above mentioned, a similar proviso, under the operation of which a removal of the export duty by the Canadian Government was secured. The Wilson Bill is supposed to follow in the same line, but the proviso contained in that Bill will not reach the purposes intended, but if the interpretation of your memorialist is correct, will result in the imposition of American duties upon the article only that Canadian export duties are imposed upon, thereby supplementing the Canadian export duty and furthering the purpose of the Canadian Government. It is respectfully submitted that this proviso should read as follows:—Provided, that if any export duty be laid by any foreign country upon any of the articles mentioned in paragraphs 672 to 683, inclusive, then all said articles imported from said country shall be subjected to the duties existing prior to the passage of this Act.

What did the hon. gentleman mean, because in the same article he makes use of this remarkable statement—and it is remarkable to see a Canadian legislator endeavouring to frame safeguards in the tariff of any other country which will militate against the interests of the country he is supposed to represent. What did he say? He said:

A large trade in the supply of American saw-mills from the Canadian forest now exists. The saw-mills of eastern Michigan at Saginaw, Bay City, Tawas, Alpena, &c., are largely dependent upon the Canadian forests north of Georgian Bay for their log supply. Canadian logs are also furnished to mills in northern Ohio and western New York. This trade last year amounted to, in round numbers, $5,000,000. The Canadian Government have shown hostility to the exportation of logs, and an export duty was first imposed in 1866.

What was the proviso that the Wilson Bill contained? It contained the proviso that in the event of the Canadian Government placing an export duty on spruce, white pine lumber should not be exported by Canada to the United States free of duty, and if the Canadian Government placed a duty upon white pine lumber, spruce could not be exported. Further on the hon. gentleman, in his memorial, states:

There should be a provision, that if the Canadian Government should place an export duty on any article in the wood schedule, then the United States Government should levy an import duty on every article in that schedule.

What was the result of that? That is the whole point in the charge, and the hon. gentleman to-day, in his lengthy remarks, has not dared to contradict that he was the author of that iniquitous document, for it is iniquitous, so far as Canadian interests are concerned. The hon. leader of the Opposition did not dare to defend the hon. gentleman's conduct, nor did any hon. gentleman on that side dare to defend it, and I am bound to say that not one will dare to rise in his place and defend it to-day. What is the position to-day? Under the clause of the Wilson Bill, prompted by the hon. member for North Norfolk, should we impose an export duty on any one article in the wood schedule, the United States will impose an import duty on every article in that schedule. Take the matter of pulp. At all points easily accessible to the United States, vast quantities of pulp wood are being exported. But as soon as we place an export duty on white pine logs, the United States will impose a duty on pulp wood.

Again, if we put an export duty on pulp wood, the United States would retaliate by imposing a duty on white pine lumber and every other article in the schedule. No one will pretend that the hon. gentleman did wrong in endeavouring to bring about the free importation of lumber to the United States, and I give him credit for his efforts in that regard, but I blame him for having been the main mover in that retaliatory clause of the Wilson Bill. Had it not been for his disloyal interference and mercenary motives, that clause would never have existed in the Wilson Bill. Its presence there is due to the conduct of the hon. member for North Norfolk, and I invite the hon. gentleman to come to my constituency at any time and place and discuss the iniquitous part he took in that matter.

PROFITS ON WHEAT.

Mr. CASEY. I wish to call the attention of the House to something which I consider at least of equal importance to the matter we have just been discussing. There is at present a deliberate and apparently organized attempt being made to persuade the farmers of Canada that on account of the passing scarcity of wheat in this country, he is receiving a largely increased price for what he has to sell, and that he has a considerable amount of wheat yet left to sell. The statement has been freely made in the public press that the farmer is receiving 15 cents a bushel more for his wheat than he would were it not for the National Policy. The statement has been also made, on the authority of a firm of millers of Montreal, that the farmers of Ontario have one and a half to two million bushels of wheat still in their hands. I want to call your attention to some alleged facts from Montreal which have appeared in the Toronto "World" and a large number of Canadian papers, and apparently have been telegraphed far and wide, and which contradict this assumption and show in the strongest manner the hollowness of the contention referred to. In the first paper I took up, this telegram was headed "Fortunes in Wheat—the recent rise has made many wealthy—one man has made a million dollars—Montreal grain and flour men benefit by the increased price—a list of the individual increases—W. W. Ogilvie, the miller, the luckiest of the lot." The telegram, which is dated Montreal, 1st June, goes on to say :

There are happy faces on 'Change these days, and your correspondent has been enabled to give the names of the men who have made their piles in the recent rise in flour and grain. It is no secret that the chief of Canadian millers, Mr. W. W. Ogilvie, has made more than a round million, while his neighbours, the Lake of the Woods people, Mr. Robert Meighen, being the central figure, count their profits at $500,000.

Mr. BENNETT.

The list of those who have made fortunes in wheat, as stated by this telegram, is as follows:—

Mr. W. W. Ogilvie made over "a round million," say.....	$1,000,000
Robt. Meighen	500,000
Hugh McLennan	150,000
Bob Esdaile	75,000
Alex. McFee	75,000
A. C. McBean.....	100,000
Crane & Baird.....	100,000
Harry Raphael	75,000
Jake Hunsiclar	50,000
Adam Thompson	50,000
Evan McLennan	50,000
Jim Carruthers	75,000
Robt. Peddie	75,000
Jas. Campbell	40,000
Ed. Craig	40,000
J. McShane	50,000
T. L. Smith & Son.....	75,000
Edgar Judge	50,000
Geo. McBean & Co.....	50,000
R. E. Wright.....	40,000
Outsiders	500,000

$3,220,000

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is a statement of the facts by an apparently well-informed newspaper man in Montreal, who speaks with authority and who, no doubt, has got his figures from the operators of that city. Who, then, are the persons making money out of the scarcity of wheat in Canada at the present time? Certainly it is not the farmers?

If it were true that the farmers of Ontario still had in hand a million and a half or two million bushels of wheat and that Mr. W. W. Ogilvie knew that fact, we cannot imagine that the price would have gone up in Montreal to such an extent as to allow these large fortunes to be made by the sharp speculators of the Corn Exchange. It may be that Mr. Ogilvie and these other gentlemen, having unloaded in this eminently satisfactory manner, find that it would be very convenient for them to have the price of wheat fall temporarily in Canada, that it would be very convenient for them to have the fact—or rather the statement, for I cannot call it a fact—sent abroad in Canada that the farmers still hold a million and a half or two million bushels, so that they might be able to buy at a lower price and afterwards be able to unload with the same success that they have experienced in their last unloading. It might be very advantageous to them to bear the wheat market by producing the impression that there is still a great deal of wheat held by the farmers in Canada. But if they knew that that wheat was still in Canada they would not have been paying the prices they have been paying for wheat. A million and a half or two million bushels held by the farmers of Ontario would have been sufficient for local consumption till after harvest, and it is only by a reduction of supplies as compared with the demand for home consumption that the duty can have the effect of raising the price. I can easily see the object of men like Mr. Ogilvie in having this statement published, as it has been published by the Conservative press throughout Canada.

But the facts that prices have gone so high and that such profits have been made by speculators prove that the wheat does not exist in Canada. They show another thing, to which I must call the attention of the House and of the farmers of this country. Hon. gentlemen must know that the National Policy can have no effect upon the prices of wheat or other grains—

Mr. MONTAGUE. You are opposed to it.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman asks if I am opposed to the National Policy. I was opposed to the National Policy before he knew anything about it. The hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that under ordinary circumstances the National Policy cannot affect the prices of farm products, that is to say, as long as we have a surplus for export the price is fixed in the great markets of the world; when we have a scarcity, then the duty does begin to raise the price. But who gets the benefit? Is it the farmer? No, Sir, in spite of all the telegrams from Mr. Ogilvie that were published, in spite of all the allegations that were ever made, here is the proof that these speculators and monopolists, the men of capital who can buy up and hold the wheat, are the ones who make a profit out of the National Policy. It was for speculators and monopolists of all kinds that the National Policy was made and not for the farmers, and the gain to the speculators proves that the National Policy has had the desired effect. It is alleged in the public press that if that two millions of bushels were still in the farmers' hands, the farmers would make $300,000. Why, Sir, here is the statement that these few operators in Montreal have already made $3,220,000 out of the rise in wheat—more than ten times the amount the farmers would have made, even if Mr. Ogilvie's statement as to the quantity they held were true.

Mr. SMITH (Ontario). Did not the farmers get the extra 15 cents a bushel?

Mr. CASEY. No, or there would not have been these great fortunes made by the advance in price. My hon. friend from Ontario is evidently in the dark as to the method of a commercial transaction. These gentlemen named in the list I have given, bought this wheat when it was worth 50 cents a bushel or thereabouts—they bought it at the lowest price they could—and they bought flour at corresponding prices and coarse grains at corresponding prices in sympathy with the low price of wheat. Then, when the local scarcity began, when the duty began to have effect in excluding foreign wheat from Canada, these gentlemen who had bought wheat were the ones who made the profit, and not the framers of Ontario, either the county or the province. Let the hon. gentleman go and ask his constituents whether they sold to Mr. Ogilvie at 15 cents per bushel advance. There are always in every neighbourhood a few farmers who are so blindly optimistic that they insist upon holding wheat for sometimes two or three years. But I think that their experience is that nine times out of ten, after keeping wheat for two or three years, they sell at a lower price than they could have sold for just after harvest, to say nothing of loss of the grain and loss of interest on the money.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Loss through rats.

Mr. CASEY. Yes. There are various sorts of rats living on the farmer's crops. If I were to say that 1 per cent of the farmers held their wheat, I should be making a very high estimate; the great majority of farmers have been compelled to sell as early as they could in order to meet their obligations. Only the capitalists and a few highly optimistic farmers have made money in this case. A few farmers have made, most of them have lost. But I am willing to assert that ninety-nine bushels out of a hundred have been sold, or at all events, that ninety-nine farmers out of a hundred had sold their wheat, before the change of prices took place, and that it is the grain speculators of Montreal who have made the profit. Taking even the Ogilvies' assertion, supposing there were 2,000,000 bushels still left, the farmers would only make $300,000 out of it, and the Ogilvies and their friends have made $3,220,000 out of it. The fact is with regard to our wheat market, as every business man knows, that last fall there was an over-exportation, even at the low prices, both of Manitoba wheat and of Ontario wheat; and when that over-exportation was discovered, when it was found that more wheat would be necessary for local use, the price went up temporarily, and the price will stay up until the next harvest in Canada comes into the market. Then, again, as it has been during the past winter, when the farmer has wheat to sell, the prices will go down, as opposed to the present condition of things, which is that when it is the speculator who has the wheat, and not the farmer the price goes up. I appeal to members of this House, and I appeal to the Government press throughout the country not to aid the speculators by publishing any wild-cat information of the kind to which I have alluded; not to help the speculators to put down the price of wheat for the little that is remaining in the farmers' hands, by publishing any such sensational statements as to the amount of wheat still left in the Canadian market.

SUPPLY—PERSONAL EXPLANATION—
FREE LUMBER AND EXPORT DUTY ON LOGS.

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to say a word or two in regard to the matter brought before the House concerning the connection of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) with the removal of the export duty on logs. I regret that I did not understand that the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) was going to allude to another subject, or I would have asked to take his place. It strikes me that the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) has been very unfair to the hon. member for North Norfolk in this matter. He made last session a most bitter attack upon the hon. member for North Norfolk, and accused him of disloyalty to Canada in connection with the stand that he had taken in regard to the matter that has been under discussion. Now, to-day, after the hon. member for North Norfolk is in a position—which he was not in at the time on account of the negotiations being pendent—to show that his action has been most honourable to himself, and most beneficial to this country, the hon. gentleman for Simcoe again makes an attack upon him. In the first place, he charges the hon. member for North Norfolk with being personally interested in this matter. Now, Mr. Speaker, is that anything against the hon. member for North Norfolk? Would you yourself, being interested in the lumber business, hesitate to use your position as a member of this House, and as a supporter of the Government, to do all in your power, legitimately, to further the interests of lumber? Would the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Bryson) hesitate to do so? Has not the hon. member for Pontiac, in fact, taken advantage of his position in this House in every legitimate way, to advance the lumber interest of this country? Is there anything dishonourable in that? Is it not highly honourable to any hon. member to advance the interests with which he is personally engaged, in a legitimate way, in this House, by attempting to direct the public policy of the country in such a way as to benefit that interest? That is the first charge made against the hon. member for North Norfolk. Why, the hon. member for Simcoe comes forward, and, after making this very strong attack upon him last session, he now admits that his action has been of the greatest advantage to the lumber interests of Canada, by obtaining free entry into the American markets for that lumber. He admits that, and he thanks him for it; but he says, I condemn the hon. gentleman because he has been the means of so arranging the law in the United States that an export duty placed upon any one of the articles in the wooden schedule, is to be followed by import duties upon sawn lumber. Sir, the hon. gentleman is entirely inconsistent. He has thanked the hon. member for Norfolk for his action in the matter. The hon. member for Norfolk has shown clearly to this House that he could obtain what he did obtain only in one way, and that was

by having the Wilson Bill so modified that the export duty being placed upon these articles would result in the reimposition of the import duty upon sawn lumber. The hon. member for North Norfolk has made it, I think, abundantly clear to this House that although he may have an interest, he has no desire whatever in having the laws in the United States depend upon the export duties being put on by Canada; but he has shown very clearly that it was utterly impossible, in the way things were in the United States, to prevent free lumber following in the course of free iron ore and free sugar in the Senate, had it not been for the influence of the Michigan lumber interests. The Michigan lumber interests had the matter in their hands absolutely, because, although the Democratic party were in a large majority in the House of Representatives, their majority was so small in the Senate that a combination between those Democratic Senators who were against free ore, and those Democratic Senators who were against free sugar, and those Democratic Senators who were against free wool, along with the Democratic Senators who were championing the Michigan lumber interests, could prevent the free provisions of the Wilson Bill being applied to all these articles. Now, that was the position, which the hon. member for North Norfolk has made clear to this House. The Michigan lumber interests had, at Washington, a delegation who had entire charge of the matter, and full power to deal with it. How was it possible, then, to influence that delegation? The hon. gentleman had intimate knowledge of this question, his knowledge of the bearings of the lumber trade, and the views of the American lumbermen, enabled him to see that there was only one possible way of obtaining free lumber for Canada, which the hon. member for Simcoe has admitted to be a great boon, and which it is admitted on all sides to be a great boon for Canada—and that was to prevent the Michigan lumbermen from insisting upon free lumber being taken out of the Wilson Bill. The hon. gentleman made his suggestion, he worked with the Michigan lumber interests, and, by showing them that it was to their interest to allow free lumber provided the export duty upon logs was not imposed by Canada, he succeeded, and the hon. member for Simcoe has thanked him for that. Now, how can he thank him for accomplishing what he did accomplish, and, at the same time, condemn him for the method that he followed? If he accomplished something in an improper method, he should not be thanked for it. If it is improper, if it is not good policy, if it is disloyal to Canada to ask that Canada should refuse to put an export duty upon logs for the purpose of gaining the entry of sawn lumber into the United States, then it is not a question of the hon. member for North Norfolk at all, it is a question of the Government of the day. The Government of the day have no hesitation in taking the responsibility of refusing to put on the export duty, in view of the strong pressure that is brought to bear upon them by the lumbermen of this country, and by their supporters; and after the matter was placed before them, as it has been placed before them through the efforts of the hon. member who gave them to understand that by refusing to put an export duty upon logs, he could obtain this great boon for Canada, the free entry into the United States of sawn lumber, they have not hesitated to adopt the course of refusing to put an export duty upon logs. Now, it is well known that the hon. member for Simcoe desires an export duty upon logs. Every session we have heard him and other members from the Georgian Bay district, speak in favour of an export duty on logs. But that, Sir, should not warrant him in attacking the hon. member for North Norfolk. He has no right whatever to impute disloyalty to the conduct and actions of the hon. member for North Norfolk, because, incidentally, the question of the export duty upon logs is involved. If it is a mistaken policy for the Government to impose an export duty upon logs, then let the hon. gentleman attack the Government, let him call the Government disloyal. They are disloyal, according to his idea, to the interests of the Georgian Bay district in refusing to impose an export duty upon logs. But I think it must be plainly seen that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had no desire whatever that there should be in the Wilson Bill a clause of this kind. What he did desire was free lumber, just as you, Mr. Speaker, desired it and as the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Bryson) and other hon. members in the House and men outside of the House who are interested in the sawn lumber trade, desired it, their only market being practically the United States. All these men, as well as the hon. member for North Norfolk, were interested in obtaining that great boon. My hon. friend accomplished his end, not perhaps alone, but his efforts were in that direction, and they were successful, and it was the only way possible to secure the result, as has been pointed out most conclusively to-day, by the letters read by him to the House, to enable the Michigan delegation to see that it was to their interest to allow free lumber to remain in the Wilson Bill, provided that export duties were not to be levied on articles in the wooden schedule. The Ottawa Lumber Association, composed of members of both sides of politics, but nearly all its membership consisting of Conservatives, and very strong Conservatives, thanked the hon. member for North Norfolk in very strong terms for his action in this matter. Does this not show the absurdity of the action of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) in rising, and on his responsibility as a member, openly making charges of disloyalty against the hon. member for North Norfolk for doing something for which the large body of men interested in the material welfare of the lumber industry thanked him. How inconsistent are the two positions? I have no hesitation, without knowing very much about the question, except from hearing it discussed this year and last year, in designating as absurd and ridiculous this effort made to place on the Liberal party a charge of disloyalty because they are in favour of securing in every possible way freer trade relations between Canada and the United States. This is simply a part of that policy. Such a charge levied against the Liberal party is ridiculous. They are in favour of reciprocity with the United States and in favour of extending trade in every possible way with them, consistent with the honour and dignity of Canada, and I spurn such an attack made on the Liberal party. This is not a question affecting the hon. member for North Norfolk alone, for his position in connection with a policy of reciprocity is well known, and he has constantly urged the adoption of the widest possible measures of reciprocity, and he has in this particular matter secured a measure of reciprocity which is a great benefit, day by day, to Canada; and it ill becomes an hon. member to rise in his place, and because it does not suit the particular interest of his constituents, to attribute disloyalty to the hon. member for North Norfolk.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has avoided the question at issue and the charge made by the hon. member for East Simcoe. The charge made by the hon. member was that when the Wilson Bill was brought into the United States Senate it included articles mentioned in paragraphs from 672 to 683 inclusive, for the free admission of the lumber of other countries, and it contained a reciprocity clause that Canada should admit those products free of duty. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) was charged with having written a letter. He does not deny the paternity of the letter, as I understand, and that letter is not one from a man who is loyal to the Dominion, but is the letter of a traitor. What does that letter say? It makes it more onerous for Canada, not more easy, as regards those twelve items, and it compels any action taken as regards any one of them to apply to the whole twelve and make them all dutiable.

Mr. MARTIN. What was the purpose?

Mr. WALLACE. To do as much injury as possible to the interests of Canada.

Mr. MARTIN. No.

Mr. WALLACE. No intelligent or loyal Canadian will say otherwise. If it was the interest of Canada to impose a duty on one of those articles, according to this memorial inspired and instigated by the hon. member for North Norfolk, that disloyal memorial to the United States Senate, it could not be done. The hon. gentleman is responsible for that memorial. What does it say :

The McKinley Bill also contained as above mentioned, a similar proviso, under the operation of which the removal of the export duty by the Canadian Government was secured. The Wilson Bill is supposed to follow in the same line, but the proviso contained in that Bill will not reach the purposes intended.

To defeat Canadian interests. And to work for the assistance of men on the other side of the line, American mills and millers. That was the object of it :

But if the interpretation of your memorialist is correct,—

Who is your memorialist ? The hon. member for North Norfolk ?

—is correct, will result in the imposition of the American duty upon the articles only that Canadian export duties are imposed upon, thereby supplementing the Canadian export duty, and furthering the purpose of the Canadian Government.

That is what he proposed should not be done—"furthering the purpose of the Canadian Government," and in that way the interests of the Canadian people. Can any member in this House or any man in the country believe that these utterances are not disloyal ? They are not the utterances of a Canadian who is seeking to promote the interests of Canada, but they are the utterances of a man who is looking after the interests of the people on the other side of the line, and of the manufacturing industries on the other side of the line.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Did he promise them substantial aid ?

Mr. WALLACE. He accomplished his purpose by giving them very substantial aid. The hon. gentleman told the House about going down there to look after the interests of Canada. Why, we repudiate him—we always have done so, and always will.

Mr. MARTIN. We do not on this side of the House.

Mr. WALLACE. That is the reason you are on that side. That is the reason why hon. gentlemen will continue to sit on that side.

Mr. LANDERKIN. For what purpose did the Controller go there himself ?

Mr. WALLACE. I never went on a disloyal trip in my life, and that is more than some hon. gentlemen opposite can say. The hon. gentleman said he took this course because he found the lumbermen of other districts and other states, Georgia, Florida, Alabama and the South, represented by Democrats in the Senate, were becoming hostile to having free logs brought in from Canada, and they might vote the other way as regards lumber. What did the hon. gentleman tell the House he did ? He tells us, Sir, that he went down to get all these men into line. How did he do it ? He did it by getting their business rivals in Michigan free logs to compete with them. He says he got these men reconciled to injure their own interests by having logs come free from Canada to compete with the lumber of these southern states. Sir, that was not his idea at all. His idea was to accomplish what he laid out for himself to do, and he accomplished his purpose only too well.

An hon. MEMBER. To get free logs at any price.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, to get free logs at any price. Then, Sir, he tells us, with reference to these boom logs, that he was employed as an agent of the Canadian Government, and that he dictated those telegrams. Well, he came over to my office to-day to get these telegrams, but he was afraid to read them in the House.

Mr. CHARLTON. I will read them.

Mr. WALLACE. I will read them myself for you. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) said that he got these regulations set aside, but as a matter of fact they were not set aside, and I told him that, when he made the remark this afternoon. The telegram which was sent by the acting Commissioner of Customs, by my direction, was as follows :—

Have wired instruction Sault Ste. Marie—collection duty American boom logs and chains to remain in abeyance pending receipt by him further specific instruction from this department.

The regulations were not set aside at all, and they were only set aside when, at a later period, we had the assurance of the United States Government that they would permit Canadian boom logs to go in free of duty, and we adopted the principle of reciprocity.

Mr. CHARLTON. Might I ask the hon. gentleman what was his object in sending that telegram to E. T. Carrington in Washington ?

Mr. WALLACE. I will tell the hon. member. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) came around with a delegation, brought over by him on purpose to make threats to Canada, that if they did not remove the duty on boom logs that there would be trouble, and that they would do their best—as we know they were doing their best—and as the Premier of that day, Sir John Thompson told me, to injure Canada. He said to me :

Charlton has brought over these men to try and do their very worst against Canadian interests in connection with these boom logs.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The coon came down.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WALLACE. The coon did not come down. These gentlemen opposite laugh, and think it is a great joke because there is a traitor assisting to injure his country, and who partially succeeds in his purpose. They think it is a great thing to have a joke about it, but it is no joke.

Mr. MARTIN. I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; sit down.

Mr. MARTIN. I should think that hon. members on the other side ought to know the rules of the House by this time, and ought not to try to interrupt a new member when he is in order. My point, Mr. Speaker, is, that the hon. member (Mr. Wallace) cannot call the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) a "traitor."

Some hon. MEMBERS. He did not; sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. Controller of Customs refers to the hon. member for North Norfolk as a traitor, or characterizes him as a traitor, that certainly would not be in order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. WALLACE. Take what back?

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) The expression "traitor."

Mr. WALLACE. I will conform with the rules laid down by the Speaker. I have not contravened these rules, and I do not intend to.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman stated a few moments ago, there is a traitor in Canada, evidently referring to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton).

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. LAURIER. Did the hon. gentleman say that?

Mr. SPEAKER. I am not to assume that the hon. Controller of Customs has accused the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) of being a traitor, unless the allusion is so perfectly direct that there is no mistaking his meaning.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He referred to the letter which he read—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am in order. He referred to the letter which he read as a letter written by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and he said that was the action of a traitor.

Mr. SPEAKER. All through the discussion that has taken place to-day with regard to this particular letter, I have not understood the hon. members who have quoted this letter to state in specific terms that the gentleman, Mr. John Charlton, who wrote that letter, was the member for North Norfolk. They have not stated it in such specific terms as to justify me in assuming that these hon. gentlemen were accusing the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) of being a traitor.

Mr. LAURIER. They dare not assert it.

Mr. WALLACE. When I was interrupted by hon. gentlemen on the other side, I was referring to the question of boom logs, and the fact that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had come to me, and had also come to the Premier (Sir John Thompson), to get that order held in abeyance. I did not consent. He said to me: We do not care, if you enforce it the day after the Bill passes through, but just now they were playing their game.

Mr. CHARLTON. I want to inquire if the hon. gentleman—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; sit down.

Mr. CHARLTON. I want to inquire if the hon. gentleman accuses me of having sent the Michigan delegation to Ottawa? I understood him to say that the Premier accused me of having a gang here trying to force the Government out of their position.

Mr. WALLACE. The Premier found out the influences that were at work trying to injure Canada. He knew who were inspiring these men, who were bringing them over from Michigan and sending them down. As the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) told us, they should arrive in Washington on the 1.40 train. Everything was well known about the Michigan lumbermen, even to the hour of their arrival in Washington.

Mr. CHARLTON. I want to know if the hon. gentleman accuses me of sending that deputation to Washington? I want no evasions, but a plain denial or avowal of it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; sit down. Answer the question.

Mr. WALLACE. Sir, that was the reason I sent that telegram to Sault Ste. Marie, and wired Mr. Carrington, and I think I am safe in saying that nobody instructed the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) in the matter. He said that he dictated the telegrams. Why, he never saw them until to-day, and when he saw them he would not read them to the House, because they did not bear out what he expected they would. These telegrams conveyed exactly what we desired to convey; not that the order had been rescinded or set aside, but that it was to remain in abeyance, and it did remain in abeyance. We made the boom logs free of duty, when we had received a certified copy from the United States Government of the fact that boom logs there were made free of duty, and we entered into reciprocal arrangements with them. In all this matter we acted in the best interests of the people of this country. So far as I was concerned I was simply carrying out the law of the land. I ask the hon. gentleman to point out one step which was not for the best interests of Canada. The only fault we find is, that men who had not the interests of the country at heart, succeeded in inducing the American Government to put the same clause in the Wilson Bill that was in the McKinley Bill, and which was injurious to Canada.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) has said that the writer of the letter which he has read was a traitor to Canada; but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) denies that he says the writer was a Canadian.

Mr. WALLACE. I did not deny anything of the kind.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman affirm that he was?

Mr. WALLACE. I said nothing about it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then, I want to know what relevancy that letter has to this discussion?

Mr. MONTAGUE. What is your opinion about it?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I will tell the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I mean your opinion as to the writer?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the hon. gentleman wanted to speak before me he should have taken the floor, but I wish to reply to the observations of the Controller of Customs, and not to the interruptions of the Secretary of State. The Controller of Customs has spoken of that letter as if it were the production of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and yet the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) has not the courage to say that the hon. member for North Norfolk was the author of that letter. The hon. gentleman insinuates that he is the author; and he assumes that the writer of the letter cannot be a man loyal to the best interests of Canada. Let us suppose for one moment that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), or whoever the writer of the letter might be, was anxious that lumber should go free from Canada into the United States. Let us suppose for a moment that the hon. gentleman knew that the lumbermen of Michigan had sufficient influence to prevent lumber being put upon the free list unless the Government of Canada abandoned their course with regard to these boom sticks; what would he do? He would undertake to meet the views of the lumbermen of Michigan as far as he could for the purpose of preserving that which he thought would be in the interests of the people of Canada; and, Sir, the hon. gentleman himself does not deny that the arrangement which he says the hon. member for North Norfolk, if he is the author of that letter, is a traitor for making, is one that the Government of Canada have accepted in the interests of the people of Canada. The hon. member for North Norfolk might have been anxious to go much further. He might have been anxious to see the principle of the free interchange of products between Canada and the United States extended very much further. If the hon. gentleman opposite could have had his way he would have permitted no reciprocity in the matter at all, and he was willing to take the risk of preventing lumber being placed on the free list in order that he might keep the duty on the boom sticks. If the hon. gentleman puts that question before the lumbermen of Canada, they will decide who was the traitor in this matter, my hon. friend—assuming him to be the author of the letter—in undertaking to secure the free admission of lumber into the United States—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes, I say assuming that, because the whole argument on the other side has been based on that assumption.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman might get the hon. member for North Norfolk to make an affidavit in regard to that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Well, Sir, I have no doubt that if the hon. gentleman did make an affidavit, he would state the truth. But that is beside the question. Let us look for one moment at what the hon. gentleman's colleagues, members of the Government, who were leaders of the Conservative party a few years ago, did with regard to the relations between Canada and the United States. I remember on one occasion, when the Government of Canada proposed to take over a certain portion of the Grand Trunk Railway to the eastera extremity of the line; what condition did they attach to that arrangement? That the moneys which the Grand Trunk Company received from the Government of Canada for the abandonment of their interests in that portion of the line, should be expended in the construction of a railway in the state of Michigan. I want to know whether the Government, in thus insisting that the money of Canada should be expended in the United States, were acting in the interests of the people of Canada? Let me cite another case. When the Government of Canada, in promoting railway connections between Canada and the United States, provided that a large sum of money should be spent in the state of Maine, were they serving the interests of Canada? Suppose the Opposition undertook to deal with the conduct of the Government in these matters as the hon. gentleman has undertaken to deal with the conduct of the hon. member for North Norfolk, in what light would he stand before the people of this country? The hon. gentleman will remember that a few years ago the Government declared that no man could be loyal to Canada who was not in favour of the construction of the Intercolonial Railway around the coast of the St. Lawrence, in order to keep it as far as possible from the American frontier; and, after they constructed the road, they declared that it had no commercial value to the people of this country, and spent millions of the public moneys of this country for the construction of a short line across the state of Maine. That is the way hon. gentlemen opposite have spent the money of the people of Canada in the neighbouring republic; and having done that, they come forward and attack the hon. member for North Norfolk because they say he undertook to prevent, and succeeded in preventing, the Michigan lumbermen having lumber taken off the free list of products imported from Canada into the United States. The hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches had better adopt a more consistent and more dignified course. They undertake to single out for destruction the hon. member for North Norfolk and have him hunted down by those who engage in the chase on that side, both in the press and in Parliament; but I can tell them that they have undertaken a difficult task, and the people of this country will understand the object they have in view.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member who has just taken his seat, for the purpose of building up an argument, made a number of suppositions, most unnatural, most unreasonable and most unlikely in their nature. One was: Suppose that the members of Congress from the South, who were interested in lumber, would associate themselves with the members from Michigan? That was unlikely. Then, he asked: If the hon. member for North Norfolk knew that this amalgamation was going to take place, was he not justified in doing what he did? Well, there is nothing in the disclosures made by the hon. member for North Norfolk, nor in the letters, which, I believe, were invited from the parties themselves, to support that supposition from first to last. In the Wilson Bill were provisions admitting every article of lumber or wood free of duty, and, so far as we know, those provisions would have passed had it not been for the hon. member for North Norfolk, who saw the opportunity, in the interest of himself and his favourite lumbermen of Michigan, of whom he was one, of binding Canada down to a provision that was very much against her interest. Now, we are entitled not to divorce the men from their surroundings, if we want to understand the situation. If the history of the past had shown that the interests of the hon. member for North Norfolk were invariably in Canada, then it would be improper to assume that he was a traitor to Canada; but when we know that his interests lie in Michigan; when we know that his firm at Tonawanda have been carrying on extensive operations there for the last twenty years, and that they get their supply of lumber from Canadian forests, is it to be wondered at that his loyalty should be questioned and that we should assume he is working in the interests of himself and partner rather than in the interests of Canada? The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), coming to his defence, said: If you were interested in the lumber business, would you refuse to use your influence in the promotion of its interests? Certainly not, and if these interests were identical with those of Canada, it would be all right. But if the interests were those of the Michigan lumbermen exclusively, it would be all wrong for Canada. What is the hon. gentleman? He is a Canadian, whether by naturalization or birth, I do not know. It is unfortunate he is not one by both.

Mr. BENNETT. He is a Canadian by chance.

Mr. SPROULE. His interests, so far as we know, lie with the men of Michigan who cut Canadian lumber and have the advantage of the American market. Our interests lie in cutting that lumber here and sending it over to the United States market as sawn lumber. The hon. gentleman's interests lie in the opposite direction, and we have the right to assume that he is guided by those interests and not by an unselfish loyalty to Canada. But the hon. gentleman is selfish enough to work for these interests alone, just as he does his interests in connection with tugs and other lines which he operates in Canada. With regard to those letters, I have listened to them carefully, and I firmly believe they were indited by the hon. gentleman himself. If he did not outline every word, he suggested what should be put in the letters for the purpose of enabling him to lead a defence here and rehabilitate his political character for loyalty, which is at a very low ebb at present with the Canadian people. If he had read the whole of the letters—he said there was something personal which he would hold back—but if he would give the whole of the letters and the history connected with them; if he would state who invited the people to send them, we would be in a better position to express an opinion.

Mr. CHARLTON. If the hon. gentleman wants the whole of the letters I will give them to him.

Mr. SPROULE. I hope he will do more, I hope he will read the letters which he sent those parties when he asked them to send the letters, and then we will have the whole inwardness of it. I am told he frequently invited the department to allow him to negotiate on behalf of Canada, but the department would not. They believed he was not the right man. He spoke of the resolution of the lumbermen of Ottawa valley. What did these lumbermen say? They said that in so far as he has been instrumental in doing anything, we thank him. They did not say he had been instrumental. No doubt he helped to make that resolution himself. It would have been much better for him if he had not revived this question. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) said that the members on this side are attacking him. Who invited the attack? We have rather been defending what we said before and believe to be correct. It is the hon. gentleman himself who brought forward this subject.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. McMULLEN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. CHARLTON. Before this question is put to the House, I desire to offer a few remarks which are called for by some of the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite, and especially by the hon. Controller of Customs. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) said that the Wilson Bill, as it left the Committee of Ways and Means with the proviso attached to it at that time, was good enough for Canada, and ought to have been let alone. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman, in making this statement, evinces a want of knowledge of the position of matters, or to what to attribute the mistake he has made; but he ought to be aware that the Wilson Bill, as it left the Committee of Ways and Means and the House of Representatives, was in a position, as regards the export duty proviso, that was not acceptable to its friends, and that it had arrived at that stage where, if it stood with that export duty proviso, as it left the House of Representatives, the free lumber provisions of the Bill would have been lost. So when the hon. gentleman tells this House that the Bill ought to have been left in the state in which it left the House of Representatives and that meddling with it resulted in striking out a provision eminently satisfactory to Canada and putting in its place a provision less satisfactory, the hon. gentleman has, unconsciously no doubt, misled this House, because that proviso was not satisfactory to the friends of the Wilson Bill in Congress, and had that proviso remained, these free-lumber provisions would not have been in it at all. So that the question to be faced on that occasione was what to do in order to secure the retention of the free lumber provisions of the Bill. It was not that the proviso attached to the Bill with regard to the export duty was not satisfactory to Canadians who wanted free lumber, but because the Bill with that proviso could not pass the Senate, because with that proviso everything we desire in connection with that Bill was lost as a foregone conclusion. The hon. gentleman wants to know if I had anything to do with this matter, if I was in Washington at the time, and why I did not let that Bill alone. Simply because I did not like to see the free lumber provisions expunged from the Bill. If I had let the Bill alone, and if no attempt had been made to allay the hostility that was aroused against that Bill in consequence of the defective character—in the estimation of those who wanted free logs—of the export duty proviso of the Bill, and if no attempt had been made to arrange the export duty proviso to the satisfaction of those whose friendship was essential to the passage of the Bill, the free lumber provisions would have been lost. That is why I felt called upon to make an effort in Washington to secure provisions in that Bill that would be satisfactory to those gentlemen upon whose good or ill-will the fate of free lumber in that Bill exclusively depended.

Mr. SPROULE.

With regard to the Controller of Customs, that hon. gentleman, Sir, very gravely informed this House that the Premier of this Dominion had informed him that I was engaged in a conspiracy with an American delegation that had gone to Washington for the purpose of forcing this Government to do something that they were reluctant to do, and that I had marshalled the forces of the lumbermen of the Ottawa valley who held an interview with him and with the Premier of this country. Certainly I must be a potent individual to marshal the lumbermen of the Ottawa valley and to compel them to act unconsciously in conjunction with this American delegation for the purpose of embarrassing the Government and wrecking certain interests in Canada. Why, the thing is too absurd to make as a statement seriously before this House. What I did, Mr. Speaker, was this: When I was informed by a friend of mine that this delegation was about to depart for Washington, acting on that information and not because I had the direction of that delegation as the hon. gentleman intimated, but knowing from that information when that delegation proposed to leave Bay City, Michigan, and when it would probably reach Washington,—for I knew the route they would probably travel by—

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. An hon. gentleman says "hear, hear."—I went to the Premier of this Dominion and informed him that such a delegation was on its way to Washington. I showed him the information I possessed in the letter that had been written to me by the friend I referred to. I intimated what I feared would be the effect of the work of that delegation if their operations were not check-mated. I asked the Prime Minister of this country to have an intimation sent to these men that the order complained of, the order that had started them upon their mission, the order that threatened the loss of free lumber in the Wilson Bill, had been rescinded or set aside. That was the proposition I made to the Prime Minister of this country, and that gentleman deemed the matter of sufficient importance to authorize telegrams that he had caused to be sent orders to the collector of customs at Sault Ste. Marie and the outports that the order was rescinded or set aside.

Mr. WALLACE. No, no.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, Sir, here is the telegram. This telegram was sent by the hon. gentleman to E. T. Carrington of the American delegation and to Mr. Young, president of the Michigan Log Towing Company of Bay City, Michigan. The hon. gentleman himself says that he sent these telegrams. Why did he send the telegrams to the gentleman in Washington whose name I furnished? Why did he send a telegram to a gentleman in Bay City whose name I furnished? Why did he cause telegrams to be sent to the collector at Sault Ste. Marie and the outports that the order was to be held in abeyance until further instructions? Was it because I was engaged in a conspiracy? Was it because the Prime Minister of this country, as the hon. gentleman alleges, said that I was a traitor and the manager of a delegation sent to Washington, and that I had been marshalling the lumbermen of the Ottawa valley to assist my traitorous designs? And was it to check-mate me that he sent these two telegrams to parties I have named? A pretty way to check-mate treason, a pretty way to rebuke a man who is engaged, according to his own statement, in endeavouring to injure the interests of this country, to follow the very course he suggested and readily comply with his suggestions. The assertion is simply preposterous and the hon. gentleman knows that it is totally destitute of truth.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. CHARLTON. Well, I cannot say they were true, at all events, but I withdraw the other assertion. Here are the telegrams:

E. T. Carrington, Esq.,
c-o Thos. A. Weadock, M. C.,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

How did the hon. gentleman know this Mr. Carrington? How did he know that a telegram addressed in care of Congressman Weadock would reach Mr. Carrington of Bay City? How did he know that Mr. Carrington was there at all? What led him to suppose that it was necessary to send a telegram to that gentleman? What was his object in sending that telegram? Was it to tell Mr. Carrington to do some business for him that he afterwards went on to Washington to attend to himself? Was it to ask Mr. Carrington to procure him some books at Washington? He knew from the information furnished him here that Mr. Carrington was a member of the delegation that had gone to Washington for a specific purpose. He knew what that specific purpose was. He sent the telegram from the Customs Department to divert these men from the purpose they went to Washington to carry out. That was the object for which I waited upon the Premier, and that was the object the Premier had in issuing the instructions to the hon. gentleman. And the hon. gentleman was carrying out the instructions when he wired to Mr. Carrington as follows:

Have wired instructions collector Sault Ste Marie. Duty American boom-logs and chains to remain in abeyance until further instructions.

He sends the same telegram to Walter Young, a leading gentleman in Bay City, engaged in the business of towing logs, one who could furnish to parties interested in sending down the delegation, information calculated to allay the feeling of hostility to Canada that had led to the sending of the delegation to seek to defeat free lumber. I have never seen in this House in my twenty-five years' experience, a more brazen instance of an attempt to deny what was true—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. CHARLTON—a more brazen attempt to throw discredit upon an hon. gentleman of this House, falsely and unfairly, than that made by the hon. gentleman to-day.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is surely aware that he is out of order in making these statements with regard to another hon. member. I must ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw the words.

Mr. CHARLTON. Well, I will withdraw them, but I shall be sorry if the rules of this House compel me to say they are not true. I withdraw them in a parliamentary sense. Then the hon. gentleman asks what was the purpose of this export proviso? Did the hon. gentleman listen to the statement made as to the various circumstances that led up to the necessity of suggesting this export duty proviso? Did he hear the statement made that when the Bill left the House of Representatives with the proviso fixed by the Committee of Ways and Means that proviso was inadequate for the purpose for which it was intended? Did he hear of the hostility aroused against the Bill in consequence, hostility threatening the existence of the Bill so far as free lumber was concerned? The hon. gentleman says it was preposterous to suppose that the southern lumber states would make common cause with Michigan and seek to help them to get free logs, because that would serve to make more effectual Michigan competition against themselves. Why, Mr. Speaker, what they were afraid of was the competition of the Canadian mills, the sending of free lumber from Canada. They cared nothing for the competition of Michigan, for they had had that competition for generations; but they had a suspicion that the enacting of the free lumber provisions would interfere with their business by lowering the price of Canadian lumber in the American markets. Consequently, though this was a part of the Democratic scheme, these states looked upon that feature of the Bill with disfavour. They had in their hearts a desire to see that feature of the Bill eliminated, and they ask only a good and suitable excuse to array themselves against that feature. As I told the hon. gentleman this afternoon, Senator Morgan, the most influential of all the Senators from any southern lumber state, had spoken against free lumber in the Democratic caucus on the 26th February. I considered that an indication of very grave import so far as the prospects of free lumber was concerned. I knew if Senator Morgan's influence was cast against free lumber, the game was up. When the hon. gentleman asked, What was the purpose of the export duty proviso, I tell him that he must have very little discernment, indeed, if he does not see what was the purpose of that proviso. The purpose of that proviso was to allay the hostility that existed against this free lumber provision in that Bill; the purposes of that proviso was to secure the influence of Michigan, which was being withdrawn; the purpose of that proviso was to set aside the hostility of all the southern lumber states, represented in the Senate by at least fourteen Democratic Senators, while there was in the Senate only a Democratic majority of four, if my memory is not at fault. That was the purpose of the export duty proviso. I have laid before this House the absolute certainty of the statement I have made, that the proviso put into that Bill with reference to export duty, alone saved the free lumber provision of that Bill. Now, if that is true, and I affirm it is true, how utterly unjustifiable is the conduct of the hon. gentleman and his colleagues, and of all the members on that side of the House, in pursuing the course they have pursued towards me with regard to this matter; in seeking to cast discredit upon me, and in the very next breath turning around and accepting thankfully the fruits of the arrangement that was made late in February, for which they condemn me. Free lumber was saved, it was saved through this export duty proviso of the Wilson Bill, that was effectual for the purpose for which it was intended; and free lumber being saved, the Government of Canada was at liberty to put on an export duty, or it was at liberty to abstain from doing it. They were not obliged to accept this proviso that was made by the American Congress. They could have put on an export duty, they could have raised it, or they could have done anything else they chose, and, in doing it, they could have allowed free lumber to go by the board. They did not do it, they thankfully accepted the arrangement, they did not restore the export duty, and they removed the boom duty. First of all, they put the boom duty in abeyance, then they put it in abeyance again last December, and then they totally removed it; and they did all this for the purpose of securing the advantages that the export duty proviso of the Wilson Bill, arranged in February, 1894, secured for the lumber men of Canada. Now, it is said that I went and made representations as a Michigan man. I suppose if I had gone to the Secretary of the Treasury and said: "I am a Canadian lumberman, and I want this and that," I would probably have had a great deal of influence in that quarter. When in Washington, I did what was necessary to avert this disaster.

Mr. MONTAGUE. You would not deceive him?

Mr. CHARLTON. I would not deceive him. I did not deceive him, but I would not foolishly give away the chances I had for the object I had in view. That would not have been diplomatic, and I would not have thrown away recklessly the chances that were laid before me, as my hon. friend's colleagues did when they were in Washington as a reciprocity commission, by refusing to consider a scheme that would include an agreed list of manufactures, and by imperiously presenting their own terms of reciprocity in natural products as their ultimatum. I was after free lumber, and I was going just as far, in my judgment, it was necessary to go in order to secure my purpose; and I was working in the interests of the lumbermen of Canada, and for the good of my fellow-citizens. Now, the hon. gentleman tells us that he repudiates me, that his Government repudiates me as an envoy looking after Canadian interests in Washington. I never asked them to authorize me to look after Canadian interests. I never acted as their agent, and I never desired to do so. I went down to Washington, and I acted in the capacity of a private citizen of Canada, I acted in the interests of Canada. I tell the hon. gentleman that if what is said with regard to this export duty proviso being attributable to me, is true, I did more for the interest of Canada in Washington than in all his genius, and tribe, and associates, and party have done since 1866; and I am not sure but what that is what is the matter with the hon. gentleman and his friends. They knew how barren have been the results of their trips to Washington, and they are displeased that a private member of the Liberal party has been instrumental in securing the abrogation of the duties upon products of Canada, the export of which to the United States amount to $13,000,000 a year, and which the hon. gentlemen have seized upon as a hawk seizes upon chickens, and having seized upon the advantage that has been presented to them, they now find fault with the man that secured it, if these allegations concerning him are true.

The hon. gentleman from Grey (Mr. Sproule) tells us that the proviso, as it left the Committee of Ways and Means, would have passed but for me. That hon. gentleman can hardly be accepted as an authority upon American matters. He was never in Washington. I tell the hon. gentleman that he is entirely misinformed, that he knows nothing about it. That proviso was submitted to the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury at Washington, having charge in lumber matters, and the Assistant Secretary gave a decision with regard to the interpretation of that proviso, which at once arrayed the hostility of the Michigan men against it. He gave the decision that the proviso was only applicable to saw-logs, that if a foreign government put an export duty on saw-logs, all the remedy the United States would have under that Bill, would be to put a duty on saw-logs also; and when that authoritative exposition of the meaning of the proviso, was given by the Treasury Department, every Michigan man in the House, or in the Senate, was at once arrayed against the Bill, as it then stood. The hon. gentleman talks about my interests in Michigan. I am interested in Michigan, and I am interested in Tonawanda. My interests in Michigan consist of a few acres of stump lands, as they are termed, stripped years ago, and I will sell them to the hon. gentleman for 50 cents per acre. My chief interests are in Canada. My desire was to benefit those interests, my desire was to benefit the interests of those who, like myself, are engaged in lumbering. I wanted to remove from their shoulders the onerous burden that rested upon the lumbering industry. I wanted to secure this concession to the Americans with regard to the export duty that was an advantage to them. I wanted to secure one advantage by granting another concession, which was also really an advantage to us; and if I was personally interested in this matter it does not militate against me at all, if I was acting in the interests of the country, if I was acting in the interests of the large class of people in this country. The resolution of the Ottawa Valley lumbermen with regard to this matter makes it pretty clear, I imagine, that in doing this I was acting in their interests, and if I was acting in the interests of the lumbermen, I was also acting in the interests of the commercial classes of Canada at large.

Now, I shall say but few words more. I will call attention again to two of these letters. I do not suppose it will be asserted that in addition to directing the Michigan delegation that went to Washington, and in addition to running the lumbermen interested in the Ottawa Valley, I was likewise dictating the course that should be pursued by the Committee of Ways and Means, and by the president of the Finance Committee of the United States Senate, and by a candidate for the governorship of Michigan, and pretty much everybody else in the United States. I hardly desire to aspire to the credit of having such wide-spread influence as that. Here are letters from gentlemen whom I could not influence, whom no individual in this House could influence. The letter of the president of the Finance Committee, Senator Voorhees, I will read again, in order that the House may understand what that gentleman says with regard to this very matter, and may appreciate the necessity that existed for securing an arrangement with regard to that export duty proviso that would allay the opposition of the Michigan men to the passage of the free-lumber clauses. Senator Voorhees said:

My attention has been called to some attacks upon you in the Canadian journals, based upon the assertion that you suggested the export duty proviso in the wood schedule of the Wilson Bill. The attacks seem to me so unfair that I take the liberty of writing to say that the proviso is understood.

Senator Voorhees would be very apt to understand this matter.

To have secured the support of the Michigan members for free lumber. It is not unlikely that the active hostility of Michigan would have defeated free lumber, and without the export duty proviso, that hostility, there is little reason to doubt, would have been vigorously applied.

That is the statement of Senator Voorhees, president of the Finance Committee. He states explicitly that this proviso is understood to have secured the support of the Michigan delegation. He states further that otherwise Michigan would have defeated free lumber; and he states still further that there is little reason to doubt that the hostility would have been actively applied if this export duty proviso had not been made. Mr. Whiting, a member of the Committee of Ways and Means is a prominent and weighty man in Michigan, he has represented a congressional district of that state for many years as a member of Congress, and occupies an influential position. He writes:

I note a disposition to criticise you because of the clause in our Bill to require free logs from Canada as the price of free lumber. I can say this: A free lumber Bill was defeated in the last Congress through Michigan protests joined to those of California and the South.

Michigan interests in free logs from Canada reconciled her to free lumber, deny this and her opposition will be aroused at once.

Mr. McALISTER. Had they free logs at that time?

Mr. CHARLTON. They had free logs at that time under the provisions of the McKinley Bill, which I discussed this afternoon. That Bill was being repealed, and some other provision had to be made in order to secure free logs. The lumber duty was reduced to $1 per thousand under the McKinley Bill, and the export duty was removed by Canada as the consideration given for the reduction in lumber duty. Then a new measure was before Congress, namely, the Wilson Bill, which abrogated the provisions of the McKinley Bill: the whole influence of Michigan was aroused to protect its interest in free logs as formerly secured in the McKinley Bill. The policy of the Democratic party was for free lumber. Michigan declared, we will consent to free lumber if you will guard our interests, as they were guarded under the McKinley Bill, as regards free logs. That was the arrangement on which the suggested free lumber provision was incorporated in the tariff as it came from the Committee of Ways and Means. It was found that the export duty proviso was insufficient, and Michigan was aroused; a crisis had arrived, when the whole scheme was under consideration before the Democratic caucus in the Senate, and when free coal, free sugar, and free iron ore had already gone by the board, through combinations among the Democrats against those additions to the free list, and free lumber appeared also certain to go unless the opposition of Michigan could be set aside, and the active friendship of Michigan to this measure could be secured. That is the key note of the situation, and the whole matter turned upon the proposition, in effect, to give to Canada free lumber, free forest exports, requiring 11 paragraphs to enumerate them, if Canada would agree to refrain from imposing an export duty on logs. That is the whole thing: Free logs on the one hand, free forest products on the other. This was the essence of the agreement, and the burthen of the negotiations and representations and interviews I had with members of the Finance Committee, with members of the Committee of Ways and Means, with Treasury officials, with members of Congress, and with members of the Senate; all these efforts were directed in the line of securing free lumber for Canada, and in the line of securing concessions that I knew must be made, for it was futile to ask free lumber from the Americans without such concessions being made. Here is a great party, and gentlemen pretending to be men of honour, who have accepted and reaped what was procured under these considerations, and under these negotiations, men who have accepted the boon thankfully and have set aside their boom duties, and done everything that was necessary to retain the great advantages secured in this Bill, yet so paltry and malignant are they as to attack the chief actor in the negotiations which secured this boon. It is in the highest degree petty on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite and is in the highest degree unfair.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CHARLTON. Is it nice, is it Christian-like, is it generous, is it honourable? It is the exact reverse of all these. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I have very much more to say. I certainly have no reason to feel ashamed of the part I have taken in this matter. I feel more confident of this because hon. gentlemen opposite are reaping the fruits of whatever I may have endeavoured to obtain, and have accepted those fruits without a murmur or question as to whether it was proper to get them. They have accepted them without question as to whether they were advantageous to Canada or not, but they know they are in the highest degree advantageous. They know they would have been false to their trust as custodians of the interests of the people if they had not seized upon the concessions made under the Wilson Bill, for they know that we are getting ten where the Americans are getting one, as regards the advantage gained by this arrangement.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CHARLTON. If hon. gentlemen do not think so, let them abrogate the arrangement and put the duties on again, and see what the country will think of their action. Hon. gentlemen opposite dare not do it. I defy the Government to act consistently with their professions in this matter, consistently with the course followed in condemnation of myself, and repudiate that arrangement, reimpose the export duty on logs, and again put all those articles on the dutiable list. I defy them to do it. If they dare not do it, then their condemnation of me is not fair, is not honourable, is not in accordance with the principles of truth, justice and right, as between man and man.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat must feel proud of himself after the statement he has made. He has stated deliberately in this House of Commons, the deliberative body of Canada, that he, of his own free will, went to the United States and represented himself as a Michigan lumberman in order that he might get advantages for Canada. This has been charged against the hon. gentleman, not only in this House, but throughout the country, and I am using, I hope, a parliamentary term, when I say that he is looked upon as a political humbug. Well, Sir, this charge from this time out cannot be without proof, because, in the statement the hon. gentleman himself made he proved it to the letter. It seems difficult to believe that a man who poses as a Christian politician, as a moralist, who even goes into the house of God and preaches on Sunday, should have said that he is maligned by misrepresentations. The hon. gentleman has said that he misrepresented as to who he was, in order to gain an end for his own advantage.

Mr. CHARLTON. I rise to a point of order. I made no such assertion.

Mr. BENNETT. I certainly, and I believe other hon. gentlemen understood him to say that he led the Secretary of State to believe that he was an American, so that he could better secure the ends he was endeavouring to promote.

Mr. CHARLTON. No. I did not.

Mr. BENNETT. And that if he had gone there as a Canadian he would not have effected his purpose as he did.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Let the hon. gentleman state what he did say.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for North Norfolk denies that he made that statement. The House must accept that denial.

Mr. BENNETT. All I can say is that "Hansard," to-morrow, will prove whether the hon. gentleman said it or not, and I will withdraw it. The hon. gentleman came here to-night, and what did he say? He said that the Wilson Bill as it stood, and the memorial of John Charlton, of Michigan, who, perhaps, may be the hon. member for North Norfolk, or may not be the hon. gentleman, but who was certainly a man who was conspiring against the interests of Canada; and that "Mr. John Charlton, of Michigan," who wrote that memorial—

Mr. CHARLTON. No such representation was made.

Mr. BENNETT. And the man "John Charlton, of Michigan," whether he was or was not the hon. member for North Norfolk; I do not say yea or nay, but I have my own opinion about it, and I think hon. gentlemen have theirs, too. He comes here to-night with a statement that when the Wilson Bill had passed the House of Representatives, and when it was going to the Upper House, that Bill was going to be changed, and that a clause in it that was favourable to Canada, was going to be eliminated. Where is the proof? Why, we have but the bare statement of the hon. gentleman himself, and not even on oath, as an hon. gentleman suggests. Perhaps that would not go much further in this House, because affidavits of the hon. gentleman have been heard here. The hon. gentleman states then that he caused that Bill to be amended and to be changed. Then if he did, he must have been the writer of the memorial which was sent to Secretary of State, Carlisle. Then, if he be the author of that article, I say that he dare not go before the people of Canada and attempt to condone, or attempt to palliate, or attempt to make good the charges that he has made there. Why, Sir, what is his position? Here was a Bill being passed by the House of Representatives of the United States conceding to the people of Canada privileges that they had not previously enjoyed; here was a Bill being passed that would have permitted the people of this country to have imposed prohibitory tariff export duty on white pine logs, and would have permitted other products of the forest to be admitted free to the United States. That would have meant that we could have exported ties, cedar posts, pulp wood, and all these articles that are combined in the wooden schedule free of duty, and at the same time we could have imposed a prohibitory duty on white pine logs, which could only have brought about a return to $1 a thousand duty against Canadian lumber. The people of Canada did not fear a $1 duty on lumber. The lumbermen of Canada had paid $2 duty, and had made money at that, and all that possibly could have resulted would have been a return to the $1 duty on lumber. These most enduring benefits to the people of Canada in respect to these other matters would have been granted; but the man, who was to be vitally struck by that was the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). If the hon. gentleman is loyal to Canadian interests why does he not establish a saw-mill on the north shore? Why does he not afford Canadians and Canadian lumber a chance? The hon. gentleman has not a saw-mill in Canada, but he is engaged in the work of towing Canadian logs into Michigan so that they can be manufactured there. The hon. gentleman is engaged in the business of selling logs to American lumbermen, and therefore he was the man who was to be hurt. It was not the Canadian lumberman that he was fearful for at all.

Mr. CHARLTON. I never sold a log to a Michigan lumberman in my life. I am not in the business of selling logs.

Mr. BENNETT. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that he has not been interested in any way in any logs that have been sold to American lumbermen?

Mr. CHARLTON. I did some years ago sell timber, and that was sent to New York and sold in the Eastern States. I am not engaged in the selling of saw-logs.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman is then perhaps doing a more unpatriotic work. He is towing logs over to the United States and having them cut in American mills. Does the hon. gentleman deny that?

Mr. CHARLTON. No.

Mr. BENNETT. There, the hon. gentleman is more unpatriotic than ever. The position of the whole matter is, that the hon. gentleman has endeavoured to bolster up his position, and yet during this whole debate, there has not been one hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who has stood up in his place and endeavoured to defend the conduct of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). And, Sir, a year ago when this matter was introduced into this House, there was not one gentleman on the other side who even made a colour of defence, to his claims to being considered, as having acted in the interests of Canada. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) is brave in defying the Government to impose an export duty on logs, or to prevent him from shipping his logs to the States so that he can manufacture them in American mills. I congratulate the hon. gentleman on having brought about what he has brought about, because I believe it is due to his efforts. I congratulate him on being in such close union with the American limit owners, Fisher and Alger; for those people whom he has quoted to-day are limit holders on the north shore of the Georgian Bay. These are the men who are attempting to bolster him up and justify him in this country. It is hard on the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) that he has to go outside his own country to get a certificate of character; and that is the position he is reduced to. In my opinion his position is one to be deplored. I may tell hon. gentlemen that this season there are being shipped from the north shores of the Georgian Bay, upwards of four hundred million feet of logs to be manufactured in the United States of America. I claim that that cannot well be prevented to-day, because by reason of the Bill as it stands at present, and by reason of the terms that the hon. gentleman has had incorporated in his Bill; reprisals will follow on the part of the American Government that will tell sorely against the whole Canadian forest products. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) is pleased with what he has done, and if the hon. gentlemen behind him are pleased with what he has done, then all I can say is this: that the hon. gentleman has very little to be satisfied with, and I do not think it will meet with the approval of the electorate of Ontario.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Controller of Customs said he did it himself, and that the hon. member for North Norfolk had nothing to do with it.

Mr. BENNETT. Not at all. The Controller of Customs made no such contention.

Mr. AMYOT. Mr. Speaker. It is very natural that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) should try to explain the position he occupies before this country. I have done my best to understand his explanation. I have done my best to convince myself that in writing to Washington he was looking after the interests of Canada and not his own interests in the United States. I must say, however, that I am not yet convinced, and I do not think that taking his whole record there is anything in it to convince me of his loyalty to Canada. I do not intend giving much of my own impressions, but I think I should lay before the House, and give the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) an opportunity for explaining, a certain document which he no doubt remembers. Before doing so, I will tell the hon. gentleman, how we humble members in this House, understood the position he took when he said in his communication to the United States' authorities "it is respectfully submitted that this proviso should read as follows:"—Then he says how the proviso should read, and he continues:

Should this proviso be inserted, it will inevitably prevent the imposition of the export duty by the Canadian Government.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, that is trying to teach the people at Washington, what they should do to take away from the Canadian Government its full liberty of action. That statement cannot be understood otherwise. He says to Washington, do this and you will tie the hands of Canada. In whose interest was that? The hon. gentleman will tell us himself. He says:

It is that provision which the entire lumber trade in Michigan, Ohio and New York, dependent more or less upon the Canadian supply for logs, is anxious to be inserted in the Bill.

Here is an hon. member of this House going to Washington without disclosing the fact that he is a Canadian and that he has sworn allegiance to Queen Victoria and to his country, any saying to the United States Congress, in the interest of the lumber trade in three of the states you should insert such a proviso in your tariff, and in that way you will prevent Canada acting as the interests of Canada demands. This position I cannot yet understand. If the hon. gentleman was acting in his interest as a lumberman in the United States, he was acting against the interests of Canada or a great part of Canada; and if he was acting as a Canadian, he was deceiving the Government of the United States in not disclosing the fact that he was a Canadian and a sworn subject of Her Majesty Queen Victoria. I say that in acting thus he acted, I will not say dishonestly, but not fairly or openly or manly, and he succeeded in tying the hands of the Canadian Government. He is trying to explain now that what he did was in the interest of Canada. I say whether or not his action was in the interest of Canada, it was not a straightforward one, and one dictated by his duty as a member of this House. But, Mr. Speaker, this was not the first time that the hon. gentleman forgot his duty to his country and even to his party. I hold in my hand a letter—I hope it will not be torn while I hold it—which I will read in order to give the hon. gentleman an opportunity of explaining it. It was written in 1866, when the hon. gentleman was living in the States. He had come to Canada, and had met some volunteers coming back from the Fenian Raid.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are you sure it was not from the North-west ?

Mr. AMYOT. No, it was not from the North-west the hon. gentleman was coming, and I will tell you why : because in 1885, in the North-west expedition the Government did their best to send only men who were loyal to the Queen. Having gone back to the States, the hon. gentleman wrote to a paper in Tonawanda as follows :—

Your correspondent happened to be in Paris, C.W., on the 19th inst. (June, 1866) ; heard music, saw flags, civilians, military, &c. ; inquired what was going on ; found that volunteer picnic was in progress, and concluded to stay and see the show.

Six companies of volunteers, numbering about 300 men, in the Canadian uniform of black coats, with ridiculously short tails, and dark gray pants, excessively large in the rear, just below the waist band, were the guests in whose honour the spread was made.

The grounds where the tables were spread, and the stands for the speakers and music erected, were in the beautiful valley of Grand River, just below the Buffalo and Lake Huron bridge. The day was all that could be desired, sunshine and a fresh, bracing breeze, contributing to the enjoyment of the crowd of hilarious and self-satisfied Canucks.

The proceedings were inaugurated by a battalion drill of the warriors. Your correspondent knows very little of military tactics, but is decidedly of the opinion that the six companies of volunteers aforesaid got slightly tangled several times, and had not a very clear conception of what they were trying to do. They formed hollow squares, for the purpose of repelling cavalry (one of Colonel Booker's strong points, I believe, when resisting an enemy without horses), but got their squares so solid that moving arms was next to an impossibility. After going through various evolutions, the arms were stacked and the volunteers invited to the stand to hear the order granting them permission to return to their homes read. The reading was performed by a tall, amateur military man, rejoicing in the title of major, whose legs were long enough to enable him to keep up with the fastest member of the Queen's Own, if it ever became necessary to try, and whose coat-tails were not long enough to impede his progress in the least.

After reading the order, and what I took to be an address from the officers, complimenting

Canada on her loyalty, progress, and self-sacrificing devotion to British connection, and the volunteers on their soldierly qualities, patriotism, courage, virtue, fighting, height, weight, &c., the chairman introduced the Rev. Wm. Ryerson, ex-M.P.P., who made a speech by way of grace before dinner. The speech of the rev. gentleman was a very fine specimen of buncombe and bombast, and contained not a solitary acknowledgment to the United States for faithfully performing treaty obligations, and all the duties of international comity, in suppressing the contemplated Fenian invasion. The crowd, who stood openmouthed, imbibing the sentiments of the venerable oracle, was informed that Canada had the finest volunteer force in the world, who had just gained a great victory, by repulsing and driving back the Fenian hordes, which a professedly friendly nation had permitted to attack them ; that their institutions were immeasurably superior to the ultra-democracy of the United States, and that Canada was to become, through the agency of confederation, one of the greatest powers of the earth ; had demonstrated to the world and all mankind her ability to take care of all Fenian hordes, and with the assistance of Britannia—that Goliath among the nations—to repulse and drive back, in ignominy and disgrace, if need be, that greatest nation in all creation which they had for a neighbour.

After the speech of the Rev. gentleman, the volunteers partook of the repast provided for them by the ladies of Paris, which I presume was a bountiful one, though I did not inspect the tables.

Dinner over, speaking became the order of the day, and the clergymen of Paris, in rotation, ventilated their sentiments. The rev. gentlemen are good on buncombe ; one, however, the Rev. Mr. Robertson, did get off a few sensible ideas, which refreshingly varied the monotony of claptrap and self-laudation. He had the hardihood to assert that it would not be improper to inquire whether Ireland did not labour under grievance, and to doubt whether the tenure by which land was held and the fact that a state church was forced upon an unwilling people, was just the thing.

In all the speeches made, I did not notice a word of acknowledgment for the course taken by the United States. All the changes were rung on the repulsion of the Fenians ; the fact that they gained one victory, and left without being repulsed, was not mentioned.

The self-glorification and elation over the glorious demonstration of power and patriotism made by Canada certainly appeared, to an onlooker, like wasting a good deal of powder on a small amount of game ; and the studious avoidance of any allusion to the United States, except in tones of insult and disparagement, by the small fry who figured as orators on the occasion, is, I presume, an indication of the tone of public men and of the press in Canada, who will now attempt to counteract annexationist tendencies by misrepresenting the United States and sowing the seeds of bitterness and hostility in the minds of the people. Perhaps they may succeed, for the masses in Canada are not remarkable for intelligence.

The hon. member for North Norfolk has been charged with having written that letter. I am told that he once tore the letter when it was presented to him, but the fragments were collected, and it has been published again. He has not denied having written that letter, and it certainly looks very much like his own ideas of love for the United States and sacrifice of Canada for the States. He represents the volunteers of Canada as a set of laughable young men, badly clothed, and praising themselves without any reason for glory that they did not win; and he gives of this country a description that is far from flattering. He says to the Americans that our people do not recognize their duties as good neighbours. He tries to foment bad sentiments between the two countries, and he winds up with this remarkable sentence "the masses in Canada are not remarkable for intelligence." It is not only the masses in Canada who are not remarkable for their intelligence. He wrote something else once. He said: "With a French Catholic leader, and under the manipulation of such unscrupulous politicians as J. D. Edgar, I have not the greatest confidence in the immediate future of the Reform party." With such allies as the hon. preacher—I beg pardon, I mean the hon. member—with allies who sacrifice the interests they have sworn to protect for the interests of American lumbermen, with allies who despise the whole Canadian people, with allies who despise their own chief, hon. gentlemen opposite may introduce hundreds of Bills of morality but they will never have a chance of reaching office.

Mr. TISDALE. I cannot allow this debate to close, after the shape it has taken, without offering a few remarks. I had hoped that the hon. member for North Norfolk who represents, in the Liberal interest, a part of the county from which I come and in which I was born, would have allowed the episode that has been discussed to-day to have remained in oblivion. It would have been wise for him and well for Canada had he done so. The conduct of the hon. gentleman has met the condemnation, not only of the Conservative party, but of the best elements of the Liberal party. It has met the condemnation of the better portion of the press of the Liberal party. I had hoped to be able to keep silent on this question, but after listening to the debate, my duty to my native county compels me, as its representative and a Canadian, to rise in my place and give expression to my opinion in this matter. Until to-day nothing would have convinced me that the hon. gentleman would not have allowed the mistake he made—to use a mild expression—to lie in oblivion and be forgotten. Representing one-half of that county, the other half of which is represented by the hon. gentleman, and that county, which, in its early days, was peopled by the fathers of this country—the U. E. Loyalists—I preferred to accept the explanation of the hon. gentleman and allow oblivion to cover the mistake which he made. But now that he voluntarily, and not only voluntarily, but aggressively brings the matter up, and invites the expression of our opinion, the case is different. I am quite willing to agree, as I have frequently stated outside the House, that in the Reform party there are men as sincerely loyal, as willing to defend the institutions of their country, as can be found any where, and I feel all the more pained to have to rise here and break the silence I have hitherto maintained. But I feel that did I not rise now to express my view of the part the hon. gentleman has played, the charges could be brought against me that I had no reply to make. Now, in case the House may not have noticed it, I think it proper to call attention to this point. In my early parliamentary experience, whether from proper forbearance or from unwise diffidence in expressing my views, I did not speak aggressively in opposition to the hon. gentleman, feeling that, as our county of Norfolk was divided between one Liberal and one Conservative representative, it was right not to insist too strongly upon differences where such a course could be consistently avoided. I may have been wrong sometimes in not expressing my views, when my views did not agree with those of the hon. gentleman. But I want the hon. gentleman and the House to understand that when I talk in this House or out of it, I speak what I believe. I may be mistaken, and I may not be able to express my views properly, but I would have it understood that there is sincerity behind what I say. But when great questions arise, when not to speak would seem a dereliction of duty, I have spoken my mind with sincerity. As to the discussion that has now arisen, I am satisfied that the hon. gentleman has been well answered from this side of the House, and I am satisfied that his colleagues behind him feel that he has been well answered. Let me read from one of the sincere journals of this Dominion, the editor of which is one of my acquaintances. And I want to say here, as I have said in other places, that I believe that in the sincere and honest expression of its opinion the Montreal "Witness" will be recognized. Some hon. gentlemen about me may feel that I give too high praise to this journal; but, though its editor and I differ in our opinions on many things as widely as men can differ, I believe that he is sincere even when I think him mistaken. I do not wish to discuss this question with regard to the hon. member for North Norfolk, and it is only in the performance of an unpleasant duty that I read from the "Witness" of the 14th of June, 1894, after this whole question had been discussed, its opinion of the hon. gentleman's action. A large part of the article is devoted to this side of the House, by no means in a complimentary strain. Discussing the position of the hon. gentleman, the editor says:—

Mr. Charlton explains that his purpose in suggesting legislation by the United States Congress which would prevent the Dominion Government from imposing export duties upon logs was to secure the continuance of the reciprocal relations which have proved so advantageous to both countries. We have no doubt whatever that Mr. Charlton was sincere in this purpose and not consciously moved by self-interest. At the same time, his course is not one that can be defended; it was a mistaken one. Canadians, and especially Canadian legislators, are bound to secure Canadian interests by the exercise of the self-governing powers within their own country, and not by placing in the hands of another country, a knowledge of the means by which Canada can be coerced even for her own good.

I have nothing to add to that. I wish to conclude my remarks by a short reference to the recollections stirred by the words that fell from my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot). I was one of those badly clothed Canadians at Paris. I was clothed in the rifle green with which Britain has clothed her soldiers, as they carried civilization and Christianity throughout the whole world. I was captain of a company, and when I marched from Simcoe, I was a younger man than I am to-day. I left a wife, and almost every man in the ranks of my company was called upon to say farewell to wife and child. We did not march away upon that occasion to be ridiculed by such as the hon. gentleman. I speak as an old man now, but this brings up the same emotions that we felt that day. We felt that, in all probability, some of us who were leaving home that day, would never see home and friends again. The man who talks about Canadians who performed their duty in the way this hon. gentleman talks is not the man who ought to be in a Canadian legislature, and I repudiate such statements as the hon. gentleman made, not only on behalf of the South Riding, which is Conservative, but on behalf of the North Riding, which is Reform. For, faithful as the people there have been to him, if they are satisfied that he holds these views they will repudiate him also. Why? Because, in the very ranks that marched to his ridicule from the township of Townsend that gives him a majority of 500, were two companies made up of Reformers and Conservatives together, showing that in this rifle green clothing that he ridicules, members of the two political parties march together at the call of their country. We were not regular soldiers; you could not hire the men in those ranks to go as regular soldiers. But they required no hiring and no pay, when their sentiments as Canadians were aroused and when they realized that the institutions of their country were in danger. I remember how the sun shone that day, and how all looked fair about us as we left those who were dear to us with the tears running down their cheeks. Hon. gentlemen may laugh and ridicule the sentiments I feel, but God take me from this country and from the world when I am no longer affected by the feelings aroused by recollections such as this.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Further amount required to pay for expenses of revision of the voters' list... $40,000

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Perhaps the Minister would afford us some information as to why this additional $40,000 is required.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman was present when, at the last sitting of the House, I made an explanation with regard to that item. However, I shall be very glad to make it again. It is to cover the balance of the cost of revision during the past year. As the hon. gentleman, of course, understands, these items are for the current year. The list was revised last year, and the vote placed in the Estimates for the purpose was $200,000. At the time it was felt by the Queen's Printer, who made a report upon the subject, that, while he would try very hard to keep the cost within the vote, at the same time he feared it would not be possible to do so. As to the cost of the whole revision, in giving an answer some time ago, I was misled in two or three figures. The sum paid already to the revising barristers is $148,000; the sum still due the revising barristers is about $12,000, that is, upon the regular pay of those officers. In one or two cases, as I explained at the last sitting, there are small claims—I think, in not over three cases—made by the revising barristers as to some extras due them on account of the difficulty of travelling peculiar to their constituencies. These amounts, however, are very small, and I have advised the Auditor General to deal with them upon some fair basis, and to settle them. The preliminary lists have always been printed outside of the bureau, and, I may say, at a uniform rate; but outside the printing of these preliminary lists, there was paid for printing $35,000. The printing of the lists at Ottawa, together with the printing of some of the final electoral lists for the cities of Toronto and Montreal, which were printed in outside offices, cost about $40,000, making a total of about $235,000. It is estimated by the Queen's Printer that this $40,000, in addition to the vote of last year, will cover the whole expenditure.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. Minister has answered only in part what I was seeking to find out, because, remembering the answer he had given as to the cost of this, I was led to inquire why he asked for $40,000 additional.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That arose from an error in the figures which were given to my department by the Queen's Printer, who misunderstood what was wanted.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Because the Minister will remember that the question was as to the total cost, and as to the unascertained cost, and the figure he gave was $195,000.

Mr. MONTAGUE. This is the way it occurred. The question was asked by my department of the Queen's Printer, what the amount paid out for printing had been. The Queen's Printer thought that the officer who asked him for the information only referred to the amount which had actually been paid out to newspaper offices outside the bureau, and the answer they gave him did not include the cost of printing here at Ottawa, which was a little over $40,000.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I understand the Minister's explanation, and it is a little unsatisfactory in one respect. When a question of this kind is asked, What is the entire cost of revising the Dominion voters' lists, if the total cost is not yet fully ascertained, how much of it is ascertained, and what is the estimate of the Government as to the unascertained cost? when an answer is given as explicitly as it was by the Minister, it is accepted by the press and by the House as a total amount, and it has gone out to the country a month ago that the revision of the voters' lists does not cost so much as was represented at the time, that it does not cost more than $200,000. Now we find that it is $240,000. But the idea is abroad and the country is under the impression that the cost is less than $240,000. It is unfortunate that answers should be given in this way. In reference to the cost of the Royal Commission on the Liquor Traffic, I think the House has been given two or three varying amounts.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Over the amount.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Over or under, I cannot tell which. When you give varying answers, we are at a loss to know which is correct. I mention this because I think that when a question is asked like this, if anything like a definite answer can be given, it should be given; and, if not, it should be made sufficiently clear that more is to follow. Now, I understand that this $40,000 will complete the total amount required.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think the hon. gentleman has some reason to find fault, although the erroneous statement was made unintentionally. This vote covers everything. The revision of the list will cost $240,000.

Mr. McMULLEN. What percentage of the printing was done in Ottawa, and what outside?

Mr. MONTAGUE. All of what we call the final electoral lists were printed in the bureau, with the exception of the lists of Toronto and Montreal. The hon. gentleman will see that all the preliminary lists, as already explained, are printed in the constituencies, but no final lists, except those of Montreal and Toronto.

Mr. McMULLEN. I want to know the value of the work done in the bureau and the work done outside.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

Mr. MONTAGUE. I gave the figures to the hon. member for South Brant. It cost $40,000 for the inside printing, and $35,000 for the outside printing. I have not the figures by me at the moment, but if the hon. gentleman will turn to the answer I gave when the item was up the other day, and which was absolutely correct, he will see that the item paid for printing the final lists outside was a very small one.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Minister says $35,000 was paid for outside printing which was done in Montreal and Toronto. Now, if it costs $35,000 to print the lists for Montreal and Toronto—

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. He forgets that every constituency first has a preliminary list printed. The final lists for all the constituencies were printed outside the bureau, and the cost of those lists for the 215 constituencies is included in the $35,000, as well as the final lists for Toronto and Montreal.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. What is the amount allowed for the printing of the preliminary lists?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Three cents a name, and 50 cents for the heading of the polling sub-divisions. That rate was adopted some years ago, and has not been changed.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I do not quite understand how the book-keeping is done in your department. You say about $40,000 was paid for printing in the bureau. Do you credit the bureau with printing the names at the same rate that you allow to outside offices? Does that go to the credit of the expense account for working the bureau, and to the debit of the wages? In other words, does the bureau pay its own expenses? Is there sufficient work done to pay all the employees and the expenditure connected with it? If so, is what you credit it for work done on the voters' list, done at the same rate as you pay outside offices?

Mr. MONTAGUE. As to the manner in which the bureau is run, I may say that it is run purely as a business concern, and on business principles, and the instructions of the department to the Queen's Printer are to run it absolutely as he would run his own private business.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). And make it pay?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes. The matter to which attention has been called is a matter of book-keeping. Each department gets supplies from the Stationery Department and Queen's Printer, and these are charged against each department. As to the lists, I think the price mentioned is the absolute cost of printing them; I am not sure about that however.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Minister no doubt understands that in the Printing Bureau there is an immense quantity of type kept constantly standing for the purposes of the voters' list. Is there any account taken of the money invested in that enormous quantity of type ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. There is no interest account kept. The lists are kept standing, and that is the system adopted by South Australia, Queensland, Victoria, New South Wales and New Zealand. I have no estimate of the quantity of type kept standing but of course it is very large.

Mr. McMULLEN. My object was to ascertain if an interest account was kept. If not, the prices charged for labour do not represent anything like the actual cost.

Mr. MONTAGUE. No Government keeps such an account. For example, it would not do to charge the interest on these buildings, against legislation.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. When the Printing Bureau, was established, it was proposed to print the lists there, and a large amount of money was invested in type for the purpose of having the lists kept set up continuously from one revision to another. Now, the Government have adopted a different system. At first the lists were printed entirely at the bureau, and outside printers had nothing whatever to do with the work. Since then, when revisions have taken place, the Government have seen fit to have the preliminary lists printed at offices throughout the country in the different ridings where the revision has taken place. According to figures given by the Secretary of State, the preliminary lists cost $35,000, while the printing of the final lists at the bureau cost $40,000. It will thus be seen that the preliminary lists cost within $5,000 of the final lists. If the preliminary lists were printed in the bureau, the type would not have to be re-set for all the changes made. As occurs now the type is set in the country printing offices where the preliminary lists are printed and these lists are sent to the bureau and re-set there; so the printing actually costs almost double that which it would cost if the system which the Government proposed when it invested in the Printing Bureau was followed, or at all events there would be a saving of one-quarter. Undoubtedly a large sum of money is wasted in having the lists printed outside and re-printed in the bureau. Could not something be done to change this system ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. In reply to the remarks of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Somerville), who is a practical printer, I may say that the difficulty lies in the time allowed between the preliminary lists being prepared and the time when those lists had to be corrected. There are very many of such lists, and after all they do not affect the lists standing in block for the final list. The preliminary lists are not the whole lists; they include a certain number of names which are to be put on, added or subtracted from other lists. I have discussed the whole matter with the Queen's Printer, and he tells me that he was given carte blanche to do what he believed to be cheapest in that regard, and he adopted the present system.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understood the Secretary of State to say that only a small number of names were printed at the outside offices.

Mr. MONTAGUE. As compared with the total names.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not quite follow the hon. gentleman. I understand the cost was three cents per name. If the preliminary list cost $35,000 or thereabouts, that rate would be sufficient for about one million voters.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman must remember there is the heading for each polling sub-division for which 50 cents are allowed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That would not amount to a very large sum, even allowing 20 or 30 sub-divisions for each constituency. The great bulk of payment must be for names, and if $30,000 are required, it is quite clear that the preliminary lists must comprise the bulk of the voters, as $30,000 is sufficient to meet the expense of one million voters at 3 cents per name. This fact materially strengthens the contention of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Somerville), that a good deal of money is wasted in dividing this work between outside offices and the bureau here.

Mr. HUGHES. In connection with the preliminary lists, I think, the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Somerville), if he considers the matter, will see that it would be a very expensive method to have the preliminary lists printed at the bureau here. The preliminary lists are made up of three separate lists; a list with the names to be added, a list with names to be removed and a list of names to be corrected. Suppose these preliminary lists were set up here and the type kept standing, that would be of very little advantage to the printer because he would have to come along and pick up the line and place it in its proper place in the final list. I am satisfied, from having had experience in printing both the preliminary and final lists, that this would lead to endless confusion and endless mistakes. It is quite possible that a much large number of names might appear on the preliminary lists than on the final list. There are, as I have said, three classes of lists. There is a list of names to be added, nearly all of which would be added, then there is a list of names to be removed, many of which would be removed ; then there is a list of corrections, all of which would appear in the final list. It would lead to endless confusion if these preliminary lists were printed at the bureau. In my county, for example, if the revising officer experiences any difficulty, he can easily consult some one in the immediate locality and settle the matter finally. Ultimately the final list is printed at the bureau here and is easily done.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Hughes) evidently did not understand what I meant to convey, which was that a very large saving might be effected if the whole of the lists were printed in the counties where the lists are made up. I have no doubt that a large sum of money would be saved in doing so, because when the preliminary lists are set up in the country offices the names are ready to be inserted in the final list. When it comes here to the bureau all these names have to be re-set. I contend that the Government would save money if they had the preliminary and final lists printed in the offices outside.

Mr. HUGHES. The only difficulty in that respect is, that it would require a larger amount of type than many of the outside offices have at their disposal. In every other respect the statement is correct.

Mr. COSTIGAN. That experiment was tried once. The first list was printed under the superintendence of the Auditor General and the whole printing was done outside and amounted to about $180,000. When the work was entrusted to the Queen's Printer, this plant was purchased and the final list was published in the bureau. The saving of cost on that in one year was equal to the cost of the whole plant employed in the printing the final lists in the bureau.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The Minister forgets that the payment for the first list was at the rate of 12 cents a name, and they only allow 3 cents now. The Government wanted to give the country printers a benefit when they paid them 12 cents.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have no doubt that what my hon. friend (Mr. Somerville) suggests would be very popular among the newspapers, but as to this whole question the Queen's Printer—whom hon. gentlemen opposite will admit is a good business man, and who runs the bureau as a business man—says that the method adopted now is the most economical. I discussed the subject with him and that is his opinion.

To pay Hugh Sutherland, late M.P. for Winnipeg, balance of sessional indemnity, 1886 $469

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not know much about the merits of this matter, but whether it be well founded or illfounded, a very strong case ought to be made out in its favour, and a strong protest ought to be entered against allowing claims which have not been put forward for nine or ten years, being presented to us. I can conceive nothing more improper than allowing eight or ten years, and as we have seen in old times, thirteen or fourteen years, to elapse, before accounts are rendered to the Government. We should have some explanation why this claim is brought forward at such a late date. On what possible grounds are we asked to pay this money, and what is the justification for it?

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not know that I should attempt to give the hon. gentleman a justification for this claim further than this: In my opinion claims for sessional indemnity, inasmuch as that the sessional indemnity is statutory, are always exigible until they are paid. I have taken the ground with regard to other claims of this nature, made within a reasonable period of time—that is one or two years after the session in which the indemnity accrued—that I had the right to authorize the accountant to pay these claims, when the necessary statutory declaration was made. With regard to this particular claim, the facts are as follows:—Mr. Sutherland, in the session of 1886, came to Ottawa in the beginning of the session. He remained here for a certain number of days—fourteen, I think—and I understand he then went to England and did not return until the session was over. Prior to leaving here, he drew the full amount of mileage, and $91 sessional indemnity at the rate of $7 a day. He never made a declaration upon which the accountant could pay him the balance of the indemnity for that session of 1886; but during the year 1893, he did present to me a statutory declaration which under the law would entitle him to the amount now placed in the Estimates. As more than six years had elapsed, I would not undertake to authorize the accountant to pay that sum to Mr. Sutherland, without a vote of Parliament, although I confess that legally, I think, he was entitled to it. An application was, I understand, made by Mr. Sutherland to the Minister of Finance, and the opinion which I held with regard to the indemnity being exigible until it was paid, was, I am informed, confirmed by the Department of Justice. Upon that report the Government placed this amount in the Estimates to pay Mr. Sutherland the sum which he could have obtained at the end of the session of 1886, if he had made the necessary statutory declaration.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The days he was absent are deducted from the sessional allowance?

Mr. SPEAKER. My recollection is that the declaration was made out in the proper statutory form, and the deductions of the days during which he was absent during that session would leave the sum $469 due him.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). If I understand Mr. Speaker aright, a member is entitled to full sessional indemnity, less the number of days absent upon which the House has sat ?

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I thought it had been ruled that a member should be here thirty days.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No ; the thirty days refers to the session.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the statute is clear upon that point, and my own opinion with regard to it has been confirmed by the Department of Justice.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is understood that we agree to this on the score that it is, as Mr. Speaker represents, a fair debt, and that he, in his capacity as an officer of the House, will see that it is so.

To pay O. Durocher and J. O. Durocher for the privilege and authority to manufacture and to use in connection with the Dominion elections a certain invention described in the Patent of Canada, No. 30784 as "Ballot slip"..... $2,500

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Has this ballot slip been made use of yet ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, in the late by-elections.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Was it used in Antigonish ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, and in Verchères.

Mr. LAURIER. It was also used in Quebec West, and it lost the election to the man who had the majority of votes.

Mr. FRASER. I would suggest that the Government should see, before the election takes place, that the same kind of ballot paper is used all over the Dominion.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There was nothing wrong in the Antigonish papers, was there ?

Mr. FRASER. There may have been nothing wrong in the papers, because the voters were right. But I see no reason why all the ballots could not be prepared here, where they ought to be prepared. I can see that the printing might have to be done elsewhere, but the paper should be uniform all over the Dominion, so that there would be no chance of anything wrong being done in that respect by any of the returning officers.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There is a law on the statute-book, which was passed last session, at the instance of the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), regulating the form of the ballot. It is impossible to have the ballots printed here, owing to the short space of time between the nomination and polling. As to the paper, I will discuss that with the Queen's Printer ; but I understand that that is regulated by statute.

Mr. FRASER. The paper should be uniform, otherwise the party in power might use paper that would give them an advantage.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, that would be a violation of the law.

Mr. FRASER. Then, the law is violated every day.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What is the nature of the paper ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The main portion is black, and there is a round space in white opposite the name of each candidate, in which the elector is instructed to mark the cross.

Mr. LAURIER. This ballot was introduced by the Act of last session, and the first result of its use does not conduce to the opinion that it is an improvement on the old system. There is this much to be said for the old system, that the people understood it. We had four or five general elections under it, it was tested in the courts, and the people came to understand it thoroughly. In one of the elections held under the new system, the ballot acted so as to lose the election to one of the candidates who had a majority of the votes, because some of the electors had marked their ballots according to the old way. I understand that according to the law, the cross has to be made in the blank space.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Some of the electors, instead of making the mark in the circle opposite the name of the candidate, made it in the space where the name was printed. Under the rulings of the Supreme Court, these are good ballots. In my riding some of them were unfortunately counted against me.

Mr. LANGELIER. A good many of the voters, instead of putting their cross in the blank space intended for it, put it in the space under or over the name of the candidate. It was understood when the law was passed in the House last year that the cross would be put only in the blank space provided for that purpose, and the deputy returning officer in Quebec West understood the matter just as it had been understood in this House. When the recount took place, the judge adopted the ruling of the different courts, and decided that the ballots in which the crosses were made outside of the blank space, that is, at any other place which would have been good formerly, would be good now. The law was clearly understood that in whatever place the cross was made, provided it was quite clear for which of the candidates the elector intended to vote, the ballot would be counted. With the ruling given by the court of Quebec, this new ballot paper is perfectly useless, because the law is going to be exactly as it was before.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think that the decision of the court in Quebec is that the marking of the cross within the disc is directory, and not mandatory, and it seems to me that there is a good deal to be said in favour of that view, because otherwise a man who marked his ballot with the intention of voting for a particular candidate and who marked it in such a way as to leave no doubt as to the party for whom he intended to vote, if he marked it outside the disc, according to one hon. member he would lose his vote, and, according to another hon. member he would be entitled to have his vote counted. Generally, we interpret the law in favour of the voter, and not against him.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think the Act is pretty explicit on that point. The argument that prevailed with the House was the satisfactory working of this form of ballot in the municipal elections in some of the Ontario districts. In Ottawa, they have that sort of ballot. It was not laid down in the Act as obligatory to make the cross inside that circle, though that was part of the directory section of the Act; but it was supposed there would be less difficulty on the part of the nervous and uninformed elector in finding the proper place to put his mark. If the mark were put in the division where the candidate's name was, it would still hold good, though it was not inside the white portion; and I think all the advantage gained was that while, as in the old ballot, if the mark were found in the division, it would still count, this white circle would attract greater attention.

Mr. LAURIER. The result of the Quebec election showed that really the best system would have been to adhere to our old system, although that was not perfect. The people had become accustomed to it, and some of them made their mark in the division. The judge ruled his ballots out, but I am not prepared to agree with the construction he put upon the law, because I think those ballots should have been allowed.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. So do I.

Mr. LAURIER. But the judge thought differently. If you allow the cross to be placed in any part of the division, what is the use of the new ballot. I quite understand that the idea was to bring the attention of the illiterate electors to this white disk, but it was found in Quebec that they marked the ballots according to the old method. In so doing, their ballots were legal, according to the construction of the

Mr. LANGELIER.

Minister of Justice, but illegal according to the judge, and the result is confusion worse confounded.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It would be impossible to construct an Act that would be similarly construed everywhere by everybody.

Mr. LAURIER. It may be that I am too much of a Conservative, and adhere to the old form.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Is it a sufficient improvement on the old ballot to make it worth the amount of money we are asked to pay. I do not see that it is any great advantage. There is apparently no great genius displayed in its invention, and I object strongly to the grant of so much money for a form of ballot which has no greater advantage over the old one than this. It has been clearly shown that in practical use it is of very little advantage. Any official could have quite easily suggested the idea, if it was found in practice that the electors were liable to make mistakes under the old form. The patent would not hold against Parliament. There is no legal obligation, and the only thing which can justify this expenditure is the recognition of the great genius who did the work.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not think that no matter what view the House might take of the merits of this ballot, they would agree that we should ignore the claim of the patentee. It is quite clear that we were under no obligations to pay the patentee anything for the adoption of this invention, but Parliament decided, without any question, that it was worthy of adoption. I do not think that the leader of the Opposition would be inclined, from the experience in Quebec, to discard this plan or advocate the repeal of the Act. We cannot escape technical questions being raised with regard to any form of ballot that we may devise. It certainly will not be said that the experience of four elections is sufficient to show that the object we had in view has not been attained. No matter what opinion the House might express now, I do not think, after the decision we came to last session, that we should rely on our technical right of declining to award compensation to the inventor of this idea.

Mr. LAURIER. I think the hon. gentleman was right when he said that the Act last year was passed unanimously. I do not recollect that any objection was taken to it, but neither do I recollect that any mention was then made that this new invention would cost $2,500.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is not a large amount, if it is worth adopting.

Mr. LAURIER. I think that no mention was made at the time the proposal was first suggested—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think the leader of the Government stated the exact amount, and I have sent for "Hansard" to verify my recollection upon that point.

Mr. LAURIER. It may be so, but I am under a different impression. According to my recollection, the Prime Minister stated that the ballot was the invention of Mr. Durocher. But I do not think he stated what it was going to cost the country. Though last year the Act was passed, it was passed unanimously at the end of the session, and perhaps, it did not meet, at that time, with sufficient consideration. The hon. gentleman must agree that we cannot devise a ballot which will be wholly free from the difficulties of working. But I attach great importance to this—that the form of ballot has been known, that it has passed through the courts, and that the courts have established upon it a series of decisions, a system of jurisprudence. Thus the elector knows generally what interpretation is to be put upon the different questions arising, and there is diffused throughout the country a knowledge of what the law is. I would not change the law unless there was in the new system a manifest improvement. This proposal is to substitute another form, which may have its own merits, which merits may not overbear the known and guarded defects of the previous form, and I question if there is any such advantage as is thought in the change. The result of the experience of this year has shown that there has been no improvement in this respect, as proven by the Quebec election. Had that election been held in the old form, what was practically an injustice to the people of Quebec would not have taken place.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think that anybody understood last year, when this matter was discussed, that we were to be asked to buy a simple invention of this kind. I remember the discussion now, and I think the impression made upon the members on this side, and of members generally, was that the invention was some new form of ballot box which was supposed to be capable of protecting the country against fraud, and not a mere slip of paper arranged in a particular fashion. I do not want to exercise our rights too rigorously, but I am bound to say that I think that the sum of $2,500 of public money is a great deal too much to pay for an invention such as this. I do not think it is worth $2,500, or even $1,000. I think the owner would be amply remunerated for the invention, for the exercise of brains and the time occupied, by one-fifth part of that sum. I must say, whatever may have been said at that time. I did not understand that what we were asked to pay for was simply a little bit of paper arranged in a slightly different way from the ballot hitherto in use.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The simpler the invention, very often, the more valuable it is.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think that, in the face of the statement made by the leader of the Opposition, as to the interpretation put upon the law in the province of Quebec, the Minister of Justice ought to propose to amend the law and to provide that the provision for marking the ballot within the disc ought to be directory and not mandatory. It seems to me that if the mark is so placed as to show very clearly for whom the voter intended to record his vote, that that ought to be sufficient. The object of adopting this ballot is not to put the voter in a worse position than he was in before.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am sure the House will allow me to give a reference to the statement made by the late leader of the Government on this point. Last session he mentioned the exact sum, so that I suppose that that will, on this item settle the point. On the 20th July last he said:

The ballot paper is patented. But an arrangement has been made by which, if the Government should choose to use the ballot, we obtain the right to use it for the sum of $2,500. We say that it will be very beneficial to adopt this form of ballot paper throughout Canada for the purpose of preventing the spoiling of ballots.

That is quite in line with the hon. gentleman's contention, and mine, of that clause to which he referred. The Prime Minister went on to explain what we know of this form of ballot. If hon. gentlemen will refer to the Act, they will see that it was not to come into force—that section of it—until a proclamation was made, and that, no doubt, is why the leader of the Government stated that if we decided to adopt this form of ballot, we had agreed to pay. And the proclamation issued shortly before these elections.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You require a short declaratory Act.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, because the Act provided for a proclamation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But the courts construed the clause adversely.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We can't help that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes, you can—by an amendment of the law.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think the leader of the Opposition will not say that we should amend the law because of that decision.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Surely—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. One court is not to control the legislation of this country. I do not think the hon. leader of the Opposition will say that that decision is good law. We agree that it is bad law.

Mr. LAURIER. If the law is such that the judges make it bad, I think we had better amend the law.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This is done every year in the Imperial Parliament. Without waiting to carry the case to the ultimate court, Parliament removes any doubt as to the meaning of the statute by a declaratory Act. Take, for instance, the Kyne case, in which on a material point the court took a view contrary to that Parliament had entertained. Parliament immediately passed a declaratory Act without a single dissenting voice. Surely, it would be better that we should have an Act of half a dozen lines declaring how we understand that the ballot should be marked, rather than have the judges, in perhaps twenty different constituencies, through a misconstruction of the law, disfranchising voters and returning the candidates of the minority.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. With great difference, I differ with the hon. gentleman. Where the law is so clear.—

Mr. LAURIER. Do you call it clear when the judges misinterpret it?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Upon my word, I do not think that we could pass a declaratory Act that would be any clearer than the law as it now stands.

Mr. LAURIER. Better impeach the judge then.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have nothing to do with the judge, nor has the hon. gentleman. At any rate, here is a matter of good faith pending at this stage. I do submit, that if we wish to change that law, this is not the time to discuss the change. That, of course, is most humbly submitted. I submitted a similar opinion the other day, with some confidence, which was not accepted in the proper spirit. But I do say that if hon. gentlemen in this House do not approve of the law as it stands, we cannot in Committee of Supply, certainly with consideration for economy of time, discuss amendments. A few moments ago we discovered from "Hansard" that the House was seized of the fact that $2,500 was agreed upon with the patentee as the consideration for the adoption of that idea, the Government asked power from Parliament to adopt it and we unanimously adopted it. No matter what we may think, and I admit there is a good deal of room for discussion as to the advisability of continuing this, I again submit that so far as that item is concerned we are bound to vote that money and pay it like men. If the hon. gentleman from Bothwell thinks the law ought to be changed, there is a very easy way to do it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman's position. Very frequently casual observations are flung out in the course of debate to which nobody pays attention and cannot be expected to pay attention, until the matter is brought before them in a substantive form. When we are being asked to pay over a disproportionate sum of money for what I regard as an extremely trifling improvement—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. For the sum named at the time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It was not brought down here, and I cannot agree for a moment that a casual statement, whether made by the leader of the House or anybody else in that way, is to be regarded as binding the House to vote public money. It would be a dangerous doctrine to allow to prevail. I never supposed for an instant, from such a statement as the hon. gentleman has read, that we were going to be asked to pay for any such thing as this. I supposed it was for some complicated invention in a ballot box, not a mere modification of the ordinary ballot slip, as I now discover it to be. But whether that be the case or not, I do not think the House should agree that any such statements as the hon. gentleman has quoted can be regarded as binding on the House until the matter is properly submitted to them and discussed. It does appear to me that the late Minister of Justice was under a very grave misconception as to the value of this invention when he agreed to pay any such sum, or promised, which was all he could do, to recommend it to Parliament. All such declarations made by the Government are subject to revision here.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Of course, that is why it is here now.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But the hon. gentleman tells us we are bound to pay it, and that is where I take issue with him. I do not consider myself bound in honour by a casual statement made by any or all the hon. gentlemen as to what the cost of a particular invention may be. I will consider that when a sum of money is brought down in the shape of a distinct vote, I entirely repudiate the idea that because such a statement may have been made at three o'clock in the morning when everybody was asleep, or half asleep, and impatient to get away, and may not have been heard by more than the hon. gentleman, and two or three of his colleagues—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman himself was awake, because I see he spoke before and after this item.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Possibly I may have been, but certainly I did not understand that we were to be asked to pay

$2,500 for any such a thing. I supposed it was for some rather intricate invention having reference to the ballot box, not to the mere slip that was placed in the box.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat must remember that the whole scheme of this ballot was brought down in a Bill which was submitted to every member of the House; so that the hon. gentleman must have had the Bill and must have seen that the change which it was sought to make was not in the machinery of the ballot box, but in the ballot papers. The amount of money which was submitted by the leader of the House at that time was also disclosed to the House. Under the circumstances it seems to me the hon. gentleman must recollect that the Bill was submitted to the House, and the form of the ballot was part and parcel of that Bill, as well as the amount of money which the Government was supposed to pay for it. Although hon. gentlemen have mentioned that one judgment has been rendered indicating that the improvement might not be as considerable as was expected, I say that one judgment would not warrant a change in the legislation on which now controls this matter. The whole thing was disclosed to the House at that time, and the fact that the sum of money needed was disclosed by Sir John Thompson, shows that the Bill was fully discussed and examined by every honest gentleman. It seems to me that under these circumstances we might allow this item to pass.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I observe this matter was brought up on 20th July, and the House rose on the 23rd; in other words, it was brought up at a time when everything was being rushed through at a rate infinitely greater than railway speed, and when there was no opportunity to discuss any of these details properly. I do not see that I took part in the discussion, nor that I was present in that committee.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We sometimes try to get things through when the hon. gentleman is asleep.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We must take care that in Committee of Supply we do not recognize any of these implied promises. The money has not been paid, I presume.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That was not in Committee of Supply, that was in Committee on the Act.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I know that, but the point is this, that in Committee of Supply we are not bound, I think, to recognize any statement of this kind. What the Minister pledged himself to, I think, was to recommend the payment of that sum to Parliament. So far, I am with the Minister of Justice; but I do not think it was quite proper to say that the Opposition should be held as concurring in any statement of that kind until we have had an opportunity of discussing it properly.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think there is not much difference between us. We do not say that until this vote is passed we are bound to pay one dollar, and Mr. Durocher could not recover a sixpence without the sanction of Parliament. All we do say is that we came to you with the Bill; we told you we were going to adopt a certain form of ballot, and we said that if this section was proclaimed according to the provision of that Bill, we had agreed to pay the sum of $2,500 for the use of it. Now, then, it is only to strengthen the claim for the $2,500 that we mention the fact that Parliament raised no objection to that Bill passing in that form. But having taken power to proclaim a clause in the Bill, and having said that we as a Government intended to pay the money if we proclaimed it, subject, of course, to an appropriation being made by Parliament, then I say that when we come the next session for the money, the House is morally bound to pay it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No; I cannot admit it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Well, in all common fairness, bound to pay that amount. We submit that at any rate the committee has the facts.

Mr. FRASER. I am bound to agree with the last statement of the Minister of Justice. I can understand that the Act, having been discussed and agreed upon, we are now not in a position to say that we will not pay the amount in question. There is, however, another point to which I wish to draw attention. The Act should be changed so that the mark must be made within the circular disk. If the Act is worth adopting, it should be made specific. This is necessary, I think, in view of the judgment given in the province of Quebec, which I hold is not correct. This Act should also be educative in its effects and be so framed that the people will rapidly learn its mode of operation. One of the troubles with the old Act was that it took some time for the people to learn its provisions. If the Act was amended so that the mark must be made only in one place, members of Parliament and the agents of the different parties would see that the people understood it; and once they understood it there would be no such difficulty as now prevails. I know a little about this matter in connection with the election in Antigonish, for I know how it worked there.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It worked very well.

Mr. FRASER. Not only because the electors understood how they ought to vote, as far as principles were concerned, but also so far as the ballot was concerned. There would be much less trouble if the Act was made imperative, although I can see some difficulties that might arise.

Mr. FLINT. Is this a final payment?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, in full of all claims.

Mr. RIDER. Is this invention a patentable one?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. RIDER. If so, where does the method of voting differ from the old voting, for the voter places his cross opposite the name, as before? It seems to be a matter of changing white to black, or black to white. I should like to have the opinion of the Minister of Justice as to whether this is really a patentable invention. If not, the committee should not vote $2,500 for an article that is not patentable.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am afraid my opinion on such a question is not worth very much. The patent was issued on the novelty of the idea, that being much considered worthy of a patent, and I suppose there is the best warrant for granting a patent in the fact that no sooner had the patentee obtained his letters than the Parliament of this country unanimously incorporated the idea in an Act of Parliament. The idea was that this white disk would attract particular attention; and I considered if there is any way in which you can appeal to the smallest particle of intelligence possessed by any voter, it is by this form of ballot. It was intended to change the old law, but it was hoped that the disk with the instructions would point out to the voter the limits to which he would be safe in putting his cross. That was the idea, and the very simplicity of a suggestion is often reason for commending the idea to the Department of Agriculture in considering the inventive genius of an applicant for letters patent.

Mr. RIDER. The method of voting under this system is the same as under the old. There is no new idea embodied in the invention—it is merely a matter of printers' ink, the position of the cross requiring to be made within the disc. I fail to see where there is any patentable idea, and if not, surely the Minister of Justice will not say that the Committee are bound to purchase it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is no question about that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As the member who took objection to this item, I desire to say that I was not aware at the time the

Mr. FRASER.

Act was introduced that any amount was stated as one which would be expected to be voted. While I will not admit that the House was bound by that statement, at the same time I must agree to this extent that the House, having been made aware that if it adopted this invention a certain amount would be expected to be paid, that promise should, in all fairness, be kept. This shows that the House was very careless in placing this power in the hands of the Government. I believe, as do many members of the committee, that the suggestion is really not worth anything like the amount asked; but, under the circumstances, that amount having been mentioned and the Government having been entrusted with the duty of exercising discretion in the matter, I for one will be willing to abide by the decision.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The immense value of having a ballot paper which would afford the least possible opportunity for making mistakes is obvious, and no doubt it weighed with the House in adopting this method now under consideration. The judgment given in the province of Quebec shows that in the opinion of the judge the ballot paper was valueless. I call the attention of the hon. member for Guysboro' to the fact that nearly a month ago I introduced a Bill, which is now waiting its second reading, having for its object the carrying out of the idea of adopting the ballot paper and providing explicitly that the ballot must be marked within the disc. Judging from the Order paper, I think I shall be obliged to ask the Minister of Justice to take charge of the Bill, as private Bills will have little chance of getting through this session. We cannot go to another election with such a judgment as now stands recorded in the province of Quebec, the effect of which is that, although we adopted the new ballot paper with a disc on it, the ballot can be marked within the square where the name is as well as within the disc where it is intended to be placed.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I call the attention of the Minister of Justice to a case recently decided where with respect to certain patterns made with paper it was decided that they might be matters for copyright, could not be matters for patent. I think the Minister will find that the rule in a case recorded in 1894, and that this rule is applicable to this case.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That was not under our Act.

Mr. McMULLEN. It appears to me that this is merely a change from a square to a circle, and I cannot see how the Commissioner of Patents ever gave it a patent. We should have some explanation from him as to why he patented this, before we vote this large sum of $2,500 to use it. I cannot see that the House is committed to this vote on the argument presented by the Minister of Justice. The Government assumed the responsibility of contracting a debt, and the House has a perfect right to say now whether it shall vote this money or not. We are at liberty to criticise this ballot and the payment for it. In my opinion it is an absurd invention and there is no genius at all displayed in it.

To pay the Hon. Mr. Sullivan the amount absence through illness in the session of 1894 $152

Mr. McMULLEN. I question the propriety of introducing this system. This I presume is to enable Senator Sullivan to receive pay while he was at home, and if you commence to do this in one case you will have to extend it to others, and after a while you will have one-half the Senators remaining at home.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). But they will have to be sick.

Mr. McMULLEN. Well, they may be sick, and they will claim their pay on the same grounds as Senator Sullivan claims it. The Senators should be made to comply with the Act, and if they are not able to, we should not pay them.

Mr. DENISON. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) is quite correct about this item. For instance, Sir David McPherson is now away in Europe for the benefit of his health, and if this is a proper vote Sir David might very well claim for the whole session, less the days he has missed. I think it is a bad precedent.

Mr. FRASER. I do not think that we should begin this system.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We began it long ago.

Mr. FRASER. There is the case of the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) who is suffering from rheumatism and has had to go home. Should he not be paid as well as Senator Sullivan.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We have done it several times for members of Parliament.

Mr. FRASER. We have done it but seldom. There is an absurd rule that if a man happens to be within a certain number of miles from Ottawa and should be sick, he gets his indemnity, but if he has to go home to be nursed he cannot be paid. That is absurd on the face of it. This, in my opinion, should be done only in very special cases, and only in such cases, as that a Senator or a member of Parliament might feel very much in need of the money. I do not think that this should be a general rule. If a member is returned to Parliament, or if a man is appointed to the Senate, he must expect to be sick, and he must accept the condition as a matter of course. However, there might be one thing said in favour of granting this money, and that is, that the Government is treating the country very well so far as the Senate is concerned; because it has not filled ten vacancies, and so it has saved $10,000 a year and travelling expenses. Yet there is another view perhaps. Perhaps this money should be voted to active Senators who do the work of the sick Senators and of those who are not appointed. I have the very highest respect for the Senator in question, and I am not speaking because it happens to be that hon. gentleman, but I think we should have a general rule about this matter. I venture to say that there were a number of members and Senators sick last year, and who if this principle is maintained, should be paid their indemnity. There should be no invidious distinctions made in this matter.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The case of Senator Sullivan is one that I think would come under the head of a special case. The hon. gentleman took so seriously ill in Ottawa, that I understand his life was despaired of, and he had to be sent back to his family. Had he remained in Ottawa without that care and attention which he received at home, this vote would probably not have caused any discussion in the House. On more than one occasion this rule has been applied to members of Parliament and also to Senators, and under the circumstances, I can see no reason why the item should not be voted.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps you should add to the item "the said Senator having got sick through staying at Ottawa."

Mr. McMULLEN. If you introduce this system you will find that a great many Senators and members of Parliament, after they come to Ottawa, will get sick, and be obliged to return to the tender care of their families. The result will be that claim after claim of this kind will be made. Now, I would like to ask the Government on what principle they will decline to acknowledge a claim on the part of Senator Macpherson, who is obliged to be in the south of France for the benefit of his health. And there may be many other cases of the same kind. By making the grant, the Government are only inserting the thin edge of the wedge, which is going to bring a general demand from senators who will return to the bosom of their families instead of remaining here the whole session. I maintain that the law regulating the attendance of members and senators should not be violated, or else it should be amended in the direction my hon. friend suggests, so that all may be treated alike.

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope I may be pardoned if I say a word or two in reference to this matter. The law is not being violated, as the hon. gentleman suggests. Under the law Mr. Sullivan could not be paid the sum of $152, and that is the reason, I presume, why the Government are now asking Parliament to grant it. Generally speaking, I think it is important that the law should be observed; but in my long experience in Parliament I have known some instances—not very many, it is true, and therefore the evil cannot be quite so great as hon. members have depicted it to be—in which members who have been absent from their duties through illness have had voted to them by Parliament the balance of their indemnity which had been deducted from them. I know nothing of the special circumstances connected with this case; but I assume them to be what the hon. Postmaster General has stated, that Mr. Sullivan, having been taken ill in Ottawa, would have been entitled to his pay if he had remained here; but finding it more convenient to go to his home, he remained away during nineteen sitting days of the session, and application was made by some person on his behalf that he should be recouped this sum of money. I say that very few cases have occurred during my time in Parliament, and therefore this case, which involves a small sum of money, is not likely to give rise to any abuse.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the Speaker has given the best reason why this vote should not pass. The hon. gentleman tells us that according to law this hon. gentleman is not entitled to this money. If you consider that the circumstances are such as entitle him to receive this money, then, I say, alter the law, and put us all on an even footing. But it is most invidious and highly improper, in my opinion, to ask the House to vote money in these individual cases contrary to the law. The law lays down that a man is entitled to indemnity under certain circumstances, and not otherwise, and it is exceedingly invidious to ask us to vote money when the facts are not and cannot be before us.

Mr. SPEAKER. One instance that occurred in recent years was that of the late hon. member for East Hastings, Mr. Burdett, who was voted the full amount of his indemnity because of his illness.

Mr. FRASER. After he died?

Mr. SPEAKER. No, not after he died. He was absent during the greater part of the session of 1891, and my impression is that the cheque was sent to him before the session was over.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) We may have done wrong before and set a bad precedent, but there is no reason why we should follow it. The amount may be small, but I decline to discuss either the amount or the gentleman in question. It is the principle involved that I am dealing with, and if you adopt a new principle now, you cannot, in justice, ignore any other similar case that occurs. If I am detained at my home in Charlottetown for a similar reason, I can demand my indemnity. In this way you make the indemnity a perfect burlesque. What is the principle of the indemnity? It is this: We grant it because while a member is in Ottawa he has to incur expenses that he would not incur at home; but here you are setting a precedent the result of which must necessarily result in similar demands on behalf of other members of the House and the Senate, who may be detained at home because they do not feel very well. How are we to decide how well or how ill a man may be? We cannot ascertain the fact: we have simply to accept the statement of somebody who says he has been informed, just as the Postmaster General states in this case that he has been informed. I think we are adopting a thoroughly evil principle.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Livingston) had his leg broken while on his way to Ottawa, which necessitated his being confined to his house for several weeks, and the Government refused to recognize his claim to indemnity for that time. In that case, the fact did not depend on the opinion of the Postmaster General or any one else; it was well known; and I would like to know from the Government how they can reconcile their granting the one claim and refusing the other.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Before expressing an opinion as to how I could reconcile the two cases, I would like to know the facts. I am not aware that the indemnity was ever refused to the hon. member whose name my hon. friend has just mentioned. I am not sure whether he applied for the indemnity, but if the hon. gentleman was laid up from a serious accident and applied for the indemnity, I see no reason why it should not be granted to him as well as to Dr. Sullivan. I was going to suggest to the hon. gentleman that to save time, we should allow the item to stand until the Minister of Finance, who happens to be away to-night, but who is very seldom absent from his place, is present to give the details.

To meet the expenses for promoting the dairy interests of Canada by placing fresh made creamery butter on the British market without deterioration, for securing recognition of its quality, in that market $3,000

Mr. McMILLAN. There was a resolution passed by the Select Committee on Agriculture and Colonization last session. I seconded that resolution, and have been blamed for being one of the causes of the Government purchasing butter and exporting it to the old country. It is true that I did second the resolution, which was as follows:—

Moved by Mr. McLennan, seconded by Mr. McMillan, "That this Committee are of opinion from evidence placed before them, that the creamery butter manufactured in Canada and sent to the English markets, suffer from an unfounded prejudice which has hitherto affected, materially the prices obtained, and consequently with the increase that this country should be making from year to year, in this important article of our dairy product, and therefore recommend that the Government will take such steps as will place our butter on the markets, in fair competition with all other butter imported into that country."—Carried.

I had no intention that the Government should take butter and ship it on their own account for the simple reason that I knew that in 1872-73, when they took butter, we were suffering in the English market from the butter that went from Canada. I knew from interviews I had in the old country that our butter only brought 16½ cents there at the time when creamery butter was bringing 20 cents. I knew from my visit to the old country that no individual trader can injure the credit of his country so much as when he ships his stuff under the wing, or in the name of the Government. Had I expected that the Government was going to purchase butter, I would never have seconded that resolution. My view was that the Government would take steps to have refrigerators fitted up in steamships, or to have ships fitted up in the same manner as they are fitted for bringing butter from Australia to Great Britain. I have always been opposed to a Government purchasing any goods and putting them on the market. We have men in the trade who are well posted and who know when to put their goods on the market, and if a bad article is put on the market by them, it does not injure the country to the same extent as when shipped by the Government. The Government should not take any steps for the purchasing and placing on the market of any article of farm produce. Denmark has never done anything of the kind, but has set us a noble example. The Danish Government give prizes for the best articles exhibited, and are very careful not to give the opportunity to manufacture specially for exhibits. With this view, they only give notice of the exhibition a week or two before it is held, so that there is no opportunity to prepare specially for it any small quantities of butter. I am decidedly opposed to this action of the Government, and I have always opposed it. I believe that we have men steadily engaged in the trade who are better capable of placing goods on the market than is the Government. I speak with a knowledge of what we suffered in 1872-73, because I interviewed some of the commission men in the old country myself, and both from these men and from the report submitted in June, 1873, it was evident that our butter was put on the market in very bad condition indeed. A question was put the other day with respect to the quantity of butter sold. We were told that a certain number of packages had been taken over—I think 915 packages—but we were not told what was the weight of a package. I would ask now what was the weight of the package that the Government took over?

Mr. SPROULE. I have some recollection of the discussion which took place in committee, and I do not think that any course was indicated for the Government to take in placing Canadian butter upon the English market. The hon. gentleman says that our traders are quite capable of putting butter on the market just as well as the Government. How then has it happened that although they have been putting our butter on the English market for years, it has not gained the reputation there it should have. What were the instructions from the committee? They were that the Government be authorized to take such steps as they thought best to put Canadian butter on the market from time to time in proper condition. The manner of doing this was not indicated. I understood most distinctly that the Minister of Agriculture and the dairy commissioner were to exercise their own judgment as to the manner in which the butter should be placed on the market, provided it got there in good condition. I can see a great deal of wisdom in the Government overseeing the work. Why? They can select experts for the examination of the butter, so that nothing except the finest quality would be taken across. If a private individual were making the shipments on his own account, his object would be to sell his goods no matter what the quality might be; but the Government, whose only object is to obtain a good reputation for Canadian butter, will see that only the best quality is put on the English market. Every package sent over is examined carefully by an expert and put on the market when fresh. That plan must ultimately bring about a great deal of good to the Canadian products. Why do we suffer to-day on account of the small sales of our butter? Because the butter is held sometimes by the manufacturers but more frequently by the farmers for such long periods that, by the time it reaches the English markets, it is not the class of butter that they want, and it will not command the figures paid for Danish butter or for butter that is sent in fresh from other countries. There are certain times when people say it does not pay to send our butter, that is during the warm weather. But that is because we have no cold storage or refrigerator cars. But even if the Government were to provide both, very often the merchant would not send his butter to the English market, at this season, because of the low price ruling at that time. But I contend that our butter should be on the English market, in those months as well as in any other. I think it would be better if a little money was used to buy the best quality of butter and send it fresh from week to week during the summer as well as the winter. If this were done with reasonable care, we should soon enjoy a reputation for butter equal to that of any other country.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Government have no apology to make for the course they have adopted in connection with this matter. The House, I am sure, is well seized of the importance of cultivating and improving the butter interest of Canada. I need not now call the attention of the House to the fact that one of the most important items of export at this time is cheese. The export of cheese from this country has risen from six and a quarter millions of a few years ago to no less than $15,000,000 last year.

Mr. SCRIVER. Without any help from the Government.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend is quite wrong in that, because this has been achieved with the help not only of this Government alone but of the provincial governments as well, who, in conjunction with this Government, have employed experts for the purpose of assisting the cheese industry all over the country. Now, with regard to the cheese industry, we have reached the point when the cheese export of Canada actually represents half the total imports into the British market; and we are increasing our exports so rapidly that we have become our own competitors in that market. Consequently we had better look to a new dairy product which, at the present time we export to a very limited extent indeed. The importation of butter into Britain represents, I believe, something like $60,000,000 a year. At the present time that market is monopolized almost entirely by France, Denmark, Australia and Sweden, while Canada is sending only about 1 per cent of the total importation into the British market. What is the reason? The reason is that while the butter made in the private dairies in Canada is, to a large extent, excellent butter, it does not possess the uniformity necessary to gain a foothold in so conservative a market as that of Great Britain, nor have we had the means of putting it upon the British market in good condition. We have secured our cheese market and have given our cheese an excellent reputation by sending it out in small samples at the Colonial Exhibition, by distributing it among many dealers in Great Britain and by putting it prominently before the world at the World's Fair; and we have held our place and maintained the price of our goods notwithstanding the keen competition that has existed during the past year. I want to say to the hon. gentleman that the Government are justified in its action with regard to the butter industry by the history of other countries. My hon. friend has referred to Denmark as a country that has held its own in the market while it has done nothing for the purpose of encouraging the industry. My information as to Denmark is very different from that of my hon. friend. I understand that Denmark took great pains, by appointing a commission of experts, to assist in the development of the industry, and employed a commissioner to remain in Great Britain for the purpose of placing Danish butter upon the English market. But we do not need to go to Denmark for a precedent in this regard. The Australian colonies are, at the present time, supplying 8 or 10 per cent of the total importation of butter into the British market. What has enabled them to do that? A few years ago Great Britain was importing from Australia only a very few thousand dollars worth of butter. But the Australian colonies adopted a policy of encouraging in every possible way the export of butter to Great Britain. They gave a bonus and this House will probably be surprised to know that that bonus was 2 cents per pound if the butter brought 16 cents in the English market, and up to 6 cents per pound if it brought 24 cents per pound. In one year—I think the dairy commissioner will bear me out—no less than $254,000 was paid by Australia as bonus upon butter shipped to Great Britain. And, notwithstanding the attack upon the system that has been made by my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. McMillan), we find that we have to compete in Great Britain with the finest butter from the Australian colonies and from other countries that have spent large sums of money in promoting shipments and the sale of butter in Great Britain. Now as to the results. It was stated that very little money would be lost in this experiment. The butter was purchased from Canadian creameries at 20 cents per pound. All of it that passed inspection at Montreal was sent to the markets of Europe, and what was not deemed not quite up to the standard for shipment to Europe was sold at Montreal at 21 cents per pound. When the two sides of the account are balanced, it will be found that we have lost only a small sum in doing this.

Mr. SPROULE.

Mr. SCRIVER. Is it not 4 cents per pound?

Mr. MONTAGUE. There were 915 packages of 56 pounds each, and after meeting all the expenses of freight, inspection and everything else, the whole item asked for is only $3,000, which will more than cover the expense. But the question for this House to consider is this—Have we met the requirements and requests of the dairy interests of Canada, and, in the second place have we done any good to the industry on the British market. I have no hesitation in answering these questions in the affirmative. Were my hon. friend from Huron and the other gentleman opposed to the carrying out of this experiment aware that the Government were only following out, not only the suggestion of the committee on Agriculture, but also the suggestions made by the various dairy and creamery associations throughout the province of Ontario with regard to this very same subject. My hon. friend, I am sure, does not doubt me, otherwise I could read the resolutions carried at the Central Farmer's Institute, and the Creameries Association, and at the last meeting of the Farmer's Institute, held on 5th March, at Finch, Ontario, all of which asked the Government to pursue this course or complimented them upon the course which had been pursued with regard to this industry. Now, as regards what has been the effect, the shippers in Montreal, have to-day more inquiries for Canadian butter than they have had before in the history of the industry for a great number of years. Messrs. Clements & Son, of Manchester, have written, with regard to this very subject:

We have received delivery of 215 packages of butter ex "Ottoman." Most of this shipment is fresher than last, and altogether superior, which proves to us that if care is taken with details at your end, and the goods shipped absolutely as soon as made, you need not fear what quantity you send. They will certainly suit this market better than Australian; but, of course, it will take some time to get them known * * We have had several of the best buyers in Lancashire examining them, and the general opinion is you could run the Danes very hard in a year or so.

I think, Sir, that that statement of facts from a leading butter dealer in the city of Manchester, is a compliment to the Government as to the course it has pursued in this matter.

Mr. CASEY. What did it sell for this last fall?

Mr. MONTAGUE. From 90 shillings to 70 shillings for 112 pounds, that is speaking generally, was the price secured in Great Britain for these shipments. I have not the exact data by me, because the last returns have not been received. I can only say that I am somewhat surprised that the attacks upon this vote should come from a farmer. It appears to me that my hon. friend has not exhibited that great kindness for the farmers' interests that he has expressed sometimes in this House. Now, as to the future. The Government do not intend to drop the dairying industry; they intend to encourage it in every possible way. They intend to continue the services of the Dairy Commissioner and his staff, who are pushing forward education in regard to this matter of better methods of making and shipping dairy products. They have made a start in the British market with this butter, and what they intend to do in the future is to supply cold storage for the purpose of placing Canadian butter in the best possible condition upon the British market. I may say more to the hon. gentleman, although the subject will come up again on the main Estimates, that the Department of Agriculture have already made arrangements with the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway, and are now making arrangements with the Intercolonial Railway, for the purpose of providing cold storage from the creameries to the port of Montreal. But first let me add that, in purchasing this creamery butter during the past year, the Government are not only establishing a market for creamery butter in Great Britain, but they were relieving the congested markets in Canadian cities, and were consequently improving the price as well of the dairy butter which is produced by the farmers throughout the country. Not only have the Government made arrangements with the railways mentioned, but they are also making arrangements for inspection at Montreal; and they have made arrangements with the steamship companies for providing cold storage across the Atlantic. They have also made arrangements for cold storage in three ports of Great Britain, London, Liverpool and Glasgow. The purpose of the Government is to provide opportunities of cold storage and to get the railways to put on refrigerator cars. The creameries which export this butter—because in future the Government do not intend to buy butter—

Mr. CASEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONTAGUE.—Will my hon. friend allow me to continue. Having started a market in Great Britain by purchasing this butter and placing it there, and, as I have shown by the extract, given it a character in Great Britain, the creameries which export the butter, will be required to pay the ordinary rates of freight, as well as the ordinary rates of storage at different points. But the Government, out of the vote which is asked for, will pay the extra expense of the cold storage upon the cars, as well as at storage points. I think that covers pretty well the question of what the Government intend to do. As to the transportation across the Atlantic, they will have, I think, a semi-monthly service, beginning with the third week in June, and continuing all through the season. They are making arrangements with the Allan Line by which they, the Government, are to fit up boats themselves at Montreal, affording excellent accommodation. This will be done out of the vote asked for in the main Estimates. Nine boats are being enlarged for that purpose, and the only expense to the Government will be the extra expense for cold storage, the freight being paid for by those who have shipped the butter. As I have said, we do not continue to purchase the butter, but do provide cold storage for the purpose of putting that butter in the very best possible shape upon the British market. The vote asked for in the main Estimates will supply facilities for putting upon the British market 2,000,000 pounds of Canadian butter during the season. If hon. gentlemen will think over the matter carefully they will see that the Government is pursuing a very wise and helpful course towards the Canadian butter industry, which has helped us in times when other products were low, and the growth of which can only redound to the advantage and prosperity of the Canadian farmer.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Secretary of State started out by telling us what was done in other countries. He has evidently got a little idea of what has been done, for instance, in the Australian colonies, but he is quite incorrect in his statements. He said that 2 cents per pound was paid by the Australian colonies as a bounty on butter that brought 16 cents per pound in the British market, and that there was 6 cents per pound paid on butter that brought 24 cents. Now, my hon. friend is not correct. It is 2 pence a pound paid on butter that brings over 9 pence per pound sterling in the English market; and it is 3 pence per pound that is paid on butter that brings over a shilling in the Australian market.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The dairy commissioner tells me that my figures are absolutely correct.

Mr. McMULLEN. I take my statement from the reports of the Australian colonies themselves, and I care not either for the Secretary of State or his commissioner. He may have valued it at 6 cents, but it is 3 pence a pound on butter that brings over a shilling in the English market. Now, with regard to the quantity that is being sent out, he asks for a vote of $3,000 to cover the expenses of shipping 915 packages. Now, count that up, and it comes within a small fraction of 6 cents per pound. I commend the Government for providing cold storage, I am glad to know they are encouraging the butter industry. Anything at all that will help the poor farmers, will certainly receive encouragement from this side of the House. I presume that it is in the face of an approaching election that the Government are beginning to show their sympathy for the farmer, and to offer to provide cold storage, and to spend money in finding a market for their butter. The Government have done very little before this for the farmers. With regard to the cheese industry, the farmers are under no obligation whatever to the National Policy for the position that industry occupies in the English market. There is not an intelligent farmer in this Dominion who will admit that the National Policy has done anything for the cheese industry.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I was not saying that the National Policy was concerned in the matter; I said that encouragement had been given, not only by this Government, but by other governments, in the way of teaching better methods of dairying and in lending their assistance in that direction.

Mr. McMULLEN. The methods of manufacturing cheese was fairly well understood long before there was any experimental farm, or anything done by the Government here. The Ontario Government took a very active part many years ago in this direction, long before the Dominion Government did any thing at all. They sent out lecturers from place to place, who gave instructions to the people in the best methods of making cheese. The Dominion Government were late in entering the field to do anything for the cheese industry, and they are late in entering the field in regard to the butter industry. I agree that it is desirable we should encourage the export of butter in every possible way. We know that in the English market there is a larger field for butter than for cheese. I think we only exported something like $2,500,000 worth of butter last year, and I think Denmark sent $20,000,000 worth to the English market. It is desirable we should encourage this industry, and I hope the introduction of cold storage will tend in that direction; but I claim it would be much better to follow the Australian system, by which the Government would either grant a bonus to those who export butter and obtain a certain price for it, or supply the cold storage. I hope, at all events, the farmers will obtain some benefit, and that the business will increase.

Mr. CASEY. I should like to know if the provision for cold storage is limited to butter, or applies to fruits and other farm products. I congratulate the Government on one resolution to which they have come—they have gone out of the grocery business, out of the business of advancing money on butter, taking the risk as to what they could obtain for it. According to the statement made by the hon. Secretary of State to a question put by the hon. member for Stanstead, the prices realized on the butter purchased by the Government, on which they advanced 20 cents per pound, varied from 16 4-100 cents to 16 3-10 cents per pound, as shown by the returns up to the 14th of last month. The Government realized less by from 3 2-3 cents to 4 cents per pound than the amount advanced to the farmers. When this plan was proposed, it was held out to the farmers that they would probably realize on this butter something like 24 or 25 cents per pound, that the imprint of the Government would do much to increase the price in England, that the careful selection by experts, and its shipment in the best possible condition, which the Secretary of State said had been attended to, would cause it to bring much larger prices than those ordinarily obtained. The absurd failure of the whole scheme is proven by the fact that the selected butter has not realized to the seller in Montreal as much as creamery butter has averaged in the Canadian market. The butter selected by experts, and sent in the best possible condition to England, has not realized, by several cents, as much as creamery butter under ordinary circumstances in the Canadian market. The hon. Minister himself has stated that butter which they rejected as not fit to send to England realized 21 cents in Montreal. I am afraid he is mistaken; but 5 cents per pound more was obtained according to his statement for inferior butter sold in Montreal than was obtained for selected butter shipped to England.

Either the Government were not sufficiently careful or the experts were not sufficiently careful. The whole scheme was an attempt on the part of those not in the business to interfere with the natural course of business and to take out of the hands of those who understood the business a particular branch of trade, and place it in the hands of amateurs who know nothing about its practical side. I am very glad for all these reasons that the Government have seen fit to give up their butter shop business. The reason of the adoption of the policy was so very evident that it is hardly necessary to explain it. When the policy was initiated it was intended to have the elections brought on before this date. It was thought that it would be good policy for the Government to go to the farmers and tell them that the cheese business which had been encouraged, was somewhat overdone, and that butter was languishing, and so the Government were going to strengthen the price of butter and do a good deal for the farmers. That would have been a very nice manoeuvre if the elections had come on at the time originally intended. But in this, as in other cases, the Government's prophecies were not fulfilled. The elections were not brought on, and so we are now, unfortunately for the Government, able to discuss the results of this catch-penny enterprises before they take place.

The Secretary of State laid great stress on the cheese industry. He pointed out that it had been one of the largest lines of export for many years back. I could go further than he did, because our cheese industry, perhaps more than any other, enabled Canada to pull through a period of depression and hard times and make up to the farmers a portion of the loss inflicted by heavy taxation which this Government has imposed upon them. The hon. gentleman is well aware that the farmers have been heavily taxed. If he were not, he would not endeavour to make it appear that the Government would relieve him on his butter. Not one hon. gentleman opposite paid the farmers the compliment that they are men of ordinary common sense.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We have positive evidence of it during the last four elections.

Mr. CASEY. If the hon. gentleman thinks the National Policy was the cause of victories at the last four general elections, he is much mistaken. The causes that led to the return of the Government have been pointed out time and time again, and certainly they have not been due to the satisfaction felt by the farmers with the National Policy.

The cheese industry has been one of the greatest supports of Canada in years gone by, and it has largely flourished on account of the assistance given by the Governments of Ontario and Quebec before the Dominion Government had anything whatever to do with it. The assistance given by the provincial governments took the form of furnishing information. They taught the people how to make cheese, prepare it, and pack it for the English market. The rest of the cheese interest is distinct from the industry of making cheese, and depends on the business capacity of those engaged in the trade. They have shown themselves worthy of the duties resting on them, and they have built up a large and highly profitable trade. But now, the Minister says, that is a warrant for us to begin the butter dealing business, and if that fails, as it is admitted to have utterly failed, it justifies us in giving a bonus on the export of butter if not in the shape of cash payment, in the shape of payment for cold storage. Did they ever pay for cold storage for cheese in Canada or in the United Kingdom? Did any Government ever send agents around to find markets for cheese? I believe that the abstention of all Governments from interfering in the cheese business has been one cause of its great success. If it is thought that the producer of creamery butter, as distinct from the private maker of butter, is entitled to this public benefit, then the Government are in the right.

It must be understood, however, that the plan of the Government is to provide cold storage for creamery butter only, and that the butter made by the farmers' wives, some of which is just as good, cannot obtain the cold storage in a Government warehouse. That is a question for the Government to settle as between the patrons of creameries and the private makers of butter. If the Government are to have a corps of experts, why should not they select the home-made butter as well as the creamery butter. The proposal of the Government is not to favour Canadian butter generally, but only that which is made by the creameries. It is, in fact, a continuation of the whole policy of the Government, to favour the large manufacturer rather than the private producer.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Are you opposed to the principle?

Mr. CASEY. I am pointing out to the House what the Government propose, and I am not saying whether I am opposed to it or not. The hon. gentleman has not yet explained to the House why it is that the Government will not extend the same privileges to home-made butter as they propose to extend to the creamery butter. The practice of bonussing exports is one which I do not think can be defended in the interests of any class of the community.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Ontario Government purchased butter and cheese.

Mr. CASEY. If the hon. gentleman says that the Ontario Government purchased butter and cheese for export he is stating what is directly contrary to the fact. If he says they purchased it for use in their own institutions, of course he is right, because they do not starve the people there.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend is entirely wrong. The Ontario Government did purchase more butter and cheese to place on the market at the time of the Colonial Exhibition, than we have purchased, and they spent more money in it.

Mr. CASEY. They did purchase butter and cheese for exhibition at the Colonial Exhibition, but that is entirely a different thing.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It was for the same purpose of establishing a market.

Mr. CASEY. I leave it to the House if anything more absurd has ever been stated, even by the Secretary of State. He says it is the same thing to buy butter and cheese and send it to the exhibition for the purpose of showing the products of the country, as it is to set up a butter market in Montreal, and buy butter from favoured parties and sell it at a loss of 4 cents a pound in England. Every Government buys certain products for an exhibition, and they may be sold to meet the expenses of the exhibition; but that is not keeping a butter shop, or a grease shop for an election either, which the hon. gentleman is perhaps better acquainted with.

The proposal to bonus butter (which he is not plucky enough to make, although he applauds it in the case of Australia) is simply a proposal that the whole of the population of Canada should pay for cheap butter for the people of England. It will not increase the price of butter in England, but the people of Canada will be obliged to pay a part of the price which the English consumer ought to pay for his butter. That is what a bonus to an export means. That is what it means when we give a bonus to the Masseys for exporting their goods out of Canada. If they sell their goods in Canada, they have to pay duty on their materials, but if they sell them out of Canada the duty is returned to them, and we pay for the cheap goods which are sold in Australia and the Cape of Good Hope, and all over the world. The hon. gentleman forgets to tell us that we are bonussing a line of steamboats to carry the bonussed Australian butter, to which he refers, across the Pacific and Atlantic, and to send it to England in competition with our Canadian butter. Perhaps he will tell us that that is in the interest of the farmers. The farmers are not the class of thickheads and mossbacks and way-backs which the Government imagine them to be. They are not open to such arguments as were advanced by the Secretary of State to-night, and they can easily see into any attempt which the Government make to hoodwink them.

Mr. SMITH (South Ontario). I have listened to-night to the discussion on this item about granting the sum of $3,000 for the purpose of promoting the dairy interests of Canada, and I must confess that not one single gentleman on the opposite side of the House has had the moral courage to say that he is opposed to that grant. They have talked around it in every shape and form, but not one of them dare say he is opposed to this grant of $3,000. I have no doubt, Mr. Chairman, that the keenness of the competition in the English market, and the difficulties of placing our butter of a uniform quality on the market, have weighed with the Government in placing this vote in the Supplementary Estimates. There is a feeling growing, not only in Canada, but in different portions of Europe, that the European countries have nearly reached the maximum of their production; and it remains to be seen whether the Canadian people will be able to take advantage of the English market as they should, and whether they will be able to overtake again what they have lost. I can scarcely understand the statements made by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, who say that the Dominion Government has done nothing to promote the cheese industry. It is true, in Ontario the farmer had to help himself to a great extent; but will the hon. gentleman say that in the province of Quebec, and in the maritime provinces, particularly in Prince Edward Island, the Government have done nothing to help this industry? Why, to-day there are about 28 cheese factories and two creameries at work in Prince Edward Island, and it is stated that the new system, as compared with the old, will make a difference of $50,000 to the farmers of that province, which would make up many times over the $3,000 that is asked for in the Estimates. Before I sit down I want to congratulate hon. gentlemen opposite on becoming protectionists. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) stated that he was not altogether in favour of cold storage, and would rather grant a bonus to the Canadian butter producer. I am a protectionist, and I do not care whether protection is given in the shape of cold storage or duty or bounty, so long as it is given. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to have had a conclave lately, and seem to have decided that they must do something in the interests of the Canadian farmers, for they sent out a circular asking them what their opinion was of protection for Canadian farmers. That question has been tested time and again, and the farmers have decided that they want protection; and if there is one thing more than another for which this Government should be supported, it is because they have given to the farmers of Canada, from time to time, the protection they demanded.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am the individual who has been blamed for sending out circulars to the farmers; but I want to say that no circular was ever sent out by me or with my consent to any of the farmers of Ontario. If any one else did it, I have nothing to do with that; I want that to be understood. Now, with respect to the creamery associations asking for Government aid for the butter industry, the Western Creamery Association met at Chelsey, and Mr. Wart brought in a resolution asking the Government to grant cold storage; but Mr. Wart told me that that resolution was not adopted. It is true that at the Central Farmers' Institute at Toronto, a resolution was brought in, in the dying moments of the meeting, when there was not time to discuss it. I was present and would have said something if I had had the privilege, but I was not a member of the institute. What I said before I say still, that I think the Government should assist in providing refrigerators and cold storage; I am not opposed to that. We are told that the best butter only should be sent to Europe; but the best butter is not sent at the present time, because part of the butter sent only brings 76s. per cwt., while part has brought 90s. per cwt. This shows that inferior butter is sent, and I fear that as much injury will be done to the reputation of Canadian butter in the English market in 1895 as was done in 1893. I am opposed to the Government becoming a purchaser of any commodity and putting it on the market. Now, it is stated that the European countries have reached their limit in the production of butter. Here is a statement from the "Fortnightly Review," showing that whereas in 1889 the value of butter exported from Denmark to England was £3,742,869, in 1894, it had increased to £5,843,954. The same authority says:

It is erroneous to imagine that Danish butter-making is a State business. The State has nothing whatever to do with it, beyond arranging competitions and awarding prizes for excellence. These competitions are usually arranged at twelve hours' notice, so that the competitors are obliged to send in any butter they happen to have ready, instead of an extra good pound or two made specially for the exhibition with great care.

I hold that the Canadian Government ought to encourage butter making in Canada in the manner in which it has been encouraged in Denmark. It has been stated that the Ontario Government purchased butter and cheese. They did not purchase it to put it on the market, but to exhibit it in competition with the products of other British colonies at the Colonial Exhibition. I was present at that exhibition myself, and I felt proud of the exhibit of butter and cheese from Ontario which I saw there. That is a very different thing from purchasing butter and cheese and putting it on the market for sale. It is very strange that some of the dealers in Montreal sold their butter to the Government when 21 cents a pound could be realized for it. I would like to know if Mr. Hobson sold his butter to the Government for 20 cents a pound, or did he get an extra price for it?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Not one cent in any case was advanced above 20 cents.

Mr. McMILLAN. Then Mr. Hobson was certainly a very stupid individual if he sold his butter for 20 cents a pound when inferior butter for shipment to England was bringing 21 cents. I say it advisedly that the farmers of Ontario are not in favour of the Government purchasing butter. They are certainly in favour of the Government doing what they can fairly do to place the butter industry upon a good footing, by assisting in placing butter on the British market in as good condition as the Australian butter, which is all brought in vessels having refrigerators. Danish butter is not shipped in refrigerators, because it does not come so great a distance and does not require them. If the Government do purchase butter, they should purchase from private individuals as well as from creameries, so long as it reaches the required standard of excellence. It is not fair to crush out private enterprise when we know that there are well-trained individuals who produce an article that will sell anywhere as well as creamery butter. Just as good butter can be produced by private individuals who have the modern appliances and who make it on scientific principles. Now, with regard to cheese, the province of Ontario engaged an expert, and sent him through the province to assist in perfecting our cheese making. Down to that time we had been at a disadvantage. But Prof. Arnold, who went through western Ontario, came to the factory of which I was at the time president, and remained there the day. The benefit we derived from his visit was very great indeed. That was the only assistance that the cheese industry received from the government of Ontario. But it was a great benefit. It placed all the factories that worked under his instructions in such a position that no further complaint was heard. The cheese industry in Ontario was established on a sound foundation before the Dominion Experimental Farm was started at all. I do not say that the Government are not benefiting the outlying provinces by means of this experimental farm system and I do not say that it is not of benefit to the farmers who follow the instruction given. We go to the expense of sending travelling dairies, and the farmers benefit by the example set them in manipulating the cream and make good butter. I believe the Government are doing right in not taking any more butter, for we have men in the business who are better capable of putting it in good condition on the English market, and all they want is refrigerators provided to take it across the ocean.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). We are all very much in the dark. I should be very pleased to have a specific statement from the Secretary of State, who represents the Minister of Agriculture, of the actual transaction. The only official statement we have was in reply to the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Rider) three weeks ago, according to which reply the limited shipment of butter was sold at a fraction over 16 cents a pound. If that transaction stands alone, it would create the impression abroad that the butter was either of inferior grade or handled under adverse circumstances.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I explained to the hon. gentleman that the returns had not been received for all the shipments which had been made, but I thought I gave to the House a very full statement as to what had been done.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It was a stump speech.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend must judge for himself, but I thought I was giving information to the House. I can only say that the cost of examination, inspection, freight charges and everything else will certainly come within the item now asked; and the question for the House to consider is whether the Government, in pursuing that course, have done $3,000 worth of a value to the butter interest of Canada because that is the real question. Again I am very much surprised that hon. gentlemen should pursue, with regard to this matter, the course they have pursued. Surely we ought to be all united in our desire to promote in every shape the dairy industry of the country, and there is not a gentleman on the other side who dare say that that was not the desire of the Government in taking the steps now under review. As to what the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMullen) said. I must say that the Government acted not only in accordance with the resolutions sent from the farmers' institutes but with the wish of the butter and creamery associations, who asked that financial aid be given for one year for the purpose of establishing a market as much as possible in Great Britain. As to the statement made earlier in the debate that this industry had not been helped by the Government, hon. gentlemen answered that themselves by admitting that money had been spent for the purpose of booming Canadian cheese in Great Britain, and the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMullen) also admitted that an inspector did spend one day in his factory for the purpose of giving them lessons in their industry.

Mr. McMILLAN. It was not the dairy commissioner but long before he had existence. It was the commissioner brought from the other side and paid for by the Ontario Government to go among the cheese factories of western Ontario. He came to the county of Huron, called the cheese makers together, and showed them how to manipulate the milk, from the time it came to the factory until it was converted into cheese.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend does not differ with me. I knew what he said exactly. I can only say that the Government are proud of their record with regard to the dairy industry of Canada. We are proud that we spent about $3,000 a year in Prince Edward Island since a few years ago, and that we raised the export of butter and cheese from that island from $5,000 a year to no less than $90,000 a year. According to the estimate of the farmers in that island, the sum of $50,000 more has been received for the dairy products of Prince Edward Island than would have been under the old system for the same amount of product, which the hon. member for South Huron is defending. We are adopting the same course in the North-west Territories. We have inspectors there who are instructing the people the way to prosper in the dairy industry, and I am glad that, while hon. gentlemen opposite are finding fault with the policy of the Government, the creamery associations of Manitoba have been asking the Government to assist them, and the Government besides spending small sums, passed through the House, last session a vote in that direction. And notwithstanding the harping of hon. gentlemen opposite on small technicalities, this Government will pursue a similar course to-day whenever required.

Mr. McMILLAN. How much butter was sold in Montreal?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Two hundred and forty-six packages, which were not regarded by the inspector as quite up to the standard for the British market. The hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that dairy butter, while it may be very excellent and command an excellent price in the Canadian market, is not sufficiently uniform in taste or colour to secure the British market and the hon. gentleman, if he knows anything about the subject, knows that the hope of Canada is to secure a large export of creamery butter and establish a uniform grade in the British market.

Mr. McMILLAN. What price did you get for the butter sold in Montreal?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Twenty-one and twenty-two and a half cents.

Mr. SCRIVER. The Secretary of State's expression of surprise that any one on this side should presume to question the propriety of the course which the Government has taken, is, under the circumstances, somewhat amusing. His own statement, made with the plausibility and eloquence which he has always at command, amply justifies those who found fault with the course taken by the Government with regard to the butter industry. That such a course was a mistaken one has been amply justified by the statement he has made himself. I do not hesitate to say that the experiment which the Government made of purchasing butter and sending it to the English market and selling it there was a huge blunder. There were very few such requests made, and his own admission, though he was wrong in his figures by $3\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound in the first place—shows that the result has been a great loss. This is one proof that it was a mistake, and a greater proof still, is his attempt to show that the result upon the butter trade has been beneficial. And what was the proof he gave us of that? A letter from one firm in Manchester—which is not our chief butter market by any means—that they had received about 200 tubs of butter which would run the Danish butter very hard. For my part, I am free to say that I was opposed to this policy on the part of the Government, in the first place, and I wondered at the time that our dairy commissioner, whose talent and judgment in regard to such matters I have often admired, should adopt such a course. For once in his life, I feel free to say, he has made a great mistake. And I would call the attention of the Secretary of State to the fact that the great exporters of butter in the city of Montreal are not buying for export in the face of the great experiment which the Government have made. The finest creamery butter in Montreal to-day is not being bought to any extent for export. And the prices are lamentably short of what they were for the same article last year. The finest creamery butter is now being sold in Montreal at 15 cents per pound.

Mr. CLEVELAND. No, no.

Mr. SCRIVER. I have a friend who is largely interested in the trade, one upon whose word I can depend; and he tells me that he has bought the finest creamery butter within the past week at 15 cents or $15\frac{1}{2}$ cents at the outside. I congratulate the Government on the fact that they have gone out of the butter business. At all events, while I am opposed to this system of bonussing any interest in the country, if the Government could be justified in doing anything that would help the butter business of the country, it would be the system they propose to undertake of cold storage. I am in hopes that some benefits will be derived from that, but I hope this lesson which they have received in the butter business will satisfy them for all time to come.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I am very sorry the hon. gentleman opposite should feel so bad that some protection is afforded to the farmers. It is really too bad, these hon. gentlemen think, that the farmers should be protected. The hon. gentleman stated that fine creamery butter is selling in Montreal at 15 cents. I will not class that statement as it should be classed, but I can speak for our own factory, and I know that we are selling at from 19 to 25 cents.

An hon. MEMBER. Look at the quotations.

Mr. CLEVELAND. The figures of actual practice are better than a table of newspaper quotations. We do not take our information on this subject from the "Witness," or the "Herald," or anything of that kind.

An hon. MEMBER. Take the "Gazette."

Mr. CLEVELAND. No, nor the "Gazette." I am speaking of what we ourselves are doing. Hon. gentlemen speak as if they were sorry that the farmers should be encouraged in any way. I am not going to approve or justify the Government in bonussing butter, but I think they should be praised for their efforts to encourage and help the farmer by the establishment of cold storage, or in any way of that kind. The particular plan adopted may be wrong, but it is right that we should help the farmer and try to do for him what is being done for all other classes. I think the farmers are more with us than they are with our friends on the other side.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. Secretary of State has addressed to the House a speech not intended to afford information to the House, but a campaign speech for the purpose of telling the farmers of the country how much the Government have done for them, and what everlasting obligations they will be under to the Government for what it has accomplished on their behalf. Well, Sir, I was not a little amused with one feature of the speech of the hon. gentleman. He said: We have done very much for the farmers; we have gone into the business of buying butter, and, so the agricultural population can see how much more we are doing for them than the members of the Opposition are willing to do. But even while he was making this boastful statement to the House, he was obliged to inform the House that the business of acting as butter merchants on behalf of the whole country was so bad a business that the Government had abandoned it. That this work for which the agricultural population ought to be under everlasting gratitude to the Government for was an experiment which the Government abandoned at the end of twelve months. The hon. gentleman has told us what the cheese industry owed to the Government, and said that the butter industry was likely to owe just as much to the Government in the future. So far as that is concerned, I felt inclined to agree with the hon. gentleman. What I wish to point out is that by entering the field of mercantile operations for the purchase of these articles, the Government have never conferred any advantage or benefit upon the agricultural population of this country. Why, Sir, how came these cheese manufacturing industries into Canada? Cheese-making in this sense was introduced in the west by certain parties who came from the state of New York, who had adopted the uniform and scientific method of making cheese, a knowledge of which method has extended over the whole country. The Government might assist in the educating process, but to enter upon the market and to undertake to act as guardian to the agricultural population of this country is another and very different thing. One would suppose, to hear the speech of the hon. Secretary of State, that the Government had issued a commission in lunacy to take charge of all the farms of this country, because those who have conducted them are no longer competent to manage their own business or conduct their own affairs. I deny that proposition. I say that what the agricultural population, in this respect, want to-day is to be released from the burdens the Government has imposed upon them. Give them a free field and a fair opportunity in the struggle of life with the rest of the people. That has not been done; and when the Government go into the market and bid against the grocery man who was buying butter at the village corner, and profess to promote the interests of the farmer by selling at a loss what they have bought in the English market, they were doing what it was none of their business to do, and what they never could do to advantage. They might as well issue a commission to take charge of the markets of this town, and do all the purchasing for all the people as to undertake what they did undertake in relation to this butter industry. Well, Sir, I congratulate them. They have learned by one year's experience that what they did was not the business of a government, that they neither helped themselves nor helped the agricultural population of this country by the undertaking. That being so, all we have to say with regard to this item is, that the adventure was a foolish one, that it turned out as every man of experience ought to have believed from the outset that it would turn out, and that the people, if they are thankful to the Government at all, are thankful that their folly did not carry them further; that the losses have not been larger than they have been in the operation. We are glad to know that the experiment is not to be repeated, and that the Government are satisfied with twelve months' experience in the matter.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat gave a history of the beginning of the cheese trade in Canada, but, from my information, he is entirely wrong in his facts. I heard it distinctly stated, not ten days ago, by Senator Reed, of Belleville, that he exported the first cheese ever exported from Canada; that he gave $100 to establish a cheese factory in the Belleville district, which was the first factory in the country. The same gentleman was one of five, I think he said, who gave $100 apiece for the purpose of employing a man to come amongst them and educate the people how to make cheese. At first the industry depended altogether upon private individuals, and it was not until some time later that the Ontario Government took up the matter and granted subsidies to supplement the efforts of private individuals. Now, it is all right for the Ontario Government to do this, but according to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), when the Dominion Government does the same thing, it is all wrong.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) I did not say that.

Mr. SPROULE. That is the natural assumption from the hon. gentleman's arguments. Now, how is it that cheese has attained the position it occupies in the English market to-day. Is it not owing to the fact that an educational process has been going on, and that the Provincial Government and the Dominion Government have been granting assistance, pecuniary and otherwise, to develop that industry. Now, if the Dominion Government try to do the same thing for butter, according to hon. gentlemen opposite, they must be wrong.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is not the same thing for butter. To undertake to become butter merchants is a different thing to assisting the manufacture of butter.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman has condemned the action of the Government, although he asks, What evidence have we that there is any good done? Does not that letter which was read from the wholesale merchant in England, show that something is being done? He says in that letter that the last consignment is better than the previous one, and, if we continue to send them butter like that, we will ruin the Danish butter-makers very hard. Is not that what we want to do? Although the experiment has only been tried for less than one year, we still have proof that it has been successful. Then, it was said that we have lost money on the transaction. Well, who got that money? Why, it was the Canadian farmer, according to what the hon. gentleman said a few moments ago. If the Canadian farmer could only sell his creamery butter in Montreal for 15 cents, and the Dominion Government paid 21 cents, who got the difference? The Canadian farmer got it. The only thing to criticise is that the Government paid a little too much to the Canadian farmer for the butter they sent over to England; but no one lost money on it. The Canadian farmer has got whatever was lost, and it is paid by the Dominion Government. However, it is only a small sum, about $3,000; but no matter whether the sum is small or large, hon. gentlemen condemn it because it is an effort by the Government to bring about a reputation for our Canadian butter in foreign markets. Now, I believe that many farmers in this country will bear me out in saying that if the Government pay annually $10,000 or $20,000, or $100,000 in buying that butter from month to month, and putting it regularly on the English market until such time as the reputation of that butter was fully established, and the wholesale and retail men could afterwards buy it and send it there, it would be money well spent in the interest of the Canadian farmer. I am sure the Canadian farmer would appreciate it, and would defend the Government for doing it. We know that, notwithstanding all the efforts of the wholesale merchant, notwithstanding all the efforts made by farmers themselves, for the last ten years especially, we have not been holding our own in the English markets with butter. If we have failed to do so through private enterprise, should we blame the Government for coming forward to assist private enterprise? From all the evidence we can get on the subject, we shall succeed in this effort, if we only persevere. If we continue in this direction for a little while longer, we shall be able to sell millions of pounds of butter in England in the future, in place of the small quantity we sell there now. As the dairy commissioner has said, we only supply a small portion of the butter used in England, whereas in cheese we are selling 60 per cent of all that is used in that country. Why can we not do the same thing in butter? I think it is unfair for the hon. gentlemen opposite to oppose the Government for their policy in this direction, and I am confident that the farmers throughout the country generally will heartily approve of their policy.

Mr. SEMPLE. The experiment of the Government in buying butter from the farmers and shipping to Great Britain so far has been a small one, but no doubt the farmers are thankful for small favours. A great many farmers think they should have protection on butter, but not in the way that my hon. friend is doing. I wish to read an extract from the "Farmer's Sun" in regard to which I would like some information:

The farmers of Canada will not fail to notice that official returns show that Sir Mackenzie

Bowell's Australian policy of importing Australian agricultural products into Canada, is getting under full swing by reason of the line of steamers subsidized by our government. Official returns from Vancouver show that from July 1st, 1894, to February 1st, 1895, the following quantities arrived from Australia: 7,552 lbs. butter, value, $1,355.

There is also another statement that by this policy the Australians have been enabled to ship butter as far as Sudbury. It says:

For example, the following advertisement of a Sudbury firm appeared in the issue of the Sudbury "Times," of May 2nd, 1894:

"From Australia ex ss. Warrimoo, to Vancouver, B.C., thence by the C.P.R. transcontinental line to Sudbury direct. We herald the arrival of invoices of consignments of creamery butter from the celebrated Rosebud Creamery of Newcastle, N.S.W., also tinned meats, the product of the country."

So it is plain that while the Government are endeavouring to find a market in one quarter, their policy of procuring cheap freights from Australia is filling up this country with butter. I wish to know from the Secretary of State, if he can tell how much butter is coming from that country, and if the Government propose to do anything to retain the market in that section of the country for Canadian farmers, that has hitherto been supplied from Australia? I read this extract from the "Farmer's Sun," the organ of the farmers of Canada. They are sensible of the fact, and feel it keenly, since they have to pay for steamers to bring butter here to compete with the products of their own country.

Mr. DAVIN. I should like to say one or two words, and I will be very brief, because I shall have an opportunity at a subsequent period of saying what I want to say on the question generally as regards butter and as regards butter in the North-west Territories. Let me say this, however, that I congratulate the Government on the determination expressed through the Secretary of State to continue a policy of developing to the utmost the butter industry of this country, and securing for it the greatest possible advantages in being placed on the English market. Having said this much, let me add a word in regard to the controversy which has prevailed to-night. The hon. member for Bothwell and the hon. member for Elgin argued as though the Government had gone into the butter business. The meaning of that is, if it has any meaning at all, and at all events it is what the hon. gentlemen intended to convey and the whole cogency of their argument depended on it, that the Government went into the trade in butter with a view to make a profit. Palpably, however, that is not what the Government did.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes.

Mr. DAVIN. What the Government did was to adopt a scheme by which they would accommodate the farmers, by which they would advance money on butter to farmers; and if in doing that any loss has been incurred, it shows merely that there has been a miscalculation, and I say the remark made by the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) is entirely fair and just, that the Government leaned in this matter to the farmers. With respect to what the Secretary of State said as to what would be done in Manitoba, at a future period I will press upon him this argument: This Parliament stands in the position in regard to the North-west Territories, if I may use the language, of being in a large measure a local government. We are not merely a Dominion Government, but we exercise powers over the North-west that are within the circle of the powers of local governments elsewhere. Under these circumstances I think that it will occur to the Government, to the Secretary of State, and I hope to the Minister of Agriculture, that while Manitoba gives a large amount to help creameries, it behooves this Parliament of Canada, not merely to do in the Territories what we do elsewhere, but to supplement what we do at present in the Territories by doing there what a local government fully equipped would do. I will not take up the time of the committee at this hour further than to say that, with my friend the member for Ontario, I am exceedingly pleased to see that the members on the Reform side of the House are on this subject mainly protectionists. They vary a little, as they vary a little on nearly every subject. Individuality is so largely developed in the Reform ranks that they never see exactly eye to eye, and although the hon. member for Huron, the hon. member for Elgin, the hon. member for Bothwell, and the hon. member for Wellington differ as regards details, they all agree in this, that they want to have something done for the farmers.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Let them alone.

Mr. DAVIN. That proves what I say. The hon. member for Bothwell says let them alone, but the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) thanks Heaven that something is being done for the farmers, and the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Semple), who is one of the most respected members of the Reform party, declares that cold storage should be provided, and, of course, that would cost money. Hon. gentlemen of the Reform side cannot escape from this conclusion: they may differ with the Government as to the particular form that protection to the butter industry should take, but so far as I could judge to-night, not a single member declared he would have free trade as it is in England for butter.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) I desire to offer a few remarks in regard to the action taken in Prince Edward Island with respect to the cheese and butter industry. Private enterprise tried to start the cheese industry, and failed. The factories were closed, with one exception, and it produced little. Our protectionist Federal Government, under the very able Dairy Superintendent, Prof. Robertson, came down to our province and established the co-operative system, so that to-day, after an experience of three years only, we have twenty-eight cheese factories and two creameries in existence, and the business is being successfully carried on. The Dominion Government have acted in a progressive and liberal manner towards the people of the province, not only in getting the co-operative system thoroughly established, but in seeing that the products of the dairies and creameries are properly marketed; and I am satisfied that the action of the Government in this respect on the Island will rally the farmers round them when the proper time comes.

Mr. DAVIN.

Committee rose and reported resolutions.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12.55 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 5th June, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PETITION FROM THE AUDITOR GENERAL.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell) presented a petition from the Auditor General and asked that it should be read at the Table of the House.

The petition was read as follows:—

To the Honourable the House of Commons, in Parliament assembled:

The petition of the undersigned, the Auditor General of the Public Accounts of the Dominion of Canada, humbly sheweth:

That he has been pleased to observe that members of Parliament have been good enough to speak of the Audit Office as giving in its annual report evidence of its not having been idle. This indicates to some extent approval of his own work; but it is manifest that one man's labour must count for little in so great an undertaking, and that, therefore, the main credit is due to the staff. He may, consequently, without to any great extent claiming favourable consideration for himself, draw attention to the amount of work which is done in the office. Every person is fully employed during office hours for the whole year, while for half the year the hour of leaving is five o'clock instead of four. Besides, much night work is cheerfully done. Without belittling the work of any other department, he can safely say that more or better work is not done by an equal number of employees in any other branch of the public service.

That it is quite useless to make the Auditor General a parliamentary officer with the object of securing an independent examination of the expenditure of $40,000,000 and of the collection of the same amount of revenue, as well as of giving an intelligible statement in detail of all, while there is left entirely in the hands of those whose financial transactions he is to criticise, the power to give or withhold assistance and the power to promote the clerks or keep them for ever in the same position. It is true the Auditor General has the power to promote when there is money to pay the increases of salary, but if the recommended increases are refused, as they have been, the power to promote never becomes effective.

That, excluding Ministers, Deputy Ministers and messengers from the estimates of the several departments, and himself with the messengers from that of the Audit Office, the percentage of chief and first-class clerks in the Audit Office compared to the whole number there is 16 $\frac{2}{3}$, while that for the whole service is 26, there being but one department—the Post Office—which has a smaller percentage.

That if your petitioner made a comparison between the Audit Office and a department in which no provision is being made for promotion, it might be said that all which can be done by the Government in the case of a department which is now too expensive, is to depend upon deaths and superannuations to restore the annual salary charges of the department to what they should be. It might also be said that, if no superannuations are indicated by the Estimates, it is because none of the staff have reached superannuation age. No one can, however, object to his comparing the Audit Office with the Finance Department, claimed, he supposes, by the Minister of Finance to be well governed, and admitted by the Opposition to be well and economically conducted. Your petitioner assents to the favourable view taken of that department. There are already 5 first-class clerks in the Finance Department, besides 4 chief clerks, and the Minister of Finance says that it is in so great need of another first-class clerk that he is justified in advising its having one, and in advising also the doing away with every restriction to the appointment that exists in the Civil Service Act. The Minister of Finance thus proposes that there shall be 10 higher grade men out of 28, or more than 35 per cent. On the other hand, the Audit Office, having now but 3 chief clerks and 1 first-class clerk, must be considered by the Government as making an extravagant demand when it asks to have two of its second-class clerks promoted to the first class, making 6 higher grade men out of 24, or 25 per cent. Your petitioner thinks that there ought to be 4 first-class clerks in the Audit Office instead of 3. He asked for only 3, two besides the one now in the office, because he understood that there were to be no increases except statutory. As the estimates show that clerks in the Customs and other departments are to be promoted, while they are much below the maximum of their classes, he thinks it is his duty to press for parliamentary authorization of the promotion of a third second-class clerk who is now at $1,350.

If this request were granted, the percentage of the Audit Office would be less than 30 as against 35 in the Finance Department.

That the average cost per clerk in the Audit Office is $1,074, while that of the Finance Department is $1,551, and of the whole inside service $1,228. That, while the Audit Office contributes, like all other departments, to the superannuation fund, not a dollar is now being paid out of that fund for any one whose right to an allowance arose from service in the Audit Office. If you take into account as chargeable to the other departments, the amount paid for superannuation allowances to those who were in the inside service, the average per clerk of the whole service is increased to $1,313.92, as compared to $1,078.96 for the Audit Office.

That there is no friendship between any of the staff and your petitioner, except such as naturally arises in the performance of the daily work of the office for a number of years, and that all the clerks have been appointed by the party who are now in power. That, therefore, there is nothing to interest him in the advancement of any of them, except the success of the work and the desire that any honest man feels to see those who are assisting him get the reward of industry and intelligence.

That, while your petitioner does not desire it to be supposed that all the clerks of the Audit Office are of equal usefulness, it is his duty to state that no improved method of selecting the staff could be the means of providing a more zealous and loyal staff than that which the Audit Office now possesses.

That he should be glad to afford any member of the House who may desire to test the accuracy of his view that the Audit Office gives as good value for its salaries as is given in a well-conducted merchant's office, every opportunity of doing so.

That your petitioner need scarcely say what is likely to be the effect on the work, of giving advancement to men in one department and leaving men of at least equal industry and intelligence in another without recognition. It must be dissatisfaction and ultimate abatement of zeal in the latter. No fair-minded man can conclude that the Audit Office clerks should remain at $1,074, while the general service is at $1,228, and is advancing.

It should not be left to the executive of the day to determine the number of employees of the Audit Office, and particularly the number of the respective grades. That should be done by Parliament. If the Auditor General does his duty, he and his staff will be unpopular with the Government, no matter what may be the political complexion of the dominant party.

That you may restrict all departments, the Audit Office among the rest, in the matter of promotions, to cases where persons have reached the maximum of the class from which promotion is to take place. It is well, however, to remind you that the theoretical organization of the Audit Office, as already established by the Government, permits the promotions which he has sought.

Your petitioner has heard an objection made with reference to the Audit Office expenditure, which, as it appears to him, will not bear a moment's consideration. It is, that men have come in at more than the minimum of their classes. Let him here repeat what was said in his letter in the Report of 1893: "Isn't it better to show the clear-headed, industrious men that you appreciate their intelligence and zeal by giving with pleasure to 3 the salaries you would be forced to give to 4, and get from them more work than from 6 of the other kind, and of an immeasurably better quality? Then, the man who is brightened by his work being appreciated, respects himself and takes an interest in everything connected with his department." There are two questions to ask with reference to the cost of work: 1. What does it cost? 2. What should it cost? Apply the test to the Audit Office expenditure now, or to what it was at any time during the last seventeen years.

It is possible that one of the objections to promotions here is that, when the money provision is made for a promotion, your petitioner makes the promotion, excluding from consideration everything but the claims which the candidates have made good by effective service in the Audit Office. The politicians have done enough for a man when they have secured his appointment. He should have a right to feel that once in the service he may look to his work for advancement. Nothing else should count.

Supposing there were a change of Government to-morrow, what efficiency would there be in the Audit Office, if the incomers could put their friends, with short experience and, therefore, insufficient knowledge of the more important work of the office, over the heads of those who have always done their duty and have acquired a full knowledge of it?

As long as your petitioner is in his present office, no matter what party holds the reins of power, every effort will be made to keep the financial affairs right, and in cases where it is impossible to do that, to make it as clear as possible to the tax-payers of the country wherein in his opinion, the wrong consists; while every man in the office, no matter what his opinions may be about other things, will get what his work entitles him to get, so far as your petitioner has the power to help him to get it.

Your petitioner does not want it to be understood that he complains about the treatment of this office until the last year or two. The success of the office, such as it is, has been brought about in a great measure by Ministers who supported it when it was placed on its present basis, particularly by Sir John Macdonald.

EXTRA CLERKS.

Your petitioner must also draw your attention to the reduction in the estimates for extra clerks from $1,800 to $1,300. The larger sum was appropriated for this current year, and all of it is required.

He is often ashamed in asking men who are doing more than they should be called upon to do, to make a further effort so that the Report may be got out in time, and yet, although the estimates for permanent clerks are reduced by $382.50, the Government has reduced this estimate, as above stated, by $500, without calling upon him for an explanation. Your petitioner just learns that two of the permanent clerks require three months' leave of absence on account of ill-health. Besides, there are now two vacancies in the permanent staff. It will then be impossible to make the Report for the current year anything like it should be in fulness and carefulness, and it will not be got out in time.

One of the extra clerks gets at the rate of $500 a year, and all the rest only $400. They work until five o'clock when permanent clerks do so. One has been here for three years, another for two years. The services of the others are dispensed with as soon as the Report is printed.

Your petitioner therefore prays that your honourable body do appoint a special committee to consider the facts set forth in this petition, and to report the means which should be taken to secure the continued efficiency of the Audit Office, whether by establishing regulations to govern its extra clerk service and by fixing a theoretical organization for the permanent staff of 3 chief clerks, 4 first-class clerks and 5 second-class clerks; or by such other provisions as may seem to be advisable for the purpose, and your petitioner, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I move:

That the petition of the Auditor General presented this day, be printed in the Votes and Proceedings of to-morrow, and that Rule 94 be suspended so as to permit of the same.

Mr. FOSTER. The rule cannot be suspended without consent. However, it is a matter of some interest, I suppose, to the House as a whole, and I have no objection at all to its being printed to-morrow in the Votes and Proceedings; but of course we cannot establish a precedent of that kind with regard to other petitions. It might be printed separately.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not object to its being printed separately; I only wish to get it before the House; and the Auditor General, being a public officer of high rank, what may be done with regard to his petition would not become a precedent for everybody's petition.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is proposed, as I understand, with the consent of the House, to strike out the words, "in the Votes and Proceedings to-morrow."

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT.

Mr. FLINT moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 107) to amend the Canada Temperance Act. He said: The principal provision which it is proposed to amend is that regarding the powers of search under certain circumstances. The object of this amendment is to define more clearly the powers and limits of the search under a search warrant. Another clause refers to a conviction for a second offence in case the party charged is not present at the time of the conviction. I will explain more fully on the second reading.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ASSIGNMENT OF SALARIES OF PUBLIC EMPLOYEES.

Mr. BECHARD moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 108) respecting the assignment and attachment of the salaries of public employees.

Mr. AMYOT. Explain.

Mr. BECHARD. The Bill provides that any public employee may make an assignment to any person of his future salary, and that his head officer, on being notified of it, may pay the creditor of that employee a certain part of his monthly salary. Another clause provides that the salary may be attached by judgment of the court. It provides for the proportion which may be so attached or assigned. If the salary does not exceed $600, no more than one-fifth of each monthly pay can be attached or assigned. If it is over $600, and does not exceed $1,400, not more than one-fourth can be attached or assigned. If it exceeds $1,400, then one-third may be attached or assigned.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the time.

MAJOR GENERAL HERBERT.

Mr. GIBSON asked, 1. Did Major General Herbert tender his resignation last year as Commander of the Canadian Militia? If so, what was the date of his resignation, and the reasons given? 2. Was the late premier, Sir John Thompson, notified while in England, by any member of the Government, of General Herbert's resignation, and what action, if any, was taken thereon? 3. Is General Herbert absent on leave, from what date and how long? 4. Is he expected to resume the position he occupies? 5. Who is now discharging the duties of General Commanding the force? 6. Does the Government contemplate any change in the law so as to permit of the appointment of a Canadian officer as General Commanding?

Mr. DICKEY. In answer to the first question, there is no record in the Department of Militia of a resignation by Major-General Herbert of his position as general officer commanding the Canadian militia. In answer to question No. 2, no. In answer to questions 3, 4, and 5, General Herbert left Canada on leave, granted 25th February last. He has been doing, in England, some work for the department, the duties of his office in Canada being discharged by the Adjutant General. It is not expected that General Herbert will resume the duties in Canada of the general officer commanding. In answer to No. 6, no.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS IMPORTED.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (for Mr. Mulock) asked, What agricultural products, and in what quantities and values, have been imported into Canada since the 30th June, 1894?

Mr. WALLACE. It will take some days to prepare the report. I will be able to answer the question about the end of the week.

THE ROYAL STANDARD.

Mr. MARTIN asked, What persons in Canada have the right to hoist the Royal Standard, and on what occasions?

Mr. DICKEY. The Royal Standard is only authorized to be hoisted at a military station in Canada when a member of the royal family is present (vide 29th March, 1889). This regulation does not, however, apply to Halifax, N.S., at which station the flag is maintained by Her Majesty's Imperial forces under Imperial regulations.

SURVEY OF TOWNSHIP 16, RANGE 16 W.

Mr. MARTIN asked, What action do the Government intend to take with regard to the new survey of township 16, in range 16, west? What is to be done with regard to those settlers who have relied upon the old mounds, and who are in possession?

Mr. DALY. From representations made to the department, it appears that there are gross irregularities or errors in the existing survey of township 16, range 16, west of the 1st meridian. Under section 7, of the Act 52 Vict., chap. 27, the Governor in Council is empowered, in such a case, to direct that the survey be cancelled, and a new one made. Before taking authority to cancel the present survey of the township mentioned, it was considered expedient to send a surveyor to the ground and find out where the lines ought to run. It may be mentioned that all the settlers in the township, with one exception, signed the petition for the re-survey. It now appears, however, that the effect of the re-survey, in at least one instance, will be to place the improvements of the settler upon the road allowance or upon adjoining property. Considerable correspondence has passed between the department and the parties interested, but no final conclusion has yet been arrived at as to the dispositions to be made of the case. Whatever is right will be done.

TELESPHORE GENDREAU—HARBOUR MASTER OF MONTMAGNY.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to grant the inquiry asked for in relation to Telesphore Gendreau, recently appointed harbour master of Montmagny?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Before considering the question of granting the inquiry, it was deemed advisable to communicate with the harbour master, and to furnish him with a copy of the charges laid against him, for immediate reply.

SEIZURE OF STILL AT L'ISLET STATION.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, Whether the Government are aware that a still was seized in one of the sheds of the Intercolonial Railway, at L'Islet station, in March or April last? Did the Dominion officer, Phileas Dubé, report the said seizure? What steps were taken in pursuance thereof? Have the Government instituted, or is it their intention to institute, an inquiry in order to ascertain whether the still was placed in the Government shed by the employees of the Intercolonial, or by other persons?

Mr. WALLACE. 1. The Government is aware that a still was seized at the freight shed of the Intercolonial Railway at L'Islet, 27th April, 1895. 2. The seizure was made and reported by Phileas Dubé. 3. The seizure report was forwarded through the Collector of Inland Revenue at Quebec, who was instructed to confer with the agents of the Department of Justice, and if evidence was sufficient to secure a conviction, to institute proceedings. 4. Yes. The Government have taken steps to ascertain who were the parties responsible for the still being found in the freight shed at L'Islet.

W. FINLAY, OF COURTRIGHT.

Mr. LISTER asked, Has one W. Finlay, of Courtright, recently been appointed to any position in the Customs service? If so, what is the position? What are the duties, and what is the compensation or allowance? How is such compensation or allowance paid i. e., monthly, or otherwise? What particular reason was there for such appointment? Have similar appointments been made at other parts of the province of Ontario recently? If so, where, and what are the names of the appointees?

Mr. WALLACE. In reply to the hon. gentlemen, I beg to say: 1. Yes, Mr. Finlay has been appointed to a position in the Customs service. 2. The position is that of acting preventive officer. 3. His duties are to control and guard the frontier south from Sarnia, to Corunna, Moore, Sombra, Davies Point, Baldoon, Oungh, Stag Island, and Walpole Island, for the prevention and detection of smuggling, also to see that duty is paid on all merchandise which may be imported to Stag Island and Walpole Island—which places, being popular summer resorts, import considerable quantities of goods and articles during the season of navigation. For this work he is remunerated at the rate of $50 a month. 4. The amount is paid monthly. 5. The reason for such appointment is that the officer employed at this work last year, resigned. 6. No vacancy has arisen in other parts of the province of Ontario recently, and, consequently, no other similar appointments have been made. 7. Answered by the above.

MILITARY GROUNDS AT ANNAPOLIS.

Mr. FORBES asked, 1. By whose authority has a grocery shop been built on the military grounds at Annapolis? 2. Who are the lessees or tenants of the whole or any part of said military grounds? 3. What rents are paid for the use of said lands or any part thereof? 4. Are any rents due for the use of said lands, and by whom, and why are the amounts not collected?

Mr. DICKEY. 1. I am not aware that any authority has been given to build a grocery shop on the military grounds at Annapolis. I have caused inquiry to be made immediately. 2. The department has at present only one tenant at Annapolis, a Mr. Andrew Gilmour. 3. The rental paid by Mr. Gilmour is $12 per week. 4. There are no arrears due for the Annapolis property, save the claim the department holds against Mr. T. B. Mills for $823.69. This claim is disputed by Mr. Mills. Legal proceedings have not yet been taken against Mr. Mills to decide the dispute.

MALIGNANT COVE AND MERIGOMISH MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. McISAAC asked, 1. Was the contract for carrying Her Majesty's mails between Malignant Cove and Ingonish, in the province of Nova Scotia, under the terms of an advertisement calling for tenders for said service, dated 1st March, 1895, awarded, and to whom? 2. What are the names of the persons who tendered, and the amounts of their respective tenders? 3. Were the tenders opened? If not, why not? 4. If the contract was not awarded under the terms of the advertisement to any of the persons who tendered, to whom was it awarded, for what amount, and for what reason?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The contract for the Malignant Cove and Merigomish mail service was awarded to W. J. McDonald, but not under the terms of the advertisements calling for tenders. As the new contract was a renewal of the one now in operation, the tenders were not opened, and the department is therefore unaware of the particulars of the tenders received. The existing contract was renewed under authority of paragraph 2, section 61 of the Post Office Act.

DISMISSAL OF CONDUCTOR GEORGE McCULLY.

Mr. PATTERSON (Colchester) asked, 1. Has any application been received by the Minister of Railways and Canals for an investigation as to the reasons for the dismissal of conductor George McCully from the service of the Intercolonial Railway? 2. For what reasons were conductor McCully's services dispensed with? 3. Is it the intention to reinstate him in the railway service?

Mr. HAGGART. In answer to the hon. gentleman, I have to state that an application asking for an investigation was received, but it was not considered necessary to hold one. His services were dispensed with because he was not considered a suitable person for the position of conductor. There is no intention of reinstating him.

NEW CHANNEL AT GRAND ETANG.

Mr. FRASER asked, Does the Government propose to open a new channel at Grand Etang, Cape Breton? If not, what is the reason? Has any promise been given by the Government, at any time, that such new channel would be opened?

Mr. OUIMET. The Department of Public Works proposes to open a new channel at Grand Etang, Cape Breton, so soon as the road which crosses the entrance to the Grand Etang has been diverted by the municipal authorities. I am not aware that any promise was given at any time by the Government, but the opening of the channel in question is part of the work required to make Grand Etang a harbour of refuge for the fishermen of the district.

ENFRANCHISEMENT OF WOMEN.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Davin:

That in the opinion of this House, the privilege of voting for candidates for membership therefore should be extended to women possessing the qualifications which now entitle men to the electoral franchise; and the motion of Mr. Laurier in amendment thereto.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I have listened, the other day, to the speech delivered by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), in reference to the enfranchisement of women. I could not help admiring the ingenuity of the hon. member in trying to show that the female portion of humanity had a natural right to vote; that is to say, to mix up with politics, on an equal footing with the male portion. The rights of the two sexes are quite different and they have been long since defined by the wisdom of the most civilized nations on earth. At all times, it has been admitted that a woman is a queen in her home, a queen in the family and that she has an absolute right to direct the family's domestic and intimate education; that according as that education is good or bad, the individual receiving it bears the traces of it during his life-time. On that early education, indeed, depends the part that will later on be played in the community by the citizen receiving it. On that early education depends the qualities, good or bad, that will develop in the individual who was its object. And lastly on that education and on those qualities often depends the future of the family and even the future and prosperity of nations. It is allowed on all hands, Mr. Speaker, that a woman reigns supreme in the family realm and I cannot conceive what service my hon. friend will render her by claiming for her the right to take a hand in the terrible conflicts of politics. I cannot see there any advantage to her, but I rather see an onerous burden for her in a contest in which man himself often leaves his good repute. If my hon. friend's motion would give to womankind a new device by which humanity could be made happier, which he has not shown, I would think it the duty of this House to take it into its earnest consideration. But, on the contrary, I only see in it the fulfilling of a painful duty which the men wish to get rid of by drawing the fair sex into the political arena. For this reason, I do not think it generous on the part of a citizen, or a member of this House, to attempt to throw upon woman's shoulders one of the heaviest burdens that bears on those of men, the burden of politics, the burden of electoral contests, the burden of representation. For, if it be admitted that one day or another women are to be called upon to take part in the elections and to give their votes, we will have to admit them likewise to the responsibilities of representation. It would be an amusing, I was going to say a queer sight, that of the mother of a family having under her charge a dozen children, some of whom would yet be in their infancy, receiving canvassers in her house, during the absence of her husband, who would inculcate to her political principles, give her a political direction and induce her to the polls, there to give a vote sometimes hostile to that of her husband, the two representatives of the family. This proposal of the hon. gentleman should be rejected for many other reasons. For, besides paying a poor compliment to women, it throws upon their shoulders too heavy a burden for them—a burden which is exclusively ours. This has been acknowledged since the origin of the representative government and I think our sex should have the courage to fill in the community the portion of obligations that were assigned to it, without allowing any encroachment upon this department. We will have the courage of our ancestors who showed themselves to be true friends of their country, by reserving to themselves alone the political duties and we will leave the woman, that guardian angel of society, that good directress of the family, within her sphere and her sanctuary, to the duties which were assigned to her by the wisdom of the people, the legislators and the clergymen of the various religions. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, for all these reasons and for many others, I understand the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) should not press the passing of his resolution. To invite the fair sex to take part in our political contests seems to me to be as humiliating and as shocking a proposition as to invite her to form part of our militia battalions organized for the defence of the country, for, Mr. Speaker, the military profession does not belong to that sex. Not that I would say that no honour attaches to that profession likely to tempt both sexes. So, from time to time—it is shown by history—devoted women were found with martial souls, who launched out into the military career and sometimes rendered signal services to their country. But is it possible to leave aside the lesson given us by the wisdom of nations and only to be guided by such precedents in order to come to the conclusion that women should go to war, be enrolled in our militia battalions and sent forward against an invading foe? Such a proposition, Mr. Speaker, would be considered as preposterous; it would be considered as a device on the part of men for escaping duties, obligations and charges which were imposed upon the stronger sex and having them shared by the weaker sex. The female sex is released from such charges and duties by the laws of our legislators, by the common sense of nations and by the common sense of the religious authorities. So, Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) will not press the passing of his resolution: and should my hon. friend press it, I hope the House, relying on the numerous precedents that are to be found in any civilized country, and acting on the precedents supplied by the wisdom of nations, will not add new burdens to the already numerous and heavy ones which bear on the shoulders of the fair sex. By adopting the principle involved in the resolution moved by him, my hon. friend would throw upon them the burden of politics, which belongs to us, and which we should have courage enough to bear alone.

SEDUCTION AND ABDUCTION.

Mr. CHARLTON moved that Bill (No. 3) to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, for the purpose of making more effectual provision for the punishment of seduction and abduction, be read the second time. He said: In presenting this Bill to the House, I desire to make a very few remarks to set forth the reasons why I deem that the Criminal Code, in this respect, should be amended slightly in some of its provisions. The measure for making seduction, under certain circumstances, a criminal offence, was first introduced into this House, I think, fifteen years ago. That Bill, in the various stages of its progress through the House, received the efficient aid of my hon. friend who now leads the House, and from whom I solicit a kindly consideration of the amendments that are proposed to be made to that Act. The Bill was at first received with great manifestations of disfavour. Very few members saw fit to support the principle of the Bill, but it gradually won its way, after discussion from year to year, and through the gradual creation of a public sentiment in the country in favour of the measure. The pressure of public sentiment in the country led to the adoption of the measure by the House. The Bill, after its passage by the House, was reaffirmed by the action of the House, I think, in three successive sessions before it secured the assent of the Senate, and it received in that body some modifications which somewhat impaired the efficiency of the Bill. At last it became the law of the land, and that law has been upon the statute-books for several years. Many prognostications were made with regard to the operation of the law. Those who were opposed to it apprehended very grave difficulties arising from the facilities it would afford for blackmail, and apprehended that it would prove to be a law not in the interests of the country. These fears, I am happy to say, have all proved to be groundless. The law has given satisfaction, has proved to be a law which has been received with favour by the country, and has grown in favour as it has continued upon the statute-book, and as its operations have developed the influence that it is calculated to exert. The results, I affirm, are in the highest degree satisfactory; and I may point with great gratification to the fact that the record of illegitimacy for the province of Ontario is lower than that of any other country in the world, so far as I know. It is lower than the record of the state of Massachusetts, it is lower than the record of the British Empire, or of any of the European countries that I am aware of. It amounts to only a fraction over 12 in the 1,000; and I attribute this favourable condition of public morals, to some extent, at least, to the operation of this law. Now, Sir, I do not need to descant upon the character of the old law or its provisions, for these are all familiar to the members of the House. The old law fixed the age of consent at sixteen years. Seduction between the ages of fourteen and sixteen was a criminal offence. Seduction below fourteen was punished with still greater severity, and between the ages of fourteen and sixteen seduction was a penal offence. I propose, in this measure, to ask the House to increase the age of consent from sixteen to eighteen years. This is practically the law in England at the present time, I believe, it is the law in New York, and many other of the American states, and I see no reason why, in a country like Canada, the age of consent should be limited to sixteen years. The age of innocence, and of lack of knowledge of the wiles and ways of the world, does not pass away at the age of sixteen, in the majority of cases; and our young women are perhaps, in some degree, as unsophisticated and as liable to the wiles of the seducer between the ages of sixteen and eighteen, as prior to that age. The first proposal of this Bill is as follows:

Section 181 of the Criminal Code, 1892, is hereby amended by substituting the word "eighteen" for the word "sixteen" in the fifth line thereof.

Which would be fixing the age of consent at eighteen years instead of sixteen years. The next proposal of the Bill is to amend section 182 of the Criminal Code by substituting the word "eighteen" for the word "twenty-one." The age fixed when the male is liable to prosecution for seduction under promise of marriage in the Bill as it originally left this House, was eighteen; but in the Senate that provision of the Bill was changed, and the age was placed at twenty-one, so that no man under the law was liable for seduction under promise of marriage until he had reached the age of twenty-one. Some of the senators, in private conversation, thought that some of their boys might get into trouble if the law was not put into that shape. The proposal of the Bill is to make a man liable for seduction under promise of marriage, at the age that a girl ceases to be protected by the law limiting the age of consent, namely, at the age of eighteen. The third section of the Bill proposes to amend section 283 of the Code by substituting the words "twenty-one" for the word "sixteen." in the fourth line. Perhaps I had better read that section in order to make clearer the change that is proposed:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to five years' imprisonment, who unlawfully takes, or causes to be taken, any unmarried girl, being under the age of sixteen years, out of the possession, and against the will of her father or mother, or of any other person having the lawful care or charge of her.

The amendment proposes to raise the age from sixteen to twenty-one. These are the changes in the Bill I now present to the House: First, to raise the age of consent from sixteen to eighteen; second, to make the man punishable for the act of seduction under promise of marriage if of the age of eighteen, instead of, as at present, twenty-one; and, third, to make the act of abduction punishable in the case of a female of twenty-one, or less, instead of sixteen, or less.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman who has charge of this Bill has stated that he has endeavoured to obtain legislation on this line for some years.

Mr. CHARLTON. I stated that efforts to get legislation such as proposed in the Bill had been made; but the Bill has been in operation for some years.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes; but efforts in the direction of amendments now proposed to the code were commenced some years ago. When I asked the hon. gentleman when these efforts were first entered upon, he said twelve years ago. I have not any recollection as to when the hon. gentleman undertook to bring this subject before Parliament. My object in referring to that matter is to call attention of the House to the fact that the subject has been before Parliament on many occasions, and a great deal of discussion has taken place. In England the subject has been considered. This is a question surrounded with a great many difficulties. No doubt the hon. gentleman is impelled to persist and continue his efforts by the agitation which, if I may say it without offence, for I mean none, is confined wholly to people who have had little or no experience in the administration of criminal law, but people who occupy very high and important positions in society, and in different parts of our country, and who, actuated by the very highest principles and best of motives, think they will secure society against evil, and prevent these serious offences taking place by making the law severe, and placing the age as the hon. gentleman now proposes. This whole subject was very carefully considered by this Parliament in 1892, and it is my duty to call the attention of the House to the fact that I find further that from no Attorney General connected with the administration of criminal matters in the provinces, or any of the judges, who watch these matters and take interest in them, has there been any statement or representation which would warrant me in coming to the conclusion that there was a desire on the part of those concerned with the administration of criminal law to secure the changes proposed. In England it was not till 1885 that the age was placed as it is in our code of 1892. The Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons in that year gave much attention to this subject. The hon. gentleman has spoken of the state this Bill left the House: but it received very careful consideration on the part of the committee, and Parliament, and whether the Senate took the action by which the law, as it now stands, was framed, or not, the result is, that outside of the people to whom I have referred making further and strenuous efforts to secure society against those evils, there is not a particle of information which Parliament should have in a case of this kind to lead it to venture further into legislation surrounded with innumerable difficulties. I do not think, therefore, that it is necessary for me to refer at greater length to this subject. I feel that what I am saying is within the knowledge of many hon. members who have had far more experience in the courts, and in connection with the administration of criminal justice, than I possess; and holding this view, and with every respect for the intentions of those who are behind the hon. gentleman in this matter. I do not think there is sufficient warrant for the legislation proposed. I therefore move that this Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read the second time this day six months.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) For my part, I concur in the reasons which the Minister of Justice has given that this House should not assent to the Bill. When the hon. gentleman introduced his Bill some years ago, to make seduction a criminal offence, punishable by this Parliament, he had my sympathy and support. The question of the arbitrary age at which Parliament should make the offence a criminal one is one which aroused much discussion, and the matter was thoroughly threshed out at that time. The principle adopted at that time was that a child below a certain age ought not to be held, in the eyes of the law, responsible in the sense of giving consent, and Parliament fixed the age at sixteen years. We must fix some arbitrary age, although no one can say that it is absolutely correct; but the general consensus of opinion was that sixteen was about the age at which the line should be drawn. Nothing has occurred in the part of the Dominion from which I come to induce me to vote to alter the age. Government should not be tinkering with these laws every year. When we have a law which works fairly well, and the general consensus is that this law is working fairly well, and requires no amendment, we would be taking a leap in the dark and moving in a wrong direction if we altered the age.

Mr. CURRAN. Not only must the arguments presented by the Minister of Justice and the hon. member for Queen's be considered, but it must be remembered that the mover of the Bill has not himself stated that it has come within his knowledge, or within the knowledge of those for whom he is acting, that there is any necessity for changing this law. The Bill is not, therefore, to remove any evil, the existence of which he knows, or is known by any of those with whom he is connected, and without a single complaint or suggestion before the Department of Justice of any sort from any source whatever, either from police magistrates, judges, or Attorney Generals of the provinces, it would be altogether improper to amend a law which has worked well so far.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not think it is a very good reason for not adopting the Bill, that it has not been recommended by the judges throughout the land. If we have to wait for legislation until representations have been made by the judges, we shall frequently have to wait a long time. This Bill is in the right direction, and should receive the support of the House, and, for my part, I intend to support it.

Mr. CHARLTON. I suppose the fate of the Bill is a foregone conclusion, as the Minister of Justice and practically the Government have declared against it. I would call the attention of the leader of the House to the fact that he was once a supporter of this proposal in this House, and I can see no reason for his dropping down from the position he then occupied with regard to this measure. The Bill as it left this House was a more stringent measure than it appears on the statute-book to-day. My hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) says that it is very difficult to tell what limit should be fixed, that the limit of age is an arbitrary limit, and that we may be pretty near the proper limit now and we may not. The object of the Bill is to preserve the morals of the community and to confer a benefit upon Canada by guarding the purity and chastity of the young females of the country, and the age of sixteen was evidently fixed by the Senate because it was thought, if a girl was sixteen years she had sufficient knowledge of the world, and of the wiles of the seducer, to enable her to guard against the consequences that this Bill is calculated to protect her from. I do not believe that such is the case, and I believe that the general consensus of opinion in this country is that the proper limit should not fall short of eighteen years. If it is proper to fix a limit at all, then it is proper to extend that limit of age from sixteen to eighteen years, which this House once believed was correct. So far from there being any evidence that this is unnecessary, we have the evidence of numerous states that have adopted the limit of eighteen years. That limit has been adopted by the great state of New York, upon our borders.

An hon. MEMBER. Any other state?

Mr. CHARLTON. I think it has been adopted by many other states, and if I am correctly informed, it is the limit of age in England.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, sixteen years is the limit in England, adopted in 1835.

Mr. CHARLTON. This limit has been adopted in many of the United States, and I might urge for consideration that the age of maturity among females is reached somewhat later in Canada than in the states to the south. I do not believe that our female population, with our society usages, and the dangers that lurk in their path, are any better qualified to resist these wiles at eighteen than at sixteen years. My hon. friend says that we should not tinker with the law every year. I agree with him, and I wish to point out that I have not been tinkering with the law. This law has been on the statute-book for five or six years without an attempt to have it changed. We have experience as to the character of the law and its working. When that law went on the statute-book, it was predicted that it would lead to blackmailing. It was affirmed that it would be a weapon in the hands of unscrupulous females for the purpose of inflicting injury upon innocent males who themselves were the ones that ought to be protected by the law against the wiles of the seducer. Practically all these fears with regard to the operation of the law have proved groundless.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. CHARLTON. My hon. friend says "no." I do not know of a case where this law has not proved beneficial. I do not know of a case where this law has not been calculated to punish the vilest of all criminals, the one who robs a female of her virtue. It has met with the approbation of all classes of society, and if the law is necessary or salutary at all, I assert that it would be proper to advance the age from sixteen to eighteen years of age, for the purpose of affording more efficient security than it now does. My hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) says: Leave well enough alone. Well, of course, that is an admission that that law is a good one.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I said we had gone far enough, and possibly too far.

Mr. CHARLTON. Perhaps the hon. gentleman did not mean what he said. My opinion is that if you have a thing in a pretty good position you should better it if you can. The Minister of Justice said, there is no evidence that there is any popular opinion asking for an amendment of this law. I beg to differ with the hon. gentleman. As far as I have been able to follow public sentiment, there is a general expression of feeling that the age of consent ought to be eighteen years, and the action of the House in granting the first section of this Bill, was met with the general approval of the public and press of this country. Having watched the indications of public sentiment myself in this matter, I can assure the hon. gentleman that he makes a mistake when he says there is no public sentiment asking for this change. The Government may not have been memorialized by judges or police magistrates, but the amendment is proposed on the broad basis of the protection of female virtue, and the object of the law is to make it a penal offence to destroy the virtue of the female. I can imagine no reason why a girl under eighteen years of age should not be protected as well as a girl under sixteen.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why not make it nineteen?

Mr. FERGUSON. Or forty-five.

Mr. CHARLTON. We have got to stop somewhere.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why?

Mr. CHARLTON. Because we assume that at the age of eighteen a girl has acquired enough knowledge of the world to lead us to say that she should take care of herself. But, while she is between sixteen years old and eighteen, we may presume that is not the case, and that she is as much in need of protection between sixteen and eighteen as she is between fifteen and sixteen years. The Solicitor General informs us that there is no desire, so far as he knows, for a change in the law. Well, the hon. gentleman must have read the newspaper press of the country very carelessly. I have followed a great many newspapers, and I do not remember a single case where a Canadian newspaper favourable to restrictions of any kind whatever has pronounced against this amendment. However, if the Government denies this application; if my hon. friend the leader of the House goes back upon the record he made once when I felt so grateful to him for assistance in this matter; we will have to wait. I had to wait for a good many years before I got this Bill through, and I had to wait three years before it went through the Senate. I may have to wait further until I have that Bill perfected, but I have no doubt that I will attain my object in the end. I shall, of course, vote against the amendment of the Minister of Justice, and I hope we may have the yeas and nays.

Amendment, six months hoist, agreed to.

SUPERANNUATION ACT.

Mr. McMULLEN moved second reading of Bill (No. 6) to amend the Superannuation Act.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend knows that I have a Bill on the Government Orders dealing with the question of superannuation. I might suggest that the hon. gentleman retain his Bill on the paper until my Bill comes up for discussion in the House, and we then could take up the whole question together. Of course that is as the hon. gentleman feels in the matter.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I think that is the fifth time during my parliamentary life that I have had the privilege of bringing before this House the question of superannuation. For several years, I have given considerable study to the operation of the Act, and I have endeavoured to expose the objectionable operation of that Act upon the public expenditure of this country. Last year, at the urgent request of the First Minister, I consented to allow this Bill to stand over, on the ground that the Finance Minister was not in the House at the time, and I did not get another opportunity of bringing it forward. On this occasion, I would gladly consent to the proposition made by the Finance Minister had I positive assurance that I would have another opportunity of moving the second reading; but, owing to the manner in which I was disappointed last year, I think I should embrace the present opportunity to go on with the Bill. I have endeavoured to point out, from year to year, the manner in which the Superannuation Act has operated. I have proved that the country has lost a large amount of money by the continuation of this system. The Act was brought into force in 1871, when Sir Francis Hincks was Finance Minister in the Government headed by Sir John Macdonald. Had the Act been allowed to remain on the statute-book as it was first introduced, by which 4 per cent was deducted from salaries of $600 and over, and 2½ per cent from salaries under $600, the fund would have been self-sustaining. In fact, had it been honestly administered, as I will prove later on it has not been, it would have been more than self-sustaining. But, after the Act had been in force some three years, Sir Leonard Tilley, when Finance Minister, introduced an amendment to it, providing that the sum deducted from the salary of civil servants should be reduced—on salaries of $600, and over, from 4 per cent to 2 per cent; and on salaries under $600, from 2½ per cent to 1¼ per cent. That cut down the receipts under the operation of the Act, 50 per cent. The result was that, owing to the large number of civil servants who were superannuated from year to year, the superannuation fund became a drain upon the country's resources, which grew worse and worse from year to year. Now, I will give the receipts and expenditures on account of the fund for each year during its operation:

Year.	Receipts.	Expenditure
	$ cts.	$ cts.
1871	49,470 50	12,880 49
1872	53,213 80	38,842 81
1873	54,757 30	53,026 12
1874	34,620 18	64,442 84
1875	36,678 71	71,371 85
1876	38,476 00	101,627 16
1877	40,890 26	104,826 99
1878	41,856 62	106,588 91
1879	41,959 20	113,531 63
1880	43,531 80	116,391 75

Years.	Receipts.	Expenditure
	$ cts.	$ cts.
1881	44,295 80	147,362 10
1882	46,426 39	160,319 95
1883	46,372 03	186,236 67
1884	51,882 21	192,692 70
1885	52,701 33	203,636 21
1886	57,075 43	200,655 25
1887	62,600 96	202,235 35
1888	62,945 72	212,743 72
1889	63,031 46	218,933 65
1890	61,513 05	241,764 66
1891	62,824 60	241,110 49
1892	63,862 79	253,679 58
1893	64,433 27	263,710 15
1894	63,974 67	262,302 00

This shows that during the time the Act has been in force, some twenty-two years, the total receipts were $1,239,094.08, and the total expenditure, $3,770,963.83; or a net loss to the country of $2,531,869.75. The number on the list of superannuated officers at the end of 1893-94 was 351. The gross amount paid to them is $262,302. The average amount to each is $476. The total amount contributed by those now in the Civil Service during the last year is $63,994.67. The total number on the Civil Service list last year who contributed to the fund was 4,685, and the average amount contributed by those who are now in the Civil Service is $14.10 annually. I contend that the Act has been very much abused. Had it been administered as originally intended, the amount which the country has been called on to pay would not have been sacrificed. The Act, however, was only in force a few years when it was used as a means to remove civil servants from the positions they occupied and place them upon a retiring allowance, in order that room might be made for others who were pressing their services on the Government. Now, to show the position in which the Civil Service now stands, and to prove that there is no necessity, from a financial standpoint, why superannuation should be continued, let me give the figures from a return that has been placed before Parliament, of the number of civil servants in the employ of this country on the 30th June, 1894, and the average salary paid. It will be found that we have in the inside service in the city of Ottawa, 898 employees altogether. They draw a gross salary of $1,095,723.50, or an average salary of $1,220 each. Then we have the outside service, consisting of 3,787 employees, who draw a gross amount of $2,830,063.30, or an average salary of $747. Taking the inside and the outside service together, the average salary of all the employees of this Dominion, on the 30th June, 1894, was $838. Now, I contend that the Civil Service are fairly well paid. There is no other class in this Dominion who get an average salary of $838 per year. School teachers do not get that much, neither do ministers of the gospel. Take the bank clerks throughout the Dominion, and I venture to say that they do not get an average salary of $838. You will get no other class in this Dominion that, on the whole, is as well paid as the Civil Service. They have short hours, good salaries, and they get three weeks holidays during the summer, during which their salaries are allowed to run. Under these circumstances, there is no ground whatever why we should be asked, in the straitened condition of our finances, to contribute not only the gross sum of over $200,000 a year, but to keep adding to the list of superannuated civil servants and thus add to the drain on our resources from year to year. To prove that the system has been grossly abused, to prove that hon. gentlemen opposite have, year after year, utilized this Act for the purpose of making room for those who were pressing their services on the Government, let me mention the fact that on the list of superannuated officials there are eighty-four who were superannuated under the age of fifty, and a considerable number superannuated under the age of forty. It is evident that a number of those were removed to make places for others who were urging upon some members of Parliament or upon the Cabinet the engaging of their services by the country at a good round salary. I claim that, with the facilities enjoyed in Canada for life insurance, it would be much better to leave the civil servants to provide for themselves, in case of sickness or old age, by taking advantage of the very cheap systems of insurance now in force rather than to compel them to contribute to this fund, in the hope that they will reap the benefits of superannuation. I am glad to be able to say that I have good reason to believe that the Civil Service is in favour of the measure I am now advocating. The salary of each one is subject to a reduction of 2 per cent annually, and those who die in the service never get any benefit, nor do their relatives, from this drawback on their salary. It is in a great measure only the incompetent class, who have put in a few years' service and are in the way of the more efficient class, who reap the benefit of superannuation. Then, the only other class which gets any benefit consists of those who were removed because their places were wanted for others. These are the two classes that fill the superannuation list. We have throughout the country many evidences of the application of the system in this way. Take, for instance, the postmastership of Montreal. Mr. Lamothe, who used to be postmaster, had served a term of twelve years, and Mr. Dansereau was very anxious to get his place. Through the influence, I presume, of Mr. Chapleau, now Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, he secured the superannuation of Mr. Lamothe, at an allowance of some $2,000 a year, by adding eight years to his term of service. Mr. Lamothe was superannuated at that figure, and is now enjoying life in Montreal on that ample allowance, and Mr. Dansereau was appointed in his place at $4,000 a year. You can go through the whole country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and find evidences of the scandalous abuse of that Act in every city and town. On 30th December, I see the Government were still continuing to use this Act in a manner contrary to the interests of the people. The return provided for under this Act and laid on the Table of the House this year shows that on the 30th December, 1894, the Government had, during that year, added 57 to the list. The gross amount payable to that 57 as long as they live, is $22,710.33 per year. There have been gratuities given to some five in addition to the number superannuated, amounting to some $2,631. Now, I notice that some have been superannuated who have not served the number of years provided for in the Act, which makes ten years the minimum term of service in order to qualify for superannuation. In order to get over that the Government have utilized another clause of the Act which authorizes them to add years to the term of service for reasons such as efficient service, technical knowledge of some particular subject, and so on. Mr. W. G. Gouin, a culler in receipt of $500 a year—the cullers are employed only in the summer time as there is no culling to be done in winter—served five years. He is now 37 years of age. The Government added ten years to his term of service and granted him an allowance of $150 a year for the rest of his life. Thomas Malone, also a culler, on a similar salary, served eight years, had ten years added to his term of service and now, at 37 years of age he is retired on a pension of $108. Out of the 551 names in the superannuation list, hon. gentlemen opposite have superannuated 429. Since the year 1880, they have superannuated 412 civil servants, so that there is a very small percentage on the superannuated list to-day who were not superannuated by hon. gentlemen opposite. While I am on this point, I will give a few more names to show how this Act has been abused:

Mr. McMULLEN.

If the Act had been honestly administered, as the Superannuation Act in England is administered, the balance would be on the right side of the ledger to-day. Every possible excuse that can be used has been used in order to superannuate men who were filling lucrative positions that were wanted for others. The result is that over two and a half million dollars of the people's money have virtually been wasted. Let me give you a statement that I have prepared, showing the amount that has been paid in and the amount drawn out by a number of those on the superannuated list. Shortly after Parliament opened, I procured an order of the House for a return that would give us the full amount that had been paid in by each civil servant now on the superannuated list and the gross amount drawn by him from the fund up to the present time. For some reason that return has not been brought down. It is not one that would take a great deal of work to prepare. I made up my mind that I would not delay the second reading of my Bill for that return, for fear it should not be presented during the present session. Now, in the statement I have prepared the amount paid in is based upon the last three years of service, so I am virtually giving them credit for more than they have paid in, for it is well known that civil servants get an increase of $50 or $100, or, in some cases, $200 per year. And basing the calculations of their payment to the fund on the last three years of their service, gives them credit for a larger amount than they are entitled to. But I want to give credit for the full amount, and even more, as I am charging them with the full amount they have drawn. This is the list I refer to :

My reason for detaining the House by reading over this list is to point out the objectionable manner in which the Act is administered. I have given those who have been drawing on the resources of the Dominion credit for more than they have paid, and the amount drawn for superannuation is that which will be drawn up to the 30th of this month. I may add that every name on the list is that of an officer who has been superannuated by hon. gentlemen opposite. I contend that under these circumstances, in face of all these facts, it is quite time in the interests of the country that we should abolish the system. There is no necessity to keep it in existence, and I now move the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER. I should like to call the attention of the House to the provisions of the Bill before the motion is put, because in my opinion this is a Bill which must be introduced on the responsibility of the Crown, if introduced at all. This Bill contains certain provisions, and it seems to me on reading it carefully—though at first glance I thought the first section might have gone—that the whole Bill hinges upon section 3, which is as follows:—

Any person now in the Civil Service of Canada, or any person so appointed after the passing of this Act, shall upon his retiring from the public service, or if he dies when in the service, his legal representatives shall upon his death be entitled to the repayment of the whole amount of the deductions from his salary under the provisions of the said Act, together with interest thereon calculated and compounded at the rate of five per cent per annum on conditions herein-after provided by this Act.

It seems to me that this creates a charge on the public revenue, which it is not competent for any private member of the House to impose by any Bill introduced into this House.

Mr. McMULLEN. I submitted the Bill to the Law Clerk of the House, and asked him with respect to my right to introduce it as a private member, and he agreed that I was quite within my right in introducing it, and I have done so.

Mr. FOSTER. But the Law Clerk is simply concerned with drafting Bills, and he will draft a Bill for any member. The hon. gentleman should have known that he has not the power to bring in such a measure as this, without the assent of the Crown.

Mr. McMULLEN. I submitted the Bill to the Law Clerk, and he held that it was quite within the right of a private member to introduce such a Bill. If the Government are prepared to assume the responsibility of ruling the Bill out on this ground, well and good.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member must not place on the Government the responsibility of ruling out his Bill. That responsibility devolves on the Chair. If my opinion was that the Bill was in order, the opinion of the Government would not prevail in inducing me to decide that it was out of order. Not being in order, the second reading of the Bill cannot be put.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think my hon. friend has proceeded on the assumption that it can scarcely be held to involve a charge on the public treasury, as under it provides for the full amount to be repaid.

Mr. FOSTER. With 5 per cent compounded interest.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Well, but if the Government choose to retain the money at that rate of interest, that is a different matter.

Mr. FOSTER. That gives a claim to the person superannuated.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But, the hon. gentleman will see that my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) is proceeding all along upon the assumption that there is to be no charge upon the public revenue, and that it is simply a trust on the part of the Government, created on behalf of those in the public service. On that ground, I think it would be worth some little consideration.

Mr. SPEAKER. Of course, I have not had a very great deal of time to give consideration to this matter, but my own opinion is very decided, that the provision in the Bill that the Government is to pay 5 per cent compound interest, constitutes a charge upon the public revenue. The provision of the Bill, if I understand it aright, is that any person now in the permanent Civil Service of Canada, and having contributed to the superannuation fund, shall be entitled to select whether he shall retain his right to superannuation under the provisions of the Act, or abandon the same, and accept in lieu thereof the provisions of this Bill.

Now, if he abandons his right to superannuation under the present Act, and accepts the provisions of this Bill—if the Bill passes and becomes law—clearly the Government would be bound to pay 5 per cent compound interest upon the amount paid in, not only to the individual himself, but to his legal representatives in case of his death in the service. It seems to me, so far as I am able to judge, that it certainly imposes a charge upon the public revenue.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, you will recollect that this is not the first time this question has been before the House.

Mr. FOSTER. Not in that form.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Never mind the form. It does not matter whether it was by resolution or Bill, because if a private member has a right to introduce a resolution, he would have the same right to introduce a Bill. One of the most distinguished members the House has ever had, and who was leader of the Opposition at the time, introduced a resolution in 1882 on the identical lines the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) adopted; and with the clause which Mr. Speaker has said is beyond the power of a private member to introduce. Of course, that is not conclusive.

Mr. FOSTER. What was the resolution?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It was introduced by Mr. Blake, providing that the Civil Service Act should be amended in the identical direction that my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) provides for. The principle in itself was so eminently just that it commanded the assent of a very large number of the members of this House. The motion was lost on a party vote, but I have heard expressions of opinion from hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House that the principle involved was just, and that if party ties were not pressed, it would command the assent of a large majority of the members. That resolution was brought up a second time by another hon. gentleman on this side of the House. The point of order which is now taken by yourself, Mr. Speaker, never was raised, nor was it thought of by any hon. member. My hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) followed the precedent set by Mr. Blake, and adopted afterwards by another prominent member of the Opposition. Mr. Blake's motion was debated in this House for several days, and I submit that my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) had a good, honest right to assume that he was fairly within his right when he made the same proposition in the form of a Bill. There may be something in what Your Honour says, and as I have not had an opportunity of looking closely into the rules of Parliament in the matter, I will not express an opinion one way or another. Unless you are very thoroughly satisfied, Sir, as to your ruling, I venture to hope that the matter should not be finally decided by you at the present time, without your looking into the question more closely.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The procedure, no doubt, followed by Mr. Blake was under the practice referred to by Dr. Bourinot in his work, at page 536 :

A practice has grown up in the House of allowing the introduction of resolutions by private members, when they do not directly involve the expenditure of public money, but simply express an abstract opinion on a matter which may necessitate a future grant. As this is a question not always understood, it may be explained that such resolutions, being framed in general terms, do not bind the House to future legislation on the subject, and are merely intended to point out to the Government the importance and necessity of such expenditure.

There is the distinction, I submit. The Bill the hon. gentleman has now in hand does not ask the House to bind itself to a mere expression of opinion, but it asks the House to commit itself to specific legislation which involves directly a charge upon the Crown.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would submit also, that as the measure of my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) is directed to the object of materially reducing the burdens of the people, that it is well within the purview of any member of this House. I grant you he cannot add to the burdens of the people by his Bill, but if he can materially reduce those burdens, he makes out a strong case why he is in order.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) desires that I should look further into this question, I have no objection to doing so. I may tell him, however, that my opinion is very decided with regard to it at present, and it will require strong evidence to convince me I am not right with regard to the position I have taken.

Mr. CAMPBELL moved the adjournment of the debate.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair, and the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 6th June, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ST. THOMAS, ONT., POST OFFICE.

Mr. CASEY asked, What additions have been made to the salaries of the postmaster and of each of the employees in the post office at St. Thomas, Ont., within a year, and when ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No changes have been made in the salaries of the postmaster and employees in the post office at St. Thomas during last year.

CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT—SPECIAL EMPLOYEES.

Mr. CASEY asked, 1. What are the names of all the persons, not members of the permanent Civil Service, who have been or are now employed by the Customs Department during the past five years in the manner of and for the purposes described in the answer given by the Controller of Customs to a question on 30th May ult., as follows :—

Mr. WALLACE. I do not know that any individual is so employed at the present time who is not a member of the Civil Service. It is only when an important question arises at a time when our regular staff is fully occupied, or when a question is so technical in its nature as to render advisable the employment of one technically qualified to make the investigation, that individuals might be employed temporarily in this connection.

2. During what periods has each been employed ? 3. What class, or classes, of merchandise has each made investigations or reports in regard to ? 4. In what country or countries has each been employed ? 5. What pay or allowance has been given to each ? 6. What was the occupation of each at the time of his employment ? 7. Which, if any, continued, during the time of his employment, to do business as a manufacturer of merchandise of the same classes as those in regard to which he was or is employed to investigate or report, or of similar kinds, or to act as the agent or employee of such manufacturers ; or is now so doing business, or acting in such capacity ? 8. What are the names of all other persons, not members of the permanent Civil Service, who have been employed during the said period to report to or advise the Department of Customs in regard to the value or classification of merchandise, and what are the particulars in regard to them as above asked for in paragraphs 1 to 8, inclusive of this question ?

Mr. WALLACE. 1. F. S. Belton, William P. Atkinson, and T. J. Hawthorne. 2. Mr. Belton has been employed for the last eight years as secretary or assistant to Mr. Chief Inspector McMichael, and a portion of his duties has always been to investigate prices of various classes of merchandise. Mr. Atkinson was employed from the 3rd to the 30th April, 1895, and Mr. Hawthorne, on several occasions during the period between the 17th July and the 13th November, 1894. 3. Mr. Belton has made investigations and reports in regard to a great variety of goods. Mr. Atkinson was employed to investigate the prices of bicycles, information on that subject being necessary, and the officers usually employed at such work being otherwise engaged. Similarly, Mr. Hawthorne was employed to investigate the prices of scythes and axes. 4. In the United States. 5. Mr. Belton's pay for a portion of the time was $2 per day, and later $2.50 per day and travelling expenses. Mr. Atkinson's pay was $2 per day and travelling expenses. Mr. Hawthorne received an allowance of $110.70, including travelling expenses. 6. As to Mr. Belton and Mr. Atkinson, I am not aware what business they were engaged in at the time they were employed in the Customs service. As to Mr. Hawthorne, I understood that he was connected with the manufacture of scythes and axes, and harvest implements, and it was because of his technical knowledge of the values, qualities and markings of the various brands of scythes and axes that the department secured his services. 7. Though having no particular knowledge of the matter, I presume that Mr. Hawthorne resumed his former employment, as he was engaged in the work of the department for only a few weeks. Mr. Atkinson is making no further investigation.

JUDGES OF PROVINCIAL COURTS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved that, on Friday next, the House resolve itself into committee to consider the following resolution :—

That it is expedient to amend the Act respecting the judges of provincial courts by repealing section 14 and substituting the following therefor :—

" 14. If any judge of a Superior Court who has continued in the office of judge of a Superior Court in Canada, or in any of the provinces, for fifteen years or upwards, or who becomes afflicted with some permanent infirmity disabling him from the due execution of his office, resigns his office, Her Majesty may, by letters patent under the great seal of Canada, reciting such period of office, or permanent infirmity, grant unto such judge an annuity equal to two-thirds of the salary annexed to the office he held at the time of his resignation, to commence immediately after his resignation, and to continue thenceforth during his natural life.

" 2. Courts of Vice Admiralty and the Maritime Court of Ontario shall be deemed to have been Superior Courts, local judges in Admiralty of the Exchequer Court to be judges of a Superior Court, and stipendiary magistrates within the North-west Territories to have been judges of a Superior Court, within the meaning of this section."

Motion agreed to.

PENITENTIARY ACT.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved second reading of Bill (No. 66) further to amend the Penitentiary Act. He said : The Bill is mainly for the purpose of enabling the Federal Government to enter into arrangements with the various provincial governments or local authorities regarding the care of criminal lunatics. It was proposed some time ago, as the House will remember, to ask for a grant to enable the federal authorities to obtain a suitable building in connection with the Kingston penitentiary for this purpose. That expense will be saved and every desirable purpose attained in this connection by the adoption of this Bill. For instance, instead of the authorities being compelled, as heretofore, to pardon the criminal lunatic, the lunatic now will be transferred, if we can make arrangements with local authorities—and I do not think there will be any difficulty in doing so—to one of the provincial asylums, and should it turn out that the insanity was feigned or should the lunatic recover his senses before the expiry of his term of imprisonment, this Bill gives the federal authority power to send him back to the penitentiary for the balance of his term. The first clause is perhaps not absolutely necessary for this object, but it was deemed best to insert it here in consequence of some experience of the administration of the department. It provides that the Governor in Council may, when the incumbency of the present accountant expires by death or otherwise, abolish his office, in which case the duties will devolve upon the inspector, who, it is believed, will be able to discharge satisfactorily the duties of both offices.

Mr. EDGAR. I suppose the hon. Minister of Justice has considered the question whether the simple certificate of the surgeon of the penitentiary is as much evidence of insanity as is required by the various local governments, in ordinary cases, to admit patients into their asylums for the insane, because it would be rather a pity to have any dispute on that point later. Very likely more stringent provisions are required in the provinces before they admit ordinary patients. When in committee we can get further information on that point. Then there is the other question about arrangements with the Lieutenant-Governor as to payment, and so on.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Exactly, we could not put any one there without their authority.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. LAURIER. I would imagine from this first section that the Minister of Justice is of opinion that the office is useless. If such be the case, why not abolish the office at once ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We may reach that conclusion, but I would not be warranted in stating, as a matter of fact, that we have the material on which we could reach that conclusion positively. The impression is that the present inspector will be able to do the work, but he has only been in office a short time. He is a particularly good accountant and a man in the vigour of life, and we expect to be able to do this ; but I do not think it would be safe to make the doing of it obligatory. We take the power to abolish the office and express our intention of doing so, unless we find it impossible in the public interest. It will be unsafe at this juncture to abolish that office. It is sufficient for the present that we declare our desire to proceed in the direction of that economy. There was no agitation or inquiry suggested in any committee with reference to the getting rid of this office.

Mr. LAURIER. The legislation which the hon. gentleman proposes is altogether dependent on the fitness of the inspector to discharge both offices. If he turns out to be a good man, then the other office will be abolished; but if he should not reach the expectation of the Minister of Justice, the other office will be continued. But I will put it another way to the hon. gentleman. Suppose that the accountant dies to-morrow—then the office is abolished and the duties would devolve upon the inspector, as to whose competence the hon. gentleman is not satisfied. The hon. gentleman must see that it is not reasonable to base legislation upon the contingent capacity of the incumbent of an office. He must decide whether there is work for two officers, or only one. If there is work for two, let it be provided that two officers shall be appointed, and if only for one, let it be so stated, and let a competent officer be selected.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not think the hon. gentleman gives altogether the credit to the department that it deserves in the effort that it is making.

Mr. LAURIER. I wish I could.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Suppose the hon. gentleman's views should prevail, what would the position be? We should have two officers, as the law now provides.

Mr. LAURIER. Not necessarily.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Certainly. I am not stating to the House, as I am not sure that, in the public interest, we could afford to abolish that office.

Mr. LAURIER. I am sorry to hear you say that.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I will give the reason. We are not in possession of the slightest evidence that this clause would work. But between this and the meeting of the next Parliament, we might come to the conclusion that we are able efficiently to administer the department without this officer. In such a case we could not take a single step until another session. I do not stand strongly upon this. I thought it would be better to come to Parliament and state that, a new officer having been appointed to the position of inspector, possessing all the qualities for the discharge of these duties, that it might be that as soon as he had an opportunity to get his work in hand—and he has not had that opportunity, as the hon. gentleman will see, as he was appointed only two or three months ago—this economy could be carried out. If so, the Government would be prepared to carry it out. But, certainly, with only two or three months' experience for the inspector—he has not had the time even to visit all penitentiaries under his supervision—it would be impossible for us at the present moment to say to Parliament that we are prepared to take this step. But we can say that if we are able to do so, we will.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Mr. McMULLEN. It appears to me there is another point in this question. I do not know whether I am right in my conclusions or not. This clause says:

At any time after the present accountant of the penitentiaries ceases to hold that office, the Governor in Council may abolish the said office.

And so on. It seems to me that that installs the present incumbent during his natural life. Suppose the hon. gentlemen now on the treasury benches should be replaced by some other Cabinet, who should find that this economy could be carried out. It seems to me that this would place this officer in such a position that the Government could not deal with him, but would have to come and ask authority from Parliament.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No; that is not the object, nor would that be the construction.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not know the hon. gentleman's object, but it seems to me that would be the effect of the clause.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am sure the hon. gentleman will accept my assurance that this Bill does not affect the officer's status in regard to any matter of discipline under the Civil Service Act. That is not the intention, nor is it the effect of the language. But, of course, so far as that is concerned, we do not propose ruthlessly to abolish this office.

Mr. LAURIER. This is the effect of what the hon. gentleman says: We have made an appointee to the position of inspector within the last few months, and we think we have appointed a good man. If he turns out to be as good a man as we suppose, he will be able to discharge the work of two officers, and there will be a saving; but if he is not equal to the discharge of these duties, two officers will be appointed, and you will have two men to do the work which might be done by one if he were a competent man and able to do the work. The whole of this section, according to the hon. gentleman, depends upon the competency of the incumbent of one of these offices. This cannot be a reasonable basis of legislation. The only basis upon which the hon. gentleman can proceed is to decide whether there is work for one or two officers. I assume that all the officers of the Government are competent for the discharge of their duty. If so, the whole question resolves itself into this: Are one or two officers required for this work?

Mr. DALY. I do not think the hon. gentleman sees the effect of this clause. It is not a question of competency altogether, but a question that only experience will enable the Minister of Justice to decide the question whether or not the inspector can find time both to inspect the different penitentiaries and to perform the duties of accountant. There are five penitentiaries in Canada, and it seems that the officer, no matter however competent he may be, is going to find his work cut out for him. All that this Act contemplates is that if the present inspector, who is acknowledged to be a competent officer, finds that he can accomplish duties of both inspector and accountant—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. At the same salary.

Mr. DALY—at the same salary, then, after the present incumbent of the accountant's office ceases to hold that office, his office shall be abolished. The section is twofold—first, to abolish the office of accountant if the inspector finds that he can fulfil the duties of that office as well as those of the inspector, and, second, on the abolition of the office of accountant, the duties and powers appertaining to that office shall devolve upon the inspector.

Mr. McMULLEN. Why not alter the clause to read: "Any time after the passage of this Act, the Governor in Council may abolish the office of accountant of penitentiaries." Then it leaves it for the Government to say whether the office of accountant shall be abolished or not.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like some information on this point. The executive Government of the country can create such offices as it deems proper, where they are not created by statute, and the statute limits the prerogative in that respect. Is not the accountant appointed during pleasure? He surely is not appointed during good behaviour?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He is appointed the same as any other officer. The appointment is provided for in the Penitentiaries Act, which reads as follows:—

The Governor in Council may appoint a fit and proper person to be the accountant of penitentiaries, who shall be an officer of the Department of Justice, and he shall be charged generally with the direction, inspection and audit of the books, accounts, money transactions and financial affairs of the penitentiaries.

And so on. Thus he is appointed by the Governor in Council, and holds office during pleasure.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But, according to this section, you seem to imply otherwise.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not think there is any importance attached to that. The drafting simply had regard to the—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is not skilful drafting.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not think there is anything objectionable in these words; but I do not attach much importance to the form of words, and we have no objection to them being taken out.

Mr. LAURIER. Make it read that at any time the Governor in Council may abolish this office.

Mr. MULOCK. Is there no way under the law by which you can relieve the public service of unnecessary officers after they have been appointed?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I stated to the House at the start that the reason for asking this was in order to remove a number of doubts as to our power, because, while Parliament gave authority to the Governor General to appoint an officer, it had charged that special officer with special duties; so it might have been argued that if we had abolished the office there was no other officer to perform the duties. The object of this clause is to remove that doubt, and to say that the officer who is appointed after the office is abolished, shall have the same duties.

Mr. MULOCK. I think if there is no power to relieve the public service of an unnecessary officer, that power cannot be taken a moment too soon. It does seem to me that a person employed in the public service should occupy a higher position than a person appointed in the private service. Does it follow that because a man is appointed to the public service, that whether he is required or not in the public interest, there is no way of dispensing with him during the period of his natural life?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Certainly, we can retire these officers for the greater efficiency and economy of the service, under the Superannuation Act. The trouble was with us that after retiring him, the office still existed, and the man who was appointed to another office could not be said to come under the Penitentiaries Act, because it had there directed that the accountants of the penitentiaries should do all these duties.

Mr. MULLOCK. The hon. gentleman has not met the point I make. It appears to me that there ought to be an implied condition in connection with every appointment to the public service, that if the service does not require such an officer, if there is nothing for him to do, then there ought to be a way of relieving the service without putting this man on the charge of the public for the rest of his natural life.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is another question.

Mr. MULLOCK. It is a question now thrown upon us by this legislation. It is conceded now that the office is not wanted.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman was present when we went into committee, but I then explained to the leader of the Opposition that we are not in a position to make that statement, although we thought that it might be found impossible after further experience, to dispense with the officer.

Mr. LAURIER. Who is the accountant ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Foster.

Mr. McMULLEN. Have not the Government had ample time, during the absence of this man from the office, to learn whether they cannot permanently dispense with his services as accountant ? How many months has he been absent, for instance, as warden of the Manitoba penitentiary ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Parliament has twice voted additional sums to officers who have undertaken to do the duties of this officer during his absence. He has been absent. I should say, over a year ; and the department has, up to recently, felt a great deal of inconvenience on that account. There has been more than the ordinary work put upon the other officers, and for that reason Parliament has given them an additional amount. But I do not think it can be argued that because an officer may be spared temporarily from his office, the office should be abolished, or that it is not required. We know that, both in our service and in the British service, very long leave is given, under certain circumstances, and on the understanding that no further charge will be put upon the treasury in consequence, and that others do these duties during the absence of that officer. But you could not argue directly from that fact that the office was unnecessary ; and certainly, I have not sufficient information to enable me to state to the House that we do not require that office, though I believe it will be found eventually that we can do without it.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Minister admits that this gentleman has been absent from his duties for a year.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. From these duties.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Mr. McMULLEN. Now, has the department been forced to employ others ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No. Mr. Lane, who was assisting him, has been working over-hours. He has been with the inspector as his assistant in discharging these duties, and twice Parliament has voted an additional amount of money to Mr. Lane.

Mr. McMULLEN. Here is a case where an important official has been unable to perform duties outside of the office for which he was originally appointed, who has been absent from that office for twelve months, performing other duties, and during all that time the work of that office has gone on just the same as if he had been there. Now, I think there is ample evidence in that fact to justify this committee in coming to the conclusion that that man's services are really not wanted in that office, and that it should be abolished.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think there are two points involved in this section, one of which relates to dispensing with the accountant. As I understand the Minister just now, he says that the assistant is retained along with the inspector to discharge the work, while the services of the accountant are dispensed with. Now, it is rather an unusual way to begin by retaining the services of the subordinate officer and dispensing with his superior. One would suppose that the natural order would be to begin the other way. But I wish to remind the Minister that this section restricts the power of the Crown. Of course, apart from statutory regulation, all the administrative functions—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me ? I consented to drop the words that the hon. gentleman thought restricted the discretionary power, because that did not interfere with my object.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The section, even as amended, does so restrict.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It reads this way, "The Governor in Council may abolish the office of accountant of penitentiaries and appoint," and so forth.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I wish to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to this, that in the constitution of a department, in most cases, you have the Crown free to reorganize the department, to say what the duties of the department shall be, and what officers shall be from time to time employed in the discharge of those duties. Now, under this arrangement, suppose you carry this Bill, the prerogative would be altered in this respect, that it would be the inspector, and any person else to whom you might appoint, who would discharge these duties. I think that the hands of the Crown ought not to be tied in that particular. I do not see any object to be gained. It might be found by experience, in a short time, that another arrangement much more convenient could be made; therefore I do not think you ought to put unnecessary restrictions upon a Minister in that particular.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is a feature of the old Bill, and has not worked injuriously to the service. The Penitentiaries Act put these powers in the hands of the accountant; and the hon. gentleman's criticism would apply to both cases. I think the hon. gentleman's argument is largely theoretical; practically, no inconvenience has arisen from vesting these powers in the accountant. The change is certainly very small, when it is provided that the officer who shall perform the duties of accountant after this shall have the same powers.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman will see that that is a reason for removing the barrier altogether. The hon. gentleman undertakes to remove it so far as the accountant is concerned and to transfer his duties to another officer. I do not see the propriety of undertaking to tie the hands of the Crown in this particular.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is Mr. Foster doing at present?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He is acting warden of the British Columbia penitentiary.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is it the intention to make him permanent warden there?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No.

Mr. MULLOCK. As I understand this question, this officer, it is thought, is not required in the public service.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No; that is not so.

Mr. MULLOCK. It may or may not be the case; but at the same time I call the attention of the committee to the state of the law. If this be the state of the law to-day, the moment a man is appointed by the Governor in Council to the public service he cannot be removed from office except he is pensioned. We must assume that this is the law, or Parliament would not be asked to relieve the public service of an unnecessary officer. If there were such power existing at the present time to remove such an officer, the Government would not be asking for such power; therefore, I assume that the Government will come to the conclusion as a matter of law that no officer can be removed from the public service unless he is pensioned. A condition should be inserted in the appointment of any officer to the public service that he shall retain office only so long as his services are required. There has been too much pampering on public officials in this way, and now it is necessary to get an Act of Parliament in order to dismiss an unnecessary officer and relieve the public treasury of his services. I submit that it is the duty of the Government, in view of this construction of the law, to introduce at the earliest possible moment a measure asking Parliament to give the Government power to relieve the service of any official not required in the public interest. The fact of the Government asking to-day for this legislation shows the view they take of the law, and that view of the law is the final interpretation of the law so long as it is within their administration. For that reason I hope that before the session is much older, the Minister of Justice or the appropriate Minister, will introduce some measure dealing with this question.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I must protest against the hon. gentleman's statement, that the object of this Bill is for the purpose of obtaining power to abolish an officer. The main object of this section, as I have more than once stated, is to vest in the officer who succeeds to these duties the power which Parliament has placed in the hands of the accountant. I do not admit that we come to Parliament confessing that we cannot abolish an office—there might be a question about that. But Parliament has vested in the hands of the Government certain powers, and said that you may appoint an accountant, and that when you have done so that officer is to have certain authority, and very important authority. The duties are not the ordinary duties of an accountant, but are of a special character. He is authorized to audit the accounts and examine them, and perform such other duties as may be required by the Minister of Justice; he shall audit the accounts of the penitentiaries, transmit the same, inquire into the money transactions and financial affairs of penitentiaries, prisons, or hospitals such as receive support wholly or in part from the Government of Canada. He has the power of an inquisitor. This new officer shall have these powers and functions, and, therefore, I do not take the position of the hon. member for North York that the Government cannot do anything without an Act.

Mr. MULLOCK. As the Bill was introduced, the Government was only asking to abolish an office. But such officer would have to be superannuated.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No. He might be promoted.

Mr. MULLOCK. The Government would not ask to abolish an empty office. The abolition is asked with a view to dealing with the existing state of affairs, and the effect is an admission that there is one officer too many.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I suggest the addition of the words "and such officer as may from time to time be appointed by the Governor in Council."

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. As hon. gentlemen opposite generally seek to restrict the powers of the Governor in Council, I did not venture to suggest the insertion of the words "such other officer as might be from time to time appointed by the Governor in Council." I was too modest.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I hold the Government responsible for the efficient discharge of their duties, and I do not undertake to tie up the prerogative of the Crown by regulations of this sort.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I accept the suggestion with a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. LAURIER. You can have the same service time and time again.

On section 3,

Mr. EDGAR. I hardly think that this provision as to proving the insanity of a convict, would be sufficient to meet the requirements of the provinces, because it only requires a report in writing from one surgeon. Under the Ontario statute, the proof required before admitting an insane person into an asylum is very different. They say: No person shall be admitted into an insane asylum except upon the order of the Lieutenant-Governor (and that refers to special cases which are provided for afterwards) without the certificate of two medical practitioners, each testifying to the signatures of two subscribing witnesses and bearing date within three months of the time of entry to the asylum. That, of course, is to ensure the protection of the liberty of the subject, and I suppose it might be said that the liberty of the convict is not of such importance. In section 6 of the Ontario Act there is a provision for admitting into an asylum those who are imprisoned for an offence, under the authority of any of the statutes of the province, and that may be done upon such evidence as the Lieutenant-Governor deemed sufficient. But, if you look at section 29 you will see that the judges and the medical practitioners have to make a personal examination of a person committed to jail as insane, and under section 33, they have to make a certificate as to the insanity of the prisoner. It would be well for the Minister of Justice to see that he does not introduce a mode of proof of insanity which might be considered insufficient.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have considered the point, and I would like the hon. gentleman (Mr. Edgar) to remember, that we are not dealing with the province of Ontario alone. The most dangerous thing we could do, would be to put any hard and fast rule that would be a condition precedent to our acting under the statute in regard to admission into local asylums. Each province will no doubt have a system of its own with regard to the requirements necessary for the admission of insane patients. We avoid all these difficulties by simply taking power from Parliament to arrange with these various asylums. We must comply with every rule they have and with their terms, and it is to be an arrangement with them on their consent or no arrangement whatever. In following the Act out, we have gone upon our own surgeon's certificates, as we always have heretofore, and while different asylums have different rules and requirements for certificates, it is enough for us to get authority to deal with our patients. We keep on the old lines in that respect. We either make an arrangement with the local authorities, or if we fail, we have to take care of our criminal insane ourselves.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) All your arrangements are contingent on an agreement being made with the provinces.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How do you dispose of your insane convicts, if you fail?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We take care of them as we do now. We have some in Kingston at present.

Mr. EDGAR. There is a good deal in what my hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) says, that he will be forced to comply with whatever the provincial arrangements are, and if he takes that view of the case and is prepared in every case to meet the objections, that might remove the difficulty.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In Ontario they have been most obliging even under present circumstances. Some patients that it would have been impossible for us to have properly treated at Kingston, have been taken off our hands by the local authorities by arrangement; but we have had to pardon the prisoners in order to send them to the asylum. One or two cases have been mentioned to me by my officers where the insanity was of a very short duration, and the prisoner escaped punishment in that way.

Mr. MULLOCK. Does the Minister think that the certificate of one surgeon will meet all cases? The surveillance in the penitentiary is much stricter than in an asylum, and a prisoner who, on the certificate of a single surgeon may be removed to an asylum, may be less carefully guarded there, and escape. That has happened. Recently in the States a very dangerous criminal, a train robber, succeeded in satisfying the prison surgeon that he was insane, upon which he was taken to an asylum, and escaped. I think the Minister should provide that the prisoner shall not be allowed out of the penitentiary unless he is clearly proved to be insane.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We provide the double check, consisting of the certificate of our own surgeon, and the approval of the local authorities, which, in most cases, depends on the certificate of two physicians.

Mr. MULLOCK. I do not think the opinion of the two physicians will be much more than an echo of the original opinion.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is from the standpoint of the province.

Mr. EDGAR. If you provide in the Bill that the dangerous lunatic should not be taken away from the prison until he had been accepted as insane, there would then be the double check before removal.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He never leaves custody.

Mr. EDGAR. He does not leave custody, of course, but my hon. friend's point was that a dangerous prisoner, feigning insanity, might deceive a surgeon, and be sent out under insufficient protection, and escape.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We must take that risk, which I think is not great.

Mr. EDGAR. But it would be easy to remove that risk by inserting the words: "Before removal from the penitentiary."

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think the point my hon. friend urges arises from a misapprehension of the manner in which patients are admitted to asylums. No patient is admitted on the certificate of one physician; of course, in this I speak for my own province only, he requires the certificate of two physicians. The examination will undoubtedly take place in the penitentiary, and my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, in this Bill, provides that the examination by the surgeon in the penitentiary shall be really a groundwork on which application is made to the provincial authorities for the admission of the prisoner to an asylum. Then the usual course pursued is to employ two physicians to examine and report, and upon their report the patient is admitted to the asylum.

Mr. EDGAR. That is exactly what I contend for. All I want is the additional protection of whatever may be required in the province.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We shall have three physicians instead of two.

Mr. EDGAR. Yes, but where?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Before the man leaves our hands.

Mr. EDGAR. That is all I ask, that you should insert the words "before removal"; otherwise the prisoner might be taken away under such guard as the warden chose, without a sufficient certificate of insanity.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am warranted in resisting the suggestion of the hon. gentleman—

Mr. EDGAR. Of the Secretary of State?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not think the Secretary of State went that far. We have the authority under the old Act to remove insane prisoners on the certificate of the surgeon, and now, in addition to the checks which the provincial authorities have adopted, and which are satisfactory to the people at large, we bring the opinion of another surgeon. I think these are sufficient safeguards.

Mr. MCGREGOR. I think it is necessary that safeguards of this kind should be provided. We had a case lately in which a man was committed to prison from the town of Windsor. It was claimed that he was a lunatic, and he was examined by two physicians and the prison surgeon, who declared him to be insane. The result was that, although he was sentenced for six years, after he had been in prison for six months, the Department of Justice turned him loose on the public without any reason whatever, and the next morning he was found with his friends on a front street in Toronto feeling quite happy and comfortable, and he is now in that city. We feel aggrieved at the injustice which has been committed in this case. We have applied to the Department of Justice for a remedy, and I may, perhaps, bring the matter up in the House again on a future day.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am glad the hon. gentleman has mentioned that case, which I have heard of. It occurred before I came into the department, and it is one of the cases that have led to this Bill.

Mr. MCGREGOR. It was only April last.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The case I have reference to occurred about the time I went to the Department of Justice. Probably it is the same case as that mentioned by the hon. gentleman. There was a gross fraud practiced upon the Government in connection with a prisoner who had been sentenced to the term mentioned by the hon. gentleman. He feigned insanity, and satisfactory representations were made by reputable men that if he were pardoned his people would have him placed in an asylum at their expense. In order to carry out that proposition, a pardon was given to the supposed lunatic, but no sooner had he obtained his liberty than he threw off all guise of insanity and is now at large. Those who were responsible for this fraud had their conduct mentioned in the proper quarters.

Mr. LAURIER. Who practiced that fraud.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The names are not familiar to me. I would have no objection to get the information for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. EDGAR. What penitentiary?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It was the Central Prison, Toronto.

Mr. EDGAR. That is a very serious matter. I can understand that the salubrious air of Toronto would have a remarkable effect on the health of anybody, but I can scarcely imagine that the Government officials were in that case without blame. Still, the Government, just as in this case, are prepared to place in the hands of one surgeon—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Three.

Mr. EDGAR. I beg my hon. friend's pardon, but he is not correct in that statement. This Act provides that if one surgeon of a penitentiary states that a man is insane, that will be sufficient authority for the warden to take that man out of the penitentiary and convey him to the other end of the province, under more or less restraint, and deliver him over to a provincial asylum. My hon. friend says he will have the protection of those two other medical examiners. What will be the use of that, if this man is not insane and makes his escape?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We move prisoners every day.

Mr. EDGAR. But they are not supposed to be insane and are carefully guarded.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We also move the insane. We take them from Dorchester, N.B., all the way to Kingston, which is the only place where we take care of the insane.

Mr. EDGAR. That should not be continued. There is no necessity for doing it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. At present there is.

Mr. EDGAR. Not under the proposed legislation. Why not add a few words to make it clear that the explanation which the Secretary of State gives will be carried out, and that before a lunatic is removed to an asylum the certificate of two medical men, or whatever is required by the provinces, shall be obtained.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It would not be workable. Take Nova Scotia, where there is no penitentiary, how can you send a justice of the peace out of Nova Scotia to make an examination in New Brunswick? He would have no jurisdiction. I entirely disagree with the hon. gentleman. You must bring your prisoner where you must comply with the regulations of the province; and if he does not pass there, carry him back. It is simply a question of moving him, and that is a matter of frequency.

Mr. EDGAR. I do not think that New Brunswick is going to maintain Nova Scotia lunatics.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not except they are paid, and the rate they fix themselves.

Mr. EDGAR. I am not aware that the authorities of one province will take lunatics from another province—pay or no pay.

Mr. SPROULE. I think there is something in the contention of the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), for although a patient must be examined and certified insane by two medical men before he is admitted to an asylum, patients frequently get well a short time after they go in. If that is done, the next examination which takes place is to ascertain whether the patient is insane or not. That is done by one medical man. It requires two for admission, but the patient may be let out on the certificate of one.

Bill reported.

SALARIES OF JUDGES OF PROVINCIAL COURTS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution:—

That it is expedient to amend the Act respecting the judges of provincial courts, and to provide that the salaries of the judges hereinafter mentioned shall be as follows:—

Two judges of the Circuit Court of the District of Montreal, each $3,000 per annum;

Five county court judges in Manitoba, each $2,000 per annum during the first three years of service, and after three years of service, each $2,400 per annum;

The local judge of the district of British Columbia, $1,000 per annum.

He said: I explained the chief change in Supply the other evening, when we took a vote for part of the salary of the Chief Justice of British Columbia, who is the local judge of admiralty. There will be two additional sums required to pay two additional judges who were appointed last session. Up to last session all these sums were included in the Estimates. By an oversight, the legislation is not similar, because years before it was not amended and thus made statutory; but the votes had run on omitting the incorporation in the statutes of this clause. The additional appointments were in the case of the provisional judicial district of Nipissing, in the province of Ontario, and an additional county court judge in Manitoba.

These are the only two new appointments. The only other change, as I mentioned, is that in British Columbia. The chief justice, who was appointed a short time ago, by virtue of existing legislation, received some $820 less than his predecessor, which brought his salary down to the small sum of $5,000. It is not proposed to restore under this Bill, the salary as it existed from confederation, but it is proposed to increase the salary as admiralty judge by $400, instead of $600, giving him $1,000, and making it correspond with the salary of other local judges in admiralty. That is the local judge—I use that language advisedly, because the local judge means the judge in admiralty.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How much is this increase ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We give $400, instead of restoring the salary paid to the late chief justice, Sir Matthew Begbie, who was an Imperial appointee.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Who is the local judge ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The chief justice ; and under this he will not have the salary of his predecessor, but he will be $400 better off than he would be without it. We leave the salary as chief justice the same as it was, but this amount gives him a uniform salary as local judge with that paid to local judges elsewhere.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) This adds $400 to his salary ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It has that effect ; but it has the justification of making his salary in admiralty the same as that paid in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

Motion agreed to ; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the hon. gentleman has hardly satisfied the committee that this is a fair deal, at all. I understood from the hon. gentleman that it was not the intention of the Government to take up the question of increasing the judges' salaries at present. Now, you are practically adding $400 to the salary of a judge who, if my recollection serves me right, receives as much in proportion to the work he does as any other judge in Canada. On what ground can Parliament justify singling out this one man from among all the judges in Canada and increasing his salary ? I do not think that this is a time for increasing judges' salaries.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Hear, hear. I agree.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) In view of the stringent financial crisis which is still—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We are passing through it, though.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)—It will be time enough to talk about increasing the salaries of officials when we get through it. From all indications, from the language of those who have the best opportunities of judging, we have a trying six months ahead of us, yet. I do not think that the expressions of the hon. gentleman hitherto justify him in asking the House to vote $400 a year to this judge. The late Chief Justice Begbie got a very handsome salary.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No; $5,800 can hardly be called a "handsome" salary for a chief justice.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But he had more.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And $600 in admiralty.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Making $6,400, besides travelling expenses. Comparing that with the salaries of some of the leading judges in Toronto and Montreal, and, judging by the amount of work they are called upon to do, he was very handsomely paid, indeed. If the hon. gentleman is going to attach salary to the office on account of it being a chief justiceship, irrespective of the work to be done, he should remember that there are other parts of the Dominion to be considered besides British Columbia. I am not pressing this course at this time ; I do not acknowledge it as the proper rule. Every one recognizes the enormous amount of work the Toronto and Montreal judges are called upon to do, and Parliament has made a discrimination in the salaries paid to them. I do not say that they are paid enough ; I am not in a position to be able to judge as to that. But I do not think the general condition of the country will justify the increase of the salaries of any judges, much less that of this gentleman in British Columbia. It has never been contended by anybody that he is overworked. Of course, we want to pay him fairly for the honourable position he holds, and the work he does. The salary attached to this office under the late Sir Matthew Begbie is an ample salary, considering the resources of the country, and the peculiar financial position in which we are placed. And the Minister himself has not suggested any reason whatever for the increase, but has merely stated his desire to pay him as judge in admiralty the same as other judges holding similar positions elsewhere. That is not argument. The question is, discharging the duty of judge in admiralty and chief justice as well, are his salaries combined, enough for the work he does, and the dignified position he holds ? I think they are.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is very little difference between the hon. gentleman and myself so far as principle is concerned. He says, and rightly, that there is a general disposition in Parliament not to deal with the subject of increases of the salaries of the judiciary this session; and he knows as well as I know that, under any conditions, there is considerable prejudice on that score, and that the time does not seem to be appropriate for coming down to Parliament and asking for an increase. But he agrees with me. I am certain, and every man who has special information on the subject agrees with me, that, regardless of the opportuneness of the time, or of the popular feeling, the judiciary of this country is not adequately remunerated; that if we have erred in connection with the organization of the judiciary, perhaps it is more in regard to the number of our judges than in regard to their remuneration. And, if I remember rightly, the hon. gentleman was, as I have been, strongly of opinion that there ought not to be such a discrimination in regard to the salaries of judges holding the same rank in the different provinces—that the larger provinces should simply be supplied with the greater number of judges; that the judges of courts of equal jurisdiction and of the same importance in the different provinces should be considered as on the same plane. Nevertheless, Parliament has not taken that view, and so these points are undecided. And, in reference to another of them, I submit that this is a case that can be dealt with consistently with the various views that obtain on these other points. This is not an increase, in fact. It is simply to prevent an undue diminution of the salary in British Columbia.

Mr. LAURIER. How?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. For this reason: The predecessor of this gentleman, without demur or complaint, or the suggestion from any quarter that the salary was too large, received $820 over and above the salary that the present chief justice is now receiving.

Mr. LAURIER. What was it before?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It was the old salary paid before confederation. When British Columbia entered the union, that arrangement was adhered to, and Sir Matthew Begbie was paid that salary until his death. Then on his death, our legislation provided that the salary of his successor should be $800 odd less, bringing it down to the round $5,000. I ask hon. gentlemen to think of the changed circumstances in that country, at the time British Columbia entered confederation, before the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and before the railway development of that province had begun. Take the expense of living,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

a matter with which we are certainly more familiar than ever we were. Take, for instance, the difference in his duties, made with the assent of this House, and involving heavier expenses of living in that country. Under these circumstances, I say in common fairness it would be ungenerous of Parliament to hold to the strict letter of that statute, and degrade the office of chief justice by cutting down the salary by $800, when it is known that the next step Parliament takes in connection with the judicial salaries, will be in the direction of raising them.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Parliament has done that already. Parliament reduced the salary after the death of Sir Matthew Begbie.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. But we should remember that when Parliament did that, the province of British Columbia did not hold the relative importance in the confederation that it does to-day.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is not many years ago.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Take into account population, trade, or anything else; take, for instance, our knowledge with regard to the cost of living. Take the case of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick; is it fair that the chief justice in each of those provinces should be paid $1,000 for the admiralty work, while in British Columbia the judge should receive only $600 for that work, and suffer a diminution of his salary of $800 as chief justice? I do not think it is a fair view to take. I do not think this resolution conflicts with the determination of the Government not to ask Parliament to deal with the increase of salaries of the judges. It was certainly in that spirit I submitted the resolution. I did not wish to act inconsistently with what seemed to be the general opinion in this House that we shall not deal with increases at present.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) This gentleman will get $6,500 all round.

Mr. DALY. No; he is put on the same footing as the other chief justices.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He gets $5,000 as chief justice, and he will get $1,000 as judge in admiralty.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That will give him $2,000 more.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The others are receiving too little.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why not level up?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In that general increase they will have a strong case. But their case is not now being dealt with. They are getting what they have always received.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You are making out a case for them.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. So much the better for them. But we should not do what is unjust, or treat the chief justice niggardly, because it would make an invidious comparison. The comparison between the puisne judges and the chief would not be so great as it was a few months ago. Already we have voted in this House on this question; we voted in the supplementary Estimates the difference between $600 and the $1,000 for the present chief justice for the period of this year running up to June.

Mr. FLINT. I see by the Estimates that the Chief Justice of Nova Scotia gets $5,000. Does he get an allowance in addition to that?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, $1,000 as vice-judge in admiralty.

Mr. FLINT. Where is that provided for?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is in the statutes of 1891. We vote this allowance and put it in the statutes. All the other judges are in the statutes. In 1891 we increased the salaries in the admiralty courts, and there the judge in admiralty in Nova Scotia appears, as you see, receiving $1,000.

Mr. EDGAR. The Minister of Justice must admit that a few months ago when the present chief justice, Mr. Davie, was appointed to that position, the law did not provide a salary that he now proposes to pay to the chief justice. Mr. Davie was Attorney General of the province, and he knew perfectly well what the legal salary of that office was when he accepted the position. The Minister of Justice cannot pretend that he could not have got a good chief justice for the salary as the law fixes it. Surely the Minister of Justice will not tell the House that any private bargain was made with the Attorney General, that if he took that office his salary would be raised.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Certainly not. I hardly think it respectful to the hon. gentleman or to the House to tell them that no such suggestion was made by the chief justice or by me.

Mr. EDGAR. That is what I was saying. As Attorney General this gentleman knew what salary was fixed by law, and therefore it is absolutely in the discretion of this House to consider whether they will raise the salary of that chief justice. He has no moral claim for any addition, and we have got to place this question on the broad ground of the policy of increasing judges' salaries. Now, I say that it is invidious and improper for this House to undertake to increase the salary of a particular judge over what the law gives him, and beyond what his salary was when he accepted this appointment, without making some general scheme.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Minister says that the judges of this Dominion are not sufficiently paid. I challenge that statement; I think the judges are very fairly paid. I think it is the duty of every layman in this House to offer pointed and determined opposition to proposals to increase the judges' salaries. Take, for instance, the judge of the city of Toronto. He acts as county court judge, as maritime judge, as surrogate court judge; and he also acts on important arbitrations for which he gets large fees. He discharges the duties of revising officer for that city, and if you add up what he receives for these several duties you will find that he makes something in the neighbourhood of $8,000 or $10,000 a year. Now, will the Minister of Justice say that that judge is not amply paid, and more than paid? It is a singular fact that when a position becomes vacant, either of a junior judge, or a senior judge, or a judge of a county court, even, there are any number of applications made by good and qualified men, men who are generally acknowledged as possessed of ample legal knowledge, efficiently to discharge the duties of the position. Now, if the salaries are so low that the judges are not sufficiently paid, it is a singular thing to find such a rush of applicants to get the appointments whenever a vacancy occurs. I contend that the judges of this country are well paid. I think if you count up all the amounts that the judges receive for the several duties that they perform, you will find that they receive a very ample income. In this case the Minister of Justice is doing an act that will virtually open the way for an application to be filed from every other judge for an increase of salary. He is proposing, outside of any reasonable expectation on the part of the judges or any provision in the Act, to pass a measure to increase the allowance of one judge. The moment that is done, every other judge will desire an increase.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is not an increase. The Chief Justice of British Columbia, Sir Matthew Begbie, received $5,820 as chief justice, and $600 as judge of the admiralty court, making a total of $6,420. All I desire the House to do is, to enable the present chief justice to receive $6,000, which will be $420 less than Sir Matthew Begbie received.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The salary paid Sir Matthew Begbie was fixed by the Imperial Government, and was paid by the terms of union so long as he lived. It cannot be accepted as a guide as to the salary that should be paid to the chief justice hereafter. In 1891 the Government had this question under consideration. They submitted their views to Parliament, and the salary of the chief justice was fixed at $5,000. The Minister of Justice now proposes to make the salary $6,000.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not of the Chief Justice.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Certainly. The hon. gentleman attaches to the office of chief justice that of judge of the maritime court, and the joint salary makes the income of the chief justice one-third more than that of his associates on the bench. That is an invidious distinction, and in consequence the hon. gentleman will be compelled to increase the salaries of all the other judges. I ask the Minister of Justice what amount of business has been done by the judge of the maritime court in British Columbia? The salary was fixed at $600 per annum, while it was made $1,000 in Nova Scotia. We all know the great difference in the quantity of work in the maritime court, and as regards maritime contracts likely to come before the judge in British Columbia as compared with the admiralty judge in Halifax or Quebec. The Minister proposes to increase the salary, not on account of the amount of work done, or having regard to incomes earned by leading members at the bar in the province, but solely because a British officer and Imperial employee received a larger salary than Sir John Thompson or Sir John Abbott proposed to allow when the subject was under discussion in 1891. The amount was then determined by Parliament, and when it is now proposed to place at the head of the bench as chief justice, Mr. Davie, the Government would be going a long way in placing his salary at $2,000 more than the salary of any one of his associates on the bench. I should like the Minister of Justice to show the number of cases tried and disposed in the maritime court in British Columbia. If the hon. gentleman were to submit to the House that information a good deal of light would be thrown on the matter, and until he can show that the work of the chief justice is so much more onerous than that of any of the other judges, he will not have established a case to make the discrepancy greater than it now stands.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman has stated that there would be an invidious distinction made if this Act provided that the chief justice should receive an extra $1,000. I think there would be an invidious distinction made against British Columbia if this $1,000 were not granted, for the reason the chief justices of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick receive $1,000 each by virtue of their positions as judge in admiralty.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). They have something to do for it.

Mr. DALY. Does the hon. gentleman not see as much reason or necessity for having a local judge in admiralty in British Columbia as in Nova Scotia? This whole question came up in 1891. The salaries of the different judges in admiralty were fixed. The judge in admiralty in Quebec was placed at $2,000, so long as the present appointee held the office; in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the salary was placed at $1,000, instead of $600; in Prince Edward Island, at $800, and in British Columbia, at $600. The reason the admiralty judge in British Columbia received only $600 is the fact that Chief Justice Begbie was in receipt of a salary of $5,820. That was the reason why British Columbia was not levelled up to the position of the other provinces; and all the Minister of Justice asks by this legislation is to place British Columbia relatively in the same position as Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. As the Minister of Justice already pointed out, Sir Matthew Begbie received $6,420, and the present proposition is to give the chief justice $6,000, or $420 less than his predecessor. In allowing the chief justice $600 per annum as judge of the admiralty court, he is placed in the same position as the chief justices of the courts of Ontario, who receive $6,000 per annum. We are not adding any burdens to the people, because the result of this legislation will be to give Mr. Davie $420 less than was paid to his predecessor.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Mr. LAURIER. All the statements made by the Minister of the Interior are rebutted by the facts of the case. These salaries of judges of admiralty court were revised in 1891, and the scale was then established. Under it the admiralty judge of Quebec is paid $2,000, of Nova Scotia, $1,000, of New Brunswick, $1,000, of Prince Edward Island, $800, of British Columbia, $600.

Mr. DALY. The sum paid in the case of British Columbia was on account of the salary received by Sir Matthew Begbie.

Mr. LAURIER. What is there to show that? Unless there is something on the record to show differently, these salaries were graded upon work done. No other conclusion can be arrived at. If the hon. gentleman is able to show that more work is done in British Columbia than in the other provinces, then there will be some force in the contention presented by hon. gentlemen; but until that is shown we must hold the opinion that the salaries were graded according to the work done, and on no other consideration.

Mr. DALY. Suppose that instead of making the chief justice a local judge in admiralty, we took the senior puisne judge. His salary is now $4,850, and if you gave him the present sum of $600, you would raise him $1,400 over and above the other puisne judges and over the chief justice, and it would be an invidious distinction.

Mr. McMULLEN. The demand made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), that we should know the amount of duties devolving upon this judge, and the work performed by him during the year, is a reasonable demand before we are asked to increase his salary. My hon. leader has drawn the attention of the House to the fact that the Act as changed in 1891 provided for a distinct sum being allowed to these several judges, and that should be sufficient. Why should we be asked to pass a special Act to favour one particular judge? The only excuse for increasing his salary should be that he has more work to perform. Judges are permitted to hold a great many of these offices for which they receive a salary and do nothing in return. I have just grounds for believing that although the admiralty judge in Toronto receives $600 a year as such, he has not had one single case within the year. Is it right that the country should pay $600 a year to a man for doing nothing? This Act must be an advantage to the judge in British Columbia, or else it would not be introduced, and before we pass it, we should know if he has any increased duties to perform to justify it. If he only performs ordinary routine; in the name of common sense, and in the name of the financial position of the country, why should we be asked to spend this money?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I believe that the House is entitled to all reasonable information pertinent to the Bill, and I have no objection to bring down all the information in my possession before the Bill goes through the different stages. I am surprised, I confess, that hon. gentlemen should take the view they do in this case. This is done to prevent a very unfair grievance, and it is not a substantial increase. I would appeal particularly to members from the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. There are no differences of opinion amongst the well-informed, but that the judges there are not fairly remunerated for their work.

Mr. McMULLEN. That opinion is confined to the lawyers only.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not think so, because the people who suffer from underpaid judges are the business people. You have a state of things in Ontario, for instance, that will illustrate the difficulties that are found in getting good men to go upon the bench and give their services to the judiciary at the best time of their lives. There is an intention exhibited on the part of the Government to increase the salaries of judges at all events in the east, at a proper and suitable time; but that comparison will be most invidious if you have it said that in British Columbia the chief justice is to receive all told for the position of chief justice and judge in admiralty $5,600, whereas the chief justices in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia receive $6,000, and if I remember right, fees in addition. Fees are not paid in British Columbia, but when I practised in Nova Scotia fees were paid to the judge in every case in the admiralty court. I submit that the comparison will be more unfair because hon. gentlemen will agree that the cost of living is, I believe from limited experience, greater in British Columbia than in Nova Scotia. I do not think that for the sake of this $400 a year, to the office of chief justice, that we should take such a narrow view of the situation. The comparison is therefore, that the chief justice of British Columbia at this time and under these circumstances, should not suffer a cutting down of salary by $820, but that he should simply be in the position that the difference between his salary and that of his predecessor, which was not large, shall be $420.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister of Justice with more ingenuity than, I think, judicial fairness has presented his views. He represents that the Government is asking this House practically to reduce the salary attached to this office, and that the present incumbent shall receive $400 less per annum than the previous chief justice. The salary of the present chief justice is not based upon what the prior chief justice received at all. The statute which confronted the present chief justice, when he determined to accept office, was perfectly explicit upon that point. It reads as follows:—

During the incumbency, the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court of the province of British Columbia shall be as follows:—the chief justice of the said court, $5,000 per annum, provided that, during the incumbency of the present chief justice his salary shall continue to be $5,820 per annum.

Thus, by the law which confronted the present occupant when he determined to accept the office, the salary was to be $5,000 a year. Therefore, how can it be said in fairness that the Government are asking the House now to reduce the salary from $6,420 to $6,000? It is a plain proposition to increase the salary, nothing else, and if acted upon in the case of one judge, it will be a precedent for similar action all along the line from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I have counted the number of judges mentioned in the Auditor General's Report, and I find that last year we paid salaries to 195 judges of all kinds, superior, county court, and so on. If, without rhyme or reason, you arbitrarily select one judge to-day and increase his salary $400, you establish a precedent for similar increases in the case of the other 194; so that you are asking, not for $400 a year, but for 195 times $400. A short time ago an appointment was made to the office of postmaster in Montreal, for which the salary at the time was $3,000, if I remember rightly, and it was increased $1,000—why? Not because the duties justified the increase, but because it was said that the postmaster in another city was receiving $4,000. And so, if to-day you grant an increase of $400 a year to one judge, you will be called upon to repeat the transaction 195 times. Now, this is not the first attempt the Government have made to increase the salaries of the judges in an arbitrary way. Last year they introduced a proposition to authorize them to superannuate any judge of the Supreme Court of Canada who had been fifteen years in some minor position, in the Vice-Admiralty Court or elsewhere, on full pay, if they saw fit—a proposition applicable, in the first instance, to seven judges, and seven judges only. If that proposition had been acted upon, it is reasonable to suppose that it would have been extended until ultimately it found its way into all parts of the Dominion. Is it not reasonable to suppose that this proposition will be extended in like manner? I would like to ask the Minister of Justice, if he is free to tell me, why, frankly, he is asking the House to do this. The present incumbent has been recently appointed. He was a politician, the Attorney General of the province of British Columbia, and he knew what the law was and what his rights were going to be. How comes it now that the Government are asking the House to do this deed? Was there any understanding with this gentleman that the House would be asked to increase the salary? Will the Minister answer that?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, I will not answer it.

Mr. MULOCK. That is the answer I expected, and I will draw the inference.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You are welcome to draw an inference.

Mr. MULOCK. I draw the inference; I may not be warranted in doing so, but if the Government were frank with the public and the public's representatives, they would give us the information and we would not be compelled to draw inferences. I think nothing could warrant the action of the Government, unless there is some understanding between the Government and the judge that this application would be made. The fact that the Minister of Justice is unwilling to deny such a statement, is, I think, some justification for our drawing that inference. For my part, I object to this arbitrary and unfair method of dealing with the salary of this judge.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not think the Minister of Justice has made out a very good case in his efforts to convince the House that this man is entitled to the proposed increase. If it is based on increased cost of living, all the information that we have is that the cost of living to-day is not half what it was when Sir Matthew Begbie was appointed. At that time, a meal in the west cost $1, whereas at the present time, I understand, living is nearly as cheap there as it is in the east. I do not think it can be due to an increase in the work of the admiralty court, because I do not think the extent of population and the amount of shipping in British Columbia would justify us in supposing that there has been any great increase. If there has been, I think it would be proper for us to ask the Minister of Justice to show that such is the case. Then, if it is claimed that this proposition is made in order to level up the salary to the salaries of other judges, I do not think that is a good argument, because it would then be our duty to inquire whether the other judges were not getting too much. I do not think it is a good argument to say that it is making an invidious distinction not to put the salaries of the judges in all the provinces at the same figure, because the provinces are not all equally important. I think the true ground on which to base the salary is the amount of work to be done, because it cannot be fairly argued that a man who does a smaller amount of work is entitled to as large a salary as the man who does more. I agree with those who hold that our judges are fairly well paid at present. If we compare them with other men in the country who are equally able, and who do as well the work entrusted to them, I think the comparison would be all in favour of the judges. Take the allied profession, the medical profession, and what is the amount of salary attached to the best positions under the Government? It is about $2,000, or from $2,000 to $2,400 at the highest; and the men holding these positions are obliged to give all their time to them. The amount of money they have expended in acquiring a knowledge of their profession is just as great as that which lawyers have to expend in studying their profession, if not more, and their services to the community are worth quite as much as the services of the judges. Therefore, if that comparison is made, it must certainly be against the judges. But one hon. gentleman said that we cannot get the best men in the profession to take a judgeship when such a position becomes vacant. I do not think that is the usual experience. If you open a judicial position to which a salary of $4,000 a year is attached, you will have all the lawyers in the country rushing after it and it will take a body of policemen to keep them away. I agree with those who say that this is only the beginning. An effort was made some years ago to raise the salaries of the judges all round. I am not one of those who believe that their salaries are too low. It may be said that I do not know anything of their work, but I believe that they are proportionately no better than men in other professions. Take ministers of the Gospel, and you will find that the salaries they get are much below those of the judges. The same holds true of the medical profession. There is no justification for the very high salaries the judges are getting and still less justification for increasing those salaries in particular instances. I agree with those who say that when the chief justice took this position he knew what the salary was, and was willing to accept the position at the salary, and the cost of living was just as great then as it is to-day and no doubt the amount of work also.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I was a little taken at the argument of the Minister of Justice, at the inception of the debate, that the late chief justice of British Columbia had received a certain sum and it was therefore not fair that we should pay the successor a much less sum. But my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) entirely knocked the bottom out of that argument, because he showed that the late Chief Justice Begbie's salary was fixed as part of the terms of the union. But the Parliament of Canada specially provided that on his death such excessive salary should cease and his successor would only receive $5,000. To-day we are practically revising a matter which was very carefully considered in 1891. We all remember the discussion that took place when the late Sir John Thompson introduced the Exchequer Amendment Bill providing that admiralty judges be appointed all through Canada. A return was then brought down showing the amount of work done in the various provinces. The largest number of cases was in Nova Scotia, and next came the city of St. John, N.B. Prince Edward Island had only five cases, I think, in three years. What had British Columbia? One case in three years. Sir John Thompson, when the return was brought down, saw how the case stood and fixed the salary in British Columbia at $600.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The chief justice then received $5,820.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But the hon. gentleman knows that he received that sum because he was an Imperial officer before the union. It was for that reason not thought proper to cut down his salary. But Parliament specially provided that his successor should only have $5,000. Sir John Thompson said that he did not think it was fair, under the circumstances, to allow more than $600. We fixed his salary then, after full consideration of the work done in all the different provinces. Some of the judges got more and some less, and the late Sir John Thompson said he thought the existing judge in Quebec was paid twice as much as he ought to get, but that the salary should continue during the incumbent's life and be cut down one-half after his death. What are we asked to do to-day? The very moment the chief justice of British Columbia dies, we are asked to raise his salary $400 more than we fixed it at in 1891. If you are going to increase this judge's salary without a scintilla of evidence that the work has increased or that the cost of living has increased, you will be setting a precedent which will compel you to raise the salaries all along the line. The matter of $400 is not much but the principle involved is a serious one, and I do not think the circumstances justify the hon. gentleman in asking us to adopt this resolution.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This is merely a resolution to bring in a Bill. I have said to the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) that I shall be very happy to lay the information he has asked for before the House. Perhaps the House will allow us to report the resolution and bring in a Bill on the understanding that I will not go on with the Bill until I give hon. gentlemen the information they desire.

Mr. McMULLEN. If we adopt the resolution, we will be committing the House to the principle.

Mr. LAURIER. I have no objection to report the resolution, but I cannot consent to its taking another stage to-day.

Mr. PRIOR. Although I suppose this is a matter on which lawyers are expected to argue and not ordinary laymen, yet, as a British Columbian, I may be allowed to say a word. Hon. gentlemen opposite have worked themselves up into a tremendous state of excitement because the Government see fit to bring forward a Bill to give a salary to our new chief justice which they consider commensurate with the service he does the country.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There are kickers on your side too.

Mr. PRIOR. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., (Mr. Davies) has insinuated that the judges of British Columbia do not do nearly as much work as those in other portions of the Dominion.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not.

Mr. PRIOR. The hon. gentleman's words are open to that inference, and also the remarks of the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen). I am not a lawyer, but I know that the lawyers and the people generally in British Columbia are of the opinion that the judges are hard worked.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). One case in three years.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is the admiralty.

Mr. PRIOR. The admiralty court is not the only court. It is very amusing to British Columbia members to see the facility with which hon. gentlemen opposite change their opinion. When the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) and others were in Victoria, they could not say too much with regard to everybody's salary being raised and money being spent on the harbour and in every other direction; but on the very first vote asked for in this House in relation to British Columbia—the small amount of $400—they take up the whole afternoon trying to stop it. Not only that, but on every occasion I notice that hon. gentlemen opposite are ready to oppose railway subsidies and increases of salary in every possible manner. The gentleman who has just been promoted to the office of chief justice in British Columbia has been known all his life as a most hard-working man, who works day and night in his profession, and I do not think that anybody in British Columbia, no matter to what side of politics he may belong, would say a word against our giving to him as large a salary as we can legally. Whether that $400 can be given legally or not, I am not in a position to say, but I deem it my duty to protest against the view being allowed to go forth uncontradicted that British Columbia judges do not perform a fair amount of work for the salaries they draw. As regards the cost of living, there is no comparison between British Columbia and the eastern provinces. There are some few things, such as fish, pretty cheap, but the general cost of living—wages, house rent and everything else—is far higher, and it is only fair that the chief justice and the other judges there should have larger salaries. They have to travel all over the country and endure much hardship and inconvenience. They have to put up at most miserable hotels in some portions of the outlying districts, and the work they do gives satisfaction to everybody. We require the very best men we can get as judges in British Columbia and elsewhere, and it is only by paying reasonable salaries that we can get such men to take the positions. Now, I only hope the Minister of Justice will see fit to bring down the return of the work that is done, because I have no doubt that that return will show that the work done is as much as that done by any other judges in the Dominion. In regard to the admiralty court, although there may not be very many cases, there are still a very great many more than there used to be. There must be, because I find that, by the navigation returns, the increase in tonnage has been very large, indeed. Last year, the tonnage in Victoria was 755,691 tons—that is, arrivals. Gentlemen will understand how large a tonnage this is when they consider that Halifax has only 670,000 tons. Nanaimo had a tonnage of 329,655, and Vancouver of 307,654, and the total for the province of British Columbia was 1,482,413 tons. In Nova Scotia the total tonnage for Halifax, Pictou, and a long list of other ports was 1,439,000, a little less than that of British Columbia. That may give hon. gentlemen opposite some idea as to the work there is in the admiralty court.

Mr. PRIOR.

Mr. LAURIER. As the hon. gentleman has referred to me, I have no objection to repeat here in much more emphatic language what I said in British Columbia. I referred to the fine harbour of Victoria, and I said then, as I say now, that it was a disgrace that the rock near the entrance of this fine harbour should be without a light. Let me say to my hon. friend that if I had had the honour to be the member for the city of Victoria, I would have used my influence with the Government of which I was a supporter to have a light put upon that rock, rather than to have a post-office in the city over the site of which there has been a squabble ever since between their friends and among the faithful. I do not admit the justice of the hon. gentleman's remarks as to the Opposition finding fault with this vote. The hon. gentleman must be aware that the vote we have now in view is to remunerate a gentleman, whoever he may be—the chief justice or any other—who shall administer the functions of admiralty judge in a proper manner. Now, this was taken into consideration three or four years ago by the late Minister of Justice, Sir John Thompson, who stated that, in his judgment, $600 was fair remuneration for the work to be done, especially considering that—whatever the hon. gentleman may say as to the tonnage—for three years there has been only one case before the admiralty court. I am prepared to say here, and to repeat in the city of Victoria, if I have the good fortune to go there again, that, if there is but one case in three years before a court, $600 is at least fair remuneration for the judge at that court. I think the hon. gentleman will not gainsay what I say in this matter. And, if he will discharge his duties properly to the city of Victoria, instead of fighting for this petty item, he will see to it that there is a light on the rock at the entrance of the harbour.

Mr. PRIOR. May I ask the hon. gentleman what rock he refers to?

An hon. MEMBER. He is thinking of Vancouver, not Victoria.

Mr. LAURIER. No, no; I mean Victoria.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think that, on the understanding I mentioned, I would move to rise and report the resolution, resuming the discussion when the Bill is before us.

Mr. CORBOULD. I endorse every word the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) has said. As this subject is to be discussed when the Bill is before us, I would rather reserve what I have further to say until that time.

Resolution reported.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Militia pay and allowances—Permanent Corps and Active Militia..... $45,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Minister of Militia might explain why this grant of $45,000 is necessary, and to what services he proposes to apply it.

Mr. DICKEY. The militia vote of last year, as presented to the House, was $482,000. Subsequently, during the session, without any particular reason being given to the House, it was cut down by the sum of $82,000; so it passed the House at $400,000 odd. It was intended, I understand, at that time, to promote economies in the permanent corps, and in the expense of the attendance of members of the active militia of the schools of instruction. But, though something was done in this respect, the department was not successful in keeping the expenditures within the $400,000. They did not go over the original amount asked for; had that amount of $482,000 been taken, this vote would not have appeared. But they are $45,000 short on the expenditure for the permanent corps and militia attending the schools, and this vote will be applied to those purposes for the current year. But the militia vote for last year has not been all expended. However, owing to the Order in Council passed some years ago, the old practice of transferring votes from one purpose to another within a department has ceased, and, therefore, we are not able to apply the unexpended amounts on the other militia items to this service, and we are obliged to come to Parliament for a specific appropriation. This is really asking for leave to appropriate some of our unexpended balances to the particular item I have referred to.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What items do you expect to save on? As I understand, the Minister contends that although this is apparently an additional vote, he won't exceed the sum total, because he will save in other quarters.

Mr. DICKEY. There was a vote for the purchase of arms, which has not yet been used.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is the amount of that?

Mr. DICKEY. Between $65,000 and $80,000. That was the reason the other amount has been reduced.

Mr. MULOCK. At this stage, perhaps, it would be interesting if the Minister of Militia could inform the committee whether he has adopted any policy, subject to the endorsement of the House, as to the expenditures upon permanent corps. There is a general feeling throughout the country that too large a portion of the grant for militia purposes is being spent upon the permanent corps. It was argued at the inception of this feature of our militia service, that the establishment of permanent corps would have the effect of placing in various parts of the Dominion, schools where men could obtain the necessary qualifications to entitle them to command companies or battalions. This system has been in force for many years, and has resulted in the establishment of a small standing army in our country that is gradually eating up the grant for militia purposes. As to whether it is accomplishing the object to which I have alluded, I can offer no opinion myself; but I can say that I have received the advice of reliable members of volunteer regiments high up in the service, and I will give to the Minister of Militia the opinions that I have received from them upon this question. With reference to schools established for the purpose of qualifying gentlemen to take commands, I am told that they practically fail to accomplish that object. Under a former system young men were enabled to attend military schools at other than business hours during the day, to receive instruction, and in due time to qualify themselves for commands. At that time there being no barracks, no permanent corps, the young men boarded in their own residences, and were able to discharge their ordinary avocations, the hours of the schools being adapted to the demands of their occupations. But with the establishment of these permanent corps, a new plan has been inaugurated. Now the candidates are obliged to go into barracks, they have to give up all their other callings during the time that they are in barracks, and are obliged to undergo considerable expense. I may say that on this point, I am not giving my own opinion now, but I am giving the opinion of men high up in the militia, one of them being an official enjoying deservedly the confidence of the country, who has seen a great deal of militia service, has been for years in the service, and is as high up as any Canadian can be. He is at present engaged as actively in promoting the militia service as is any man in Canada; and I give you his opinion, amongst others, to the effect that the graduates of the permanent corps to-day are not any better qualified to take commands than were the graduates of the old military schools conducted as I have mentioned. He gave me as an illustration his own experience. This gentleman told me that he had received his certificate under the old regime, and although a considerable interval had elapsed between his qualifying and receiving a command, yet when he was gazetted as a subaltern, he found himself thoroughly qualified to take command of his company, and in due time he obtained a first-class certificate, and now he is a field officer of the first rank. The present system, then, is not only very expensive, but is a system which practically defeats the object in view. Under the old system, young men attending colleges, putting in their winters at various centres where the system of training and examination obtained, were able to qualify in considerable numbers and then return to the country, and become centres for diffusing the military education acquired by them in this way. Thus there were gradually scattered throughout the country a great many young men ready to take commands whenever vacancies occurred. To-day, how many, in comparison, can qualify? I have not got the figures; but if it is to-day, as I understand, the rule that a man must give up his whole calling and go into barracks for the time being, how many men in our country are able to afford that? The system now in existence discriminates against a great army of industrious people with callings that demand their whole time. It prevents graduates and undergraduates of our various colleges taking practical advantage of the system, and it limits the number. The old system was elastic and inexpensive, and almost any person of industrious habits could, without loss of a day, qualify himself to take command of a company, or even of a regiment. Now, it is only those who are out of employment, or who can so arrange their affairs that they can for the time being give up their ordinary calling, or those with means, who are able to take advantage of this system. The system, therefore, appears to be entirely failing to accomplish the object in view, that of disseminating a military knowledge throughout the Dominion; and it is in addition, absorbing a large portion of the money that should go for the maintenance of the rural battalions. Under these circumstances, I, for one, will be pleased to learn whether the Minister of Militia has considered this question, and if so, whether he is prepared to give his opinion to the committee.

Mr. DENISON. I am glad that the hon. member for York (Mr. Mulock) has made this suggestion, because it is the plan that I suggested some two or three years ago. I then proposed to revert, more or less, to the old system, or to engraft the old system of schools, if possible, on the present. I explained then my reasons somewhat in the line just taken by the hon. member. I also then showed that very few men could go through on account of the difficulties of leaving their business. There are also other objections, one of which is that a man has either to go in as an officer and go to the expense of purchasing his uniform, or else he has to enter the ranks and attend school, either as a non-commissioned officer or as a private.

Mr. DICKEY. I would suggest to the committee whether, with the view of saving time, we should not let this question lie over, because it will have to be gone over again at a subsequent period. When the Estimates for 1895-96 come up, I shall be called upon to state the policy of the Government as regards the future. This is a vote simply to provide money for the current year, and although a discussion at the present time would probably be quite regular, still I am afraid that if now we have to go into it, the discussion will be repeated on the main Estimates.

Mr. MULOCK. Why not take the discussion now as well as any other time?

Mr. DICKEY. I am quite content to do so, but I think we shall have to go over it all again. I am quite satisfied to briefly state what my own ideas are, but for the sake of the committee, I desire to postpone a long discussion on the whole system at this stage.

Mr. DENISON. There is something in what the hon. Minister has said, but any remarks I make now it will not be necessary to repeat afterwards. As I shall occupy only a short time, I may as well conclude the remarks I was about to offer. I was going on to point out the advantages of the old system, and I hope the Minister will look into it, and have an inquiry made and see what can be done. There is no doubt that under the present system we do not get as much advantage from the schools as we ought to obtain; when I say the schools, I refer to the permanent corps, in the expense of which there has been a steady increase for years past. For the ordinary militia about $290,000 have been appropriated each year, that is, for the drilling of the militia proper. While that amount was greater during the seventies, since about 1880 the expenditure has remained practically stationary, or at about $290,000. The total amount appropriated for the whole militia has somewhat increased, and now it is in the neighbourhood of $1,300,000. What I complain of is, that while the ordinary militia estimate has been reduced and curtailed, and the militia more or less starved, the difference has been expended, I might almost say lavishly, in increasing the permanent corps. There is no doubt that the militia expenditure proper, the amount expended on the men of the force, is a popular expenditure, in fact there is no more popular expenditure than that made on the militia of Canada, but we must not allow the whole amount of the estimate gradually to be diverted from the regular militia, and be expended in paying a staff and permanent corps.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. DENISON. When six o'clock was called, I was endeavouring to point out to the Minister of Militia the necessity of grafting the old system of schools upon the present system. Under the old system, the cadets were given a cheap uniform by the Government, and after a couple of months' instruction they were examined, and if found capable of passing the examination they were given a certificate; and if not, they were allowed another month, and then if they failed they were returned without a certificate, or, if they succeeded, they received $50 and got their certificate. This was a cheap and inexpensive way of instructing a very large number of men, and could, I think, very easily have been grafted on the present system. While I do object to some of the large expenses on the permanent corps, I must not be understood as being opposed to them. I am in their favour in their proper place, but it is not desirable that we should go on increasing the expenses of the permanent corps, year after year, and reducing the expenditure on the regular militia. If we follow that course, in time we will have an expensive set of schools, without any militia to instruct, and that, of course, would do away with the necessity for schools, staff, and everything else. Some means ought to be adopted to try to retain the equilibrium between the permanent corps and the regular militia. I would like to add that while we spend $1,300,000 on militia, and are only enabled to drill one-half of the regular militia, if we could increase that vote by $150,000, or else reduce expenditure in some other way, we could drill the entire militia, which would be of great service to the country. I regret that General Herbert's term is about to expire, because I consider that he is the best general we have had since the time of Sir Patrick Macdougall. However, his five years are about up, and I suppose we shall have to part with him. As an officer of the force, I say he has done a great deal of good in every way. He has helped on the efficiency of the militia generally, and especially has he improved the permanent corps, and made them much more efficient. I would like to read some extracts from a letter evidently written by an officer, or an ex-officer of the force, and which appeared in the "Globe," on the 21st of May, 1895. It shows the manner in which the militia expenditure has been drifting towards the permanent force. He says:

There is little sign in this country of men who have served in the permanent force being of use as non-coms. in militia battalions; and General Herbert's own express statistics show that the number of men in it who are available as extra instructors is nominally 11.5 per cent. Practically, the only use of the men of the force as instructors would, if carried out, be to drill with attached non-coms. from the ordinary militia force, and to furnish the men by drilling whom attached officers may qualify.

Again, he says:

Again, a large sum is expended yearly for clothing. The private in an average city battalion, as he stands on parade, has his tunic, a pair of trousers, a great coat and a forage cap—in some corps he provides these himself—coming from the Government; his helmet and leggings belong to his corps, and his underclothing and boots are supplied by himself, and exceedingly inefficient for actual campaigning these articles, especially the boots, usually are. And there are many corps whose Government clothing is worn out and shabby to the last degree. Compare with him the man of the permanent corps, provided for, from helmet to boots, with winter and summer clothing and necessaries, and judge as to what share of this allowance for clothing goes to the permanent corps, who are daily in uniform, and what share to the rest of the militia, who wear their clothing only during drill. The benefit of the outlay upon furniture and utensils, &c., goes to the instructional troops. Of late several officers and men have been sent to Britain for instruction, and this swells the expenditure by over $2,000.

He gives an estimate that he has made up, evidently as carefully as he could, of what the permanent corps takes out of the militia grant of $1,300,000. He says:

The account for the cost of the permanent force, looked at in this light, mounts up as follows:—

Pay and allowances.....	$215,033
Provisions, supplies, &c.....	98,472
Clothing and necessaries, say.....	50,000
Remounts	6,684
Artificers, horse-shoeing, &c.....	8,560
Barrack services.....	17,006
R.C.A. Institute, Quebec.....	500
Expenses of trip to England.....	2,023
Change of uniform, R.C.D.....	750
Modern rifles.....	16,156
Military properties.....	47,263
Warlike and other stores, say.....	20,000

Total.....$482,447

Then he goes on to say that each certificate costs the country $1,564. Of course, I do not consider that is a fair estimate, because we no doubt have the permanent corps there and the militia behind them as a police force, and for helping the civil power if necessary. Under the old system of schools, I fancy that each certificate did not cost the country more than $100 or $150. I would again press upon the Minister of Militia the desirability of looking into this matter and endeavouring to graft the old system of schools upon the present system; and to see if it cannot be carried out in conjunction with the present system in an extensive manner.

Mr. DICKEY. When I deprecated extended discussion on this vote, I assure you it was not that I wanted to avoid a discussion on the militia estimates, because, as everybody in the House knows, I am entirely ignorant of the details of the department I am now administering, and I shall be more than glad to have suggestions from every quarter of the House, from gentlemen who are much more competent to deal with the matter than I am. It is, therefore, not for any purpose of precipitating a general discussion that I say anything at all to-night upon the general policy. I am indebted to the hon. member for York (Mr. Mulock) and the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Denison) for the suggestions they have made, and I can tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Denison) that his suggestion with reference to incorporating the old system of schools upon the new will receive my earnest attention, when I have time to make some reforms in the Militia Department, as I sincerely hope to be able to do. With respect to the permanent corps, I may tell the committee that my present intention is to reduce them to 800 men and officers, which the committee will see is a very material reduction. I also hope to make them more generally serviceable in the drilling of the active militia, and the furnishing of drill instructors. I do not know that at the present time it is necessary for me to say anything more upon this particular item. The vote asked for is a vote for the current year, and in connection with the policy of the department for which I am not personally responsible. It does not apply in any way to the reduction I propose to make in the permanent corps; that will come in the next year's Estimates. It is asked from the House simply to discharge the obligations of the Government with regard to the present establishment of the permanent corps.

Mr. SCRIVER. What is the strength of the permanent corps now?

Mr. DICKEY. It is quite up to the average of 1,000 men.

Mr. O'BRIEN. If the Minister of Militia takes the advice of any member of this House in the administration of his department, he will be the first Minister who has ever done so since I have had the honour of a seat in Parliament. We have had discussion after discussion on militia matters, and I have never yet discovered that the slightest result came from them. It was pure waste of time, so far as the force is concerned. The Militia Department went steadily on in the path in which they started some years ago, magnifying the permanent corps into a standing army at the expense of the rest of the force. Last year they increased it beyond what the law allows; but this Government pays no attention to the law. The law allowed 1,000 men, and they increased the force to 1,100. Now they propose to reduce to 800 men, and they might reduce it very much more. I think 500 men would be ample for the country or the force. I am not averse to the schools of instruction, but I do protest against their body being regarded and kept up as a standing army at the expense of what is really the army of Canada, that is, the active militia. While I think it would be very proper to postpone the general discussion of this question until the main Estimates are before us, a word may be said of the way in which the Government have treated the force during the past year, showing how little the interests of the officers and men of the force have been consulted as to what is their chief interest, the annual drill. Twelve months ago they were under orders to go to camp. That order was not rescinded until the time had elapsed when we should have been in camp. The officers and men went to considerable trouble and expense in preparing for camp, and nothing came of it; all that trouble and expense was thrown away. Naturally, the officers and men felt aggrieved that, after having been ordered to camp and having made preparations for it, no provision was made for their going. This year, about the 15th May, we were told most unexpectedly—for there was nothing in the Estimates for the purpose—to prepare for camp, barely more than four weeks being allowed for preparation. I would like the hon. Minister to understand one thing, what I have not yet been able to get any previous Minister to understand, that there is nothing more injurious to the force than to give these orders for drill without sufficient time being allowed for preparations to be made. Unless the men know early in the spring that they are going to camp, they make other engagements; and it is exceedingly unfair, both to employers and employees, to order camp at short notice. When an employee goes to his employer and informs him that he has been ordered to camp, the employer naturally asks him, "Why didn't you tell me before?" and it is not unnatural that he should say, "If you go without giving me notice, you need not come back." Therefore, it is exceedingly necessary that there should be some certainty about this matter. With regard to the general subject of the instruction of the force, I am quite prepared to advocate the continuance of the schools on a very much reduced scale, and their being treated simply as schools of instruction and nothing else, which could be done with at least half the men now employed. At present they are perfectly useless for instruction. The whole work is done by two or three non-commissioned officers, and the rest of the expense is practically thrown away. However, I do not intend to go into a general discussion to-night, partly because I have found it to be useless to do so, although I do hope, from the spirit shown by the present Minister, that we may look for better things in the future. I am afraid that the Minister of Militia is a very unimportant member of the Cabinet, for the interests of the militia force are always the last to be regarded and the first to give way to political exigencies, as I think has been plainly seen this season. It is perfectly clear that there was no intention to drill the force when the Estimates were brought down. However, it is some satisfaction to see that the proposition to allow the force to go another year without drill was so exceedingly unpopular in the country that at the last moment the Government had to give way. That is not the way the force should be treated, and I trust it is the last time that it will be so treated, for nothing would sooner bring about its complete demoralization and disorganization. I trust that we are now going to enter upon a new regime with a Minister who will consider the interests of the officers and men who make great sacrifices to keep up the force, and that ultimately we may arrive at the object we most desire, that is, an annual drill, instead of the present fluctuating system.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to express my pleasure at the remarks of the hon. Minister of Militia, if he will only carry out the suggestions that he has made. We have had such promises made very often in the past, but instead of the department making some improvement, they have made changes which, I think, will be admitted by all connected with the force to have been unsatisfactory. I say with the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), that if the present system of administration goes on, we shall have the whole force disorganized. There is not the slightest doubt that the administration of this year has given a great deal of dissatisfaction. The disappointment of not going out last year on the part of some battalions that expected to go out, and that had made preparations for doing so, and again this year the calling out of the battalions on short notice, have greatly incommoded the officers and men of the force. However, it is almost too late to find fault with that now; we have to make the best of it. I simply want to take the opportunity of pointing out to the Minister the very great desirability of adopting some new system that will be satisfactory to the country, and at the same time within the amount of money which the country is willing to advance for militia purposes; and then the system should be carried out faithfully in the best interests of the force. I must say that during the last few years a great deal of dissatisfaction has arisen, and while I would not undertake at present to offer any particular suggestions as to what should be done, or to criticise the permanent corps as it exists at present, if it were possible and in accordance with public opinion to grant a larger amount of money for the maintenance of the militia force in the country, it might be a good thing to have a permanent corps something on the basis now existing; but if that is not practicable, then it will be necessary to adopt the suggestion made to-night by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Denison) and others, to reduce the schools to the position originally intended, that of schools of instruction, instead of spending the amount of money which is at present exended at the sacrifice of what we consider the best element of the force, the militia in the rural districts. I wish to take this opportunity of saying to the Minister that I think the present system of brigade camps requires his very careful consideration. Speaking for the battalion to which I belong, in the section of the country which I represent, we have found this system of brigade camps very unsatisfactory. I am confident that the officials of the department, many of whom we all know to be very efficient gentlemen, could, if consulted, and asked to give the benefit of their experience, devise a scheme that would be very much more satisfactory to the country, and certainly to the militia force. One of the causes for the great dissatisfaction existing with regard to brigade camps, is this: In the rural districts, under the old system, when we had drill at the headquarters of the battalion or company, we had the best young men in the country belonging to the companies. I remember that, when I first belonged to a company, it was almost by a vote of the members that a young man was allowed to join. They were careful in the selection of their members, but, under the present system, especially in the rural districts, it is impossible for those young men to go out and join a camp. In making up the force, volunteers are taken from those who are of very little use at present, and likely to be of less use in the future. That is not the class of men we wish to see in our volunteer force. We must all recognize the fact that the young men, the sons of the best people in the districts in which they live, the young men who are likely to be the future citizens of the country, are the ones we desire to see interested in the force. That must be taken into consideration. Again, as no doubt has been pointed out to the Minister already, it is very questionable whether the education in the brigade camp is better than that obtained by drilling at battalion or company headquarters. These are matters of the greatest importance to be considered by the hon. Minister in the near future. There can be no doubt that at present the greatest possible dissatisfaction exists among officers and men. That dissatisfaction must be removed and the men must become interested in their work, and proud of their companies and battalions. They have to sacrifice a good deal both of time and money. The spirit which prompts them to take an active interest in the force is a spirit of the best patriotism, and I hope that the hon. Minister who has newly taken the position will, as he has promised to do, look into this matter. I recognize the difficulties he has to contend with, and I know that conflicting opinions will be given him, but I would suggest that if he would take some advice from those who are more in touch with public opinion and the wishes of officers and men, he will find some practical scheme which will be more satisfactory to the country than the present one.

Mr. HUGHES. It was not my privilege to hear the explanation of the hon. Minister, or the statements of other hon. gentlemen who followed, except the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Sutherland). I would take the liberty of saying, in connection with the remarks of that hon. gentleman, that, in my opinion, the system of brigade camps should be viewed from an entirely different standpoint from the one he took. In the days when he and I joined the force, no doubt all the good boys of the community did join as the hon. gentleman has said. However, I think if he would analyse the men who make up the rank and file to-day, he would find that they are equally good as those who wore the jackets in the old days of 1866, and onward. The hon. gentleman gave as a reason why he favoured drill at company or battalion headquarters in place of brigade camps, that the better class of young men joined the force in the former case, and this he said was the cause of the superiority of the force of the old days. The first drill that our volunteers had, except in the days of the old independent Rifles, was in 1868. That was battalion drill at battalion headquarters. The next year the same course was followed. But, in 1871 was begun the system of brigade camps, and from 1871 to 1875 are the crowning years in the history of our volunteer force. Fortunately or unfortunately, during the regime of our friends opposite, the Government were seized with a desire to create a permanent force, and to cut down the militia. Speeches were made in Parliament at that time which certainly were unbecoming loyal Canadian citizens; letters were written concerning the volunteer force and militia that would do anything but credit to any citizen of the Dominion; and the policy was adopted of creating a permanent force, and gradually disbanding the volunteer force, except in the cities. Unfortunately, when the Liberal-Conservative party came into office in 1878, they were, as far as the militia policy of the country was concerned, inclined to follow the lead set them by the Liberal party; and in that respect I must complain of the policy of the Liberal-Conservative Government from 1878 onward. To a very large extent they followed exactly in the footsteps of the Liberal party when in power.

One reason why I think brigade camps should be preferred to the system of drill at company or battalion headquarters, is that company headquarters camps were never tried but for one year, and then they were such an outrageous failure that they were abandoned for all time to come. The brigade camp is superior for many reasons. The men naturally like to leave their homes for an excursion; and, in travelling they gain experience in boarding and disembarking from trains, in looking after their horses and weapons, setting up their tents, and so on. Besides, at almost every point where brigade camps are located, we find old military ruins or fortifications. At Kingston we have the old Fort Henry, and the historic Fort Frontenac, and those old Martello towers, if useless to-day, tend to create a military spirit and send the boys home, who have never seen anything of the kind, with a broader idea of military life than if they had drilled round the fields of their own battalion or company headquarters. I am satisfied that the experience of military men is almost unanimous in favour of brigade camps as against any other class of camps.

As to the permanent corps, my views have been placed before the House for a number of years in succession. The permanent corps, to my mind, are altogether too large and cumbersome at the present time. As I pointed out in detail last session, the permanent corps were established for one of three purposes—as a standing army, as a police force, or as training schools for the militia. If they are intended as a standing army, we have no use for them; if as a police force, they are much too large for the purpose; and if as military schools, they do not to the best serve that object. The cost of getting certificates from these schools is altogether too great. I speak now of the whole cost of the permanent corps, and comparing the total cost with the number of certificates, the expenditure cannot be justified. On other occasions I have made this suggestion, and I have yet to see that it can be improved: If the permanent corps were reduced in strength—not the total strength, mind you, of the available force, but the actual number of men enlisted for the three years' service—by 50 per cent all round and their places supplied by cadets on the old plan attending these schools for certificates, I am satisfied much greater gain would accrue to the country at much less cost than at the present time. We might have each of these permanent corps filled up with 50 or 75 drilled men as cadets, not to go there in the sense of privates or sergeants or officers, but simply cadets attending the school for instruction. There would always be a large number of these men as capable of taking places as soldiers as the men now in the permanent corps. We should then be sending every week or every month back to the country a large number of trained men; to take their places in the battalions throughout the Dominion. The schools should be supplied on some systematic basis from every battalion throughout the district. It would be very easy for the brigade major of the district, or the deputy adjutant-general of the district to notify each officer commanding a corps, or each officer commanding a company that on a certain day there would be a vacancy in the school for a certain number of men from his company or corps, and he should be held to account in case he failed to furnish the men to take their places in the military school. By this means you would keep the schools up to the present strength—and far beyond it, I believe—with men who would be changed every two or three months and who, at the end of their period of instruction, would return to their homes taking with them the useful lessons they had learned. We should then have battalions filled with these properly qualified men, and to be dispensed with.

One reason while the old companies and battalions were so efficient is that from 1866 onwards, our schools were well filled with cadets. These cadets returned to their homes with their certificates and became members of their local battalions. And I venture to say that when my good friend from Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) joined the militia force, there were in his company five or six men who had passed the military school and were capable of instructing in drill. And I venture to say that to-day in the whole battalion of my hon. friend from Oxford—and our own battalion and others are the same—you would scarcely find as many men qualified to drill as were found in one company in the old days. I can point to reports of officers on our own battalion back in 1870-71, when they were inspected by field officers of the British service, where it is shown by the record that these men "surpassed in physique the regular soldiers of the British service, and so far as field movements were concerned, they were the equals of any soldiers in the British army." We can point to the record of our volunteers last year in camp at Lévis, where the boys from our city and rural battalions were drilling; and it is a well-known fact, that after the first four weeks in camp, these men from our rural and city corps attached for service, were the equal of any corps of the permanent force in camp at Lévis. At the present time I shall not go into details in regard to the permanent corps, but when the main Estimates come up I may say a few words on the subject.

Another suggestion I would make which the Minister may consider. At the present time each captain of a company receives a certain sum per annum for drill instruction and care of arms. I would not deprive these captains and commanding officers of corps, who, in many cases, have organized the bodies they command—I would not deprive them wholly of this money; but I think that half the amount, a total of from $30,000 to $40,000, can very properly be taken from them, because we know as a matter of fact that the money for drill and care of arms is not properly earned by these officers. I would take this money, and with some saved from the permanent corps. for each regiment or battalion I would appoint a drill instructor, a non-commissioned officer, who would act, possibly, as sergeant-major of the regiment and would be under the direction of the officer commanding. It would be his duty to look after the arms and to drill the squads, preparing the men for sergeants and non-commissioned officers' certificates and training the men so that when they were sent to obtain certificates in the permanent schools, they would go there fairly well qualified. If this were done, I am satisfied that the arms of the battalion would be found in good condition, and there would be a spirit aroused in the force that would be well for the best interests of the country. Another suggestion I would make—a mere detail—is this: At the present time the band and staff-sergeants are distributed, some to each company. There ought to be a separate pay-sheet made up for band and staff-sergeants; in other words, these might be counted as a separate company instead of part being counted in the strength of each company. Very often a captain who is apt to be dilatory in the performance of his duty, who puts off making up his roll to the last minute and wishes to earn his $40 as easily as possible, says: Well, I can fill up with band and staff-sergeants, anyhow. And we find in experience that this works very injuriously to the force. In our own corps we make up a separate pay-sheet for band and staff-sergeants. We have always had difficulty with the paymaster over it, but we have always managed.

One other point that may be mentioned, even before the main Estimates are taken up, is the rifle. There are one or two suggestions I will take the liberty of making. Up to the present time the British Government have not finally adopted the Lee-Metford magazine rifle; in fact it is doubtful if they will decide to use it. The magazine rifle is a good weapon, but until the British Government actually decide as to its adoption, it would be folly, according to my opinion, for this Government to adopt any rifle permanently. Meantime, there are, at the present moment hundreds of thousands of Martini rifles stored in the magazines and armouries of the British service. When the Snider-Enfield rifles were given over to this country, they were given, I believe, without cost to the Dominion of Canada, merely on the guarantee of this Government that these rifles should be properly cared for and returned when called upon. I would suggest that the Martini rifles at present stored in Great Britain might be drawn upon by arrangements between the Governments of Canada and Great Britain, on the same terms as those upon which we obtained the Snider-Enfields; and we could arm our force from one end of the Dominion to the other with the Martini-Henry rifle, a rifle which for accuracy of fire and for length of range, is at all events quite sufficient for any purpose for which we are likely to require it in our day. The rifle is infinitely superior to the Snider-Enfield, which has been in use thirty years, and that is a very long time to stand service. I think the Martini-Henry could be placed in the hands of the volunteers at no cost to the people of this country, and I am satisfied that the best riflemen in the country, as well as the raw recruits that we find in various camps, would be well satisfied could they have the Martini-Henry in their possession.

Another point I would suggest to the Minister is this: The main object of our militia at the present time is to afford a nucleus for a larger force in case of actual war. Therefore I condemn, and I am satisfied that the military men of the country, as well as those in this House, will condemn the policy that has been pursued by the department in recent years of cutting down the framework of the militia force to the very lowest possible notch. Every officer having anything to do with camps knows that he cannot possibly get along with less than four sergeants, yet he is allowed on the average but one and five-sixths of a sergeant: and the mystery to every officer, having anything to do with rural corps, is to know how he is going to cut the sergeants up so as to divide them around the companies. There should be four sergeants to every company, three officers to every company; and there should be the regular two surgeons to every battalion, but the surgeons are cut down to one for every battalion. There is only one major allowed to every six-company battalion. The whole framework of the force has been torn to pieces, and I maintain it is the framework that should be kept up efficiently, so that in case of actual warfare these men will be able to fill up the companies of their various corps with large numbers of men, and the whole be ready to be put into the field.

Again, I understand, in fact I know, it is the custom in some of our brigade camps to take the officers of the permanent corps and place them in command of men who are their seniors. For instance, the present camp that is going to be held at Niagara will, as I understand, be in command of an officer who is a junior to many other officers who will be there. I do not know the object of the department, in doing that: I do not see that it can be done short of an Act of Parliament; and yet we find a large number of instances of that kind throughout the country where officers of permanent corps are placed in command of men who rank above them, and who are their seniors. I am satisfied that if these officers thus superseded were to bring the matter to a focus, it would be found that the order issued by the department was not capable of being carried out: in other words, the department is acting illegally in placing such men over their seniors in command of these camps. I understand that the present intention is to place Col. Buchan in command of the Niagara camp, who is junior to a large number of men in that district: and I think the same remarks will apply to other districts throughout the country.

I may also say that the volunteers who have served for many years in this country at great personal expense to themselves, will be pleased to know that the Minister has given assurance, as I understand, that the medals or decorations issued by the British Government for long service are to be forthcoming for those Canadian volunteers who have served in the Canadian militia. This has been in abeyance for a long time. It is not a fact that the volunteers asked for this, but some three or four years ago it was announced that this decoration would be given to the volunteers of Canada. It has been dangled in front of their eyes, and a large number of officers who wished to retire, but who wished to remain until they secured that decoration, have been deceived, have been bamboozled into holding on to office in order to get this decoration, and finally have retired without it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Bamboozled?

Mr. HUGHES. Possibly bamboozled is not a correct military term. It does not apply to the action of the present Minister of Militia, but possibly to some newspaper reports. I hope the Minister of Militia will take this matter up in the interest of the old volunteers, the good boys who joined the force away back in the days of the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), when he and I and others joined the force, and see that we are rewarded for our long services and good conduct by this "old country" badge.

Mr. FORBES. You ought to have a leather medal.

Mr. HUGHES. We keep the leather medal for those who shoot only with the mouth.

Another matter that I will bring before the Minister of Militia is the question of brevet rank. A large number of our quartermasters—I believe our good friend from Oxford is a quartermaster, and I have two or three other instances in my mind—have been in the force a great many years, yet under the present rules these men can obtain no higher rank than that of honorary major. I would simply recommend to the Minister that he consult the military authorities throughout the country as to whether it would not be advisable that these men should be recognized. Take, for instance, the best shooting man in the Dominion, Major Mason, of the 13th Battalion of Hamilton. He has been in that battalion since the Fenian raid days of 1860, and long anterior to it, and notwithstanding all the time that he has given to rifle shooting, and to the organization of that battalion, and to the militia of Canada generally, he can obtain no higher rank than that of major. There are many other cases like his to which I would draw the attention of the Minister. I think that when the department saw fit to abolish the brevet rank, it made a very serious mistake, and did an injustice to a large number of officers. At the present time a man has to serve ten years as captain before he can become a brevet major; and he has to serve a lifetime, excepting in an artillery corps, before he can become a brevet Lieutenant Colonel, under present regulations. In many of the rural corps of this country there are officers who hold no higher rank than captain, who are seniors to very many city colonels in the Dominion, and who were in the force and were officers previous to the entrance of the latter into the force. I say this, not that I have any objections to the city corps; for I have proven myself their friend on many occasions, but I am merely pointing out the injustice that is done to many officers in the rural corps where old officers have held on to office for a large number of years, as compared with the officers of city corps. If the Minister will take this into consideration, I am satisfied that he will decide to make a change in the line I have suggested.

There is another point—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear. Go on.

Mr. HUGHES. I am not in the least bit of a hurry to get through; I can keep it up for a good deal longer. Owing to the unfortunate state which the militia is in, and the unfortunate precedent set by my good friends of the Opposition in office, and followed unfortunately by our friends since their accession to power, the militia force is in great need of reorganization at the present time; and I do not intend that the little by-play of any hon. gentleman shall deter me from placing my views before the committee on this matter. Another suggestion I wish to make is this: At the present time, owing to the great increase in numbers and the reduction in the use and price of horses in the United States, owing to the fact that electricity has driven horses from street cars, owing to the fact that horses can be purchased in the United States and Canada for a mere song, I maintain that the amount of money paid to-day for the service of a horse in our annual camps should be reduced 50 per cent. A horse to-day is not worth much over half what it was twenty years ago. At that time the pay of a horse was $1, and the pay of a man was 50 cents. To-day the pay of a horse is $1 and the pay of a man 50 cents. Our experience with the cavalry corps and artillery corps is this, that a man will not join an infantry corps so long as he has any opportunity of bringing a horse to the camp and earning $1 for the horse and 50 cents for himself against 50 cents for a man in the camp. I suggest, and I am satisfied the suggestion will commend itself to the good sense of the Minister of Militia as well as to a good many Lon. members of this House, that the pay of the horses should be reduced to 50 cents per day, the same as the pay of the men. When the general Estimates come up I may have occasion to offer some further remarks; in the meantime, I commend the suggestions I have offered to the consideration of the Minister of Militia, and I am satisfied that they will, at all events, receive his serious consideration.

Mr. CASEY. These amounts in the Estimates have been incurred already far in excess of the Estimates of last year, I suppose. Can the Minister tell the committee how much of the first item has been spent for the permanent corps, and how much for the active militia?

Mr. DICKEY. I am not able to give the information at the moment, but I think from $40,000 to $45,000 on the permanent corps; $400,000 was granted under the head of permanent corps and active militia last year.

Mr. CASEY. I understand that $308,000 was for pay and allowances. How does it occur that as regards the permanent corps, which include a fixed number, there should have been an expenditure of $40,000 in excess of the estimate?

Mr. DICKEY. I have already explained that the amount voted for the total service, grouped under permanent and active, was $482,000; but before the session closed, the department, thinking they could save $82,000, omitted that amount, and a vote was taken for only $400,000. The department expected to make reductions in the permanent corps, and in attendance at schools. Instead of the attendance at schools diminishing, it nearly doubled last year, and the strength of the permanent corps was not reduced; so an increased expenditure of $47,000 was involved beyond the amount voted, but the amount was $35,000 less than the original estimate.

Mr. PRIOR. I have listened with a good deal of interest to the remarks of hon. members who have discussed this question before the committee, and I must say my interest was tinged with a good deal of regret owing to what I heard said by the Minister of Militia in regard to the permanent corps. The hon. gentleman informed the committee that it was his intention to reduce the number of the permanent corps. Although there seems to be a unanimous opinion among commanding officers in the House as to the advisability of that step, even though I may stand alone, I must say that I believe it will be a fatal mistake if the hon. Minister does anything of that sort. There may be localities in which some of the corps may be cut down with benefit to the general service, but I think it is a force that should be kept up to a strength of at least 1,000 men, and maintained in its present state of efficiency. A strong reason why hon. gentlemen present have spoken in the way I have indicated is owing to the fact that there is only a certain amount of money voted for the militia, and they think that because the permanent corps receive a considerable sum, the ordinary militia is starved. Well, Sir, there may be something in that argument, but the remedy lies not in cutting down the permanent corps, but in inducing Parliament to vote more money for the militia force. I do not think that very many people in this country would refuse to sanction such an increased expenditure, and certainly there are not many members of this House who would not sanction a larger vote if the Government would bring it down. The militia of Canada is a force which is to be relied upon to do its duty if any trouble arises, and it is very well to think that no trouble will arise because no trouble has occurred for a long time; but we see every other nation in the world maintains a standing army, although I do not believe that Canada has reached such a position as to maintain a standing army of any magnitude, still, the least it can do is to maintain a large force of properly trained and efficient militia. I am sure if the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) were to secure the passage of his Bill for the enfranchisement of women, there would be no more popular vote in the world than the militia vote, because whatever we men may think of the safety of the country, we know the ladies expect us to defend them, at all events, whatever we may do as regards ourselves. I was very sorry to see that the vote for the annual drill of the militia is such a small one. The item states, "$220,000 for drill in camps of instruction of the rural corps." I should like to ask the Minister whether he intends to drill the city corps, and to drill the artillery. I am informed that owing to pressure brought to bear on him lately by a large number of commanding officers, from different parts of the country, who waited on him and urged their claims, the Minister intends to drill the city corps, but not to drill the artillery. As I am, I believe, the only artillery officer present, the responsibility falls on me to see if I cannot change the mind of the Government in regard to the drilling of the artillery, and give good reasons therefor. Any one who knows anything about military affairs must be perfectly well aware that if there is one branch of the service which requires constant drilling and attention, and constant reading up of the red book, it is the artillery. The men have to do double duty, they have to learn their artillery duties as well as infantry drill, and I would ask the hon. gentlemen present commanding infantry corps not to think I am in any way belittling the infantry corps of the country. What I am stating is a fact, and they know it as well as I do. The artillery officer has to pass a much stiffer examination. He has to keep thoroughly well read up from year's end to year's end, or he is no good at all as a commanding officer, or an officer of any kind. The sergeants have to be better educated, and have to learn a great deal more, and especially in the field artillery you have to have smart men and men of good intelligence. Well, Sir, it is impossible that the men can miss drill for a year or two, without the force suffering, and suffering very materially. I therefore trust that the Minister of Militia will use his best endeavours with the Minister of Finance—or whoever it is who gives the order that the drill pay shall be forthcoming—and see, that whatever branch of the service is to suffer it will not be the artillery. It is very poor policy indeed for this Government, or for any Government, to economize with the militia. Let them economize in something else, but do not let us run our country into danger by thinking that we have a militia force to defend us in time of war, if any such should occur, and then when the time comes, to find that the men are only on paper, or that, if we have the men, that they are not efficient soldiers. I am specially interested in the artillery, and if hon. gentlemen will pardon me I will cite as an instance my own regiment. We have been put under a new establishment, and raised from 175 to 525 men. Every commanding officer knows the time and money it takes to keep a regiment of that size up. We have just got our regiment in a pretty efficient state, and if we were not allowed to drill this year the consequence would be that we would lose half the men. They would say: The Government have not taken an interest in us, although we have done our best on our part. A great many of the officers have gone through three months hard work in the short course. They have purchased their uniforms, and if they see that the Government does not care for them, how can we expect them to care for the Government or for the militia? Another feature of the British Columbia garrison artillery is, that if they are not drilled and kept efficient, this Government will be breaking faith with England. We have come to an arrangement with the Imperial authorities with regard to the building of forts at Esquimalt. I believe the total amount spent on the fortifications there will amount to nearly £1,000,000 sterling before they are completed, making them the most modern kind of fortifications. The Imperial Government has a small company of 100 royal marine artillery to take charge of the guns and keep them clean, but the agreement with the Imperial Government is that Canada shall man those guns. That is the reason that the British Columbia garrison artillery was raised to the present strength of 525 men. Unless the Dominion Government provide that these men and the officers commanding them are efficiently drilled and properly qualified to take charge there. In case any trouble arises, they are, I say, breaking faith with the Imperial authorities. I therefore urge on the Government that the British Columbia garrison artillery should be drilled this year and every other year. I also have heard it stated that the Government might allow enough money to drill the artillery force for eight days. Well, I think that is very small potatoes, indeed. The men are supposed to draw drill pay for 12 days, which amounts to $6 a man, but dozens of my men have put in between fifty and sixty and seventy-five drills a year, and yet they only get paid for twelve. I hope that the Minister of Militia will use his best endeavours to see, that not only the rural and city battalions are drilled, but that also the field batteries and garrison artilleries shall be drilled as well. I heard with great pleasure what the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) said with regard to the new rifle. I am perfectly certain that if this Government could see their way to make some arrangements with the Imperial Government to get a number of Martini-Henry rifles, that the entire force would be very well pleased for the present. In time to come, when England, and France, and Germany, and other nations have come to some sort of opinion as to which really is the best rifle, I do hope that we shall be armed with it; but at the present time I do not think that it would be good policy for this Government to invest in the Lee-Metford, or any other rifle. Let us use the Martini-Henry. It is a good rifle for the militia, a good rifle for recruits, a good rifle for a good shot, and, I think, all would be perfectly satisfied with it. I shall have another opportunity, Sir, of saying a few words in regard to other militia matters when the ordinary Estimates come up.

Mr. PRIOR.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If there is any truth at all in the doctrine, that in a multitude of counsellors there is safety, the Minister of Militia is very much to be envied to-night. I am not going to anticipate the discussion which he promises us. I shall be very glad indeed to hear what system he is likely to recommend to the House, when he has had time to consider it, and I am quite aware from recollection that he will have a great deal of trouble in introducing any system that is likely to please even his own supporters, let alone the gentlemen on this side of the House. I do not want to treat the matter in any shape as a party question. I never have done so, and, I think, I might say that it has not been done on this side of the House. We are all agreed in desiring that whatever may be done as to our militia, it may be done so as to give us a respectable force which every Canadian could and ought to be proud of. I am bound to say that such little experiences as we have had, have not been at all discreditable to the material of which our force was formed; nor did they compare badly—I think I may say that—in our recent experience, with the conduct of Her Majesty's regular troops when exposed to similar antagonists.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But, I would say this to the Minister of Militia, and I think on the whole that the common sense of the House will agree with me in respect to it: whatever the Government decide to do, whatever policy they choose to adopt, whatever number of militia they think necessary to maintain, I trust that they will rather aim at quality than at quantity. For my part, I would rather see a much more moderate force liberally treated by the Government and fairly dealt with, than an attempt (which I think we have been making for too long) to sustain a larger force than the funds at our disposal allow us to discipline and handle properly. I think the hon. Minister, whatever course he decides upon, will be well advised to bear that in mind, and to see to it, that he does not ask Parliament to maintain a larger number of militia than the funds at his disposal will enable him to keep in good order.

Mr. TISDALE. I wish to endorse to a certain extent what the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) has said. I agree with him that this country ought to be able to keep up as large a regular force as we have now, and a sufficient force of volunteers besides. But at the same time, if the Government cannot see its way to vote sufficient funds for both. I would rather see the permanent force reduced, because I think that if the money that Parliament is prepared to vote is not sufficient for both, the funds could be applied to better advantage in keeping a larger number of volunteers, than in spending so much of it to maintain a small number of the regular force. I also, for once, agree entirely with what the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has said, that it is most important that the number of militia, both in establishment and men, should not be larger than can be maintained and drilled every year. If they are not, there are two great deficiencies in being able to keep up a proper force. One is that you cannot keep the men together, and the other is that they are always dissatisfied. The officers find great difficulty in keeping their companies up and in getting the officers to qualify properly, when there is an uncertainty about their being called out at regular periods. Therefore, I would ask the Minister, in considering this matter, to make that one of the essential points. I think we can afford to keep up the present number of the volunteer force, and if we cannot do that without reducing the permanent force, I would say, reduce that force. But, speaking for myself, and as one coming from an old part of Ontario, and knowing the responsibility I am taking, I am satisfied that my constituents would be prepared to support Parliament in voting enough money to maintain both the thousand men of the permanent force and the present strength of the militia force and to drill the latter every year, and also to secure the best arm that modern science has been able to invent.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I understand that the hon. Minister of Militia does not desire to discuss the general policy of the department upon this vote, but that he prefers to do so upon the main Estimates. That being so, I shall so far comply with his wish as to confine my observations to the item which we have now before us. Now, I would like to ask the hon. Minister, who has, no doubt, been informed on the subject, whether an unusually large percentage of the men in the permanent force have not left that force without leave—practically deserted? I understand that nearly one-fourth of the men of that force are not actually in the service at the present time. If that be so, the hon. Minister will, no doubt, be saved the trouble of the reduction which he proposes to make, because that reduction, as a matter of fact, has already been accomplished. Then, there is in this appropriation $33,000 for clothing. Now, I understand that a very large quantity of clothing was purchased by his predecessor, and that it included some 60,000 coats of oilskin or waterproof. I believe it is necessary that these coats should be separated from each other to be kept in good order, but these were left together in a large parcel, and when the inspector of clothing came to examine them, he found it impossible to separate one coat from another without tearing them to pieces. They had been left unpacked, and when the warm weather came they adhered to each other; so that the whole purchase was rendered practically valueless. The hon. Minister, no doubt, can tell us how far that is so. Then, one hon. gentleman has spoken of the importance of drill and of the unpopularity of the service to-day compared with what it was in former years. Whether we have in Canada any person competent to take charge of the militia force as Major General, I will not pretend to say. With the number of graduates that have been turned out at the Kingston Military School, which has always seemed to me to be a very important institution if properly managed, there ought to be some person competent to occupy that position. I do not pretend to say that the gentlemen who have been sent from England to this country to take charge of our volunteer force are not capable men; but their notions of the force and of the way to maintain order and discipline and promote efficiency are so much at variance with the habits of the population of this country, that it is very difficult to maintain the popularity of the force and to get into it the class of men my hon. friend from North Oxford says are desirable. When they are spoken to in the manner in which almost every man of military training from the other side of the Atlantic thinks appropriate in addressing those whom he deems wanting in duty, in efficiency or in proper regard for military etiquette, they are not inclined to consent to be spoken to as if they were scarcely entitled to the rank of freemen. I think that is a matter entitled to the serious consideration of the Government, if the force is to be made a popular one.

Mr. DICKEY. I am not at all aware of any diminution in the permanent force from the cause mentioned by the hon. gentleman, though, if his information is better than mine, I cannot say that I shall particularly regret it, for it will have done very easily what we intend to do, as he himself says. As to the destruction of oilskins, I am quite sure the hon. gentleman is under a misapprehension. I am informed by the superintendent of stores that that is an entire mistake. I do not know what foundation there is for the statement; if there is any, it must be in a very small degree. However, I will make direct inquiries on the spot. With respect to the Major General Commanding, that, of course, is a very large question. There is a great deal to be said in favour of a native commanding officer, and also a great deal to be said for an officer connected with the Imperial service. I would not like to commit myself by cutting off that link which binds our militia system to the Imperial service, and which assures us a similar standard, not only of manners, which may be objectionable, but of efficiency and 'esprit de corps' in the volunteer force here to that in the regular force in England.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). With regard to the clothing, I believe my information is correct. I am informed that the statement was made in the presence of the Major General himself.

Mr. McMULLEN. With regard to the first item, I would ask the hon. Minister, when he is making the inquiries about clothing, to find out how it is that 1,188 great-coats were sold to the Indian Department at $1 a head? Also, a large number of blankets at 50 cents, and of trousers at 25 cents a pair; fur caps at 25 cents, and helmets at 25 cents? They may possibly have been returned or worn-out clothing.

Mr. DICKEY. The hon. gentleman is, no doubt, aware that worn-out clothing is returned to store by requisition. Some is destroyed, and that which is of any service is made use of. Clothing in the militia service has a regulation life. It lives three years. It may be worn out the first year, but it must live three years. It comes back at the end of the three years; and, as far as the overcoats are concerned, they were returned to store after being used—some had three years, and some had ten years' wear—and sold to the other department, which was able to make use of them. The other items I am not so sure about.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I understand the overcoats averaged three per year to each volunteer.

Mr. DICKEY. The hon. gentleman is certainly wrong.

Mr. McMULLEN. Can the hon. Minister say whether the entire number of overcoats sold, 1,189, was all returned, or consisted partly of stock that was in store and had not been given out, but had become damaged or moth-eaten?

Mr. DICKEY. I speak entirely from instruction: I know nothing myself. The statements of the officials are clear and distinct, that they are all old overcoats returned, and I have no doubt it is correct.

Mr. McMULLEN. The same remark will apply to the fur caps and helmets?

Mr. DICKEY. Yes.

Mr. CASEY. The $45,000 for pay and allowance, which we are asked to vote now, and the $33,000 for clothing and necessaries appear to be both due to an attempt at economy on the part of the hon. gentleman's predecessor. The hon. gentleman's predecessor reduced the estimates last year considerably below what they were first put at, and, in consequence of this attempt to make a good showing for the year, we have expended $78,000 more than was actually voted last year. In other words, the Government got the credit last year of making a reduction of $78,000 in the militia estimates, which reduction was not made at all, because we are now asked to make up for it in the supplementaries. I wish also to call the hon. Minister's attention in connection with item for monuments on battlefields to the fact that there is an important battlefield in my own constituency—one of the most historic of the war of 1812. It was here where Tecumseh fell. That battle was more important in its results than many others in the war of 1812 which have been commemorated, and I think something should be done to mark this place. It is near Moraviantown, an important Indian reserve. With regard to the question of rifles, as the matter has been brought up, I can hardly avoid urging on the Minister that, in the first place, the chief object in volunteer drill throughout the country should be to obtain a large number of good marksmen. The first thing to be kept in view is to teach young men how to shoot straight, and they ought to have the best rifle we can get for them. I was for a long time of the same impression as the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Hughes), who urged that the Martini-Henry was a good enough rifle. But since I have seen something of the shooting of the Lee-Metford rifle, I am much shaken in my opinion. It is as much ahead of the Martini as the Martini is ahead of the old Snider. It is much lighter to carry, and the ammunition is much lighter. A Martini bullet weighs as much as the whole cartridge of the Lee-Metford. I am not speaking of the Martini-Metford, because I consider that rifle the perfection of clumsiness and inconvenience. It is very much heavier than the Martini or Snider. In the Lee-Metford the breech action has not yet been so thoroughly tested in actual service as it ought to be. It has a partial disadvantage in the fact that it is a magazine rifle. I do not believe that soldiers have any use for a magazine rifle, unless they are in the face of some such enemy as the Soudanese or Zulus, who come on in endless droves until actually shot down. I cannot understand that, in any battle between ordinary Europeans, it will be necessary to keep up that awful fire for a few minutes which the magazine rifle is capable of keeping up. In ordinary service, the possession of a magazine rifle might lead to a waste of ammunition. If the Lee-Metford rifle can be got at a reasonable price, it is undoubtedly vastly better than the Martini. But if the price has not yet diminished sufficiently, I would urge that, at all events, every Snider in the service should be superseded by the next best rifle, the Martini. There is no excuse whatever for keeping the Snider-Enfield in the hands of our volunteers any longer. It is as much out of date as the Brown-bess, and the constant use of it will only incapacitate the volunteer for the use of a better rifle afterwards. As to the question of the permanent corps and the active militia, I am strongly of the opinion that if there is to be a reduction of expenses anywhere it should be at the cost of the permanent corps. Our only need for this permanent corps is to afford a pattern for the volunteers, and to provide drill sergeants for the much larger force that would have to be used in case of any emergency. The expense in connection with the volunteers is widely distributed throughout the country. It creates a little plentifulness of money in many places, and the expense is not so much felt as where it is spent for a small number of men in barracks; and I think we all agree that the main expenditure should not be so much to keep up an efficient force of regulars as to spread over as many men as possible a certain knowledge of drill and a very considerable knowledge of rifle shooting. We ought to make our people as expert with the rifle to-day as the yeomen of England were with the long bow many years ago. I do not know that the members of this House would require much training in drawing the long bow, but we should make Canadians as much superior to the rest of the world in rifle shooting as the yeomen of England were superior in the middle ages to the rest of the world in the use of the long bow. I will reserve what else I have to say until the main Estimates are before us.

Railways and Canals—Capital—Sault

Ste. Marie Canal—construction..... $310,000

Mr. HAGGART. This estimate is for the purpose of covering the following items: Hugh Ryan & Co., section 1, $100,000; lift lock, $91,600; lock gates, $16,000; power pipes, $6,300; lock valves, $9,400; motor houses, $3,700; difference in cost between native and Portland cement, $14,000; construction, section 3, $39,100; Canadian Electric Company, electric machinery, $7,350; William Kennedy & Sons, water-wheels, $3,000; Canadian Locomotive Engine Works, machinery for gates, $500; Miller Brothers, gate pontoon, $3,000; concrete piers, and anchors for movable dam, $8,300; salaries of staff, $5,500; sundries, $2,250.

Mr. McMULLEN. Would the Minister say whether the articles he has named were supplied by tender—outside of what was done by Ryan & Co.?

Mr. HAGGART. The water-wheels from Kennedy & Co. were not got by tender.

Mr. McMULLEN. Where do Kennedy & Co. live?

Mr. HAGGART. Owen Sound.

Mr. McMULLEN. Are there any other items in which there were no tenders asked for?

Mr. HAGGART. There is the gate pontoon, $3,000—supplied by Miller Brothers, of St. Catharines.

Mr. McMULLEN. Were the amounts of money paid to Ryan & Co. paid on a schedule of prices, or was any sum paid outside of the schedule?

Mr. HAGGART. It was all paid under schedule prices, except the lock gates, for which a lump sum was paid.

Mr. McMULLEN. How much?

Mr. HAGGART. There is about $16,000, in this estimate. They made a contract for the lock gates of $67,500, on which they received $51,037, and this is the difference.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. Minister mentioned a change in the cement. What was the increase in price on account of that?

Mr. HAGGART. It was one dollar for 400 pounds.

Mr. CASEY. You mentioned a lump sum of $100,000 paid to Ryan & Co.

Mr. HAGGART. That is a balance on the schedule of prices.

Mr. CASEY.

Mr. CASEY. It seems remarkable that it should be the even $100,000. What is the explanation of that?

Mr. HAGGART. It may be a few dollars more or less; the final estimate has not yet been made up.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman says, I understand, that there was a change from native to Portland cement. Are we to understand that the original contract called for native cement?

Mr. HAGGART. The terms of the original contract called for native cement, and I thought it was to the benefit of the work that it should be changed to Portland cement.

Mr. LAURIER. Why?

Mr. HAGGART. Because it is a much superior article.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes; but surely this might have been thought of before as well as after. How is it that these changes come after the contract is made, and invariably result in mulcting the public in large sums of money?

Mr. HAGGART. Almost anybody knows that Portland cement is better than native; and the relative prices are as well known as the prices of different grades of sugar.

Mr. LAURIER. It is a surprise to me that the hon. gentleman, if he knew it before the contract, did not act upon his knowledge.

Mr. HAGGART. Unfortunately it was fixed before I took charge of the department.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) As this question and some other matters arising out of the construction of this canal, are being made the subject-matters of examination before the Public Accounts Committee, I think before the hon. gentleman asks the House to vote this money, it would be well for him to give some information to the committee, a general statement showing, in the first place, what was the original proposition with respect to the construction of this canal, what price the proposers informed the Government that the work was going to cost. Then I would suggest that the hon. gentleman inform the committee of the more marked changes that took place in that contract since, the length of time that the completion of the contract was extended, and the bonus or additional sums of money which that extension and those changes cost the country. Having that general information, the committee would be in a better position to discuss this item.

Mr. HAGGART. I was intending to make a full explanation of all these changes on the main Estimates, but I can give the explanations just as well now. The design of the canal upon which the contract was entered into, was for a lock 600 feet long and 85 feet wide, with 16 feet 3 inches of water on the mitre sill. The width of the prism was to be 150 feet, with a depth of 18 feet of water below the lowest known water-line. That was before the first contract was let. The first contract was let on the 20th November, 1888. The then estimated cost of the canal was $4,000,000. I may state to the hon. gentleman that the canal will be completed for a cost nearly $500,000 less than the estimate.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Was that estimate of cost submitted to Parliament at that time?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes. On the 20th November, 1888, a contract was entered into with Messrs. Ryan & Co., for the construction of lock and prism covering a length of about 3,500 feet. On the 30th January, 1889, a further contract was given to these contractors for the construction of the lower entrance, covering a length of about 5,300 feet. On the 26th March, 1888, a contract was entered into with Messrs. Allan & Fleming, for the construction of the upper entrance, covering a distance of about 9,300 feet; or a total length of about 18,100 feet, the whole work to be completed on the 10th May, 1892. Some time after the works were commenced, strong representations were made for a change in the plan of the lock by increasing the size.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What time was that?

Mr. HAGGART. That was some time after the 20th November, 1888. The change in the contract for the lock was then made, an agreement being entered into on the 13th June, 1891, by which the contractors undertook to execute the additional work, the whole contract to be completed on the 10th May, 1893. Then the work was started on the modified plan. A discussion took place, as the hon. gentleman will remember, in December, 1891, which led to a further modification; and on the 23rd December, 1891, an Order in Council was passed changing the dimensions of the lock, adopting a length of 900 feet by a width of 60 feet, with 19 feet of water on the sills at the lowest recorded water-line, provided reasonable arrangements could be made with the contractors. I think it was shortly after this time that I took charge of the department.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Was it on the hon. gentleman's personal recommendation that the Order in Council was passed?

Mr. HAGGART. I think it was done before I became Minister of Railways. According to my memory, the only change I made was an extension of the depth of water on the mitre sills of the lock by one foot six inches, to make it correspond with the depth of water on the mitre sills of the American lock. But on account of the difficulties with the Americans a year or two ago, I made an arrangement by which they were to finish the lock a year before the time stipulated in their last contract, for which they were to receive $90,000.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What were they to receive for the other contracts you made respecting the deepening?

Mr. HAGGART. The whole contract was to be completed on 10th May, 1893. My deputy has the changes in the different contracts, and the different prices, and will lay them before the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) As a matter of fact, did they finish it within the time the hon. gentleman stipulated?

Mr. HAGGART. They finished it a month before the time contracted for, and received the $90,000 extra. It was to be finished in December, 1893, and I understand it was finished in the month of November.

Mr. LAURIER. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the canal was completed in 1893, and ready for navigation?

Mr. HAGGART. The contract with the Ryans I have referred to was never intended to be finished until this spring, because there was additional work to be done, in the shape of placing machinery for opening and shutting the gates, and valves, the placing of the valves before the dams could be removed.

Mr. LAURIER. I was under the impression that the canal was to be opened for navigation last September, 1894.

Mr. CASEY. It was given out that such would be the case. It was also stated that water was let into the canal last fall.

Mr. HAGGART. The water was let in to the canal in October, I believe.

Mr. CASEY. And the gates operated?

Mr. HAGGART. The gates were hung, for water could not be let into the canal without the gates being in place.

Mr. CASEY. Was it not ready last fall for a vessel to go through?

Mr. HAGGART. A boat did pass through, but the canal was not open for traffic. It was not intended to be opened until this spring.

Mr. CASEY. Then if Ryan's contract had not been completed when it was, in consideration of this bonus, the canal could not have been opened this spring?

Mr. HAGGART. No; not until a year afterwards, next fall.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) So the reason for giving the bonus of $90,000 was to secure the completion of the canal in December, 1893, because, if it had not been completed then, it could not have been opened until the summer of 1895. What possible object was there gained by having a portion of the contract work completed in December, 1893, and giving a bonus to secure that, if the lock was not needed to be completed at that time ?

Mr. HAGGART. We had to have the lock completed in order to get the gates, valves, and a lot of other things not included in the lock contract placed in position, ready for the spring. Much of this work could not be done at all in winter without building a shed over the place.

Mr. CASEY. Could these works have been gone on simultaneously with the Ryan's contract ?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes, by making an arrangement with the contractors ; but the gates could not be hung until the work was completed.

Mr. McMULLEN. Did the Minister say that the first understanding was to have a lock 660 feet long ?

Mr. HAGGART. Six hundred feet long, and 85 feet wide.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice in a speech delivered by Sir Charles Tupper, when he was Minister of Railways and Canals, that he stated the lock would be 540 feet long, with 15 feet on the mitre sill.

Mr. HAGGART. The first contract was let on 20th November, 1888, and it was for a lock 600 feet long, and 85 feet wide.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is quite evident from the statement made by the Minister of Railways at that time that the first intention was to construct a lock 540 feet long. Surely the Minister will not challenge the statement of his predecessor, for I am quoting from "Hansard." So there must have been more changes than the statements of the hon. gentleman opposite would indicate.

Mr. HAGGART. That is the information I have received from the department. I was not at the head of the department at that time, and the information furnished me is that the first contract was for a lock 600 feet long and 85 feet wide. That was subsequently changed to 650 feet long, and 100 wide, with 19 feet on the mitre sill, the width at the gates remaining as before, at 60 feet.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman will find Sir Charles Tupper's remarks at page 1440 of the debates of 1888. The question was put by Mr. Choquette : "Can the hon. gentleman state what will be the depth on the mitre sill ?" Sir Charles Tupper replied : "We expect 16 feet, and the lock will be 500 feet long."

Mr. HAGGART. No doubt the hon. gentleman is quoting correctly. All I can tell him is that the contract was made for a lock of a different size, a lock 600 feet long, 85 feet wide, and 16¼ feet on the mitre sill.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Mr. CASEY. I understand that the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) is pointing out to the committee that the changes made by the Government have not even yet been fully explained, that there were changes between the time the statement was made by Sir Charles Tupper in the spring of 1888, and the time the contract was let in September, 1888. But, perhaps the most interesting point is to ascertain what is the actual benefit we have obtained by giving the bonus of $90,000. The Minister does not seem to be positive as to whether the work of finishing up the canal might not have been carried on simultaneously with Ryans' work, whether the canal might not have been opened for last season's navigation, instead of this season's navigation. It was evidently the intention of the Government, under fear of the closing of the American canals, to have had our canal open earlier than it has been opened, and that this bonus was given to push on all the works simultaneously, and get the canal opened a good deal sooner than has proved to be the case. When, however, the difficulty with the United States in regard to the use of their canals passed over, the efforts of the Government were relaxed, and the canal has not been opened sooner than was anticipated, although the Ryans have obtained a bonus of $90,000. That is the outcome of the explanation given ; perhaps if the Minister gave all the particulars, the case might appear otherwise. But the hon. gentleman's brief is not as well prepared as was that of the Finance Minister when he submitted the present tariff.

Mr. HAGGART. The understanding was that Ryan's contract, in so far as the masonry lock walls were concerned, should be finished on 31st December, 1893, in order to enable the Government to open the canal this spring—when navigation commenced, if necessary.

Mr. CASEY. Does the hon. gentleman state that Ryan's contract was originally to be completed for the fall of 1893 ?

Mr. HAGGART. The bonus of $90,000 was given by Order in Council, and it was for the completion of the masonry work one year sooner than was originally intended.

Mr. CASEY. What was the original date ? I understood the hon. gentleman to say that without a bonus, Ryan's contract would have been finished in the fall of 1893.

Mr. HAGGART. No. I will read what the last contract was. All the documents are before the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. MULLOCK. The Public Accounts Committee meets to-morrow, and if the matter is threshed out there it might save discussion in the House.

Mr. HAGGART. The whole discussion will be in order on the main Estimates.

Mr. CASEY. Would the Minister of Railways give us the date it would have been finished if the bonus had not been paid, and the date it was finished when the bonus was paid?

Mr. HAGGART. I understand that we were enabled by the $90,000 bonus to have the canal completed a year before it otherwise would have been completed. They were obliged by the last contract to complete it on the 31st December, 1893, and I understand they had it completed in November, 1893. This is an amount that has to be available before the 1st of July, and, of course, there are some other items in connection with it in the main Estimates.

Mr. LAURIER. Well, this is only the 6th of June. The hon. Minister wants us to vote it without giving any information. Let the item stand.

Mr. HAGGART. All right, let it stand.

To pay salaries and expenses in connection with the commission of inquiry into Lachine Canal expenditure..... $6,700

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I take it for granted that this item is partially, for the inquiry into the Curran bridge expenditure.

Mr. HAGGART. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We would like to have some particulars into the state of affairs there in reference to what the Minister of Militia described on a recent occasion as "a clear steal." We should like to hear from the Minister of Railways what has been done, or is being done, with respect to the suit instituted in consequence of the report of this commission.

Mr. HAGGART. An action is being brought against Mr. St. Louis to recover $120,000 which it is alleged he got in excess of what he is entitled to. He brought an action against the Government for $65,000, and he did not succeed in it, but I believe it is in appeal. There was a criminal prosecution against Mr. St. Louis for conspiracy to defraud the Government, and that action is now being pressed for the purpose of bringing it before the grand jury in Montreal. That is in the hands of the Justice Department.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) As I understand it there was an action brought by St. Louis against the Queen, and in the statement of defence put in by the Government they claimed the overpayments to St. Louis as a kind of set-off. Afterwards, on the application of the Crown, the claim of set-off was struck out, so that it should not be considered in the action of St. Louis against the Queen. That action of St. Louis against the Queen was dismissed by the Exchequer Court, and if it is still pending, St. Louis must have appealed.

Mr. HAGGART. I think he has appealed.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The set off the Crown put in by way of statement of defence is now brought as a substantive action, and that will be tried before the Exchequer Court in a short time.

Mr. HAGGART. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The third action is a criminal prosecution pending against St. Louis.

Mr. HAGGART. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Have any proceedings been taken against any other parties in connection with what my hon. friend states was "a clear steal"?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did not describe it as such. I said the Minister of Militia said that, but perhaps it was the Minister of Justice. I would not like to misappropriate the statement.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Have any other criminal proceedings been taken against any other parties for this conspiracy?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No steps have been taken at present against other parties.

Mr. MULOCK. It is as much as you can do to handle St. Louis.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. At present there is an application pending before the assizes in Montreal to lay before the grand jury the evidence taken before the police magistrate.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is the hon. gentleman able to state to the House whether these proceedings are being pushed?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes. The application has been made, and the necessary steps taken under the code, and the whole matter is now under deliberation. The Chief Justice, I believe, is presiding, and he took the case into deliberation to-day and we expect a decision.

Mr. LAURIER. The steps of justice are very slow in this case.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not the steps of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not hear distinctly the last portion of the hon. gentleman's remarks.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In order to proceed in this case we have to obtain the permission of the court to lay the evidence before the grand jury; but a question has arisen in this regard, which was argued this afternoon, and I have received telegraphic information to the effect that after the argument the chief justice took the matter into deliberation, and will decide whether the matter should go to the grand jury or not.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is a preliminary point taken before the Chief Justice ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes. We have contended that it can be laid before the grand jury. Some exception to that was taken by the counsel for Mr. St. Louis and the matter argued, and the case has been taken into deliberation to-day.

Mr. MULOCK. Who is acting for the Crown ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Hall.

Mr. MULOCK. I see it stated in the press that the provincial government have refused to pay some of the expenses of the prosecution that failed.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. What effect has that upon the present prosecution ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This is a point which the judge has to decide. It was argued that the Crown, as represented by the Attorney General for Canada, was bound to enter into an understanding to pay the expenses of this prosecution in the event of it failing. That was not admitted on the part of the Attorney General for Canada ; and that is the real point in dispute.

Mr. MULOCK. The point is whether the Dominion shall give security or pay costs already incurred ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not already incurred, but which would be incurred by a new trial.

Mr. MULOCK. At all events, if the judge decided that the Crown as represented by the Dominion, shall give security, I presume there would be no hesitation on the part of this Government in giving that security.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman presumes that.

Mr. MULOCK. I ask the hon. gentleman, then, whether, in the event of the court requiring security from the Dominion Government, they will be prepared to give it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think it would be very unwise and quite extraordinary for me to state at the present juncture what we would be prepared to do in the event of the court deciding in a certain way. It would not be respectful to the court.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would like the hon. Minister of Railways to give us some general statement of the particulars of this vote of $6,700. Whose salaries is it for, and what are they ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Mr. HAGGART. The salaries are : H. A. F. Macleod, services and expenses, $2,860 ; J. E. Vanier, $1,920 ; and R. C. Douglas, $1,810. That makes $6,590.

Mr. LAURIER. How is it these men were not paid before ?

Mr. HAGGART. We had not the money ; it lapsed.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How much did the hon. gentleman pay for the investigation in addition to this ?

Mr. HAGGART. The whole cost amounts to $9,270.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does that include this $6,000, or is it outside of this ?

Mr. HAGGART. It includes this.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then, it would be $3,000 for the expenses of the commission, and $6,000 for the salaries.

Mr. HAGGART. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the hon. gentleman will find that these figures do not cover the whole cost. There are no claims outside of this pending and unsettled ?

Mr. HAGGART. No, there are none.

Mr. LAURIER. Do I understand that these three commissioners have never received any money for their services up to the present day ?

Mr. HAGGART. $395 is all they received.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The Minister of Railways says this is to pay, among other things, the salary or remuneration allowed to Mr. Douglas. You cannot pay him under this vote, Mr. Douglas being an officer of the department.

Mr. HAGGART. He is not in the Civil Service. He is one of the technical staff attached to the office, but he is not a permanent officer.

Mr. MULOCK. Before we pass from this item, I wish to come back to the point I raised with reference to the Minister of Justice. Let us refer to this prosecution to see how much progress we have made either to cause some person to make restitution or to obtain some satisfaction in some court for the great fraud committed on the country. If I remember the transaction rightly, the country could have got this work done for $160,000 or $170,000, and it was shown that we had paid $390,000, or $230,000 in excess of what the work could have been constructed for by reliable contractors, the Grand Trunk Railway Company, I think. A commission inquired into the matter, and made a report in plain Anglo-Saxon language, alleging that the Crown had been grossly defrauded, and enumerating instance after instance of fraud. That opinion was laid before Parliament a year and a half ago. It was in the possession of the Government as late as September, 1893. Nearly two years have elapsed since an amount of $200,000 was stolen out of the treasury in the most barefaced way, and the only progress made in the meantime is that the accused person has carried the warrant to Africa, and is prosecuting a suit against the Crown for more money. On the eve of a general election, a short time ago, there was a temporary manifestation of energy on the part of the Government, and we saw it stated that they were proceeding criminally against St. Louis. The Government, however, seem to have lost a good deal of their energy of late; and the preliminary attempt having failed before the magistrate, we are now told that there is danger of further criminal proceedings being interrupted by reason of the Dominion Government not having given security, or by reason of the point being disputed as to whether they should give security. The hon. Minister will not say whether the Crown will give the security or not. He thinks it would be ill-advised for the Crown to do this.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. As we are just contending that we need not.

Mr. MULOCK. Does the hon. Minister pretend to argue that the Chief Justice of Quebec would be influenced in his judgment by a declaration here from the Minister? The Minister ought to assure us that he will do everything necessary in order to bring the case to trial. The public will be content with nothing else. I can see no object in the Government refusing to state what they will do lest that statement should affect the decision of the Chief Justice. If the Chief Justice decides there is to be security—and he will decide that point quite regardless of the attitude of the Dominion Government—the hon. Minister ought to tell us what the Government will in that case do. There has been a good deal of trifling of late by the Government in dealing with matters affecting the administration of justice. I do not wish to re-open old sores, but, speaking of the future, I must say that the public will not stand any more trifling in the administration of justice. It is the duty of the Government to say here, in plain, unmistakable language, that whatever is necessary to vindicate the law, they will do. It is a defiance of public sentiment, it is an outrage, that this great robbery should have taken place, and that there should be no one behind the bars to answer for it. Would the state of affairs which now exists have existed had the accused person not some sort of influence or pull? There can be but one inference. Do you suppose that in any other country under the sun such a transaction, condemned by the Government engineers, resulting in a direct steal from the public treasury of a sum approaching a quarter of a million dollars, would remain unredressed for two years after its discovery? Why, we have contracts for millions of dollars being at all times carried on, and this laxity or carelessness or whatever else you may call it, on the part of the administration, is an inducement to other contractors to do likewise. This state of affairs would not be allowed to prevail among private individuals. The machinery of the law would long since have been put in operation and the accused brought to jail. Why, then, should there be a different rule when the Crown is the injured party? Are we to suppose that there is not enough energy or administrative policy in the whole seventeen members of the Cabinet to bring one accused individual to jail? How long does it take to bring an accused person to jail?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In my judgment the position which the hon. gentleman takes is pitiable. In his desire to serve his political ends, he most utterly failed, by taking up a most extreme position. No more extreme position could possibly be taken. I am sorry for the hon. gentleman. He is always extreme. I have never known the hon. gentleman to be fair and candid in the discussion of any subject connected with politics. If the hon. gentleman thinks he can help his party or influence public opinion by taking the position he has to-night, I believe, knowing something of the people of this country, that he will fail miserably. The Government is proceeding in order and decency. The Government is bound in these matters to observe the procedure of the courts; and while there is no dispute in this Parliament in reference to the frauds that were perpetrated on the Crown, and while the hon. gentleman apparently believes that the accused, with other people, were guilty of crime, we must not be childish in our desire to bring the accused to justice. We must recognize that the Government and this Parliament must bow to the laws which this Parliament has enacted. But the hon. gentleman would hang a man first and try him afterwards. No matter what our opinions may be, from the evidence taken, the only way we can attempt to carry out the opinion of Parliament is by proceeding as other parties proceed. We have taken every step up to this day that we could possibly take. The hon. gentleman refers to the time when these frauds were committed. The hon. gentleman means to state that, after and almost before there had been time to carefully examine the voluminous evidence that had been obtained by a commission issued for the purpose, Parliament undertook, as its right was, to go on with the story, not to leave the Government to discharge its responsibility as it best could. This Parliament exercised its undoubted right and constituted a committee to investigate, de novo and from the beginning everything in connection with this transaction. When an enormous amount of evidence had been accumulated and submitted to the committee, every step that could be taken under the laws of Canada, was taken, and the case was put into the hands of eminent counsel, reputable men, who, in the opinion of the advisers of the Crown, did all that could be done to carry out the desire of the committee and the desire of Parliament. And what was that? To put in due form before the magistrate, the proper authority in the province of Quebec and in the city of Montreal, the evidence on the case. The decision of the magistrate has been given. The hon. gentleman, I take it, thinks—and I agree—that the result was not such as we could have anticipated. What, then, remains for us to do? It remains for us, if we are dissatisfied with the decision of the magistrate, to put that evidence, that cogent evidence, that exceedingly strong evidence, in the opinion of the Government of the day, before the grand jury in the district of Montreal. And, on the first opportunity that we could do that, acting according to the legislation of this Parliament, we have done it. There we meet, as in every case of this kind we must meet, opposition on the part of the accused. And I say that Parliament will not hold its proper position, if we exhibit an undue desire to get the accused into the prisoners' box again. Surely, that is not our desire. We must respect the judges of the land; we must have regard to the regularity of procedure, and, having regard to that procedure, and showing respect for the judges of the land, we have done all that we could do. And now a point is taken as to the regularity of our course in the application that has been made, because opposition has been made to it, and the case is taken into deliberation. I say with confidence and appealing to members on both sides of the House, that it would be an exhibition of gross disrespect to the courts of Quebec, if we should begin to-night to discuss what we should do if the Chief Justice presiding at these assizes did not carry out the desire of the Parliament of Canada. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this discussion—although I do not hesitate to enter into it—is not germane to this vote, and is not strictly in order. The question before the House does not relate to the prosecution of Mr. St. Louis, or to the proceedings that are now being taken; they relate to an investigation that took place some time ago; and this committee is simply asked whether that investigation is one that should be paid for and whether the expenses that were incurred preliminary to the proceedings that are now being taken, were such as the Parliament of this country ought to provide for. I do not think that this is a time to discuss our position before the court or what we will do in the event of the court not agreeing with representations made by the counsel on behalf of the Crown.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister of Justice says that he has done all that was possible to do in order to bring this case to justice.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Certainly.

Mr. MULOCK. I have not got the exact dates in my mind, but, speaking from recollection, a report was made by the commissioner in the fall of 1893. Does the hon. gentleman recollect the exact date?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No. It was before the last meeting of Parliament.

Mr. MULOCK. And many months before.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not many; the work was not finished until May, 1893.

Mr. MULOCK. At any rate, in the fall of 1893 the Government had the report of the commissioner. In the fall of 1893 they knew as much as they know now about this robbery. This was months before Parliament met. I want to put two questions to the hon. gentleman in view of his statement that everything has been done that could be done for the administering of justice in this case. Would he explain what was done in order to administer justice in this case between the making of this report and the assembling of Parliament? He pretends that the assembling of Parliament tied the hands of the Government, because Parliament undertook to investigate the matter. Let us, for the instant, concede that point, and let me ask him why his department or his Government was not at work between the handing in of that report and the assembling of Parliament, an interval of months? The accused, according to the information in the hands of the Government, had taken a large sum of money they were not entitled to. The hon. Minister has told us that the Government has done everything that could be done, proceeding in a dignified way, as justice ought to proceed. Let him tell me what was done in the period I have referred to. Perhaps, I should be correct in assuming—though I will not assume it until he has given me an answer—that they had folded their arms during these months, and it was not until Parliament had assembled, and for weeks afterwards, when the House showed activity in the matter, that any manifestation of an intention to do anything was made by the Government. Now, there is another period I want him to bridge over, in view of this statement that everything has been done that could be done. Parliament prorogued, as well as I can remember, about the middle of July, 1894. We are now in June, 1895. I do not know exactly when the information was laid before the magistrate.

Mr. LAURIER. In October.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon. gentleman tell us if he took from July to October to lay an information? These are two points I should like to know about, and then we will see how far the Minister's statement is verified.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman seems to be thoroughly at home. He imagines that we are in a police court, and that he is bullying a witness in the box. The hon. gentleman never seems to be so happy as when he is in a position of that kind. Now, I am not surprised that he has put these questions; he puts them out of the innocence of his heart. If he had ever held a position in the Government, he would not have put these questions.

Mr. MULOCK. Oh.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes. The hon. gentleman will observe that no gentleman on his own side of this House who understands these matters—

Mr. MULOCK. Answer the questions.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I will answer them in good time.

Mr. MULOCK. Assume that I am guilty, and answer the questions.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I want to give the hon. gentleman more information than he has asked. No hon. gentleman who has held a Cabinet position, either in the Federal Government or a local government, would put his question. If he had listened to the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) I am certain he would not have proposed these questions, or spoke of the number of witnesses. The hon. gentleman spoke of the hundreds of witnesses examined. I say there were not 200 witnesses examined; nevertheless we all admit there were a great many, and the case is one that did require an enormous amount of testimony. It was a case in which the fraud practiced was not only gross but ingenious; it was a case in which almost all the employees were involved; it was a case in which a crime was committed through the acts of this enormous body of men. Consequently it was a case exceedingly difficult to consider, and to present in a proper shape to a tribunal. I know, incidentally, something of the difficulty in connection with the massing of the evidence before the police magistrate. Those who have followed the proceedings will easily understand what I mean. There had to be statements tabulated in connection with that vast number of men who were employed, because one of the chief charges was that there had been a resort to fictitious names, as of carters, labourers, and so forth. Then there had to be an investigation into the various and extraordinary means used for defrauding the Government, the misconduct of those representing the contractor and incidentally the misconduct of those representing the Government, who were induced to be false to their trust as it was alleged, by the contractor. I know that the preparation of the evidence, before it was put into the hands of the court, involved a great deal of necessary labour. The case could not be shoved into the courts. Every one in this House knows the way a case is shoved in the Public Accounts Committee; and it is not disrespectful to that committee when I say that evidence is taken there by the ream that would never be admitted by any court in Christendom. Time is consumed there, and witnesses are examined in a manner that would not be tolerated in any court. Therefore, there had to be a careful investigation held before the case could be presented to the court. It is not an unusual thing that when a case of this kind is reported upon, and an enormous amount of evidence is taken, it does not receive such a careful consideration, first, at the hands of the department immediately concerned, and secondly, at the hands of the Government, as a man would give to evidence relating to his own private affairs. I am almost ashamed to give these explanations to the hon. gentleman. He ought to know all I am telling him. Did the hon. gentleman ever hear of red tape? Does the hon. gentleman not know that very simple matters that would be dealt with by a private concern instantly consume, and I fear always will consume, a great deal of time in being handled by the Government, either in this country or any other country?

Mr. LAURIER. No.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman cannot say that with a serious face, because it is common knowledge that no matter how perfect we may ultimately become, even in that dim and distant future when hon. gentlemen opposite will sit on this side, we can never hope for the celerity in the conduct of public business that obtains in the conduct of private business. Now, in this case there was not an opportunity within reason to deal with the subject until Parliament was upon us, and Parliament was no sooner upon us than it adopted this inquisitorial proceeding. It would have been highly disrespectful to this House had we ignored its desire for further information before coming to a conclusion. Let me put this point to the hon. gentleman, if there is anything in it—and from the manner in which he has received my remarks it is evident he does not attach much importance to the case—

Mr. LAURIER. What about the answers?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The answers must necessarily be ludicrous, because they are in reply to such absurd questions. If there was evidence existing upon which a direct action could be taken, is it to be believed that we would have spent weeks, if not months, in taking further testimony? I put it to the committee whether we ought, on the occasion to which I referred, having received the evidence of the commissioner, to ignore that evidence altogether, and whether we did not go into this question from beginning to end? Therefore does it lie in the mouth of the hon. member for North York, or any other member, to charge us with not acting before that evidence was taken, when they were not ready to come to any conclusion upon that evidence themselves? They were not prepared to act, they were not prepared to express an opinion. But they did demand a more thorough investigation, and a more thorough investigation took place. The case of the Government was in no sense prejudiced by waiting until all the evidence that could be accumulated, was obtained. For instance, does the hon. gentleman remember that some of his friends took an extraordinary interest in this case? Some of his political friends connected with Liberal associations in the city of Montreal, men of good standing, took a great interest in this case. Does he not remember that with fear and reward, those men attacked in the investigation which took place under the Government and endeavoured to add to that and to extend the inquiry before the committee. Would it have been respectful, then, to the members of the House, would it have been discrete for the Government to have ignored the fact that this House was not satisfied that all information was in the possession of the Government? I think the course taken was not only a wise course, but even if there happened to be delay, that delay has by no means defeated justice. We presented from all the information obtainable, the strongest case that could be made out on behalf of the Crown, and, taking the magistrate's decision, and all he said that was proved before him, the Government believed that on that evidence which was before him, a case was made out, and that the accused should have been put on trial. The magistrate came to a different conclusion. No one can say that facts were overlooked or not regarded, because the very facts we wished to prove, and which we thought it essential to prove, the magistrate recounted in his decision. Under the law of this country, the Government believed, notwithstanding an apparent miscarriage of justice, there is another proceeding we can take, and that is to put the case just as it appeared to the magistrate, before the Grand Jury; and we have lost no time in doing so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) may not know a great deal about red tape, but it is his own fault if he does not know a good deal about circumlocution. As to the appeal which the hon. Minister has made to us who formerly occupied seats in an Administration, I must tell him there was no precedent in a similar case. I do not recollect ever having been called to sit in judgment on the first cousin of a colleague of mine in a predicament.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister of Justice has furnished me now with a full explanation of the delay that I asked to have explained. The whole proceeding is in his hands, and he has exhausted a very long period of time in order to offer an explanation, without having furnished the explanation. If that is the method adopted in administering this case, then it furnishes a complete explanation as to why progress has not been made. One point more, and then I have nothing more to say at this stage. The hon. gentleman has told us that, on account of the intricacy of the case, and the voluminous character of the evidence, it was necessary for the Government to proceed safely and cautiously and steadily in order that success should meet them at every stage; and so they began last October taking steps to get ready, and then took months to put in evidence, and all to have their case thrown out by an ordinary magistrate. That is the result of the deliberation, care and ability with which they brought this case to the courts.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have just one remark to make on the lengthy speech which the Minister of Justice has seen fit to deliver on this matter.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It only occupied ten minutes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It seemed to occupy more like thirty minutes. The hon. gentleman reflected somewhat on the House for having indulged in the luxury of an investigation in addition to that which was carried out by the officers of the department. I suppose he understands that the department undertook that investigation for the purpose of discovering who the parties were who committed the frauds on the department. But the investigation which the House ordered, and which took place under its auspices had in view another object, and that was to ascertain to what extent the Government and the department were responsible to the country.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I quite agree—that was the object.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That was one object of the parliamentary inquiry, and that inquiry did a great deal of good in that direction, at all events, and it did that which the departmental officials could not be expected to do, namely, to ascertain that it was the department which was in fault. The point which I understand to be taken against the Department of Justice, and against the Government as a whole, was this, while the evidence brought out at the investigation before the departmental officers and also before the Public Accounts Committee showed the existence of a conspiracy in which there were a number of men engaged to defraud the Government out of $200,000, not a single step has been taken, although two years have elapsed, against any man connected with the conspiracy, and sworn to be connected with it, except one. Whether the proceedings against that one have been duly and efficiently prosecuted I will not, at the present stage, express any opinion; but it is written on the face of the proceedings throughout that the Government never have done what they should have done when the sworn testimony given before the departmental officers, and repeated before the Public Accounts Committee, involved a number of men in the conspiracy to defraud the Government, and yet no step has been taken to punish a single one of those men.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is a very serious statement to make, and I am sure the hon. gentleman will accept from me, speaking candidly to the House, and directly on that suggestion, that there is not the slightest desire on the part of the Department of Justice to shield a single individual who is connected with the crimes that have occurred. I speak candidly to the hon. gentleman and to the House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I spoke from the facts.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I ask hon. gentlemen to wait the conclusion of the discharge of this very unpleasant duty before they condemn the proper authorities. If there be responsibility in regard to these proceedings, it rests entirely on the department which I now represent, and I appeal particularly to hon. members versed in the practice of the law, and connected with criminal procedure, in regard to this matter, for our instructions give carte blanche, so far as the department is concerned to the officers to proceed in this case under the evidence, not against one man, but against any or all who are in any way connected with the crime. We have given the most careful consideration to that evidence, because we desire it to be understood that the charge against one man is not taken with a view to victimize him. I am delighted to have an opportunity to correct any such impression that may prevail in the House or in the country; far be it from us to do that, there is no malice, I hope, on the part of any hon. member on either side of the House. All we desire is to thresh this matter out in the proper way before the courts, and whether we proceed against one party or against several parties under a general charge of conspiracy, or against one party after another is, I need not say, to hon. members and particularly those to whom I have referred, a matter involving great discretion and careful consideration. I say we are proceeding now with the bona fide intention of carrying out the ends of justice in the best and most approved manner, and after careful consideration, and acting on the opinion of counsel we have not deemed it in the interest of justice to proceed against all or any at the same time. I hope therefore, that until the end of this unfortunate matter, Parliament will do justice to the low officers, so to speak, of the Crown, and give them their confidence, while they are to the best of their ability endeavouring to bring all to justice. But the mere fact that we happened to proceed against one is no reason at the present time for any hon. gentleman to infer that we may not proceed against others. I say it hoping the hon. gentleman will accept the statement in the spirit in which I make it.

Mr. LAURIER. No, certainly not. The hon. gentleman cannot be serious in the statement which he makes, when we know that this offence took place two years ago, and we have not yet had a single person prosecuted with any effect. It took one year after the offence came to light, before the Department of Justice took any steps against one offender, and after six months of effort it has to be commenced again. Nothing is done. If the prosecution is to go on at this rate, it cannot take effect for one year more. Does the Minister pretend, that if these offences are four or five years old, the time will come to prosecute. He knows that there is such a thing as limitation to these matters, and that these prosecutions cannot be effected unless they are taken within a certain time. If the offence has been committed four or five years before it is tried, the hon. gentleman knows very well, that there is a bar against effective prosecution in such cases. The hon. gentleman has no excuse to say that he is in earnest, as he pretends to be, and as I am quite willing to believe that he is. If he is in earnest that all offenders are to be prosecuted, the prosecution must commence right away, because every day that intervenes makes the chances of conviction less.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am sorry the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) will not accept the statement from me in the spirit in which I offered it. I cannot help that, but I regret it exceedingly. I think it is the first time in a British Parliament, that a man—no matter how humble, or even unfit for the high office I for the moment hold—making a statement of that kind, was received in such a manner. I do not remember such a case in this Parliament, and I do not believe that in a British Parliament, or in the local legislatures of Canada, when any one representing the Department of Justice, or acting as Attorney General, having made a similar statement in regard to criminal proceedings, had his statement in the slightest degree doubted. Now, I will tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) just why it is that we did not venture pell mell against each and every offender, and all, at the same time. I regret to have to say it, but I must say it because the hon. gentleman has forced me to it. It could not have been anticipated; it was not anticipated by the law officers of the Crown that such an unfortunate miscarriage of justice would take place in the city of Montreal. That was not anticipated, but I do say this: That if under that evidence that we produce, we can neither obtain a committal from a magistrate, nor obtain the presentment of a bill from the grand jury, then I do say, that I will advise my colleagues and the Government, that it is absolutely futile and useless to proceed against the minor and other offenders. That is the course we have adopted. That is the course upon which we proceeded, and on good advice; not only on the advice I have from those immediately associated with me, but, I candidly tell the House the position that the Government takes in that regard. We are not masters of the situation. We must bow in this respect to higher powers. We must submit ourselves to the tribunals of the country even if we are dissatisfied, and meet the obstacles that were not anticipated. There is no law that I know of at present existing on the statute-books, that would put the people of this country or their rights in any better state. When I made my statement to the hon. the leader of the Opposition I had hoped and expected that he would have taken it in a different spirit. I regret that he did not, but of course that does not in the slightest degree affect me, and the confidence that I have that we are proceeding in this matter, not only in the regular way, but under the very best advice.

Mr. LAURIER. That is where I do not agree with the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). I do not suspect his motives. He speaks in earnest, and I am quite ready to believe that he means what he says. But, I question the method followed so far by the Department of Justice. The hon. gentleman is a new hand in this department.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not lay the blame upon him which I would lay upon the department generally, but I must say, and it is a feeling I believe shared in by every one in this country, that in the prosecution against the chief offender Mr. St. Louis, there has been a want of energy, and a want of determination, which has convinced the great majority of the people that it was a sham prosecution and not a real prosecution. Why, Sir what has been the case? This information was laid before the magistrate in the month of October last, and it took almost four or five months before the preliminary investigation was ended. This showed a want of energy and a want of determination on the part of the prosecuting counsel, whoever he was I do not know. At all events, if the matter had been pushed with the energy which should have been applied to the case, it is not conceivable that the determination of the case, in so far as the preliminary investigation was concerned, should not have been reached in the space of a few weeks at least. I know there was a good deal of technical matter introduced. I followed the prosecution in the newspapers, and for my part I was amazed that so much technical matter was introduced. It seemed to be totally irrelevant to come to the kernel of the matter. It seems to me that if the suit had been prosecuted with vigour and energy there would have been a result at a much earlier day than it came. At least it was said; the hon. gentleman says there was a miscarriage of justice, and I must say for my part, I would not have come to the conclusion that the magistrate came to. The reason which he gave was a reason to convict other parties, but not to let go the man who was before him. That seems to be the reasoning which I would have given to the case. At all events be that as it may, I believe that the Minister of Justice, if he is in earnest, as he appears to be at the present time, must put more vigour and energy into the prosecution than has hitherto been given to it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is good enough to shift the charge from the Government to the counsel who have been employed.

Mr. LAURIER. I did not do that.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I hoped the hon. gentleman had shifted it somewhat. If I heard aright, the hon. gentleman has said that the chief trouble was the delay that occurred, not in the Department of Justice, but before the magistrate. Surely the hon. gentleman knows that the Government has no standing there of a special character. I wish to say in justice to the counsel who represented the department there, that they were interrogated by the Department of Justice from time to time. We placed at their disposal the best assistance that we could and the best men that we had. But there was delay. In one regard it seemed so to myself when I became charged with that responsibility, but on every occasion that inquiry was made, the fault did seem, not to lie—perhaps it is well I should not go further—not to lie with the counsel for the Government. The procedure in Montreal—the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) is more familiar with that than I am—but the manner in which the evidence was taken, the adjournments that were not asked for by counsel, and the delays that occurred, were things over which the Crown had no control. We were subject to the magistrate. I trust that after the additional explanation I have given the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) will understand, and the House will believe, that the Government adopted every reasonable means they could to promote expedition in that case.

Mr. FRASER. I would like to ask one question for my own information. I assume that the Minister of Justice has retained the best available counsel in Montreal, because counsel are generally retained with an eye to the magnitude of a case; and, more than that, it should be insisted on behalf of the Crown that there should be continuous action, and not a day lost. The Government are not in the position of a private individual with a private suit. If all the time mentioned by the hon. leader of the Opposition was taken in that preliminary investigation in Montreal, there is something very curious about it. I used to notice myself that there would be an adjournment for a week or two. This the Department of Justice should have seen to.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Surely, the hon. gentleman knows that the department could not interfere with the presiding officer to prevent an adjournment.

Mr. FRASER. Were those adjournments always made by the court, or were they made on behalf of the prosecution?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman surely does not mean that?

Mr. FRASER. I know that no court in any case in the world arbitrarily says, "I will adjourn for a week or a month."

Mr. GILLIES. The adjournment was asked by the defence.

Mr. FRASER. The hon. gentleman seems to know more about the case than the Minister of Justice. If it was asked by the defence, the Crown ought to have seen that there was the best cause shown for it before it was granted.

Mr. GILLIES. It was in the discretion of the court entirely.

Mr. FRASER. Will the hon. Minister of Justice say that it was at the instance of the defendant?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. A gentleman belonging to the Montreal bar informs me that during a month at least the magistrate was ill and incapacitated. That would account for part of it.

Mr. FRASER. Is it not most extraordinary that when the Government have a prosecution of this kind the judge gets sick?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman know another case?

Mr. FRASER. I do not, but I think this may have something to do with the hint thrown out by the Minister of Justice a little while ago, namely, that there is not very much justice in Montreal. If we are to meet that issue, that there is not a magistrate in Montreal to send a criminal to trial or a grand jury to find a bill, we had better know it.

Mr. AMYOT. When was the adjournment?

Mr. FRASER. I do not know the dates.

Mr. AMYOT. Was it the fault of the Government?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman does not profess to know a single thing about any of the adjournments.

Mr. FRASER. Not about the day, but I make the statement that there were three or four adjournments. Does the hon. gentleman deny that those adjournments took place? The statement has been made in this House, and I am bound to assume that it is correct until it is denied. If those adjournments took place on behalf of the defendant, no judge would grant them without the defendant showing good cause, such as the necessity of getting witnesses, and so forth. As I understand, the defendant did not give any evidence to show why the case should be adjourned. Besides any adjournment that took place must have taken place with the consent of the Crown, or else the Crown was not able to make a sufficient case to prevent the adjournment. Now, these adjournments were the very best things that could happen for the defendant, for everybody knows that in any criminal case, if the court adjourns for a week, a very good opportunity is afforded of getting rid of witnesses or of doing a number of things to weaken the case. I do not mean to say that the Minister is responsible for that; but when the case went before the courts, it should have been prosecuted with the greatest possible vigour; because it must not be forgotten that the country was more interested in this prosecution than almost any other Government prosecution that has ever taken place. The Government themselves would not deny that it was about the worst case ever brought before Parliament, not as to the amount, but as to the magnitude and the variety of the stealing. I can understand that the department, after placing the matter in the hands of their counsel, would take it, as a matter of course, that he would proceed vigorously; but I submit that when these repeated adjournments took place, the department should have inquired what the reason was. I am bound to assume that they do not do so, but left the whole matter in the hands of their counsel. I am glad to know that the Minister states that the matter is to be proceeded with. I do not know what the defendant means to do; but know that when a case of this kind is postponed, the evidence cannot be got as well as at first, public interest abates, and in the end the man gets off. There is nothing like the system prevailing in the motherland, where, when a man commits a crime, almost before he knows he has committed it, he is tried and sent to jail. The evidence is fresh: the community is aroused and insists that justice shall be done; but every day that a case is postponed, the more difficult it becomes to convict. That is the mistake the Government made, either in not appointing the proper person to take charge of the case, or, having made that appointment, in not seeing it properly prosecuted.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The fairness of the hon. member for Guysboro' may be understood when he says to the committee that it is bound to assume that the Department of Justice never inquired as to the cause of delay. That is a sample of the manner in which the hon. gentleman approached this subject. The hon. gentleman also said that I had aspersed the administration of criminal justice in Montreal. I did nothing of the kind. I expressed a strong opinion as to what I thought of the evidence we had presented; I referred to the law, and I showed that the Crown was proceeding in this case as in others, and that if a magistrate did not commit, there was still under the Code another procedure by which the views of the Crown could be pressed. If the magistrate does not commit, there is still, under the Act, another procedure by which the views of the Crown may again be pressed. But when Parliament made that provision, it was not with the desire of aspersing the character of the magistracy in any particulars.

Mr. FRASER. I did not say so, but I did say that a hint from the Minister of Justice, namely, that this having failed, and as the case before the grand jury might fail, the Government might, therefore, be in the position of finding itself unable to proceed at all, was very serious.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In that event, what could we say? What did I insinuate? If the Grand Jury refuses to find a bill, it stands unimpeached for that, and it would not be the first occasion in any province in which the Crown thought it had a strong case and the Grand Jury did not think it had a case at all. There is nothing in that, and I am surprised that the hon. gentleman made reference to it. One of my colleagues has suggested another feature that I might present to the committee as explaining some of their difficulties. I never anticipated that hon. gentlemen opposite would have been so uncharitable in connection with the prosecution of this case. Hon. gentlemen smile as if they thought I should have anticipated their being uncharitable. There were enormous difficulties in connection with the case.

Mr. FRASER.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We know that.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman refers to others than I do. The difficulty of dealing with a number of the witnesses was this. We could pretty well trace the men who could give important evidence, but often and often and time and again when we supposed we could obtain a certain witness for the court, he was not available. The means taken by the Crown were the best I could imagine to secure all the evidence, but time and again we were foiled. It was a running fight on a very heavy case. There are innumerable details, but this I will say that be the end what it may, there is nothing that will stand more thorough investigation at the hands of this Parliament than the conduct of that prosecution. I am not making a vain boast, because I had nothing to do with it. I came in at the tail of the hunt, I came in at the end, and so I am not making a vain boast on my own behalf. But I do say that this Parliament may investigate until the very end of its term every step; and I sincerely believe that no gentleman will be able to suggest any step we could have taken in presenting the case for the Crown, which we have not taken. The Commissioner of Police, a most efficient officer in these cases, according to the Crown attorneys of the various districts of Ontario and Quebec—one who has made a reputation in connection particularly with the prosecution of counterfeiters—gave almost his whole time for months to that work, and did excellent work. It has been one of the most trying cases the department has ever had to deal with on account of the great difficulty of obtaining evidence. In the end we succeeded in obtaining what we thought was sufficient evidence.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There are some things the hon. gentleman has overlooked. I remember that the Minister of Public Works, not very long ago, in addressing his constituency upon this very subject, said that, considering the circumstances under which the work was undertaken and executed, considering the speed required by the Government for its completion, he did not think that the amount which the structure had cost was unreasonable, but that on the whole it was most reasonable. It seems that the magistrate, before whom this charge was made, agreed with the Minister of Public Works, and not with the Minister of Justice. He takes the same view of the energy and efficiency exhibited by Mr. St. Louis in the prosecution of his work that the Minister of Public Works does; and until the Government are generally agreed as to the character of the charges brought against Mr. St. Louis, it is not surprising that the magistrate should agree with the Minister of Public Works, under the circumstances, rather than in the views expressed by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. MULOCK. I think it would be well if the Minister of Justice would withdraw one statement he made, if it is to be regarded as seriously made. If I understand him correctly, he intimated that if the Grand Jury on this occasion, threw out the bill, he might deem it his duty to advise his colleagues that the prosecution could not be successfully carried on. I think that is an unfortunate statement.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. God forbid that I should make such a statement. I did not.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman intimated that in the case of failure at this stage, that would be his attitude.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am very glad the hon. gentleman is not a reporter, for I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman intimated, at all events, that he might be compelled to come to that conclusion. If one grand jury throws out that bill, it is the duty of the Minister of Justice to have a new bill presented, and to continue doing this until he can get this case tried before a petty jury and efficiently tried.

Mr. McMULLEN. All the discussion to-night has been upon the prosecution against Mr. St. Louis for the money he is supposed to have stolen under the contract. After the action, the magistrate held, rightly or wrongly, that owing to the looseness of the contract between St. Louis and the Crown, St. Louis was enabled to take advantage of his position and pocket the money, and could not be prosecuted criminally. That contention could not come up in the case of those who must have been guilty of stealing a million feet of timber. There was a large amount of timber stolen. Either it was never delivered, or if delivered it was stolen. Why has no action been taken to reach the criminals? If hon. gentlemen opposite had taken active steps to arrest those men, they would be in jail to-day. How is it that the Government have simply followed one man and that very tardily and allowed the others to go scot free? Allow me to tell the hon. gentleman that the country is looking to the Opposition to discharge their duty in this as in other matters. It is our duty, in the interests of the people, to urge the Government, when money has been stolen, to make every effort to bring the thieves to trial. The people of this country are disposed to look upon the course of the Government with a considerable amount of disgust, after the experience of another case, in which there was a long troublesome prosecution and the parties found guilty and sentenced to twelve months in jail, but let loose at the end of three months, it looked like a friendly proceeding taken with a view of throwing a sop to public opinion. I would like to know how it is that the people who were undoubtedly guilty of stealing a million feet of timber, have not been proceeded against?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is assisting considerably, in my humble judgment, the acquittal of Mr. St. Louis, if he should be committed to trial. The whole tendency of his argument is in the very line of the argument which the counsel for Mr. St. Louis would make if he were endeavouring to obtain sympathy from the jury for him. Now, the hon. gentleman will see on what delicate ground he is treading, and I venture to tell the committee that they must give to the law officers of the Crown some latitude, and accept, at any rate, for the time,—not for all time, but until the affair is through—the statement that they are acting in this matter with care and consideration, and not with the intention of allowing any criminal to escape. And, in the matter of procedure, as to whether they should go at all the accused at once, or separately, that is a matter that I would prefer should be laid before the jury, for, no doubt, the very point will be taken. The hon. gentleman will see that the discussion of this point, if it has any effect at all, has the effect of instilling into the public mind the idea that we are making a victim of Mr. St. Louis. Now, there are some men who believe that, and, in the end, that may be a very formidable criticism—that we have adopted the wrong method of procedure.

Mr. LAURIER. You escape that by prosecuting the other parties.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has given his opinion. For the time, we must take the responsibility of not acting upon it, and when the matter is finished, we shall be judged on the whole case as it then stands. But why hon. gentlemen should ask us to follow up quickly and hotly all the minor offenders, when this charge, according to their own wish was levelled at one man, is something that I cannot understand.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman evidently misses the force of what my hon. friend behind me has said. You are prosecuting Mr. St. Louis for the offence of endeavouring to obtain $170,000 from the Government by false pretenses. That offence stands upon its own merits, and will be supported by the evidence the Government can bring against him.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Whom do you wish to have prosecuted?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am not saying that this man or that should be prosecuted.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Who is the man whom any one suggests to have stolen the lumber?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am not trying to bring that out. I am only repeating, much as I dislike repetitions, at this late hour of the night, what my hon. friend said. Before the committee was appointed, evidence was given that the Government had received and placed in position in Montreal a certain quantity of lumber. That lumber was absolutely stolen.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. By whom?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is impossible for me to say. But the point my hon. friend makes is that the fact of that theft has nothing whatever to do directly or indirectly with the question whether Mr. St. Louis was or was not guilty of the offence charged against him. This relates to a simple theft; and I have yet to learn that the punishment of theft is more difficult in Montreal than any where else in the world. I believe you have nothing to do but to bring forward your evidence before the jury, to show that the theft took place, and that such and such parties were engaged in it, and punishment will follow as quickly in Montreal as anywhere else in the Dominion. I simply rise to point out to the Minister of Justice that there should be no confounding of other offences committed in connection with this lamentable contract with this crime. The stealing of the lumber has nothing to do with Mr. St. Louis. The evidence to prove the guilt of the parties must be easily obtainable, or it must have been easily obtainable at one time. Whether the lapse of time has made it more difficult to obtain or not, the hon. gentleman must decide for himself. I have had sufficient experience in criminal matters to know that while you can easily obtain evidence just after a theft has taken place, after twelve months or two years have passed very often, that evidence will have disappeared. Steps should be taken to punish these parties, who ever they may be.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That shows how much assistance the committee can give the Government when they approach the question in that manner. The hon. gentleman says that after twelve months have passed you cannot find the parties guilty of a theft. And this happened in 1893.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I said nothing of the kind. I say it becomes more difficult as years go by to find the guilty parties. And if the hon. gentleman's department has let two years go by without taking the necessary steps, they have only intensified the difficulties in the way.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, no; the hon. gentleman cannot get away that way.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am not getting away.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. All these offences occurred in 1893. We had the benefit of the hon. gentleman's ability as a lawyer in the Public Accounts Committee, and I challenge him to tell me, closely as he followed the evidence, the name of the man who stole the lumber.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman has made a very bold challenge. I do not set up to be a detective. I pointed out to the hon. gentleman earlier in the evening that the object of the investigation held by the Public Accounts Committee was, in a large measure, to ascertain whether there had been departmental negligence. We depend upon the Department of Justice, with its detectives, with its sleuth-hounds of justice, to ascertain who are the parties who stole the lumber belonging to the country. The Public Accounts Committee were examining witnesses to ascertain whether the Government departments had or had not been guilty of gross negligence in a case which, it was alleged, that $200,000 has been stolen. We reported that we had found the same facts in regard to the stealing of the lumber as the committee appointed by the Government had already reported. It then became the duty of the Department of Justice to have the parties punished if they could be found. The charge made by my hon. friend is that there has not even been a pretense of prosecuting any one for that theft.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And the bald facts stand out in this form: Two committees of inquiry—whether they were sleuth-hounds on the second, I will not say—went into this subject; many witnesses were brought up from every point of the compass; every conceivable question was put, and all that the committee could ascertain was that the lumber had disappeared. I will not make the admission to-night that we can put our hand upon the guilty parties, but what I do submit is that this discussion of the strength or weakness of the case for the Crown is not only entirely irregular, but will, in no sense, assist the administration of justice. I do venture to urge that the tendency of this discussion is to create a sympathy for the man that the committee desired to have prosecuted; that the tendency of the discussion is to create sympathy because we have fastened the fangs of the law upon one man and one man only.

Mr. CASEY. But you have not done it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Well, that we have attempted to do it. And that will not assist what the hon.

gentlemen have, up to now, pretended was their desire—to have the guilty parties brought to justice.

Mr. McMULLEN. In order to prevent any embarrassment on the part of the Government, I would suggest that we allow this item to stand, and stop the discussion.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is no item relating to what we have been discussing.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not think that the Minister of Justice has quite answered the statement from this side of the House, and I think that we ought to have some further light upon the subject. I am making no further criticism as to the prosecution of Mr. St. Louis. But there was evidence before the committee that there was about a million feet of lumber stolen, that several large boxes were made and ironed off and used, I think, as hoists for taking up and bringing down material, and something like twenty or thirty of these disappeared in one night.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Those are matters about which no information, beyond the fact that they were stolen, was given to the committee; and it seems to me that once the fact is known, it ought not to be very difficult to ascertain who the guilty parties were. Now, the fact that that was stolen has been testified to; the fact that an immense quantity of lumber was purchased and paid for that did not go into the work, was also clearly established, and that it was delivered there and that it was stolen.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You could not arrest any one on that evidence.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am not saying that, but I am saying that when that fact was made known, it was the duty of the Government to inquire into the matter and to ascertain who the guilty parties were.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman does not suggest that we did not inquire?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No, but I am stating that, so far as we know, no party has been charged or prosecuted up to this moment. It would be a rather extraordinary state of things that, if in a large city you could have a million feet of lumber stolen and some 24 or 25 large boxes made of the kind mentioned, that these should all disappear, and that it should be impossible to ascertain what had become of them.

Mr. HAGGART. There was no evidence in that direction. The evidence reported by the commission was that parties had charged for one million feet of lumber more than was found in the work. Then, there was evidence of one party that he saw pieces of timber, some of them 12 inches square, that were delivered upon the ground, and that had disappeared next day. Then, there was the evidence with reference to these mortar boxes, but there is no evidence at all about a million feet of lumber being stolen.

Mr. LAURIER. We have first of all the offence proved that lumber was paid for which was not delivered; then we have lumber which was paid for by the Government which never went into the work, and, therefore, never was delivered.

Mr. HAGGART. The lumber was charged for, but has not been paid for.

Mr. LAURIER. That makes no difference. It was in evidence that lumber was delivered and taken away, and, as I understand the Minister of Justice, that matter has not been investigated, and we do not know who are the thieves. If that be so, I must say that the investigation has been a farce. Are we to be told that in the large city of Montreal, with judges, detectives and policemen, timber can be stolen and no trace of it can be found and that the thieves cannot be brought to justice?

Mr. CASEY. The Minister of Railways is quite mistaken when he says that this lumber might have been charged for but it was not paid for. The evidence was that the lumber was paid for, and that a large part of it, if not all, was delivered.

Mr. HAGGART. It was not paid for, and is not paid for to this day.

Mr. CASEY. The evidence is entirely the other way. The Minister's memory will bear me out that there was no stoppage of payments until the latter stages of the work, when it was pretty well proven that overcharges for labour were being made, and then there were some payments stopped. But this lumber was delivered, and charged for, and paid for, in the early stages of the operation.

Mr. HAGGART. I shall have to correct the hon. gentleman again. The party who delivered the lumber claimed $15,000 more than we paid for.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman has admitted just what I said. A certain amount of lumber was delivered and paid for, and the man who delivered it claimed $15,000 more; and that shows that he had been paid for all except the $15,000. So the Minister's correction is an admission of what I said.

Mr. HAGGART. If you take that as an admission, all right.

Mr. CASEY. It is not necessary for him to go out of his seat and consult somebody else about it, because he has admitted the whole case. Then the Minister says: Do the Opposition want us to be hot-footed after everybody concerned in this? Well, Sir, I should not call it very hot-footed not to proceed with the prosecution for two years from the time the offence was known. It is two years since they knew there was this theft of lumber, and no prosecution was instituted. He says that this discussion will create sympathy for the man on whom they had fixed the fangs of justice. Well, the fangs seem to be in very poor condition. They do not seem to be very good holding fangs. They have not drawn blood so far. The Government have not been able so far, after two years trying, to get them fixed even in Mr. St. Louis. The mouth of justice, seems to be very toothless; and as an hon. friend suggests, it has been only the gums of justice that have been mumbling at Mr. St. Louis. His treatment so far has been more of the nature of a rough caress than of the nature of a bite. It does not seem as if justice wanted to draw blood at all. The blood in Mr. St. Louis' veins was too precious, it was too pure, it was connected with too high a source, to be rashly shed.

I hear a suggestion from somewhere, perhaps it comes from the air, that he has been bled sufficiently already. That was evidently Mr. St. Louis' opinion, for he swore on oath before the Public Accounts Committee that he had been bled very heavily indeed for Government election funds here and there, and to maintain certain prominent politicians, who, he said, were very expensive to keep up. Mr. St. Louis thought perhaps, that he had bled enough already. Perhaps the Department of Justice may be of the same opinion, but the country does not feel that way about it. Now, the Minister of Justice thinks it is quite enough excuse for him that the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) cannot put his fingers on the man who stole that lumber. Well, as has been pointed out, we are not a detective agency on this side of the House; it is not our business to put our fingers on the actual thief. If a Minister of Justice and a Solicitor General are for any purpose at all, surely they are for the purpose of ferreting out the man who steals Government stores, and that somebody has stolen here is beyond doubt.

Then there is another point. What has been done in regard to prosecuting Government officials who allowed all this to be stolen? Here was a large staff of engineers, sub-engineers, clerks of works, book-keepers, caretakers, and so on—it is not necessary to go through the whole list. A large staff of Government officials were there to prevent Mr. St. Louis from stealing, and the evidence shows that these men assisted Mr. St. Louis to steal, and not one of them has been prosecuted. It is no trouble for the Minister of Justice to put his fingers on them, and to fasten his fangs into them, if he is inclined to bite in that direction. They are all within reach of his fangs. Let him fix the fangs of justice on those who took public pay and at the same time received money from St. Louis, and knowingly allowed him to steal the public funds. No doubt they have been suspended or dismissed, but it is absurd to dismiss a thief in your employ, and pretend that such is adequate punishment. In the case of an employee who either stole or connived at stealing a hundred thousand dollars from a private party, his employer would put him in the penitentiary. Why have these men not been put in the penitentiary. I will tell the committee why: They know too much and would squeal. Let the fangs of justice be fixed on these men. These are points which the Minister of Justice omitted in the course of his explanation.

Rideau Canal $8,200

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The committee should have details as to the land damages?

Mr. HAGGART. Unfortunately, these claims arise every year. This is an estimated amount, and may perhaps not be required. Claims, however, have been filed in the department to the amount of over $20,000, covering a number of years.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The water was low on the Rideau Canal. I think.

Mr. HAGGART. These claims have been running for a number of years.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps the hon. gentleman's attention has been directed to the Tay Canal, but certainly the water was low on the Rideau. At what point have these damages occurred?

Mr. HAGGART. On the different stretches where dams have been constructed for reservoir purposes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Details of the claims should be submitted to the committee.

Mr. MULOCK. How does the water come to be allowed to overflow? Cannot it be regulated?

Mr. HAGGART. The engineers make estimates as to the damages that will result from the erection of dams for reservoir purposes. But these sometimes prove erroneous, and when an officer is sent to investigate claims it is found that damages have occurred, and we endeavour to settle the matter for as small an amount as possible, for if the parties go to the Exchequer Court they generally get four times the sum for which it could be settled.

Mr. LAURIER. What do you do with the engineer who misleads you?

Mr. HAGGART. Take the case of a lake ten miles long. Without a topographical survey it is impossible for an engineer to determine what damage may be done by the erection of a dam.

Mr. MULOCK. Were not those dams erected years ago ?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes, some were erected five, six, ten, and fifteen years ago.

Mr. DEVLIN. When were the claims made ?

Mr. HAGGART. Some were made two, three, or four years ago. I will bring down all the particulars on the main Estimates.

Beauharnois Canal $10,855

Mr. McMULLEN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would make explanations as regards the cost of the drain.

Mr. HAGGART. The estimated cost of the drain was $10,000. The contractor failed to complete the work, and the cost, as subsequently carried out was $11,800.

Resolutions reported.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to ; and House adjourned at 12.20 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 7th June, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE INDEPENDENCE OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. MULOCK moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 111) better to secure the independence of Parliament.

Mr. FOSTER. What are the principles of the Bill ?

Mr. MULOCK. The object of the Bill is to accomplish what its title indicates—further to secure the independence of Parliament. It has been the constant effort of parliamentists in Canada to secure on the floor of Parliament the free, unbiassed expression of the will of the people ; and from time to time legislators have directed their attention to the removal of all obstacles in the way of the accomplishment of so desirable an end. Our predecessors have from time to time, provided against biasing, influencing, as, for example, the presence of place-men in Parliament. That is recognized now as a condition of affairs which should not be tolerated in a free Parliament. There are a few exceptions to the Act respecting this House, but the general principle has been affirmed long years since, that members of Parliament should not owe any divided allegiance ; the member of Parliament should represent freely and fully the will of the people who sent him here and, to speak inoffensively and yet, perhaps, in an apt way to describe my view, he should not accept the shilling from any side of the House to the extent of being in any way hampered in the discharge of his duties or rendered at all otherwise than free to act as his best judgment dictates in dealing with all questions before the House. Now it is impossible for one to shut his eyes to an abuse which has sprung up in the Canadian Parliament, more particularly in the House of Commons, an abuse that is far-reaching and is attended by more evils even than the one to which I particularly allude, but none equal in magnitude to the evil of menacing the independence of Parliament itself. What I refer to is members of Parliament, and members of this House, applying to the Government of the day for positions in the gift of the Crown, positions of emolument, which if they were to accept would at once disqualify them from remaining members of the House. Why ? Because the moment they have entered the public service as civil servants, they would cease to be free, they would be servants of the Government of the day, and, therefore, to that extent, not untrammelled to represent their constituents. Well, Sir, I would like to know if a man is more free who is an applicant for a position, or who has received the promise of a position from the Government of the day as soon as it may suit them to appoint him. How many members are there in this House to-day in that position ? There are a considerable number.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. MULOCK. Yes, a very considerable number of members of this House to-day are applicants for public offices from the Government that they are supporting, and several have promises of such positions. A short time ago the Premier of this country wrote a letter to a member of this House stating that ten seats in the Senate had been promised. He did not say they had been promised to members of this House, but I have not the slightest doubt but that a very considerable number of these seats are being kept vacant for some members of this House. We know, and the country knows that public offices have been kept vacant now for years, which ought to have been filled or abolished long since, in order that when a fitting time arrived, members of this House might be appointed to these positions. It is not very long since a member of this House was appointed to a position, the promise of which, I understand, had been made to him whilst he was a member of this House, and he continued to be a member for a length of time after the promise was made. How can a member of this House, who has the promise from the Government of a position of emolument, be free to vote or take a stand, as a representative of the people, against the will of the Government? However independent he may desire to be, that relation entirely destroys his usefulness as a representative of the constituency which sent him here. Further, Sir, to regard Parliament as primarily a stepping-stone to office is calculated, in my judgment, to lower the dignity of Parliament. I do not deny that members of Parliament, after the lapse of a proper period of time, may have an equal claim with others to public office; but it will be a deplorable state of affairs if the idea comes to prevail that the best way to secure public office is to be a candidate for Parliament or a member of Parliament. Men will come here, not to serve their country generally, but the Government of the day, in order that they themselves may profit, and the interests of their constituents will only take a very secondary position. I think, therefore, considering the magnitude of the evil, that the time has arrived when Parliament must assert itself. I think I am not outside of the mark when I say that from fifteen to twenty per cent of the members now supporting the Administration have promises of situations, and depend upon the Government to carry out these promises. Such an element in Parliament is calculated to lower the influence of public opinion in the House, and entirely defeat the object of our parliamentary system.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 112) to amend the law relating to conspiracies and combinations formed in restraint of trade.—(Mr. Sproule.)

HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS OF THREE RIVERS.

Mr. FOSTER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 113) to amend chapter 10 of the Statutes of 1892, respecting the Harbour Commissioners of Three Rivers. He said: The House will remember that about three years ago a Bill was passed with reference to the harbour of Three Rivers, the object of which was to give the harbour commissioners power to issue debentures to a certain amount, subject to the condition that none of these debentures should issue until the arrears of interest and sinking fund due to the Dominion Government on the loan to the harbour commissioners, made many years before, were paid. It has been found impossible for the commissioners to issue their debentures and pay the whole of those arrears. Three years have run on and the arrears have been accumulating, of course, to a certain extent. It is found impossible by the commissioners to issue the amount of debentures authorized—$60,000, I think—and pay the arrears, and have sufficient left to make the improvements required, which improvements will result in increased revenue. I may say that the revenues of the harbour of Three Rivers have been appreciating from year to year and business has been increasing. The harbour is managed with a great deal of prudence and economy. It is proposed that the commissioners should pay the Government the amount of arrears due at the time, three years ago, namely, $15,000, but no indebtedness is taken away which the commissioners are under to the Dominion Government. The Bill simply gives the commissioners the power to issue debentures on paying us $15,000 of arrears, and it is expected that increased revenues will result from the improvement of the wharfs, in which case, of course, the Dominion Government may expect a larger return.

Mr. LAURIER. Of course, the petition of the commissioners and all other documents will be brought down?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY—PETITION OF THE AUDITOR GENERAL.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I propose bringing the attention of the House to the petition that was submitted to it a day or two ago, with reference to the department of the Auditor General.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman would allow me, before he goes further, I would ask him not to bring this matter up to-day. I have had no notice of it, none of the papers are here, and the petition was only read and printed the other day.

Mr. AMYOT. We received it in French only a few minutes ago.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I thought there was sufficient notice on the subject when the petition was read at the Table. Of course, when the hon. gentleman asks to have the matter postponed until he has all the papers, I am quite ready to acquiesce in his request. I think that is only proper, under the circumstances. But I would say that I consider this matter of very great importance, because the office and department is one peculiar to our system. And the relation in which the department stands to parliamentary and public expenditure makes the office a unique one in our organization.

Mr. FOSTER. We can have it up on Tuesday, if you like.

Mr. LAURIER. We will let you know.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Chambly Canal—To pay A. Hurteau & Frère for timber, $1,957.15; to pay for lands taken from A. Yule and A. F. Riddell, $1,100; total..... $3,057 15

Mr. HAGGART. The first item is an old account for timber supplied. The price charged was considered excessive, namely, 38 cents per foot; whereas, 32 cents was considered a liberal price, and was offered him. He refused to accept it for a long time, and has now agreed to take the price. I think the land was taken about four years ago.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do you pay him interest on the 32 cents?

Mr. HAGGART. No.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is there no standard of value fixed by the department that should be paid for timber?

Mr. HAGGART. The officers of the department reported that 32 cents was enough for the timber, and we refused to pay any more. In reference to the other item, the above is the valuation which Col. Yule, until now, has declined to accept. This land was expropriated for the purpose of erecting an electric station upon it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What was the quantity?

Mr. HAGGART. It was three lots in the town, making in all about 180 by 300 feet. The parties finally agreed to accept the valuation put upon it by arbitration.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is a large quantity of land for such a purpose.

Mr. HAGGART. It does seem so. The land was expropriated about five years ago, and the parties refused to accept our offer until now.

Sir RICHARD CARWRIGHT. Surely, it must be for some other purpose than merely an electric station. That is rather more than an acre of land, and prima facie that seems quite too large an amount for such a purpose.

Mr. HAGGART. I think there are workshops and other buildings upon it. That is all the information I can give the hon. gentleman.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman had better obtain for us a statement of the reason why so much land is required, apparently a great deal more than is wanted for the purpose mentioned.

Mr. HAGGART. Yes. I will get a memorandum and make explanations on the main Estimates.

Cornwall Canal—

To complete Government sewer.....	$4,000
To complete telephone line.....	500
For repairs on lock No. 15.....	3,000
For repairs on lock No. 16.....	3,000
To pay William Tackabury indemnity for injury received whilst on duty....	400

Mr. HAGGART. The first item is for the purpose of paying a contract entered into with a person named Clarkson, at schedule prices for the lowest tender. There was $10,000 voted before, and this is to complete it. At the time of the expropriation of land in Cornwall for the canal, the Government made an agreement with the town, which is embodied in Orders in Council thirty years ago, by which we are obliged to repair this sewer.

Mr. McMULLEN. Can the Minister say what is the length of that sewer, and what it is built of?

Mr. HAGGART. It runs along the town of Cornwall right down to the end of the canal, about 5,000 feet. It is built of stone and is of a permanent character.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is it for the use of the town of Cornwall alone, or for joint use by the Government?

Mr. HAGGART. For the town of Cornwall alone. On account of the canal cutting them off from the river, this sewer was necessary in order to enable them to dispose of the sewage. There was a commission appointed years ago under old Canada, and an agreement was made with the town of Cornwall by which the province was obliged to build this sewer.

Mr. RIDER. Will the Minister give some explanation in connection with this telephone line?

Mr. HAGGART. That was an appropriation for a telephone line along the canal, which was put up by the lowest tenderer. I think it is about 12 miles long.

Mr. RIDER. How many instruments were there?

Mr. HAGGART. One to every lock, and one for the headquarters of the staff.

Mr. RIDER. Does the line cross under the canal?

Mr. HAGGART. No ; it is on the bank of the canal.

Mr. RIDER. I understood that the line did pass under the canal, and instead of the work being done by a cable the wires were put into a lead pipe, which was found to be unsuitable for the purpose. I understand that tenders were called for the construction of the line. Was the lowest tender accepted?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes.

Mr. RIDER. What kind of telephone was to be used? Was it to be a metallic circuit or a single metal wire?

Mr. HAGGART. I have not the specification here, but the work was done under specification by the engineer in charge of the canal. If it had been necessary to cross the canal, the wires could have been carried through a subway.

Mr. RIDER. There was a sum voted, and that has been exceeded, I believe.

Mr. HAGGART. There was an application last year for $2,000 for this work. The total cost of it has been $2,500, and that includes everything.

Mr. RIDER. Then this will be the final payment?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes, for the whole work.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Why has the Minister, in regard to this and many other items, placed it under this head, instead of taking the appropriation under the ordinary head of maintenance of canals? It would appear to me prima facie that such items as repairs on locks would come more properly under collection of revenue than in this particular place.

Mr. HAGGART. It has always been done this way.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not always. This whole business of "Railways and Canals—Income" was instituted by a Conservative Government, of which the hon. gentleman is now a pillar.

Mr. HAGGART. For a long time it has been done.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It has been done for many years no doubt, but it was not the original practice. What principle governs the hon. gentleman in distributing such items as repairs to locks, and placing them under this heading instead of under the heading of maintenance?

Mr. HAGGART. The Finance Minister is very particular that the amount voted shall be applied to the special object the Minister states when he asks the vote. I suppose that is the real reason—to keep the appropriations solely to the object for which they were voted.

Mr. RIDER.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Finance Minister does not want to trust you with the funds, and there is a good deal in that, perhaps.

Mr. HAGGART. The item of $400 indemnity to William Tackabury is asked under these circumstances: One night when Tackabury was sitting on a snubbing-post, a tow approached, struck the post and the man fell off, and has never recovered.

Mr. McMULLEN. Has there been any doctor's report on his condition, and is it in the hands of the department?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. Who was the attending physician?

Mr. HAGGART. Dr. Bergin, I think, made the report. I do not know who was the attending physician.

Mr. MULOCK. When did the accident happen?

Mr. HAGGART. Last year.

Mr. McMULLEN. This is rather a singular proceeding. We have no statement made as to the physician in attendance, but we have a report from Dr. Bergin, in whose constituency the accident happened. The doctor out of the goodness of his heart, perhaps, made a report by which this man was able to obtain an indemnity from the Government. A report should, however, have been obtained from an independent physician, one who did not expect to obtain any favours. I do not say that the country has not been properly treated, but it gives to the whole transaction the complexion of there being an object behind.

Mr. HAGGART. There is also a report by the doctor attending on the party.

Farran's Point Canal—

To renew superstructure of pier at lower entrance	$8,000
To build lower gates at lock No. 22.....	4,000

Mr. HAGGART. The superstructure of the pier at the lower entrance is very rotten, and requires immediate renewal. The amount of $4,000 is required to build the gates at lock No. 22. These gates are old and rotten and require immediate removal, which is being done. Miller Bros., of St. Catharines, are the contractors.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Were tenders asked for the work?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes.

Mr. GIBSON. What is the length of the part to be rebuilt?

Mr. HAGGART. About 700 feet.

Mr. GIBSON. On what is it being built?

Mr. HAGGART. Timber, filled in with stone.

Mr. GIBSON. What is the depth at that point ?

Mr. HAGGART. The depth of navigation is 9½ feet, and the least possible depth would be about 11 feet.

Mr. GIBSON. But this is only super-structure, and only above the water will any work be done.

Mr. HAGGART. Of course it is only above water.

Mr. GIBSON. I would like to ask the Minister, what rate per thousand feet, board measure, he is paying for timber, and what he is paying per cubic yard for the crib filling ? This is an enormous price.

Mr. HAGGART. The contract is not let yet, but will be to the lowest tender. This is merely an estimate from the engineer.

Mr. GIBSON. As I understand, the gates have been let to Miller Bros., but the pier has not been let yet.

Mr. HAGGART. That is right.

Trent Canal—To assist in building Rosa's bridge over the Otonabee River..... $800

Mr. McMULLEN. Are you getting assistance from the municipality here ?

Mr. HAGGART. We are obliged to build it. Wherever a highway passes over a navigable stream, we contribute towards the building of the bridge, the extra cost, supposing there was no canal there. The cost of the bridge is $10,000, the amount appropriated, $1,700 and the $800 will make $2,500, which the superintending engineer says is what it will cost for the enlargement of the swing.

Mr. MULLOCK. Does the municipality pay the remaining $7,500 ?

Mr. HAGGART. It is paid from other sources, either the municipality, or the provincial government.

Mr. McMULLEN. Are there many instances of this kind throughout the Dominion ?

Mr. HAGGART. There have hitherto been a good many.

Mr. McMULLEN. Then there should be a law applying to all these cases, and it should not be made the subject of an Order in Council. The assistance given is now a discretionary matter with the Cabinet, but I think there should be a law to provide for a certain percentage under certain conditions to structures of this kind.

Mr. MULLOCK. That might be desirable, but the question would be if we had power to make a law, which would meet with the approval of the other contracting parties, which, in some cases, is the municipality, and, in some cases, the provincial government.

Mr. HUGHES. The rule is found to work very satisfactorily, so far as it concerns the Trent water. The road crosses the water, and the water becomes navigable after the construction of the bridge, and the Government then pays for the swing.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) misunderstood me. I did not intend that a law should be passed that would affect structures of this kind, so far as other parties are concerned, but simply to grant a percentage of the entire cost.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the Government requires that a bridge should swing so that vessels may pass through where none were required to pass before, the contribution of this Parliament should depend upon the cost of the bridge over a bridge of a different kind from that which was required before. In some cases it would be very much more than in others. I do not think the rule of a percentage could apply to that. Everything would depend upon the extra cost that would arise from the character of the structure required.

Welland Canal—To pay claim of North Cayuga Township for damage to road by floods $567

Mr. GIBSON. Would the Minister be kind enough to explain what damage was done in North Cayuga ?

Mr. HAGGART. The official arbitrators, some time ago, assessed the damage at this amount.

Mr. GIBSON. What led to the damages ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. As I was the means of asking that this amount be put in the Estimates, I will explain it to the hon. gentleman. Some years ago, the water was raised by the dam at Dunnville, and, in consequence, not only was land drowned, but a number of streams running into the Grand River were made much wider, and more difficult to bridge. All the other townships around applied for certain sums in connection with that damage, and their claims were referred to the official arbitrators. This is the last one of the townships, and the same sum is being asked for here as was paid to a much smaller township.

Mr. GIBSON. Did this occur thirty years ago ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I cannot tell you exactly, it may be. All the townships came here for compensation.

Mr. GIBSON. I suppose it is a case of resurrection to meet the general election ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. No. All the townships were dealt with on the same basis.

Mr. GIBSON. The Government are getting very generous to pay for damages that occurred thirty or forty years ago. Is there nothing else in the township that they could pay for ?

Mr. McNEILL. I must say that if the other townships only got what they were entitled to, and got that thirty years ago, this township should get a little more now.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What majority did North Cayuga give on the occasion of the last general election in Haldimand ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. About a hundred, which it has always given against me ; and all the members of the council are Liberals.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, this is not much for a hundred majority.

Mr. HAGGART. They have been asking a great deal more, but they finally consented to take this.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is very singular that just at the time of an election in a constituency, any old claim that may have been standing since the days of Adam is raked up for settlement. Here is a claim thirty years old which is presented for payment just at a time when Haldimand is called upon to do a favour to the Government by returning a member of the Cabinet. I am quite sure the hon. member who sits for Haldimand would not consider himself bound to pay a debt against himself that was thirty years old. It bears a very suspicious aspect.

Mr. MONTAGUE. This claim was never mentioned in connection with the Haldimand election. It was before the arbitrators four or five years ago, and was reported to the department three or four years ago ; it was never mentioned in the election, so far as I know. It is a matter of simple justice to the township ; and, as for the purchase of the Liberals of North Cayuga, though they vote against me, I must resent that.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman's statement will not satisfy the country that there is not a connection between this payment and the election held in Haldimand. The hon. gentleman says that the arbitrators reported on this three or four years ago. Then, why has it been in abeyance so long ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will explain why. The Minister of Railways promised last year to put it in the Estimates, and I think he will admit that he forgot it ; and long before the election he wrote to the reeve of the township informing him that it would be placed in the next Estimates.

Mr. McMULLEN. How long before the election ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Away back in the beginning of 1894.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As this damage occurred thirty years ago—

Mr. GIBSON.

Mr. MONTAGUE. No, my hon. friend says fifteen years ago.

Mr. BOYLE. I think the claim grew out of the raising of the canal banks during the administration of the Mackenzie Government.

Mr. MULLOCK. They were not in power fifteen years ago.

Mr. BOYLE. Well, probably twenty years ago.

Mr. GIBSON. The hon. member for Monck probably knows all about canal building, but how the raising of the banks of the canal would cause the country to be flooded, I do not know. Canal banks are raised to prevent flooding.

Mr. DAVIN. I know that when I ran for Haldimand this was one of the things brought before me as a grievance left by the Mackenzie Government.

Mr. BOYLE. With all deference to the knowledge of the hon. member for Lincoln, I may explain that the raising of the banks of the canal necessarily raised the water in the Grand River, and caused it to flow into the creeks and to overflow that part of the country.

Mr. GIBSON. The new canal is not fed by the Grand River.

Mr. BOYLE. The old canal was. These claims were unsettled at the time the Conservative Government came into power, and they have continued ever since. This, I believe, is the final one, and it is a bona fide claim without any political significance.

Mr. GIBSON. There was two-thirds of the Welland Canal built at the time the Mackenzie Government went into power, and they decided to make the canal 14 feet deep from lock 24 to the level of Lake Erie. The Conservative Government that succeeded constructed the remainder of the canal to a depth of 14 feet. Even if this claim arose twenty-five years ago, I cannot see how the hon. member for Monck can throw the responsibility of this flooding upon the shoulders of the Mackenzie Government.

Mr. BOYLE. I am not throwing any responsibility on the Mackenzie Government. I simply say that it was deemed advisable to raise the banks of the canal in order to obtain more water into the Welland Canal feeder and into the old canal, and they recognized the claims of the farmers along the line for damages, and paid some of those claims. I recollect that the village of Dunnville was paid $1,500 during the time of the Mackenzie Government.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That was for injuries done years before we came into office at all.

Mr. BOYLE. No matter about that, it was recognized as a public loss, and, therefore, paid. My hon. friend from Lincoln is confusing two public works—the old and the new Welland Canal. The old Welland Canal got its supply by water from the Grand River and it was necessary, especially in a season of drought, that the level should be kept as high as possible. The Government, in consequence, encroached on the lands of the settlers and the farmers, injured the roadways to some extent in the townships, made the creeks wider, and consequently claims for damages were made on the Government.

Mr. GIBSON. The old Welland Canal ceased to exist at Thorold. The old and the new canal became joined at Allanburg, so that neither depends on the Grand River.

Mr. EDGAR. It was my good or ill-fortune, a good many years ago, to have some little experience in elections very near this neighbourhood. In the county of Monck, I know that in several elections which I contested there, perpetual abuses were made of the power of the Government to compensate for damages the owners who had votes. That work was built more than twenty years ago, but to my knowledge it was for a number of years the most fertile source of undue influence upon the electors along the Grand River. Men were led to believe that they were going to get damages, from one election to the other. Official arbitrators would be sent down, just before an election, to make some estimate of the damages, and the thing was held back until to-day when we hear that at last the township of North Cayuga is to be paid for some of those old claims. I hope this is the last feather. I hope that the Government have found out that in twenty years, after gerrymandering that part of the country three or four times, they will be able to carry elections there without the assistance of these damages on the Grand River any more. I can only say that the whole system, from 1878 down to the present, has been an unblushing and partially successful effort to unduly influence the electors along the Grand River.

Mr. MONTAGUE. All I know about this, in any shape or form, is the application of the Liberal reeve of North Cayuga, made to me in 1891. I simply transferred it, in the most ordinary way, to the Department of Railways and Canals, and they, without further question, sent the official arbitrators there, and I never heard any more of it until the judgment was given. I then felt it my duty to ask that the amount should be placed on the Estimates.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is exceedingly objectionable that claims of this kind should be allowed to lay over from year to year, until twenty years have elapsed, and then have them presented just at the time when an election is about to take place in the constituency. It is unfair. No matter what explanation the hon. gentleman may give, the people may come to the conclusion that this is another "dam" humbug for the purpose of getting money into some constituency.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. When were the official arbitrators sent there?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think a couple of years ago.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Who were the arbitrators?

Mr. HAGGART. One of them was Mr. Numa. I do not remember the names of the others.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Was he the only one?

Mr. MONTAGUE. There were two or three others.

Galops Canal—To pay John Mullen for kitchen to house at lock 26..... $248

Mr. HAGGART. He is a lockman. In enlarging the canal, it was thought necessary to take down the kitchen, which he had built at his own expense.

Beauharnois Canal—To pay the widow of the late bridge-tender, Pierre Leger, a gratuity of two months' salary..... $76

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not object to the item at all, but it seems to me that it should come under unforeseen expenses.

Mr. FOSTER. This had to be voted in order to authorize us to pay it at all. It does not come under the class of Civil Service.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But the gratuities are usually paid out of unforeseen expenses—a kind of gift, and not as in discharge of a legal obligation.

Mr. FOSTER. We cannot pay them without an appropriation of Parliament, except they come within the class of civil servants.

Williamsburg Canals—To pay collector of canal tolls, George Reid, $9 per month for travelling expenses as paymaster..... $108

Mr. McMULLEN. What travelling does he do for this?

Mr. HAGGART. This is an amount that has been paid this man for a number of years. He travels about twelve miles.

Mr. GIBSON. This principle of collecting tolls, and allowing extra pay to an official whose duty it is to go up and down the canal, collecting rents, is a bad one. How much do the rents amount to?

Mr. HAGGART. This is the collector of canal tolls.

Mr. MULLOCK. Well, what do they amount to?

Mr. HAGGART. I do not know; you will see it in my report.

Mr. McMULLEN. Does this man belong to the Civil Service?

Mr. HAGGART. No; he belongs to the outside service.

Mr. McMULLEN. But many of these outside come under the Civil Service rules.

Mr. HAGGART. He is not in the Civil Service in that sense.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is his salary?

Mr. HAGGART. You will find that in my report or in the Auditor General's Report. It is $2 a day, or some small sum like that.

Mr. GIBSON. He is getting about 40 cents a day for travelling expenses.

Mr. HAGGART. That is the amount of $108 which has been given him for a number of years. There is some difficulty, I suppose, with the Auditor General, with reference to the payment of it as salary, and he insists upon having it voted in this way.

Mr. GIBSON. It is wrong to have officials paid in two ways. We had this discussed the other day on an item in relation to the Department of the Interior. A man is employed in certain duties, and is paid so much a year. And then, in order to increase his pay, he is allowed travelling expenses. The Minister says that this has been going on for years, but that does not affect the principle.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I understand that this is to pay him travelling expenses as paymaster. How often are the men paid?

Mr. HAGGART. Every month.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Then he is not travelling every day? He gets $9 a month for going up and down this canal and paying the men?

Mr. HAGGART. I suppose so. He also collects canal tolls. I have not inquired very particularly as to his duties. This salary I found attached to the office when I became head of the department, and it is paid this way this year instead of the manner in which it was paid before.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. How many men are to be paid?

Mr. HAGGART. You will see it in the report. If I had a copy of my report here, I would read it to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MULLOCK. Here is one.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

Mr. GIBSON. Don't be discourteous to the Minister; he is going to give us some information.

Mr. MULLOCK.

Mr. HAGGART. You have all read my report.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It would be well for you to read your own report. I have known some of your predecessors who never read their own report—very distinguished individuals, too.

Mr. HAGGART. The particulars are not given here, but the staff of maintenance cost, for the last fiscal year, $10,230. This is for the Rapide Plat Canal, Galops Canal and Farran's Point Canal, which are collectively known as the Williamsburg Canals.

Collection of Revenue—Cornwall Canal—To pay F. Dawson wages from date at which he retired from duty to close of season of 1894, 240 days at $1.25..... $300

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the cause of this?

Mr. HAGGART. Two or three months elapsed between the time of his superannuation and the passing of the Order in Council, and he did not get paid in the meantime.

Mr. McMULLEN. Was he at work in the meantime?

Mr. HAGGART. I suppose so.

Mr. FOSTER. He would not have been able to draw his pay unless he was.

Mr. MULLOCK. But, according to the item, he had retired from duty.

Mr. McMULLEN. There must have been a portion of this time when he was not engaged at all, because the canal would be shut for a certain portion of the season. Was this man getting pay right along?

Mr. HAGGART. He is paid up to the time of his superannuation, and if he did not work, or if there were not a certificate to that effect, the Auditor General would see to it that he was not paid.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. But the item shows he did not work; it says: "Wages from date at which he retired from duty."

Mr. HAGGART. The man was superannuated because he was unable to work; and this is to pay him what he is entitled to, pending the passing the Order in Council for his superannuation.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. What was the amount of his superannuation?

Mr. HAGGART. I do not know. It is not in excess of what the law allows him, I think a little over $100. He was reported unfit for work.

Collection of Revenue—Welland Canal—To pay William McClory and Robt. Edgraft from date at which they retired from duty to date at which superannuation took effect, 6 22-25 months each, at $45..... $619 20

Mr. McMULLEN. I cannot understand why the Order in Council did not fix their superannuation, if they were to be superannuated, from the date they quit work, in place of paying them full wages.

Mr. HAGGART. The Order in Council only takes effect when it is signed by the Governor General, and it may have been passed in Council some months before. It is dated at the time the Governor General signs it.

Mr. RIDER. The result then is that the individual gets two pays, his superannuation allowance, and his wages?

Mr. FOSTER. Suppose there is an officer engaged in work on the canal. The Minister, for a certain cause, recommends to the Council that he be superannuated on such a date. The Minister's recommendation goes to Council, where action is taken. Council meetings are not frequent, Treasury board meetings are less frequent, and it may be two or three months after that recommendation is signed that he be retired at a certain date, before the Order in Council superannuating him is signed by the Governor General. That becomes an Order in Council only when it is signed by the Governor General; so that the person is really superannuated three months, we will say, after he was recommended. In the meantime he has been doing work, but has received no salary, and this is to pay him from that date up to the time his superannuation took effect. He does not get two salaries. He is not getting salary as a workingman, and a retiring allowance at the same time.

Mr. GIBSON. In the case of Robert Edgraft I had some communication with the Minister of Railways, and I can bear out what the Minister of Finance said with regard to him. Would the Minister kindly say how much of this $619 Robert Edgraft is getting as his share?

Mr. DALY. One-half.

Lachine Canal—For maintenance and lighting of Mill Street..... $1,200

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How do we come to be responsible for the maintenance and lighting of that particular street?

Mr. HAGGART. We own Mill Street ourselves, and the parties on either side, the city and others, have been urging us to have it lighted, as it was otherwise dangerous. We light it from our own electric plant. This sum will not be an annual charge.

Public Buildings, New Brunswick—To complete payments for works of construction, fittings, furniture and other supplies of St. John Custom-house..... $7,600

Mr. OUIMET. The first estimate made of the cost of rebuilding the old custom-house which was burned about three years ago, was $150,000, exclusive of heating and furnishing. As the work progressed it was discovered that the building was not fireproof, that there was a vacant space between the plastering and an inner wall so that a fire could go up from the cellar to the roof without anything to stop it. The architect devised plans in order to make it fireproof, by using iron instead of wood, and by providing that the floors should be in cement instead of wood also, along with divers other improvements. The cost of rebuilding was increased by these changes by about $27,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What was the total cost, all told?

Mr. OUIMET. The total cost all told is $198,560. The building proper is $182,000; heating apparatus, $8,953.53; furniture, fittings, &c., $7,600. These sums make up the total. As a matter of fact, if the building had been rebuilt according to the first estimate, the cost would only have been $146,000; so that the actual cost, except the additional cost incurred by making the building fireproof, is not exceeded. This amount of $7,600 is to pay outstanding accounts. The building was very nearly ready for occupation last spring, and in order to save rent, I preferred to go on with the expenditure, and am now asking for a vote to pay the balance of these accounts.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We have lost a good deal of money either one way or other by the various fires that have consumed public buildings. I am not at all sure but it would not pay the Government to have a general insurance over all the buildings, if properly constructed, as the rates would be very light. No doubt within the last ten or eleven years we have lost considerable over one million dollars. We had a large fire at Halifax recently; the St. John buildings have been completely swept away twice, and other fires have occurred.

Mr. OUIMET. Since I have had charge of the department only two fires have occurred, namely, that at St. John and another in the building at Stratford, outside of insignificant fires.

Mr. GIBSON. Does the hon. gentleman consider the new building at St. John fireproof?

Mr. OUIMET. Yes.

Mr. GIBSON. I notice in the returns of the Auditor General that in order to make the building fireproof the cost had to be increased about 25 per cent, from $146,000 to $182,000. What is the amount of extras on the building, and what was the original contract price?

Mr. OUIMET. Everything that could be obtained by contract was contracted for.

after tenders had been obtained, and the list included lumber, iron, furniture, and everything required in large quantities. As to the labour, it was done under the special supervision of Mr. Adams, who was sent from the department here, and everything was carried out in the cheapest manner possible.

Mr. GIBSON. Did Mr. Adams have power from the department to purchase and procure all supplies necessary for the construction of the building?

Mr. OUIMET. We obtained most of them by tender. The tenders were submitted to the department, and awards made by the chief architect.

Mr. BOWERS. Did the Minister when in St. John last spring notice how the floor of the building was broken up, although it had been only laid down a short time? Whether the work was done by contract or day labour, it was imperfectly done. I noticed one place 6 or 8 feet square, which was broken up. I also called attention to the fact last year that spruce deals, which generally cost from $6 to $8, cost from $15 to $18 when bought for this building, and there were a good many other things for which similar high prices were paid.

Mr. OUIMET. Spruce deals cost $12.25, and $12.75.

Mr. BOWERS. According to report in St. John, the members for the city and county were worried nearly to death by applications for work. Some of the members could hardly obtain a spare hour in the day—and probably this added much to the cost.

Mr. HAZEN. In regard to what the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Bowers) has said with respect to the floor in the building, he has very grossly and greatly exaggerated the matter, unintentionally I believe, but at the same time he has done so. What occurred was this. The floor in the lower hall was set with tiles, and every one knows that if there is any defect in setting, they crowd together and rise up. That is all the defect there was. The cost of remedying the defect was very trifling. I have noticed the same defect in other buildings, and in the large station of the Canadian Pacific Railway at Montreal, where the flooring a few years ago were laid in mosaic, the same crowding process occasioned by expansion occurred, and the flooring was thrown up. In the St. John building the defect was repaired at a very trifling expense and not in any way caused general defect in the building. The building itself, so far as I am able to judge, was very carefully looked after during its construction by Mr. Adams, who acted on behalf of the department; he is a thoroughly competent man who bought nothing without asking for prices from dealers in the trade, and in every way he safeguarded the interests of the department and the country. It was impossible to repair the building by tender. The original cost of the building, erected under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, was about $500,000. The fire did not totally destroy the building; it left the walls standing and also the division walls inside, and it was impossible at the outset to have made a specification on which any contractor would have given a tender that would have been at all near the figure for which the repairs could be carried out. It was, therefore, necessary that the greater part of the repairs should be carried out by day work under a superintendent appointed by the department. I think the work was thoroughly done; from what I understand, Mr. Adams is a competent man, and he did everything in the interest of the department. I noted what the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Bowers) said in regard to the prices paid for spruce. I think if the hon. gentleman will look at the returns he will find that the prices paid for spruce were $12.75 and $12.25, and not the figures given by the hon. gentleman to the committee. I also noted what the hon. gentleman said in regard to members of the city and county of St. John being nearly worried to death by applications for work. The men were employed by Mr. Adams, who took every precaution that only first-class men should be employed, men who would give full value for their wages, and the fact that my hon. colleagues and myself are here to-day in good health is a complete refutation of the statement made by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. OUIMET. The spruce lumber for which $12.75 per thousand, board measure, was paid was seasoned lumber, and tongued and grooved ready to lay on the floors.

Mr. BOWERS. The Auditor General's Report for 1894 shows that spruce lumber was paid for at from $15 to $18 per thousand on that building. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) said I was guilty of exaggeration in my statement. I do not think I exaggerated when I said that 7 or 8 square feet of flooring were broken up. I think probably 10 or 12 feet were damaged. One of the clerks of the department said this was the second time the work had been done and it was scandalous.

Mr. GIBSON. In looking over the Auditor General's Report, I find at page P-33 that no less than $49.75 were paid for pine plank, and for No. 2, $31.50. The spruce lumber, which is worth $8 or $9, is charged at $14; and so it is with almost everything else. In my opinion, we paid most extravagant prices for material. For instance, stock brick, which is ordinarily worth $5 or $6 per thousand, was paid for at high prices; Mooney & Son were paid $9 per thousand for 264,999 brick, or about 50 per cent more than it was worth, or else the bricks are worth more in New Brunswick than in any other part of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. OUIMET. They are worth $9 in Ottawa now.

Mr. GIBSON. I can buy stock brick anywhere as low as $5.

Mr. HAZEN. You cannot buy them in St. John for any less.

Mr. GIBSON. Does the hon. gentleman know what stock brick means?

Mr. HAZEN. Yes.

Mr. GIBSON. What do they mean?

Mr. HAZEN. I am not here to be cross-examined by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. GIBSON. You are defending the price, and I ask you what stock brick means.

Mr. TEMPLE. There is quite a difference in stock brick. There are 9-inch brick, and 8-inch brick, and 3-inch brick, and they all vary in price.

Mr. GIBSON. I was referring to the quality of the brick, and the hon. gentleman refers to the size. He does not know any difference. If all the other articles required for the reconstruction of this public building in St. John were paid for in keeping with the brick and lumber, then the Government paid from 30 to 50 per cent more than they were worth.

Mr. HAZEN. These bricks are made several miles from the city of St. John, and you have to include the cartage in the price.

Mr. OUIMET. Before the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gibson) makes a case against the Government, he should inquire the price of bricks at that period. He had better say nothing, because he does not know.

Mr. GIBSON. Whom do you refer to?

Mr. OUIMET. I refer to you. If the hon. gentleman does not know what the price of brick was in St. John at that time, he has no reason to say that the building cost more than it should.

Mr. GIBSON. I repeat my statement. I say that throughout the whole Dominion of Canada, bricks, generally speaking, are worth from $5 to $6.50 per thousand.

Mr. ROBILLARD. Stock bricks are worth $9 a thousand in Ottawa now.

Mr. GIBSON. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Hazen) spoke about the cartage being added to the price. Now, the rule of the trade is that the bricks are delivered in all cases, and that is the price mentioned. I admit that if brick has to be brought a long distance, and if the bricks were of an extraordinary character such as terra cotta, they might have to be sent for a long way. But ordinarily speaking, bricks can be had within reasonable distance of every town and village.

Mr. McMILLAN. I see you pay a very high price for lumber?

Mr. OUIMET. Tenders were asked for the various kinds of lumber, and the lowest tenders were: Hard pine, No. 1, $47.50; white pine, No. 1, $49.75; white pine, No. 2, $31.50; birch flooring, $40; T. & G. spruce No. 2, $12.75; 3 by 4 spruce scantling, $12.25. It is possible that for a small lot they had to pay more, but these were the lowest prices by tender.

Mr. McMULLEN. Why was not this building let by tender for the complete work?

Mr. OUIMET. I have explained that for two sessions, and the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) has explained it just now. The building was burned down, and the walls only remained. The extent of the damage to the walls, and especially to the walls which were part in limestone, and part in sandstone, had to be ascertained. The amount of stone in these walls that had to be taken down could not be ascertained, and, as I am told by my officers, they had to take down larger quantities of the walls than they expected.

Mr. RIDER. Did they make any use of the old walls?

Mr. OUIMET. Of course they did.

Mr. GIBSON. I understood the Minister to say that the spruce lumber, T. & G. was $12.75. How does it come that the department paid $14 per thousand for some of that lumber? In the Auditor General's Report, spruce, No. 1, 1,383 feet, cost $19.38, or $14 per thousand. Evidently, they did not stand by the contract.

Mr. OUIMET. My architect tells me that this lot was a different kind of lumber altogether.

Mr. BOWERS. The Minister doubted my word about the lumber a moment ago, but if he will turn to the Auditor General's Report, 177 C, he will find the following entries credited to W. H. Quinn, Lower Cove:—15,284 feet spruce timber, $17.50; 1,251 feet, $17; 3,184 spruce deals, $14.50; 5,682 feet, $18; 11,136 spruce planking, $15; 22,201 2-inch plank, $15; 15,471 feet spruce boards, $13; 6,950, $16. The hon. gentleman will see, if he consults the Auditor General, that I was right in my statement.

Mr. BORDEN. I think the hon. member for St. John should withdraw the statement he made a few moments ago to the effect that my hon. friend from Digby had made a grossly untruthful statement.

Mr. HAZEN. I said nothing of the sort. The hon. member for King's is putting words in my mouth that I never used. I said that the injury to the floor of the custom-house had been unintentionally, I hoped, exaggerated by the hon. member for Digby. I said with regard to the price of lumber, that the hon. gentleman was mistaken, as from the return I saw in the hands of the Minister of Public Works, the price was $12.75. I made no such statement as the hon. gentleman attributes to me, and it is his duty to withdraw what he has just said.

Mr. BORDEN. Then, I do withdraw it, for I understood the hon. member to say that the hon. member for Digby had made a misstatement with reference to the price of spruce lumber, whether intentional or not. Since I misunderstood the hon. member, I, of course, withdraw the statement.

Mr. McMULLEN. I see that you paid for doors $6.75 each. What are the doors made of? That is a very high price.

Mr. OUIMET. They are oak doors, veneered.

Mr. BOWERS. Was this lumber, for which $17 or $18 per thousand was paid, purchased by public tender, or by private contract?

Mr. OUIMET. All I can tell the hon. gentleman is that instructions were given to ask tenders for everything that was worth asking tenders for. Perhaps a small lot might have been bought here or there as it was the only place where it could be got at the time.

Mr. BORDEN. The quantities were large, aggregating 20,000 or 30,000 feet, and $18 a thousand for spruce deals in the city of St. John is simply absurd. Everybody knows that $9 a thousand on the wharfs at St. John is a fair price.

Mr. OUIMET. The hon. gentleman knows very well that the department would not buy deals on the wharfs to use them at once. The lumber had to be dry and in condition to go into the work.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. Minister cannot expect the committee to accept that as an explanation of the difference in price between $9 and $17. He must know that there is not that difference even between lumber that is newly cut and lumber that has been dry for two or three years. There must have been some other reason for paying this high price.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). The explanation of the Minister is a very reasonable explanation, and if the hon. gentleman who has just spoken understood anything at all about the price of deals, he would not have made the statement he has just made. The price he refers to, $8 or $9 a thousand, is the price in St. John, of deals by the carload, in which there is a large proportion of very small stuff. But when you have to get lumber of certain dimensions, perhaps sixteen, or eighteen, or twenty feet long, and buy in quantities of perhaps not more than 2,000 feet, you always have to pay from $14 to $20 a thousand. I know that in the town of Moncton the price of ordinary spruce flooring is $14, and it goes up to $18 or $20 a thousand.

Mr. GIBSON. If the hon. gentleman takes the trouble to look at the Auditor General's Report, he will find that there was 47,000 feet of 3 by 6-inch timber, 17,000 feet of 3 by 4-inch, 6,850 of 3 by 2-inch, and 15,000 feet of spruce timber, all at $17.50 per thousand feet, board measure. We are not speaking about lumber, but about timber scantling, which does not require to be so dry as the Minister would have the committee believe. None of this lumber was of any special value. No flooring was required; it was nearly all deals—scantling, timber, plank, and so forth, with the exception of 6,950 feet of clear spruce boards; and the contention of the hon. gentleman that that required to be dry, and that in consequence of its being dry the people of this country had to pay $7 or $8 a thousand more than the timber was worth, has no foundation.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). Have you the length of that lumber?

Mr. GIBSON. I do not know the height of the ceilings, but if a greater length than fourteen or sixteen feet were required, it would only be necessary to splice two or three scantlings together. Notwithstanding what the Minister has said, when he is asked why he went outside of the contract price, he says he does not know, that he had to take the report of his officer, and the officer gives as a reason that the lumber was of a special character. The Auditor General's Report shows that the lumber was only of ordinary character, and I repeat what I said before, that it was an outrage to pay two prices for ordinary spruce lumber, even to gain support for the Government.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I am informed that that lumber was thirty or forty feet long. I doubt if the hon. gentleman had the specification before him and could see the length of that lumber—taking the specification right through, the timber and the narrow stuff with it—that he would say the price of $17 is too high.

Mr. GIBSON. It would require specially cared-for lumber, 40 feet long, 3 by 6, to be worth this price. It would have to be put in a glass case.

Mr. WOOD. I did not say 3 by 6 and 40 feet long. I said that a portion of the lumber in that specification was round timber.

Mr. GIBSON. Three by six, 47,000 feet, board measure.

Mr. McMULLEN. Can the hon. Minister say, after the statement we have heard with regard to the large quantity used, whether tenders were called for, and how many were received?

Mr. OUMET. The architect tells me that tenders were asked for every time they could be invited for.

Mr. McMULLEN. That is not an answer to my question. Were tenders asked for this lumber? If so, how many were received? Was the lowest tender accepted?

Mr. OUMET. The lowest tenderer who could supply the article required was always accepted.

Mr. McMULLEN. Were tenders invited for this timber?

Mr. OUMET. I have just answered the question. I am told by my architect that tenders were asked for.

Mr. McMULLEN. For this particular timber and lumber?

Mr. OUMET. Yes, from the different firms. We do not go to the newspapers every day when lumber is required, but every firm that could supply the stuff was asked to tender.

Mr. McMULLEN. How many tenders came in?

Mr. OUMET. I could not say. That is two years ago.

Mr. McMULLEN. Can the hon. gentleman not find out from his officer?

Mr. OUMET. He does not keep these things in his head. Better ask the Auditor General.

Mr. GIBSON. I wish to call attention to the statement of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) regarding long lumber. I notice at the foot of page 177, Auditor General's Report for 1892-93, that the Government took very great care of Mr. Quinn when they ordered any long timber from him. Instead of the long timber being paid for at the rate of $17.50 a thousand feet, I find that 2,233 feet of long pitch pine timber is charged at $40, and 4,965 feet of the same over forty feet long, is charged at $45. So you see that the very long lumber which the hon. gentleman was trying to convince the House was being given to the country by this generous gentleman, Mr. Quinn, at $17.50 per thousand feet, was charged for at $45 per thousand feet. When you scrutinize this gentleman's account, you find that he had as long a head in getting a long price for his lumber as our long-headed member, who wanted to make the House believe that Mr. Quinn was throwing in the long lumber at the same rate as the short stuff. Strange to say, he took care of his own business sufficiently well to prevent the Government getting any advantage over him, because we find that when the lumber was under forty feet in length, he charged $40, and when it exceeded that he was paid at the rate of $45.

Mr. BORDEN. The hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) has accounted for what he himself must admit to be the unusual price paid for the lumber by the supposition that it was very long. The price certainly was long, and, therefore, the hon. gentleman said, the timber must have been long. I would ask him if he ever heard of timber scantlings 40 feet long 2 by 3, 3 by 4 and 3 by 6? That is perfectly absurd. Let me call the attention of the committee to this further fact. In St. John, which is the centre of the deal trade in this Dominion, which exports more deals than any other place in the Dominion, the price of deals below six inches in width is two-thirds the ordinary price of deals, so that when deals are selling in St. John at $9 a thousand feet, seven and eight inches being the narrowest deals, the price of six-inch deals and of scantlings below six inches would be, not $9, but $6, and you would have the price $6 instead of $17 or $18. It seems to me that the hon. Minister must see at once that this demands an explanation. He may say that it is dry lumber. But whoever heard of putting dry scantling into a building. Suppose it was, it would dry in the space of three months by exposure to the air. There is no difference made because a lot of deals or lumber is left over from one year to another. The hon. member for Westmoreland will admit that deals left over from one season to another, which have become dried, do not bring any more for that reason, the following season. I am, however, prepared to admit that an extra price might be paid for a special lot of lumber—what we call dimension stuff, sawed in certain lengths. But whoever heard, in a general way, of the increase in price in such a lot of lumber as that being more than $2 a thousand feet? Nobody ever heard of its being double the price, but these figures are double, and treble the ordinary market price of deals in St. John at the time the lumber was purchased.

Mr. McMULLEN. There appears to have been a very large amount of lumber supplied to the building. Did all the lumber go into that building, or was any portion of it stolen?

Mr. OUMET. The question may be very funny, but I am sure the hon. gentleman does not expect me to rise to the height of his wit, and be able to answer him whenever anything funny passes through his head. But I will just tell him this, that I have taken every precaution to have that building cost as little as could reasonably be expected. Mr. Fuller, the chief architect, with his assistant, Mr. Ewart, first went and visited every part of the building. They made estimates in detail. These estimates amounted to $150,000. More work had to be done than was foreseen. The building itself was under the supervision of Mr. Fuller, and Mr. Ewart, who paid bi-monthly visits to the work. We sent from here the best man we had. He was a stranger there, without any interest in favouring anybody, and the result was that the building actually cost $6,000 less than the estimate, carefully made by two competent architects of this department, who had no interest in increasing the cost. I should think the House and the public ought to be satisfied that the cost of the building has been reasonable, and nothing has been stolen, and that every cent expended was expended to a good purpose. And I should think that, instead of going back two years to discuss small details, as the hon. gentlemen do, it would be more reasonable to accept the general statement I have just made. The country, at least, will be satisfied that the cost has not been excessive.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I hardly think, Mr. Chairman, that the country will be quite satisfied that the hon. gentleman should pay $17 for an article that was worth $8 or $9. The only possible way the House can judge whether the Government has been acting economically and with prudence is by comparing with such instances as my hon. friends have brought forward. We have heard from the hon. member from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), who appears to have taken this matter under his charge, or from the Minister of Public Works himself, no reasonable explanation. The suggestion of the hon. member for Westmoreland that this was unusually long stuff appears to be disproved by the note read by my hon. friend. To all appearance, in St. John, which appears to be a specially favoured locality, the price of deals has doubled in value within the last nineteen months or so. If this is the explanation, it is a pity he did not furnish it to the Secretary of State, as that gentleman might have added it to the equally excellent illustration he gave of the increasing value of our products under the National Policy.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That will do for next year.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). The hon. gentleman is doing what the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) did—comparing the price of lumber cut to certain specifications with the cargo prices of general lumber. These are two entirely different things. Even taking the cargo prices, I, for one, certainly never heard of lumber of these dimensions being sold in St. John at $6 per thousand. I know that up in the country where I live, and here, there are some lumber mills, we never sell even small lumber as it comes from the mill, all sizes together, at so low a price as that. The ordinary price for cargo lumber, even of this small description, has been from $7 to $9 per thousand feet. I understand that some cargoes this year have sold for $9. That is a little higher than the ordinary price for the last few years. But when the lumber is cut to specifications the price is always higher. To my own knowledge, the price for a particular bill of lumber to fill the specifications for a small building in the country, is about $10 to $12 per thousand. I have known it to be as high as $15. This is rough lumber right from the mill. Now, the specification for a building the size of the custom-house building in St. John must certainly be much more difficult to fill than that of a small building in the country. Taking the differences in the specifications, and comparing the prices, I should say that the price charged—$17 per thousand feet—is a very reasonable and moderate price; and I do not believe that if we had that specification to fill to-day, and it was placed before any man who has knowledge of the ordinary price of lumber, it could be filled for any less than that.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is not much wonder that the Opposition are suspicious with regard to this building. In every case where the Government have undertaken to put up a structure of this kind without asking for tenders or letting the work by competition, the cost has been much higher than the real value of the building. The hon. Minister says they asked for estimates. He asked the engineers of his own department, I assume. These officials, basing their estimates upon past experience, take the outside figures, knowing what is expected of them. In this case, they estimated the cost at $101,000. I cannot see why the Government did not ask for tenders for the whole work, giving those who wanted to perform the work an opportunity of inspecting the building, so as to ascertain what they should repair and what they should build anew. There are always excuses given for not letting the work by tender to one contractor. Take the case of the Langevin Block. They gave the contract for the walls to one man, the contract for the stairs to another, the roof to another, the joisting to another, the iron girders to another. Wherever they can, they reserve the privilege of farming out or dividing the work as much as possible. Now, I am sure, the previous experience of his department should have deterred the Minister of Public Works from letting the contract in this way. But in the face of that experience, they hire men and buy material and the result is that the cost of the building runs up to enormous figures. We had a similar experience in the Napanee post office. The estimate of the cost of the building was $32,000, but in the end the actual cost to the country was $54,000. And so it runs. Where buildings are not let by public tender they cost the country 50 to 60 per cent more than they ought to cost. It is no wonder we, on this side, investigate these matters closely. Take our experience with the Curran Bridge, for instance. There was a contract in which double the money was spent that should have been spent. Then there was the case of the Harris property, and many others. I hope there has been no St. Louis in connection with this building. The cost has been kept within the estimates, the Minister says.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No ; $40,000 more.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Minister shakes his head. Is he prepared to deny that ?

Mr. OUIMET. I said that the original estimate was $150,000, and that the actual cost was $144,000.

Mr. GIBSON. I took the figures down as the Minister spoke them. He said that if he had gone on and completed according to the original plans, the building would have cost $146,000 ; but, in order to make it fire-proof, there was an additional cost of $36,000, making a total of $182,000. Now, with reference to this lumber that we have heard so much about, I am astonished to hear the member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), a business man, and one who claims to look at this matter from an impartial standpoint, speaking as he does. He admitted that the lumber could have been bought in the city of St. John for $9 per thousand feet, board measure, instead of $6 to $7, as stated by my hon. friend to my right (Mr. Bowers). I may say that my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Edwards) tells me that, taking the lumber as it is, even a special cargo, it would not be worth more than $9 per thousand feet. Yet the hon. gentleman from Westmoreland, after admitting that it was not worth more than $9, thought the Government was perfectly right in paying $17 for it. The Minister made light of the question by asking my hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) whether any of this lumber had been stolen. But when men can carry away in one night 450 sticks of Government timber, from 26 to 30 feet long each, it is a wonder the whole custom-house in St. John was not carried away.

Mr. OUIMET. I have no doubt the people in New Brunswick will appreciate very highly the compliment the gentleman has just paid them.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman imagine that because the fact is recognized that a few people steal timber, there is a reflection cast upon the people of a whole province ?

Mr. OUIMET. I did not rise because I expected to satisfy the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) that I had done the best that could be done in this case. I was pretty sure that if I could show to the House that the work cost less than was estimated, I should be blamed just as much as though I had to admit that it cost much more than the estimate. As to the charge made by the hon. gentleman against me, that the work was not given out by tender, this is another illustration of how the "Hansard" could be shortened without any one losing by it. The work was started two years ago, when the first estimate was asked for to rebuild that custom-house. I then explained to the hon. gentlemen that the intention of the department was to have the work done by days' work, and that plan was approved. Two years afterwards I am blamed for having done what the House authorized me to do. The hon. gentleman is not satisfied with what he agreed to then, but he has to talk about an hour to overload the "Hansard," involving a considerable cost of money, just in order to reverse his course of two years ago.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is very much better that the debates should be overloaded than that the people should be overloaded with taxes. We are performing a duty which the country expects of us, in making these criticisms of the hon. Minister's actions. Now, if the hon. gentleman will turn up "Hansard" of July, 1894, he will find that when this item was before the House, the following remarks were made:—

Mr. MULOCK. Does this item finish the construction ?

Mr. OUIMET. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. There will be no more money asked for from us ?

Mr. OUIMET. No more.

Now, how is this ? The Minister now comes down and asks us to add to what has been already voted, the sum of $7,600. Last year he told the committee that that was the last vote, and now he challenges the propriety of the committee interrogating him and the Government because he asks for an additional amount. I think the people in the country will endorse the action of the Opposition in criticising the hon. gentleman with regard to expenditures of this kind, more particularly when he comes this year and asks for an increased vote, after stating last year that he then asked the last amount.

Mr. OUIMET. I am ready to admit that I made a mistake last year, but I do not think I can be blamed for it, as I made that statement on the authority of my officers.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh.

Mr. OUIMET. Well, surely, when the hon. gentleman was a Minister of the Crown, he had to rely on the 30 or 40 clerks under him. In saying that I cannot be blamed, I do not mean to cast any blame on the shoulders of my officers, for they must have been mistaken, just as any hon. gentleman may be mistaken. The fact is that hon. gentlemen opposite are so often mistaken that they have to change their policy every six months. The architect of my department may have been led astray by some reports made to him, and it is not to be wondered at if he made a mistake of $7,000 in a building that has cost $192,000. If the hon. gentleman has ever built for his own account, he must know that architects frequently err in their estimates. It cannot be expected that public business can be carried on any more accurately than the private business of the best business men.

Mr. GIBSON. The Minister seems to misunderstand the object of the Opposition altogether. There has been no question discussed this afternoon about the propriety of the Government doing this work by days labour. What we object to is that in the matter of giving out contracts to different parties, he gave in some cases twice the price for lumber that the lumber was worth.

Mr. OUIPET. I beg to differ with the hon. gentleman. We have not paid twice what lumber was worth, nor even 1 cent more.

Mr. GIBSON. My point is this, that if prudence had been observed on the first item of lumber alone, where nearly 90,000 feet of common rough lumber was supplied for the interior partitions of this building, for which over $10 per thousand was paid, there would be no need for the Minister now to come to this House and ask for a vote of $7,600. He gave this friend of his a contract for 86,000 feet of lumber, for which he paid $10 per thousand more than it was worth.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). What lumber is that you refer to now?

Mr. GIBSON. On page 177 of the Auditor General's Report for 1892-93, we see "spruce scantling at $12 : 3 x 6 inches, 40,039 feet."

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). Do you say that $10 per thousand more than it was worth was paid for that lumber?

Mr. GIBSON. I said $10 per thousand for nearly 90,000 feet.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). Read the item.

Mr. GIBSON :

Spruce scantling at $12 : 3 x 6 inches, 47,039 feet ; 3 x 4 inches, 17,485 feet ; 3 x 2 inches, 6,850 feet ; spruce timber, 15,284 feet at $17.50.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). You have just read three items making about 70,000 feet, at $12 per thousand. If you say he paid $10 per thousand too much, does the hon. gentleman think that $2 would be a sufficient price?

Mr. GIBSON. I beg your pardon.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). Do you say he paid $10 per thousand too much for that?

Mr. GIBSON. I say all that spruce lumber was not worth more than $9 per thousand, and they paid $17.50.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I beg your pardon, they paid $12 per thousand for it, for what you have just read :

Spruce scantling at $12 : 3 x 6 inches, 47,039 feet ; 3 x 4, 17,485 feet ; 3 x 2, 6,850 feet.

In the very line you are reading.

Mr. GIBSON. Allow me to correct the hon. gentleman. I will read it word for word as it appears here :

Spruce scantling at $12 : 3 x 6, 47,039 feet ; 3 x 4, 17,485 feet ; 3 x 2, 6,850 feet.

Spruce timber : 15,284 feet at $17.50 ; 1,251 feet at $17 ; 1,092 feet at $14.50.

If I made a mistake of $5 per thousand I should be forgiven, especially when the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) declared that the Government were justified in paying $17.50 for that lumber. It is a poor rule that will not work both ways. The Minister of Public Works said that all the repairs to the Custom-house in St. John were done on business principles, as a business man would conduct his own affairs. I pointed out that while the Government had received tenders at $12.25 for supplying certain lumber, the officer in charge went out of his way to pay $14. The hon. Minister further contended that every purchase in connection with the building was made at a reasonable price. I remind the hon. gentleman of his speech at Quebec regarding the Curran Bridge, when he declared the expenditure had been reasonable considering the character of the work.

Mr. OUIPET. Order.

Mr. GIBSON. I mention this in refutation of the remark that the hon. gentleman thought the cost of the St. John building was reasonable. I wish to put myself right with the people of New Brunswick. I do not wish to say that the people of that province would have run away with the building, but what I wanted to convey was that if the same kind of people as were connected with the Curran Bridge had done this kind of work in St. John, they would no doubt have run away with the custom-house.

Mr. RIDER. If I understood the Minister correctly, he stated that the large cost of the building was due to the fact that it was fireproof. On looking over the Auditor General's Report for 1894, I find that 250,000 feet of lumber was used during the previous twelve months, and adding the quantity used previously, no doubt the total would reach 500,000 feet. What method has the Minister adopted to make this immense quantity of lumber fireproof? It must be a large building to have enabled the Minister to use up that quantity of lumber. The building surely cannot be fireproof.

Mr. HASLAM. This discussion is altogether out of place. There is no man in this House or out of it who can tell anything about the value of lumber without seeing it. In the first place the quality of the lumber is to be considered, and then the length of it is an important element. Unless a copy of the specifications is furnished, no one can intelligently discuss the prices of lumber. There is not a length stated in the Auditor General's Report, and I am not aware that hon. gentlemen opposite have a copy of the specifications.

Mr. GIBSON. I doubt if there was any specification. If there was, let the Government bring it down.

Mr. HASLAM. Unless there is a copy of the specification available it is unreasonable to find fault with the price paid for the lumber.

Mr. RIDER. Then, it is absurd to discuss the question under these circumstances, and the item should stand.

Mr. HASLAM. Hon. gentlemen are discussing the question without knowing what they are talking about.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If a practical man finds it difficult, it must of course be much more difficult to ordinary members of the House to consider this question and judge whether there is an overcharge. But there is a peculiar phase of the question, and it is this: the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) always poses as an independent member, a man eminently fair and impartial, and he asks this House in his soft, soothing tones to accept his opinion on every practical point because he is a practical man. I want the hon. gentleman to explain how, when he was equally in error with my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Gibson), as to the amount charged per thousand, he was equally ready to defend the Government whether they paid $17 per thousand or $12 per thousand?

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I am sure I very much indebted to the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the committee for the very complimentary manner in which he has referred to my remarks. I do not very often address the House, not nearly so often as does the hon. gentleman, and I certainly do not assert my opinion with any more emphasis than he does. I only make statements when I have some knowledge of the facts. The hon. gentleman has asked me to explain why I challenged the statement of the hon. member for Lincoln when I was equally in error myself. I am not prepared to admit that I was equally in error. I had not before me the figures of the Auditor General. The only statement I made was, that for a mixed specification for lumber, as I understand that to be, large lumber with some small lumber in it, $17 is an average price and is not an exorbitant price. That is the statement I made, and I am prepared to repeat it, and hon. gentlemen possessing a knowledge of the lumber trade of New Brunswick will say it is a correct statement. When I look again at the charges which I find in the Auditor General's Report, they appear to be reasonable. The charge for 3 x 6, 3 x 4, and 3 x 2 spruce scantling is $12. The ordinary price for such lumber, in lots of different lengths as they come from the mill, is from $7 to $9 per thousand. This lumber must have been to fill a certain specification, the lengths must have been uniform, and no doubt, for such a large building, considerably in excess of the length which ordinarily comes from our mills. The spruce for which $17.50 is charged was not scantlings but timber, and some of it is charged at $14.50. When we come to deals, they are also required to be of uniform length, and greater lengths than the average deals which come from our mills, and we find the price for selected deals $14.50; long deals are charged at $18. Spruce plank is charged at $15, 2-inch at $15, and some at $14. Spruce boards are charged at $13, and clear spruce boards at $16. The hon. gentleman spoke about $40 per thousand having been paid for certain lumber. I find that this price was paid for a different description of lumber altogether from that to which he referred; it is for sawn pitch pine timber, some of which is charged at $40 and the balance at $45 per thousand. I can only say that so far as my knowledge of lumber transactions go, and my knowledge of the prices which usually prevail in St. John, that I do not consider that any of these prices are exorbitant.

Mr. EDWARDS. The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Haslam) thought a little while ago that I was smiling in derision when the real truth was that I was smiling in approval. I may say that I would not be willing to undertake a discussion on transactions such as this, unless I saw the specifications.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS. I will state the prices as I know them, and I may say that cargo prices always vary from the prices of small quantities which are sold in retail. The value of spruce lumber on the Ottawa River—and I suppose it is about the same in New Brunswick—in cargo lots, of dimensions 9 inches wide and 16 feet long, would be about $9 a thousand feet. I sell many cargoes at that price.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is in the rough.

Mr. EDWARDS. Yes, that is the price in the rough. While that is true, scantling sold for division purposes in buildings, if retailed from the yard, and delivered to the buildings, costs $12 to $14 a thousand feet. But these long lengths at $17 a thousand are prices that we have never heard of, except for very special sizes. My candid opinion about this transaction is that the prices for the lumber are high, and I think that the lumber could be obtained at lower prices if tenders were called for.

Mr. CARGILL. But supposing that it was manufactured.

Mr. EDWARDS. Suppose it was kiln-dried and manufactured for flooring purposes, it would be worth $4 a thousand feet more. I say, in all candour, that this is a subject worthy of criticism, but it is also the case that when a man knows all the details of a transaction of this kind, he would be better able to criticise it than if he did not know the details. I am stating exactly what I know, and I am sure that His Honour the Speaker could back up my statement, if he were speaking on the subject. Our cargoes for shipment to New York net us $9 per thousand at the mill. The prices are a little higher this year, I admit, but we are not obtaining any increase. Under six feet long, the price is lower, but for joists or scantling for division purposes, delivered at the buildings, the price varies from $12 to $14 per thousand feet.

Mr. CARGILL. I think that this discussion has been protracted to an unusual length, and to an unnecessary length from the fact that it has been taken part in by a number of hon. gentlemen who are probably not familiar with the lumber business. My hon. friend from British Columbia (Mr. Haslam) and the hon. member (Mr. Edwards) would not have discussed the question at such length, because they know the business. My hon. friend from Nanaimo (Mr. Haslam) put the whole thing in a nutshell. It is quite impossible for men to come to any definite conclusion as to the value of lumber unless they have the specifications before them. No doubt there is some lumber quoted here in the rough, and there is also some quoted which is finished and ready to be put in the building, which materially increases its value. The whole discussion this afternoon is calculated to leave the impression on the country that excessive prices have been paid for lumber in this case; whereas, when the real facts are brought out and understood, it is found that the material purchased and put into the building, has been obtained at the best possible rate. I am very much surprised at the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) a gentleman of wide experience, a contractor, and a man who knows the variations in the price of lumber, should have said what he did in this discussion. Why, lumber varies in price as much as $45 per thousand feet. We sell lumber at from $3 to $4 a thousand, and we sell lumber, also, at $50 per thousand. The hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) can bear me out in that. Every one knows that the price of lumber materially increases according to the length and quality. If a particular kind of pine is needed for specific purposes, a high price must be paid. It is insinuated by hon. gentlemen opposite that there is an attempt at a job being put up by the Government in order to make a little money out of it for electioneering purposes. Now, I believe that the facts show that to be entirely wrong. The object of some hon. members opposite seems to be to leave an impression throughout the length and breadth of the country that there is jobbery in connection with every contract let by the Government, and that contractors have got to receive more than a fair profit in order that, at the completion of the work they may have a surplus to lay aside, especially for elections. Now, that is not fair, nor is it just. From all that I have heard in connection with this discussion, I believe that this work has been done in the best interests of the country, and at as reasonable prices as it possibly could have been done for.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has the superintendent of insurance reported on this Bill?

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). He did not specially report on it but he was present in the committee, and the changes in the Bill were made at his suggestion.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I had a good deal of conversation with the superintendent and understood that all his suggestions were accepted. When we left the committee, one or two of the clauses were to be amended in accordance with his suggestions? I suppose that has been done.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). Yes.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

Quebec Dominion Public Building—Renewals, improvements, &c.....	$2,000
Montreal post office.....	3,000

Mr. RIDER. I want to make some inquiry in connection with the Montreal post office. I notice, in the Auditor General's Report, an amount of $118.70, in connection with an arbitration with the "Gazette" Printing Company. Will the hon. Minister please explain?

Mr. OUIMET. The post office is lighted by electricity, the power for which is supplied from the "Gazette" printing office, which is close by. We also take from the "Gazette" building the power to run the two elevators. A difficulty arose as to the price that should be charged for these two services, and the matter was referred to arbitration, each side appointing one arbitrator, and they appointing the third.

Mr. LAURIER. Who were they?

Mr. OUIMET. The arbitrator appointed by the department was Mr. Ahearn, of Ottawa. I cannot give the names of the other arbitrators, but one was connected with the Royal Electric Light Company, of Montreal.

Mr. RIDER. Has the matter been fully decided?

Mr. OUIMET. Yes.

Mr. RIDER. Is the "Gazette" Printing Company still furnishing power and light?

Mr. OUIMET. Yes; we made a contract with the "Gazette" for three years.

Mr. RIDER. What is paid to the "Gazette" by the Government in connection with the electric light and furnishing of power?

Mr. OUIMET. I think it is in the neighbourhood of $1,800, but I am not sure. I inquired very carefully as to whether the electric power would be cheaper than water or steam, and found it cheaper by far.

Mr. McMULLEN. Do I understand that a contract was entered into years ago with the "Gazette" Printing Company, and that that contract has since expired?

Mr. OUIMET. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. What was the rate under that contract?

Mr. OUIMET. I could not say. I at first found the price high, and when the time came to make a new arrangement with the "Gazette," the whole question was gone into, and prices such as now obtain were agreed upon as a result of the arbitration.

Mr. McMULLEN. We would like to know what the original contract was so that we could have some idea of the reduction.

Mr. OUIMET. There is an item in the main Estimates for the same building. I will undertake, before that item is discussed, to bring down that contract, and all the information asked for by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. McMULLEN. This item is for the present year, and you will have another for next year. I understand that you will present to the House the statement of the amounts paid under the old contract, and under the new?

Mr. OUIMET. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. You have left over item 33, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Denison.) I had declared it carried; then it was opened again, and that was the way it stood when we rose at six o'clock.

Mr. McMULLEN. But the discussion on the item was not closed at six o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. When I was in the Chair I declared it carried, and afterwards it was opened and the discussion went on. I had declared it carried, and nobody was on the floor at six o'clock to discuss it.

Mr. McMULLEN. My hon. friend to my right (Mr. Rider) was waiting for an opportunity to ask for some information on the subject. When an item is carried, it should be so declared clearly so that we may understand.

The CHAIRMAN. I spoke quite audibly, and it was the hon. member himself called out to wait.

Mr. RIDER. On resuming to-night, Mr. Chairman, you called item 34, and I supposed that item 33 was allowed to stand.

Mr. OUIMET. Items 33, 34, and 35 are carried.

Mr. McMULLEN. The rule has been that when we rise at six o'clock and the item that has been discussed is not passed, the Chairman reads it again on resuming, thus giving an opportunity for discussion. To proceed to the next item is hardly a fair way of doing.

The CHAIRMAN. The hon. gentleman did not understand me. When the item was read, when I was in the Chair, about five o'clock, no gentleman arose, and I declared it carried. But the hon. gentleman asked to have it gone into, and the discussion went on.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think you are a little mistaken about that, because I cross-questioned the Minister myself about it the moment the item was called.

The CHAIRMAN. There was some discussion after I declared it carried.

Mr. McMULLEN. If we have got to submit to this, all I can say is that we shall watch closely to see that an item is not declared carried until we are done discussing it. The item was not read until after six o'clock; it was read at five o'clock, and pronounced carried by the Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. After discussion.

Mr. OUIMET. All the discussion which took place after you declared the item carried, was irregular.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I must protest against such a doctrine as that. It has not been our custom, and it ought not to be our custom, that the Chairman should take snap votes. If he does that, it will lead to no end of wrangling and recrimination. I do not blame our present chairman (Mr. Denison), but there has been a great deal too much of attempts to snap votes through; and whenever there is suspicion of that, it is sure to prolong discussion. Hon. gentlemen are well aware that if any idea of that prevailed, the only thing the Opposition could do would be to debate at very great length all the other items, which we do not want to do. No doubt, if the Chairman accidental calls it carried, when there is a desire for further discussion, that ought to be considered as an accident and reversed.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Denison).

The CHAIRMAN. I may say that I declared the item carried in good faith at the time, and I adhered to that. Of course it is in the power of the committee to appeal to the Speaker against my ruling.

Mr. McMULLEN. There will be no time gained by taking advantage of the committee in that way. Here are two gentlemen who have not been long in Parliament, who wanted to ask a few questions, and it would not have taken fifteen minutes for them to have done so and to have received the information they desired.

Mr. FOSTER. I well recollect what took place. I do not think the Chairman is to be lectured on the ground of his having desired to rush the vote through without fair consideration by the committee. The vote was called and read, and quite a long debate took place, with a series of questions and answers. Then, at a time when no person was on his feet, the Chairman took advantage of the opportunity, as he is always looking for such an opportunity, to declare the item carried. Then, when some other gentleman got up and wished to ask another question, it was allowed, though it was informal, and the discussion went on, question succeeding question, until six o'clock, the Chairman having declared it carried some time previously. There is no disposition to shorten the discussion. If hon. gentlemen are anxious to prolong the discussion, we are willing to sit here until September. But a great deal of discussion that was informal was allowed by the Chairman after he considered the item carried. There will be another opportunity for any gentleman to ask questions on concurrence, when they can get their replies and make their remarks.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. To talk about discussion on concurrence, is a farce. That cannot be done, and never is done. Nine times out of ten, the whole $40,000,000, or whatever it may be, are put through in little more than an hour or two on concurrence.

Mr. FOSTER. That is because they have been so thoroughly discussed before, and there is nothing left to say.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not know about that. We prefer to discuss the items fully on the Estimates, and that has always been our rule. As a matter of fact this discussion had been going on to six o'clock, and I am perfectly certain that the Chairman had not the slightest desire to interfere with the discussion.

Brockville Public Building—To pay
Tompkins, Crain & Co., contractors, amount due on final estimate.....$2,475 37

Cornwall Public Building—Balance due—the late John James Brown, architect, of Montreal, and to be paid to his legal representatives in full and final settlement of all claims for professional services rendered by the late Mr. Brown in connection with the said building... 131 32
Strathroy Public Building—Balance due contractors on final estimate..... 215 00

Mr. OUIMET. I will explain the first item. That building was completed in the course of 1888. The final estimate was given by the chief architect on the 19th September, 1888, by which it appeared that a balance of $2,475.37 was due on the contract. The contractor filed a claim for extras, which was not allowed, and the claim has been pending since. I ask for this amount to be revoted in order that it may be legally offered to him, and the matter closed, as we anticipate that it will probably be settled for this amount.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is this within or outside the contract ?

Mr. OUIMET. The amount of the contract was $37,320. The additional work authorized and carried out, amounted to $3,655.37; making a total of $40,955.37. There has been paid up to, the final estimate, $38,480, leaving a balance of $2,475.37. That was the final estimate, which was refused. This public building at Brockville includes a post office, customs, inland revenue and excise.

Mr. GIBSON. What is the difference in dispute between the Government and the contractor regarding the final estimate ?

Mr. OUIMET. The contractors claim for additional work $11,608.91.

Mr. GIBSON. Was the amount the Government are willing to pay the contractor settled by arbitration ?

Mr. OUIMET. No arbitration has taken place. The amount awarded to the contractors is $40,955, which includes, for additional work, $3,635. Instead of the latter amount, the contractors claimed $11,608.

Mr. GIBSON. Then, this sum of $3,635 is admitted by the Government as the proper amount to be paid to the contractors ?

Mr. OUIMET. Yes, but it has never been paid because the contractors would not accept it.

Mr. McMULLEN. Will the Minister please explain this payment to John James Brown.

Mr. OUIMET. Mr. Brown was the architect in charge of the Cornwall public building. He died some two or three years ago, and his estate was not settled until this year, when his heirs came forward and presented their claim in due form. This balance is admitted due, and is to be paid. With respect to the Peterborough custom-house, that is a balance due the contractor for grading, fencing, &c.

Mr. McMULLEN. How much did the Strathroy building cost ?

Mr. OUIMET. The total cost of the building has been $2,602, and cost of the site $2,400.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What amount of business is done at Strathroy, as shown by the collections of custom-house, post office and inland revenue ?

Mr. OUIMET. I have not the information at hand. The building was completed in 1890.

Brandon Industrial School—To complete payments $2,500

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is this for the benefit of the Indians or the whites ?

Mr. OUIMET. It is an Indian industrial school. The amount is required to pay the balance due to the contractors.

Mr. McMULLEN. How much did the building cost ?

Mr. OUIMET. The total cost is $27,084.

Mr. McMULLEN. This building is not placed, in my opinion, in the most desirable location. I do not know why it was placed at Brandon. We have spent large sums of money in erecting training schools. There are no less than seven in the North-west, on which the Dominion spent last year $165,000. The schools are as follows : Battleford industrial school, $21,011 ; Brandon, $20,091 ; Elkhorn, $14,899 ; High River, $15,427 ; Qu'Appelle, $35,324 ; Red Deer, $11,370 ; Regina, $16,280 ; St. Boniface, $14,375 ; St. Paul's, $16,214. So we have expended no less than $165,000 annually on these schools, and it is an extravagant outlay. How many Indians are there in the Brandon school ?

Mr. DALY. It seems to me a very inconvenient time to discuss the policy respecting the industrial schools. The hon. gentleman in charge of the item cannot possibly give the information. I cannot give it off-hand, but I shall be quite prepared to discuss the question on the proper item.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think that is the proper way to answer my hon. friend. My hon. friend may, in his discretion, abstain from exercising his undoubted right to discuss this question very fully, but I am bound to say that when the Government come down and ask the committee to vote a sum for industrial schools, the whole subject is properly open for consideration, and while we may not go into a discussion of policy, hon. gentlemen should be prepared to tell the committee, at least, what number of pupils are being instructed at the school at Brandon, and why Brandon was selected for the school. There is a great deal of force in what my hon. friend has said. Brandon does not appear 'prima facie' to be a very desirable point at which to establish an Indian industrial school; and I am also bound to say that the expenditure of $165,000 on eight or nine Indian industrial schools appears to me to be an extravagant expenditure for the people of Canada to be called upon to pay. The total expenses of the Indians in the North-west have been frequently criticised in this House, and very deservedly criticised. I doubt very much whether we are getting anything like a proportionate return or sufficient value for the expenditure. From what I have heard and seen, I am of the opinion that greater results could be obtained for the expenditure of a very much smaller sum of money, particularly if the work was more centralized than it is now.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not desire to press for an answer as to the number of pupils in the training schools. We can let that matter stand until the main Estimates come up. But in connection with the Brandon school, we should know the amount of accommodation furnished and how many pupils are in training. I thought possibly that information might be supplied. I may say that the school is just about to open, and I cannot tell as to the number of pupils.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Minister may tell us what the building has cost?

Mr. DALY. The Minister of Public Works will know about that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I presume the Indian Department furnished the Public Works Department with a statement as to the number of Indians?

Mr. DALY. We simply furnish a plan as to the accommodation required. I understand this item furnishes the building.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Public Works Department does not take the initiative in this matter without an application from the Interior Department, stating the Indian bands that are to be accommodated, and the reserves the children are to be drawn from.

Mr. DALY. As I stated last year, this school is established at Brandon to be conducted under the auspices of the Methodist Church, and in order that they may draw from the different Indian reserves in Manitoba on which they have missionaries. The department concludes that an industrial school is necessary in a certain locality which they select, and they make a requisition on the Public Works Department for accommodation for a certain number of children. The school will be opened this present month, but I cannot say if any pupils have arrived yet, nor can I say how many they expect, because that will depend upon the efforts of the missionaries.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

From my knowledge of the building, I presume it will accommodate about 100 pupils.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Are these institutions wholly supported by the Government?

Mr. DALY. We give a per capita grant, and with that they have to furnish teachers, food and everything of that kind.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the per capita grant?

Mr. DALY. The school is not opened here yet, and in this instance we may not adopt the per capita grant. The per capita grant differs in respect of all the industrial schools. For instance, the grant at Battleford is greater than at Red Deer, on account of the distance the school is from the railway, and the greater cost of supplies.

Mr. MARTIN. I would like to draw the attention of the Minister to a matter which I do not propose to discuss at any length now, but will have something to say on when the regular Estimates come up for the industrial schools. Last year I pointed out that the reports seemed to show that in a great many instances the pupils died very shortly after leaving the school. I notice that the department has omitted from the report this year any information upon that point, which seems very strange. I hope that some explanation will be ready later on.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not suppose that this is the proper time to discuss the general principle of the industrial schools, but I would like to know from the Minister what has been the effect of establishing these schools. The amount expended is large, and unless the results are beneficial we should change our system.

Mr. DALY. I do not think this is the right time to discuss that matter at all. This item is a supplementary vote for a building, and has no more to do with the question the hon. gentleman asks than an item in the fishery estimates. I will give the hon. gentleman all the necessary information at the proper time. I think it is unfair to take up the time of the House discussing matters of this kind on such an item.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not think the Minister is fair in putting it in that way. We are asked for a grant for industrial schools, and my hon. friend (Mr. Campbell) asks about the schools generally. He does not expect an answer from the Minister of Public Works, but surely the Minister of the Interior has information which would enable him at least to give a courteous reply.

Mr. MULOCK. I think, upon reflection, the Minister will see he is in error in assuming it would be out of order to discuss the system on an application for funds to build a school. The building of a school is intended for the education of Indian children, and it is germane to the question as to whether we should build the school or not, to see what public benefit would be done by the work. The Minister might be excused from answering on the ground that he did not expect a discussion, but not on the ground he took.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Minister of the Interior ought to be able to tell why he selected Brandon as a site for this school.

Mr. DALY. I stated that last session.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But that is not answer to a question asked to-night. We are not expected to go over all the hon. gentleman said last session. The question is pertinent now. Now, any member of the House is entitled to know why a site for an Indian industrial school was selected at Brandon, which is the centre of a large and, I believe, a very thrifty white population. I do not think there is any very large number of Indian reserves in the vicinity of Brandon.

Mr. DALY. I am quite prepared to answer that question, which I answered last session and the session before. Brandon was selected partly because of its central position in the province of Manitoba as to railway and other facilities for getting the Indian children there, and also because the city of Brandon donated to the Indian Department the land, 320 acres, or 160 acres, I forget which, on which the building has been erected. As the hon. gentleman has said, there are not many Indian reserves in the vicinity of Brandon, and that is one reason that moved the department to locate the school there. It is considered desirable to have the schools as far away as possible from the reserves from which the children are taken, experience having shown that if industrial and other schools are located near the reserves, the parents of the children delight to go and camp in the neighbourhood in the hope of being fed, and in that way they interfere with the attendance of the children and generally with the working of the school. Another object of locating the schools near the centres of civilization is to accustom the children to the habits and ways of the white people about them. For instance, take the school at Elkhorn. That school is amongst the most successful. Its pupils conduct the only tailoring, shoemaking, harness, and tin-shops in the place, and the young women conduct a dressmaking establishment, all in connection with the school. The pupils are not only taught these civil trades, but they are taught business habits and generally how to deal with white people.

Vancouver, B.C., Public Building—To complete payments to contractors for construction and heating of building, and to superintending architect.....$1,367 94

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What has been the total cost of this building?

Mr. OUIMET. $102,784.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What was the original estimate?

Mr. OUIMET. To give that I would have to refer to the explanations given by the Minister who was in charge of the department at the time. The only extra is $888.63.

Rideau Hall, including grounds—Renovations, improvements, repairs, furniture and maintenance..... $ 3,000

Lighting public buildings throughout the Dominion 15,000

Heating public buildings, Ottawa, including salaries of engineers, firemen, elevator attendants and caretakers..... 5,000

Telephone service—To pay arrears of rents of instruments used in 1893 and 1894.. 400

Mr. McMULLEN. Will the Minister explain these items?

Mr. OUIMET. The appropriation for Rideau Hall for 1894-95 was $15,000. Of that sum, up to the 31st of March, $14,980.42 has been expended. The items of expenditure, adding this $3,000, are as follows: Gardeners, contract, $3,000; filling ice-house, $70; repairs staff, salaries, $6,500; lumber, $600; hardware, $350; glass, putty, shellac, &c., $100; dry goods for repairs, $50; blacksmith, $60; firebrick, cement, fireclay, plaster of Paris, &c., $125; furniture, upholstery and carpets, $1,000; linen, $800; china, crockery and glassware, $1,000; repairs to stoves, tinware and utensils, $950; shingling roof of ball-room and curling rink, $500; paper, painting &c., $1,600; incidentals, $1,295. The increase in the vote for lighting public buildings throughout the Dominion is nearly all accounted for by the substitution of electric light for petroleum and gas. There is also an increase in the number of public buildings. The total appropriation was, $71,500.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is no use in the hon. gentleman bringing down estimates which are very largely at variance with what he knows must be expended, and this excess of $15,000 on an aggregate vote of $70,000 is really an extremely large discrepancy. I should think the hon. gentleman's department ought to have been able to make a much closer shot at what would be required. Besides, the hon. gentleman must recollect that in view of all that has been told as to the economy which was to be exercised—we have not seen any of it this year—it is rather discouraging to find items like this cropping up in the supplementaries. It inspires us with very considerable doubts as to what supplementaries may be found necessary by the hon. gentleman, or other people, in an en-suings session. I very much fear we will have a very considerable number of repetitions of similar votes to this.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What amount did the hon. gentleman put in the Estimates for this purpose for the next year?

Mr. OUIMET. I could not tell.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is worth while looking up. If the department imprudently cut down the Estimates of the hon. gentleman last year and this imprudence be repeated this year, we will be only providing for another supplementary vote next session.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman wants $15,000 more on an estimate of $71,500 for 1894-95, and he only asks $70,000 for 1895-96. There is something queer about that surely. He wants $86,000 for the service of 1894-95, and only $70,000 for 1895-96. Does the hon. gentleman expect a reduction in the price of light?

Mr. OUIMET. My officer tells me that there was a deficit of $13,000 last year, which this supplementary vote is to cover.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Has the hon. gentleman tried the system in any of our public buildings of putting in our own electric light? Business establishments now generally have their own plant. They have dynamos sufficient to furnish the light they require, and that plant is found far cheaper. In the Montreal post office and custom-house, where a great deal of light is required, the cheaper and better way for the Government would be to put in a dynamo of their own.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. Finance Minister is only putting the trouble a year further back. What was the estimate of that year in which the $13,000 deficit occurred?

Mr. OUIMET. From the information I have, the deficit has been increased from year to year. The vote is only $38,000, and I made a mistake in giving a larger figure.

Mr. MARTIN. Is the same deficit going to occur again?

Mr. OUIMET. No; whenever it is paid it will be wiped out.

Mr. MARTIN. If the estimate for next year is not sufficient, the deficit will go on again.

Mr. OUIMET. I am told that the estimate will be sufficient for next year.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Can the hon. Minister give an answer to my question about lighting public buildings?

Mr. OUIMET. That question has already had the attention of the department. It is only in Toronto and Montreal that plant of our own could be used with advantage. On the other hand we would have to lay down the plant and connect all these different buildings. If all the buildings were together, it would be much cheaper, but we would have to get a franchise from each municipality, and the hon. gentleman knows how the various private companies look after their own privileges, and we should have to meet a great deal of opposition on their part. And after all, we now have the light about as cheap as it can be had. That is the opinion of my architect, Mr. Ewart.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What does it cost to light the buildings in Toronto?

Mr. OUIMET. I could not say for each building.

Mr. MULOCK. You have a contract for the Montreal post office?

Mr. OUIMET. Yes; with the "Gazette" Company, to furnish light and power for running the elevators.

Mr. MULOCK. What does that cost a year?

Mr. OUIMET. I could not give it off-hand. When we are in the main Estimates, I will have all this information ready.

Harbours and Rivers, Nova Scotia—

South Ingonish Wharf—To provide for the amount of a judgment rendered in the Exchequer Court in the suit of the Queen vs. Murdoch G. McLeod, for the expropriation of a property required for wharf purposes, together with the costs recovered.....$635 88

Mr. FORBES. Will the hon. Minister state what the judgment was about; also the amount of the judgment, and the amount of the costs?

Mr. OUIMET. The amount of the debt was $427.68, and the costs $208.20.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Fifty per cent—pretty fair.

Mr. OUIMET. Pretty fair; any province would be proud of that.

Mr. FORBES. Is that the result of a suit brought in the Exchequer Court by the Crown?

Mr. OUIMET. No; expropriation proceedings taken to cheapen the cost of that land. Our engineer reported that the land was worth $240. I think we offered $300, in order to avoid expropriation proceedings. The owners would not accept, and wanted over $500. The matter was referred to the court, and this was the result.

Harbours and Rivers, New Brunswick—

Hopewell Cape—To pay balance due for lumber required for repairs to ballast wharf$217 60

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman tell us what amount of fees the Government received from Hopewell Cape wharf—anything at all?

Mr. OUMET. The work was built out of the appropriation of the current year, and was completed, I think, last fall. No fees have been collected. It is a ballast wharf.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I know; I have seen it.

Mr. McMULLEN. What was the entire cost?

Mr. OUMET. The appropriation was $600. Without the knowledge of the department, this was exceeded by $317.50, which we refused to pay, as it had been incurred without due authority. But, after the party had waited long enough, we thought the officer in charge had been sufficiently punished, and that he would likely remember the lesson that he must not exceed his instructions in future. As the amount was reported by the engineer in charge to have been actually spent, and that as that was confirmed by the engineer here, it would be better to pay it.

Maritime provinces generally—General repairs and improvements to harbour and river works..... $3,000

Mr. FLINT. I would like to ask the hon. Minister if any of this has been spent on the breakwater at Yarmouth?

Mr. OUMET. I omitted to bring down the information for the hon. gentleman. I beg his pardon. I will have the information on the main Estimates.

Mr. FORBES. Will the hon. gentleman please say where this sum has been expended?

Mr. OUMET. The regular appropriation for the present year was $10,000, which was all expended on 31st May last. This sum was not sufficient for the enormous requirements of the current year. There were very heavy storms during the winter in Cape Breton and along the Nova Scotia coast, and we had to go into this expenditure. Out of this $3,000, there is an amount of $1,000 to cover a special warrant of the Governor General which we had to get in order to make some absolutely necessary repairs. I have not with me a list of the works done, but that can be given when the main Estimates of the department are before the House.

Mr. FORBES. Several years ago the Minister said he had a plan, or his chief engineer was to devise a plan, with regard to the expenditures on the chief wharves in Nova Scotia. I understood they were going to arrange so as to keep them in repair without submitting a vote for each to Parliament. There are, however, the smaller wharves along the shore, to which I would like to call the Minister's attention, if he thinks that this discussion affords a fitting opportunity. I do not want to take up time unnecessarily.

Mr. OUMET. If the hon. gentleman will be kind enough to make a list of the names and requirements of these different harbours, I could submit them to my chief engineer, and have the answer ready for the hon. gentleman when we come to the main Estimates.

Mr. FORBES. Will the hon. gentleman, then, make an explanation with regard to the new plan of which I have spoken?

Mr. OUMET. I think the hon. gentleman refers to the suggestion of a plan for the classification of the harbours of Nova Scotia. It was proposed to divide them into three classes, according to their importance, either as harbours of refuge or as shipping harbours, in order to have a better distribution of the public money voted for keeping them in repair. As we are going now, I am bound to say, the votes we have are too small to enable us to keep up the harbours in the maritime provinces.

Mr. FORBES. That is true.

Mr. OUMET. I thought I should be, in part, at least, relieved of difficulties I encountered every day if we had that classification, which would be placed before the House, and so would enable me to make a better distribution towards the maintenance of these harbours.

Mr. FORBES. Why does not the hon. Minister give us a larger vote?

Mr. OUMET. Better times are coming.

Mr. FLINT. I think the suggestion is a good one. Even if a larger sum is appropriated, it will not follow that there will be an increase in the expenditure on necessary repairs, because any proposal for new expenditure can be investigated on its merits. I knew of cases in which, the fact that the Government had not an appropriation in hand for small repairs of from $300 to $500, has been either the cause or the excuse for very large subsequent losses. The other day in the county which I have the honour to represent, a large section of an important breakwater collapsed. I suppose we shall have the report in a few days. The collapse was probably due to some weakness not apparent on the face of the work. If the hon. Minister had in hand a little larger sum for special occasions of this kind, repairs could be easily made, under the supervision of the proper authorities, and a large sum would be saved in the long run. We know how a break of that kind goes. One or two storms will so enormously increase the cost of reconstruction as to make the Government unable to cope with it, except through a vote of Parliament. I believe hon. members on both sides would agree if the Government would lay any scheme before the House under which this appropriation could be laid out, and that care would be taken that no improper use was made of it by local persons, that the real interests of economy would be served.

Mr. FORBES. I wish to call the Minister's attention to one or two places right in line with the remarks made by the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint). In the county of Queen's there are two breakwaters in particular to which I wish to call his attention, those at Port Joli, and Port Mouton. One of these works is absolutely going to decay and destruction for want of proper repairs. That at Port Joli was sadly injured by a storm some years ago, and that wharf is now in absolute want of a small appropriation. If nothing is done to it, in a few years it will require many times the amount to put it in repair that it now requires. It is necessary to use it for a wharf for a passenger and freight steamer about to run to that town from Liverpool, and it needs an outlay of $200 or $300 at once. I called attention to this before, and urged it on the Government, and was put off with the reply that the Government was making a classification of the breakwaters, and hoped to include those named. For Port Mouton I got a sum of money voted to build a new pier, but it does not serve the purposes of the citizens to the extent that it was intended, as vessels cannot use it for want of dredging. Indeed, I may add also that the caretakers of all these public wharfs, to a great extent, neglect their duty in not reporting to the Government the damages which they sustain from time to time from storms and accidents, and the condition they are in. Then, coming further east, to the harbour of Liverpool, there is another breakwater at Coffin's Island Harbour, which needs repair. These are wharfs which are works of necessity. I had the pleasure of writing to the Minister about them, and I will do so again to urge on his classification, and I trust he will be able to give a favourable answer showing that they are included in the Government's list and among the class for permanent repairs. Although I am obliged to the Minister for at least recognizing the rights of the citizens of Queen's County in the appropriation he made last year, I must say that the sum asked for in this vote is altogether inadequate to the necessities of the works. Both as harbours of refuge, and for shipping purposes, they require larger expenditures than they are getting, and the policy of the Government in neglecting even the urgent necessities of keeping established works in order, because the people send members opposed to the Government on their trade and other policy, is a vicious one, and fraught with danger to the country and loss to the people, and our citizens repudiate the action of the Government in so doing, and I am glad to hear the Minister say he does accept it as the policy of his department.

Mr. BORDEN. I understood the Minister of Public Works to say a year or two ago that he was having a report made with reference to the condition of the breakwaters in the maritime provinces, with a view to collecting certain of the most fitting to receive public grants, and to be taken under the special care of his department. I would like to know whether the hon. gentleman has completed that report.

Mr. OUIMET. Mr. Perley is now working at it, and my chief engineer says that he does not expect it to be ready before the end of the season. It will be put in the next report of the department.

Mr. BORDEN. Then, to a certain extent, the department is going very much on the lines they have followed in the past, without any special principle governing these grants, except that utter want of principle which, I am sorry to say, has governed the department, that of selecting places for expenditure on the lines of politics, merely selecting counties in which the Government happen to have, for the time being, a representative, without having special reference, as they should do, to the requirements of the work itself.

Mr. OUIMET. I do not think the hon. gentleman can establish that charge to the satisfaction of the House. I think the department can very well defend itself against such a charge. We have done for the best in every place, and even we have spent sometimes the larger amounts of money in counties that were opposed to us. We are certainly not open to that charge.

Mr. BORDEN. I do not desire to make unpleasant charges, or to misrepresent the hon. gentleman. But, speaking from my own experience, I am compelled to say that I can account for the utter neglect which he has shown towards the public works in the constituency I have the honour to represent, on no other grounds than that the county happens to be represented by a man opposed to him. If there is a county in the Dominion of Canada which has a right to a fair share of public expenditure, it is that county. I will venture to say that there is not the same number of people anywhere else in the Dominion who pay more money per head into the treasury of this country, than the people of my county. I have, over and over again, brought to the notice of the Minister certain works which demanded immediate attention, works constructed by public money, at a time, perhaps, when that county happened to be represented by a gentleman in sympathy with the Government, but which are now being allowed to get into disrepair, and that money is allowed to be absolutely wasted. I have before pointed out to the hon. gentleman, and to this House, both in the House and privately, one particular work among a dozen, and I am sure he will not mind me reminding him once more of the work known as Pickett's Pier. That hon. gentleman considered it necessary, in 1892, a few weeks before the date of a by-election, to send one of his engineers into that county to look at that breakwater, although I believe it was covered with several feet of snow and ice. The engineer recommended that $200 be expended to save that work from destruction. It so happened that the election did not turn out as that hon. gentleman expected, and that $200 grant was cancelled. However, by dint of persuasion, by calling the hon. gentleman's attention to the importance of the work, I was able to get him to place in the Estimates, subsequently, the sum of $800 to repair that important work. He assured me that the work was to be done. Time went on, and the vote was allowed to lapse. Then when I came here and asked for this expenditure, what do you suppose I was told. I was coolly told that the work had become so out of repair that $800 was not sufficient to repair it, and that, therefore, it could not be repaired. Is not that a nice state of things? In 1892, $200, according to the report of the hon. gentleman's own engineer, was sufficient to have repaired that work. In 1893, the engineer recommends a vote of $800; but in 1894, when the grant has been allowed to lapse, the Minister comes down and says: No, we cannot do it, because it will take so much money. If the hon. gentleman pursued a policy of looking after the interests of this country and attending to the public works when they demanded attention, $200 or perhaps less would have repaired that work; but he dilly-dallied, because the county was represented by a man who was opposed to him, until the time arrived when the work is so greatly out of repair that the amount voted will not cover the expenditure and the whole undertaking is allowed to go by the board. That is a case which is patent to every member of this House. Every word I have said is susceptible of proof, and the hon. gentleman knows it. So it is with regard to scores of other works. It is about time a halt was called in this kind of business; it is about time public money was spent in the interest of the people and not in the interest of a particular party. I will tell the hon. gentleman what happened, only a year ago when Pickett's pier was being examined by one of his engineers at Halifax, Mr. Greenwood. He went down to look at the breakwater, and one of the gentlemen living in the neighbourhood, whose name I am prepared to give, went down with him. When he had looked over the work, Mr. Greenwood said: "Well, it is too bad, that this was allowed to get into this condition; but you people in King's are making a mistake—you do not know how to get grants for public breakwaters?" "What do you mean," asked the gentleman. "I mean this," replied Mr. Greenwood, "that if you will send a representative from King's to Ottawa to support the present Government, you will get all the grants you want for your breakwater." That gentleman is Mr. James B. Dickey. If the hon. Minister wishes to verify the statement let him write to Mr. Dickey, who is one of the most responsible gentlemen living in King's. There is a statement made by his own engineer direct to the people; he made no secret of it—if you want money for breakwaters send a representative to support the Government.

Mr. KAULBACH. Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN. "Hear, hear," says an hon. gentleman opposite, the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach). Such is his policy. It is about time, however, to put an end to such a state of things. I do not mean to say that the Minister would instruct his engineer to make such a statement but that statement has been made, and it is in line with the manner in which the public money in this country is being expended, on breakwaters at any rate. I do not pretend to say that it is possible for the Government to maintain all the breakwaters. I have sympathy with the statement made by the Minister on a former occasion in this House, that the most worthy public works should be selected and maintained. I believe it is utterly impossible for the Dominion Government to maintain all these breakwaters; but the Minister has left too much time before making his selection, and thereby he has allowed valuable public works to get entirely into disrepair when a very small sum would have saved them from destruction.

Mr. OUMET. As to the information given by the hon. gentleman in regard to Mr. Greenwood, I think there must be a mistake. I think the engineer was only chaffing. Or another construction may be put upon it: If he was not chaffing, he might have made that statement in order to hurt the Government, and he must therefore be an opponent. He certainly should not have said it, as I do not think he was correct in making the statement. If he said so, it was no doubt with a desire to hurt the Government and the department, and he will have to answer for it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then dismiss him.

Mr. OUMET. I will see that the case is inquired into. If the inquiry shows that this was done to injure our party or your party, we will see that he is properly dealt with.

Mr. FRASER. I do not expect to get anything for my county—long ago I arrived at that conclusion. This engineer must have been trying to hurt the Government, for he acted in almost an identical manner in my own county. The principle laid down is something like that of dividing an estate, the friends must get there first. Of course, as the old cock crows the young cocks cry. These officers have learned to repeat the cries of the Ministers. When such acts are done publicly, as a matter of course, what else can be expected? In my own county there are 150 miles of coast line, and no railway except the Eastern Extension goes there, and that road touches it only at one point. For the last three Parliaments the county has seen fit to send to this House an opponent of the Government. The Minister, after a good deal of begging, last year gave us $1,500. Two years ago, I obtained an order of the House for a return showing the money expended in Nova Scotia by counties, and up to this day I have not been able to obtain it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It will take two or three years to prepare such a return for all the counties, outside of Guysboro'.

Mr. FRASER. It would take only five minutes so far as Guysboro' is concerned. I suppose nothing else could be expected. I call attention to the fact that at a meeting at which the Ministers were present in my county the candidate who opposed me rose and said, "I have brought down these Ministers here to show them what is required, and I tell them in your presence that they will find me a man who will ask for a good deal."

Mr. OUMET. I think if my hon. friend opposite had accepted our invitation to attend the meeting, he would not have had so much to complain of now.

Mr. FRASER. I was only asked five minutes before the meeting opened. I sent a written request to be allowed to speak at the meeting, but I was refused in a written reply. I asked a week beforehand. I have not a word to say about the courtesy not being given, for the committee had a perfect right to refuse. I was not going to go there five minutes before the meeting, because I had made a request and been refused, and of course none of my friends would have been there.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There were some of your friends there.

Mr. FRASER. My opponent made the statement that the Ministers were brought down specially for the purpose and in that bland manner for which the Minister of Public Works is noted he spoke, but he did not say anything in regard to carrying out this or that work. Nevertheless the people went away delighted. It was said: Well, the Ministers have never been here before, we have seen and heard them and now we are going to have everything, the days of happiness have come. One gentleman of a religious frame of mind said, "I feel as if I was a new Moses sent to deliver the people of Guysboro'"—and all the Ministers cheered. This Moses at the first opportunity he got wanted to get on the bench. He had led the Conservatives into the wilderness, and he left them there. They were trying to get a Joshua. This was all said before the Ministers, and there was something very funny about it. One of the men, not being a biblical scholar, asked, "To whom does he refer—who is Moses. I never heard of him."

An hon. MEMBER. Was it the Minister of Public Works?

Mr. FRASER. No; it was not the Minister of Public Works, and I am certain it was not the Minister of Justice, because I think he has been better brought up than that.

Mr. OUMET. Was not there a Jonas there?

Mr. FRASER. Oh, no; there is no Jonas in the Bible. You mean Jonah. The Minister is really as far behind in his biblical knowledge as the gentleman whom I won't name.

An hon. MEMBER. Perhaps it was Jonas?

Mr. FRASER. The county I represent has 150 miles of coast line, but the county of Antigonish, next to me, has not more than 40 or 50 miles.

Mr. CAMERON. If you go around the county of Antigonish you will get 150 miles.

Mr. FRASER. Nothing like it. Perhaps with the indentation of the bay you might get 70 or 80 miles, but from Pictou to Mulgrave it is only 60 miles.

Mr. CAMERON. It is 80 miles in a "B" line.

Mr. FRASER. Why there is no "B" line there at all. In Antigonish, within the last six or seven years, $60,000 has been spent. Now, is that justice? The Minister sent an engineer down there after I had made out a very strong case as I thought, and the engineer reported on the work, but year after year when I ask about it, the answer is: it is under consideration. That is the most dangerous thing that could have happened, because the more he considered it the further we are away from getting it. I am not going to be ungenerous, and with a falling revenue and a large deficit, it cannot be expected that any heavy expenditure will be made. But in the days of our prosperity we did not apply the correct rule. There are men who have to toil with their boats five or six miles to seek safety from a storm in my county. They have to land far away from their homes, and yet no accommodation is provided for them. The Government has been expending money on the idea that they would apply it where they could get the most political assistance from it. A Government is not for this purpose.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This one is.

Mr. FRASER. The proper function of Government is to see that those who need help, and cannot help themselves, should receive help.

Mr. McALISTER. Does your local government in Nova Scotia do that?

Mr. FRASER. Yes, they do. They spend the Government money in every county whether it supports them or not. Why, they borrowed money for bridges and roads, and every county pro rata got its share whether it supported the Government or not. The road grant is given to each county every year. I would not lay it down as a rule that the Government should give a like amount to each county, but I do say that in the interests of the people of this country, the prime idea should be to spend the public money where it is most needed. For twelve years, the county I represent has only received $1,500, and let me ask the Minister of Public Works now how much of that has been expended?

Mr. OUIMET. It has been all expended.

Mr. FRASER. I am thankful for that at least, and I hope that the work will prove of some benefit. When one of the Ministers spoke about that very little sum of money in my county, the man who was opposing me said to the people: The Minister can tell you how much he did towards it. Well, I brought the matter year after year before Parliament. I did nothing except what was my duty in the matter, and certainly it is a prostitution of proper representation to say that a man who is not in Parliament should get a grant of money for the county. If a proper representation is made by the member representing the people of a county, it is that representation should be acted upon, and not the representation of a man who is seeking to get into Parliament, and who has failed to secure the confidence of the people. I feel that my county has not been treated as it ought, and because I feel that, I have pressed its claims upon the Government. Every day I hear it said: It is no use to send this man to Parliament for he will get nothing. Well, I do not fear to meet that accusation, but when a Minister is appealed to in proof of that, I say that a very bad and improper system prevails in this country. I was sorry that the Minister of Public Works did not come down to my county as he was billed to, because I think that his well-known fairness would have prompted him to do something for our public works there when he saw the condition they were in. I cannot help mentioning a rather amusing thing that occurred in connection with that visit of some hon. gentlemen opposite to my county. On the bill announcing the meeting, among other members of the Government it was promised that the Hon. Mr. Costigan and the Controller of Customs (Mr. Clarke Wallace) should appear. I was glad to see the cordial relations existing between the various members of the Government, and I was glad to see that Mr. Costigan and Mr. Wallace were travelling in harmony together. But they did not appear, and curiously enough just a few days afterwards, and then I understood it all, the Conservative press announced that the Hon. John Costigan had been out in the woods, and that he had not seen the face of a white man for weeks, so that he would not appear with Mr. Clarke Wallace in my county. I regret that very much, because I enjoyed the visit of the others. I say that the Minister himself is to blame for the mistakes made by Mr. Greenwood and others. Many of these officers think that they are serving the Government and not the country, and parrot-like, because they want to stand well with the Government, they repeat the expressions of the Minister. What business is it of a public official who are in or who are out? What has he to do with what party has control of the Government? He likes to do that sort of thing, because he thinks it will result in his shortcomings being overlooked. Even now the hon. Minister is attempting to set up a plea for Mr. Greenwood, and what is the plea? That he was only in fun—that he was trying to hurt the Government? Does the hon. Minister believe that? The hon. Minister knows that he was carrying out the well-understood wish of the Government in representing that if any county expends anything it must support the Government. But now that the statement is made, I shall wait with a good deal of interest to see whether Mr. Greenwood is asked to explain, and whether he will show that what he said was high-flown wit or will make an apology for an attempt to hurt the Government. I cannot understand the mental construction of the Minister when he calls it wit. Now, the principle I want to be bound by myself, now and always, is this; that the need of a locality is the only rule that should guide the Government in making expenditures. There was more money thrown away in the county of Antigonish than would build two or three breakwaters. I do not say that has been generally done elsewhere, but universally the idea in the province of Nova Scotia, and the supporters of the Government have learned parrot-like to repeat it, is that only those counties that support the Government will get anything—as if we were all standing here over a big trough, with pails in our hands, waiting to get them filled. That is not the purpose of the Government at all, and the sooner they understand that the business of the country is to be conducted according to the wants of the country the better. As to the hon. gentleman's visit to the county, I was glad to see him. He saw a county that was worth seeing. He saw a county, which despite its lack of the means of communication which most counties have, and despite the fact that its inhabitants find that every-day life is a struggle, has, with the exception of one occasion when the party were divided, clung, the hon. gentleman may say ignorantly, to the principles which its people have thought to be right. I can assure the hon. gentleman that not even the fascinating presence of the chairman of this committee, whose wit enlivened the scene, and who let the people understand that he was very near a Minister, was sufficient to induce them to leave their old love and take up with the new. Nor could the Ministers accomplish that object by attempting to strengthen themselves by ensconcing a man in a judge's chair which he found was the safest retreat he could have. I trust when the Ministers come again to that county they will come into the very place they did before, or, at least, that the Minister of Public Works will be less skilful in that deceptive style of oratory which, while not staying much, injects into the minds of the innocent Conservatives of that county that after all, back of it, they may depend upon him in the day of need.

Mr. CAMERON. I was very much pleased with the very amusing address delivered by my hon. friend from Guysboro'; but when he states that Guysboro' should be looked after with regard to its public works before Antigonish—

Mr. FRASER. I did not say that. I said that if so much money was expended in Antigonish, a little should be given to this county with twice the coast line.

Mr. CAMERON. My hon. friend said the money should be expended where public works are most required, and that part of the money expended in Antigonish should have been expended in Guysboro'. I am fairly well acquainted with both of these counties. I know that the sea coast of Guysboro' is about 150 miles in extent; but if my hon. friend will start from Auld's Cove on the Strait of Canso and follow the coast line of Antigonish by Cape George, thence to Merigonish he will find that the coast line of that county is nearly as long as that of Guysboro' itself; and I tell my hon. friend that when Antigonish shall be provided by art with harbours and piers as fully as nature has provided Guysboro' with them, it will be a long time before the Public Works Department of Canada will expend public money in Guysboro'. I do not know any county in the province of

Mr. FRASER.

Nova Scotia that is so well served with harbours as Guysboro'. From the time you leave Auld's Cove at one end, until you reach the county line of Halifax at the other, it is indented with harbours from one end to the other. In fact, unless he goes far into the interior of harbours, I fail to see where the Minister of Public Works could profitably expend public money in that county. The opposite is the case with the county of Antigonish. Along its entire coast line of nearly 150 miles you cannot find a single harbour of refuge in which vessels could get shelter. That being the case, if the principle laid down by my hon. friend from Guysboro' is to be adopted by this Government, not a dollar of public money will be expended in Guysboro' until the interests of Antigonish are as well served as are those of Guysboro'. There is another county which requires a large amount of public expenditure, and that is the county of Inverness. I am satisfied that my hon. friend from Guysboro' will agree with me in that. From Hawkesbury on the Strait of Canso to Cape St. Lawrence at the northern part of the island there was not a single harbour of refuge on the coast of more than 150 miles in extent until the Public Works Department of this Dominion undertook to construct a few in the interest of the people there. I was amused to hear my hon. friend from King's (Mr. Borden) complain of the manner in which public works were treated in his county, which he attributed to the fact of that county not being represented by a supporter of the Government. I do not believe there is a county in the province of Nova Scotia which does not fare in a similar manner, simply for the want of sufficient public money being placed at the disposal of the Minister of Public Works, and it is unfair to attribute to the Minister political motives in looking after the public works of any county of the Dominion. Very much as Guysboro' is served by public harbours, so is King's served by railways. The county is intersected by railways. It is a very important county, but a large amount of public money has been expended on public works for the distribution of the products of that fine county. I was equally amused by the funny manner in which the hon. gentleman described the visit of the Ministers to his county. I had the great luck myself of having the county of Inverness visited by prominent political gentlemen from other parts of the Dominion, who, although they were not ministers of the day, I am satisfied were ministers in prospect. "Hope deferred maketh the heart sick," and no doubt it will be deferred in their case for a long time. It appears that a committee in Guysboro' refused my hon. friend from Guysboro' a hearing. I may say that I was not aware there was any committee in my county to whom I would have to apply in order to obtain a hearing; but I was aware of the fact that these prominent gentlemen, who visited the county of Inverness during the month of December, advertised a public meeting in the district in which I resided. Although not invited, I determined to have the pleasure of meeting them there, but, to my utter astonishment, I found that some wire-pullers from the district, when they learned that we were prepared to meet them, changed the place of meeting from the agricultural building, where all the people of the county could be well accommodated, and gave out notice that the Liberal leaders would address the electors of Inverness at Port Hood, on Wednesday, the 12th December, at 11 o'clock a.m., and in the hall at Whycocomah on Tuesday evening, 11th December. When I first observed this notice, I could hardly believe my eyes, and pointed out to my friends that this could not have been the intention of the committee when they invited the Liberal leaders to address public meetings in Inverness. The only way I could find out their original intention was by placing the advertisement between me and the light, when I found that the original notice read in the exhibition building.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What date?

Mr. CAMERON. The date was not given. The intention was to hold a meeting in the exhibition building on the 12th December, and it was announced all through the county that the meeting would take place there. Early in November we were notified to that effect, but it was found very inconvenient to have a big meeting in a central part of the county, and so they changed their course and held three small meetings in places where, of course, they have performed great work, as no doubt the next elections will show.

Mr. YEO. I would like to ask the Minister if any part of this amount is to be spent in Prince County? That county has fared very badly. The few grants we have had there have been very small, indeed. The hon. Minister will recollect that I have frequently drawn his attention to the necessity of an outlay on several wharfs and breakwaters in that county, and I think, in the session of 1893, the Minister promised that he would complete the breakwater at Brae, Prince County, and the following year pay some attention to a breakwater at West Point. Since that time I believe $100 has been expended at Brae, and that is all that has been done. I have, at every session since 1891, drawn the attention of the hon. Minister, both in the House and the department, to the necessity of these works, but without much success so far. At Brae the inhabitants, in the year 1890, constructed a work themselves of about 350 feet in length. That shows the great necessity which they consider exists for a shipping place there. The Government the following year made a small outlay, and extended the work some 200 feet. The portion which was constructed by the people is falling into decay, and likely, if not attended to, soon to be carried away. I find it stated in the Minister's report that:

The inner portion of the work, which was constructed by the inhabitants, is in a bad condition, as it has not had any repairs for some time, and should be put in order.

My colleague and I have frequently drawn the Minister's attention to the necessity of something being done to protect this work, but so far our efforts have been unsuccessful. If this work is not attended to during the present season, this portion of it, at any rate, will be destroyed. We have also drawn the hon. Minister's attention to the necessity of a wharf or pier being constructed at West Point. Before confederation there was a wharf there which afforded great facilities to the inhabitants. Since this pier was handed over to the Dominion by the local government, nothing has been done to keep it in repair, and it has nearly all disappeared. This is a very important place, one of the best portions of Prince Edward Island for fish and agricultural produce of all kinds, and lumber. I hope when the Minister considers the appropriations he will decide to do something both at Brae and West Point. I may also refer him to the necessity of an extension to the Miminegash breakwater. This is also a very important place. Some money has been expended there at different times; but to make the work at all a success, a further extension is needed. I am aware that at present repairs are being done to the pier or wharf at Moss shore, Malpeque, as promised last year. The work now going on there is very necessary, and will, when completed, give the people a very good shipping place, if the Minister will carry out his intentions of sending a dredge to that harbour. This is absolutely necessary. I would also call the Minister's attention to Summerside Harbour, which is perhaps the most important shipping place in Prince Edward Island. Some few years ago an engineer was sent there, who surveyed the harbour and made a report. I would like to know from the hon. Minister whether it is the intention of the Government to do anything towards improving the navigation of Summerside Harbour. I believe the proposition was that two piers or breakwaters should be built near the entrance—one running from Indian Head on the south side to the lighthouse, and one from Welland Point to the north side of the channel. I know these works will cost more money than is provided in the present Estimates, or the main Estimates, but as they are very important, I hope they will be favourably considered. While speaking on this matter, I may say that the Government supporters make no secret in saying to our people: If you want anything from the Government, you must return members to support it. They would like the people to believe that is the only way of getting anything like fair play. It is a very immoral doctrine, and with our people it does not go down. They consider public works should be dealt with on their merits. If they are entitled to public grants, these grants should be made whether they elect supporters of the Government or not. There are other important wharfs and breakwaters in Prince County which have been asked for; but when the main Estimates come up I may then draw the hon. gentleman's attention to them. In the meantime, I would like him to say whether it is the intention to do anything with the wharfs or piers I have referred to.

Mr. PERRY. I think I have the right to draw the attention of the Minister of Public Works to a very solemn promise he made last session that during the recess he would send his engineer to Tignish to make a report on the requirements of the harbour. I had drawn his attention to the fact that Tignish was not sufficiently large to give accommodation to the many large fishing boats that come across from Caraquet, Shippegan and other places. The result of these boats coming into the harbour as it is at present is that our own fishing boats sometimes in the mornings cannot be got out. I indicated a plan to the hon. Minister which would remedy that. He seemed to feel sympathy for the people of Tignish, Caraquet and Shippegan, and said that he would send his engineer down as I have stated. I saw his engineer at St. John when I had the pleasure of attending a great Reform meeting there. I thought that really the lion and the lamb were going to lie down together at last. I made no doubt but that he had come there clothed with orders from the Ministers to survey the harbour of Tignish. But he told me that he had no such instructions. I had not thought that the Minister of Public Works would break his promise in that way; I thought that when he made a promise it would be carried out. I am sorry to say that I was disappointed, that I was deceived. The hon. gentleman will not deny that promise he made, because it is in "Hansard." That promise, however, has not been fulfilled. How am I going to tell the people of Tignish that the Minister of Public Works, one of the highest men in the land, broke his word. I know his Government does not get much support from Tignish; but if they expect to get votes from the people of Tignish they should treat them with justice. It will not do to say that the Government have no money. The people of Prince Edward Island believe that the Government have lots of money. We find that they squander not by thousands but by hundreds of thousands. Every one in Prince Edward Island is not so happy as the sugar barons who, acting upon what they tried to learn, laid in enough sugar, before the present tariff came into operation to last them for a year, and thus made $300,000, which the people of Canada will have to pay. The people know that there is the money here and that they have a right to a share of that money. They know that they pay $1,000,000 a year into the exchequer of Canada and that they get back very little over $600,000. My colleague (Mr. Yeo) has stated the shameful and glaring case of West Point. There was a wharf there for which this Government allowed the local government of Prince Edward Island about $6,000 or $7,000. And they have not spent a dollar on it since then. And the result is that the wharf has gone adrift; it is buried in the sand. There may be two or three sticks there but the wharf is not there. It is a monument to the Government's neglect. And we have been asking for protection to this work ever since. The only time they ever pretended to do anything, I believe, was that they made some kind of promise on the eve of the election of 1891. They were ready then to make any promise, but their promises have not been fulfilled. In this case the wharf has gone adrift, some of the planks, I believe, drifted over to the main shore in the county of Kent and were used for fire wood. They have steadily neglected the public works of Prince Edward Island. They are doing some work at Rustico, I believe, and some at Souris, but, Sir, these are not the only places that require to be attended to. It would require an expenditure of $20,000 to make Tignish the harbour of refuge it ought to be. We have not now a harbour of refuge from Alberton all the way around to Summerside. And even at Summerside they are not willing to spend money, though they have been asked to do so, not only by members of the Opposition but by supporters of the Government as well. Sir Richard Hunt, when he attended as a delegate, urged this very strongly upon the Government. But nothing has been done, and they have no intention of doing anything. I asked the Government last year if they intended to dredge the rocks and stones that they had blasted in Cascumpeque harbour. They spent $18,000 there in blasting the rock, and then never removed what they had blasted, so that it has actually made the harbour worse than it was before. That is another monument to the gross neglect of the Government, and particularly to the Department of Public Works. When is this going to stop? When may the people expect justice and fair-play? I can tell when—when the people can get an opportunity to speak in the next general election. My hon. colleague (Mr. Yeo) has brought out very well the case of the Brae. The Public Works department did not vote a dollar until the people began the work, and then they only put up an amount equal to what the people had taxed themselves for. That work, as the hon. Minister knows was wasting away. His report shows that he has not one dollar, either in the main Estimates or supplementaries showing that he is going to repair it. He will let that go to waste as well as the wharf at West Point. There is to be another monument of the injustice done to the people of Prince Edward Island, more particularly the people of West Prince, the county that I have the honour to represent. And I tell the Minister of Public Works that I do not misrepresent the interests and wishes of the people. I talked to the Minister for them, and I might as well talk to the wind. Promises are made and promises are broken. I thought that no honourable man would ever break his promise. As humble as I am, if I made a solemn promise on the floor of this House, I would try to keep it. If I promised here that I would support the Government, bad as they may be, I would do it. I make no doubt that the Minister intends to bring down another Supplementary Estimate. Perhaps there will be an item for $5,000 or $10,000 to build a wharf at West Point, which is very much needed. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that the West Point people live 20 or 25 miles from railway accommodation. It is only a short distance across from West Point to Richibucto or Shediac, where they could carry their canned fish or dried fish and their herring, to market if they had this accommodation. Now they have to travel 25 miles, and pay three times the price in freight which it would cost them to run across with their little schooners if they had shipping accommodation. But the Government will not give them such accommodation. What encouragement have the people to live on the island at all under such an Administration as this? Who can wonder at the continual exodus from Prince Edward Island to the United States? I say that the Government ought to accommodate these people with their own money. The money does not belong to the Government, but it belongs to the people who paid it. And let me tell the Minister of Public Works that the people of Prince Edward Island are not squandering their money the same as a gentleman squandered money two years ago at Chicago. Sir, we do not pay $146 per week for board. We live economically. When we are lucky enough to catch a few fish, we eat them. It is very seldom that we have fat meat. We have to use potatoes and fish, but fish makes brains, and the more that is used the more brains the people will have. If my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works would only resign his seat and go to Tignish, and ask the people to elect him, and make them promises, I have no doubt they would elect him, but what good would that do them? Well, Sir, I think the Minister is going to put a sufficient amount in the Estimates to commence and finish the breakwater at West Point, and he is going to come down with $2,000 or $3,000 to extend the breakwater at Miminegash. Why, I had the promise of the late member for Gloucester, two years ago, that he would help me to get these public works. I spoke to his successor, the present member (Mr. Blanchard), last year, and he said he would help me. But I do not see him in his place, he is not here to represent his county. I have to speak for the people of Caraquet, Shippegan, Pokmouche, and these other places, for he is not here to speak for them. I am sorry to say that, old as I am and weak as I am, I have to represent both the counties of Gloucester and West Prince. However, I hope that the Minister, after he takes a sound sleep, will conclude to render us the justice that we deserve.

Mr. KAULBACH. I was rather amused by the expressions of the senior and junior members for the county of Prince (Mr. Perry and Mr. Yeo) who have just spoken regarding discrimination shown by the Government toward certain counties in the distribution of patronage. I may say that there are several public works in the county I have the honour to represent which require a deal of attention. Appeals have been made to the Government from time to time in their interest, but without avail. I cannot complain that all my requests were not heeded, because a number of them were acceded to, and much appreciated. With regard to the hon. gentlemen I have mentioned, as well as the hon. gentleman for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser), that if it were not for the twinkle of their eye and the curl of their lip, you would imagine that they were really serious in the remarks they have made. They charge the Government with dealing unfairly, in recognizing the interests of their political friends, while turning their backs upon their opponents. Now, that charge comes with bad grace from the hon. member for Guysboro' for if he is correctly reported, when he went up west a few months ago, he and his friends were making pledges from time to time at every stopping place all the way to the Pacific coast. I am not going to say that he was correctly reported, but if he was, I think his charges against the Government are most unfair. Now, the hon. member for the county of King's (Mr. Borden), a few minutes ago referred to me as having ejaculated during the course of his remarks. He was wholly in error in using my name. I made no expression such as he mentioned. Perhaps it may have come from a neighbour of the hon. gentleman on the other side. However, I may say I fully justify the remark that was made, and consider it perfectly fair on the part of the Government to deal with their friends as well as they possibly can. When hon. gentlemen opposite reflect upon the manner in which the local government have dealt with their friends in various constituencies, I think they will feel satisfied that this Government have only been following their example in looking after their friends instead of their foes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have felt a little disgusted and humiliated at the description given by the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) of the pusillanimous conduct of certain Liberal leaders who were advertised to appear in the hon. gentleman's county last fall, and whom, it seems, showed the white feather. I gather from the hon. gentleman's remarks that in some way or other those Liberal leaders had discovered—

Mr. CAMERON. No; I said the political heelers who invited them there discovered.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)—I think the hon. gentleman read a placard setting forth that certain Liberal leaders were advertised to speak at a large agricultural gathering; but although the hon. gentleman, the doughty champion of the Conservative faith, had determined to meet them there in mortal combat, he ran away, and hon. gentlemen could not catch him. I am sorry for the disappointment.

An hon. MEMBER. They are still running.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I remember a curious commentary. Some not very distinguished members of the Liberal party went down to the hon. gentleman's county—I happened to be one of them myself—and held two or three meetings, and all the king's horses, and all the king's men could not find the hon. gentleman. We had a meeting at Hawkesbury, and hoped to see the hon. gentleman, but failed to do so. Then we had a meeting at Whycomagh, a large and enthusiastic meeting, at which the hon. gentleman was expected; some of his lieutenants were there, but the hon. gentleman himself did not appear. Then we travelled up to Port Hood, and held a meeting in the court-house, and the hon. gentleman discovered on the morning of that day that he had an important engagement thirty miles away, and he could not be found, to the regret of the people. The report had been circulated there that the hon. member was going to meet Liberal leaders and challenge them to mortal combat before his own constituents. But I am sorry the hon. gentleman thought discretion the better part of valour, and took to the woods. I should have been delighted to have met him and to have discussed public questions as we do here. I hope, if I have the opportunity of going down to Inverness again that he will not have an engagement in another part of the county. The hon. gentleman knew when the Liberal representatives were going to be there, because he has carried round the placard in his pocket from that day to this, for some particular reason. I hope when we go there again the hon. gentleman will treat us more generously, and meet us in open discussion; but as to the leaders who went and advertised a public meeting, and when they heard it was the hon. gentleman's intention to be present, ran away, I hope he will not disgrace them by naming them.

Mr. CAMERON. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., was one of them—the prospective Minister of Justice.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am very sorry I was not aware that I had been advertised. How was it, however, that when the hon. member for Queen's was duly advertised, my hon. friend did not make it convenient to be present.

Mr. CAMERON. He was not invited to attend, and the notice shows that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) We had men scouring the county to try and find him. I passed his house and his office, I went through the surrounding district, and all we could hear was that in the early morning at day light he was seen making a bee line for a distant part of the county, pleading that he had an engagement. I now want to call attention to a speech which the Minister of Public Works is reported to have made in the town of Guysboro', when there last fall, in which he laid down a doctrine that is politically immoral, and a doctrine which is contrary to that laid down by him from time to time in this House, when he meets his opponents and to which he subscribes his vote. The hon. gentleman went down to Guysboro', and we have it in evidence that the candidate carried him round on exhibition like a bear. This was done by Mr. Forbes, the Conservative candidate. The Minister went there, and declared not that he would give a special grant for special purposes which Mr. Forbes demanded on the platform, but he pledged that they would receive due consideration. But what doctrine did the hon. gentleman lay down? He said that if any of his hearers had a trust to administer and a large sum of money to be divided among certain parties, they would certainly select first their friends, and pay the money to them. I venture to remark that if the hon. gentleman lived in my province and so administered a trust he would be apt to find himself behind the bars for malfeasance and breach of trust. And the hon. gentleman was himself correct in saying that he was administering a public trust when he was advising the paying out of public money. But in stating that he would appropriate public funds to his friends, he made a statement and enunciated a doctrine which was repudiated by this House as a whole. Hon. gentlemen will remember public works and other departments became so disgraceful that public attention had to be called to it in the most marked manner, and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) moved a resolution setting out that "in the expenditure of public money, public interest and not party favouritism should control." That motion was supported by such ample illustration and argument that the leader of the House, the anniversary of whose death was commemorated yesterday, announced that he could not oppose the principle of the resolution, and accepted it, and all the members of the party voted in favour of the principle on which public money should be expended. That was supposed to embody the governing and guiding principle in all the spending departments hereafter; and yet the Minister of Public Works went down to this county, just before the time when an election was supposed to be about to be held, and announced a policy directly at variance to the policy to which the House agreed; and this is something which should be most severely condemned. The hon. Minister should have an opportunity either of disallowing the report of his speech or defending it in this House. It was published in every newspaper in Nova Scotia; I go further and say that it was published in every paper in the maritime provinces, and it remains to-day uncontradicted, so far as I have been able to see, by the hon. gentleman, and that speech contains, politically immoral doctrines, doctrines calculated to destroy the efficiency of the public service, unjust and unfair doctrines, and doctrines directly contrary to the declaration of principles proposed by this side of the House, and adopted unanimously by the whole House.

Mr. CAMERON. The hon. member for Queen's has referred to his tour through Inverness. That placard speaks for itself. No Conservative was invited to speak at either public meeting. "Liberal leaders will address the electors of Inverness in the court-house at Port Hood on Wednesday, 12th inst., at 11 a.m., and in the hall at Whycocomagh, the 11th," was visible on the placard. But the intention of the tourists are easy seen throughout the advertisement if we read between the lines. I will tell the hon. gentleman one thing so that he may not forget it. I shall hold some public meetings in Inverness before the next general elections. I shall be most happy to meet the tourists at such public meetings, as I shall convene. I invite the senior member for Queen's, the Premier of Nova Scotia, and the hon. member for Guysboro', and such other Liberal leaders as they desire to bring into the county; and I shall do a little better with them, and give them as much time to discuss public questions as the Conservatives will get on those occasions. I think that is fairer treatment to them than I receive at their hands. If they give me any such invitations as that, they will find I would meet them at the places at which they are pleased to meet their friends, and where they hope to have a majority.

Mr. OUIMET. The hon. gentleman has been kind enough to pay me a compliment before he read me that dreadful lecture on what he calls the immoral principles I proclaimed to the electors of Guysboro'. He had to admit that I never made any promises to them, and he says that when we are before him we do him justice. Probably he means that I have been doing justice towards his electors and his county. All I said in Guysboro', and it is a very important thing to remember, was this: I said that every year my department was given a certain sum of money which the country can afford for public works, and mentioning especially the public works and harbour improvements in the maritime provinces. I said: Unfortunately, I must admit that the amount I have at my disposal is quite insufficient to do justice to every part of the country. Being in that position, I said plainly, that after all, things being equal, that they should not be surprised if our friends were served first. I said "things being equal."

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is the rule, is it?

Mr. OUIMET. My hon. friends on the other side may say, that, things being equal, they ought to be served first. But what would be the use for us to be generous to that foolish extent, as the only compliment from them would be that we did it through cowardice, and that we did not dare to do justice to our own friends, and that we gave them favours, and spent every dollar of money to appease our opponents, in order. I suppose, to keep their mouths closed. Well, we won't do that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You never have.

Mr. OUIMET. At least, I am not one of those who will do that. If I cannot provide for every harbour in the lower provinces, I shall take first the most important harbours, and when the main Estimates come before the House, I shall prove that all important places in the maritime provinces, whether they be represented by Liberals or Conservatives, were first provided for.

Mr. CAMERON. Look at Yarmouth.

Mr. OUIMET. Yes, look at Yarmouth. $10,000 were spent in the improvement of Yarmouth Harbour during this present year. As all cannot be served at the same time our friends shall be served first, all things being equal, and our opponents shall come next.

Mr. FRASER. That is all we want.

Mr. OUIMET. Well, we will do that, and I think the Government—

Mr. FRASER. I mean that all we want is to have that statement on record.

Mr. OUMET. Well, when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, they were very careful never to serve us.

Mr. CAMERON. That is correct.

Mr. OUMET. If there is any immorality in what I have said, I would like to know it. I know very well that hon. gentlemen opposite would always find some way of blaming us. Sometimes they say we spend too much money, and sometimes they say we do not spend enough. They will always find fault, but we have gone on, and the country has gone on, without consulting them very much for the last fifteen years, and, if they continue preaching morality as they do, I think the country will go on for twenty-five years more without taking much stock in their professions.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Ouimet) has spoken with a very great deal of frankness, and his speech is in perfect accord with the practice of his department, but that speech is directly in the teeth of the resolution for which the hon. gentleman voted. That resolution says :

That in the expenditure of public money the public interest, and not party favouritism should control.

The hon. gentleman says to-night that party interests shall control.

Mr. OUMET. I did not.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman said to-night, that he will serve his friends first.

Mr. OUMET. Yes, "things being equal."

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is the position which the hon. gentleman has taken. And he has never enough money voted for the necessary public works over the country, therefore, the time will never come, so long as the hon. gentleman is in office, when the constituencies represented by hon. members of the Opposition can be served at all. The hon. gentleman talked about things being equal. Has the hon. gentleman acted upon the assumption that the expenditures are made in constituencies represented on this side of the House, only in cases where things are equal. Has not the hon. gentleman asked for an appropriation for public buildings in Petrolia, but has he asked for an appropriation for public buildings in Sarnia? He has not done so, although the Government collect twice the amount of revenue in Sarnia that it does in Petrolia. Have you preferred Petrolia to Sarnia because the public interests are superior in Petrolia? No, but it is because the constituency in which Sarnia is situated is represented by an hon. gentleman on this side of the House, while the constituency in which Petrolia is situated is represented by a supporter of the Government. That is what the hon. gentleman calls equality. Why, the hon. gentleman has appropriated money for post offices in villages in which there are not a thousand people, and in which there are not a thousand dollars collected, and he has failed to erect a public building in the city of Woodstock, where the Government collects nearly $50,000 revenue, and where a public building would be in the public interest. The hon. gentleman calls that equality. Laprairie, with a population of 400, and a contribution of $400 a year to the post office, gets a public building, but the town of Woodstock does not. Is that in the public interest? I could go all over the country and I could show that the hon. gentleman in his conduct has not taken into consideration the question of equality at all. The year before last, I brought under the hon. gentleman's attention that the navigation of the river in my constituency had been destroyed, and the hon. gentleman said: Yes, I will see to removing those obstructions. I will have the matter attended to at once. I so wrote to my constituents, and I communicated the letter which the hon. gentleman had sent me. I supposed the hon. gentleman would keep his engagements, and that he meant what he had said. But the twelve months went by and nothing was done. I mentioned it to the hon. gentleman last year, and he said that he was in doubt whether the matter was in his department or under the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, then the present Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). I spoke to both gentlemen, and the promise was given by both. But I do not happen to be on that side of the House; and, although I called their attention to the fact that the port of Wallaceburg was one of the most important in the whole Dominion, considering the amount of tonnage that arrived and departed, up to this hour nothing has been done, although the promise was repeated last year. The hon. gentleman says that is keeping faith with this side of the House and acting in the public interest. Do the facts which I have mentioned correspond with that statement? Now, Sir, in my opinion the Government are trustees for the public, the money they are expending is not the money of the Government or the money of the Tory party; it is the money of the people of Canada, and by their oaths of office and by every principle of honour which should govern the conduct of public men, the Government are bound to consider and to consider only the public interests in its expenditure. Does the hon. gentleman act upon that assumption? I say, Sir, from first to last he has wholly disregarded that consideration. At this moment he has boasted that he intends to act upon a different principle. He says: The House did not give me money enough to expend in every portion of the Dominion where public money is required to be spent, and, therefore, I must look after my own friends first, and spend money in constituencies represented on this side of the House. That is the doctrine the hon. gentleman laid down.

Mr. OUMET.

Mr. OUMET. As they must be served in turn.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Whose turn? The hon. gentleman says that according to the appropriations he receives the turn of members on this side of the House shall never come. While the Government have a right to appoint officials from their own party for administrative work—and so far as these appointments are concerned, I have no fault to find—yet the fact that the public have entrusted them with the administration of public affairs makes them trustees, not for a party, but for the whole people, and that trust I say has not been discharged. If a return is brought down, every member of this House will see how representatives on this side have been treated. Why, Sir, the negroes in the South in the days of slavery were dealt with as fairly as the Government have dealt with us. There is nothing to ostracise men, to humiliate them, if possible to crush out and destroy an independent public sentiment, that the hon. gentleman's department could do with the expenditure of public money that has not been done; and when you go upon the public platform you are prepared to say to the people: If you want a man who will obtain for you the expenditure of money for necessary public works in your constituency, why, just send a man who will support the Administration. The Government assume to be the masters of the people of this country instead of their trustees, their servants; they are not Ministers, but masters; that is the position they take. It is a position to which the people of this country might submit when a man of large experience and great ability was at the head of the Conservative party; but hon. gentlemen will find that they cannot play the role of Sir John Macdonald in this matter. What people would submit to at his hands they will not submit to at the hands of the Minister of Public Works; and when he undertakes to deal in the unfair way he has, and which he has scarcely concealed in the statement he has made—

Mr. OUMET. The hon. gentleman cannot substantiate his statement, that I have dealt unfairly with any constituency, because it was Liberal.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). You admitted it.

Mr. OUMET. I did not admit it. I said that in point of fact I could prove that every constituency has been fairly dealt with, and that some Liberal constituencies have been perhaps more liberally dealt with than some Conservative constituencies.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Well, I put this question to the hon. gentleman again. How is it you are undertaking to erect public buildings in East Lambton and none in West Lambton? You collect more revenues in West Lambton, and yet you erect a post office at Fairfield in East Lambton, with 800 inhabitants, and none in Woodstock with 10,000?

Mr. OUMET. That is ancient history.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is modern history; it is the state of things at this hour. The hon. gentleman knows that he has not dealt fairly with the constituencies represented by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) One would imagine, to hear the hon. gentleman, that the Government did nothing at all for hon. gentlemen opposite and their friends. I can instance a case in my own province to show the reverse. In my own county I wanted some money expended by the Government, and I could not get it because, forsooth, my neighbour from Queen's had to get an expenditure in his county; so I had to wait my turn, and I trust that the Minister of Public Works will not overlook that very extensive work in Prince Edward Island—the Souris breakwater, which will require a large expenditure this year, not only as a harbour for the people of that locality, but as a harbour of refuge for the fishermen of Prince Edward Island and those of Nova Scotia. It is the only harbour on very many miles of coast and within easy reach of the fishing grounds. I think the hon. member for Bothwell has altogether misrepresented the intentions of the Minister of Public Works and the expression he used. Of course, it is well known that the public money granted from year to year is not sufficient for all the public works of the country, and he must take them in turn as they come.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I speak of pledges and promises made.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's). What he cannot accomplish in one year will come in its turn the next. That has been the case with us in Prince Edward Island, and no difference has been made between the counties represented by Conservatives and those represented by Liberals. In this connection I trust that the Minister, when he comes to the regular vote for the coming year, will see that provision is made for keeping up the breakwater at Souris.

Mr. FOSTER. It is amusing to listen for a little while to the high-flown morality and eloquence of the hon. member for Bothwell, and then to cite a fact which is under his own nose, and which might have been patent to himself while he was engaged in delivering his lecture. Here in harbours and rivers we have a vote of less than $10,000, of which $5,000 is to go to a county represented by a Grit member.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I wish to correct the hon. member for Bothwell, who took a very unfair liberty with me, and I am surprised that he would make such a statement on the floor of this House. He stated, if I understood aright, that he had brought to my attention the condition of a river in Ontario, and I had made a promise to him which I had never carried out. The reference that I remember last year on the subject was made across the floor. The first thing I did after that discussion was to refer to the discussion and the date to the hon. chief engineer of Marine and Fisheries and ask him to do what he could to remove these snags and floating timber. I subsequently informed the hon. gentleman personally of the difficulties, as shown by the reports of the officers of the department. The want of success in connection with entering into arrangements, after inviting tenders for doing the work in a certain way, retarded the carrying out of the plan as first suggested by the chief engineer. At this moment I cannot recollect the exact stage which the transaction has reached when I left the department, but I think if the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to move for the papers in the matter, he will find I followed up the work as well as I possibly could. I do not think the hon. gentleman, after hearing my explanation, should allow this statement to stand.

Rivière du Sud—Protection works at Montmagny $5,000

Mr. OUIMET. Montmagny cannot complain of any want of favour.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not consider the Government are doing a favour to Montmagny but simply paying a debt.

Mr. OUIMET. A great many people do not pay their debts. I think it is a very good thing to pay one's debts.

Mr. LAURIER. I hope the Government of Canada is not reduced to the position of claiming great credit when it pays a debt.

To complete payment for steam communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, during the season of 1894, as per terms of contract..... $500

Mr. FOSTER. This is part of the subsidy voted for a line of communication in Prince Edward Island, between the island and the mainland. The steamer "Electra" went to quite a number of places and a vote was passed in Parliament, but a difficulty arose regarding the wording of the vote and the subsidy as earned. The Attorney General refused to pay because the wording did not carry out the intention we had in passing the vote.

Mr. FOSTER.

To pay the Bay of Fundy Steamship Company for services performed in the month of June, 1893, between St. John, Digby and Annapolis.....$910 42

Mr. FOSTER. This is a vote of the same nature as the former one. A vote for the service was made upon a certain schedule, involving a certain number of trips. After the vote had passed, the schedule was changed with my own knowledge, allowing the boat, instead of making a certain number of trips for five months, to make less in the first month and a half and more during the succeeding two and a half months. There was the same number of trips but the distribution was different.

To pay the Furness Line for services between St. John, Halifax and London, in January, 1892..... $1,000

Mr. FOSTER. That arose in this way. The Furness line was under a contract to give us a certain number of trips. The number of trips was given, in fact more than the number of trips, but in this one case the vessel came to Halifax but did not make her trip to the city of St. John. She loaded at Halifax instead and went back to London. I refused to pay because the company did not make the full trip. Correspondence ensued. They pleaded certain reasons why they did not go to St. John, and pretended that their neglect ought not to prejudice their claim to the subsidy. Finally I said I would give them $1,000 to end the matter. They refused at first, but afterwards concluded to take the money, and this amount is asked to carry out my promise.

To pay the Yarmouth Steamship Company for steam communication between St. John and Halifax, via Yarmouth, during the season of 1894..... $7,000

Mr. FOSTER. That is exactly the amount voted in the main Estimate for the current year. A contract was entered into between the department and the Yarmouth Steamship Company, and the terms of the contract were different from the terms upon which the service had been carried on for years, and upon which the company proposed to carry it out. They had no idea of carrying out the service on any different terms. They received a local subsidy from the Nova Scotia Government, I think, for a number of years. The contract, however, as it was signed, prevented the Auditor General from paying a single dollar of the subsidy, and this is to re-word the appropriation and bring it into harmony with the service actually performed, and exactly on the same lines as those on which it has been performed for the last eight or ten years. It is practically $7,000 voted and not paid.

Mr. BOWERS. What places has the boat to call at?

Mr. FOSTER. St. John, Yarmouth and Halifax are the objective points, besides

Shelburne and Lunenburg, and I am not sure what others on the south coast.

Mr. BOWERS. Is Westport included ?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. BOWERS. Two years ago ?

Mr. FOSTER. There were a great many difficulties in connection with that. It was found impossible to call at Westport and do the service. Westport has not been a port of call for the last two or three years.

Mr. BOWERS. A boat stops there right along for which the local government pays a subsidy. The hon. members for St. John Lunenburg, Queen's and Yarmouth waited on the then Minister of Trade and Commerce, now First Minister, and stated the case, showing how Westport was situated, and $2,000 was granted, making the vote $7,000.

Mr. BOWERS. It was reduced to $5,000 and then increased to $7,000. I hope the hon. gentleman will see the necessity of making Westport one of the ports of call.

To pay Roderick McDonald balance on account of steamship service between Port Mulgrave, Arichat, and Canso, Guysboro' and Port Hood, from 1893 to 1895.. $3,000

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Macdonald was paid for several years at the rate of $5,000 per annum under a vote for that service. That was eventually reduced to $4,000, together with an additional $1,000 paid by the Post Office Department out of its general appropriation. From 1893 the Post Office Department ceased to pay the sum, and this is to recoup Macdonald for the three years during which the Post Office Department has not paid him.

Mr. FRASER. Were the mails carried ? Did the Minister say that this carried the mails from Port Mulgrave to Guysboro' ?

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot say whether he does or not. I am rather inclined to think that the reason the Post Office Department refused to pay the $1,000 was that the mails were sent another way. But as the contract was that he was to receive $5,000, we are bound to pay it.

Mr. FRASER. I wish to urge in connection with this—

Mr. FOSTER. We will have another item in the main Estimates for this service. Let any discussion take place then.

Mr. FRASER. All right.

Additional amount required for Winter Mail Service $1,000

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Where is the winter mail service ?

Mr. FOSTER. By ice boats.

To provide a gratuity to the widow of the late Wm. Smith, who lost his life in the attempt to save the Government buoy adrift from Portuguese shoals during the storm of the 15th April, 1895..... $500

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is it customary to give these gratuities ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Always.

Mr. COSTIGAN. This man leaves eleven dependent children. He lost his life in attempting to save Government property.

Mr. FRASER. The vote is too small.

To provide the widow of the late J. R. Spencer, the amount of one year's salary due that officer while employed as an observer in Fort Churchill in 1885.. $120
To provide for the refund of fines imposed on the owner of the "Golden City." 200

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Did Mr. Spencer lose his life while at Fort Churchill ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It was not until after his death that a claim was put in by his widow, that one year's salary had not been paid to him, and, on reference to the accounts of the department, this was found to be the case.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the meaning of this refund of fines imposed on the "Golden City" ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Charges were brought against these parties and fines imposed. Representations were made to the department that the offences were not at all serious. The fines were paid. In view of the fact that the offences were not serious, and that the parties pleaded guilty, it was thought that $200 might be refunded.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman did not state the offence.

Mr. COSTIGAN. They were offences under the Steamboat Inspections Act. Sometimes these offences are considered serious, but in this case they were only minor breaches of the law.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What were the offences—I do not remember the case.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I could not say.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This was at Peterborough. This is the return of one fine inflicted.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It says "fines." You had better take out the "s."

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is all right as it is.

Mr. FRASER. There may be a distribution of this $200 over all. It might involve an important question if there were ten of them and this $200 were spread over them shortly before election time.

To provide additional amount for legal expenses, including prosecutions re Fishing Bounty frauds..... $4,600

Mr. FLINT. This is a large amount, and I think the House ought to have some information now. Or, if there is an appropriation in the main Estimates—

Mr. FOSTER. There is. Discussion can be had then.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the hon. gentleman had better let this item for fishing bounties stand.

Mr. FOSTER. The whole question can come up on the main Estimate and full discussion take place then.

Mr. BOWERS. I may not be here then. Is this for legal expenses that have been incurred?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. BOWERS. In the Municipal Council of Digby, I notice an item of $88.35, paid in connection with the prosecution of some of these bounty cases. Will that be refunded to the council?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, not necessarily. This is for taxed costs. I may just take a moment to say that it was in my time as Minister of Marine and Fisheries that a vigorous prosecution, which resulted, on the whole, successfully, was inaugurated. The most gigantic frauds were being perpetrated on the department. We sent several of the offenders to jail.

Mr. FORBES. Some escaped.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Some escaped, as the hon. gentleman says. Still, the results have been most encouraging. In the prosecutions in Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the expenses were beyond the appropriation.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Were any practical results obtained to offset the expenditure?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Indeed there were, in one case we were just in time to prevent $5,000 from being misappropriated.

Mr. BOWERS. Will this amount be repaid to the council?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, why should it be?

Mr. BOWERS. My attention has been called to this matter by letter. They say it was not right that this should be thrown on the county of Digby, particularly as the trial turned out a farce. One or two of the accused were sent to jail for 24 hours, but the principal malefactors escaped altogether.

Mr. FRASER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Who is the judge?

Mr. BOWERS. I do not know.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You do not know much about the case.

Mr. BOWERS. The fishery officer called my attention to a case which I brought before the department one or two years ago. A customs officer was getting a bounty for fishing, in a ten foot boat, and yet nothing was done against him. It is not fair that the county should have to pay these taxes in such a case as this.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That case is familiar to me. The judge gave him sentence of 12 hours, I think.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understand from my hon. friend that the sentence was not carried out, that while the judge inflicted the sentence, the prosecutor did not see that it was carried out, and the sentence remains unfulfilled to this day.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What have we to do with it? He is not in our charge after that. We prosecute a man, and he is convicted. We can do nothing after that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the prosecutor applies to the magistrate to have the necessary warrant issued, it must be issued, but the magistrate won't issue it of his own motion. I quite agree in what the hon. gentleman has said, that the administration of these fishing bounties has been marked by disgraceful frauds.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I did not say that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman used stronger language than that.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not that the administration had been marked by fraud. I said that gigantic frauds had been perpetrated.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The fact of the matter is that connected with the administration of this fund, there has grown up a huge system of fraud and wrong-doing that has been known to the department, and known to everybody throughout the maritime provinces, and it has been so stated in this House for the last eight or ten years. Now, I commended the hon. gentleman when, as Minister of Marine and Fisheries, he took vigorous steps to put that down. There was a time when we were laughed at from this side of the House for making the statement that enormous sums were paid to the people who were no more entitled to them than the babe in the cradle; that false and forged certificates were put in; that men who were connected with the Conservative party almost made a trade of obtaining public money fraudulently out of this fund. It became a matter of notorious disgrace. I was glad when the department took it up, and I believe a large amount of energy was shown by the head of the department, and was sought to be infused into his subordinate officers in carrying out those prosecutions. But they were frustrated at every step. The hon. gentleman found the local members were too strong for him, and he found, from one reason or another, that the prosecutions became a farce. Now, I would like to have submitted to this House a statement of the number of prosecutions that were brought, the number of convictions that were obtained, and above all the number of convictions that were carried out, after they were obtained, and how many men were really punished. Very few men were really punished. I heard it talked about last year when I took a trip through the maritime provinces, laughed at all over the coast—the manner in which the public officials were imposed upon, and the manner in which those who ought to have known better, winked at it. I am sorry to say that the fishery officers and inspectors themselves have been criminally lax in this matter, and have allowed public money to be paid to men when they ought to have known if they did not know, and the means was within their knowledge to lead them to the conclusion, that these men were not entitled to the money. But they winked at it, they kept the department hoodwinked, and nothing that could be said would open the eyes of the department until a year or two ago, when the representations became so strong that the department had to take action. I commended the department for the action they took. I was glad to see the prosecutions. I say that every honest fisherman who earns this grant or bounty, looks with disgust upon the dishonest men who obtain it by political favouritism, but who are not entitled to it; and they will join in the effort to punish these fraudulent wrong-doers. I believe myself the secret spring of the wrong lies in the fishery officers who wink at this wrong-doing, and make use of the money for political purposes. It is known and talked about everywhere that such is the fact. But my main object now is to obtain, either to-night or before this vote passes, a statement showing the number of prosecutions, the number of convictions obtained, and the sentences that were carried out, together with the names of the parties. It will have a most salutary effect all over the maritime provinces where this fund is distributed, if these names are published. It will have an excellent effect if it becomes known that a man who is guilty of obtaining money fraudulently from this bounty fund, will be punished, no matter whether he votes Liberal or Conservative. I do not mean to say that the fishermen as a class are parties to this fraud, but there is an inside class among them of fraudulent, wrong-doing men, who take advantage of their votes to obtain money illegally, and then perhaps try to curry favour with the inspectors or other fishery officers to save themselves from prosecution and punishment.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. While I anticipate this subject will bear discussion, it is only fair for me to say with reference to the fishery officers, that they do not deserve anything like the extravagant denunciatory language of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. I was in that department from 1888 until this year, I went through the whole of this business, I saw all the complaints, I investigated every statement that was made of alleged fraud, and the frauds were not traced to the fishery officers.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not say the frauds could be traced to the fishery officers; I said to the laxity of the administration of the officers.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have no recollection now of a single instance that would justify the language that was used, that the fishery officers, inspectors and others, as the hon. gentleman said, had connived at this fraud, and had used this fund for political purposes.

Mr. FORBES. Why is it that George Bishop, the present collector at Digby, under conviction for fraudulent practices under this Fishery Act, has not been committed?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not remember the sentence at the moment, and I do not think the hon. gentleman does. But all these cases are to be brought down, every case the hon. gentleman wants will be included in the fisheries report. Speaking from memory, the case of Bishop was tried in the county court of Digby, and, I think, there has never been a sentence imposed upon him. It is an extraordinary case. The facts are laid before Parliament, and that is as far as we can go. We prosecuted that man, and the whole incidents of the trial were laid bare. I rose, however, to defend the fishery officers and the inspectors as a class from the aspersions cast upon them by the hon. gentleman. If he refers to Nova Scotia, I can tell him he is wholly wrong. If he refers to Prince Edward Island, I believe him to be wrong, because there is nothing that has come within reach of the department that would justify such a wholesale charge as that these men were guilty of misconduct, if not of fraud. These charges used to be made across the floor of this House in the days of Mr. McIntyre, but every case that he brought to my notice was thoroughly in-investigated, and the reputation of the fishery officers stood the investigation, and I believe will stand it. In Nova Scotia there is no such opinion as the hon. gentleman speaks of—that every one talks about the fishery officers using the bounty fund for political purposes, and conniving at fraud. A more serious statement could hardly be made.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman mean to tell me—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to finish my remarks? He can speak when I get through.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman has made a charge against me.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I ask you, Mr. Chairman, to direct the hon. gentleman to take his seat.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I rise to a point of order. It is not usual, when a member rises and asks to be allowed to make an explanation, for a Minister to get into a tantrum in the way the hon. gentleman did.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I rise to a point of order. I will not submit to this sort of language.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member for Queen's may state his point of order.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) My point of order is this. The hon. gentleman has charged me with having said that which I did not say.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is no point of order in that. The hon. gentleman did charge the fishery inspectors and fishery officers, in some part of this country, I assume—he did not name the province—with being so notoriously connected with these bounty frauds, and so notoriously using this bounty system for political purposes, that it was the common talk, wherever he went in the provinces.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I say that if the hon. gentleman has information of that kind, it is his duty to make a specific statement in this House, so that action can be taken upon it, particularly when I say that the files of the Fisheries Department will show that every charge of that kind has been thoroughly investigated, and the character of the fishery officers has been proved to be as good as could be expected or desired. There have been officers guilty of wrong-doing, but they have been punished, and some of them have been dismissed. But I say that as a class, the fishery officers, particularly those concerned in the administration of the bounty, gave,

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

in my time, every possible satisfaction to me as the head of the department. Every case reported to me that had the smell of fraud, was investigated, and every case where we could obtain evidence of crime, was put into the hands of the Justice Department for prosecution. I gave directions before I left the department, to see that these cases which had not met with conviction and punishment, should be mentioned in the report. I call on the hon. gentleman either to withdraw these charges against respectable men, many of whom I know, and who have been engaged in the fishery service in Nova Scotia, and against others in other provinces whom I know not to the same extent, or to name the men who are tainted with fraud who have been guilty of misconduct, and place the committee of the Government in possession of that information. These men are not in the House, but they are entitled to fair-play, and their characters are as dear to them as the character of hon. members are dear to them.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman must not get into tantrums; I made no specific charge.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I ask it to be made.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The administration of this department has been such that huge frauds have been committed during several years in the payment of these moneys.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. On the part of the officers?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do not interrupt me.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Do not get into tantrums.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman said that huge frauds were proved to exist, amounting to thousands of dollars. Does the hon. Minister mean to say that, if the fishery overseers had discharged their duty, these frauds would have existed year after year?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Those frauds have been notorious for years. They were brought to the attention of Parliament by Mr. McIntyre some five or six years ago, when he showed that hundreds of cases of fraud existed in King's County, and he read 25 or 30 cases in this House. And who was to blame? Was it not well known, and was it not charged that the men themselves were not so much to blame as were the fishery officers, that many of the fishermen were induced to put in their claims by officers of the Government, who knew at the time that the claims were not valid?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Name one single officer.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am not going to name one.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Then why asperse the officers?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman knows that these frauds amounted to thousands of dollars.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not in the case of the fishery officers.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) To what extent the fishery officers may have been concerned or been parties, I cannot say, nor can the Government. I speak of the general impression prevailing all through the province that bounties have been paid in years gone by. I believe the system has been improved since the Government has compelled the declaration to be made in a different way; but the fact remains that thousands of dollars have been defrauded out of the public in this manner, and this sum must have been defrauded either by the crass negligence or the willing connivance of the officers. The hon. gentleman said that effective measures were taken. I want to know the names of parties against whom action has been taken.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Every information of that kind will be supplied.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman will, no doubt, tell me to wait until the fishery report is brought down; he knows that necessarily it is brought down at about the end of the session. Before we vote this money the returns should be brought down, so that hon. members may be able to see not only how many men were convicted and how many prosecutions proved abortive, but also how many convictions were carried out, and then we will be able to judge how far there is effective administration of the department, designed not to punish offenders, but to vindicate the law.

Mr. FORBES. I have listened to the remarks made by the Minister of Justice in regard to this question. His memory must be short, if he does not recollect that specific charges have been made against fishery officers.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is not my statement.

Mr. FORBES. The Minister stated that the charge made by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., was that a great many of the frauds charged against the Government were due either to the shirking of duty on the part of the fishery officers or to direct connivance by the officers in the commission of the frauds. The Minister attempts to justify the acts of his officers. Surely, the Minister must have forgotten the case of A. C. Hockin, fishery inspector on the south shore of Nova Scotia, in which the Minister refused to pay the bounty in a certain case of J. J. Hubley, and prosecuted and subsequently persecuted this man, and brought a charge of perjury against him. The whole defence was contained in an affidavit which was filed, written in the handwriting of the fishery officer; but the officer would not come forward and give evidence. I could not get him there. However, the grand jury discharged the defendants. It was proved that he swore he made a sworn statement on the advice of the officer. Another case was that of Kenney. He misappropriated money, and was discharged for negligence of duty and otherwise neglecting his office. Further, I can make special reference to the fishery officers in the county of Queen's. Between 1st January and 17th May, there was but one inspection made at the lobster factories. The charge was made that men favourable to the Government were curing lobsters that were under size, as small as 5½ and 6 inches, two of them being put together to make a full-sized lobster. This complaint was brought to the notice of the officers, and they deliberately overlooked it, and only made one visit between the dates I have mentioned. The matter was again brought to their attention, and it was mentioned that this packing of undersized lobsters was constantly going on. The answer of the officer was; If men make a specific charge in writing, we will have it investigated. There is one packer who is anxious to conform to the law, and he has made reports to the department that the law was being violated in this respect by other rival packers, but he cannot get the officer to inquire into these violations. He says he cannot attempt to compete with these packers who are allowed to catch undersized fish of five or six inches.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What has that to do with the bounty. This is only an ex-parte statement.

Mr. FORBES. Every man in Nova Scotia is anxious to conform to and observe the law. If I understand the inspector's duties aright, it is to watch that the laws are not violated. If they are to draw their salaries and do nothing, the sooner we know it the better. While I believe that some officers of the Department of Marine and Fisheries do all that is required of them under the law, yet there are others who do not. I must say that when an honest citizen is endeavouring to conform to the laws of the country, and lays a complaint before the officers of the department, it should be looked into, and he should not be told to lay the information in writing and to enter a prosecution himself. I have cited those instances to justify the statement made by my hon. friend (Mr. Davies).

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is only one remark of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Forbes) that I will notice. He referred to Mr. Hockin. I know Mr. Hockin as well as I know the hon. gentleman, and I believe him to be as honourable a man as is to be found in the Dominion of Canada. I venture to make this prophecy: That the hon. gentleman from Queen's (Mr. Forbes) will not put over his signature in a paper in this country, the statement that will be found reported in "Hansard," and which he is privileged to make; with regard to Mr. Hockin's conduct in connection with that prosecution. I never heard of this before, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Forbes) never made that charge officially to me. The hon. member from Guysboro (Mr. Fraser) knows Mr. Hockin, and he can speak as to his character. Every one in the county in which he lives, on either side of political life, will join me in the statement that I make as to the integrity of Mr. Hockin's character. And for whom is the hon. gentleman (Mr. Forbes) pleading? For two miscreants, or one of them I forget which, against whom the grand jury would not fill a bill it is true, but who are black listed in the Department of Fisheries on account of their known frauds, and who under the general rule are debarred from it. This is the case the hon. gentleman brings up here, and for the first time he mentions Mr. Hockin in the connection in which he has mentioned him, and then he runs off to tell us in regard to some who are violating the law with regard to lobsters. I have no doubt the Minister of Marine will act upon that information. I have no doubt that he will inquire fully into the matter and see that those people are prosecuted if they are violating the law. But what has that to do with the very serious statement made in regard to these fishery officers as a class?

Mr. FORBES. Pardon me for one moment. I did not want to reflect in any way upon the conduct of Mr. Hockin.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Your language did, seriously.

Mr. FORBES. I know Mr. Hockin as well as the Minister of Justice does. I will put over my signature and lay it before the hon. Minister too, the fact that Mr. Hockin drew, in his own handwriting, a form of affidavit for this fisherman to write out, and swear to, and that the fisherman did it word for word as Mr. Hockin drew the draft. That affidavit was sent to the Minister and upon it an information was laid for perjury against that fisherman. The indictment was before the grand jury of the county of Halifax, and as the Minister himself says, the grand jury refused to find a bill against him. Subsequently when the next grand jury was empanelled the Minister again made the charge, and without calling all the witnesses that were necessary they found a bill. The trial took place and the petty jury acquitted that man of the charge which the Minister has now black-listed him for.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. FORBES. I wonder who is the better judge of the character of the fishermen: twenty-four grand jurors and twelve petty jurors of the county of Halifax, or a few officers of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. What right has the Minister to blacken the character of that fisherman by putting him on the black list, when thirty-six of his fellow countrymen say he was not guilty of the charge. I have in my office now, or I have returned it to the fisherman I do not know which, the pencil draft of Mr. Hockin on that affidavit.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is a very different statement from the first one you made.

Mr. FORBES. That is the statement I made, and if I did not I intended to.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not object to that statement, but I do object to the other.

Mr. FORBES. That is the statement I made word for word. As regards the case of the canners in my own county of Queen's, I intended to refer to it later on. I do not think that any fishermen in the province or in the Dominion, is bound to come to Ottawa, or is bound to lay before the member for the county, information in regard to infractions of the law. His duty is to go to the officers of the Government, and in this case that was done, but they have taken no notice of it. I want fair minded men to draw the inference. There are only one or two reasons why it has not been taken notice of. Either the officer of the department does not believe the man making the charge, or else he knows the man against whom the charge is preferred and he decides to leave that man alone. It is the duty of the officer to investigate the charge, and if he has not done so, he cannot be carrying out the law. As regards Mr. Hockin again, I made no charge against him that the Minister says I did, but I believe he acted as he did to aid and help a good Tory who was opposed to Mr. J. J. Hubley and bound to hurt him.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Your last statement I do not object to. It was Mr. Hockin's duty to draw the affidavit for an illiterate man.

Mr. KAULBACH. I must object to the reflection so generally made by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., upon the fishery officers charged with the distribution of the fish bounty money. The officers in my county, I may say, distribute more bounty than is distributed in any other county of the Dominion, and I must speak in the highest terms of their reputation. They have in every possible way discharged their duties faithfully and well, and without a particle of blemish upon their character, of any kind. I, therefore, rise for the purpose of exonerating the fishery officers of the county I have the honour to represent—Lunenburg—from any aspersions which have been attempted to be made upon them by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. FRASER. I would like to know from the Minister, if he will bring down the items of those expenses?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, I think they are ready.

Mr. FRASER. As the Minister has referred to me, I may say that perhaps I am not the best judge to give Mr. Hockin a character as to the discharge of his official duty. He was all over the county to try and get up a case, and he did work up a case against me.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What case had he against you?

Mr. FRASER. He was trying to get evidence to enter a case to void my election. He was the man who went over the county, together with the local member, to do that, and I might therefore not be the best judge in his case.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He was inspecting.

Mr. FRASER. Yes.

An hon. MEMBER. Was his salary going on?

Mr. FRASER. Oh, certainly, and all his expense. I will say, however, that I do not believe that Mr. Hockin would wilfully, either tell a lie or write a paper for the purpose of fraudulently getting a bounty. I will say that. I will say also, that perhaps his ignorance of the fishing law would enable him to do a number of things that would not be thought of by any officer who understood his business. I say that, because Mr. Hockin has not the advantages of understanding all the fishery laws that another man would have. As I had occasion to say to my own electors in Guysboro', he was taken out of a dry goods shop and sent there, and I do not think, if he was called upon some fine morning and taken down to one of the fishing stations where various kinds of fish were caught, and without knowing that he would be asked, he was asked what were the names of six different kinds of fish; I do not think he could tell them. I have said that openly in the county, and I believe it is true. Of course he is learning. When officials become ardent partisans, they will wink at irregularities, and, just for the purpose of not hurting their party, they will see that the law is not carried into full effect. A fishery officer in the eastern part of my county was at a meeting—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. How much did he receive? About $150 a year.

Mr. FRASER. That is quite a consideration to him; and he not only got up and spoke, but interrupted, and when I told him this was unseemly on the part of an officer like himself, he said, "I will take my office in my hands, and go around canvassing for the candidate I want to see elected." I can give the Minister the name. What I want to point out is that an officer like that is not likely to correct the wrongs which are perpetrated on the department. He is a politician more than an officer, and if a man whom he knows to have perpetrated a fraud happens to be a Conservative, he is sure not to suffer for it. Why, just before the election, men who had been fined went to this officer, and made arrangements with him by which the fines were not collected, and nothing has been said about it to this day, because they were Conservatives.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would take it as a great favour if the hon. gentleman would give me the particulars of those cases.

Mr. FRASER. The hon. gentleman will remember that I told him about the frauds in my own county, and he was frank enough to tell me that he knew there were wrongs; and he will remember the statement I made that I did not wish to add to his difficulties, and I did not want that fishing bounties, small as they were, should be made to appear before the representatives of the people of the Dominion to be so distributed as to be in danger of being abolished; and I did not make these statements in public until the hon. gentleman arose to-night and had to say that huge frauds has existed.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Had existed—because it is my firm conviction that we have stamped out the main part of them, and a great many of the perpetrators have been punished and several are now in jail.

Mr. FRASER. Well, I think the hon. gentleman will not deny that if there is a county in the lower provinces where an attempt has been made to get $5,000 improperly from the Government, the officers under him in that county could not help knowing it, as they are the men who know the fishermen, and whose duty it is to find out who the parties are. As I was going round last summer I saw notices notifying the fishermen to go to such a place and put in their claims.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That was not the practice formerly. The hon. gentleman is now referring to the new system, one of the advantages of which is that an officer having superior knowledge and education goes to a certain district and holds a little court where the fishermen are convened, and he examines their proofs of claim. Under the old system, recourse was had to the ordinary fishery officers in the various districts, who were paid a nominal salary, and who had only ordinary qualifications. In that system there were found to be opportunities for fraud, as the claims were not so thoroughly examined.

Mr. FRASER. I know this is a better system, but if attempts were made to get $5,000 for one county more than it was entitled to, the hon. gentleman's officials must have winked at them.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No. I am satisfied that they did not.

Mr. FRASER. Of course, I am satisfied that the hon. gentleman would pounce upon an officer whom he saw going astray; but I say it is impossible for these officers not to know. In one county, a man actually put down the name of his dog, and got the bounty. I do not say the application came before one of the officials, but he got the bounty. While I am ready to commend the hon. gentleman for the improvement made in the manner in which these applications are now presented, and while I do not say that corrupt bargains are made with the officials, yet I do say that with their knowledge claims were put in that should not have been put in. There is an idea that it is not as much harm to steal from the Government as from any one else, an idea which has been encouraged in the last fifteen years by the Government neglecting to punish men who steal from them under cover of contracts. Therefore, the idea goes abroad that the Government are good game and should pay more than private parties, and these men make the best of their chances. I do not know the name of the county where this $5,000 grab was stopped. I trust it was not a county represented by a Liberal. I am not going to name the county, because I do not know it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It has got to be so delicate a matter that I do not want to name it now.

Mr. FRASER. I would suggest to the Minister in this connection a great mistake that is made in connection with the payment of the bounty.

Mr. COCHRANE. Shut it off altogether.

Mr. FRASER. I am not going to say that I would not do that, although I come from a fishing county. I do not say it would not be a good thing to abolish it, provided the money were put to other uses, such as the building of breakwaters and harbours. I do not say I would do it. Here is $4,000 for example, in costs. That would be quite a substantial sum to expend even in the distribution of bounties. I object to the manner in which the bounties are distributed. I think the officials could, without any risk whatever, send cheques to the fishermen in the various counties. I notice that it costs, in the county I represent, pretty well on to $200 or more to distribute bounty cheques, and the fishermen have to walk quite a distance—in some cases several miles—to get these cheques. Let me suggest to the hon. Minister a plan, which I wonder was not adopted long ago. Let a cheque be issued to every man entitled to a fishing bounty. On the back of that cheque let a form be printed, which the payee must sign in the presence of a justice of the peace, and on signing which he can cash the cheque. That cheque will then go back to the department and be the best receipt the department could have. This would be a great saving to the fishermen, and be a perfect safeguard to the department. I would ask the Minister whether this $4,000 for costs comes out of the bounty.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No; $160,000 is divided among the fishermen, and nothing comes out of it. The cost of distribution and other costs are paid out of the general exchequer.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The statement has been made on the floor of the House that a Collector of Customs, who has been convicted of fraud, continues to hold his position. The same statement was made to the Government last session, and it seems strange to any one from the other provinces that an officer of the Government who has been found guilty of fraud, and the prosecution of whom has cost the Government this ridiculously large amount of $4,000 in law costs, should be still continued in his position.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Do you know that he is Collector of Customs?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The statement was made by a member on the floor of this House, and I take it for granted that the statement was correct, and the hon. Minister did not dispute the statement.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I say that in the case of Bishop, who was one of the fishery officers, and who was convicted of fraud, he was dismissed after conviction. I do not know that he is a Collector of Customs.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the hon. gentleman dispute the statement? It was made on the floor of Parliament by a member of this House a year ago.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It could not have been made and could not have been true, because he was not convicted a year ago.

Mr. BOWERS. The hon. gentleman will find it in "Hansard."

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not that he was convicted.

Mr. BOWERS. No, but that I made a charge against him.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Certainly, and he was dismissed as a fishery officer. The prosecution was pending, but there was no conviction.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He is Collector of Customs to-day at Sandy Cove.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have nothing to do with the Department of Customs, and this is all news to me. I had not the slightest idea that he was collector of customs. I had to deal with him as fishery officer. In some of these little petty offices, a man may hold two of them. He was dealt with as a fishery officer, prosecuted, convicted, and dismissed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As one listening to the discussion, it struck me as a very strange state of affairs that this man should still be in the employ of the Government. I tried to bring this to the notice of the House and the Ministers, in a very respectful manner, and I do not think it is quite proper for an hon. gentleman, who is a member of the Government, and who has his colleagues beside him from whom he can get information, to deny a statement which was made across the House, and which we were bound to assume was true, unless he was in possession of facts to warrant the contradiction.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I did not deny it because I had not the opportunity to investigate it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. You apparently tried to insinuate that I was making a statement which was not correct.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I said the hon. gentleman could not be correct in saying that all this had been brought to the attention of the Government last year, because, as the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Bowers) knows, the prosecution was pending then, and there was no conviction. There was a conviction during recess.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The charges were brought.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Certainly, and action was taken.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It certainly does seem strange that a state of affairs should exist under which, after information has been given to the Minister of Justice, who has taken some pride in declaring to us that he was exceedingly anxious to put down fraud, and even severe in the administration of justice—it is certainly strange that after he had obtained information of the fraudulent conduct of this man, he still retained him in the service of the Government as collector of customs. What answer has the hon. gentleman to make? It is not by bandying words that he can give a satisfactory reply. What is the opinion of the Government? Should this man be allowed to occupy this position? Are the people to be told that a man who has been found guilty of obtaining money by fraud is to be retained in the service of the Government, his fine to be remitted, and the Government called on to pay this large amount of costs for the securing of his conviction?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I did not know at the time that the Controller of Customs was not present, but it goes without saying that this information will, of course, reach his ears, and that very speedily, and that immediate steps will be taken.

Mr. BOWERS. I laid the matter before the Controller of Customs in writing.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Was that before the conviction or after?

Mr. BOWERS. Before the conviction. I stayed in my place in the House. I think, and if not, then in a letter to him, how this gentleman sent for articles to Boston and brought them into Sandy Cove in a vessel, and told the captain he need not enter them, as the Government allowed him to bring them in without entry, as they were for his own family. If the Minister of Justice remembers, when he was Minister of Marine and Fisheries, I told him of the case in his office. He sent out for the papers and called in one of his officers. He had been away to France and knew nothing of the case until I called his attention to it. He asked his deputy why this case had not been attended to before. He said: Take these papers at once and send them to the Minister of Justice, and we will have this man's head off—or something to that effect. I called attention to the matter in the House, I think, and the Minister told me to make a charge in writing. I did so, and sent the man's letter who made the charge from Sandy Cove to him. I fully exonerate the past Minister of Marine and Fisheries for and connivance in these bounty frauds.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Thank you.

Mr. BOWERS. I think the hon. gentleman has done his duty in that respect. I believe in giving honour where honour is due. I have called his attention to two or three cases in Digby County that should have bounties that have not. Now, as to this $4,000, I would like some Minister to state to me what it is for. If the county of Digby pays the expenses of its suits and other counties do the same, what is this amount for?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This is to pay counsel, no doubt, employed in these cases.

Mr. BOWERS. I think that when the department brings charges against these parties, they ought to pay the expenses, and not saddle them on the county. This is a Dominion, and not a county affair, and I do not want the county of Digby to pay $88.35 more than they should fairly be called upon to pay. I do not want to have these expenses charged to the county in some cases, and paid for by the Dominion in another.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Government ought to say whether an officer who has been prosecuted and convicted in such a case is to be employed in some other branch of the service.

Mr. FOSTER. He ought not to be retained; I have no hesitation in saying that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is sufficiently satisfactory. I think we ought not to be retained, either. We have been here for five hours.

Resolutions reported.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12.45 a.m. (Saturday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 10th June, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 114) to further amend the Indian Act (from the Senate).—(Mr. Daly.)

VOTERS' LISTS FOR WRIGHT.

Mr. DEVLIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to call the attention of the Government to the fact that the voters' lists for the electoral division of Wright have evidently not yet been prepared. I have received lists for the electoral division of Labelle, one portion of the county of Ottawa, but I have not heard one word yet with regard to the lists for the other portion, the electoral division of Wright. I would like to know from the Government when I may expect to receive them?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I understand the corrections have not yet been received from the revising officer. Some days ago I made inquiry, and was informed that this was the cause of the delay. I have no doubt the lists will be ready in a short time.

LANGENBURG AND SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. McDONALD (Assiniboia) moved third reading of Bill (No. 55) to incorporate the Langenburg and Southern Railway Co.

Mr. McMULLEN. I understand that some objection has been raised to proceeding with this Bill, and I think it was the Minister of Railways himself who suggested that it should stand over. I understand that the bondholders interested in the southern sections of the road were not aware until very recently that such legislation as this was to be sought. Have any representations been made to the Minister of Railways respecting the Bill, or has any requests been received on behalf of the bondholders for time to consider the position this Bill, if passed, will place them in? Although, no doubt, notice has been given in the "Gazette," in accordance with the requirements of the law, yet, it seems to me that if the bondholders were unaware that such legislation was to come before the House it would be well to allow this Bill to stand over.

Mr. HAGGART. The only communication I received on the subject was a telegram which reached me on Saturday, asking that the third reading of the Bill should stand over until Monday, to afford Mr. Ewart, who represented the bondholders, time to secure some individual to make a statement regarding the position of the bondholders.

Mr. LAURIER. Under such circumstances, will not the hon. gentleman afford Mr. Ewart the opportunity to make the statement contemplated? If the Bill is now read the third time, he will not have that opportunity.

Mr. HAGGART. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, I did not catch what he said.

Mr. LAURIER. I understand the hon. gentleman to say that he received a telegram on Saturday asking that an opportunity be afforded for Mr. Ewart to be heard on this matter.

Mr. HAGGART. All I received was a telegram—I think the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) handed me a telegram, also that I received one from Mr. Ewart—asking that the third reading be adjourned until to-day. I saw Mr. Ewart in town to-day. If he had wished to make any explanation, the Bill might be sent to committee. I am waiting to hear if there are any reasons adduced by any one why the Bill should be reconsidered.

Mr. LAURIER. Under such circumstances, I hope the hon. gentleman will not press the third reading of the Bill, for if that is done there will be no opportunity for Mr. Ewart to make a statement.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In the Senate they have a Railway Committee, also, and Mr. Ewart can be heard before that committee.

Mr. LAURIER. But he asked to be heard before this House.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Heard—on what ground?

Mr. LAURIER. On the ground, as I understand, that he has a statement to make on behalf of the bondholders, whose interests, it is claimed, are jeopardized by this Bill.

Mr. TISDALE. This Bill came up first on Friday, the 31st ult., and was talked out. On Monday, 3rd June, it passed through Committee of the Whole, and was objected to being then read the third time. On Friday, the 7th instant, it stood over upon an understanding between Mr. Ferguson and Mr. Kingsmill, who arranged, by consent between them, as the solicitors of the parties, that it should stand until to-day, in order that there might be plenty of time if it were necessary to raise any objection. Mr. Ewart arrived in town this morning, and saw Mr. Ferguson. I had sent Mr. Ferguson to Mr. Kingsmill, and they arranged that it should stand until to-day.

Mr. McMULLEN. There cannot possibly be any harm in allowing it to stand over.

Motion agreed to (on division), and Bill read the third time, and passed.

DOMINION ATLANTIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne) (for Mr. Stairs) moved that the House resolve itself into committee on Bill (No. 48) to incorporate the Dominion Atlantic Railway Company.

Mr. HAGGART. I will ask the promoter of this Bill to allow it to stand. The Government are preparing an amendment to the Bill for the purpose of relieving the Government from the provisions of the Bill in relation to the customs duties.

Motion allowed to stand.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 79) to incorporate Gilmour and Hughson (Limited).—(Mr. Edwards.)

Bill (No. 95) to incorporate the Grand Falls Water-Power and Boom Company.—(Mr. McAlister.)

ROYAL STANDARD.

Mr. DICKEY. I wish to correct a mistake that was made in my answer on 5th June to the question of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) who asked, "What persons in Canada have the right to hoist the royal standard, and on what occasions?" That subject has been dealt with in more than one place in the General Orders, and the officer who made up the answer missed one of the General Orders referring to it. I wish therefore to supplement the answer I made, by saying that the Royal Standard may also be hoisted upon the citadel in Quebec, and the Government House, on the anniversary of the birth, accession and coronation of Her Majesty. I understand that the expression "Government House," in the order, is stated by the Imperial authorities to mean the house occupied by the Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Quebec.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS IN CAPE BRETON.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, The cash receipts for freight and passengers at the several stations and ticket offices in Cape Breton for freight and passenger service over Cape Breton and other Government railways, for each year since the commencement of the operation of the line to the close of last fiscal year? The number of miles of Government railways in Cape Breton, and the cost, per mile, for the operation of Government railways during the last fiscal year?

Mr. HAGGART. The earnings at each station of the Cape Breton Railway for freight and passenger service over the Cape Breton and other Government railways for each year is as follows:—

BINDER TWINE IN KINGSTON PENITENTIARY.

Mr. MARTIN asked, How much binding twine was manufactured last season at Kingston penitentiary? How much was sold? How much remained on hand after close of season? How much was realized from sale of twine? Was collection made in full for all twine sold? If not, how much is still owing and names of parties indebted and amounts? Was any twine sold on credit, and to whom? When was twine sold on credit, paid for and names of parties to whom so sold?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The amount of twine manufactured during the season, was 331,366 pounds; amount sold during the season, 241,016 pounds; amount sent as samples, 200,000 pounds; amount remaining on hand at the close of the season, 90,050 pounds; sum realized from the sale of twine, $15,515.62. Collection was not made in full for all the twine sold. Mr. R. Rogers, of Manitou, Manitoba, owes a balance of $652.75. In reference to the two last questions, I would prefer not to give that information to the House to-day, although it is available, in order that the hon. gentleman might consider, before pressing it further, whether it is in the interest of the business itself that those two questions should be answered. The names of the parties who are in debt are covered by the answer I have given, but in reference to the lines of credit, I would suggest to the hon. gentleman to consider whether it would be in the interest of the business if we gave that information on every occasion where default was made, and if these particulars should be laid before the House of Commons, whether we might not be to some extent embarrassed. There might be good parties willing to deal with us if we treated them in the ordinary way, but unwilling to have their names published as buying on credit. I would prefer to leave those questions unanswered in order that the hon. gentleman may consider the suggestion I have thrown out. If, however, he wishes to renew those two last questions, we have the information of course, and it is available.

FISHING IN DETROIT AND ST. CLAIR RIVERS, AND LAKES ST. CLAIR AND ERIE.

Mr. MCGREGOR asked, What are the present regulations as to close seasons in Detroit and St. Clair Rivers and Lakes St. Clair and Erie? Is seine net fishing permitted in any and all of the above waters? If so, what is the regulation size of mesh? Was seine net fishing prohibited in any or all of the above waters during the season of 1894? Has the order prohibiting seine fishing been rescinded? If so, what is the date? Has there been any change as regards the fishing with pound-nets? If so, what?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The present regulations as to close seasons in Detroit and St. Clair Rivers and Lakes St. Clair and Erie are as follows: Bass, 15th April to 15th June; maskinongé, 15th April to 15th June; pickerel (doré), 15th April to 15th May; salmon trout, 1st to 30th November; whitefish, 1st to 30th November. (2.) Seine-net fishing is permitted in the above waters. (3.) There is no regulation of size of mesh employed. (4.) Seine-net fishing was prohibited in all the above waters in 1894. (5.) The order prohibiting seine-net fishing so far as relates to Detroit and St. Clair Rivers and Lake St. Clair has been suspended for the present. (6.) The date of suspension was 22nd May, 1895. There has been no change with regard to pound-nets.

POST OFFICE AT ST. THOMAS. ONT.

Mr. FLINT (for Mr. Casey) asked, What additions have been made to the salaries of the postmaster and of each of the employees in the post office at St. Thomas, Ont., within a year, and when?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No changes have been made in the salaries of the postmaster and employees in the post office at St. Thomas, Ont., during the past year.

BONDED WAREHOUSE IN CARLETON, N. B.

Mr. COLTER asked, Is it the intention of the Government to close the bonded warehouses on the international boundary between Carleton and the state of Maine? If so, when, and for what reasons?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The question of abolishing the bonded warehouse in the county of Carleton on the international boundary between Carleton and the state of Maine, is now under the consideration of the Government.

HAY EXPORTATIONS.

Mr. GIROUARD (Two Mountains) asked, What was the quantity of hay exported from Canada to the United States and to England, respectively, in each of the years 1891, 1892, 1893 and 1894?

Mr. WALLACE. The quantity of hay exported to Great Britain and the United States, respectively, during the years in question, was as follows:—

DRILL SHED, HALIFAX.

Mr. FRASER asked, How many tenders have been received for the construction of the drill shed at Halifax? What are the names of the tenderers and the amount of each tender, and which tender has been accepted?

Mr. OUIMET. Two sets of plans and specifications, one for a stone and brick building and the other for a stone building, were prepared, and tenders were advertised for both. Six tenders were received for both the stone and brick and stone buildings, as follows:—

Tenderer.	Stone and brick building.	Stone building.

HAY SHED AT THREE RIVERS.

Mr. BERNIER (for Mr. Langelier) (Translation) asked, 1. Is the Government aware that a large hay shed has been built on the Harbour Commissioners' wharf at Three Rivers by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company? 2. Has the said shed been built with the knowledge and consent of the Government? 3. Has any arrangement been made with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for an annual rental of the ground thus occupied by the said hay shed, and, if so, what is that rental? 4. Has any arrangement been made with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the removal of the said shed when the ground occupied by the same shall be required for the piling of lumber awaiting shipment?

Mr. OUIMET. (Translation.) In answer to the hon. gentleman, I beg to inform the House that the wharf referred to is under the exclusive control of the Harbour Commission of Three Rivers, and that the Government has no knowledge whatever of the facts mentioned in the question.

CASCUMPEC HARBOUR, P.E.I.

Mr. PERRY asked, Who has the contract for placing and keeping up the buoys at Cascumpec Harbour? What is the amount of the contract?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. John Brennan is contractor. The amount of the contract is $194 per annum.

TIGNISH BREAKWATER, P.E.I.

Mr. PERRY asked, Has the wharfinger at Tignish Breakwater, P.E.I., made a return of the amount collected for wharfage fees for the year 1894? If so, what is the amount paid in?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes; $49.81. The total collection was $66.42.

POST OFFICE SERVICE, P.E.I.

Mr. PERRY asked, Has a postmaster been appointed at St. Louis, P.E.I., in the place of Avit Perry, deceased? If so, who is he? If no appointment has been made, who is the acting postmaster? Has he given security? If so, who are the securities?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. There is no post office called St. Louis in Prince Edward Island.

MAIL SERVICE TO THE MARITIME PROVINCES.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis) (for Mr. Stairs) asked, Whether arrangements could not be made by the Post Office Department by which a mail for the maritime provinces could be forwarded by the Canadian Pacific Railway train leaving Ottawa at 6.30 p.m. every week-day, and by the Grand Trunk and Intercolonial trains leaving Montreal every morning at 8 o'clock?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. At present all correspondence, registered and unregistered, for the maritime provinces is despatched from Ottawa post office at 4.10 p.m. A supplementary mail is made up for despatch by the Grand Trunk Railway, which leaves the Ottawa station at 6.10 p.m. and reaches Montreal at 7.35 a.m. This latter mail, which is forwarded from Montreal by the Grand Trunk and Intercolonial Railway at 8 a.m., contains unregistered matter for all places in the maritime provinces east of Moncton. As there would only be a gain of about twenty minutes in the time of arrival at Moncton, if the mails were forwarded from Ottawa at 6.30 p.m., as suggested, it is not thought that the gain in time is sufficient to offset the expense, more especially as the postmaster at Ottawa reports that the quantity of mail despatched by the supplementary mail is very small, and it may therefore be inferred that what is posted between 5.40 p.m. and 6 p.m., when the mail for the train leaving at 6.30 p.m. is closed, would be very trifling.

DAM AND LOCK ON YAMASKA RIVER.

Mr. MIGNAULT (Translation) asked, 1. When were the dam and lock on the River Yamaska commenced? 2. When were they finished? 3. What is the total cost of the lock and dam? 4. How much has the Government paid for the total cost of dredging the River Yamaska?

Mr. OUIMET. (Translation.) The construction of the lock on the Yamaska River was commenced in 1881 and completed in 1890. The total cost of the lock and dam, including the indemnity paid to the neighbouring land-owners, was $127,360.39. The total cost of dredging the river was $5,082.01.

Mr. COSTIGAN.

PILOTAGE—ST. JOHN, N.B.

Mr. BOWERS asked, 1. Has the report of the Commission appointed to make inquiries regarding pilotage matters in St. John, N.B., been made to the Government? 2. If not, when is such report expected? 3. If so, is it the intention of the Government to publish such report?

Mr. COSTIGAN. 1. The report of the Commission has not yet been received. 2. It is expected in the course of a few days. 3. It is not the intention of the Government to publish the report.

PORT ROWAN WHARF.

Mr. ALLAN asked, 1. How much was voted by Parliament for the construction of a wharf at Port Rowan? 2. When was such wharf completed? 3. What has been the total cost of it, and what is the greatest depth of water at the said wharf? 4. What tonnage has reported inwards and outwards at Port Rowan during the year 1894?

Mr. OUIMET. 1. $18,600. 2. May, 1895. 3. Total cost of wharf to date, $11,819.81. Greatest depth of water, 8 feet.

GENERAL BOOTH'S COLONY.

Mr. MARTIN asked, Whether there is any understanding between the Government and General Booth as to giving or selling him land for the purposes of his proposed colony, and whether they are in favour of encouraging the kind of immigrants which General Booth purposes to send to Canada?

Mr. DALY. There is no understanding between the Government and General Booth as to giving him or selling him land for the purposes of his proposed colony, and the Government has no information as to the kind of immigrants General Booth proposes to send to Canada, and are therefore not in a position to say whether they are in favour of encouraging such immigration or not.

LAKE SHIPPING REGULATIONS.

Mr. LISTER asked, Has the attention of the Government been called to the fact that the Congress of the United States has recently passed certain rules regulating the meeting and passing of vessels on the lakes different from those in force in Canada? Is it the intention of the Government to pass rules uniform with those above referred to?

Mr. COSTIGAN. 1. The attention of the Government has been called to the United States Act to regulate navigation on the great lakes and their connecting and tributary waters. 2. It is not the intention of the Government at present to pass rules uniform with those established by the United States Act, as it is not considered expedient to have one set of rules for ocean traffic and another for the commerce of the great lakes.

TROOPS IN QUEBEC.

Mr. LAURIER asked, Is it true that the Royal Canadian Regiment of Artillery and "B" Battery, stationed at Quebec, are to be reduced in strength by two hundred men? If so, when, and why will this reduction take place? Is it true that the Minister of Militia threatened to withdraw all the troops from Quebec, if the city corporation declined to reduce the price of the water supplied to the citadel and other military property in Quebec?

Mr. DICKEY. In answer to the first question, no. On the 31st ult. the strength of the Royal Canadian Artillery at Quebec, ("B" Battery and Companies Nos. 1 and 2) was 297 officers, non-commissioned officers and men. On the 30th June instant it is proposed to reduce this number to 214 officers, non-commissioned officers and men, and no further. This reduction is made in the interests of economy. The city corporation of Quebec required the Militia Department to pay for water rates in the coming year an amount very largely in excess of the sum paid in previous years. This amount, in the opinion of the Minister of Militia, was more than was fairly exigible for the services performed and more than in the public interest should have been paid. The Minister notified the mayor of Quebec that if the additional demand was adhered to the department would make other provision for the force, and intimated that possibly this provision might include the removal from Quebec of the force or a part of it.

STRENGTH OF PERMANENT CORPS.

Mr. GIBSON asked, What is the total strength (officers, non-commissioned officers and men) of each of the following corps:— "A" Battery, Kingston; "B" Battery, Quebec; No. 2 Company, Quebec; "C" Battery, Victoria; "A" Dragoons, Quebec; "B" Dragoons, Winnipeg; No. 1 Infantry, London; No. 2 Infantry, Toronto; No. 3 Infantry, St. Johns; No. 4 Infantry, Fredericton?

Mr. DICKEY. The following is the total strength (officers, non-commissioned officers and men) of the permanent corps on the 31st May, 1895:—

Kingston, "A" Field Battery.....	130
Quebec, "B" Field Battery.....	61

HILTON WHARF, ST. JOSEPH'S ISLAND.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (for Mr. Lister) asked, 1. What amount has been expended by the Government on the wharf at Hilton, St. Joseph's Island? 2. Was there a wharf in the place when the Government built the wharf at Hilton? 3. Who claimed to own such wharf? 4. Was any agreement entered into with the Government whereby the pretended owners assigned their interest in the land upon which the wharf stands? 5. If not, why not? 6. Were wharfage fees to be collected and returned to the Government? 7. Have fees been collected? 8. Has any return been made to the Government of fees collected? 9. Has any demand been made for such fees? 10. Is the Government aware that the pretended owners deny that the Government have any claim to the wharf? 11. Is the Government aware that the pretended owners have mortgaged the wharf?

Mr. OUIMET. 1. $10,460.30. 2. Yes. 3. Messrs. Bowker & Co. 4. No. 5. No, the reason being that the construction was not to improve the wharf already existing, but to provide an extension to the same which would give a place of refuge to vessels going up the Sault Ste. Marie before attempting the navigation in the River Ste. Marie, which was dangerous at night. The owner who was not in a position to and did not require to make the extension for his own business, having agreed to maintain light, and keep a man to take the lines of vessels, allowing them to lie at the wharf free of charge. As to the rest of the questions, the answer is, no.

PLUMMER'S WHARF, SAULT STE. MARIE.

Mr. LISTER asked, 1. Is the title of the Government wharf known as "Plummer's Wharf" at Sault Ste. Marie in the Government? 2. What is the total amount expended by the Government in the construction and repair of such wharf to this date? 3. Who has charge of the wharf? 4. What fees have been collected, and what is the date of the last return? 5. Was a commissioner, Mr. Gourdeau, appointed to make inquiries regarding the wharf? 6. Did his report charge that Mr. Plummer or any one else owed for fees or otherwise a sum of money in connection with such wharf? 7. If so, what was the amount, and has it been paid? 8. Does the Government intend to keep the wharf, or has the same been given back, or any negotiations taken place with regard to giving the same back to Mr. Plummer? 9. If so, what are the particulars of such agreement or arrangement?

Mr. COSTIGAN. 1. Yes. 2. $15,080.61. 3. Alfred Carney. 4. $3,147.04; January, 1895. 5. Yes. 6. Yes. 7. The report showed that side wharfage for about $300 had not been collected, as well as the tariff on his own shipments, amounting to $41.36. These amounts were not paid in, as Mr. Plummer has a counter claim, not having received salary, pending settlement of his case. 8. Yes, but the question of future management of the wharf is under consideration. 9. The same answer.

LUMBER FOR WELLAND CANAL.

Mr. LOWELL moved for :

Return giving copies of all lumber and timber supplied, under contract or otherwise, upon the Welland Canal from 1st January, 1885, to 1st January, 1895; the names of the contractors, the quantities supplied and the prices paid either under contract with the Government or by purchase.

Mr. HAGGART. I have no objection to this return, but the hon. gentleman must know that it will be a very long and expensive return. If there is any particular information he wants, perhaps he had better move for it separately.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. OUMET.

HOMESTEADING LEASED LANDS— CASE OF WILLIAM FLEMING.

Mr. MARTIN moved for :

Copies of all correspondence with regard to the homestead entry of William Fleming for the north-east quarter of section 16 in township 9, range 14, west of the first principal meridian, and also of all correspondence with Nathaniel Boyd, M.P., as to said quarter-section, and of Mr. Boyd's lease of said land, and also of the regulations as to leasing land and as to homesteading leased lands.

He said: I desire to say a few words in regard to this motion, in order to throw a little light upon the administration of the Department of the Interior. It appears that Mr. Fleming has obtained from the department a homestead entry for the north-east quarter of section 16, township 9, range 14, west of the first principal meridian. Now, Fleming was a person desirous of becoming a settler, and, learning that there were homestead lands open for settlement in this particular neighbourhood, went to the Dominion lands office, and obtained from the agent a list of the lands in the neighbourhood which were open for settlement. Among other lands, this particular quarter-section was mentioned in the neighbourhood given to him by the land agent. The agent made a memorandum upon the paper which he handed Mr. Fleming, stating that a number of these sections were under lease, but that would not interfere with homesteading, that the leases were subject to the right of homestead. Mr. Fleming went and examined some of the lands, and put in an application for this particular quarter-section. It now appears that he made a mistake in locating this land. In the affidavit on the printed form supplied to applicants by the officers of the Dominion lands office, he swore that there were no improvements upon this particular quarter-section. It turns out that there were improvements upon it. The department, having been apprised by the gentleman who held the lease for this and other lands in the neighbourhood—that gentleman being the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Boyd)—that this land had been taken up by this particular homesteader, opened a correspondence with him with a view to getting him to cancel his homestead entry. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw particularly the attention of the House to the manner in which the department attempted to get that done. So far, the homesteader had proceeded quite regularly. He had gone to the lands office; he had obtained from the agent a list of lands open to homestead and had been notified that, while some of these were under lease, that was no bar to his obtaining and having a homestead entry for them. But with respect to the improvements he made a mistake. At this time, the department was not aware that it was a mistake, but they were aware that he had put in affidavits that there were no improvements on this particular quarter-section. Now, under these circumstances, the department wrote a letter to Mr. Fleming, in which they charged him with having been guilty of perjury, and informed him that unless he withdrew his claim under homestead entry to this particular quarter-section, he would be prosecuted for making a false affidavit. Mr. Speaker, it strikes me that this is most reprehensible conduct on the part of a department of Government. If this man had been guilty of swearing to a false affidavit, if he had been guilty of perjury, and the department had learned that fact in the course of the administration of the department's affairs, it was their duty to prosecute him for perjury. They had no right to attempt to rectify a mistake of their agent or of the department by writing a blackmailing letter—and I have no hesitation at all, Mr. Speaker, in describing this communication as a most bare-faced blackmailing letter, holding over the head of this man the threat of prosecution for perjury unless he would consent to a proposition made to him. It is the same as though a private individual, learning of the criminal conduct of another individual, should write a letter, saying: Unless you give me $100 I will prosecute you for this crime. The department were not in need of $100, but they were in need of having the mistake which their agent, or themselves, had made of allowing this quarter-section to be homesteaded, corrected, and they took the course, which would be so reprehensible in an individual, of writing this blackmailing letter to William Fleming, telling him that he would be prosecuted for perjury unless he gave them an equivalent to prevent them bringing this criminal action. I have just a word or two more to say with regard to the rather peculiar circumstances under which this quarter-section appears to have had improvements upon it. It was, as I have said, included in a lease obtained for grazing purposes, by the hon. member for Marquette. Of course, the House is well aware that a grazing lease gives the holder of it no right whatever to make improvements upon the land in the way of breaking up the soil or anything of that kind. It appears, however, that, in violation of the lease, the hon. member for Marquette had broken up this land and had raised large quantities of wheat upon it. So it was a fact that, at the time it was homesteaded, there were improvements of that kind—that is, the land had been broken up and crops of wheat grown upon it. As a matter of fact, I claim, as between the department and Wm. Fleming, that even if the department had, in the affidavit of Fleming, notification of this fact, that should constitute no reason why he should not obtain a homestead entry for that land.

If a man has a lease of Government lands for the purpose of pasturing stock, and in violation of that lease, breaks up the land and grows wheat upon it, that surely gives him no right as against a homesteader, who had obeyed the provisions of his lease and not broken up the land and grown wheat upon it. So I claim that the only wrong in connection with the matter was the mistake made by Mr. William Fleming in locating the land and making his application. If all the facts had been before the department, they would have had no right to take any steps to cancel the homestead entry, because the land had been improved in violation of the contract between the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Boyd) and the department. It appears now from correspondence with the department, that the hon. member for Marquette had applied some time previously for the purchase of this particular land, and they had intended to grant him the right to the land under the regulations for leasing land. That clause is a provision by which it is intended to give to ranchers in the west the right to purchase a quarter-section of land on which to place their buildings, a provision which could not possibly be intended to apply to a case of this kind, where the gentleman who holds the lease has land of his own upon which he has his buildings, therefore he had no need, for the purpose of carrying out his lease, and of making available the land which he has under his lease, of buying from the Government and taking out of the hands of homestead settlers, a quarter-section for that purpose. I say, therefore, that even if he had made the application, and there appears to be no written record of any such application, and even if the application had been agreed to by the Government, that would have been done in violation of law. I may say, Sir, that we have had to complain in Manitoba all along of the manner in which the Department of the Interior has administered its affairs. I have brought that complaint to the attention of the House on one or two occasions, and the answer of the Minister of the Interior to all my suggestions has been that the administration of the department speaks for itself. Well, this is one instance in which it does speak very loudly for itself, an instance in which we find a large department of the Government using its power and its right to institute prosecutions against individuals who, to its knowledge, have been guilty of crime, as a threat and as a means of blackmail, in order to get set right what it considered at the time to be a mistake of its own. It is the view of the department, I understand, that the land should be given to the hon. member for Marquette, and that he should be allowed to purchase it, as he had requested to do. But this settler has told the department that he is quite willing for them to prosecute him for perjury, that he is prepared to stand his trial for perjury, but that he declines to submit to be blackmailed by the Government, and that he does not propose to give up his right, which he claims he is legally entitled to, and which he claims the Government have no right to cancel, and which he defies them to cancel. He claims that if there is a charge against him for perjury, if he has made a false affidavit, it is the duty of the Government, not to threaten him with criminal action, but to take a criminal action against him, and allow him to substantiate his good name in court. That, however, they decline to do, although months ago they were challenged by this poor and persecuted individual to take the only honourable course they could take under the circumstances. They have declined to do that, but they have left the imputation upon him, and they have endeavoured, as I say, to use their power as a Government to threaten this poor settler into doing something which would be very much against his interests, and which he does not propose to do.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman was not content to move for the return of the papers, to which there is no objection, but he takes occasion to make one of his characteristic attacks upon the Department of the Interior. He tries to make out that this man Fleming is an unfortunate settler whom the department have attempted to bulldoze and to blackmail by writing him the letter to which he refers. Now, Sir, what are the facts? It appears that a lease was made of the township referred to, township 9, range 14, west of the 1st principal meridian, Manitoba, for grazing purposes, to Messrs. Boyd & Crowe, in July, 1885; that those gentlemen have occupied that lease under the regulations ever since; that subsequently, some years after the lease was granted, Mr. Crowe, the partner of the hon. member for Marquette, assigned that lease to Mr. Boyd, who has been the holder of it for some years, and included in that leasehold is the land in question mentioned in the motion. From the statement made by the hon. gentleman it would appear that this man Fleming went to the land office at Brandon, and made application there for the lands that were open for entry. I presume he was given a township map, as men in the usual course of business are given, and upon that map, according to the hon. gentleman's statement, the officer marked the quarter-sections that were open for settlement. At the same time, the hon. gentleman says, the agent notified this Mr. Fleming that these lands were covered by a grazing lease, and that consequently Mr. Fleming had due notice of this grazing lease to Boyd & Crowe. It appeared that when the notice of the department here was called to the fact that the agent had given the entry to this man Fleming and another for lands included in this lease, these men were notified that the entries would not be granted, that the lands had been applied for by Mr. Boyd for his home farm or corral, under the regulations, and that consequently the entries would have to be cancelled. Upon this, one of these men, without further ado, gave up the land, the money was returned to him, and nothing more was heard of it. But Mr. Fleming said he would not give up the land and wrote to the hon. gentleman, and I presume if he had not been a supporter of the hon. gentleman and had not written to the hon. gentleman, we would not have heard about this matter.

Mr. MARTIN. He did not write to me. I do not know whether he is a supporter of mine or not.

Mr. DALY. Some friend of the hon. gentleman must have written to him. I presume. The facts as to Mr. Fleming's claim to the land are as follows:—On 23rd November, he appeared before the Dominion lands agent, at Brandon, and made the usual application for homestead entry, which runs as follows:—

I, William Fleming, of Carberry, Manitoba, do hereby apply for a homestead entry under the provisions of clause 38 of the Dominion Lands Act, for the north-east quarter of section No. 16, of the 9th township, in the 14th range, west of the first meridian.

WILLIAM FLEMING.

Souris district, 23rd November, 1894.

Number of family, including entrant, four; nationality, Canadian (Ont.); where from, Manitoba; previous occupation, farmer.

As provided by the Dominion Lands Act, at the time of the application being made the application is to be supported by affidavit. On that occasion, Mr. Fleming made the following affidavit:—

I, William Fleming, do solemnly swear that I am over eighteen years of age; that to the best of my knowledge and belief the land in respect of which my application is made, is of the class opened for homestead and pre-emption entry; that there is no person residing on the said land, nor are there any improvements thereon, and that this application is made for my exclusive use and benefit, with the intention of residing upon and cultivating the said land, and not directly or indirectly for the use or benefit of any other person or persons whomsoever; and that I have not heretofore obtained an entry for a homestead on Dominion lands.

WILLIAM FLEMING.

Subscribed and sworn to, this 23rd day of November, 1894, before me.

W. SHAW COTTINGHAM,
Clerk of Dominion Lands.
(Agent not present.)

According to that affidavit, Mr. Fleming swore that there were no improvements on that particular quarter-section. It was ascertained subsequently that this quarter-section had been cultivated during five or six years, and that there was some fifty acres of breaking on it; and, consequently, Mr. Fleming made a false oath when he said there were no improvements on the quarter-section. When the attention of the department was called to the fact, he was notified that he had made a false entry in view of the fact that there were improvements on the quarter-section, and, in consequence, his entry for that land would be cancelled, and it also stated that the department might take proceedings against him for perjury. The hon. gentleman makes out that letter, which the officers of the department had a perfect right to send Mr. Fleming, to be a blackmailing letter, and that it was written to Mr. Fleming because the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Boyd) happened to have a lease of the land. If the hon. member for Marquette had not had a lease of the land, and it had not been brought to the attention of the hon. member for Winnipeg, that hon. member would not have made such suggestions as he has made to-day, and, in fact, the hon. gentleman, in his letters, made all sorts of threats to the department.

Mr. MARTIN. What threats?

Mr. DALY. You made several threats. The correspondence will be laid before the House, and no doubt hon. members will be highly edified by it.

Mr. MARTIN. Name one threat.

Mr. DALY. The hon. member for Winnipeg stated in a communication to the department, that the officers had no right to communicate in this way with Mr. Fleming. He said in a letter of 5th April, addressed to the secretary of the department, as follows:—

Yours of 30th ultimo at hand. I fail to find in your letter any reference to any laws which enable you to cancel a homestead entry on account of false affidavits having been made. I consider the extract from lease regulations wholly inapplicable to the case in question. At any rate, I must object to your selling to Mr. Boyd Mr. Fleming's homestead under that or any other regulation. What right has Mr. Boyd to crop land of which he has only a grazing lease? Your proposed inquiry is not necessary, as Mr. Fleming's statement as to improvements was made under a mistake.

The hon. gentleman in a letter dated 13th March, sent to the department, said:

If Fleming ought to be prosecuted, it is your duty to do so; you have no right to use a weapon of that kind for the purpose of inducing him to give up a right which he has bona fide acquired. I may say that Mr. Fleming is quite prepared to meet your prosecution, and demands that you either proceed or apologize most fully and completely to him for your outrageous conduct in making the threat contained in your letter. Mr. Fleming has made no false affidavit.

Yet the hon. gentleman in the letter I read previously said that Mr. Fleming made a mistake. That is a matter of degree. If a man deliberately goes into a land office and swears that there are no improvements or cultivation on certain land, and it subsequently appears that fifty acres of it are under cultivation, and the hon. member for Winnipeg considers that under this state of facts the man did not make a false affidavit, but made a mistake, I do not think any other hon. member will agree with this construction.

Mr. MARTIN. I think every lawyer will.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman's letter continues:

I may say that I have never known so flagrant an attempt upon the part of a governmental department to bulldoze a settler for the benefit of a political supporter of the head of the department as is contained in your letter of the 9th instant.

If there has been any bulldozing in the matter it has come from the hon. gentleman himself, because, what interest could the Government have in taking proceedings against this man, particularly if he is a poor man, in view of the fact that neither the Government nor its agent are specially interested in Mr. Fleming's action? Mr. Fleming, no doubt, went to this section, examined the land, or had the opportunity of doing so, whether he did so or not, and it is presumed that he did, because he returned to the land office and made affidavit that there was no cultivation on any part of the land; and then, because the department called the attention of Mr. Fleming to this fact, the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) takes up the cudgels on the part of Mr. Fleming and says the Government is bulldozing and blackmailing. I fail to see where the blackmailing comes in, and I think the officers of the department would have been derelict in their duty if they had not informed Mr. Fleming that he had made a false affidavit, and was open to proceedings being taken against him. In regard to the other features of the hon. gentleman's speech, I may say in regard to his assertion that these improvements were made in violation of the lease, the lessee had a perfect right to make the cultivation. Further, under the regulation relating to grazing leases, by clause 15, they had a right to acquire this particular quarter-section, or any other section for which they applied. The fact is that Mr. Boyd had, prior to the application made by Mr. Fleming, made application to the department to purchase this particular quarter-section. Section 16 of the regulations provides that a lessee can acquire any particular section for constructing corrals, and erecting house. The hon. gentleman said that the regulation had reference to grazing leases in the west. I want him to understand that there is only one form of grazing leases, either in Manitoba, or that part of the western country known as the ranching country; and, consequently, when Messrs. Boyd and Crowe assigned the lease to the hon. member for Marquette, the lease was the same as those used in Alberta and other portions of the western country where grazing leases are granted, and the regulations apply equally as regards leases in Manitoba or in the North-west Territories. So Mr. Boyd was clearly within his rights as assignee of the lease in making application for the purchase of this particular quarter-section and others, in view of the fact that the department has always dealt with leases in accordance with these regulations and the Government would not have been doing justice to him if they had not given him the right to purchase this particular quarter-section. For the information of the House, and this hon. gentleman, I may add that since that time the hon. member for Marquette, the lessee of this whole township of land, has had on the land during the continuance of the lease, 1,400 sheep, 120 or 130 head of horses, and from 50 to 100 head of hogs, and he has fully complied with the terms and regulations of the lease made to him. This Mr. Fleming cannot complain of having received unjust treatment at the hands of the department in any way whatever. He went to that township with his eyes open, and with a knowledge of the facts that the agent had told him that this land was under leasehold. He knew, or should have known, that he could only make an entry for land that was subject to homestead entry, and more than that, he went to the land office and subscribed to an affidavit that was read to him and which clearly indicated that there were no improvements upon the land. The same thing might have obtained if Mr. Fleming had made an entry anywhere else. Suppose he had made entry in a township that was not covered by the lease of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Boyd); so far as Mr. Fleming's position is concerned, the department would have taken the same attitude towards him as they do at this moment. I want the hon. member (Mr. Martin) to understand, that the fact of the department having written as it did to Mr. Fleming has no relation whatever to the fact that the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Boyd) is the lessee of this particular township, because, as I said previously, the officers would be derelict in their duty had they not called Mr. Fleming's attention to the fact that he had made this false affidavit. I repudiate the idea that the letter written to Mr. Fleming was on account of the member for Marquette (Mr. Boyd) having anything to do with this lease, or being entitled to any rights under it. On the contrary, it was written to Mr. Fleming in due course, and if Mr. Fleming had acted the same as the other man, who had made an entry within this lease, and immediately upon notification by the department that he had no right to make that entry, had withdrawn and accepted his $10 fee, he would not be in the position he is in to-day. I can say to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) that so far as relates to the department carrying out its threat about prosecuting Mr. Fleming, the department has no desire to put this Mr. Fleming or anybody else to the trouble of a prosecution. The hon. gentleman knows that if we undertook to prosecute, the expense of the trial would have to be borne by the department.

Mr. MARTIN. I did not say so.

Mr. DALY. This is one of the quasi-criminal cases in reference to which the Act provides that when the complaint is laid before the Grand Jury by the Attorney General and a true bill found, the subsequent prosecution must be at the expense of the private prosecutor.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not think I said that.

Mr. DALY. But I am saying it. The Government would have no reason for following up this Mr. Fleming. If he had done what the other man did, and simply applied to the department for a refund of his $10, his entry would be cancelled and he would be dealt with then the same as the other man. If Mr. Fleming has suffered in this matter, he has suffered in consequence of his own actions. The department are not responsible in any way whatever. If Mr. Fleming, upon being notified of the fact that he got an entry for lands which he was not entitled to, and upon being further notified that he had made a false affidavit, had been properly advised he would have allowed the matter to drop, and had he done so, the department also would have allowed the matter to drop.

Mr. MARTIN. I have a word or two to say with regard to the remarks of the Minister of the Interior. It is not true, as every lawyer knows, that because an affidavit is incorrect you can found a charge of perjury upon it. A man may make an affidavit which is not true, but for which there can be no charge of perjury brought. Does it not occur in the courts every day that witnesses swear to something which is entirely inaccurate and untrue, but that they do not intend to be guilty of a false oath. It is the intention that counts, and that is what the Minister would find out when he came to prosecute this man. This man has not been guilty of perjury, and the hon. Minister, knowing the facts, has no right to say that he made a false affidavit. If the hon. gentleman thinks he has made a false affidavit, it is his duty to prosecute him, but Mr. Fleming has not made a false affidavit in the sense of being guilty of perjury, and no prosecution would lie against him. Mr.

Fleming was informed by the department that it was leased land, and that he could homestead it. That is to say, that it being leased was no bar whatever to his right to homestead. I have here the original paper which the land agent handed to him giving the numbers of the sections with a cross opposite each section which is open for homestead, and then there is a cross at the bottom of the paper with this memorandum :

Open for entry, grazing leases cannot interfere with homestead entry. Leases are granted subject to it.

That is a plain intimation to Mr. Fleming that these lands are all covered by grazing leases, but that a grazing lease is subject to a homestead entry. If Mr. Boyd had acquired some right prior to this time entitling him to buy these lands, why was it that the Department of the Interior, through its agent, gave to Mr. Fleming this piece of paper upon which this particular land is marked as being covered by a grazing lease, and being still open to homestead entry? The real fact is, that the department made an error; and you might as well charge them with fraud and misrepresentation as to charge Mr. Fleming. They made it innocently, no doubt, and I do not charge the agent with any fraud or intention to deceive Mr. Fleming. If he made a mistake, it was just as much a criminal act as the act of which Mr. Fleming was guilty. Mr. Fleming made a mistake as to the location, but, as the hon. gentleman knows, that is a very easy thing to do in Manitoba. The mounds and posts have disappeared in many cases, and I have time and again gone to examine land myself, and examined the wrong land.

Mr. DALY. That is all the more reason why Mr. Fleming should have been careful in making his entry.

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, and so should the Department of the Interior be careful. If Mr. Boyd had a right entitling him to purchase this land at a certain figure, what possible excuse can there be for the conduct of the department? It was not a question of mounds or posts in the department, because they have the entire record there, and could easily have prevented any mistakes. There is a clear case of negligence on the part of the department there. The department having got themselves into a scrape, undertook to get out of it, and how? By blackmailing this man, and by bringing a charge of perjury against him, which they knew they could not substantiate, and which the Minister has failed to substantiate, although challenged by Mr. Fleming to do so. They have made a charge against this man which is utterly and entirely groundless. If it is not groundless, it is true, and if it is true, the department should prosecute him. But the department have not done so. They have no right to be lenient in a case of that kind, because it is of great importance that perjury arising in these matters should be promptly detected and punished. The moment a false affidavit is made to the department, it is most important that the department should at once prosecute and punish the man who makes it. But the hon. Minister is well aware, from what I have said, that no prosecution could succeed in this instance. Mr. Fleming denies that he is guilty of perjury and is prepared to defend himself against that charge in a court of law. That being the case, I state here, as I stated in my letters, that the department should either proceed with this threatened prosecution, or they should withdraw the charge and apologize to Mr. Fleming. Either the one thing or the other should be done.

Mr. DALY. The department has not made a charge against this man, nor have I done so in my speech. It will be time enough for the hon. gentleman to say that when the charge is made.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know what you can prosecute a man for making a false affidavit for if not for perjury. Here is what the letter of the department says :

In order that you may be under no misapprehension as to the letter of the agent sent you in this matter, I may inform you that the department are seriously considering whether it would not be in the public interest to prosecute you for making the affidavit that there were no improvements on the said lands at the time of making entry, which affidavit was not true.

What does that mean if it does not mean perjury? And did not the hon. gentleman in his speech to-day charge this man with making a false affidavit? Every man is liable in mistake to make an affidavit which is incorrect and untrue. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman has done it; I know I have.

Mr. DALY. No, I never did.

Mr. MARTIN. Then, he has escaped. I have known most honourable men to have done it repeatedly—to have made statements before a court which were not known to them to be incorrect at the time, but which were afterwards found to be incorrect. There is that great distinction, which the hon. gentleman does not seem to see, between an incorrect and untrue statement which is made inadvertently and with no intention to deceive, and a false statement made with the intention of deceiving, which is perjury. If a man makes a false statement with no intention of deceiving, thinking he is telling the truth, as this man did, there is no perjury. The hon. gentleman says that I made threats against the department. I made no threats whatever. I simply made that statement to them, that it was the most outrageous case I had ever known—a case in which the department undertook to threaten a criminal prosecution against a man for the purpose of inducing him to give up a legal right. The hon. gentleman speaks of this man as unfortunate. He is not unfortunate in any respect, except in having levelled against him a charge of perjury by the department, which they cannot substantiate and have not the manliness to apologize for. He owns the homestead; he has a right to it; it was open for homestead entry according to the document I hold in my hand; he obtained homestead entry for it, and if there is any matter between the hon. member for Marquette and the department, Mr. William Fleming has nothing to do with that. I question very much, however, if under the provisions of the lease, which the hon. gentleman did not read to us, Mr. Boyd had any right whatever to use this land for growing wheat. I should be very much surprised if it was the intention of the department, or the intention of Parliament in granting them power to lease public lands for grazing purposes, to allow them to be used for growing wheat for sale on the market. There may be, and it would be reasonable that there should be in the lease a clause allowing the rancher owning cattle or horses or sheep to grow a limited quantity of oats or barley for the use of his stock; but that is a different thing from growing wheat and selling it on the market, which in this case has been done for years; and that is the reason this question of improvements arose. But that is a question between the hon. member for Marquette and the department. The question between the department and Mr. Fleming is the one I have put, that they tried to blackmail Mr. Fleming into giving up his legitimate right on this homestead entry, in order that the department might get out of a mistake they made; and the department not being prepared to go on and prosecute Mr. Fleming, have not the manliness or decency to withdraw the charge and state that it was made under a misapprehension of the facts.

Mr. BOYD. Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Winnipeg in bringing this matter before the House, not only makes an attack on the Department of the Interior, but, in his attempt to rectify any wrong done to the gentleman referred to by him, has endeavoured to connect me with it, in stating that I have done things that I should not have done, I shall ask a few moments of the time of the House to explain the position I occupy in regard to this matter. About ten years ago I discovered this tract of land, which extends for about 30 miles between the town of Carberry and the Assiniboine River, and which is composed entirely of sand-hills. It is totally unfit for settlement; no settler would settle upon it. All the good land in the neighbourhood was taken up previous to the time I applied for the lease of that land. For three miles south of the town of Carberry the land is good, and has been occupied by settlers for years before I applied for my lease; but from there to the Assiniboine River, for eighteen or twenty miles the land is totally unfit for settlement, and no settlers up to the present time have applied for homesteads there. I applied for a lease of the lands for grazing purposes, and I explained to the department at the time that there was not sufficient hay on the land to winter the stock which I proposed to keep. I explained to the department that there were small tracts which might probably be classed as second-class lands and which could be made to produce sufficient crops every second year to enable me with what hay I could get to obtain food enough to winter my stock; and I have cultivated in that way two or three hundred acres. There are not more than three or four hundred acres in that tract suitable for settlement. Even if any settlers should go in, there would not be more than sufficient for two or three, and they would be ten or fifteen miles away from any other settlers. Within the last year, this gentleman—I believe at the instigation of my opponents—made an application for the piece of land, on which he knew I was growing my crops and wintering my stock. The hon. gentleman referred to me as growing wheat on this land. I grow wheat and oats mixed for the feed of my stock. At times I grow wheat and feed it. I fed 1,000 bushels of wheat last year and the year before, and found it was the cheapest feed I could get.

Mr. MARTIN. Did the hon. gentleman sell wheat?

Mr. BOYD. Yes; and for every bushel I sold I brought back ten bushels of oats, and used it for no other purpose than feeding my stock. I have in no way injured the settlement, but have benefited it by bringing in the very best of stock of all kinds, of which the settlers have had the benefit. My political opponents instructed that man to proceed with that application, and the hon. gentleman took it up and tried to make out of it a great case of wrong to the poor settlers. That man has done nothing; he has made no improvements. I have fifty acres of crop on that land, and still this man Fleming says he is told to go on by his solicitors and they will indemnify him against any loss, and they are the same solicitors who were consulted by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). Those are the facts. It was not to rectify any wrong but simply to make an attack upon the Minister of the Interior that the hon. gentleman has brought this motion before the House.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE, PORTAGE LA PRAIRIE.

Mr. MARTIN moved for:

Copies of all Orders in Council respecting the purchase of a site for a post office building in the town of Portage la Prairie, in Manitoba; also for copies of all instructions to, and reports by

Mr. Daniel Smith respecting said site ; also of all petitions presented to His Excellency the Governor General or the Department of Public Works in connection with the selection of a site for said building.

He said : I desire to draw the attention of the House to the very extraordinary proceedings of the Department of Public Works in connection with the location of the new post office in the town of Portage la Prairie. An amount was put in the Estimates last year for the erection of a new post office and customs building at Portage la Prairie, and since then a location has been made of the site. It will be admitted by the House that in selecting a site for a public building in any town, the Government should not endeavour in any way to affect the position of the business centre of that town, but put the building in a place convenient to the largest number of persons interested, and not allow the member who represents the constituency in which the town lies, or any other person, to bring influence to bear in favour of a location which is not suitable, and which has the effect of interfering with the people as to the business centre of the town. I contend that that has been done in this particular instance. The old post office, which was in a rented building, was located in its present position many years ago, when the town was in an unsettled condition as regards its business centre. At that particular time, the post office was very far from what was then the business centre of the town. It was, however, upon a street which was likely to become in a few years the business street of the town, and the anticipations in that respect have been realized. The street called Saskatchewan Avenue, upon which the old post office was located has become the business street of the town, and the town may be said to have become, to a certain extent, solidified and settled. However, this particular site, where the old post office is situated, is entirely on one side of the town. When it was known that the Government intended to build, petitions were sent in—one petition at any rate, very largely signed indeed, was sent in to the Department of the Interior. A gentleman, now the mayor of the town, came all the way down from Portage la Prairie to present the petition and lay it before the Minister of Public Works, and along with it was presented a map, showing the location of the business houses and the business institutions. By that map, it most clearly appears that the site which the Government proposed to adopt, lying immediately west of the old site, was most unsuitable. I may say that I went myself last session to see the Minister of Public Works and suggested to him that as a dispute was likely to arise between the citizens generally and the business people on the one hand, and the particular few who are interested in real estate in a certain part of the town on the other hand, he should, under the circumstances, send a disinterested Government official to make a report entirely free and independent of all these influences. I believe the Minister of Public Works did carry out my suggestion and sent to Portage la Prairie Mr. Daniel Smith, who is an officer of the department located in Winnipeg. Mr. Smith made a report upon the three different sites offered to the Government. But I also understand that an Order in Council has since been passed at the instance of the Department of Public Works, overruling entirely the report of Mr. Smith. There are three sites available for this post office, all of which are on corners, and in that respect equal. One site, which is acceptable to the citizens at large, is that at present occupied by the Presbyterian Church. It has long been the intention of the Presbyterian Church-people to move their church off the business street, and they would be very willing to sell the land on which it is located to the Government for this purpose. The price they ask is $80 per front foot. The location is admirable, almost in the centre of the business portion, except that, even with regard to that particular site, there is a considerably greater number of business places lying east of the Presbyterian Church. Another site is two blocks west of the Presbyterian Church. It belongs to the Massey-Harris Company. The third site, and the one which has been finally accepted, is a block west of that again, or on the outskirts of the business portion of the town. I may say that there is not a business place on the same side of the street west of the site chosen by the department for the post office, except one—an implement establishment. The department purchased land at this point having 99 feet frontage, as I understand ; and they have given for it, I am informed, $75 per foot front. This is $5 less than the land upon which the Presbyterian Church is located could be obtained for. Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in saying that the price given for that land was at least three times more than it was worth ; and I understand that Mr. Daniel Smith's report was against the site which the Government accepted, and in favour of the site occupied by the Presbyterian Church. It would be quite impossible for the Minister of Public Works or for any independent man not connected with local matters to go to Portage la Prairie and look over the situation, and then say that the site of the Presbyterian Church was not eminently a more fitting site for a public building than the site which has been chosen. Because, as I say, it is entirely on one side—there is only one business place on that side of the street, west of it, and one or two scattered places of business to the west of it on the other side. I can tell the hon. Minister that he could have obtained, in the eastern part of the business street, land just as valuable, and just as suitable as a site for a post office for $25 per foot—land that is just as valuable to-day, as that they have selected and paid $75 per foot for. What does that mean, Mr. Speaker? The Government, in the first place, took the proper course of sending an independent, fair-minded official up to the town to make a report upon the various sites offered to the Government. That official goes up, and he gives the Government the facts. He points out the location of the several sites, quotes the prices that are asked, and recommends to them one or two sites. Then, in the face of that report, as I understand through the influence of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Boyd), the Government selected a site and paid $75 a foot front for it, although, as a matter of fact, it is not worth more than $25 a foot front. Moreover, the selection of this site entails for all time to come upon that town the very serious inconvenience of having a public building in a place most inconvenient to the vast majority of the people of the town. You understand, Mr. Speaker, that in a country town like that, the post office is an important point. It is a place visited by the most of the people every day; for there is no letter delivery, and every person has to go or send to the post office for his letters. If the Government were anxious to act in the public interest—and I suppose that gentlemen opposite will take the stand that they are—they would be most careful, when they are about to spend $15,000 or $20,000 on a public building, not to choose such a site as would inconvenience the majority of the people. They would, at any rate, be very careful in choosing a site not to pay three times the actual value for a site which was most against the interest of the town. The hon. Minister has, no doubt, before him the report made by Mr. Smith, and I desire to get that report, and also the correspondence with regard to this matter. For that purpose, I put this motion in your hand.

Mr. BOYD. Before this motion is put, I wish to say a few words with regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). The hon. gentleman has taken particular pains to connect me—and in a somewhat unfair way, I think—with this transaction. I shall best explain the position by describing to this House the general situation of the town of Portage la Prairie. On the south side of the town is an inlet of the Assiniboine River—a slough, as it is called. On the north is the Canadian Pacific Railway. Between these two the town lies. It is probably not more than half or three-quarters of a mile broad. The people do not want to build too close to the railway, nor do any wish to go too close to the slough; so, you will understand, there is a tendency for the town to extend laterally and, like all towns, it grows westward. There has always been considerable competition between the east end and the west end. The hon. member for Winnipeg has been one of the most ardent supporters of the east end, owing to his having property in that locality, property in regard to which many doubts have been expressed, as to the manner in which it was purchased. Every building of the local government in Portage la Prairie has been located on land the hon. gentleman was interested in—

Mr. MARTIN.

Mr. MARTIN. That is absolutely untrue.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am obliged to ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw that statement. The hon. gentleman is too old a parliamentarian—

Mr. MARTIN. But the hon. member makes a statement with regard to me which is absolutely untrue.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw his expression.

Mr. MARTIN. But I cannot withdraw what I know—

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman refuses to withdraw his expression I shall be obliged to name him.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order. Chair.

Mr. MARTIN. I will submit to the Chair, but I must say—

Mr. SPEAKER. I have said that the hon. gentleman must withdraw his statement.

Mr. MARTIN. I accede to that, Mr. Speaker, but I think it is very unfair that the hon. gentleman—I do not see how I can withdraw—

Mr. SPEAKER. I must ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw the expression.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Withdraw.

Mr. MARTIN. I do withdraw.

Mr. BOYD. As I was remarking, every public building put up by the provincial government during the time the hon. gentleman was in the local legislature was placed upon the property which it was claimed he was interested in. The home for incurables—

Mr. MARTIN. I rise to a point of order. I ask, Mr. Speaker, whether the hon. gentleman can make statements with regard to me which are absolutely untrue, and I have no means of protecting myself?

Mr. BOYD. I say that was what the report was.

Mr. MARTIN. I say it was untrue.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The report ?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must not say that the hon. member is making statements respecting him that are absolutely untrue. That would be unparliamentary, and the hon. gentleman knows that. The hon. gentleman will have the opportunity of speaking again, and, if there are statements made by the hon. member which the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) says are without foundation and untrue, he will have an opportunity of stating his position.

Mr. BOYD. As I was remarking about these buildings, I have reference especially to the home for incurables. The hon. gentleman speaks about petitions that were sent here to the Dominion Government. Does he forget the application that was made to him at the time that the land titles office was being placed there ? I am credibly informed by gentlemen there that petitions signed by members of the county council and of the city council were presented to the hon. member for Winnipeg when he was Attorney General of the province, when he had the patronage of that town, asking him to place the lands title office in a more central locality, and I have been told that he answered them that they could go to the father of all lies, that he would put it where he pleased, and he did so. I have been told this by a man who occupied the position of mayor of the town. Now, the next building mentioned is the court-house and jail in Portage la Prairie, which he has placed immediately at the east end of the town. The present post office site was situated in a very central place. Now, it has been moved fifty yards west of where it was, in other words, taken from the centre of the block and placed on the opposite corner ; and yet he says it was taken away out of the town. The hon. gentleman makes a statement regarding the report of Mr. Smith. Although I have not seen that report, I have no hesitation in saying that the meaning he puts upon it is not correct. What Mr. Smith did report was the other site west was a good site, that could be purchased for $80 ; that the next site east of that was not so good, and he would not recommend. He reported that the other site west was a good site, that the foundation was safe, and therefore he would recommend that site. No person knows better than the hon. member for Winnipeg that in the eastern end of the city the cellars are nearly all filled with water at certain seasons ; in fact the hon. member's cellar is the only one in the east end that is kept dry, as I understand he has a windmill that pumps the water out. That is one reason why he suggested that this building should not be erected there. It is a well known fact that the court-house which the local government is now erecting is costing to-day for the foundation as much as it would cost to build the balance of the building ; whereas the site of the building that is being proposed will give a good foundation seven or eight feet distant from the surface before reaching water. He speaks about the business being done. I have evidence that 40 per cent of the business of the town is done west of the site where this building is proposed to be erected. Another point is that the central school, which you would suppose would be in some central locality, is one block west of the present proposed site. I may say that the centre of the population of the town is one or two blocks east of the present proposed post office site. I do not know that a post office should be erected for the benefit of the business men of the town any more than for the benefit of the rest of the people. As regards the location, I am quite prepared to assume the responsibility of the site for that post office ; and if the hon. member for Winnipeg thinks that he would have a chance of making a better case than he has made here, he will have a good opportunity of doing so by coming up there and testing it at the next election.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Boyd) has stated that the home for incurables and the land titles office building in the town of Portage la Prairie, were placed upon land owned by me.

Mr. BOYD. I did not.

Mr. MARTIN. Of course if he withdraws the statement, that is all right. But that is what I understood him to say, and then he qualified his statement by saying it was so reported. It makes no difference to me whether the report came from him, or to him from somebody else. Then he says that these two institutions which were built by the local government when I was a member of that government, were built on property belonging to me. The hon. gentleman knows that if that were so, it would have the effect of unseating me as a member of the House, because it was quite impossible for the local government to purchase from me land for either of these buildings. But I can tell the hon. gentleman that the local government did not purchase from me, directly or indirectly, either the land upon which the home for incurables was placed, or the site for the land titles office ; and I can tell the hon. gentleman that I never at any time owned the land upon which either of these buildings were located, and never had any interest in either of those properties. In the one case, the land was bought from Mr. William Smith, and in the other case from Mr. Michael Burke, and in both instances these men had owned the land for a long time previous to the time when I first saw the town of Portage la Prairie. But even if his charges were true, I do not think they would have anything to do with the question of the site of the post office, or what I did in the local government. The hon. gentleman also stated that a deputation came to me with regard to the site of the land titles office. I do not know that that makes any difference either with the case now before the House. I may say that the site of the land titles office was chosen by a committee of the municipal council of Portage la Prairie, and the site was recommended by them to the Government, and afterwards it was purchased by the Government. Afterwards, other interested parties in the town came to me and asked me to change the site. I made no such statement to them as the hon. gentleman suggests, but I did tell them that the site could not be changed. It is a most proper site for that institution and one which people generally are perfectly satisfied with. On the other hand, the site for the post office is a most improper one. From the silence of the Minister of Public Works, I take it for granted that he acquiesced in the statement of the hon. member for Marquette that he considers it part of his patronage, and that he is responsible for the selection of that site. It is a somewhat new doctrine, I think, that the Government should delegate its duties to individual members of this House. I was under the impression that it was the duty of the Public Works Department to select the site for the construction of the building. I did not know that there was any patronage belonging to individual members of the House in selecting a proper place upon which to construct a public building. I draw the attention of the House to this fact, that while the hon. gentleman claims it is part of his patronage to select a site for these public institutions, he has not said a word upon the very grave matter which I brought to the attention of this House, namely, that the Government gave for that site $75 a front foot, when its actual value was not more than $25 a front foot.

Mr. OUIMET. I did not think it was necessary to say anything, but I am surprised to hear the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) say that this site has been chosen exclusively because it has been recommended by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Boyd).

Mr. MARTIN. He said that, I did not say it.

Mr. OUIMET. His argument would be worth something if the department was unwilling to take the responsibility upon themselves. The pretended doctrine he has enunciated may appear very funny, but on the other hand, the House will agree with me that it is the duty of the heads of any department, as well as of the Government, whenever the interests of a constituency are concerned, to consult the representatives of that constituency. I did not consider that the advice of the hon. member for Marquette, as representative of the town of Portage la Prairie, was to be thrown aside just because the hon. member for Winnipeg came to me and told me that another site would suit him better. I have followed the hon. gentleman's suggestion to this extent: I have sent to Portage la Prairie an officer representing the department in Winnipeg, and generally in the province of Manitoba and the Northwest, a man in whose judgment, honesty and ability every one has full confidence, at least so far as I know, in that part of the Dominion. It is on the advice of Mr. Smith that this special site has been chosen. It is situated on the main business street of the town, Saskatchewan Avenue.

Mr. MARTIN.

Mr. MARTIN. There was no other possible street for it.

Mr. OUIMET. So we did not make a mistake so far as regards the street.

Mr. FRASER. Because there was no other.

Mr. OUIMET. I am sorry to hear that the only street in Portage la Prairie is Saskatchewan Avenue.

Mr. MARTIN. That is the only business street.

Mr. OUIMET. I have learned that at the eastern end of Portage la Prairie, the hon. member and other parties have built quite a town, but of course that has not diminished the value of the other portion. The interests of the west end must be taken into consideration. The present site, as far as I understand, lies between two main parts of the town, and if either one of the two sections is to be preferred it must be, according to my judgment, the west end, as that is the growing part of the town, and not the east end, which, although it has received the greater amount of patronage from the local government, has made practically no growth recently. The site is only about 150 feet from the site of the old post office, and during the last fourteen years no dissatisfaction has been expressed with respect to that site. If the old site had been available at a reasonable price, my preference would have been to have purchased it in order to avoid any question as to site. As to the value, the present site cost $75 per foot frontage, and I am told by Mr. Smith and others that there is not a single lot to be purchased at that price in the neighbourhood.

Mr. MARTIN. No, but for about one-third of that price.

Mr. OUIMET. On December 8th, a few days before the selection was made, a telegram was sent by Mr. Smith to Mr. Fuller, the chief architect of the department, as follows:—"Post office price is reasonable; below current rates for adjoining property." That, in my judgment, settles the question of price. It was the best site available, it was the cheapest site that could be purchased, and distinctly the best site, as a building lot, as in the foundations alone, the department will save several thousand dollars in the construction of the building. I hope the House will agree that the department did the best that could be done, and selected the most suitable site available, and I trust that when the papers are brought down at as early a date as possible, they will establish these facts to the satisfaction of every one concerned.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY ACCOMMODATION IN PRINCE COUNTY, P.E.I.

Mr. PERRY moved for :

Petitions, letters or other documents from the inhabitants of Duvar Road, Prince County, P.E.I., or from any other person, asking for a flag station at Duvar Road railway crossing.

He said : About a year ago the Department of Railways ordered the station at Mill River, Prince County, to be transferred to Howland Road. That was done at the request of several parties who petitioned the Government. It is about four miles to the north, while the location of the old station was about midway. I am well aware that the people in the locality of the old station agreed to its removal to Howland Road, but on the distinct understanding that a flag station should be placed at Duvar Road station. I trust the department will carry out their promise in this respect. No doubt, Duvar Road is an important settlement. Although it is thickly settled, no railway accommodation will be afforded to the inhabitants unless this flag station is provided at the crossing. This is a matter involving only a few dollars, and I trust the Minister will see his way clear to have the promise given carried out, and thus provide for the necessities of the people. They now have to travel four or five miles further than if the station was in the old locality. I have no objection to the removal to Howland Road, which is a very important settlement, but this change was made on the distinct understanding made and the solemn promise given by the Railway Department that a flag station would be erected at the Duvar Road crossing. I am not aware that any step has so far been taken to provide this station, but I hope the Minister, in the near future, will furnish the people this accommodation they require.

Motion agreed to.

EXPORT OF CANADIAN SHEEP.

Mr. FEATHERSTON moved for :

Copies of all correspondence or papers passed between the Dominion Government and the Imperial authorities relating to any shipments of sheep from Canadian ports to Great Britain since the 31st October, 1894, and alleged to have been diseased, and any reports or correspondence from our veterinary inspectors relating to the same.

He said : Mr. Speaker, I move this as a precaution against having our Canadian sheep scheduled in the British market, and I take this course on account of reports that Canadian sheep in England were found diseased with what is known as "scab." I wish to bring before the attention of the House the fact, that American sheep have been shipped through Canadian territory, and some of which have been condemned as diseased when they reached the other side. It is my opinion, Sir, that the cause of the disease existing amongst our Canadian sheep is on account of their coming in contact with American sheep in transit. In the Annual Report of the Minister of Agriculture for last year, I notice that there was no disease found among the sheep that were shipped from the port of Montreal. Out of the 121,000 sheep which we shipped from that port, only some seventeen were condemned, but they were condemned on account of injuries they received in transit and not because of any contagious disease. However, I find that a great many of our Canadian sheep were condemned in England, and had to be slaughtered there, and sold at a less price than if they had been sold on foot. I notice also in the Report of the Minister of Agriculture to which I have referred, that there is no reference to any American sheep coming through Canadian territory, except those entered at the port of Sarnia by the Grand Trunk Railway and Michigan Central in transit to Buffalo and Suspension Bridge on their way to American ports. The report of Mr. Westell, who is the Government veterinary inspector at Sarnia, states that sheep have been entered there, and they also have been entered at St. Armand, in the province of Quebec. There is no reference whatever in the report to any American sheep being exported from the port of Montreal. The 121,304 sheep shipped at Montreal are all set down as amongst the products of Canada. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is to my knowledge that over 30,000 American sheep were shipped from Montreal last year, and about half that number were shipped before this report was published. This year there are a great many more American sheep going from Montreal, and I have noticed that many American sheep which have been shipped from Boston and other United States ports, have been condemned in England during this last month. Several shipments of American sheep shipped through Canada have also been condemned in England, and last week our inspectors in Montreal noticed disease amongst American sheep sent to that port. Last week when I was in Montreal I had an opportunity of inspecting a lot of sheep that had arrived there from Chicago, and I noticed that some of them had this disease. The question in my mind, and in the minds of a great many people in Canada is that through the mixing up of American sheep with Canadian sheep in transit, there is great danger that our sheep will become diseased. This is a matter which demands the serious and immediate attention of the Government. I trust that they will see that no animals will be allowed to come in here for export which will be a cause of danger to the sheep export trade of Canada. We shipped a great many sheep to England in the fall of the year. Last winter especially we shipped a number of our best lambs, and if we have a good season we expect to ship a great many next year. It is therefore important in the interests of the country that our sheep should not be diseased, for, of course, if they are scheduled in England they will have to be slaughtered there, and their value will be immensely depreciated. I submit, therefore, that we should take all the precautions possible, and take them in time, so as to prevent our live sheep being debarred from the British market.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, there can, of course, be no objection whatever to the motion passing. Indeed, the Government appreciates the interest which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Featherston) as a practical man, has taken in the matter, and I may say to him, that the Department of Agriculture are very alive to the question of protecting our sheep export trade from any possible contamination which may come to it, through associations with the trade of the United States in that same line. I fear, however,—and the hon. gentleman will probably know the facts to which I allude—that the feeling which is now very widespread among the British farmers in their desire for protection against foreign importations, has had not a little to do with the suspicion which has been passed upon the shipment of sheep, as it had a very great deal to do in connection with the charge made that our herds were not free from pleuro-pneumonia. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Featherston), who no doubt has followed the discussion in the public press in this matter, will notice that at some time ago, the "Mark-Lane Express," while congratulating Mr. Gardner, the President of the Board of Agriculture, for dealing so effectively in the line of protecting the cattle resources of Great Britain from the competition of importations from Canada, went out of its way to suggest that the Department of Agriculture should now complete the work it had so well begun in connection with the cattle importations, and find some disease in Canadian sheep whereby they, as well as cattle, might be shut out of the British market alive.

Mr. FEATHERSTON.

There is no doubt that there is a desire on the part of those who raise cattle and sheep in the British isles to shut out our products or to cause the trade to be hampered and checked, and I fear that we may have some such effort made in reference to sheep as has been made in reference to cattle. However, I assure my hon. friend that we are glad to have his assistance as a practical man in our efforts to protect the sheep trade from every possible danger.

Mr. McMULLEN. This is unquestionably a very important subject; and, while the representative of the Minister of Agriculture in this House declares that the Government are ready and willing to give every assistance to protect the purity of our herds of sheep, we are sorry to have to say, and experience has proved that the Government have not given that assistance to protect the purity of our cattle.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Oh, yes, we have.

Mr. McMULLEN. No. Our experience has been that the Government have been very neglectful of their duty in that regard. It has been proven most clearly that, for several years they have quietly and knowingly winked at violations of the law.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We will discuss that later on.

Mr. McMULLEN. As a result of that, Canada is to-day suffering from her cattle being scheduled in the British market.

Mr. MONTAGUE. No.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. Minister is not posted, when he says, no. He says that the reason there is opposition to Canadian cattle in England is that the English people are anxious to secure the largest possible home market for the productions of their own people. The hon. Minister is, perhaps, not aware of the very serious effects resulting from the introduction of diseased animals, both cattle and sheep, into England; and it is not much wonder that they make a thorough inspection of the cargoes of these animals that are sent there. They are anxious to preserve the purity of their own herds, and if our Government had tried to cultivate the confidence of the English Government in this matter, we would not to-day be running the risk we are doing.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. McMULLEN. The object of the hon. member for Peel, in making this motion, is, if possible, to protect our Canadian sheep trade from disease being introduced into our herds by allowing American sheep to come into Canada and be exported to the English market as Canadian sheep. He has stated to the House, and his statement is backed up by official reports, that no less than 30,000 sheep have been imported into Canada from the United States, and exported from Canada to the English market as Canadian sheep. The House will understand easily what an enormous risk Canada is running in permitting this trade, in its very infancy, to be injured in this way. Is it possible that the Government will close their eyes to these facts? If this is allowed to go on, the interest of the Canadian farmer will be in danger of being placed upon as bad, or worse, a footing than that of the American farmer, in the English market. We know that the Americans are large exporters of sheep, not only to England, but to other countries, and we know that a large proportion of these exports is in the form of frozen mutton. Is it too much to ask, in the interest of the agriculturists of this country, that some effort be made by the Government to guard that great and important industry, when we consider the immense possibilities of our North-west in regard to developing an export trade in sheep? We know that there is an unlimited field there for the production of sheep; and are we going to allow the intermingling of the herds of the United States with our own to such an extent as seriously to injure the purity of our herds, and neutralize or ruin this important trade which is now in its infancy? I very much regret that we have not, in this House, as Minister of Agriculture, an experienced farmer. The gentleman supposed to preside over that department is comfortably ensconced in the other Chamber, beyond the reach of interrogations, and the hon. member who answers on his behalf in this Chamber is not a practical farmer, either. I am sure that there are many extensive and intelligent farmers in the ranks of that party who would ably discharge the duties of Minister of Agriculture. Why was it that over this most important industry, the most important in this Dominion, a man is appointed to preside as Minister of Agriculture who has no practical experience in that industry, and knows no more about its requirements than he does about the contents of the moon. He has not even a seat in this House, but has been ostracized to the Chamber of the Senate where nobody can reach him, and the gentleman who in this House has been appointed to discharge the duties of sponsor to the Minister of Agriculture, is a doctor by profession. I contend that agriculturists are not properly treated in this matter. We know perfectly well that when the interests of the manufacturers are at stake, the Government think nothing of picking up a man like Mr. Larke, at a salary of $3,000, and sending him to Australia, paying his expenses and the expenses of his family. Is he sent there in the interests of the agriculturists? Not at all. He is sent in the interests of our manufacturing industries; he is sent for the purpose of working up a trade for the Canadian manufacturers and the agricultural implement manufacturers, and classes of that kind. Have we ever heard of a man being employed and sent to any particular point for the purpose of working up the farming interest? See what the Americans are doing. They have in the British ports to-day veterinary surgeons, the ablest men in their profession, to look after the American shipments of sheep and cattle, to do everything they can in the interests of that trade, and these men are paid out of the revenues of the United States, and kept there at the expense of the United States. We have nobody. We have no one to take the Canadian exporter by the hand and give him advice. We can hire a man and send him to the Australian colonies in the interests of our manufacturing institutions, but the farmers are neglected. Nobody is sent abroad in their interests to take charge of matters of vital importance to them. I make this appeal because I know that the farmers of this country realize that they have been neglected, and they find fault with us if we do not persistently appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite to do something in the interests of this growing trade. Take the facts. The hon. First Minister (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) went to Australia some time ago, and travelled around at the expense of this Dominion. He addressed several meetings of the board of trade and other gatherings; he came back to this country and addressed the Board of Trade of Toronto, and other gatherings, concerning his visit to the Australian colonies. Was there a single word said with regard to the interests of the farming community? Not a word. All the addresses and speeches had for their burden the benefit of our manufacturing industries, and our farming interest was neglected as if it had no existence. We have subsidized a line of steamers to the Australian colonies, and they are now bringing to us frozen mutton, frozen beef, and other agricultural commodities, to compete with the products of this country. I hope that when the return asked for by the resolution of my hon. friend is brought down, the Government will, in the interests of the farming community, make an honest and earnest effort to preserve the purity of our sheep, and the advantages we have been enjoying in the English market. I am very sorry that the Secretary of State is not present to hear my remarks in this connection. I claim that the interests of our cattle trade were sacrificed through the neglect of the Government. I know that the hon. Secretary of State tried to cast ridicule on the information secured by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) with regard to the cattle. I know he said that they were from an unreliable source, and that the man who gave the information told an untruth. But that information was sworn to; it was given under a sworn affidavit, and if the Secretary of State believes it to be untrue, why does not the Minister of Agriculture have this man arrested for perjury. The Government may reply that he is living in the United States, but perjury is an extradictable offence, and if the Government want to punish this man they can do it. But they dare not make the attempt, because they know his statement cannot be refuted. They cannot show that the unfortunate condition in which that trade is at present is not directly attributable to their neglect. Are they going to have the sheep trade put in the same condition? Are they going to allow carload after carload of American sheep to come over our lines and be shipped from Montreal as Canadian exports? That has been done. Thirty thousand have been so exported. Are the Government going to permit that to continue until such time as our sheep trade is ruined along with our cattle trade. If the same line be followed out, which is followed with regard to our cattle trade, our sheep trade will shortly be in the same condition; and, unfortunately, we have not a man at the head of the Department of Agriculture who has the knowledge and the experience to enable him to grasp the situation. The man we have in that position, besides lacking the requisite knowledge and experience, has a seat in the Senate, and the duty of answering questions across the House has been put in the hands of a gentleman who is equally at sea with regard to farming matters and the export trade of cattle and sheep. For my part, I consider it my duty to bring this matter to the attention of the House on every opportunity, and thus clear my skirts of any responsibility.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am glad that my hon. friend the Secretary of State has come back to the House in time to hear the closing remarks of my hon. friend who has just spoken. The reason why, perhaps, the Secretary of State did not consider it necessary that he should be here was that he had successfully replied to the objections made by the hon. mover of the resolution. Now, it would not improve matters if I were to attempt, after the remarks of my hon. friend, to discuss these important agricultural questions, because the hon. gentleman has stated that one of the great troubles under which Canada is at present labouring is that the Minister of Agriculture is a lawyer, and I happen to belong to the same profession. The hon. gentleman stated that it was of great importance—and I agree with him—that that department should be presided over by a gentleman who understands the matters which he has to administer. But the hon. gentleman must be forgetting a page in the history of his own party.

Mr. McMULLEN. Two wrongs never made a right.

Mr. McMULLEN.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am quite certain we may have made a mistake in taking a leaf out of the hon. gentleman's book, and it might be a question whether we ought not to make up our minds never again to commit such an error. In the brightest days of the Mackenzie regime, gentlemen opposite who had been appealing to the people as Reformers, ready to rectify the mistakes which the Conservative party had made during so many years of power, selected as the First Minister of Agriculture the Hon. Mr. Letellier, who resigned to become a Lieutenant-Governor, and who was succeeded by a lawyer, a member of the same bar as the present Minister, and a member of the Senate like the present Minister, Hon. Mr. Pelletier. It seems to me that it comes with bad grace from these gentlemen to say that the troubles which, according to them, afflicts this Dominion, result from the agriculturists not being represented by one of their own class. I do not believe, as a matter of principle in judging men by the position they occupy in life, but I believe in judging them by the work they do. And, as far as I can judge public opinion, the present Minister of Agriculture is regarded as more successful in advancing the interests of the farmers than any of the gentlemen who occupied a similar position when the gentlemen now on your left, Mr. Speaker, had control of the Government. So far as the motion is concerned, I believe the Secretary of State, who represents the Minister of Agriculture in this House, has successfully replied to every objection. He has pointed out what must not be forgotten by the people of Canada, that the change in regard to our cattle was brought about in order to give the British farmers the semblance of protection. There is no farmer in England who does not know that no disease exists among the cattle of Canada, but the cattle of Canada were shut out in order to afford the English farmer protection against the Canadian farmer; it was the effort to secure for the English farmer that protection that was giving to our farmers the prosperity which we claim they enjoy under the National Policy.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I would like to remind the Postmaster General that it was under the Mackenzie Administration that our trade in cattle and sheep in Great Britain began. They had business men in that Government, and if they had a lawyer as Minister of Agriculture, he was a lawyer who knew something about farming, theoretically at least. I do not think the present Government or the Department of Agriculture can take much credit for their management of our cattle and sheep trade. We have been quarantined in the United States as a result of the impracticable and irritating policy pursued by this Administration. Then the Government have so badly maintained the regulations which the Imperial Government insisted upon, that they had our cattle scheduled in Great Britain. These are the reasons why, for the last two or three years, our market has been so low. For the last three years our people have not been able to sell their lambs at anything like a profitable price, and, for that reason, we have larger flocks to-day than at almost any other time in the history of the country. Now that the Government allow sheep to come in afflicted with disease, we are likely to see destroyed the trade in sheep as well. I am willing to give gentlemen opposite every credit where they deserve it, but the fact remains that this trade in cattle and sheep was built up under the Mackenzie Administration, and I was one of those who gave them a loyal support in carrying out that work. What the members of the Government did not know some of the rest of us did know, and our knowledge was used to develop this trade so that it became one of the most important to the farmers of Canada. I am sorry that gentlemen opposite have not any agriculturists among their supporters deemed fit for this position. Those who are given positions by gentlemen opposite are not those who are successful farmers in the ordinary sense of the word, but those who are successful in managing the political farm. There are some gentlemen among the supporters of the Government who have sought the place of Minister of Agriculture. They are fit for the position and would discharge its duties with credit to themselves and benefit to the country, at least we have it upon their own authority that they would do this. Still those who are called to the higher places under this Government are those who have been successful in political farming. It is no secret that the present Minister of Agriculture would not occupy the position he does to-day had it not been for the work he did for this Government in Quebec. He acted in a way to please the Government and so he is given a place in the Senate and taken into the Cabinet. I think if the Government will look around among their supporters they will find gentlemen whose knowledge better qualifies them for this position than one who has never had any connection with agriculture. But there is the contrast—while the Mackenzie Administration built up the trade in cattle and sheep, these hon. gentlemen have had our cattle scheduled in England and our cattle and sheep quarantined in the United States. I charge the Government that it is through their incapacity that these results have followed; I say it is through the laxity of the administration of this department that these calamities have overtaken, not only the cattle trade, but the sheep trade of this country. Why, I remember one occasion last summer when I was driving out through the riding I have the honour to represent, I saw immense flocks of sheep in every field, and I said: "How comes it that we have so many sheep up here?" "Why," the gentleman said to me, "they cannot sell sheep; there has been no market for sheep, they can scarcely give them away, and the consequence is that they have to keep them." And now the Government, through their negligence, are going to imperil the trade in sheep, which have been accumulating in such large numbers in our country. I feel a great interest in this matter, as well as in the cattle trade, because it is a large and important industry and adds to the revenue of the country, and a great deal of its material wealth; and I am anxious that the Government should not, through laxity, imperil this business, or destroy this trade, which promises so much, if properly looked after. I think I have replied to the Postmaster General, and have shown him something that he had probably forgotten in the heat of opposition.

Mr. McMILLAN. I wish to protest against the system of allowing American sheep to come into Canada and be shipped to England as Canadian sheep. These sheep should be properly inspected when they come into this country, and they should not be allowed to go out of this country and be shipped to England as Canadian sheep. It is a strange thing that our inspectors knew nothing about this disease being brought into the country until it was exposed in the public press. If any of these diseased sheep are allowed to go to the old country, our Canadian sheep will certainly be scheduled. The Postmaster General states that the present Minister of Agriculture has done more for the farmers of Canada than any of his predecessors. What has he done? He and the Premier has given a subsidy to steam vessels by which the farmers of the Antipodes are able to send their beef, and their mutton, and their butter into Canada to compete with us very keenly, while, at the same time, the Government pretend to be benefiting the farmers by giving them 20 cents per pound for their butter. That is what they have done. They have taken our market away from us; they have taken from us the advantage which nature had given us. I saw, the other day, that a shipment of butter had come from Australia to Vancouver, and thence to Sudbury, in the province of Ontario; while, at the same time, the Government have been taking the butter from Ontario and sending it to the old country. Let me say that the English farmers are not a unit against Canadian cattle being allowed to go to the old country. I know from experience that many English farmers are anxious to get our cattle, and if it had not been for the careless manner in which they were handled on this side by the Government, they would not have been scheduled. But when the Government allowed American cattle to come in in this manner, with as little inspection as is now given to American sheep, they were guilty of a negligence which has been one of the great causes of our animals being scheduled. I can assure the Minister that a large number of English farmers are anxious to get Canadian cattle, but when it is known that the Canadian Government, through their inspectors, are so very careless as to allow so many diseased animals to come in and to be shipped to England as Canadian animals, it will be another obstacle, not only to our sheep trade, but also to the renewal of our cattle trade. I say that the Government are doing a greivous injustice to the sheep raisers and the cattle breeders of our country, and if this thing is allowed to go on and sheep are allowed to be shipped from Canada to the other side without proper inspection, and the disease is not rigidly excluded at once, depend upon it, the day is not distant when our Canadian sheep will be prohibited from importation into England as well as our cattle.

Mr. FEATHERSTON. I am pleased with the remarks that have fallen from the Secretary of State to the effect that the Government would give all needed assistance for the protection of Canadian sheep. Now, Sir, I, for one, as being interested in the trade, am willing to give all the assistance I can, not only as a member of the Dominion Live Stock Association, but as a member of the House, representing the old county of Peel, whose farmers send so large a number of animals to the British market. I think it is very desirable that the Government should at once take this question into their serious consideration. The report has gone abroad to England by this time that diseased sheep have been stopped in Montreal; and, no doubt, as the Secretary of State has said, that the English farmers are watching with all their eyes, and desire to see our sheep prevented from going in there. Now, when the American Government was asked to remove the restrictions and allow Canadian cattle to be shipped from the ports of Boston, New York, and other places, to England, the department issued an order which read as follows:—

The Secretary of Agriculture has declined to modify the regulations regarding the importation of Canadian cattle so as to permit their export from the United States by way of Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore. The decision has been communicated to the collector at Plattsburgh by the Secretary of the Treasury, with instructions to notify the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company that their similar request is refused. The regulations in question were issued 11th February, 1895, and Secretary Morton wrote Secretary Carlisle, in reply to the suggestion of the latter that they be modified, in the following terms:—"The owners of cattle and sheep in the United States are entitled to protection by proper sanitary regulations in regard to imported animals. It is a difficult matter to carefully and thoroughly inspect sheep and cattle at the port of entry, when they must be hurried on for exportation from some other port. In order to give reasonable protection against the importation of contagious diseases, this traffic must be confined to as narrow an area as possible, and, therefore, the regulations restrict the importation of Canadian stock to the one port of Portland, Me., and require them to be taken there by the most direct routes. To allow the shipment of such stock to Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, which subject a large part of our territory to any danger which might exist from contagious diseases, and it also allows the cattle to go to cities where it is difficult to keep them isolated, and still more difficult to secure the disinfection of cars."

Now, those are the restrictions that are imposed by the American Government. I think it is the duty of our Government to arrive at some conclusion as to the best mode to adopt to prevent the spread of this disease amongst our sheep, because, I have been informed by Canadian sellers now in England, that unless we do something immediately, our sheep will likely be scheduled as our cattle have been. That will be a very serious thing for this country, because mutton is quite different from beef. When mutton is slaughtered in England, and put in cars as beef is, it will not keep as well, and cannot be handled as well as beef. Therefore, it is to our interest that this disease should be stamped out as soon as possible, and that we should prevent any unhealthy stock from coming in from the United States and being exported again. I think the Government ought, at the earliest moment to look into this matter, and take some decided step. No doubt the reports that this motion was on the paper created considerable excitement in Montreal, and the inspector there, as well as other men interested in the trade, immediately made a close inspection of the four cars of American sheep that came in last week, and in those four cars, containing over 600 sheep, they found six sheep diseased in two cars. I am satisfied that it was the fact of this motion being put upon the paper that brought this matter to the attention of the inspectors, and led them to find all the diseased animals they possibly could. I hope the Government will give them such assistance as will enable them to inspect every animal coming into the country, and to keep out every animal that is diseased. Now, Sir, these sheep had been purchased in Chicago, subject to this disease, and when the owner heard that these six diseased sheep were discovered, he sent orders from Chicago to have those two cars forwarded on to Boston, and they were forwarded on to Boston that they might be slaughtered and shipped in dressed meat cold storage. We want to preserve our sheep industry in its present form; we want, if possible, the opportunity to send our best lambs in the fall of the year by way of Montreal, and Portland, through the winter, to England, as we did last year, whereby we were able to realize pretty fair prices, now that we are shut out of the American market by the duty imposed on our lambs.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I trust that what I said before dinner in reply to the hon. gentleman, was not taken as a statement that the Government were not alive to the importance of this matter. From the tone of the speeches delivered by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) and the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan), I think they must have concluded that the statement made was that we were paying no attention to it whatever. On the contrary, my statement was that the Government were paying attention to it, not when the motion was placed on the Order paper by the hon. member for Peel, but as quickly as the reports were sent abroad. The departmental officers were instructed to exercise the very keenest observation in regard to this subject, and I pledge the Government to the hon. gentlemen that we will not under any circumstances allow any point to escape which will prove a benefit to the sheep trade.

Mr. McMILLAN. In many cases the very best inspectors of cattle are utterly ignorant of sheep and their diseases. As the matter stands at the present time there should be a practical shipper employed, one who possesses a thorough knowledge of sheep, particularly as to their disease, and that is what very few cattlemen possess. I hope the Government will pay attention to this matter, because the facts I have stated come within my knowledge as a practical farmer.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And the hon. gentleman will not object to the expense involved?

Mr. McMILLAN. No. What we do object to is that large expenditures should be involved without any real benefit resulting to the people, and at the same time no affective measures be taken when they are required.

Motion agreed to.

FISHING RIGHTS ON MATANE RIVER.

Mr. LAURIER moved for :

Copies of all contracts made by the Government granting fishing rights to individuals in the River Matane, and of all complaints and correspondence in relation thereto.

He said: I particularly desire to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that there is a standing lease of the fishing privileges on River Matane, which has been in existence, I believe, for fifteen years and over. As I understand the jurisprudence as at present settled by a recent decision of the Supreme Court, the Government of Canada can claim no right to the exclusive privileges of fishing in any waters. Those privileges, if they exist at all, would go to the benefit of the riparian owners, and I do not understand that at the present moment the Government can claim that they have any such rights as were conferred by them at the time the lease was entered into. The riparian owners along the river Matane, which is a valuable salmon river, have been debarred from the privilege of fishing for a great many years, but I should like to have an expression of opinion from the hon. Minister that if the riparian owners exercise the privilege of fishing for salmon they violate no law, and the Government have conferred no right whatever on the lessee under the old lease. At one time it was supposed the Dominion Government had the right to the fishing, and they extended it to any one they pleased; but I suppose at this date, in view of the decision that has been given in a New Brunswick case, if I remember rightly, the Government no longer claim that privilege.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries is not present, but I have no doubt he will offer no objection to the papers being brought down. I may say to the hon. gentleman that, speaking from recollection the lease for fishing in this river was granted a good many years ago, and in my time it expired. I renewed the lease, with a provision saving the rights and responsibilities of the Crown in that matter, and allowing the lessee to take it at his own risk. The hon. gentleman has correctly referred to the view of the fishing rights and privileges laid down in the case of the Queen and Robertson; but as the case was argued many questions were involved which did not directly come within the purview of that decision, or that could be said to be properly before the court. The practice after that decision rendered was, that while recognizing the rule laid down and the rights of the riparian proprietors, the governments and parties interested, not having taken action elsewhere, and the question being considered by the different local governments with the Federal Government in connection with the general principle involved, there being considerable difference of opinion as to the ultimate decision, these questions having to be finally decided by the Privy Council, there was put on foot negotiations by the Dominion Government, with all the different local governments so as to consolidate every question as to the fisheries, the jurisdiction over the harbours and the great lakes and questions regarding the foreshore, and in fact all the claims under the Fisheries Act of Canada, and the Fisheries Act of some of the provinces, notably that of Ontario. Finally these points were consolidated in a case that has been prepared for argument before the Supreme Court, with a view of obtaining the final decision of the Privy Council on all these questions. In view of the condition of the subject-matter, the Department of Marine continues to exercise jurisdiction which was no doubt indirectly questioned in the case of the Queen vs. Robertson. Where there was a renewal of these leases, and there are quite a number outstanding, it was decided to put in that clause, so that the lessees took them at his own risk, and on his own responsibility. The action of the Government in that regard was based, in a measure, upon the view that ultimately the case might be decided differently from what it had been in the Queen vs. Robertson.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I did not know that the Government had made any claim in the matter since the case of the Queen vs. Robertson. I think the principle upon which the court proceeded in that case was very clear. They recognized that the Crown claims a proprietary interest in the lands under the bottom of a river, in which the tide does not ebb and flow, just precisely the same as it does in lands not covered with water at all. And so, in granting proprietary rights, it usually grants the right in the soil to the middle of the stream. It has always been held in England, that the right of fishery goes with the soil to the proprietor, and that being so, the proprietary interest in the ground being in the Crown as associated with the local government, the interest or property in the fish in the stream in which the tide does not flow, would be in the Crown as associated with the provinces, and not in the Crown as associated with the Dominion. That principle was recognized in the case of Queen vs. Robertson. In the case of fisheries where the tide does ebb and flow, the rule, of course, would be different, and there is an English case, the name of which I cannot recall just now, in which it was held that while the Crown could grant a right of fishery to an individual in a stream where the tide did not ebb and flow, the Crown could not grant the exclusive right of fishery in a harbour, or in any portion of the sea coast, because there the right of the Crown was a right as a trustee for the nation, and not a proprietary right with which it could part. If such a right were to be dealt with it would require to be dealt with by Parliament, so that any right in a fishery, or any right to the fisheries within the three-mile limit upon the sea coast, it seems to me would be governed by a different principle from that which would prevail with regard to fisheries in streams, even though they are navigable, but in which the tide does not ebb and flow. It is an important question, under which of these rules the fisheries in the lakes come. There is an Irish case in which that question is disposed of, where the right of fishery in the lakes (which are very much smaller than ours) is rather upon the Crown as public trustees than as proprietors to the soil. That would seem to class the lakes along with the sea shore fisheries, rather than with the river fisheries. How far that third proposition would be applicable to our case I do not say at this moment, but it seems to me, that the distinction is very clear, and I do not see upon what ground the Government could set up a right to license persons engaged in salmon fishing, or any other kind of fishing, in any of the rivers or streams of the provinces.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. With reference to the point, as to how far these general principles have been affected by the British North America Act, the Federal Government is pressing for a decision and interpretation. That was one of the points involved directly here, and it was under this clause, to which I will refer, that Parliament assumed it had jurisdiction at the outset, and took authority to lease, and license, and regulate all these different fisheries. Section 91, of the British North America Act gives exclusive authority to the Parliament of Canada on matters coming within the subjects hereinafter enumerated, and clause 12 enumerates "sea coast and river fisheries." That, of course, will be set at rest by a judgment upon this comprehensive statement of the case.

Motion agreed to.

NORTH-WEST REBELLION—SCRIP FOR SCOUTS.

Mr. DAVIN moved :

That in the opinion of this House, the outstanding claims for scrip from the Wood Mountain and Maple Creek scouts, and also individual claims elsewhere of scouts and teamsters who were engaged actively in warfare during the rebellion of 1885 in the North-west Territories, should now be fully inquired into and the demands of justice satisfied.

He said : Mr. Speaker, since putting this motion on the paper, I have had a conversation with the Minister of Militia, and he agrees with the motion, and has told me he would inquire into the claims of the persons in whose interest this motion has been moved. When I came down here in 1887, I brought before the House the claims of certain volunteers, and an inquiry was subsequently instituted into the claims of the volunteers and others. It was conducted by Mr. Sedgewick, now Mr. Justice Sedgewick of the Supreme Court, and Mr. Sedgewick decided in favour of the volunteers whose claims I put before him, and also in favour of certain other persons. But the claims of the scouts, and of teamsters who were under fire, have never been attended to. An Act was passed in 1885 which provided for giving land or scrip to volunteers engaged in putting down the rebellion, and in 1886 an Act was passed providing that those who acted as scouts should get land or scrip. It was under these two Acts we made the claim, and it is under the Act of 1886 I make the claim that is implied by the motion before the House. The only object of bringing the motion before the House and urging the House to pass it would be to influence the Government. But as the present Minister of Militia has told me that he intends to do the very thing which this motion asks should be done, namely, to inquire into the demands of these persons, who still feel that in justice they should get either scrip or land, I will not put the House to the trouble of dividing on the motion.

Motion agreed to.

CREAMERY AND CHEESE FACTORIES IN THE NORTH-WEST.

On the Order

That in the opinion of this House, it would be expedient to apply $20,000 to aid in establishing creameries and cheese factories in the North-west Territories, and that this sum should be considered as an addition to the immigration grant; that, further, the Government should at once take into consideration the propriety of giving a bonus on butter exported to the London markets, as is done by some of the Australian colonies, and also of raising the Customs duty from 4 cents per pound to 6 cents, in order to enable the North-west farmers to compete with the Australian exporters in the British Columbia markets.

Mr. MONTAGUE. In deference to the wish of some gentlemen who are not here to-night, and who desire to take part in the discussion of this question, I would like this motion to stand.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) According to your ruling of the other day, Mr. Speaker, this motion is out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. No, this is merely the expression of an abstract opinion that it would be expedient to apply $20,000 to aid in establishing creameries and cheese factories in the North-west Territories. That imposes no burden on the public, because no Bill can be introduced into Parliament, even supposing this resolution passes, except on the authority of the Crown.

Motion allowed to stand.

BELL BUOY FOR LITTLE HOPE ISLAND.

Mr. FORBES moved for :

Return giving copies of all petitions, letters and telegrams in the possession of the Government relating to the placing of a bell-buoy on the inside of Little Hope Island, off Lower Port Joli Harbour.

He said : This resolution refers to the better lighting of the south coast of the province of Nova Scotia, in the interest of the shipping along that coast and of the fishermen who use our inshore fisheries. I had occasion to call the attention of the Government to this matter some time ago. Little Hope Island is situated off the south-west coast of Nova Scotia. It is an important island to navigators, and has upon it a very large lighthouse, being in the track of vessels going coastwise up and down that coast, and of the fishermen who use the inshore or nearer outside shore fisheries. Between that island and the mainland there is a reef over which at certain seasons of the year there is very shoal water, which a very slight tempest is sufficient to agitate to such an extent as to make it dangerous for vessels going in and out. It is also dangerous to fishermen when fogs are thick along the coast during the fishing season, which is about the whole year. If a bell-buoy or a fog-whistle were placed on or near the coast of this island, it would be a great convenience to the shipping and to the fishermen. The fishermen and others acquainted with the locality would rather have it placed on the reef than anywhere else. As a result of my negotiations with the department, I was referred to the Government agent at Halifax, who was instructed to make a survey of the locality. He did so, and reported that a bell-buoy of smaller size than that which I desired, if placed on the inside coast of the island, would serve the purpose. While I could not get what I considered best in the interests of the fishermen and the coastwise shipping, yet I was satisfied with the statement made by the officials of the department; but from that day to this, although three years have elapsed, nothing has been done, and I have not been able to get any satisfaction. Therefore, I would again urge upon the Government the absolute necessity of providing a bell-buoy or fog-whistle on the inside coast of this island, to serve as a guide to the fishermen and mariners during foggy seasons or at the end of a voyage, when they wish to make a harbour of refuge. It is the habit of the fishermen in that district to lay off for three or four days and engage in fishing. Their boats are of small size and are manned by small crews; and in tempestuous weather, or in an inclement season, or when their work is ended, and they make for the harbour, their lives and property are subjected to great danger in the absence of the protection for which I ask. I know that the last Minister of Marine and Fisheries looked into this matter carefully, and it was upon his report that the inspector went down and inquired into it; and I was led to believe that the necessary provision would at once be made, and supposed the Government was honest in its intention. Now that I have been obliged to call the Government's attention publicly to it, and to press upon them and upon the House the necessity of supplying this long felt want, I do hope that I shall not be required to do so again. It is not necessary at this particular time that I should dwell upon the importance of the industry to which this bell-buoy would afford an aid. I beg, therefore, again simply to urge this matter upon the attention of the Government if they have not had it drawn to their attention by their own officers. I am satisfied that the petitions which have been sent by the fishermen and the inhabitants of the south shore, the letters and telegrams in possession of the Government, and the reports of their own officers, and my earnest and frequent solicitations, will show most conclusively the necessity of at once complying with this request of a large number of the inhabitants of Nova Scotia.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am quite sure that when the papers are brought down, my hon. colleague—who was unable to be present to-night—will give the hon. gentleman all the information he requires.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION AS TO INDUSTRIAL PROPERTY.

Mr. DENISON moved :

That in the opinion of this House, Canada should take advantage of the International Convention as to industrial property, and that the Government should take such steps as are necessary to attain that object.

He said : As this motion was so far down on the list, I did not expect it to be reached to-night, and, consequently did not expect to be able to go on with this motion. However, as it is late in the session, I think I had better briefly explain the object I have in view. I have in my hand "Sebastian on Trade-marks," which contains the terms of the International Convention, entered into by some of the countries of Europe for the purpose of protecting their trade-marks and patents. It was signed on the 20th March, 1883, but the Imperial Government did not give its adhesion until the 6th of June, 1894. Article 2 explains the arrangement, as follows :—

The subjects or citizens of each of the contracting states shall, in all the other states of the union, as regards patents, industrial designs or models, trade-marks and trade names, enjoy the advantages that their respective laws now grant or shall hereafter grant to their own subjects or citizens.

Consequently, they shall have the same protection as the latter and the same legal remedy against any infringement of their rights ; provided, they observe the formalities and conditions imposed on subjects or citizens by the international legislation of each state.

The next article provides that subjects or citizens of states not forming part of the union but who are domiciled or have industrial or commercial establishments in the territory, of any of the states of the union, may be assimilated to the subjects or citizens of the contracting states. Article 4 provides :

Any person who has duly applied for a patent, industrial design or model, or trade-mark in one of the contracting states, shall enjoy, as regards legislation in the other states, and reserving the rights of third parties, the right of priority during the periods hereinafter stated.

Consequently, subsequent legislation in any of the above states of the union, before expiry of these periods, shall not be invalidated through any acts in the interval : either, for instance, by another legislation, by publication of the invention, or by the working of it by a third party, by the sale of copies of the design or model, or by the use of the trade-marks.

The above mentioned terms of priority shall be six months for patents and three months for industrial designs and models and trade-marks. A month longer is allowed for countries beyond sea.

Article 16 allows all other nations to be brought under the terms of this treaty :

States which have not taken part in this convention, shall be permitted to adhere to it, at their request.

Such adhesion shall be notified officially through the diplomatic channel of the Government of the Swiss Confederation, and by the latter to all the others. It shall imply complete accession to all the clauses and admission to all the advantages stipulated by the present convention.

The Imperial Government evidently found it was in the interests of their merchants and traders that they should give in their adhesion to this convention, and, on the 6th June, 1884, the United Kingdom joined the convention, at the same time reserving their right to accede thereto on behalf of any of the colonies, after giving due notice. By Order in Council subsequently passed, the provision of the Patents, Design, and Trade-mark Act of 1883 (Imperial) were made applicable to the different countries that were in convention at the time, as follows :—

Belgium, Brazil, Denmark, France, Guatemala, Italy, Holland, Norway, Portugal, Servia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Tunis, the United States, New Zealand and Queensland.

The benefits to be derived would be : Protection to the different trade-marks in all the different countries within the convention for a period of seven months ; rights of priority to parties applying for patents during the same space of time ; within that period, no rights could be invalidated by publication of the inventions, by another registration, by the importation of the article, by the working of it by a third party, or by the sale of a design, or use of a trade-mark. On importations, &c., all goods bearing illegal trade-marks will be seized, trade-marks duly registered in Canada would be admitted to protection in the form originally registered ; trade names would be protected without registration, whether forming part of a trade-mark or not. The question, of course, now comes in, why Canada should not enter this convention as there are annually about 725 Canadian inventors and 375 parties who obtained trade-marks. Evidently, when our criminal code was passed, our possible adhesion to this convention was foreseen, because the paragraphs in our criminal code dealing with trade-marks are taken almost verbatim from the Imperial statutes on the same subject.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. This is a very important question, and, as several of my colleagues who are particularly interested are absent, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. EDGAR. I do not propose to discuss this question at all, only I would like to call the attention of the Government to this state of affairs. They went into a convention once on the subject of copyright—at least they allowed England to go in and represent them at the Berne convention. Perhaps they were right, perhaps wrong, but, at any rate, Canada, for reasons of her own, made up her mind a good while ago that she wanted to get rid of that treaty, and this Parliament unanimously passed an address, many years ago, asking the Government, on behalf of Canada, to denounce that treaty. And the British Government has, so far, failed to do that. Well, now, I suggest that if this convention ever goes on, and if Canada ever joins in it, the representatives of Canada should take good care that there shall be a clear and distinct understanding that if and when Canada desires to denounce that treaty she shall be at liberty to do so.

Motion agreed to.

TOWING SAW-LOGS ACROSS GEORGIAN BAY AND LAKE HURON.

That as an immense number of saw-logs are towed across Georgian Bay and Lake Huron, the bark of which coming off, causes great damage to the nets of fishermen in those waters, it is advisable that the Government take steps to compel those persons towing logs to take the bark all off before the logs are put in a boom for export.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). The report of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will be of great value to me in arguing this motion; and, as it is not yet distributed, but is expected to be distributed in a few days, I would ask that this motion be allowed to stand.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Stand.
