Bill (No. 1) respecting the Administration of Oaths of Office.—(Mr. Foster.)

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that when the House did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate Chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both Houses of Parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows :—

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

It is with much satisfaction that I again have recourse to your advice and assistance in the administration of the affairs of the Dominion.

By the sudden and lamented death of the late Right Honourable Sir John Thompson, Canada has sustained a grievous loss. The deep and heartfelt sympathy expressed by Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen, and the manifestations of sorrow with which the distressing intelligence was received throughout the Empire, as well as tokens of esteem and respect everywhere paid to the memory of the deceased statesman, have been gratefully appreciated by the people of Canada.

Satisfactory assurances having been received from Her Majesty's Government respecting the interpretation of certain clauses in the Treaty of Commerce with France, ratifications will be exchanged as soon as the necessary legislation has been passed.

The recent action of the Imperial Parliament enabling the various Australasian Governments to enter into preferential trade relations with the other self-governing Colonies of the Empire, affords gratifying proof that the suggestions of the Colonial Conference are being favourably entertained by Her Majesty's Government.

In conformity with a recent judgment of the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, to the effect that the dissentient minority of the people of Manitoba have a constitutional right of appeal to the Governor General in Council against certain Acts passed by the Legislature of the province of Manitoba in relation to the subject of education, I have heard in Council the appeal, and my decision thereon has been communicated to the Legislature of the said province. The papers on the subject will be laid before you.

The depression in trade which has prevailed throughout the world for the past few years has made itself felt in Canada, but fortunately to a less degree than in most other countries. Although this has not resulted in any considerable decrease in the volume of our foreign trade, yet, owing to low prices and recent reductions in and removal of taxation, it has been followed by a serious decrease in revenue derived from Customs and Excise. In order to produce equilibrium between revenue and expenditure for the coming year, it will be necessary to observe the greatest possible economy in the appropriations for the various branches of the public service.

During the period that has elapsed since the last Session of Parliament, I have had an opportunity of visiting many portions of the Dominion, including the Maritime Provinces, Manitoba, the North-west Territories and British Columbia. Throughout these tours I have been impressed and gratified by manifestations of an abounding loyalty and public spirit; and notwithstanding the phase of trade depression already referred to, I observed everywhere unmistakable signs of that confident hopefulness in the future, based on a thorough belief in the greatness of the resources of Canada, which is one of the characteristics of her people, and which furnishes a good augury and pledge of further development and progress.

The Government of Newfoundland having intimated its desire to renew negotiations looking to the admission of that colony into the Dominion of Canada, a sub-committee of my advisers have recently met in conference a delegation from the Island Government and discussed with them the terms of union. It will be a subject of general congratulation if the negotiations now pending result in the incorporation of Her Majesty's oldest colonial possession into the Canadian Confederation.

Mr. SPEAKER.

Measures relating to bankruptcy and insolvency, and to joint stock companies will be laid before you. You will also be asked to consider certain amendments to the Insurance Act, to the Act respecting Dominion Notes, to the Dominion Lands Act, to the Indian Act, to the North-west Territories Representation Act, as also a Bill respecting the land subsidy of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I have directed that the accounts of the past year shall be laid before you. The Estimates for the ensuing year will also be presented. They have been framed with every regard to economy compatible with the efficiency of the public service.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I now leave you to the discharge of the important duties devolving upon you with an earnest prayer that, being guided by the spirit of wisdom and patriotism your deliberations may, under the divine blessing, conduce to the unity and well-being of Canada.

Mr. FOSTER moved :

That the Address with which His Excellency has been pleased to open the session be taken into consideration to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. FOSTER moved :

On Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.—4. On Miscellaneous Private Bills.—5. On Standing Orders.—6. On Printing.—7. On Public Accounts.—8. On Banking and Commerce.—9. On Agriculture and Colonization;—which said Committee shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House; and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon; with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 19th April, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY— INTERNAL ECONOMY.

Mr. FOSTER presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message as follows :—

ABERDEEN.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, an approved minute of Council, appointing the Honourable George Eulas Foster, Minister of Finance, the Honourable Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, Minister of Justice, the Honourable John Graham Haggart, Minister of Railways and Canals, and the Honourable Joseph Aldric Ouimet, Minister of Public Works, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons, as Commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of the 13th Chapter of the Revised Statutes of Canada, intituled "An Act respecting the House of Commons."

Government House,
Ottawa, 18th April, 1895.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House proceeded to the consideration of His Excellency's speech delivered at the opening of Parliament.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, in rising to move that an humble address be presented to His Excellency in answer to the Speech from the Throne in this, what in all probability will be the last session of the 7th Parliament of Canada, I do so fully conscious of the duty entrusted to me, and likewise of the compliment paid to the constituency I represent, and also the compliment to my humble self. In referring to the Address from the Throne, I from the bottom of my heart, aye, Sir, from its innermost core, regret the sad occurrence referred to in the first paragraph, the untimely decease of the late Right Honourable Sir John Thompson. Coming as he did to this House little more than seven years ago, unheralded and unsung, soon it dawned upon the people of Canada as also upon the members of this House, that a master-mind had been placed in this arena. We all remember with what bounds and strides Sir John Thompson advanced. Step by step he passed on until at last the great goal of his ambition was reached, becoming the proud Premier of this vast Dominion. A short year ago we saw the hon. gentleman here, to all appearances, at least to all outward appearances in the possession of robust and rugged health, and little did we dream that on this our assembling again, he would not be with us, and his absence to-day recalls all more painfully and vividly. Need I recall his tragic death in historic Windsor Castle, aye, even almost in the presence of royalty itself, and the closing of a life and ending of a career not only as a colonial statesman, but in all probability in some future day, had he lived, as an Imperial Councillor. I do not propose to dilate upon his excellencies, that I shall leave to the historian of the future, and when the history of Canada is written no name will stand out in bolder relief than that of the brilliant parliamentarian, the great Premier, the patriotic statesman, Sir John Thompson, of whom well might it be said :

"His life was gentle and the elements so mixed in him, That nature might stand up to all the world and say : This was a man."

But as we speed the parting guest, so in turn we welcome the coming, and honour having been paid departed merit, it is now my duty to pay respect to existing worth. Thrice in three successive years, the Conservative party of Canada has lost its respected leaders, and thrice in that time has it been prophesied that the downfall of the party would be consummated. But, Sir, I say : that as upon the death of Sir John Macdonald, so upon the death of Sir John Thompson, the ranks were closed, the squares filled, and under the leadership of the talented gentleman who now leads the party, victory is assured, as victory has been assured in the past, when an appeal shall be made to the electorate of this Dominion. Now, Sir, to refer to some of the matters that are contained within the Address. It seems only right and proper that I should at the outset allude to that clause which speaks of the legislation recently enacted by the Imperial Parliament in reference to the Australian provinces, when it is borne in mind that the Rt. Hon. First Minister of the day had a great part in the bringing about of the Colonial Conference, which we were all pleased witnesses of last year. Under the constitution of Australasia, a charter was granted in the year 1873, conferring on those colonies the right of self-government, but for reasons best known to themselves, limitations and provisos were inserted in reference to trade, which resulted in commerce being restricted as between the Australasian colonies themselves. That, Sir, has been to the people of these provinces a serious and great drawback, and that undesirable condition of affairs has been terminated as a result of the intercolonial conference held here last year—a conference which was truly representative, not only in its character from a colonial standpoint, but likewise by its being graced with the presence of an Imperial Councillor in the person of the Earl of Jersey thereby evidencing that interest which the mother land takes, and which we trust she will always take in the prosperity of her colonies. On that occasion resolutions were passed asking that the Imperial Government might be pleased in their wisdom to enact legislation which should give to those Australian colonies the rights and privileges which are enjoyed by the people of Canada in reference to commercial treaties, and I was pleased to hear it announced in the Speech from the Throne that such legislation had been enacted, and we trust and hope that by reason of it, there may be inaugurated between the Dominion and the provinces of Australasia, a stream of commerce and trade which will be an enduring benefit to both, and which will tend to bind in closer unity and to knit together these colonies of that great Empire of which we are pleased to be an integral part. In the Address there is a most pleasing reference made to His Excellency the Governor General. Coming here as the successor to distinguished noblemen, His Excellency found for himself no easy task: but, Sir, I believe that the conduct of His Excellency, since he has been in Canada, manifesting in all matters pertaining to the welfare of the commonwealth a deep and abiding interest, has caused the people to have for him a warm place in their hearts, and also for his most excellent consort, who has most ably seconded all his efforts. And when the time comes for His Excellency to pass from his present position to those high duties which we trust the Imperial Government will hereafter assign to him, I believe he will, like his predecessors, lend his hearty aid to the promotion of the material prosperity of this colony in the mother land. And now, Sir, I come to discuss a matter not pertaining to commerce, but involving one of those unfortunate questions which unhappily for the public of Canada, it seems are never to end. We in Canada had thought when the consolidation of the different provinces was brought about, that then once and for ever there would be a stilling of all discord in respect to questions of race and religion. We thought those differences would be quelled; we thought they would be buried in oblivion never again to be resurrected. But, unfortunately, differences of opinion on these questions have arisen from time to time, and within the last few years what is known to-day as the Manitoba school question has been before the people of this Dominion, and is at the present time more particularly before the people of the province of Manitoba for adjudication. In 1870, after negotiations, Manitoba was admitted into the confederation.

Mr. BENNETT.

Prior to that time there had been in that region no settled form of government, no institutions with provincial autonomy; and consequently there had been a school system free to all sects, and not owing thanks to any government for contributions or aid. The Roman Catholics, the Episcopalians, and the Presbyterians each had their own schools; and so, when the province of Manitoba was admitted into the confederacy, and had engrafted upon its constitution all the rights and privileges which are conferred upon the other provinces, power was given to that province to deal with the question of education exclusively, subject, however, to those limitations and provisos which were contained in the Manitoba Act, which Act was afterwards approved of by the Federal Government of Canada. Under this system, from the year 1870 to the year 1890, educational matters in Manitoba pursued the even tenor of their way, and from neither one side nor the other were heard any complaints or remonstrances. There were the two religious bodies, those professing the Protestant faith and those professing the Roman Catholic faith, living side by side in unity, carrying on the institutions of the country, but reserving to themselves, as they each had the right to do, the educational system they preferred. But, Sir, it remained for the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), and those with whom he was associated, at one fell stroke to interfere with all existing regulations, and to sweep away all the vested rights that up to that time existed; and then commenced this unhappy friction which has been disturbing that country from that day to this. When that legislation was put into effect in Manitoba the Roman Catholic minority of the province, feeling aggrieved, feeling that they had not been dealt fairly by, feeling, as the facts show, that the Manitoba Government had given a pledge that those vested rights should not be interfered with, appealed to the superior power, the Federal Government at Ottawa, to exercise the veto power of disallowance in their behalf. That appeal having been made to the Federal Government, what was their answer? it having been stated that the Act of the Manitoba legislature was not within the power of that legislature—that, according to the legal expression, the Act was ultra vires. That question having been raised and argued, the Federal Government declined to intervene, and left the matter to be adjudicated in the courts. Afterward, the case known as the Barrett case, which was submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada and afterwards carried on appeal to the Privy Council of England was instituted when it was decided by the highest court that the Act was fully within the power of the local legislature. Debarred from redress on their legal rights, the minority then had recourse to another form of appeal which had been suggested, and which, during the consideration of the appeal in the Barrett case, had been referred to as applicable to the question—that was the power of appealing to the Federal Government for clemency and for redress. Now, Sir, I ask hon. gentlemen to mark well that latterly that phase of the question has been discussed, as it must be remembered, and the record will prove it, that when the question came before the Privy Council whether the Act was constitutional or not, it was openly stated and contended that even if under their legal rights the minority were estopped, they had at least left to them the right to appeal to the Federal power for clemency. Now, in 1890 this question was before the Parliament and the people of Canada; and, taking advice from cases of a somewhat analogous nature which had produced dissension and discord in this country on previous occasions, an hon. gentleman who then had the honour of representing a constituency in this House, and who was an acknowledged jurist—I refer to the Hon. Edward Blake—caused to be placed upon the statute-books of this country a resolution which reads as follows:—

That it is expedient to provide means whereby on solemn occasions touching the exercise of the power of disallowance, or of the appellate power as to educational legislation, important questions of law or of fact may be referred by the executive to a high judicial tribunal for hearing and consideration, in such mode that the authorities and parties interested may be represented, and that a reasoned opinion may be obtained for the information of the executive.

Now, Sir, I repeat that the Federal Government being appealed to, had no other course open to them than to hear the appeal that was presented by the minority of the province of Manitoba; and when that case came on in its proper course by way of petition or memorial, the Government of the day under the late Premier referred it to the Supreme Court of Canada for a decision as to whether or not that course should be followed. A series of questions were submitted, some six in all, and they were all negatived by a majority of the Supreme Court. Estopped in that direction, another avenue was open to the minority, and that was by an appeal to the Law Lords of the Imperial Privy Council; which appeal was taken in due time. It has been argued that the Federal Government in this regard, had done something that was not at all incumbent upon them, in fact that they had gone out of their way in listening to the appeal for clemency put forward by the minority of Manitoba. But, in answer to that, I have this to say, that throughout these proceedings, as I believe, not only were the Government of the day acting within the constitution, but, moreover, and beyond that, the very fact that in these proceedings, and in all subsequent proceedings, the Manitoba Government were represented by counsel indicated, that even in the opinion of that Government every step taken in the case was regular and proper. Now, Sir, what were the questions submitted, and to these questions what answers were given? I do not propose to read them at length, because they are in all the reports. But when the matter came before the Law Lords in England, among other questions, this one was asked:

Has His Excellency the Governor General in Council the power to make the declarations or remedial orders which are asked for in the said memorials and petitions, assuming the material facts to be as stated therein, or has His Excellency the Governor General in Council any other jurisdiction in the premises?

And another question propounded for answer was this:

Did the Acts of Manitoba relating to education, passed prior to the session of 1890, confer on or continue to the minority "a right or privilege in relation to education" within the meaning of subsection 2 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, or establish a system of separate or dissentient schools, within the meaning of subsection 3 of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867; if said section 93 be found applicable to Manitoba; and if so, did the two Acts of 1890 complained of, or either of them, affect any right or privilege of the minority in such a manner that an appeal will lie thereunder to the Governor General in Council?

The answers to these questions were respectively as follows. To the first:

That the Governor General in Council has jurisdiction, and the appeal is well founded, but that the particular course to be pursued must be determined by the authorities to whom it has been committed by the statute.

And in answer to the second:

That the Acts of Manitoba relating to education passed prior to the session of 1890, did confer on the minority a right or privilege in relation to education within the meaning of subsection 2 of section 22 of "The Manitoba Act," which alone applies; that the two Acts of 1890 complained of did affect a right or privilege of the minority in such a manner that an appeal will lie thereunder to the Governor General in Council.

Now, Sir, these were the answers delivered by the Imperial Privy Council to the two questions propounded, and I submit, and every fair-minded man will agree, that the duty was incumbent upon the Privy Council of Canada to hear the matter complained of. Well, Sir, in due course, that appeal was heard; in due course that appeal was argued. And once again did the province of Manitoba show that they believed that everything that had been done by the Government was right, that they believed the Dominion Government was acting within the strict letter of the law, was entirely within its constitutional rights and privileges by their acquiescence in having a representative and counsel at that hearing. I have recapitulated all the facts, I have recapitulated all the steps that have been taken in the case; and all that has been done has been the handing over of the case by the Dominion Government to the government of the province of Manitoba. And, Sir, it is to be trusted by all those who would wish to see the disappearance from the arena of Federal politics of matters of this vexed nature that the province of Manitoba may be pleased to arrange amicably between the parties the rights or privileges of the minority in respect of the matters complained of, and which the Privy Council stated had been affected. Now, Sir, I come to deal with the phase of the Address in reference to the trade and commerce of the country as it at present exists, and as it has existed during the past year. And, referring to the phraseology of that, I do regret, in common with hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, that there has been in this Dominion a depression in trade that has resulted in a decrease of our revenue; that has resulted in this year of grace, in a deficit in the income of the Dominion. Sir, the faces of hon. gentlemen opposite light up at the prospect of a deficit. That is to be little wondered at, because in a deficit they recognize an old friend. Year after year they sat on the Treasury benches, and year after year they had to announce to the country that deficit after deficit was piling up, but they consoled themselves with the reflection that they had transferred them to capital account. Contrast that with the other picture. Year after year, instead of deficits of from one to two millions piling up, we found, under a Conservative Administration, a surplus announced annually, reaching in one year nearly the colossal sum of $4,000,000. I am not, at this time, going to discuss whether it was right or wrong to pile up those surpluses. But this I do say—that the surpluses so piled up were of benefit to the people in this way, that, while they had the capital on hand without unduly taxing the people, the Government expended those surpluses in great public works which have been, and will be for all time of enduring advantage. Now, Sir, there must be reasons for a deficit. And I have no doubt that before this session closes, hon. gentlemen, very fruitful in charges, very prolific in contentions, will allege many reasons why a deficit has occurred. First, throughout the whole civilized world, there has been, during recent years a most wonderful depression. Situated as we are, close to the great republic to the south of us, feeling as we do the very pulsations and throbs of the commercial life of that country, little was it to be wondered that such depression would not penetrate within our borders. But I am proud and pleased to say that the depression in the Dominion of Canada has not at all reached the extent of the depression which has been felt throughout the length and breadth of the United States of America; and to-day no country in the world has a more fair distribution of wealth, has a more fair distribution of prosperity, has a more fair distribution of comfort, than Canada. And I say that it is in great measure due to the fiscal policy which not only has predominated in this country for years past, but which shall predominate, I believe, for years to come. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been crying for an opportunity to test in a constituency the trade policy of Canada as it has been under this Government. Where were the gentlemen opposite when there was an election in Haldimand the other day? Echo answers, "where?" And though the hon. leader of the Opposition was almost within a stone's throw of the Liberal stronghold of Verchères, his silence on that occasion was golden. And, although he has the honour of representing one of the constituencies of the city of Quebec, he permitted two Conservatives to make the fight to a finish in the adjoining riding to his own. Sir, these are signs of the times, and most unexampled proof that when the appeal is made to the people of this country they will endorse the fiscal policy which has been in force since 1878. Now, Sir, I have an authority under my hand, a most eminent authority, that of Mr. Sauerbeck, who, in a recent issue of the "London Times," has made this statement: and being a statistician of the very highest order, and an acknowledged authority in the old country, to his statements some reliability must be attached; and he has proved conclusively that within the last 100 years there have never been lower prices realized for the exports of Great Britain than in the past year. Moreover, he has proved that in the years 1878 and 1879, as contrasted with the present year, prices of exported goods from England were 20 per cent higher than they are to-day. Well, Sir, what has that to do with Canada? I say that has a great deal to do with it, for in that time we were importing from Great Britain at prices which were one-fifth higher than they are to-day, and it must be borne in mind that if duty is paid on an article of the value of only $50, the same duty paid on an article of the value of $100 will produce more revenue to this country. So in the decreased price of every article we have purchased, and, while our consumption may not have been less, the value of the goods so consumed has been less, and, as a result, there has been a lessening of the revenue. Then, it must be considered that on many articles the tariff of this country has been greatly reduced in the last year or so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. member says "Hear, hear." I trust he says it approvingly, and I believe he does. But as a result, what do we see? We see that the revenue derivable from a great many of the large staples has been most materially reduced. Take, in the first place, the goods that have been entered for consumption. In this year, as against last year—and I am speaking as to values—there has been a decrease of eight millions and a half worth of goods; then, the duty collected on these goods, as contrasted with the preceding year, has been less by a million and three-quarters of dollars. But the most noticeable changes have been in respect of the very goods which were affected by a reduction in the tariff, as witnessed in the fact that the revenue derivable from woollen goods has decreased, as compared with the preceding year, by a million and a half; the revenue in respect of iron has decreased by a million and a quarter; and that in respect to silks, by $300,000. The great falling off in the excise this year of $1,000,000 as compared with last year, has, too, helped to increase that deficit. Now, Sir, on the whole there is a deficit, but the reasons are ample, the matter is explainable; and the fact that there is a deficit this year will not be looked upon by the country as a proof that such a state of affairs must exist under a Conservative Administration, but the people will regard it as a rarity and a novelty. I trust, Sir, that the deficit will not amount to what has been prophesied, and that, having a due regard to the efficiency of the public service, economy may be practised to such an extent as to make that deficit as small as possible. Now I come to another clause in the Address, that which makes mention of the probable admission of the oldest British colony in America as part of the confederation. When the scheme of confederation was broached and when it was effected in 1867, ay, and even before that, it was thought by the fathers of confederation that this great work would never be consummated, would never be finally completed, until within our borders was embraced every colony in North America under the flag of Great Britain; and from time to time overtures and propositions have been made to that end. I am pleased to see that at last they have taken a tangible form, and in this city, as the capital of the Dominion, a very important conference was held a few weeks ago, from which we trust beneficial results will follow. The terms of the offer upon which Newfoundland proposes coming into this confederacy, and the terms which were offered by the Federal Government, have not yet been made public; but I think I echo the hope of every Canadian, and of every parliamentarian, irrespective of politics, that those terms may be of such a nature that a consummation of that union may be brought about. We, in this portion of the Dominion, particularly in the province of Ontario, not having been in touch with the people of Newfoundland, have only known it as rather a sterile, bleak and inhospitable island; but I am happy to say that our views in that respect have been entirely changed by a speech delivered in Ottawa last week by the Hon. Mr. Bond. With their thrifty, industrious and hardy population, of somewhat over 200,000, engaged, as they are, largely in the greatest of all hardships, the fishing industry, also interested as they are interested in the lumber business, and interested as they are in the great industry of mining, in which $5,000,000 is invested; not having, as we, in the western provinces have, great manufacturing enterprises, it must of necessity result that they should be, and would be in due course of time, if any considerable interchange of commodities took place, good customers of ours, as of the $7,000,000 worth of goods imported into that island, only $2,500,000 worth came from these provinces. So I believe that, if that consolidation is brought about, if that colony is admitted, a union will be accomplished which will greatly add to the material prosperity of the whole Dominion. Moreover, Sir, we will then guard and control every entrance to the British possessions on the Atlantic; and then it will be the proud boast of every Canadian, that from the western shores of this continent, where the waters of the Pacific lave the golden sands of British Columbia, to the far east, where Newfoundland's rock-bound coasts are dashed by the billows of the Atlantic, all shall be under the sway of the confederation of Canada.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) In rising to second the motion just moved by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), I must say that the Manitoba school question referred to in the Speech from the Throne has given rise to that other question whether the moment had not come to break the tie which unites us to the Dominion and seek elsewhere other destinies for us. Many wise and enlightened people, men from all sections of the community and from all races, have had, in the face of the general mistrust which for nearly five years now has unsettled every mind, to painfully consider whether the Dominion could last much longer, and whether the time had not come, as I said, to break the tie which unites us to it, should not Manitoba or the Federal Government remedy the injustices done and replace, so to say, in its former position the fundamental stone which the Manitoba Government had taken out of the very basis of the Dominion structure. Thank God, owing to the spirit of justice of the people, owing to the common sense which prevails everywhere in the Dominion, owing especially to the courage shown by the Government with respect to that school question, the minds may now regain their composure, uneasiness may disappear and hope revive among all the races which have made this country their own. For these reasons, I might be allowed to tender to the executive our most sincere thanks on behalf of the righteous men of the province of Manitoba, and of the whole Dominion. The Government is entitled to the gratitude, not only of the Catholics, but of all the righteous men, whether Catholic or Protestant, Mohammedan or Turk. Notwithstanding the clamourings of the hon. gentlemen opposite, the Government were not afraid to do their full duty from beginning to end. They pledged themselves to render justice, notwithstanding the opposition they met with in every province, notwithstanding the opposition made in this House by the hon. gentlemen opposite. The Government is now rebuked for not disallowing the school law, because they are powerless to upbraid them in any other respect. This is what the Liberals have cried out everywhere in the province of Quebec; the Government, they said, was too slow, it ought to have disallowed the law. Well, I say the Government did their duty to the end. They were bound not to disallow the law, in the first place, because the Catholics of Manitoba had decided to apply to the courts for the rescission of the law of 1890, which was thought unconstitutional. When the Supreme Court delivered its judgment as regards the constitutionality of the law, the time for disallowance had lapsed. I may add that the Government were bound not to disallow the law, because in that they were forbidden by prudence and wisdom. They would not have failed to denounce, in the province of Manitoba, as well as in the other provinces, such an attempt from the Federal power against provincial autonomy. And finally, I say that the Government could not disallow that law because it was constitutional, and the judgment of the Privy Council does not utterly do away with it. Therefore, while there is now an injustice to remedy, it is none the less true that the school law may continue in existence if the Manitoba Government is satisfied with it, provided the injustice complained of by the Catholics be remedied. Therefore, the Government could not disallow that law simply on account of the injustices done to the Catholic minority in Manitoba. As for that, it was the practice adopted and followed by both the political parties in this House not to disallow the local laws with respect to education. As to this, I will quote from the speech delivered by the Hon. Edward Blake in 1890, when he brought before this House his famous motion referred to, a moment ago, by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett). In the course of his remarks, he said:

Those members who have long been here will well remember the New Brunswick school case, which was agitated for many years, in the course of which agitation I have hoped that some political aspects of that and of analogous questions were finally settled—settled, at all events, for the bulk of the party with which I act, and for the humble individual who is now addressing you. I regard it as settled, for myself at any rate, first of all that, as a question of policy, there shall be no disallowance of educational legislation.

This practice having been approved by all parties, it ill-becomes any one now to reproach the Government with not having disallowed that law. But I ask by what right the Liberal party could now reproach the Government with not having exercised the right of disallowance since they are the very party which rendered useless, inefficient and dangerous the exercise of such a right? They are the party which cried out in every province that the disallowance could not be exercised. It is the Liberal party again which, at the interprovincial conference held in Quebec in 1887, included in its platform the wiping out of the right of disallowance from our constitution. Let us see what Mr. Mercier, referring to provincial autonomy, said in 1886, before the Quebec Legislature:

The right of disallowance of local laws granted to the Federal Cabinet, is the negation of provincial autonomy, and it should be abolished, or confederation will disappear. The right of veto should reside not in the Executive power, but in the judicial power as the sole sure refuge against the passions of the political arena.

Later on, in 1887, at the time of the interprovincial conference which was attended by the Prime Ministers of all the provinces, I think, and even several other ministers from these provinces, and at which, if I am not mistaken, every province in the Dominion was represented, all the members of this conference, I say, were agreed on the necessity of drawing up and adopting as one plank of the platform of the Liberal party the following, which is to be found in the report of the proceedings of that conference:

That by the British North America Act exclusive authority is expressly given to the provincial legislatures in relation to subjects enumerated in the 92nd section of the Act; that a previous section of the Act reserves to the Federal Government the legal power of disallowing, at will, all acts passed by a provincial legislature; that this power of disallowance may be exercised so as to give to the Federal Government arbitrary control over the legislation of the provinces within their own sphere; and that the Act should be amended by taking away the power of disallowing provincial statutes, leaving to the people of each province, through their representatives in the provincial legislature, the free exercise of their exclusive right of legislation on the subjects assigned to them, subject only to disallowance by Her Majesty in Council, as before confederation; the power of disallowance to be exercised in regard to the provinces upon the same principle as the same is exercised in the case of Federal Acts.

So it can be seen that they claim the transfer of the power of disallowance to England. And why was this claim made? Because it was considered that the disallow-ance would thereby be abolished if it could only be exercised by the Imperial Government. Such was the construction put upon it by the Provincial Secretary of Quebec, Mr. Gagnon. Here are his own words, when commenting this resolution adopted by the interprovincial conference :

As worded, this resolution is practically the abolition of the right of disallowance, for we say that this power will only be exercised with respect to the laws possibly affecting the general interests of the Empire, that is to say, we assimilate the position of the provinces to the one now occupied by the Federal Parliament. Now, as we cannot make laws which affect the general interests of the Empire, it follows that the Imperial Government will not have to exercise against us this power of disallowance.

Thus, if we cannot now claim, or rather if we ought not to claim the exercise of the right of disallowance with respect to a question as that which we are now discussing, it is because the whole Liberal party succeeded in rousing the public opinion in every province by exaggerating the right of the provinces to enjoy a full autonomy, and even to escape the right of disallowance conferred by our constitution to the Federal power, in educational matters as well as in any other difficult questions. But I say, moreover, that no motion was brought before this House with the object of censuring the Government for not disallowing such a legislation. I say, moreover, that it is yet time to make such a motion, and I invite those who are fond of motions of censure directed against the Government to bring about such a motion because they have not disallowed Manitoba's legislation as they are blamed from all over the hustings. Therefore, to sum up, we could not exercise the right of disallowance because, as I have just said, it would not have been wise for the Government to do so, and because it was not claimed by the Catholics who took another way to obtain the redress they sought, and finally, because the disallowance weapon was made useless and inefficient by the doings of the Liberal party. Now, there remained an appeal to the courts of justice. After the Manitoba legislation of 1890 had been declared constitutional, the Catholics took an appeal to the Government, and the latter resolved in the first place to cause to be proclaimed or defined their right to interfere, and should the occasion arise, to pass a remedial legislation. Never was a motion brought before the House to blame the Government for their recourse to this mode of proceeding, but they were studiously reproached, in popular meetings, with having taken this means of having the question solved. Nevertheless, this way of proceeding was the only reasonable one ; it was the only one dictated by common political sense and reason. The fact is, with respect to such a question, it was absolutely necessary that we should know whether we had a right to interfere ; it was the main point. Why ? Here is the reason why : Had we immediately passed a law to set aside Manitoba's legislation and had the legislature of that province disputed its constitutionality, in what position would we find ourselves now, had the Privy Council decided as it has contrary to our contentions ? The Government and the Federal Parliament would then have found themselves in the most humiliating position. On the contrary, the Government wisely decided that prior to interfering they should know whether they had a right to interfere ; the Government wanted to know the extent of their rights prior to helping the minority, and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council decided that they had such a right under the constitution. The Government acted therefore in compliance with the constitution, as explained by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. As regards the mode adopted by the Government nobody can blame them for doing what they did, for it was the mode suggested by the Liberal party itself. Indeed, when the Hon. Mr. Blake brought up his motion in 1890, he had in view that very question of the separate schools in Manitoba. If the Government was not to be bound by this motion of Mr. Blake, then it was useless. We all know that this motion was moved and agreed to by Parliament, precisely in view of this Manitoba school question. The Government have passed the remedial Order in Council and they have done right. Mr. Speaker, I think there is no one to be found in this House who will reproach them with this act. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council decided that we had a right, not only to interfere, but also to remedy an injustice done to the prejudice of the minority in Manitoba ; the Judicial Committee pronounced that we had both the right and the duty to interfere. This Government are the custodians of the rights and privileges of each and every class, and therefore they are in duty bound to protect the minorities. It is for them to say to the persecutors : Cease your persecutions, to say to the infringers of the constitution : Cease to cause the minority to suffer in the exercise of a right which is guaranteed to them by the constitution. It was said somewhere that an interference would not be expedient. I think, Mr. Speaker, it is always expedient to remedy an injustice. There is no middle course to follow, in such matters, one must be either friend or foe. I think any honourable and honest man owes it to duty to remedy an injustice when his duty is clearly laid down. Assuredly now that the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has been delivered, the question is not whether it is favourable to the Protestants or to the Catholics of Manitoba, but our duty is to inquire whether there is any injustice to remedy. The question is whether the oppressed ought to be protected. I say it is the duty of this House to come and help the Government which has interfered in favour of the oppressed. When, in 1892-93, the Government and the Conservative party agreed to the mode of interfering through the courts, the party and the whole House committed themselves to such a mode, and therefore they virtually adhered to any judgment that might happen to be pronounced. Had the judgment been against the minority, the minority would have yielded to it. Likewise, if the judgment should go against the contentions of the majority, the majority had to bow down. Now, it is for the majority to yield to a judgment favourable to the minority, a judgment delivered by Her Majesty herself; and I think every hon. member of this House, especially those from the Conservative side will be happy to vote for a remedial legislation should the Manitoba Legislature not do its duty as it was called upon to do. This, Mr. Speaker, is a question which has moved the public mind with passion. Moreover, the policy of the Government with respect to it has already received the approval of the people of the Dominion. In Haldimand, the contest was fought on the school question, and it did not prevent the brilliant Secretary of State (Mr. Montague) receiving a majority of nearly six hundred votes. In Verchères, in Antigonish, in Quebec West, it is the Government policy which won the day. It is the remedial order which is accepted by the electorate. And, if I am well informed, in Verchères especially, had not the opposition candidate completely endorsed the remedial order, he would have been defeated and left in a minority of hundreds of votes. The public sentiment in that county was so overwhelming in favour of the remedial order that, in spite of opposition ideas, the candidate, Mr. Geoffrion, had to accept the policy of the Government and promise to his electors that he would vote for the Conservative Government, going even further, possibly than the gentlemen on this side of the House, should the Government introduce a remedial legislation. In Quebec West and Antigonish, the same thing was noticeable. I therefore say that on the 17th April instant, the Government carried the day. I must confess that the Catholics of Verchères could have acted a little better. I think they could have shown a little more generosity to the Government by returning its candidate, especially when the Liberal candidate was endorsing the course followed by the Government. But, after all, there was no matter for surprise, Verchères having been a Liberal county for twenty-five to thirty years. In the very local elections of 1892, when the whole people was aroused, Verchères remained Liberal and would not follow the rest of the province. Well, it is its own business, but

Mr. BELLEY.

I think the great majority in the province of Quebec approve of the course followed by the Government as did the voters in Verchères and that, at the next general election, it will give to the Government an enormous majority. There is now rejoicing everywhere. However, we do not rejoice because we think we have won a victory over the Protestants. There can be no question of Catholics or Protestants in this House, but we are simply dealing with the right of the minorities and due regard for public faith which no honourable man can violate. When we came into the Dominion, we relied on this that the rights of every class would be respected. We signed a compact which we are pledged to respect, and he who violates this compact is derelict to faith. If the minorities should not find in this Parliament the protection to which they are entitled, how could we hope to form a people? How could we go along in peace and harmony? How, for instance, could we hope for the coming of Newfoundland into the Dominion if the people of that Island could not rely on our respect to faith, on the observance of the compact to be signed with them, and if the minority of that Island could not find under our flag that liberty which they now enjoy under their present government? This Parliament is in duty bound to show the greatest respect for faith, the greatest respect for the pledges we commit ourselves to. I join with the hon. member who just sat down in the praise he has given to the memory of the late Sir John Thompson. When the news of his death spread throughout the country, it was the cause of a great surprise coupled with a great pain. He was not only the honoured leader of the Conservative party, but he ranked also amongst the foremost men of our political world. Our whole people will be faithful to his memory and will keep in store the encomiums he so well deserved as well as remind his lofty nature, his powerful logic, his eminent abilities and his respectability. We will, all of us, long remember him as one of the most precious men Canada has ever produced. Reference is also made in the Speech from the Throne to the French treaty. Last year, that question was discussed, and this House approved of the treaty. The Government who is perfecting this commercial engagement will meet with the approval of this House and that of the country at large. The business men are now all one in requesting the ratification of this treaty which establishes closer commercial relations with France. Agriculture has now a good market for its products, but it will soon want a new European market for its cheese and butter, the export of which is now mainly directed towards England. By means of this treaty, the Dominion will secure a very advantageous market for its produce.

Mr. LAURIER. While I have no fault to find with the manner in which the mover and seconder of the Address have presented their views to the House, whilst, on the contrary, it is a pleasure for me to testify that they have discharged their duty with great credit to themselves, with great satisfaction, I am sure, to their friends, and with perfect acceptance to their opponents, still I cannot but express my astonishment that having undertaken to review the political situation, such as it exists to-day, they should have entirely failed to notice in any way whatever the late, the inconvenient, the unfortunate season at which Parliament has been called for the despatch of business, that they should have failed altogether to offer, I will not say a word of criticism, which perhaps it would be impossible to expect from hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, but I will simply say a word of remonstrance such as might perhaps have been expected that they might have offered against the breach of duty of which the Government stand guilty towards the House and the people. Sir, what is to-day? To-day is the nineteenth day of April, and the simple mention of this date means this, that we have now reached a period at which, if Parliament had been called at the proper time, the well-understood time, the time fixed and determined by long usage of Parliament, by the unwritten law of Parliament, the members of the House, who, as a rule, are not millionaires, who are, as a rule, engaged in the ordinary occupations of life, who, as a rule, now all depend on their daily labour, might look to an early prorogation and might expect to return to their business occupations at the opening of the business season. Why, the first paragraph of this Speech which is placed in the hands of His Excellency is strange almost to ludicrousness. It reads :

Why, Sir, if it was so much satisfaction to the advisers of His Excellency to have the advice of the faithful Commons and Senate of Canada, it was within their power to have had it long ago. Why did they not get it? I submit this with all respect, that instead of having framed this mocking paragraph, the first thing the advisers of His Excellency should have done was to offer a statement of some kind to explain, to justify and to excuse this unpardonable dereliction of duty on the part of the advisers of His Excellency. But, perhaps, and I rather think it was so, it was altogether too much to expect that hon. gentlemen would make such a statement. What reason could they urge, what explanation could they give, what excuse could they offer? Why, Sir, it is well known, it is a matter of public notoriety, that if Parliament was not called at the proper season, at the usual season, at the season at which it should have been called, and at the date often promised, it was not from any consideration for the public weal, it was not from any motive which could stand the light of day, but it was simply because it was altogether too much to expect from the hon. gentlemen who now adorn the Treasury benches that they would arrive at an opinion of their own so long as they could put off the day. It is a matter of public notoriety that during the whole winter the Cabinet has been divided into two—what shall I say, two factions, two rival factions, quarrelling, squabbling, fighting, one in favour of holding a session and the other in favour of dissolution, both afraid to meet Parliament or to meet the people. This is the situation. But at last when the day came that they had to make up their minds to do something, when they had to face the issue and have a mind of their own, when they could no longer postpone and put off and delay, when they had to take some action, the faction in favour of dissolution, which had almost triumphed, was upset, and the Government decided in favour of holding a session. I must pay this compliment to them, that from their own point of view, they were wise in their generation. It was true that during a session there might be some very bitter pills to swallow, it was true that during a session the Finance Minister would have to face that spectre, that monster, an ugly ill-visaged deficit, that spectre which indeed we had seen last year lurking in the distance, but which the hon. gentleman had promised to ward off by economy and entrenchment, but at all events, my hon. friend could depend upon it that the majority would be equal to the occasion, that they would swallow the pills, bitter as they were, and even finding a deficit in their minds, a new friend to them, as the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) said, they would think that this new friend when seen among themselves, was not so ugly, not so ill-visaged as it was seen on the other side, and even had some redeeming features, whereas if they had dissolved the House and gone to the country, their majority would have disappeared, would have vanished, would have melted away as snow under the rays of an April sun. The wisdom of their course was fully vindicated on the 17th April, just two days ago. There were four elections on that day. As to one I shall not speak, because the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennet) said a moment ago that the Liberal party offered no fight in Haldimand, it was a little family quarrel which they agreed to settle among themselves. But in the other three constituencies I claim a victory for the Liberal party. I claim a Liberal victory in Verchères, although there is not much to be proud of there because it is an old rouge county; but I also claim a Liberal victory in Quebec West, an old Conservative constituency. My hon. friend from East Simcoe said a moment ago that the candidates were two Tories. To some extent it is true; but there are Tories and Tories. On the one side there was Mr. Dobell, whose record I am sure is above suspicion; and on the other side there was our old friend Mr. McGreevy, who is well known in this House. I will quote to the hon. gentleman what was the programme of Mr. Dobell. He said:

And if you send me to Parliament as your representative I shall not allow party spirit to warp my judgment, and shall record my vote upon all questions as in my belief the best interests of the country demand. * * * I shall use my best endeavours, if elected, to have measures carried which will benefit the Dominion, increase its foreign trade,—

What a departure from sound principles is that.

—remove obstacles to closer and freer trade with our sister colonies and the mother country, and I shall not cease to advocate reciprocal trade, on fair and just terms with our great neighbour, the United States.

I do not observe much cheering on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to that programme. Now, let me take the comments of the ministerial organ in the city of Quebec upon this paragraph of Mr. Dobell's address:

Mr. Dobell's platform embraces reciprocity with the United States, freer intercolonial trade, and closer foreign trade relations, superinduced by more liberal terms than we now possess. Of course, this is a programme, to which Mr. Laurier could interpose no objection, since he has opinions of a similar nature himself.

Give me such Tories every day, and have them elected everywhere.

Mr. McGreevy, we take it, has not lost faith in the National Policy, which he helped to create.

Well, Sir, it is a matter of record that the Liberal party unanimously supported the candidature of Mr. Dobell. It is equally a matter of record that the Conservative party from the leaders down supported the candidature of Mr. McGreevy, and I suppose at this time Mr. McGreevy's health is sufficiently restored to have allowed him to take his place among the Conservative members of this House. But, Sir, the Government decided in favour of holding a session. They were wise. But it was an effort to make such a decision. Why, it was such an effort that it almost broke the Government. We have it on good authority, we are not in the secrets of the gods, but we know one of the gods, and not the least among them, the one whom I take to be the god of war, would no longer soar on the Olympian heights, but that he declared his determination to come down to the level of frail, ordinary, mortal flesh. For three days the whole ministerial world was on the tiptoe of anxious expectation. "Will he return or will he remain out?" That was the anxious question which every ministerialist harboured in his breast. But as good fate would have it, peace was restored. The wandering one returned to the fold, and ever since there has been, at all events, peace on the outside, and the Government seems to me to be very much like one of those sulphur springs whose waters are calm and quiet on the surface, but whose muddy bottom is always boiling with mephitic gases. But, Sir, I see my hon. friend the Minister of Justice shaking his head at the statement which I have made. I make that statement upon authority. I make it upon the authority of the Conservative press. I know that my hon. friend said a few days afterwards that the story was not true, and that there was no dependence to be placed upon the ministerial press. I always thought so myself. That was no news to me. But I thought that so much smoke could not exist without some fire, and that the exception in this instance simply confirmed the general rule. But, Sir, there is more than this. We are all proud of our British institutions. My hon. friend to my right, the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), speaking some seven or eight weeks ago in the western part of the province of Ontario, made an elaborate comparison between the American constitution and the British constitution, and he concluded, and rightly concluded, that the British constitution is more elastic and more responsive to the voice and to the wish of the people than is the American constitution. There are, under the American constitution, several powers which are fixed by law, while the same powers here, are left for their exercise to the intuitive action of the Executive. Thus, under the American constitution, the summoning of Congress does not exist, and Congress meets according to the very letter of the instrument itself. It is fixed by the constitution, whereas, under the British constitution the only provision that exists is that there should be a session at least once a year. But as to the time Parliament shall meet, the entire discretion is left to the Executive, and it is a discretion which should not be exercised except for cause adequate and in extreme cases. In England, though the period at which Parliament is to be summoned is left to the Executive, the day on which Parliament will open is as well known to every voter in Great Britain as if it were fixed by law, and a Government would not be permitted either to postpone or advance the period at which Parliament meets unless there was strong cause adequate to show for it. If in England a Government presumed to violate the unwritten law of Parliament in that respect, that Government would be at once called to severe account by friends and foes. But in this country, although we have a similar law, that law is violated without the slightest concern by the Ministers of the day, as if the only rule and law which they acknowledged was their own fantastic will. For my part, I would be sorry to see a single item removed from the constitution which would mar its elasticity. I would be sorry to see it more drastic. I would be sorry to see it follow the American precedent, but I remind the House, and I am sure in so saying no one can gainsay me, that if we want to work the British constitution in this country with the same benefit and advantage that it has been worked in the old country, the Canadian people must act in the same spirit as is shown by the British people, that is to say, that they must see that there are no undue liberties taken with the privileges of Parliament, whether they are written or unwritten. Though I have no fault to find with my hon. friends with the manner in which they have discharged their duties, I venture to believe that on reflection they will agree with me that they would have discharged these duties more effectually, and with more profit to their country, if they had spoken upon this subject, which I suppose is before their minds, as it is before the minds of everybody else, with the exception, perhaps, of the gentlemen sitting on the Treasury benches. I venture to believe also, that better counsel would have prevailed if the hand of fate had not removed him, of whom my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) spoke so feelingly, and of whom it might be said, that though perhaps not altogether free from blame in that respect himself, yet Sir John Thompson always, while he was leader of the Conservative party, insisted on the maintenance and preservation of parliamentary laws and parliamentary rules. I think I might say also that on some occasions he defended those laws and rules against the encroachment of some of his colleagues. My friend from Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) spoke eloquently and well, and most feelingly, on the death of Sir John Thompson. I can re-echo everything he said in that respect. The death of Sir John Thompson was a most shocking one. When a man is struck by the hand of death in the fullness of his years, after a long career, after a career of great usefulness to himself and his country, there remains a feeling even above the poignancy of grief, that after all death has dealt kindly with him. Such was the death of Sir John Macdonald. But when a man is struck down, when he has hardly reached the summit of middle life, when he has attained the full measure of his power, when his friends and his country could look to him for years of useful work, then, Sir, death carries with it a sense of inexpressible bitterness. Such was the death of Sir John Thompson. In that respect it is, perhaps, one of the saddest, perhaps altogether the saddest that our history records. In other respects I look upon it as one of the most glorious. This Canadian Minister, this colonial statesman died under the roof of the old Norman Kings, when he had just been sworn in as a member of the Privy Council of that mighty Empire, of which the old Norman kings laid the foundation, but which has reached dimensions which their wildest dreams of imagination never, I am sure, contemplated. Perhaps it is that such a death, under such circumstances, sad as it be, may be looked upon as a sacred consecration of the majestic principle of the unity of the Empire; unity, not only of land and water, unity not only of islands and continents, but a unity of all the creeds and races embraced in that mighty Empire, giving to all while preserving their individuality, a common aim, and a common aspiration and teaching to all the salutary lesson of tolerance and mutual forbearance. If the death of Sir John Thompson were to result in such a lesson being learned by the Canadian people, I am sure we must all agree that glorious indeed would be his death, and I am sure that for all ages, his name would be surrounded with a halo of imperishable fame. Now, Sir, coming to the Speech from the Throne, I do not know that it calls from me for any extended remarks. The Speech from the Throne has been, for some years past, a very dry skeleton. This year it is drier than ever, and the few bones that are in it rattle against each other with a most ominous sound. Perhaps this paucity of substance, this dryness of material, may be the result of the return to the fold of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, though, if we are to credit a certain press—not that scurrilous ministerial press that is not to be depended upon, but the Opposition press which has never been accused of unverity, at least by its friends—one of the conditions of the return of my hon. friend to the ranks was that there should be no important legislation this session. Well, Sir, I do not know whether that be true; but, at all events, that would be a very light way of looking at a situation so full of gravity as the situation of this country is to-day; for I submit to the consideration of the hon. gentlemen opposite that we have reached a period of the very greatest importance to the interests of Canada. We have reached what perhaps we may call a day of reckoning. Yet on this grave subject the Government are silent. The altered tone of their speeches compared with those to which we have been accustomed to listen in former years on the occasion of the Address being proposed and seconded, is most significant. On previous occasions the burden of all ministerial speeches was a song of triumph, a paeon of exultation, even in the face of the most damaging record—even when the figures of the census had ruthlessly dispelled the illusions long cherished by the supporters of the ministerial policy. Even then the burden of all ministerial speeches was that Canada was prosperous. To-day we have a different tone. To-day there is no song of exultation or of triumph. To-day there is the plaintive admission that Canada is suffering, though in a minor degree, from a universal depression. Depression, says my hon. friend from East Simcoe; but then, where is the virtue of the National Policy? What has become of the power of the National Policy? Was it not to remove the then existing depression and to for ever prevent its recurrence, that the people of Canada were induced to submit to that intolerable yoke of taxation which by a strange euphemism is termed the National Policy? What is the commercial situation, the economical situation, the financial situation of this country to-day? Sir, we have a deficit, the ugliest that ever made its appearance in Canada, an immense public debt ever increasing, an alarming falling off in the revenue, public burdens always increasing, a paralyzing commercial crisis and stringency, ever wider spreading, amongst all classes of the community. This is the situation which my friend characterized by the diluted term depression. Sir, it is high time that the Ministers and the friends of the Ministers should no longer delude themselves with the mere clatter of words, but should open their eyes to the fact that Canada has reached a most dangerous condition. It would be idle folly for the members of this House, sitting on that side or on this side, to imagine that Canada is simply suffering from one of those cycles of depression which come periodically. Sir, I am sorry to say, but it is a fact to which the attention of the Government must be called, since they persist in ignoring it, that the evils from which Canada suffers to-day are of a more alarming character than those caused by a mere passing depression; and the abiding cause, the source of all those evils, lies in the fact that the country has been burdened with an immense and alarming public debt, and equally alarming public expenditure and at the same time with a high tariff, imposed upon us under suppositions which have never materialized—under promises of development which, if it had taken place, would perhaps have made the burden bearable, but the failure of which makes the burden hardly bearable by our small and scanty population. Why, Sir, I recall to the memory of the House that in the early days of the National Policy, when the public debt was increasing at the rate of a hundred millions at a time, there were men in this country, not confined to this side of the House—men in all walks of life and in all conditions, politicians and non-politicians—who were staggered at the magnitude of the burden imposed on the shoulders of the Canadian people, who believed that it was too great for us to carry. But their apprehensions were removed by the assurance often given by the occupants of the Treasury benches, that immigrants would follow the track of the Canadian Pacific Railway, that the immense territories of the Northwest would fill with a teeming population, and that the price of the lands sold would be more than sufficient to recoup the country for the whole outlay. That statement was made, not once, but many times by Sir Charles Tupper at that time, and repeated by his followers until it became a stock phrase. I remember, as everybody I suppose does, that Sir Charles Tupper fortified this statement with the opinion of a high civil functionary whose duties should enable him to speak with high authority on the question on which he wrote. I remember Sir Charles Tupper quoting the opinion of Mr. Burgess, the Deputy Minister of the Interior, to the effect that in a short time the sale of the public lands would cover the whole outlay. That letter has often been quoted, and it may be well to quote it again if only to show the House that the condition which the country has reached to-day is not the result of a casual depression,—to show the wide chasm which separates us from the high hopes which were held out to us at that time. Here is the letter of Mr. Burgess:

Ottawa, 4th May, 1883.

Sir,—Having given the subject my best and fullest consideration, I estimate that the receipts of this department from the sale of agricultural and coal lands, timber dues, rents of grazing lands, and sales of mineral lands other than coal, with the royalties from the minerals between the 1st January, 1883, and the 31st December, 1891, both inclusive, will amount to not less than $58,000,000.

A. M. BURGESS.

Sir, everybody who had a seat in Parliament at that time recollects that when that letter was read to the House by Sir Charles Tupper, endorsed as it was by the character, the ability and the reputation of that right hon. gentleman, it was received with wild cheers on the other side of the House. The hon. members on that side of the House affected to believe, and perhaps did believe, that there was a ready asset of $58,000,000, not yet in the coffers of Canada, but to be found in our coffers within eight years afterwards, and that therefore there was no cause for alarm if the public debt jumped up at the fearful rate at which it was then being increased. I notice that the same letter read again to-day, and read in the light of our experience of the last year, does not evoke any cheer at all on the other side of the House. Why, Sir, it would be almost ludicrous, if the case were not such a sad one, to refer to that letter now, to comment upon the statesmanship—because at that time it was called statesmanship—which could build up such castles in the air. I do not care to do so. I come to sober facts. How many millions, I ask the Minister of Finance, have been realized from the sale of agricultural lands, how many millions from coal lands, how many from mineral lands, how many from timber dues and grazing leases? How many millions? Not one dollar. Not one single dollar. We are just fifty-eight millions of dollars astray. The sale of the agricultural lands, of the coal lands, of the mineral lands, the royalties, the timber dues, the grazing rents—all that has not produced enough to pay the salaries of the officers charged with the duties of administration. But, Sir, the debt is there; not to be wiped out with a fantastic asset, but to be paid in cold coin out of the hard earnings of the people of Canada, earnings wrung from them by a relentless system of taxation. And I would call to the attention of hon. gentlemen that that relentless system of taxation was introduced under the same hopes—hopes doomed to disappointment. Does not everybody remember how, in those early days of the National Policy, manufacturers were invited to clap on all sail, to manufacture, not for the small, restricted market of five millions of souls, but for the widespread market soon to be enlarged by hundreds, by thousands, and by hundreds of thousands of immigrants, who were to be brought in to fill the North-west Territories? That advice was readily acceded to by the manufacturers. Millions of dollars were invested in bricks and mortar and machinery. And what was the result? In a very short time the warehouses of manufacturers were piled with goods for which there were no purchasers. The population did not increase, and the manufacturers found themselves face to face with a very serious problem. But the manufacturers were equal to the occasion. I take the case of cottons, just as an example. In the summer of 1888 a meeting of cotton manufacturers was held in the city of Montreal. The reports of that meeting are to be found in the Montreal 'Gazette,' and there, amongst other things stated by the reporters, we find the following:—

By actual comparison, good farmers' shirting can be obtained in Canada to-day at a lower figure than the same material can be purchased for in the United States. This is one effect of the National Policy, and it is a great boon to the agricultural community. The country, however, requires 600,000 more people in it to maintain the present number of cotton mills, but these are quickly coming, as 100,000 landed on our shores last year.

Yes, Sir, one hundred thousand had landed on our shores the previous year. Those were the happy, blind days when the Government of Canada was increasing the population by bringing in a hundred thousand emigrants every year. Those were the happy, blind days when the Government of Canada—according to its own statement—added to the population of Canada in ten years no less than 800,000 souls, who, however, were not to be found when the census was taken; they had disappeared; and with them, I am sorry to say, had gone a considerable portion of the native population. But what did the cotton men do then? They had declared that they needed 600,000 souls more to keep their mills busy, but this addition to the population had not been made. But the cotton men were equal to the occasion. They made a combination; they bought up all the cotton mills—except one, I believe—and brought them under the same management. Some of the mills they closed, paying dividends to the shareholders, though the mills were idle, and turning out the operatives to shift for themselves as best they could. Under the system that was to have given work to every man willing to work, we saw operatives turned out in the streets and shareholders receiving dividends for their idle mills. The production of cotton was restricted, and upon this restricted production extra profits were charged to the people of Canada, who were thereby compelled to pay taxes not only to the public treasury, but to the manufacturers of cotton also. Sir, there is the root of the evil; there is the cause of the depression. The public debt was increased under false pretenses, the tariff was imposed under false pretenses. The public debt was created under the promise that there would be such an influx of population into the North-west Territories that, in eight years at most there would be in the treasury a sum sufficient to wipe out the public debt. The tariff was imposed under the promise that there would be an influx of population such as would make the burden of taxation bearable by the people of Canada. Now, Sir, we know that all these expectations have been disappointed. In those early days we had centred our expectations and hopes upon those vast plains which extend from the craggy hills of Lake Superior to the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains. And, I am bound to say, it is a most magnificent heritage. Great as were the hopes entertained of it, they were not extravagant, but how those hopes have been blasted we know only too well. The immigrants came in, but the flow of immigration became less and at one time almost ceased. What is the primary cause? The primary cause, and I challenge the issue upon this, is the high tariff with which Canada is burdened. The high tariff imposed by gentlemen on the other side, and maintained by them has produced this result—it has made the tilling of the soil a thankless and profitless occupation. We cannot increase the price of cereals. The price of cereals have fallen and so have the prices of other farm products, as is admitted in the Speech from the Throne. We cannot increase the price of a bushel of wheat or pound of cheese. But there was a time when gentlemen on the other side pretended that they could increase the price of farm products. We cannot do anything for the farmer in that respect. But the tiller of the soil in the North-west, and, for that matter, in every part of Canada, finds that while the prices of his products have diminished, he has to pay artificial prices for all that he has to buy. And this is the result of the policy of gentlemen on the Treasury benches. While he has to sell at free trade prices, he has to buy at protection prices. The result of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite is this,—that the farmer of Canada has to sell, not in the dearest, but in the cheapest market, while what he has to buy he must get, not in the cheapest, but in the dearest market. This is the cause of what is termed on the other side of the House, "depression." What then is to be done? What course shall we follow? The course to follow is to retrace our steps of the last fifteen years, to devise some sensible scheme of taxation. The course to follow is to make this country a cheap country to live in, and until this is done it is vain for gentlemen on the other side of the House to expect that we shall have such a thing as prosperity in Canada. Until this country has been made a cheap country to live in, we may expect anything but that the plains of the North-west will fill up, and we shall look in vain for the prosperity which has been promised us for the last fifteen years, but which has not come. This is the aim, this is the goal, this is the purpose. But it is an aim, a goal, and a purpose which it is vain to expect gentlemen on the Treasury benches to keep in view. But we can expect it when the little operation of two days ago is extended, and the whole people of the Dominion of Canada, from the Atlantic to the Pacific express their opinions at the polls.

Mr. FOSTER. You are better on small operations.

Mr. LAURIER. Why do you not try the larger ones, if in those you have the advantage? I want to be a fair opponent and give every possible credit to gentlemen on the other side. There is an admission, at all events, in the Speech from the Throne of something that exists, there is an admission that the finances are not as good as they might be. Though you will look in vain through the four corners of the Speech for such a word as deficit, the word is not to be found, but the thing is there. This is what we read:

Although this has not resulted in any considerable decrease in the volume of our foreign trade, yet, owing to low prices and recent reductions in and removal of taxation, it has been followed by a serious decrease in revenue derived from Customs and Excise. In order to produce equilibrium between revenue and expenditure for the coming year, it will be necessary to observe the greatest possible economy in the appropriations for the various branches of the public service.

Sir, it seems to me that we are somewhat familiar with this language. I do not know but we have heard it before. I think we heard it last year, perhaps, with some more rhetorical flourish than we see in this dry speech. We heard it last year from the mouth of the Minister of Finance himself, and the flowery language which my hon. friend then made use of is worth repeating to the House:

If the expenditure from the 10th of March to the end of the year should be normal that would leave us with a deficit; but this Government has come to the conclusion—a wise conclusion, which I think will be echoed by this House, and in which the Government will have the co-operation and cordial help of the House—to endeavour to live during the year within our income, and if our income is less, to resolutely keep down the expenditure, so that in the end we shall not have that unwelcome visitation which so often made its appearance to my hon. friend who sits opposite me—an ugly and ill-visaged deficit. A prudent business man, any prudent business concern, any private gentleman, any householder, would take that course of action; and in the national housekeeping it is equally incumbent, it seems to me, to follow the same.

So it seemed to my hon. friend, and so it seemed to all of us, that he was using very resolute language. It could not be more resolute, and would to Heaven my hon. friend had been as resolute in his action as he was in his speech. But it is manifest that during the course of the year my hon. friend has not only had one moment of weakness, but moment after moment of weakness until it became chronic. I am quite sure that my hon. friend was covered from head to foot with good intentions, but he was besieged by those who had been in the habit of bleeding the treasury, and he yielded, and he yielded, until, between his language and his performance, there is a discrepancy of $6,000,000. Now, we have the same promises of economy and retrenchment, but to-day they are made in more sober language—not made in so pompous language as last year, but I am much afraid that whether made in sober or pompous language, the expenditure will always be the reverse of sober. My hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) said in his speech a moment ago, there must be reasons for a deficit. Why, of course there must be reasons for a deficit, and what are they? They are simply that the Minister does not, as a prudent man, as a prudent business concern, cut down the expenditure to the level of the revenue. That is all there is about it. If my hon. friend had been as resolute in his conduct as he was in his language, my hon. friend from Simcoe would have an answer to his query. For my part, I must say to my hon. friend from Simcoe, and perhaps I will not surprise him if I say so, that I am not so much overburdened as he seems to be with confidence in the men who adorn the Treasury benches. He takes their promises as they are made, I take them as they are executed, and that gives another deficit. Now, Sir, the legislation which is promised does not seem to be of a very serious character. There is just one measure in all those that are promised here, which seems to be of some importance. I understand that the Ministry again this year are going to try their hand at an insolvency law. They tried it last year, but they did not succeed. I hope they will succeed this time. I hope so with all my heart, because it seems to me that an insolvency law is a fitting accompaniment to the National Policy. There are so many bankrupts in the country that it is an act of charity to extend to them the benefits of an insolvency law. There is another clause in the Speech, that with regard to the French treaty, which I do not altogether understand. It reads thus :

"The necessary legislation has been passed." This is what I do not understand. The treaty has been ratified by this House, the treaty has been ratified by the French Corps Legislatif, and the French Senate. What more legislation is necessary? We all remember, the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) pointed out last year, the difficulty the Government were sure to meet in their treatment of third powers. I know that difficulty. That may be the one which is referred to, but the language is so vague that it is impossible to perceive what the Government means. I suppose it means that the treaty is not to go into force for another year or so, and in that respect the object of the Government will have been attained. Sir Charles Tupper will have been satisfied, he will have brought the Ministry to their knees. The supporters of the Ministry will be satisfied also, the treaty will not be passed by Parliament, and will not be put in force. As to Newfoundland, I am glad to say that I re-echo very cordially everything that has been said in the Speech from the Throne. The entrance of Newfoundland into the confederation was contemplated from the first as necessary to the completion of the Dominion, and I so regard it. But I must say that it is, perhaps, unfortunate that the negotiations have come at such an inopportune moment. It may be a misfortune, not only for Newfoundland, but for Canada as well, that these negotiations come at a time when Canada can ill afford to undertake any new burdens. I do not offer this remark in any spirit of hostile criticism. I will wait until the negotiations have been completed, and until they are laid before the House, and judge of the scheme upon its merits. But, Sir, there is one thing to which I would draw the attention of my hon. friends on the other side. There is a difficulty with regard to Newfoundland which it would be well to have removed before the island is taken into confederation. I mean the French shore difficulty. Heaven knows that we have causes enough of difficulty in this country, and here is another which, if the island were taken into confederation, might creep up at any moment and add to the numerous difficulties we have. It would be nothing but fair, I presume—I make it as a friendly suggestion, not at all in a spirit of carping criticism—it would be nothing but fair, I presume, that the Imperial Parliament, which is responsible for that state of things, should be called upon before the Island is taken into confederation, to settle that question with the French Government; because, so long as this difficulty is pending, we must not close our eyes to the fact that it is impossible at any moment that the whole confederation may be convulsed with one of those explosions of sentiments which unfortunately we have seen too often in this country already. Now, Sir, my hon. friend from Simcoe, and also my hon. friend from Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley) who seconded the Address, dilated at some length with the question which my hon. friend from Simcoe called a question of sentiment, the Manitoba school question. The language of the Speech is, in that respect, very discreet. The elections are over now, and the language is far more discreet and temperate than it was while the elections were taking place. This is what it says :

In conformity with a recent judgment of the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, to the effect that the dissenting minority of the people of Manitoba have a constitutional right of appeal to the Governor General in Council against certain Acts passed by the legislature of the province of Manitoba in relation to the subject of education. I have heard in Council the appeal, and my decision thereon has been communicated to the legislature of the said province. The papers on the subject will be laid before you.

That is not saying very much. I do not blame the Government for it—perhaps it was better not to say very much about it. A good deal, however, was said by the Minister of Justice, by the Minister of Public Works and by the hon. Secretary of State on this question in the recent elections.

Mr. OUIPET. Not much by you.

Mr. LAURIER. The Order in Council is termed a decision. I do not understand that term exactly. As I read it, and I read it pretty carefully, it can hardly be called a decision; it is simply an invitation to the Government of Manitoba to deal with that question, and to leave them to apply the remedy to the evil which has been created by their own legislation, an invitation I say, though I am sorry to say it, couched in most unfortunate language. The language should have been framed, not in the dictatorial spirit which pervades the Order in Council, but it should have been an appeal framed rather in a conciliatory tone to the Government of Manitoba to remedy the grievances which their legislation has promoted. For my part, Sir, I think that in the whole of these proceedings the Government have shown a sad want of discretion. If they had acted in a different spirit, if they had taken any action, the first thing they should have done in my estimation was to have appealed to the Government of Manitoba to redress the evil which their own legislation had created. But at a later period I shall have to deal with this question. I shall not deal with it to-day at length, because after having heard to-day the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) and the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley). I ask myself, what is the meaning of that Order in Council which is termed a decision? I followed very carefully the language of the hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded the Address, and I found it to furnish a repetition of what has been taking place of late in the Dominion. The order has one meaning in one section and another meaning in another section; the order has one meaning in Catholic constituencies, the order has another meaning in Protestant constituencies. In Verchères and Antigonish it was a pledge to the people that the Government had determined upon interference; in the Protestant constituency of Haldimand the order was simply the first and last of the action to be taken by the Government, and the Government had thereby exhausted their intention. I took a note of the words of the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) as they fell from his lips, and these are the very words he made use of—if I am wrong he can correct me. The hon. gentleman said: "All that has been done is handing over this case to the legislature of Manitoba, there to be amicably arranged." I took a note also of the words which were spoken by the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley), and they were words of thanks, of faith and of exultation because the Government had determined to render justice to the Catholic minority of Manitoba. Which is correct of these two interpretations? If the interpretation placed upon the language of the hon. member for Chicoutimi is the right one, does it mean interference actively by legislation? Or does it mean, as the hon. member for East Simcoe said, simply the handing over of the case to the legislature of Manitoba, there to be dealt with and amicably arranged? I may be pardoned if I refer for a moment to my own personality. I read the Conservative papers, and paper after paper has done me the honour of calling on me to advise the advisers of His Excellency. I confess I am ambitious of the honour, and perhaps, though unworthy, I may be ready to advise His Excellency, but I am not ready to advise the advisers of His Excellency. One of the papers said that if Mr. Laurier refused to advise the advisers of His Excellency it was through wickedness; another paper said it was through cowardice; and another it was through incapacity. I acknowledge at once that it would be very presumptuous incapacity for me to rush in where these angles fear to tread. But I have only this to say, and to repeat, that I have no desire to create political capital out of this question, I have no desire to go into power through it, if the Government solve it, as they should; but I am not ready to offer advice to the advisers of His Excellency. I shall wait until they bring in their measure. Sir, the Government never consulted me or my predecessor when they brought down the Gerrymander Act of 1882; they never consulted me or my predecessor when they brought in their Franchise Act of 1885; they never consulted me when they brought in the Gerrymander Act of 1892, and I spurn the idea of their calling on me to advise them as to what they should do in this instance. Let them act, and we will judge them according to their action. Before concluding I have a more congenial task to perform. I shall do myself the pleasure of extending to the hon. Finance Minister my sincere congratulations on the promotion that he has received to the seat which he now occupies. I must say I offer the hon. gentleman my own congratulations, and I believe I can speak for the party also in offering him the congratulations of the Liberal party. From the day that the hon. gentleman entered the House his advance has been constant and steady, and as he was elevated from post to post, it is not the language of flattery but the language of sincere truth to say that he always was equal to the expectations of his friends. He now has been promoted to a seat which has been illustrated—I shall speak only of his own party at the present moment—by men of great ability. From the very bottom of my heart I wish that he may discharge the duties appertaining to that seat with as much credit to himself as his predecessors did to themselves, and if I may be permitted to add also, with more benefit to the country, though of this I have but faint hope and no faith whatever.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I cannot do other than, at the very outset of the few remarks that I shall have to make, to thank the hon. gentleman for the very graceful, and what is still better, the evidently hearty way in which he was pleased to give me his own congratulations and those of his party. I augur from that more pleasure during the time that I may occupy this seat than if I had undertaken the position under different auspices as regards the sentiments represented by hon. gentlemen opposite. It shall be my endeavour, although taking a seat which as he has said has been made illustrious by great men of both parties, to do the best I can to so perform my duties that I may retain the confidence of my own party, and I should fain hope also the confidence of the hon. gentlemen opposite led by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) who has so kindly extended his congratulations. My hon. friend paid a compliment which was not undeserved to the two gentlemen who moved and seconded the Address. It is true that in the case of neither of these gentlemen was his address a maiden one. We have heard their voices before in this House and we know their ready expression, and although we were pleased to-day with the manner in which they addressed themselves to their task it was nothing more than our previous experience led us to expect from them. My hon. friend, however, although complimenting them in general had to find some fault. What is the Opposition for, if not to find fault, and what would become of the leader of an Opposition, if he did not ply his trade? After complimenting my hon. friends, the hon. gentleman came down to the real business of the hour, namely, to criticise. He found fault with these hon. gentlemen in the first place because as the Speech from the Throne did not give any reasons for the late calling of the session, neither of them deigned to enlighten the House on that question. I do not know the motives which were in the minds of the two gentlemen who respectively moved and seconded the Address, but I have a shrewd suspicion that if the right reason were known, they probably did not take my hon. friend opposite into their confidence, because they would spoil, as the sequel proves, the delight of the pleasant five minutes that my hon. friend spent in giving imaginary reasons why the House was not called at an earlier period. The late calling of Parliament has been on several occasions the cause of complaint by my hon. friend, complaint couched in his usually pleasing and not at all bitter language. I do not think, however, that the charge is a very grave one. He instituted a comparison between the constitutional methods of the United States and this country and he proved to his own satisfaction and the satisfaction of the whole House that, constitutionally speaking, he had no quarrel with the Government as regards the time that they called the House together. Constitutionally, it is perfectly within our right to use, as he says, our discretion in this matter. The hon. gentleman may quarrel with our discretion, but on constitutional grounds he certainly has nothing to say against it. Well, Sir, I am willing to be quite frank with my hon. friend and to give him the reasons why the House was not sooner called. He may consider them insufficient reasons, but they are the real reasons and the only reasons why we meet on the 18th April rather than sooner. These reasons are three in number. In the first place there was the lamentable death of our chief, Sir John Thompson, which on account of the long and sad period which intervened between the time of his death and his burial, disorganized the Government, not only as to its headship and its membership, but as to its work as well. After that there was the question, which has been spoken of by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, admittedly an important question, one which had passed through all the phases of the courts, one which had reached that stage, where it was to be discussed and action to be taken, before the Canadian Privy Council. It is a question the judgment upon which involved certain action on the part of the Government to perform, which it intended to perform and which it has performed. It was only on the 29th of January that that judgment was given by the Judicial Committee of the Lords; it was not until the second of February that the Imperial Order in Council was signed and it was not until the 19th of February that the order was transmitted from London to Canada. It came here in due course of mail, and seven days afterwards, counsel appeared in prosecution of their appeal before the Committee of the Privy Council in Ottawa. At the request of the counsel of the majority in Manitoba, the hearing was postponed, and was disposed of on the 5th, 6th and 7th days of March. The discussion and consideration of these pleas and the formulation of the decision, and of the order, took no more time than should be decently given to it, and which should characterize a question of so great gravity and importance; and on the 19th day of March, the final Order in Council of the Government was passed, and a decision was come to within twenty-four hours thereafter to call the House together, and the House was called. Now, Sir, I say that there existed a very good reason why this matter should be disposed of before the hurly-burly and excitement and business of the session which brings together 213 gentlemen from every part of the country to discharge their legislative duties. There was another important reason. We had been in correspondence with the government of Newfoundland in reference to a conference with regard to the union of that ancient colony with the Dominion of Canada. Matters were gradually ripening towards a conference and a decision was come to to have that conference, and it was called, in order to have its discussion ended if possible before Parliament met. Those are plain reasonable reasons why it was better these matters should be got out of the way, and made ready as far as they possibly could be made ready for the House, before the session opened. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition also complains of the bill of fare, and he says that it is very slim. Well then, the members of the House will be kept less time away from their ordinary business, and to that extent the gravity of the hon. gentleman's complaint is modified. It is not the invariable practice of the Opposition to facilitate in any extraordinarily generous manner the business of the House, if it is to their party and political interests to keep it in session. It is not a fact that the House has been invariably called together in the early months of the year. A look at the dates from 1867 down will show that the months of March and April play no inconsiderable part in the dates on which a Parliament has been called; but I do know of instances in which Parliament has been called together much earlier than this, and yet has sat on into the hot days of July and August before the members were permitted to return home to attend to their private business. Therefore, if we are here at this date, we are here under the reasons of which I have spoken, and not on account of the fanciful reasons of my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) that we could have no mind of our own, and that we were balancing as between the better prospects of going to the country without a session or having a session without first going to the country. My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) says that it would possibly be an unthinkable thing that the Government should have a mind of its own, and he attributes the lateness of the session to the instability of the Government in making up its mind. Well, I may say to my hon. friend that if it were unfortunately true that we had no minds of our own and could not make up our minds, we should find ourselves in very good company, for I have a suspicion that my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) has put himself in that category very often within the last few years. And I am not sure, that from anything he has said yet on the important question, upon which he last dilated, he has had during the last three or four years, any mind of his own. If he has he has taken precious good care to let no person else know what that mind may be. My hon. friend was very crafty in getting out of the necessity of having, as the leader of his party, a mind of his own and expressing it, by saying that it was an unheard of thing that he should be asked to advise the advisers of His Excellency. Well, we do not wish him to do that. For many long years he has not done it except across the floor. For many long years to come, we hope, he will not be in the coveted position of advising His Excellency upon the current affairs of the country. As to that we may have different views, according to the side of the House upon which sit; but there is one thing certain, that in every constitutionally governed country, and in this Dominion, the electorate might reasonably expect that the hon. gentleman would advise his constituents, his party and the electorate of this country as to what are his views on a great public question. We will allow the hon. gentleman for many years to come to do without advising the advisers of His Excellency; but we do ask him to make up his mind upon this and sundry other questions, and advise the people of Canada just where he stands, and where his party stands. Sir, the hon. gentleman spoke of the trade issue; he rang the changes upon the iniquity of protection; he declared that it was the root of all evil; he said that it destroyed the farming interests of this country particularly. But when the hon. gentleman came down from these definite maledictions, and began to talk about what the remedy should be, how delightfully indefinite he became. I appeal to gentlemen on this side of the House, I appeal to gentlemen on that side of the House, I appeal to 'Hansard' and the readers of 'Hansard,' if they can make out from the few sentences with which he finished his tirade against protection, as to his panacea for the ills of the country, if they could take the prescription which he gave to any political druggist and have it made up in a form in which it could be given to the body politic. My hon. friend, instead of plunging all at once into the heavy political questions of the day, which he said the mover and the seconder of the Address had slighted, indulged in a good deal of persiflage with reference to the position of the advisers of His Excellency and the amusing incidents which he assured us are taking place and have from time to time been taking place in the Council chamber and elsewhere. He made allusion to wars and fighting that were going on between two factions in the Cabinet. I can assure my hon. friend that though he imagines there have been wars, and that there are two factions, and that there has been fighting, so far as I am concerned, I have escaped without a scar or a scratch—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. And, looking around on the healthy and serene faces of my colleagues, I think they can say the same for themselves. My hon. friend has one fault: he is too imaginative. I have no doubt that in certain adverse political situations, when no great satisfaction can be derived from the actualities, it is a great help to my hon. friend to have a strong imagination and to be able to soar away from the sordid and not very pleasant realities into the regions of airy fancy where he may disport himself at his pleasure. I remember that the hon. gentleman lately engaged in such a flight in the city of Toronto, where, happening to read a paper in the afternoon and making a speech in the evening, and having seen in the paper that my humble self had been interviewed and had made a very positive statement in regard to the coming elections, he thought it worth while to take up fifteen minutes in his speech before a great audience to point out how the Minister of Finance had made certain statements which he should not have made, and if he had made them how diametrically opposed they were to the facts of the case and to the statements made by other Ministers. Sir, the fact as regards that was that I had never seen the reporter to my knowledge, and I was certainly not interviewed.

Mr. LAURIER. I apologize to the hon. gentleman certainly, and I beg to assure him that I will never believe another report that appears in a Conservative paper.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. After the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House get through with the satisfaction which this illusion has given them, I think it will be my duty to prick that bubble as well, and to say that unfortunately for that version of the case, the interview did not appear in a Conservative paper.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What paper was it?

Mr. FOSTER. If I wait a little while, I am sure I shall get from hon. gentlemen that same delightful consistency and concurrence of opinion as to the paper that characterizes their utterances on other parts of their policy. The hon. gentleman then spoke of the elections which have taken place on the 17th day of April, and endeavoured to draw a good deal of comfort for himself and his party from the result of those elections. Amongst other things he claimed a victory in the city of Quebec in the election of Mr. Dobell; and, to prove that a victory for his party and his policy, he read the principal planks in the platform placed before the electors by Mr. Dobell, in which platform the hon. gentleman read word for word, article for article, what has been in the main the political creed and faith of the Liberal-Conservative party for the last thirteen or fourteen years. The hon. gentleman says that Mr. Dobell is in favour of an increase of foreign trade. So is the Liberal-Conservative party, and so it has been; but in every endeavour the Liberal-Conservative party has made to increase our foreign trade, by great lines of railway to open up and develop the resources of the country, without which our products could not be sent to foreign countries—in every effort which this party has made to subsidize great lines of steamers to make quick and regular communications with the great trading countries of the world—my hon. friend and his adherents have opposed us tooth and nail upon the floor of this House; and yet, forsooth, he claims Mr. Dobell as a supporter of his policy, because Mr. Dobell very wisely is in favour of an increase of foreign trade, which foreign trade has been continually increasing under Liberal-Conservative rule, which foreign trade under the regime of the hon. gentlemen who had power in this country from 1874 to 1878 decreased from $200,000,000 odd down to about $154,000,000, and has increased from that small sum $250,000,000 under Conservative rule. We are quite satisfied with Mr. Dobell, and we shall be quite satisfied with any gentleman who comes to this House as a representative who has for one article of his faith a desire to increase the foreign trade of Canada, for the foreign trade of Canada can only be increased by the development and the increase of the internal resources and the internal trade of this country. Well, Sir, he says that Mr. Dobell proved his sympathy with the party of gentlemen opposite by saying that he was in favour of reciprocity with the United States on a fair and equal basis. These are almost the very words that have been in the platform of the Liberal-Conservative party for these many years. But Mr. Dobell did not say that he was in favour of Unrestricted Reciprocity with the United States. He did not say that he was willing to pull down the tariff wall between ourselves and one country at the expense of putting a discrimination amounting to prohibition against every other country in the world in its trade with Canada. And although Mr. Dobell did say that he was in favour of lowering the tariff rate, in so far as it could possibly be done, consistent with the best interests of the country, we do not see in that expression of his, nor can it be found there, proof that he favours free trade as it exists in Great Britain. Well, Sir, my hon. friend was rather mild, and, for him, somewhat tame in his criticism up to this point. But he braced himself for the occasion, and he regained his old vigour when, by some good fortune, he happened to light upon the idea conveyed by the word depression. In one moment the exultant spirit of the war-horse returned, and he laid about vigorously to show into what a terrible state of affairs Canada had been plunged. He sought to show that this was a most serious time in the history of Canada; that we were burdened on the one hand with a national debt which was crushing the life out of us, and on the other hand by the taxation which must be imposed to meet the expenses of the country. And he ended up with the statement that it was this protective tariff and this protective principle which was the root of all the evil, which was despoiling the country, and which had brought it to this crisis. But, curiously enough, he went on directly afterwards to say that it was impossible to avoid periods of depression. But he stated, and wrongly stated, if he will allow me to say so, the belief of the Liberal-Conservative party by whom the National Policy was introduced. We have not said that if there be any necessity for it, if there be any argument for its continuance it must be that it is powerful enough to keep off depression from a country, powerful enough to ward off these cycles of depression which sweep over the whole world, no matter what fiscal system, no matter what system of government may be adopted. No, Sir, that is an extreme statement which Liberal-Conservatives do not make. But what they do state and that in which their position is impregnable according to sound reasoning and good theory, impregnable according to the experience of this country and other countries, is this, that the National Policy—bringing it down to this particular country—has moderated the force and effect of cycles of depression, and has kept this country steady, and has kept it strong in the midst of four years of commercial depression deeper and more far-reaching in its consequences, and causing a wider and deeper distress than any other period of depression for the last twenty-five years in the history of the commercial nations of the world. That is what we stand upon, that is what we are willing to be judged by as to the effects of the National Policy. I am not going to make a speech upon the budget; I am not going to discuss the trade question within the narrow limits of time that is allowed me upon the Address. But when we come to that question we shall have ample time to contrast ourselves with other countries. Let me just now give to my hon. friend a text which he may think about, one upon which he may be called upon to say something when the discussion comes on. If his policy is, as he says, free trade as it is practised and as it exists in Great Britain, when he denounces the National Policy here, because he declares that it does not ward off but induces depression, we shall ask him, by and by for a satisfactory explanation of his assertions and ask him to point out why it is that in the greatest and almost the only free trade country, our own mother country, Great Britain, there is to-day, and has been for the last four or five years a series of depressions in agriculture hitherto unknown in the history of that island, and which have brought about a state of affairs which is exercising more serious thought among the statesmen and economists of Great Britain than any other question which is to-day pressing for solution there. That is a question of practical politics which it will be incumbent upon my hon. friend to make very clear to the House and the country before he can get either the House or the country to believe that free trade as it is in England is a better system for Canada than that we have adopted. The hon. gentlemen made merry over a prediction which had been made by Sir Charles Tupper in this House with reference to what was to take place in the future as to the development of the North-west, and the settlement of its fertile lands. Now, if the hon. gentleman will read the letter he will find that it was not a prediction of a Minister, or of Sir Charles Tupper, but a statement drawn up in cool blood by a departmental officer without political bias, to say the least, who, from the data that he had in hand at that time made up what he thought would be the line of development in the North-west within the next few years. That was a statement which a Minister is bound to take, and is bound to give his adhesion to unless—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. Wait until I get through. That is a statement which a Minister is bound to take, and is bound to give his confidence to unless he has the best of ground for believing that the departmental officer is biased or is mistaken in his opinions. But, Sir, that was a statement made up by a departmental officer, made up without bias, made up under circumstances which, at the time, he thought predicted the result, and I am bound to say that he made it up in full faith that the next few years would realize the truth of his statement. The result was different. But there are statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite that might be criticised in the same way, statements made by them upon their own responsibility. Let us examine one of these. I remember that my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) in 1883, I think it was, speaking in this House in opposition to a loan which was proposed to be given to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company of $30,000,000, opposed it on the ground that it was not a loan in reality but a gift. And he made this oracular prediction, that he was as likely to see the waters run up hill as to see one dollar of that $30,000,000 recouped to the Dominion treasury. Now, this was a statement made, not by a departmental officer, but made by the hon. gentleman himself, and testing his own powers of prediction. And it failed. Having fallen into error himself he ought to be wondrous kind in the case of an error in prediction made upon far better grounds, by a political opponent. I remember later than that, when the hon. gentleman, the political leader of his party, supposed to give them the word of faith and guidance, which they were to follow with implicit obedience, looking over the whole political field, studying the whole economic problem, looking at the state of agitation and the state of opinion in the republic to the south of us, came here, and went through this country, and made the prediction without any ifs, or buts, or qualifications, that the United States, the first born daughter of England, had pronounced for, and would speedily realize, free trade; and the next daughter of England to follow her example would be this Dominion of Canada. Well, Sir, the eldest daughter of England has not pronounced for free trade, has not got free trade, but rejoices under the iniquity, as my hon. friend would call it, of a 40 per cent tariff on dutiable goods. And, Sir, I am of the opinion that he is just as much mistaken in thinking that the second daughter of Great Britain, Canada, to wit, will not follow in the line of the United States, upon more moderate grounds, and consider it to her advantage that as long as the United States keeps up a high protective tariff against Canada, Canada in self-defence to her manufactures, her industry, her development and her future, must keep up a moderate and reasonable protection against imported goods.

After Recess.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend made a legitimate criticism of a statement of mine with reference to the finances, as to the expenditure of the current year compared with the falling off of revenue and the consequent deficit which he anticipates, and rightly anticipates. But, just at this point, I would like to disclaim the statement of my hon. friend that the deficit would be, in round figures, about six million dollars. I think my hon. friend has had bad advisers in that respect. He has buoyed himself upon the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who in this respect, as in some others, is not the best guide in matters party and political which are meant for campaign work against his opponents. It is true that a deficit to a Finance Minister and to a Government is never a welcome thing. Probably there will result from this decline in the occurrence of the year to myself and the Liberal-Conservative party, that we shall hereafter have a little more sympathy and fellow feeling with hon. gentlemen opposite, and having had the casual, and, I hope, but temporary acquaintance with one of those ill-natured and ill-visaged deficits, we shall be better able to appreciate the misery of hon. gentlemen opposite, who seem to have made constant companions of them.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. FOSTER. There is, however, a word more to be said. A greater authority than myself has stated that execution often lags on promise; and perhaps the promise that I made, the statement that might be construed into a promise or pledge to the House and the country, was made without sufficiently weighing the difficult circumstances in the case. One thing is certain, that after moneys have been voted and appropriations have been made, it is much more difficult to economize then, than to begin to economize at the start, when the Estimates are being passed and appropriations are being made. It is also a fact that these obligations in expenditure accumulate, that one year never sees the completion of the works begun in that year, and that any one year that may be taken shows obligations in the shape of contracts which have been begun and must be finished, in the shape of preparations which have been commenced and which must be carried out, if loss is not to accrue. So the Government found these accumulations of contracts or obligations, and it becomes very difficult indeed to forego their completion. There were also some extraordinary expenditures which occurred in the past year and added to that difficulty. More than that: the extraordinary falling off in the revenue was of such a nature that it was quite impossible for the Government to have made the expenditure tally with the income, which went so rapidly downward during the last six months of the fiscal year. There is, however, a difference that I should like the House to note in the position at present and that of the regime from 1874 to 1878. It is a fact that the deficits which took place from 1874 to 1878 were deficits accompanied by the laying on of taxation upon the people and were not in any sense deficits which were contributed to by taking off taxation that had formerly been placed upon the people. But with respect to the events of the last three years, and with respect to the deficit of last year, and the deficit of the present year, this must be understood, that that deficit would not have occurred, even in part, if the same rate of taxation which existed in 1890 had been kept on through 1891, 1892, 1893 and 1894. Sir, if the sugar taxation alone had been kept at its old figures for these years, we would not only have had the deficit, but we should have had a clear record as between expenditure and income, and have paid off from six to eight millions of the public debt. So, if a deficit has occurred last year and this year, out of the people's pockets it has not come, but along with the people's savings. It has come with the people's savings in two ways: savings from taxations which was removed, the raw sugar taxation which was a direct tax, and savings from decreased purchases owing to economy practised, which always occurs in times of trade difficulty and depression. That marks a distinct difference between the deficits which have occurred in the past year, and will occur in the present year, and those which marked the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear. Was there no shrinkage then?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly. Was there any taxation laid on then? The hon. gentleman should say, "Hear, hear," again. What I stated is perfectly true, that the deficit is due to two causes, the removal of taxation, and that is in greater part, and the reduced purchases owing to economy practised by people in general. Let us hope, and I think I can confidently express this hope, that we have seen the last of our deficits, and that, having cleared off the residue of accumulations for past years, of contracts entered into, we shall, during the next year not only make, which I trust we shall do without fail, an equilibrium between revenue and expenditure, but we shall get back to our normal and our proper position, where we shall have met all expenditure and have a little sum to the good as well. The hon. leader of the Opposition made some remarks with respect to the French treaty, which calls for an explanation on my part, an explanation which was not given in the Speech from the Throne, but which is pertinent and proper to be given at this stage. My hon. friend was right in saying, that, so far as the French Chambers were concerned, they had passed the Treaty Act, and that, so far as Canada was concerned, that legislation was consummated. Ratifications, however, have not yet been exchanged, and the proclamation of the Governor General in Council calling the Act into force cannot be issued here until the ratifications have been exchanged. The satisfactory assurances that are spoken of have reference to this fact, that during the progress of the conference with the delegates of the colonial Governments, which took place last year, our Australasian and Cape friends criticised the treaty which was entered into with France on this ground, that they believed, and they expressed that belief that it would be found to be the fact that it would prevent the making of treaty arrangements between those colonies and Canada in which wines, the native products of the Cape and of some of the Australasian colonies, might be a factor in the interchange of products on the basis of better trade relations, their contention being that France would require, that if better terms on these articles were given to the colonies than were stated in the French treaty, under the third powers clause or phrase, she would be entitled to ask that the same treatment be given to her. That contention was so strongly made that the Minister of Trade and Commerce thought it his duty to formally communicate with the Colonial Office. That was done, and assurances received that the third powers did not include the colonies, and that the treaty, if passed, would not militate against any arrangement that it might be thought well to make between the colonies and Canada, even if it involved a lower rate of duty for the articles which were mentioned in the French treaty. That is the explanation in regard to that matter, in part. There is, however, another explanation. Great Britain has most-favoured-nation clause treaties with some powers, and she is also anxious that her other colonies should have as good treatment as is given to France in this respect, as to any other foreign power with which Canada makes a treaty. With respect to the most-favoured nations and the treaties with them, it is absolutely necessary, under the treaties, in which Canada is included, that their articles which are of the same nature as those mentioned in the French treaty should receive the most-favoured-nation treatment. The Canadian Act of Parliament in which the tariff is embraced does not make provision for that, and the fact of the existence of the treaty does not override the tariff law of the country. So that Great Britain wishes that, before ratifications are exchanged and the treaty proclaimed, the actual law shall make that point clear as regards the most-favoured nations and the colonies. That is the legislation which is hinted at in the Speech and which will be brought before the House for its consideration. My hon. friend was good enough to say in his criticism of the French Treaty that the members of the Government had been brought to their knees in this matter by Sir Charles Tupper, our High Commissioner. If the hon. gentleman had not had a lapse of memory he might have recollected that others besides the Government—if that be true—had been brought to their knees by this same French treaty; for, if I remember aright, my hon. friend very vigorously opposed the treaty. I am not sure that he did not vote twice against the treaty, but by and by, for sentimental reasons—and he is the hon. gentleman who has repeatedly declared that there is no sentiment in trade—for sentimental reasons he swallowed the treaty and came to his knees with the rest of us. I was very glad to hear my hon. friend's statement of friendship with regard to the colony of Newfoundland. I think he echoed what are the feelings of Canada as a whole; that if treaty terms can be fairly, honourably and amicably arranged, without coercion either of circumstances or of power, and with all proper provisions, it would be an excellent and much to be desired consummation, if Newfoundland be added to the confederation, and thus, that all the British possessions on this part of the North American continent should be brought into one united and harmonious whole. It was with this view and with this desire that the Canadian Government were happy to respond to the proposition which was made by the Government of Newfoundland that delegates should meet and discuss the matter. They have met and they have discussed the situation in a thorough and exhaustive and friendly way, and although negotiations are not as yet concluded; it will be, as the Speech from the Throne says, a matter of congratulation on all sides if this union can be consummated with fairness and with friendship between all. My hon. friend, however, made the proviso, that he should like to see the French shore question settled before the colony came into Canada, if it so happens that the colony be united with us. The hon. gentleman thought that that question should be settled with Great Britain and France. There is a treaty, there is the plain wording of the treaty, there are the rights which France claims under the treaty, there are the rights which so far as the English contention is concerned, she sometimes exercises but which are claimed not to be within the four corners of the treaty, and on these matters long negotiations and repeated negotiations have been going on and they have assumed—I think I may say without violating any confidence, because the blue-books have been already published—they have assumed a position at the present time, where we may fairly say, that with agreement between the Newfoundland Government and the Home Government, legislation is likely to be passed at the coming session of the Newfoundland legislature which will settle that question agreeably to the government of Newfoundland and to the government of Great Britain on a basis which will be accepted by France. So much with reference to that question. I desire to say a word, and but a word with reference to the last allusion but one, of my hon. friend, and that was his reference to what is known as the remedial order and the Manitoba school question. My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) touched that very gingerly. He stated that the Ministers, some of them at least, had been making very decided utterances in different parts of the country, and that they had been talking a great deal. Evidently that criticism does not apply to my hon. friend for he has been making no very decided utterances about this question and he has not been talking much about it. In fact, it is a matter which is somewhat significant and somewhat unusual, that in a series of election contests undertaken in different parts of the country, in constituencies of different temperaments and different complexions, after the passage of the remedial order and after the Government's decision, it is remarkable I say, that four contests should take place and that in two of the constituencies the leader of a great party did not put candidates in the field. My hon. friend says that he looked upon it as a family quarrel down in Haldimand. A family quarrel in Haldimand! Left to the Liberal-Conservatives alone, in a county which has been the closed home, the castle of the Liberal party for many and many a year, and the hon. gentleman has allowed the Liberal-Conservatives to go into his own home, his own castle, and without a word from him to settle a family quarrel between themselves! I am afraid that that excuse is not sufficiently strong to base my hon. friend's conduct upon before the electors of this country. I would not go further in reference to this question were it not that the hon. gentleman had stated that the Government had been guilty of indiscretion all the way through. Now that is one of those broad statements that I do not think can be sustained, and I shall present two or three considerations to the House to show why it cannot be sustained. My hon. friend says the Government has shown a lamentable lack of discretion all through this matter. In what respect, let me ask him? Manitoba, a province having exclusive rights limited by certain restrictions under the constitution, having dealt with a certain matter relating to education, passed a law and the law came for revision, as provincial laws do come, to the Minister of Justice for the Dominion of Canada. The Dominion took the ground, well established—does my hon. friend controvert that ground or will his party controvert that ground—the Dominion Government took the ground that that Act passed on such a question with such powers behind it ought not to be disallowed, that it ought to be left to its fulfilment and the courts would very soon say whether it was ultra vires or not. The Dominion Government, therefore, did not disallow the Act. Does my hon. friend count that as one of the indiscretions? I do not think he will say so. Well, Sir, after that legislation had gone before the tribunals, and the first decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was given with reference to the Barrett case, our friends in the minority in the province of Manitoba having loyally accepted the decision of the Government not to disallow, having then had recourse to the courts, as they were told they had, and as they knew they had, having fought out that matter in the courts, and had a certain decision which satisfied them, at least as to the law on one point, they have availed themselves of—what? Of the constitution of this country—of their own constitutional act, as every minority has a right to do. They availed themselves of its express provisions in their petition to the Dominion Government. Now, Sir, that was perfectly right. The action of the Government upon that was simply this: it is better to be sure than sorry—is this a matter which comes under the right of appeal—under that provision of the Manitoba Act or the British North America Act? It was best that that should be decided by the courts under a law which was introduced by the leader of the party opposite, the predecessor of my hon. friend, and acquiesced in on both sides of the House. Under that they proceeded, and under that the Government of this country made them this answer: We will defer the hearing of the appeal until every difficulty is settled and the clear legal answer is given, the clear legal ground is shown. Was that in the opinion of my hon. friend an act of indiscretion? The minority in Manitoba loyally accepted that; they took their case to the Privy Council; they argued it there, and they got their decision. That decision having been given, the case was clear. The Government of this country knew then, if they acted, exactly upon what ground they were acting. Suppose they had acted in the first instance and allowed the appeal, and the case had then gone before the courts and it had been proved that the appeal did not lie in that case. Would that have been a discreet act? Would that have been a wise act? But after the whole ground was cleared, after the decision was given, then the Government heard the appeal. Will my hon. friend count that as an act of indiscretion? If he does, I think the reasonable people of this country will say that that was the only step for the Government to have taken—that as it was best for it to know exactly its powers in this case before it sought to carry them out. So it was necessary when these powers were made known to give the minority their constitutional right to appeal. After that the appeal was heard in due course, and the decision given; and the only criticism my hon. friend has to make upon the decision is that it was dictatorial and not conciliatory. He pointed out that the order had two sides to it. He is wrong: the order is simply the order. It has two sides to it if two people from different standpoints read it and come to different conclusions. It has two sides to it in my hon. friend's own camp. What does "La Patrie" say about it?—that it is peremptory and dictatorial? On the contrary, that it is nerveless and no order at all. What does "L'Electeur" say about it?—that it is dictatorial and peremptory? Not at all. That it is simply the act of a sheriff passing on an execution or something to that effect. What does the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) say about it?—that it is dictatorial or peremptory? No. That the Government simply get down on their knees and make a prayer to Manitoba—why do they not order Manitoba to do so and so? So there are two sides to it amongst my hon. friend's own people. There were not two sides to it in Verchères, where the candidate of my hon. friend went ahead of his leader and made a clear statement where he stood, and implied a rebuke, and I think a well merited rebuke, upon his leader, who in these important contests and on this important question had no word of advice, no suggestion to guide the conduct of his followers who were looking to him for guidance. In one thing I do agree with my hon. friend, that I hope this question will be settled as far away from the heat and bitterness of sectarian and party strife as possible; and to that end I deprecate extended discussions on that question at the present time. On that account I deplore the action of a member of the Manitoba Government of the province of Ontario within the last ten days. What was the case? What is the case to-day? That subject is remitted to the legislature of Manitoba. Call it dictatorial, call it nerveless, look upon it as you please, it is simply this: a decision of the law; and if there is a request implied, it is a request implied by courtesy to the fuller powers which Manitoba has, as compared with this Parliament, to settle the question. The difficulty arose in Manitoba legislation; the difficulty, if it is to be cured completely, can only be cured completely by Manitoba itself, on account of the peculiar and far-reaching powers which Manitoba has in that respect. There it goes; it is there to-day; and when it went there it was considered a grave and serious matter—so grave and serious that outside of all defiant expressions that had formerly been used, the Government and the legislature which had the responsibility did a wise and proper thing, in my view, in taking time to consider the question. In their calm and cool moments they are to deliberate upon it, and come to their conclusion; and by and by they are to formulate their decision. And yet, Sir, we find the Attorney General of that province—one of the Cabinet who is to take this subject into consideration and look over the legal points and peculiar circumstances of the case, and come to a conclusion involving the peace and prosperity not only of that province, but of other parts of this Dominion—we find that gentleman instead of giving it that calm and cool consideration, hieing himself down to Haldimand, going upon the stump, and saying that the Dominion Government has no object in view except to buy votes, and hurling his defiance from every platform in that county. Now, Sir, I think that as political conduct deserves condemnation, and I have no hesitation in saying that I do not know of a single instance in which political indecency has gone further towards outrage than the instance I have just detailed to you. That, Sir, is not the position which my hon. friend takes to-day, and is not the position which any statesman ought to take. Until the 9th of May, when the decision of the Manitoba Government may be come to and the legislature will be convened to hear it, let Manitoba think over that matter with as little passion and as far from strife and bitterness as possible; let her come to her conclusions apart from the heat of fiery and inflammatory declamation; and until that day comes and those conclusions are formulated, I am bound to maintain, as I certainly hope, that she will do her own work as she best can do it, and that she will find a way for making smooth these waters which are now rough and troubled. Now, Sir, I have but one word more to say, and I commence that by thanking my hon. friend for his allusions to our late lamented leader, Sir John Thompson. So hearty and so eloquent a tribute as he paid to Sir John Thompson's memory shows us, and shows us in a most pleasing manner, that whatever may be the bitterness of party and political life, whatever may be the strifes between different camps and on different sides of political questions, there is yet deep in the heart of Canadians this feeling that ever and anon there arise amongst us on one side or the other men who do not belong entirely to any party but who belong emphatically to their country, whom all are proud to know as Canadian citizens, and to whose worth and merits all are glad to pay tribute. And after that eloquent tribute which the hon. gentleman has paid to the memory of Sir John Thompson, what can words of mine avail. What can any words avail in the face of that splendid exhibition of sentiment which commenced at Windsor and flashed itself out along the chords of sympathy, under sea and over land, until in the remotest parts of the world wherever British institutions are established and the British flag waves, there vibrated the plaintive lament for a great man who had lived and, alas, was now dead; a man distinguished above others in the greatest of the possessions of Great Britain, a man honoured above others in the Empire itself, a man whose life contributed great and invaluable factors to the public spirit, the development and the future greatness of both? What words can avail in the face of that tender solicitude and that unfeigned sorrow of Her Most Gracious Majesty herself, and of that significant pomp and circumstance which followed him from the scene of his tragic and sudden death, accompanied him across the sea panoplied in the symbols of Britain's might by sea and land, and never left him until, in his native city, the tender blue sky and sorrowing multitudes of friends bent over the grave in which his mortal remains were laid to rest. We may strew our flowers, we may drop our tears, we may keep the last sad vigils with the dead, and after all is done, what remains? In one sense, nothing; but in another and better sense much remains. There remains to us his memory, instinct with loving reminiscences, pregnant with noble impulses and ideals. For, after all, when we think of it, the career of Sir John Thompson was a phenomenal career. Known and loved by his circle of intimate friends for many years before he was widely known to Canada, it may be truly said of him that he came to be known to the larger public in 1885, and the short span of ten years saw his rise and his glorious and tragic death. In 1885 he entered the Ministry. In 1886 he took first rank as a debater and statesman in this House. In the few years that passed he gained the confidence of both sides of this House, and he went from honour to honour until he became the Premier of this country, in judicial matters attaining proud pre-eminence and on one of the greatest tribunals that the world ever saw, and upon a most important case—easily the peer of any who sat with him, until, at the last, under the highest honours that his Sovereign could bestow, his life went out like the noon-day sun—shining one instant bright and glorious in mid-heavens; in the next, hidden for ever from view, with the soft effulgence of its light flooding the horizon far and near. Let us hope, that seeing now most clearly the virtues of the man who was so loved by us, and who has for ever gone from us, we may emulate them, and that there may never be a decade in the history of this country when there shall not be equally strong, equally true, and equally grand and patriotic men as the late Right Honourable Sir John Thompson.

Mr. FOSTER.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the hon. Minister of Finance is prolific in nothing else, at any rate he is very prolific in excuses, but I am bound to say that on the present occasion I think he might well have spared us, and spared himself, the trouble of enumerating them. Sir, we are perfectly well aware on this side of the House that the hon. gentleman for one was not in the slightest degree desirous of inflicting this session upon us at this inconvenient time. We are perfectly well aware of that and the House fully appreciates the excellent reasons which the hon. gentleman possessed for not desiring at this particular time to confront the assembled wisdom of Canada, or to give us an opportunity of showing how thoroughly and completely the hon. gentleman had made good his claim to the title of a skillful financier by the prophecies he was good enough to make to us with respect to the probable results of his fiscal policy for the current year. Sir, I do not pretend to say that the several excuses which the hon. gentleman presented to the House, or the several reasons he alleged for summoning Parliament together at this time, are not without a certain foundation in truth. But this I will say, that if the hon. gentleman has told us the truth, he has not told us the whole truth as to the reasons which impelled the hon. gentlemen to hold this present session. Sir, I think not only on this side of the House but on that side, there is a tolerably good idea of the reason why this particular session is held. It is the fate of hon. gentleman to be considerably better known than trusted, and there is not the slightest doubt that in certain of the intricate negotiations which have attended the settlement of the Manitoba question, certain influential personages who knew these hon. gentlemen, and who, I have reason to know, had very good grounds for their distrust of these hon. gentlemen, had intimated to them in the most unmistakable language, had, in fact, conveyed their mandate, or, shall I say, their "mandement" to them, that on this occasion they were not going to be granted any credit, on this occasion no promises would do, on this occasion they had to hold a session, and they had to implement their promises, or certain personages would know the reason why. Now, Sir, I do not object to a session 'per se': on the contrary, I am very glad indeed that we will have an opportunity, before we meet the electors, of proving from these hon. gentlemen's own mouths, of proving from their own official records, how absolutely and correctly every statement made from this side of the House, every prediction as to the ultimate consequences of the villainous policy of which these hon. gentlemen are the exponents, have come to pass and are verified to-day. But, Sir, while I have no objection at all to a session in itself, I have the very strongest possible objection to the course which the hon. gentlemen have pursued in defiance of custom, in defiance of precedents, in defiance of their own repeated promises in summoning the Parliament of Canada together at about the date when, with ordinarily good business management on their part, the Parliament of Canada ought to be ready to prorogue. Sir, the hon. gentleman told us that it is not a very grave charge at all, not a thing that is much worthy of the consideration of an important body like ourselves, if Parliament is summoned together nearly three months after its proper time. To the hon. gentleman's mind it is of very little consequence whether the 200 other gentlemen forming the great body of this House, are put to grave and serious inconvenience by the incompetence of himself and his colleagues; it is of very little consequence in the hon. gentleman's mind whether the whole mercantile community of Canada, whether every business man in Canada, is put to grave inconvenience by reasons of this extreme delay in meeting Parliament; it is of very little consequence in the hon. gentleman's mind, I suppose, whether the whole public service of Canada is gravely disorganized by reason of the extreme delay in summoning Parliament. Now, as to the idle pretense that there is any real difficulty, as to the idle pretense that these gentlemen if they were really possessed of the business capacity they claim, could not have met Parliament at the proper time, let me call the attention of the House to the way in which the public business was administered at a time when there were genuine business men in charge of the Government of this country. In the year 1875, Parliament met on 4th day of February; in 1876, Parliament met on 10th February; in 1877, Parliament met on the 8th of February; in 1878, Parliament met on the 7th of February. Sir, there are four successive years. We had important questions to deal with, we had deficits to face, we had a world-wide depression, a far greater depression than exists to-day, to contend with; but we never hesitated to meet Parliament, we never hesitated to meet the hon. gentleman's predecessors, we never hesitated to explain clearly what our policy was, we never hesitated to stand or fall by the course which we, in our consci-

ences believe, and which the history of Canada has since conclusively proved, was the policy which alone Canada could look to for safety and salvation, if Canada is ever to make a worthy and fitting use of the resources which Providence has placed at our disposal. The hon. gentleman is good enough to tell us that the lamented death of Sir John Thompson was a reasonable ground why Parliament should not be summoned together. Well, Sir, was there any change of policy caused by the death of Sir John Thompson? Did not these gentlemen tell us on all occasions that their policy is the same as his? Was there any very great alteration in the personnel of the Cabinet? Was there any great alteration in the offices held by these hon. gentlemen? Not, at any rate, so far as I am aware of. Sir, let their own acts, as usual, be the best answers to their own arguments. Sir John Thompson's death and the disorganization consequent thereon, the Minister of Finance tells us, was a ground for delay in meeting Parliament. If the sorrow which he and his colleagues, I do not doubt, sincerely felt, prevented them from attending to public business, their sorrow and this disorganization did not in the slightest degree prevent them from starting out and carrying on an electioneering tour from one end of Canada to the other during the months of January and February, and so much of March as was not occupied in other negotiations. Now, Sir, if these hon. gentlemen when they traversed Canada from end to end, when the Jamaica car, and the contents of the Jamaica car, was daily and hourly seen perambulating Ontario, when these hon. gentlemen were stirring up the country from one end to the other, these hon. gentlemen, I beg to tell them, were doing an extremely foolish act in their own interest if they really meant to have held a session. In the first place, these hon. gentlemen knew, and the Minister of Finance knew best of all, that by postponing the session to the 19th April, he had practically rendered it impossible that one single vote for the public service could be got through before the 1st of July of this year. He knows, and I know, and you know, and all hon. gentlemen who have any experience in public life, know, that we can hardly hope to see one single vote passed until the termination of this fiscal year. He knows, and I know, and all men of experience know, that the result will be to gravely inconvenience and gravely delay the public service; and the hon. gentleman considered all that a perfectly insignificant thing provided the temporary convenience or the political advantage of the Ministry were not disturbed or interfered with. Sir, I must say for my part—and I make the remark for the benefit of hon. gentlemen opposite—that it does look to me to be a very curious piece of strategy indeed. Why, Sir, what have these shepherds of the people been doing all this time ?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Shearing the sheep.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Trying to shear the sheep. They have spent the months of January, February and a part of March, in providing opponents for their own supporters and followers. It is going to be a very interesting experiment. You will take an interest, and a good many other of our friends will take an interest in it. For the first time in my memory—and it goes back tolerably far on political subjects—we are going to see what the results upon the public mind will be of having 200 gentlemen sitting here at Ottawa voting away the people's money, and 200 other gentlemen prowling along the concessions, explaining to the people how their money is being voted away, and what for. Sir, I saw the other day, in one of the subsidized organs which support the hon. gentlemen, a statement that the mantle of the late Sir John A. Macdonald had fallen upon them. It may be so. If so, Mr. Speaker, it strikes me that it has covered them all up, with much the same results which were observed, if I recollect aright, when Gulliver's cloak descended on the Privy Council of his sacred majesty, the King of Lilliput, Mr. Speaker. I may say that we are glad to learn from so high a source as the Minister of Finance, firstly, that the Cabinet is in harmony, and next, if I understand him aright, that he had escaped all personal damage in any little collisions which may have occurred. Let us trust that the same may be said of all his colleagues, or that, if any of them were called upon to seal their devotion to their opinions with their blood, their wounds were all received in front. Now, as a rule I object, and I think hon. gentlemen will admit that I have not been forward, as a general thing, to anticipate the discussion on the Budget in the course of the debate on the Address ; and I will so far relieve the mind of the hon. Minister of Finance as to tell him that I do not propose on the present occasion to go into any discussion of the trade question further than, possibly, to offer a remark or two in answer to some statements of his own. But while I say that it is not desirable, as a general rule, in the public interest, that you should anticipate a discussion on the Budget in course of the debate on the Address, I say that the present occasion is thus far an exception, that it is in the highest degree of importance to this House and to the country at large, that we should understand exactly the present financial position. Sir, according to my view of the case, the situation is most grave. Whatever the hon. gentleman may say, whatever the hon. gentleman may think, all who have studied the question know well that our present taxation is extraordinarily onerous. We know right well, and I shall have, perhaps, a word or two more to say on that subject, how utterly, hopelessly and completely the recent efforts of the hon. gentleman, well meant as they may have been, and though prolonged through several months of the last session, failed to relieve the pressure of that taxation. It is only too true, and I do not hold him to blame for it, that the income of very large classes in the most important sections of this country have been enormously reduced within the last three or four years. It is likewise true that the total indebtedness of Canada abroad, and by that I mean, and the hon. gentleman ought to take it into account, not merely our federal debt, but our municipal debt, our private debt, and our provincial debt, the general debt of Canada, in short, has enormously increased within the past few years. Sir, the hon. gentleman knows only too well, there is no hon. member in this House who ought to know it better, that over large sections of Canada, not merely has the increase of population fallen below that which prevails in old and thickly peopled countries elsewhere, but it has come to a positive and absolute standstill ; and that most of all is true of the province he represents, and of the particular riding for which he sits in this House. I do not wish to enlarge upon these subjects at present ; it requires more time than I have at my disposal, and I dare say before the House rises there will be very full opportunities, indeed, to point out the bearing of these facts on the present situation, and to show how utterly and totally fallacious is the view which the hon. gentleman holds out to himself and to the country that this depression can be looked upon as one which is likely soon or easily to pass away. Sir, as I have said, the conduct of the Government itself makes it impossible for us on the present occasion to avoid commenting on the existing financial situation. One of two conclusions must be arrived at : either the Government of Canada, and notably the Finance Minister, have been most gravely mistaken, or they have been most reckless in making provision against the present deficit. The hon. gentleman had warning after warning, time and again, not merely from myself, but even from members on his own side of the House ; and it was pointed out that the position last year in particular was one full of peril. Time and time again it was pointed out, and I see that some of the hon. gentleman's friends are using the argument as an excuse to-day, that there is an intimate connection between Canadian trade and the trade and business of the United States, that it is almost an axiom in our commercial economy that wherever there is serious financial distress in the United States, or a prolonged period of distress there, a similar distress, generally equally prolonged, is almost certain to follow in Canada. I shall not repeat the statement which my hon. friend read of the professions of the Minister of Finance. They are fresh in the memory of the House. I have no doubt the House recollects quite distinctly the excellent advice which the hon. gentleman gave to his colleagues and to the House. Sir, there is a frightful contrast, I am sorry to say, between the profession and practice of that hon. gentleman. Before the House rose last session, the hon. gentleman knew perfectly well, it was patent on the face of the returns laid on the Table, that a deficit of over one million dollars was a certain and fixed fact. What did the hon. gentleman do? What did this preacher of economy do? What did this hon. gentleman, who thought it was the first duty of a Government to curtail expenditure so as to meet the deficiency in the revenue, do in the way of making provision for an ascertained deficit of a million and a quarter? His first proceeding was to throw away half a million of dollars. One quarter of a million for the purpose of conciliating the liquor interests, and another quarter of a million for the purpose of conciliating, what I may call, without offence to the Minister of Justice, the Tupper interest, and a very unprofitable investment is appears to have been, according to the last electoral returns. Then after effecting needless loss of half a million dollars of revenue in the face of a deficit of a million and a quarter, the hon. gentleman proceeded by statute to add one million dollars a year in all to our fixed charges, in the shape of an Atlantic subsidy of $750,000, and of subsidies to railways involving a total expenditure of four or five millions more. Finally, and by way, I suppose, of an appropriate finish and wind up, the hon. gentleman, this advocate of economy, brought down further Supplementary Estimates to the tune of $1,300,000. These are the precautions taken to secure economy, this is the way the hon. gentleman carried out in practice the economy he professed. Let the House compare these facts with the statement which my hon. friend read. Now, the hon. gentleman is confronted, and he knows he is confronted with a huge deficit. Let us know the facts. I have observed with some amusement the desperate contortions and evasions made on the part of the hon. gentleman's organs to escape the pressure of this deficit. I have observed something more. Newspaper correspondents and newspaper editors are not supposed to be very well versed in the mysteries of the Finance Department, and, according to the Minister of Justice they could not always be relied upon, even if they were. But, Sir, what shall we say when we find in the last copy of the "Official Gazette" a statement like this: Revenue and expenditure on account of consolidated fund; expenditure to the end of 31st March, 1895, $24,553,000; revenue at the end of 31st March, 1895, $23,844,000; surplus, $708,107. I beg to state to the House that I believe this is the first time since confederation that the word "surplus" has ever been inserted, or this line ever appeared in the Public Gazette at this date. What does it mean? Why was it inserted? There were four bye-elections—of course that is a matter of detail—about to come off a few days after this first appeared. But what does the hon. gentleman mean by it? Here is the official statement of the department that on 31st March, 1895, there was a surplus of $708,107. If that means anything, if that has been inserted for a purpose, I am sorry to say I can conceive of no purpose except the purpose of confusing the minds of the people at large, and creating an absolutely false impression as to the real state of the case. It is true, no doubt, that the audited expenditure, certified by the Finance Department up to 31st March, 1895, may only show what is stated here, a total expenditure of $23,844,000 as against a total receipt of $24,553,000. But every man who knows anything at all of the Department of Finance or of the way in which our national book-keeping is managed, knows perfectly well that from the nature of the case a very large portion of the expenditure which has actually been incurred and which is payable at that moment is not included in these statements of expenditure and that in the later months of the year this is never entered in the public accounts until some few weeks after the termination of the financial year; and that therefore, although this may be a correct statement as regards the audited expenditure, yet this statement which I hold in my hand is most unquestionably a very false statement, as to impression which any ordinary reader will take from it on seeing for the first time in twenty-seven years a declaration that there was such and such a surplus in favour of the Government on the 31st of March. Now, Sir, I am going to show the House what the real state of the facts are, and I challenge the hon. Minister to contradict these facts. I desire the attention of the House because this is a grave matter. If I am wrong I desire to be corrected, and if I am right, I desire that every member of this House should bear in mind what it means, that to-day, after nine months receipts are in, after nine months audited expenditure, so-called is in, so far from having a surplus of $708,000, we have to-day, as I will presently show, an ascertained deficit of $5,016,000 on the transactions of these nine months. I do not think that the hon.

gentleman will have any ground to complain of want of plainness with respect to the statement that I have just made. It is well known to every member of this House that we unfortunately closed the last financial year with a deficit of $1,200,000 in round numbers. Now, on the 31st of March, the date on which a surplus of $708,000 is claimed by the "Official Gazette" and for which the Minister of Finance is entirely responsible; on that date the revenue received from all sources fell short of the revenue for the nine months of 1894, by the sum of $3,292,747. The expenditure for the same period exceeded the expenditure for the first nine months of 1894 by the sum of $513,236. We started therefore with a deficit of one and a quarter millions in round numbers. We have got in these nine months a revenue of three millions and a quarter less, and we have spent half a million dollars more, and if you add these three sums together you will find that if it is the desire of the Department of Finance to enlighten the public as to the real state of the case, instead of putting in a fictitious and imaginary surplus of $708,000, they would state that in those nine months there was an ascertained deficit of $5,016,000. What the remaining three months may have in store for us, I do not know, and the hon. gentleman does not know; but I am afraid that it is extremely improbable that any material portion of this $5,000,000 will, under the most favourable circumstances be reduced; and on the other hand, if the same expenditure continues in proportion, and the same falling off in the revenue continues, it is extremely probable that in the ensuing three months the figure which was named by my hon. friend, is likely to be attained. I make no prediction about it, I simply point out that it is extremely likely to occur. It is true, no doubt, that in the month of March last year, there was a small anticipation of revenue in the matter of excise, but it is very unlikely indeed that when the first of July comes—looking at the very large amount of the hon. gentleman's estimates and looking to the fact that these estimates do not include any supplementary estimates for the service of the current year, with which we will doubtless be presented in good time—it is very unlikely indeed that the additional expenditure which we will have to incur, will not fully equal any trifling gain which may be made in the Department of Excise. I have observed that a very disingenuous use has been made of these "Gazette" returns, whether by the connivance or under the instructions of the Minister of Finance, I do not say. I hope not, although I am bound to tell him, that the appearance of such a line as I have pointed out in the "Official Gazette,"—a paragraph which never appeared before, at any rate until after the close of the financial year, and until the Finance Department knew whether it had a surplus or a deficit—I say,

Sir, that the appearance of such a paragraph at such a time requires explanation at his hands unless he chooses to allow us to draw the inference that this paragraph was put in either under his orders or with his knowledge for the purpose of misleading the public as to the real state of the facts.

Mr. FOSTER. As my hon. friend puts it that way I will give him my answer now. There is not the least grain of reason for the suspicion which he has thrown out. These are returns which are simply made up by the Dominion book-keeper and initialed and signed by the Deputy. I see them when they are in the "Official Gazette" or just before they are put in sometimes, and oftener not. I have had nothing to do with it at all. If it is the word "surplus" that my hon. friend quarrels with he may have that quarrel. The statement is simply a monthly statement of the cash collected in that month, and of the cash paid out, and under it they appear to have drawn a line and stated as for that month, taking cash that is paid out and cash that comes in, there is surplus of so much, which is undeniably true.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No that is not the case. This is for the period of the nine months, and my hon. friend will see that if he looks.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend read, and I have the paper from which he read in which he referred to the month of March, 1894, and comparatively to the month of March, 1895, and in each of these cases it is a monthly statement.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. I did not refer to that. I referred to the nine months terminating on the 31st of March, and I expressly stated so.

Mr. FOSTER. At the first did you?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. At the first.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman referred to the nine months he has taken good care not to send me the paper in which the nine months comparison is. He has sent me simply the monthly comparison.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the hon. gentleman would have looked at the paper I have sent him, he would have seen it is no such thing. I will read from it: "Total to the 31st of March, 1895, revenue received, $24,533,009. Total expenditure to the 31st March, 1895, $23,844,991. Surplus, $708,107."

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, my hon. friend is right and so am I. The month of March, 1894, gives here the receipts and expenditures and the surplus for that month. The same is given for the nine months.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Exactly, and to which I referred.

Mr. FOSTER. The surplus is given there. In each case they are simply as they purport to be, the cash record of the month or the cash record, receipts and payments of the nine months. They correctly represent what they purport to represent. Whether you call it surplus or anything else, that is the actual statement of the case. In the nine months so much was received in cash, so much was checked out of cash, and so much remains over—a surplus undoubtedly.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not object to the fact of the hon. gentleman's department making a return of the audited expenditure. What I think is very objectionable is that the line "surplus" should be introduced now for the first time. We have had these returns published every month ever since confederation, a period of eight and twenty years, and I do not think that in all that time the hon. gentleman will find any such reference to a surplus until after the end of the financial year. The reason we do not find it is that the heads of the department were perfectly well aware that any statement of a surplus made at any other time would be misleading in the highest degree; and I object to its being put in the "Official Gazette," because any ordinary business man in Canada, looking at that, and knowing no better, would naturally say to himself, "Well, after all, things are not so very bad when there is a surplus for nine months of $708,000.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman will excuse me if I say a word or two further. My statement is true, and my hon. friend will take it as such; but I want to supplement that by stating that the only time I have interfered with the way in which these statements have been made was last year. Previous to that time, if I mistake not, at the end of the fiscal year, when all the accounts were not in, but when overdue claims and accounts that had to be adjusted, amounting to some millions of dollars, had yet to come in, I said to the book-keeper, "That will be a misleading statement if you send it out at the end of the fiscal year or in the July statement, because there are accounts yet to come in; after this, when you make up that statement to the end of the year, I want you to add a note stating that this does not include accounts overdue and accounts to be adjusted which are yet to come in, and which will make this statement very different."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I accept frankly the statement of the hon. gentleman, and I am glad to hear it. I am glad to hear that the hon. gentleman was not responsible for what looks on the face of it to be rather an unworthy artifice, and I recommend him to strike out that line for the future, or to add a note to the effect that this is merely audited expenditure and has nothing to do with any other expenditure.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly; any one would see that who looked into it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, anybody would not see that. On the contrary, all over the country, in all the organs of the hon. gentleman from the "Mail-Empire" downwards, these statements have been accepted as representing the true state of the case, and long articles have been indited holding me up as a slanderer of the credit of Canada, because I alleged that the real deficit for the nine months was over $5,000,000, when it was only $500,000. Now, Sir, I call the attention of the House to the extent to which this absurdity in the way of book-keeping may go. We all know that 1894 terminated with a deficit of one million and a quarter; as to that there is no dispute. For the nine months ending the 31st of March, 1894, the revenue was given as $27,845,000, and the expenditure as $23,331,000, showing a nominal surplus on the operations of the nine months of $4,514,000, with an actual resulting deficit of $1,210,000. On the 30th of April the revenue was given as $30,288,000 and the expenditure as $25,515,000, showing a nominal surplus of $4,773,000, with a resulting deficit, as before, of $1,210,000. On the 31st of May the revenue is given as $32,911,000, and the expenditure as $28,840,000, showing a nominal surplus of $4,071,000, with a resulting deficit of $1,210,000, as before. On the 30th of June, under the date of the 4th of July, the revenue is given as $35,382,000 and the expenditure as $30,755,000, showing a nominal surplus of $4,627,000, while the actual deficit was only $1,210,232. However, Sir, can the hon. gentleman gainsay the accuracy of any one of my statements? Can he gainsay the fact that we closed last year with a deficit of $1,210,000? Can he gainsay the fact that on the last day of this month our revenue had fallen to the extent of three and a quarter millions and our expenditure had increased to the extent of half a million? These statements are taken from his own official returns; they are the statements which he has himself submitted; they are the statements which, at any rate, have issued from his department, whether he saw them or not, and I suppose, according to the rule he laid down some time ago that the Minister is bound to accept the statements of his subordinates, these are statements which he must accept in full faith or get rid of the subordinate who made them. Now, as to whether we are likely to lose another million by extra expenditure or diminished revenues during the next three months, I do not desire to offer an opinion other than this, that if, on the 1st of April, 1895, you have an ascertained deficit of $5,016,000, it is not very likely that you are going to make much improvement in the remaining three months. However, that is a matter on which I shall probably have an opportunity of cross-questioning the hon. gentleman shortly, because I propose at the earliest moment to find out from him what the receipts and expenditures of the first half of the month of April may be. Perhaps he has them now.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not carry them in my pocket, but I can bring them over on Monday. I do not sleep with them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Nor carry them in your head, I presume; and I can understand why—because they might murder sleep under the present circumstances. Apart from that, here is a significant fact, which I also find in the statement of the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman, be it remembered, was very strong some time ago in telling us that he was going to put a stop to the increase of the net debt; yet the total net debt on the 31st March, 1894, amounted to $240,189,000, while on the 31st March, 1895, it amounted to $248,150,000, being as nearly as possible an increase of $8,000,000 in one year. The House will remember, Sir, as I said, that I am quite open to correction. If I have, in any shape or way overstated the facts, if I have in any shape or way misunderstood the hon. gentleman's statement, I will be ready at once to make amendment. The Speech informed us that His Excellency regrets that although the depression has not resulted in any considerable decrease in our foreign trade—yet owing to low prices and recent reductions in and removal of taxation, it has been followed by a serious decrease in revenue derived from Customs and Excise. In order to produce equilibrium between revenue and expenditure for the coming year, it will be necessary to observe the greatest possible economy in the appropriations for the various branches of the public service.

Well, Sir, I listened attentively to the Speech, I listened attentively to the speeches of the mover and seconder of this Address, and I listened attentively to the speech of the hon. Minister himself. Sir, the inference which I drew from these various speeches—and it is open to the Finance Minister to correct me if I am wrong—is this, that whether the deficit be five millions or whether the deficit be six millions, the hon. gentleman's recipe is to do nothing, the hon. gentleman proposes to fold his hands, the hon. gentleman hopes that by and by things will improve. The hon. gentleman reminds one of the peasant in Aesop's fable who sat down by the brink of a river waiting until all the water should flow away, when he expected to walk across. The hon. gentleman is without resource. All that the hon. gentleman can tell us is that he proposes to exercise economy. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman knows that it is one thing to propose economy and another thing to practice it. The hon. gentleman has colleagues, some very close to him who do not propose to practice economy; colleagues who, during the recent electioneering tour, stated to the public—and I think stated quite correctly—that the difference between them and those miserly Grits was that they were not afraid to spend the public money for the benefit of their friends. How does that comport with “the greatest possible economy in the appropriations for the various branches of the public service.” And I think the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) will have to be heard from. The hon. gentleman who, by the way, I am sorry to say I do not see in his place at the moment, has generally a tolerably extensive budget, and he has also various expensive relations who contribute to swell the expenditure from time to time. Now, Sir, I do not ask much from the hon. gentleman; but I think, under the circumstances, I have the right to ask for some information. If the statements that I have made be true, if it be the fact that there is to-day at the close of nine months an ascertained deficit of over five million dollars, I think, Sir, that although we are not entitled to ask the hon. gentleman for details, we are entitled to ask him whether he seriously proposes to allow this monstrous deficit to exist without taking any steps to reduce it or to equalize expenditure and revenue by imposing additional taxation. Judging from what he stated, I should imagine the hon. gentleman intends to do nothing. Judging from the tone of his speech, the hon. gentleman lives in hope and desires us to live also. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman can surely tell us—his policy must have been settled on this head long ago—whether it is part of his intention to meet that deficit by the imposition of an additional amount of taxation or not. He can likewise tell us whether he intends to add to the burden of the people by making any new and additional grants; and that is a thing that the House ought to be seized of at the earliest possible moment, under existing circumstances. The hon. gentleman might likewise tell us, does he propose to effect any new loans? Sir, I have taken the opportunity of analysing the statements of the amounts at the hon. gentleman's disposal; and, so far as I can see—and again I am open to correction—the hon. gentleman's recent loan, amounting to about $10,700,000—I think that is about the amount it realized—appears to have entirely disappeared. Sir, I find that up to the 1st of April, 1895, we had incurred a capital expenditure of $3,273,000; we had temporarily borrowed £500,000 sterling in England, which we have repaid; we had the deficit of 1894 to provide for, $1,210,000; we have a deficit for the current year to date of $5,016,000. So that against $10,700,000, the hon. gentleman either has spent or will be called upon to provide for sums amounting to $11,932,000, without counting any additional expenditure which may be incurred upon capital account within the next three months. Now, Sir, as to the amount of cash in hand—and here again the hon. gentleman can correct me if I am wrong—I find that in the various Canadian banks the hon. gentleman is credited with $5,300,000. I want to ask the hon. gentleman, has he any considerable amount to his credit in London, or does that $5,300,000 represent his total available cash assets?

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. gentleman propose to enter into a discussion of finances in the debate on the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne? If the hon. gentleman proposes to do that he goes against what he said five minutes ago.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I said I did not propose to discuss the trade question.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman does propose to discuss finances, I do not.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then the hon. gentleman, I may assume, has no money in London?

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman will keep his patience until about the middle of next week—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will keep it until I have time to put two questions on the paper, when he will have the opportunity of giving me the information. I will assume that this sum of $5,300,000 represents the hon. gentleman's total cash assets. That sum of $5,300,000 is all anticipated already. If the sums due to date were paid, the whole amount would disappear. That is the position in which we stand to-day. We have very considerable commitments as the hon. gentleman knows. We are bound to provide several millions of dollars to be paid to the various railway companies we have subsidized, nor are these all the capital commitments. And, moreover, Sir, as everybody knows, we borrow at call from the people of Canada about $40,000,000, so that we ought, in all conscience, and reason to keep a considerable sum in ready cash at our bankers so as to be ready for all emergencies. Sir, I will not now discuss a matter which may require a little attention, with reference to the relations of the Bank of Montreal with the Government. I told the hon. gentleman at the time he made the present arrangement that I thought he was making a mistake, and for this reason, which he has found or will find, I suspect—when he confided all our financial affairs to the Bank of Montreal, a bank doing a large business in Canada, he exposed himself to the danger that if he requires money from that source it will have to be drawn from the current accommodation granted to the business of the country, and may prove a serious inconvenience to the people. However, I will leave the discussion of that subject for a further opportunity. As I have said, I purposely forbore discussing the trade question, but before I leave the question of these ugly and ill-visaged deficits, I will take the opportunity of saying a word or two on the deficits of 1876-77-78. The hon. gentleman was good enough to say that there was one difference between that of to-day and those of 1876-77-78. Sir, the hon. gentleman is mistaken; there is more than one difference between the deficits of 1876-77-78 and the deficit, as at present ascertained, of 1895. I will point out one difference—the deficit of 1895 is like Aaron's rod, it is big enough to swallow the other three deficits put together. The hon. gentleman may say with truth that he has "seen" us and gone several "better."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. FOSTER. We always do.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, it is a twenty-knot government in the way of going to leeward, and particularly in the way of deficits. My hon. friend who spoke first was mistaken in one thing. He was mistaken in saying that this was the largest deficit known in Canadian history. That is true literally, yet it is not quite true comparatively, because under the late Sir John A. Macdonald, whom the hon. gentlemen revere so much, deficits were of everlasting occurrence until confederation; and those deficits—I will give the hon. gentleman that crumb of comfort—were much greater in proportion to the revenue than his, although he is in a fair way to overtake his master and teacher if he goes on much longer.

Mr. FOSTER. Give me time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I intend, if I can help it, that you shall not have time to scuttle the ship before you leave it, though I have no doubt you will try. The hon. gentleman says there is another difference in that we put on taxes, a very grievous crime to commit in face of a deficit. The inference is that he proposes to meet his deficit by putting none. That is the inference, if he disputes it, let him deny it. The hon. gentleman goes on to tell us that the revenue has fallen off because last year he took off such a lot of taxes. Well, Sir, with my customary generosity, I made an estimate of what he had taken off, and I gave him credit for 200 per cent more than he deserved; I credited him, after carefully examining the result of his tariff for two months, with a reduction of 3-10ths of one per cent. I observe now that the six months have been added together, that I committed the grievous error—for which I apologise—of crediting him with 200 per cent too much, the actual reduction being 1-10th of one per cent. Sir, the French treaty and Newfoundland must stand over; and I think I will do the same with the Manitoba question. But I want to ask the hon. gentleman seriously, does he pretend to deny the computation I have made as to the amount of the deficit? Does he, in cold blood, pretend to tell this House that there is any reasonable prospect that within the next ten weeks he will have any chance of materially reducing that deficit? Does he not know on the other hand, that there is only too great a probability that it will be considerably augmented, largely by reason of the expenditures he has already asked for? Now the hon. gentleman has brought us to the very verge of the financial year. Neither last year did he make any provision for the deficit now existing. Apparently the hon. gentleman is all at sea as to what is to be done with this deficit. Now, I really think that paragraph of the speech which I have quoted in plain English, ought to read thus: "Gentlemen of the legislature, there is a huge deficit, I do not know what to do with it. Perhaps if we wait long enough, things will right themselves; anyway I can't." As I have said, the hon. gentleman's mode of delivering us from a deficit was to agree to give up $200,000 of revenue to the brewers, $200,000 and more for the French Treaty, $750,000 a year for the Atlantic subsidy, $4,000,000 to be granted to railway subsidies. But how much more to the Trent Valley Canal? How much more to the Hudson Bay Railway? How much more to other railways gently hinted at, but not quite clearly indicated by the hon. gentleman? The hon. gentleman talks of his economy. He is prepared to cut down the services to starvation point if his colleagues will let him; but at the same time he is prepared without shrinking to add tens and tens of millions to the general expenditure. Now, Sir, I will give the hon. gentleman one bit of advice. I know the difficulties that beset a Minister of Finance who tries to keep his colleagues within bounds. I have had to do it myself, and a very difficult job I have found it, I admit. I know perfectly well that however much the Minister of Finance may desire to keep down expenditure, he is but one among 13 or 12 or 17—what is it? What is the number of those who have no portfolios? I have really forgotten. However, he is only one among a number, and they have all expenditures to be provided for. Let the hon. gentleman make a clean breast of it, let him throw himself on the House, and let him throw himself on the country. I dare say his intentions are good, although his power of giving effect to them seems to be almost nil. Sir, he has been frightfully overborne in the past; and I now solemnly promise him publicly—and I think my friends will help me to implement the promise—I promise him my best assistance in struggling against the efforts which will be made by his colleagues to overcome his good intentions and prevent him from carrying out his scheme of economy. I am abundantly willing to forward his alleged desires, but it is on one condition. I want there should be no misunderstanding. I desire to say, before the hon. gentleman makes his budget statement, that when he does make the statement, I think he should give us fairly and honestly to understand all the expenditures that he proposes to bring down to the House. Sir, for years back the Government and the Parliament of Canada have been, in my judgment, very derelict in their duty, in that they have allowed the Government, owing no doubt to the enormous majority at their back, to make their financial statement only in part and to conceal from the House and the country at the time an enormous number of grants which they have made up their minds to give, making large additional charges on the public chests. Sir, that is all wrong, that should never have been permitted. The House, had they made the Government do their duty, would have insisted on all occasions that when the Government made their annual financial statement they should make a full and complete statement of all proposals they were about to make entailing any additional charges on the public treasury. I call on the hon. gentleman on this occasion more than on any other, in view of the enormous admitted deficit between our revenue and expenditure, in view of the situation of the country, in view of the fact that, as the mover said, this is the last session of this Parliament. I call upon him to turn over a new leaf in that respect, and if he will do that, and make a clean, candid, honest statement, I repeat my pledge on my own behalf, and on behalf of my friends, that we will do our best to protect him against his colleagues, and to enable him at long last to give effect to the pledges of economy and retention to which we have listened so often and by which so far we have profited so very little.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Several playful allusions have been made to my name in this debate, Mr. Speaker, and I shall therefore claim the attention of the House for a few moments while I contribute, to some extent, to the discussion. I have been puzzled for some time to find the reason for what seems to be the most extraordinary debate on the Address that has taken place—certainly since 1883, the beginning of my parliamentary experience. The leader of the Opposition, of course, was very happy, and used his eloquence with great effect; but it seemed to me that he was struggling to-day to avoid discussing or referring to those subjects which are uppermost in the minds of the people at the present moment, and forcing, if possible, the debate upon subjects which have been discussed 'ad nauseum' for many years past. We had the old arguments brought out one by one, the old references to trade, and the arguments which may be used with some effect in a discussion upon the Budget or a debate on Ways and Means, but certainly an undue importance has been given to them on an occasion of this kind. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to my surprise, in what I may term, not offensively, I hope, a most peculiar speech, has not only run over these subjects, but openly given to my colleague, the Minister of Finance, the points for his Budget speech, and pressed upon him most earnestly the necessity of referring to them. I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that the solution of this extraordinary tactical movement on the part of the Opposition, is they are not in a position to speak as a party to-day any more than they have been for the past month on very important and very burning questions; and that, therefore, if they can carry the minds of this House, and the minds of the people of this country, away from these subjects for some time, it will be better for them. The leader of the Opposition was good enough, and he did it in a very happy manner, to refer to some liberties that have been taken with my name, and he stated that I had observed that no dependence could be placed on the ministerial press. I think it unusual for the leader of the Opposition and for a prominent member of the Opposition at the opening of Parliament to give this extraordinary importance to press rumors or to invite a debate as to the accuracy of references of a personal nature. I can say this, however, that I have never charged the ministerial press with being inaccurate; but I do not hesitate to say that I have seen many inaccurate statements both in the ministerial press, so called, and in the Opposition press, and I think the experience of the leader of the Opposition is similar to mine. But I deny there was authority to make many of the statements respecting my action that have been made during the last two weeks. I, perhaps, can illustrate that by referring to a story told by a traveller of an extraordinary monkey he had seen. Sitting at his dinner with his fellow voyager and servant standing behind him, he began to relate that he had seen a monkey with a tail 50 yards long. The waiter whispered that the tail was entirely too long. Correcting himself he said that the tail was certainly forty yards. "Still too long," came a whisper. Then the traveller said, I certainly shall not be wrong if I say the monkey's tail was thirty yards. The waiter said the tail was still too long. The traveller then turned round and said, "confound this man, we must allow the monkey to have a tail of some length." Of course we must allow gentlemen Opposite to amuse themselves with the extraordinary stories regarding their opponents. But I can say this, that whatever truth there may be in those rumours, I have not been obliged to go to my constituents or appear before the people in any part of the country with a certificate of character from my leader, as the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was obliged to do. The hon. member for South Oxford, for instance, said—and I am certain he spoke from his heart—that he had no objection to a session "per se." Now, we know that that hon. gentleman has no objection to a session "per se." But the hon. gentleman has had a very hard struggle. I was with him in heart in the struggle because I wished to see him survive the effort to retain his hold upon the constituency of South Oxford, and the hon. gentleman was obliged, and it must have been a very hard task for him to perform, to read to his own constituents on an important occasion when they were discussing the nomination for the next candidate a certificate of character and the endorsement of his leader, the leader of the Opposition. I think that report in the Opposition and ministerial press was accurate. The hon. gentleman also referred to the subject of the session in another respect, namely, as to whether it was called too late; and with considerable delight he referred to the fact that in his time, when the Reformers were in office, they had four early sessions, 1875, 1876, 1877 and 1878. I think I can meet that argument, if there be any force in it, by saying that since 1878 the proportion of early sessions will compare very favourably with the proportion of early sessions held during Mr. Mackenzie's regime, because the hon. gentleman carefully avoided any reference to 1874, and the date of the session that year.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There was an election.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Exactly; and reforming and reorganization of the Government occurred in 1895. There had been an election previous to the session of 1874, and for that reason, and it was a valid one, the session was not held until pretty late in March. If hon. gentlemen opposite had been sufficiently long in power they would have found other reasons no better than our own, for not assembling Parliament this year at an earlier date. I have referred to the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and it was an extraordinary one in a debate of this kind. It was evident to the House that the hon. gentleman felt as if he were in office as Finance Minister; he revelled and made fun and apparently enjoyed himself to his heart's content in a discussion of the deficit, and with that word and topic his name will be for ever connected and remembered in this country. But I think the hon. gentleman was particularly happy to-night—he broke out, so-to-speak, in a new part. He as a rule uses pretty hard language, he strikes very severe blows, and on no occasion has been guilty of such an amount of good humour and jollity as on this occasion. If the newspaper reports can be relied upon, he has had an experience that has been for his good. The last occasion on which I read his utterances was at his appearance in a theatre at Brantford, perhaps a comic opera, and it was said he contributed to the amusement of the evening. Certainly the hon. gentleman has gained much by that experience, and I congratulate him on his new role. But the hon. gentleman made some serious statements in that extraordinary speech, and from one of them it appeared to me that we have called this House together too soon. This day is the 19th of April. The hon. member for South Oxford said the Government would not get a vote until the 1st of July. If he had kindly intimated that fact to us, we would have taken the responsibility of delaying the summoning of Parliament at as early a date as 19th April. I believe, however, the hon. gentleman was no more serious when he made that assertion than he was in regard to many other statements he made. I feel sure he cannot be serious in constantly sneering at the French Treaty; I feel sure the hon. gentleman does not wish to make it uncomfortable for his leader; I fain would believe that he did not inspire the article in the Toronto "Globe," published in last July, where not only the leader of the Opposition but the whole of the French Liberals were hauled over the coals for lending their support to a treaty which involves chiefly, as the hon. member for South Oxford says, the Tupper interest. If it does involve their interest I am glad to welcome as allies all the hon. gentleman's friends and coadjutors from the province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman spoke for a long time on the subject of deficits, and I fear that he has forgotten some of the advice which he and his old leader used to give the country when dealing with the subject of that kind. I have before me the opinion of the Hon. Alex. Mackenzie, given in the year 1880, and I think it will meet most of the points the hon. member endeavoured to make with the object, perhaps, of inspiring a certain fear or dread among the business people of this country. Speaking in this House in 1880, Mr. Mackenzie said:

Under these circumstances it was but right that we should not look upon a deficit as an insurmountable evil, or its existence, or in all cases a political mistake, because money has to be provided in some way at any rate, and the only question that can possibly arise under these circumstances, is this. It is better for the Government to impose additional taxation where it can possibly be able to do so, or to leave the amount of the deficit as an additional charge against the country in another shape? The country has to pay in either case; by imposing additional taxation, it pays at once; by avoiding it, payment is postponed. * * *

I refer to the opinion of Mr. Mackenzie because it will, no doubt, form a subject for contemplation to members on both sides of the House, when considering how best to deal with our financial standing. At any rate, it gives some support to the view I ventured to express, that the mere existence of a deficit is not in itself an evil which should instil fear or alarm. It is a peculiarly happy thing that Canada alone of all the important countries of the world, has not felt the great commercial crisis through which the world is now passing. There have come from responsible mouths in the various legislatures of Canada, words of good cheer and words of thankfulness for our condition, whether the governments of the provinces happened to be in the hands of Liberals or Conservatives. I am not without authority for saying that the responsible business men of Canada, regardless of politics, are expressing words of congratulation that our country is in such a good position as it is to-day, considering the unfortunate condition of other countries. What do you see, for instance, in Great Britain? You have there in evidence leading men of both parties, Lord Salisbury, the Duke of Devonshire, Mr. Balfour, all speaking with dread of the present condition of affairs. You have Lord Salisbury saying that the great industry of agriculture is actually ruined in England, and the Duke of Devonshire goes further, and says that not only was Lord Salisbury right in that particular, but that the condition of business generally in England, the manufacturing industries, was deplorable. You have the representatives of the great manufacturing county of Lancashire stating that thousands are walking the streets in the manufacturing towns without work and without money. You have the representative of labour in England, Mr. Keir Hardie testifying before a committee of the House of Commons that one million skilled workmen are out of employment, without any means of subsistence, and that they represent five millions of people who are in actual distress, outside of those entitled to parochial relief. You see a committee of the British House of Commons appointed to inquire into this terrible distress. We know of the crisis through which they are passing in the United States, and it is comforting that even though the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has evidently watched affairs most carefully, and is as thoroughly posted upon the fact as any one, that on this occasion he dealt purely with the condition of our finances which could not be controlled, and, as he said, intentionally avoided any reference to trade. Is it possible that if the condition of Canada were as bad as the condition of England has been pictured in the British House of Commons, and as the condition of the United States has been pictured in Congress, that he would have neglected his duty in not calling the immediate attention of this Chamber to such a state of affairs if they existed in Canada. It may, therefore, be said that the condition of Canada is, comparatively, not bad, but that it is comparatively good. Now, Mr. Speaker, I cannot sit down without saying a word or two on a question which the leader of the Opposition avoided saying much about. The present is an occasion when he, perhaps, is exercising a wise discretion, but if he will allow me to say so, I do not think that his discretion to which he referred was anything to his credit with reference to the four elections which have just taken place. I believe there was never an occasion in any of the old provinces of Canada, I am sure there never was an occasion in the mother country, when a great constitutional question, on a question that had any analogy to the Manitoba School question, the leaders of both parties were not heard from, or that the leader of a constitutional Opposition remained dumb and kept silence. I have no knowledge of any similar case, although some may be mentioned, but certainly in Canada it has not been the custom for leaders of the Opposition to take that course. The leader of the Opposition cannot avoid the responsibility which the people will insist in fastening upon him, by lightly talking of an invitation to advise His Excellency's advisers. We cannot forget that he branded the members of this Government as cowards because they did not declare their policy on this subject, before the courts had dealt with the question of the powers of this Government. We cannot forget his pledge on more than one occasion, notably at the convention of his own friends in June, 1893, and subsequently, this very year in Toronto, that so soon as the courts had spoken he would speak. It is quite clear that when the leader of the Opposition made these observations, he did not think that discretion should command silence on his part, but he believed then that when the time for action had come, and this Government was bound to take a step in one direction or the other, that it would be his duty to speak out his mind upon this question, though, perhaps, not to advise His Excellency's advisers; they sought on no occasion his advice, neither did they seek his assistance. They neither sought it nor spurned it, but, steadily pursuing their course, committed themselves, and assumed the responsibility which up to that time it had been expressly stated they were afraid to assume. These elections took place. I took part in one county, and as for the statement which was made on the floor of the House to-day, that in Haldimand my colleague, who won the magnificent victory upon which his friends are congratulating him, was speaking in one sense, while I was speaking in another constituency in an entirely different sense. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to know that in the campaign in Antigonish the sentiment of the speech of the hon. Secretary of State was quoted in my presence by my opponents, and I subscribed before the electors to every word of it; and I myself sent a message to him as to what I had been saying, and correcting erroneous reports as to my utterances early in the fight in Antigonish, and the Secretary of State took the earliest opportunity to read that message to the electors of Haldimand. But I do not think the hon. leader of the Opposition can claim much consolation from those fights. He purposely abstained to-day from committing himself on this question or dealing with it, and those men who defeated the candidates supporting the Government, won their victories by expressing opinions which their leader dare not express at this juncture, but purposely abstained from expressing. They practically won their victories chiefly because, among other reasons, they were fighting the first fights in Canada in which the Liberal candidates were allowed to fight without being trammelled by the utterances of their leaders—the first fights which those leaders took care to keep out of, and which were won by their supporters alone.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And they threshed you.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, in the county of Antigonish the opponent of the Government threshed the Government, as the hon. member says, by pledging himself to support the Government on this policy, and because he was entirely out of harmony with the views of the leader of the Opposition, who sneered at the remedial order to-day, and found fault with the language in which it was couched. The hon. gentleman's candidate there subscribed to every line of the remedial order and promised to support the Government in carrying it to its logical conclusion. The hon. leader of the Opposition to-day that the remedial order was couched in unfortunate language—that it was dictatorial. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if other language had been used, or if it had proceeded in what the hon. gentleman conceives to be more polite form, the danger of a fatal defect would have existed. Not only was every effort made to prevent the Manitoba Legislature thinking for a moment that we desired to dictate to them or to insult them in the slightest respect, but every pains was taken in the drafting of the order that no flaw should be found to give rise to further litigation and further embarrassment. Following strictly the lines of the statute, the order had to be in a sense dictatorial, but in no offensive sense. It had to make a direction. It had to state clearly and precisely what was required to be done, in the opinion of His Excellency the Governor General in Council; and any one having experience with the orders of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England will find that, so far as that dictatorial spirit is concerned, all of those orders possess it. It is the language of judgment; it is the technical spirit and nothing more. I have, therefore, referred to the subject particularly, and I trust that no member of the Manitoba Legislature will be for a moment misled by the views thrown out to-day by the leader of the Opposition, that there was on the part of the Government any desire to assume the role of dictators, or to use language that could be considered in the slightest degree disrespectful. Now, Mr. Speaker, we stand in this position, that the Government have before the country, and in those very constituencies, taken a clear and well-defined position on this question. We do not shrink in the slightest degree from any responsibility which that position involves; but notwithstanding that, I subscribe to what has been said by hon. gentlemen to-day, that, considering that the Manitoba Legislature has yet to deal finally with the remedial order, it would be certainly unwise, if not irregular, for this Parliament to thresh out the subject formally on the floor of this House until we know the mind of the legislature which we had approached.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says "Hear, hear," perhaps not seriously. Surely, if he sympathizes with his leader's resentment of that spirit of dictation, he will subscribe to the opinion which I have now expressed, that we should take the greatest care on all sides of this House that nothing should be said that could in any way give affront to the Legislature of Manitoba. Now, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) made a reference to public works which have been promised, and, looking across the House, connected me, I think, with a statement as to the difference between the policies of the two parties in reference thereto. I remember the day when a colleague of that hon. gentleman used to come to the province of Nova Scotia and present what seemed to him his best argument in counting how much he had been able to obtain from the economical Finance Minister of the Reform Administration for wharfs, breakwaters and other public works, in comparison with the expenditure of the former government. At Moncton I made a statement as to the difference between the policies of the two parties with regard to the construction of public works. I said that no person in Canada could expect that federal money would be taken for local improvements or useful public works if the Reformers kept their promises and made a bona fide effort to carry out their policy of free trade, because that policy was wholly dissociated from affording assistance for works of the character under consideration. Their policy, if there was anything in it, meant to leave individual localities to their own resources, to drive them away from the Federal treasury, and I pointed out that our policy was the direct opposite—that we did make the acknowledgment that out of the revenues we could obtain we would promote useful public works both for the advantage of localities and for the general advantage. But curiously enough, Mr. Speaker, that meeting had no sooner taken place than the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) hurried to Moncton, and in the self-same hall went one better than myself, according to the common expression, taking complete issue with my statement that the policy of the Liberal party was not to make these expenditures; and I think the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) would do well to take his colleague immediately in hand if he has the slightest idea, as he hinted to-night, that he expected in a short time to be called upon to deal with his old friend the deficit.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to; and debate adjourned.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 10.35 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 22nd April, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. FOSTER moved:

That Notices of Motion be postponed until after the consideration of the Order of the Day for resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in answer to his Speech at the opening of the session.

He said: I do this because I suppose we all agree that it is better that the debate should go on until it is finished.

Mr. CHARLTON. I would suggest to the hon. leader of the House that in case the House complies with his proposal, any notices of motion called in the absence of the mover be allowed the courtesy of standing over for one occasion. The debate may close at a time when some members may not be here to attend to their motions.

Mr. FOSTER. That may be a long way ahead.

Mr. CASEY. Perhaps it would answer the hon. gentleman's purpose to go on with all notices of motion on which there is to be no discussion.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 2) to secure the better observance of the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday.—(Mr. Charlton.)

Bill (No. 3) to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, for the purpose of making more effectual provision for the punishment of seduction and abduction.—(Mr. Charlton.)

Bill (No. 6) to amend the Superannuation Act.—(Mr. McMullen.)

SALARY OF THE GOVERNOR GENERAL.

Mr. MULOCK moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 4) to reduce the salary of the Governor General.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. MULOCK. The title of the Bill is sufficiently explanatory.

Some hon. MEMBERS. How much reduction?

Mr. MULOCK. That is a matter of detail.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. MULOCK moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 5) to amend the Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. MULOCK. This is an Act to facilitate hon. gentleman attending to their duties free from other than public considerations. It is to provide that members shall not draw mileage which they do not pay.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SEDITIONOUS AND UNLAWFUL ASSOCIATIONS AND OATHS.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 7) further to amend the tenth chapter of the Consolidated Statutes for Lower Canada, respecting seditious and unlawful associations and oaths.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What seditious association is this expected to deal with? Does it include, for example, seditious associations for the purpose of promoting rebellion in Ulster?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The Bill is identical with that introduced last session and the previous session. It has for its object the extension to the Masonic Lodges in the province of Quebec, acting under the jurisdiction of the Grand Lodge of the province, the same rights and privileges enjoyed by

Mr. CASEY.

Masonic Lodges under the jurisdiction of the Grand Lodge of Canada.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Mr. WILSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 8) to amend the Act respecting weights and measures. He said: This is the same Bill as was before the House last session. The weights are not at all accurate in the case of certain articles, and it is desirable either that the actual weights be put down or that the system be abolished.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

LETTING OF CONTRACTS TO ALIENS.

Mr. McLENNAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 9) to prevent the letting of contracts to aliens. He said: Contracts are let to aliens in this country while we are deprived of the same privilege on the other side of the line. There are contractors in this country who have taken their men, machinery and plant from the other side, and any money saved by them or by the men in their employ is taken out of the country. We think that we should protect our own labour. They are men who subscribe to our revenues, and it is but right that we should protect them in the letting of contracts when they are ostracised on the other side. There is nothing in this Bill to prevent aliens or emigrants coming into Canada. Its sole object is to protect our contractors against people who refuse us employment on the other side.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

RAILWAY RETURN-FARE TICKETS.

Mr. McLENNAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 10) respecting the sale of railway return-fare tickets. He said: The object of this Bill is to prevent discrimination against men who wish to take advantage of second-class fares. A man who asks for a return second-class ticket is refused at many stations, and we wish to give him the right to get a second-class return ticket at a proportionate reduction to that allowed on first-class return tickets, on trains carrying first and second-class passengers.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PAYMENT OF LABOUR ON PUBLIC WORKS.

Mr. McLENNAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 11) respecting the liability of the Government and public companies for labour used in the construction of public works. He said: This Bill is intended to protect men working on Government works and on works constructed by companies. Contracts are let by the Government and by companies to contractors, who sub-let them to other contractors, who again sub-let, and perhaps the one contract will be re-let three or four times. Then it falls into the hands of men who are not competent to carry on the work, whose price is not sufficient to enable them to carry it through. They find out, after they have worked a month or two, that they have not enough money to complete their work, and they put what money they have drawn into their pockets and clear out, leaving the labourers unpaid. This Bill will provide that the men employed on public works shall be paid and that somebody must pay them. The failure to pay men on public works has happened. I may say, in almost every county in Canada, and I think it is time that this should be put a stop to. There is no reason why the Government should not protect itself. In the first place they call upon the contractor to put up a 5 per cent deposit, and they only pay 90 per cent, on the estimates as the work progresses, retaining 10 per cent. Then under the specifications they have a lien and claim on all plant, machinery and horses, and everything that is put upon the works; and there is no reason why they cannot protect the labouring man who is doing the work.

Mr. LANGELIER. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman what method it is proposed under the Bill to adopt to protect the labourers as suggested?

Mr. McLENNAN. The Bill to a large extent will explain itself, and it will not be necessary to go into details until it is printed. I shall then hope to be in a position to explain fully my views in regard to the Bill in all its details. I think it can be easily worked out. Practically, the Government have now full power to protect the working-man.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DETECTIVE CORPORATIONS AND MERCANTILE AGENCIES.

Mr. SPROULE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 12) respecting Detective Corporations and Mercantile Agencies. He said: The object of this Bill is to bring the parties referred to under the surveillance of the law and to have them act as corporations; first, by compelling them to deposit with the Secretary of State a bond for a certain amount as surety in the event of their doing injustice to individuals or committing any illegal acts, and, second, by providing that none shall carry on the work of a detective agency or mercantile agency without being incorporated.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

COPYRIGHT.

Mr. EDGAR asked, Has Her Majesty's Government yet denounced the Berne Copyright Convention on behalf of Canada, as requested? 2. Has Her Majesty's Government yet given its assent to the issuing of the proclamation by the Canadian Government to bring into force the Canadian Copyright Act of 1889? 3. Does the Government propose to withhold the proclaiming of the Act of 1889 indefinitely, to await the assent of the Colonial Office?

Mr. FOSTER. In reply I beg to say: 1. Her Majesty's Government has not yet denounced the Berne Copyright Convention on behalf of Canada, as requested. 2. Her Majesty's Government has not yet given its assent to the issuing of the proclamation by the Canadian Government to bring into force the Canadian Copyright Act of 1889. 3. I desire to say that after personal communications had with the late lamented Sir John Thompson and the Colonial Office, a request has been received within the last few days to the Canadian Government from the British Government to send some person to talk the matter over, so that instead of correspondence with long intervals between, the matter may be discussed by personal interview with the Government for the purpose of arriving at an understanding. The Government proposes to act upon this request, and the proclaiming of the Act will be delayed, not indefinitely perhaps, but certainly until after that conference shall have been had. And it is the purpose of the Government to have that conference take place as soon as it can possibly be done.

QUEBEC CITADEL GROCERIES CONTRACT.

Mr. EDGAR asked, In whose name has the contract for the supply of groceries to the Citadel at Quebec been standing in each of the months of the year 1894? To whom have cheques been issued in payment for such supplies delivered during the year 1894: giving dates and amounts and name or names of endorsers in each case? In whose name has the contract for the supply of groceries for the Citadel at Quebec been standing for the expired portion of the year 1895? To whom have cheques been issued in payment for such supplies; the dates and amounts and name or names of endorsers in each case?

Mr. FOSTER. With reference to that question, I may say that some of the information has not yet been received at the office. It has been sent for, and if my hon. friend will allow the question to stand until to-morrow it will probably be ready.

PROHIBITION COMMISSION—EXPENSES.

Mr. EDGAR asked, What is the amount of the whole expenses in connection with the Royal Commission on the Liquor Traffic?

Mr. FOSTER. I am not able to give the information at present. The accounts are being made up, but some details are still incomplete. The statement will probably be ready in a few days.

Mr. EDGAR. Let the question stand, then.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; or, if he prefers, the hon. gentleman might renew notice of the question.

Mr. EDGAR. Let it stand.

VOTERS' LISTS—COST.

Mr. EDGAR asked, What is the entire cost of the recent revision of the Dominion Voters' Lists? If the cost is not yet fully ascertained, how much of it is ascertained, and what is the estimate of the Government of the amount of the unascertained expenses?

Mr. FOSTER. I will ask my hon. friend to allow that question to stand. I will make the same request of my hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey), who has given notice of the next question, which relates to the same subject. The Secretary of State is not here at present, and I have not the information at hand. I will look after the matter personally, however.

SEAL FISHERIES—COMPENSATION.

Mr. PRIOR asked, 1. Whether the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries has seen a statement in the press to the effect that Sir Edward Grey had stated in the English House of Commons that no request had been received from the Government of the Dominion of Canada by the Imperial Government asking them to advance the sum of $425,000 to the sealers of British Columbia, that being the amount agreed upon as proper compensation under the Behring Sea award; and which amount the United States Government declines to hand over at once, thereby causing great inconvenience and loss to the Canadian sealers? 2. If the statement credited to Sir Edward Grey is true, what reason has the Government for refusing to make the request in accordance with the expressed wishes of those interested in the sealing industry?

Mr. COSTIGAN. With regard to the first question I would answer in the affirmative—the Minister has seen such a statement as that referred to. But I would like to go a little further and state that the Government of Canada did not understand the "lump sum" of $425,000 as "the amount agreed upon as proper compensation under the Behring Sea award," but as an amount conditionally offered and accepted by Her Majesty's Government, with the concurrence of the claimants, to satisfy their claims, if paid immediately. With regard to the second question, I may say that the Government had no reason for refusing to make the request, and did not refuse, inasmuch as the desire of the sealers was duly forwarded through the proper channel, 6th March, and commended to favourable consideration.

WORLD'S FAIR—MEDALS AND DIPLOMAS.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Whether the Government have any definite information when the medals and diplomas of honour awarded to Canadian exhibitors at the Chicago World's Fair of 1892, will be distributed? What has been the cause of the delay in distribution?

Mr. FOSTER. The obtaining of medals and diplomas awarded to Canadian exhibitors at the Columbian Exposition, Chicago, has been a subject of correspondence. The latest information received from the World's Columbian Commission at Washington, dated January 8th last, is to the effect that the Act of Congress of August, 1892, made the appropriation for the preparation of medals and diplomas to the hon. Secretary of the Treasury direct, and, therefore, the Committee on Awards is without responsibility until they are delivered to it for distribution. The diplomas are being prepared by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and the medals are being struck off under the supervision of the Director of the Mint. The Director of the Mint has unofficially advised the Committee on Awards that the medals will be completed about May or June next.

EXPORTS TO AUSTRALIA.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, What were the kinds and values of the articles embraced under the classification "Other articles," on page of Trade and Navigation Returns 418, for fiscal year ending 30th June, 1894; exported to Australia, amounting to $646, and constituting the total of the exports of animals and their produce from Canada to Australia for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1894.

Mr. WALLACE. The kinds and values of articles embraced under this classification of "Other articles" on page 448 of the Trade and Navigation Returns for 1894, cannot be separately given without getting the information direct from the point of export, as these values are returned to this department under the item "Other articles." Vancouver exported $506, and Victoria $140 of the value mentioned. I have written to these ports for the detailed information.

PROHIBITION COMMISSION—REPORT.

Mr. CASEY asked, Whether the final report of the Royal Commission on Prohibition has been presented to the Governor in Council? Has it been printed? When will it be laid before the House? Has the evidence taken by the commission been printed? If so, when will it be laid before the House?

Mr. FOSTER. In reply to the hon. member, I beg to say that the final report of the Royal Commission on Prohibition has been presented to the Governor in Council. It has not been printed. It will be laid before the House as soon as the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne is passed. I am not quite sure whether the whole of the evidence has been printed, but I think it is nearly all printed; and that also will be laid before the House in due time.

BIRTH OF AN HEIR APPARENT.

Mr. FOSTER presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

ABERDEEN.

Government House,
Ottawa, 22nd April, 1895.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S WARRANTS.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to lay on the Table of the House, in accordance with the Act, a statement of the Governor General's Warrants on account of the fiscal year 1894-95, made as directed by the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act; also, a return of the Treasury Board's over-rulings on appeals from the decisions of the Auditor General, between the sessions of 1894 and 1895.

JUDGMENT OF THE IMPERIAL PRIVY COUNCIL—MANITOBA SCHOOLS.

Mr. FOSTER presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

ABERDEEN.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, the Judgment of the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Imperial Council in the Manitoba Schools Case and the Imperial Order in Council founded thereon, together with the proceedings had before the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, and the Remedial Order of the Governor General in Council.

Government House,
Ottawa, 22nd April, 1895.

REPORT.

Trade and Navigation Returns for the Dominion of Canada, for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1894.—(Mr. Wallace.)

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT.

Mr. McMULLEN. Might I inquire of the leader of the House when we may expect to have the Auditor General's Report laid before the House? It is now nine and a half months since the close of the fiscal year, 1894, and we have not yet before us this important blue-book, which is unquestionably one of the most important that is presented to Parliament. It will be impossible for members to give their attention to the items of expenditure until that valuable book is laid on the Table of the House. The Minister of Finance appears to be anxious to expedite business, and he can certainly do so by giving members an opportunity of looking through that large volume before proceeding with other business.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no doubt that the report, or such portions of it as are necessary, will be ready for the House when the business to which it particularly appertains, comes before the House. My hon. friend has had all the more anticipatory pleasure by the delay, he will have added to that the actual pleasure of being able to peruse it before many days.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think we ought in all conscience to have it laid before us as soon as possible.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, it will be.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is specially the duty of the Auditor General, and he is usually very punctual in performing it. There is a great deal in what my hon. friend says. We cannot discuss these estimates properly without having had an opportunity of looking through the blue-books, particularly that one. May I ask the hon. Minister if he has got the statement of the 20th April, of the receipts and expenditures which he has undertaken to bring down?

Mr. FOSTER. I beg my hon. friend's pardon, it had slipped my mind. But they are ready, and I will send for them.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCEL-LENCY'S SPEECH.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Bennett for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in answer to his Speech from the Throne.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I listened, Sir, with a great deal of attention to the observations addressed to the House by the Minister of Finance, who is now the leader of the House, and the Minister of Justice, in reference to the period at which Parliament have been convened. They have stated to the House the various excuses for calling Parliament at this late period, and I am quite sure that none of them were entirely satisfactory to their friends, as they certainly were not satisfactory to the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. The Minister told us of the delays arising from the decease of the late Premier; he told us of the delays that were occasioned by the receipt and consideration of the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the Manitoba school case, but I do not think that any of the reasons which the hon. gentleman assigned, some of which occurred before the period at which Parliament is usually convened, and others of which transpired at a period later than that at which Parliament usually meets, were satisfactory to the House. I cannot understand how it could be important that the hon. gentlemen should engage in a political tour through the country, holding meetings in various provinces of this Dominion looking to an election, if it was their intention to meet Parliament at the usual season of the year. Then, Sir, we were informed of the special efforts that were being made to print the voters' lists; how it was found that sufficient expedition could not be secured by printing them at the Government office; that some of them had been sent in manuscript to Montreal, and others to certain newspapers supporting the Administration in Toronto, for the purpose of being printed with expedition, so that they might be available at an earlier period of time. All these things pointed rather to an election than to a meeting of Parliament, and I am quite sure if we were to bring the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to the bar of the House and ask him whether some instruction had not been given for the preparation of the writs, we would find that instruction had been given. And so we find in this matter that the Government have been considering their own safety and their own convenience rather than the public interest in deciding whether they would go to the country or whether they would meet Parliament in session. Now, Sir, while the Crown has a discretion with regard to the period at which Parliament may meet and with regard to whether Parliament shall be convened at all or not, that discretion is not an arbitrary discretion, it is a constitutional discretion, and I do not understand how, if a constitutional duty had arisen which made it necessary and proper that the Government should have dissolved Parliament and should have gone to the country, how they could constitutionally and properly reconsider that proposition and hold a session instead of holding an election. The hon. gentlemen who have addressed the House from the Treasury benches have not given us information on that subject. They have certainly laid down rules with respect to the rights of the Crown and the constitutional rights of Ministers in the matter, which are not sustained by any writer upon this subject. Then, Sir, we have had laid down by the Minister of Finance a new doctrine of ministerial responsibility. My hon. friend called attention to a letter which had been read by Sir Charles Tupper, a Minister of the Crown in this House, written by the Deputy Minister of the Interior, in which he predicted that a very large amount of money would be realized from the sale of the public domain in the Northwest Territories before 1891, and after 1883, and stating that not less than $58,000,000 would be available from the sale of public land. When my hon. friend read that letter and reminded the Minister of the illusory character of the prediction, the Minister denied the responsibility of the former Minister who read that letter to the House, and maintained that the responsibility rested solely on the author of the letter, Mr. Burgess, Deputy Minister of the Interior. I deny that doctrine altogether. I remember very well in this House when Mr. Mackenzie referred to the reports made by his engineers with respect to the Pacific Railway survey, upon which he relied, that he was charged with attempting to shift the responsibility from his own shoulders to those of the officers of his department. He denied any intention of doing that; if it had simply been a question of fact with respect to matters which had already transpired, and if the Deputy Minister had made an inaccurate statement, and the Minister might have very well said that he made the statement in good faith, and he relied on the representations made by his department. But a Deputy Minister when called upon by his chief to engage in the work of prophesying, and when called on to predict what would be the state of things eight or ten years after the period at which he was writing; the Minister who read that letter to the House assumed the responsibility for the declaration that the state of things there foreshadowed were such as he was justified in relying upon and presenting to the country, and the Minister assumed entire responsibility for a statement of that kind. So that the Government cannot escape the responsibility for the glowing pictures they have drawn with respect to the North-west Territories, and with respect to the state of the country, by stating that they are not responsible, that they have no responsibility in the matter, that it rests entirely upon their Deputies. I could not help noticing, Mr. Speaker, how much both the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Justice worried over the position of the leader of the Opposition. They demanded that he should discuss a question which they refused to discuss. They said: We are very anxious to know what the views of the leader of the Opposition are upon the Manitoba School question; but, at the same time, they informed the House that the question, for the present, was relegated to the Government of Manitoba, and that it would be an imprudent, an improper act on their part to enter upon the discussion of any feature of that question until the Manitoba Government had pronounced its deliverance on it. Yet those hon. gentlemen who have the responsibility of the Government resting on their shoulders, come to this House and demand from my hon. friend beside me a declaration of opinion which they themselves decline to offer. They have placed themselves in rather an uncomfortable position. They seem to think that it is a patriotic duty for the leader of the Opposition to assist them out of the embarrassment in which they are placed. They have put the chestnuts in very hot ashes, and while they insist they are there properly and they shall have the privilege of eating them after they are cooked, they ask the leader of the Opposition to be good enough to pull those chestnuts out of the fire. Well, Sir, I think he has very properly declined that task; I think he would have been going far afield if, while having none of the responsibility of the administration of public affairs resting upon his shoulders, he should have come to the rescue of the Government who are confessedly, by their own proposition, incapable of dealing successfully with the question. The Minister of Justice informed us that we have a new Premier, and also that we have a new leader in this House,—and we knew before we came here that the choice of leader was not a choice very acceptable to him. The Minister of Justice also informed us that the National Policy had become a real Ishmael, that the Government have a new baby, that is to be the heir of promise on this occasion, that the subject of the National Policy and other issues had been discussed ad nauseam, that he wished to hear nothing more about them, that there are other questions, live questions before the country, and that he had the courage to discuss them at Antigonish, although he said it was improper for a Minister of the Crown to discuss them here, but a highly proper act for the leader of the Opposition to engage in such a discussion. When the hon. gentleman made his statement, I thought this new child of promise to the Conservative party in this House was not altogether unlike Ginks' baby. The whole Government were not quite united in describing it. Some regard it as a very proper infant, and one entitled to the utmost attention and care. Rumour has it that the real parent is the Minister of Public Works. He has taken a very great deal of interest in this youngster, and its appearance among the Cabinet has led to a good deal of difference of opinion, and much angry discussion. There is a dispute as regards its character, some wishing to cast a doubt on it, and others wishing to give it the greatest possible attention. There is, in fact, so far as one can judge, a dispute as to the sex of the infant, and they wish to bring it to my hon. friend here for him to decide the differences between them. They have sent it abroad; they have asked Manitoba to take charge of it, and until they know what Manitoba will do they are not in a position to say anything further in regard to it. It is remarked that the Controller of Customs was greatly scandalized by the appearance of this youngster, and that in fact he threatened to desert the family if the family did not desert the baby. We hardly know the position of the hon. member at the present time upon this subject. We do not know whether he is reconciled to the adoption of the interesting infant into the Government family or not, and I suppose we shall not know until the Government hear from Manitoba. The Minister of Justice said that my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Laurier), was struggling to avoid a discussion upon this burning subject. Burning what? Burning whom? The Minister did not tell us. He says that other questions have been discussed 'ad nauseam' and that the public are weary hearing anything with regard to them. Well, Sir, the Ministers made peregrinations through the country not very many months ago, and they discussed what they thought were the interesting public questions. Did they say anything about this question? Did they tell the public what they intended to do or how they intended to deal with it? I fancy that the hon. the Minister of Railways had something to say with regard to the tariff, and I think he had something to say with regard to the Tay Canal. He had something to say also with regard to many other questions connected with the public service, but he did not think then that he was discussing dead issues or questions in which the public had no longer any interest. I also find, according to the reports of the ministerial papers, that his colleagues followed in very much the same line. In my opinion, Sir, the conduct of the Government and the conduct of the electors in the constituencies which have recently had an opportunity of expressing an opinion, show that these matters are not dead issues. The public are tired of the present tariff, I believe, but they are not tired of the discussion of the subject and they are not disposed to treat with indifference the question as to whether they will get rid of the tariff, or whether they will longer submit to its burthens. The public are not tired of the discussion of the Tay Canal; they are not tired of hearing something with regard to the disinterested and patriotic services of the Government candidate in West Quebec, and they are not tired hearing something of the sterling integrity of St. Louis of Montreal. The public are still interested in public blunders and in public plunders that have taken place. I am charging nothing against the Government, I am speaking of the facts which have been disclosed in this House and admitted. All these matters are matters of public interest. The public are not disposed to say that there is nothing of interest to them in the five millions dollars of deficit for the nine months of the current year, which my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has pointed out. These things of course are not of interest to the Minister of Justice, and neither is the condition of the North-west, the absence of population there, the desertion of the country by some of those who were there and the straightened circumstances and the distress that exists amongst that people. All these matters the public care to hear about, although the Minister himself may have become thoroughly tired of their consideration. The observations of the two Ministers who have addressed the House,—and who directed their addresses to my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Laurier)—remind me something of the story of Tom Sawyer's experience in painting the fence. He had great skill in white-washing. He interested the boys who were about him and some of them were willing to pay him something to try whether or not they could do it as well as he could. The Ministers have addressed my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) much as Tom Sawyer addressed the boys who watched him carrying on his white-washing operations. The Ministers said to my hon. friend: Show us what you think of this subject, explain to us your view, let us see what skill you possess, if the responsibility rested with you let us learn from you how you would solve the difficulty. But my hon. friend cannot be drawn into the service of the Government just as the boys around Tom Sawyer were drawn in by that knowing young man. Tom was a little more skilful in his business than the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Justice have been on this occasion. Sir, I adopt,—and I think it is generally adopted on this side of the House—the opinion of Sir Robert Peel, who said: It would be time enough for him to prescribe when his Sovereign called him in. We admit that there is disease existing.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

We admit that there are grievances requiring redress and abuses requiring reformation, and we are of opinion that they are not likely to be redressed, nor is the reformation to be brought about so long as the Government continues in the present unskilful hands. But, we think that that is no reason why we should undertake to assist the Ministry in the discharge of those duties for which they claim eminent fitness and superior ability. Now, Sir, the hon. gentlemen evidently are disturbed by this new infant that is substituted for the National Policy in the coming contest. The Minister of Finance informs the House that he escaped with a whole skin and without a scratch. He was as fortunate as Daniel in getting out of the den of lions. The Hon. Minister spoke with great earnestness and it was not a facetious matter with him at all. It was perfectly clear that the Minister of Finance thought that some of his colleagues were not so fortunate as he, and you have but to look at the Minister of Public Works with his serious face, with that haggard look, and you will see that the matters which appal the Minister of Finance were matters of serious difficulty to him. I do not wonder that the hon. gentleman did not care to go to the country after this subject was discussed. The hon. gentleman of course knowing what terrible difficulties were amongst twelve men, thought and thought seriously: if this happens amongst twelve men, what will be the condition of the country if five millions of people are called into a 'melee' such as that existing among Ministers of the Crown. Now, Sir, this may have had, and I have no doubt it has had, an important influence upon the Controller of Customs. I think it goes a long way to excuse, and perhaps to fully explain, the position of that hon. gentleman. The hon. Controller of Customs was ready to stand with one party in preventing home rule on the other side of the Atlantic, law or no law; he was prepared to stand by his friends in Ulster in opposition to the law. It is declared that on this side of the Atlantic the hon. gentleman is ready, law or no law, to stand with his friends in the province of Manitoba. No doubt, when the question comes to be discussed, the hon. gentleman will be able to explain to us how it is that he takes one view of the question when he looks across the Atlantic, and takes another and different view when he looks towards the west. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman will shoulder his musket and strap on his bayonet in the one case as well as in the other. An impression has gone abroad that he has modified his opinions, and is reconciled to the views of the mother of this interesting infant, the hon. Minister of Public Works. The hon. Minister of Justice said that my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) found it necessary to appeal to my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition for a certificate, in order that he might become the Reform candidate in Oxford. The hon. gentleman did not tell us what kind of a certificate was required; it would not have suited his purpose to do that. The hon. Minister of Justice, it is rumoured, sulked in his tent. He is a younger man than my hon. friend, and he has a parent, a father, living; and it is rumoured that he threatened his colleague with the wrath of the mighty father. I do not know whether that is so or not. It is also rumoured that the Prime Minister addressed to the Minister of Justice on that occasion an interesting letter, which called him out of his tent, and put him back again in the public department of which he has charge. It would be interesting to know what were the contents of that letter. Then we were told that the Minister of Finance was also interested in the matter. Now, I do not think the Minister of Finance was helping anybody to obtain a nomination. His case, it is said, is a case of the head being helped by the tail. The Minister of Finance has adopted the scriptural rule of not putting his trust in Kings; he has retired from Kings. The hon. gentleman has gone to the "Temple" to worship. There is where he is now said to pay his devotions; and there is an impression abroad—I do not know how well it is founded—that he will require to sacrifice something more than a turtle dove and two young pigeons to be successful—that nothing less than an unblemished male sheep will serve his purpose. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. Ministers have spoken of their success in the four elections which have recently taken place. Three of those constituencies, prior to the elections, were represented in this House by supporters of the Administration; now, three of them are represented by gentlemen who were opposed by the Administration. In Quebec West, the Government supported the candidature of Mr. McGreevy. Mr. McGreevy was entitled to their support. He has endured a good deal on their account. That hon. gentleman was expelled from this House; he endured that rather than give evidence. He was prosecuted civilly, and judgment was obtained against him; he was prosecuted criminally, and was sent to jail. Having been purified by these processes, he was qualified again to become a candidate, and was entitled to receive support from that side of the House. The Ministry, in the Address, and in the Speech which they have put in the mouth of His Excellency, have, for the first time since 1878 admitted that the country is not in a highly prosperous condition; but they console themselves by declaring that matters are not as bad here as they are elsewhere. The hon. Minister of Justice pointed out that Lord Salisbury had made a regular blue ruin speech with regard to the state of agriculture in England; and the hon. gentleman himself, while admitting that the country was far from prosperous, maintained that the farming population of England were in even a more disastrous condition than the farming population of Canada. This is the first time we have had a statement from hon. gentlemen opposite of the relative condition of this country. For the last fifteen years, the hon. gentlemen have carefully ignored the fact that there was a general depression throughout the world from 1875 to 1880; they have carefully ignored the fact during that period Canada suffered less than almost any other country in Christendom. They have carefully ignored the fact that real property did not shrink in value at all, and that personal property and manufactured goods, such as textile fabrics, shrunk in value less in Canada than in the United Kingdom, the United States, or Germany. But the hon. gentleman says: "Oh, but you had a deficit then, and your deficit happened notwithstanding the fact that you did not reduce the taxes." Well, Mr. Speaker, our rate of taxation was a little more than half the present rate of taxation. If we had been disposed, in a period of distress, to increase taxation on the people of Canada, we might very easily have made up the amount of the deficit that then existed. The hon. gentleman said: "But I reduced the rate of taxation." How did the hon. gentleman reduce it? He took the taxes off sugar. He says he made a large concession to the people there. Well, Sir Leonard Tilley argued in this House for three sessions that the tax on sugar did not increase the price, and he compared the prices of sugar in the New York market with the prices of sugar in Montreal and Halifax to show that no increase took place as the result of the tariff. The hon. gentleman no doubt has obtained light since that period, and so no doubt have his colleagues and his friends who sit behind him, and we are glad that he is now ready to make this concession; but the reduction of the duty on sugar is indeed a very small matter when compared with the actual rates of taxation on almost everything else throughout the country. The hon. gentleman has not told us when or how the very large deficit now existing is to be met. He talks of economy; he says that when we go into Committee of Ways and Means he will ask the House to make the necessary appropriations. What is the object of going into Committee of Ways and Means except to provide an adequate sum for the expenditures that are to take place? Will the hon. gentleman be prepared, when he asks this House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, to make adequate provision for the expenditures which he expects the Government to incur during the next twelve months? The hon. gentleman referred us to a number of matters.

He called our attention to the public lands of the North-west, and he feebly hinted that some matter or transaction between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Government is to be brought under the attention of Parliament this session. The hon. gentleman knows that the condition of things in the North-west, which has seriously affected the revenues of the Canadian Pacific Railway, is in a large degree due to the change of route. The line which was surveyed by Mr. Sandford Fleming, and which ran through a fertile belt from Winnipeg to the Rocky Mountains was abandoned, and a line was adopted which carried the road through the American desert. People have been invited into that country and have found it, two or three seasons to one, almost uninhabitable and unproductive, and that has had the effect of giving to the country a bad name and seriously interfering with its settlement. Now, I think the statements made by the hon. gentleman go to show that the condition of the country is very grave, that its financial condition is imperilled. You have great public works and enterprises existing in the country, none of which are remunerative at this moment and the largest of which are not paying current expenses. This is a serious condition of things, which requires to be carefully considered by this House during this session, or the House will be derelict in its duty. The time has come when it will no longer serve the purpose of the Government to give charters for railway lines to penniless adventurers in order that they may sell the land grants attached and make private fortunes at the public expense. There was a period in the history of the mother country when the Crown domain was given away to favourites of the Crown, and the Crown domain in Canada has for some years been in the same way bestowed on the favourites, not of the Crown, but of the Administration. During last session we had a railway charter given to a company composed of men without means or capital, for the construction of a road through a section where no settlers had yet gone and where none are required—where none ought to be for the next twenty years. And for what purpose? To promote the public interest? Not at all. For the purpose of enabling some men to make a fortune by offering the charter to capitalists in New York, England, or the continent of Europe. But the time has gone by when that system can longer be practiced, and it is in the interests of the people of this country to see that that system is no longer continued. The Minister of Finance has preached to us economy. But the Minister of Justice has everywhere throughout the country taunted us with being a party of economists, with undertaking to economise too much, with wishing to starve public works, by not making the necessary liberal appropriations. Whose view is to prevail—that of the Minister of Finance or that of the Minister of Justice? It is perfectly obvious that if the views of the Minister of Justice are to prevail—and they have prevailed in the past—the hopes of the Minister of Finance are not likely to secure to him anything like an equality between the expenditure of the Government and the revenue of the country. This country has been for the past ten years travelling over precisely the same road taken by the Argentine Republic. We know where the expenditures of that republic have landed it. We know what its financial position is at present. And unless this Parliament is prepared vigorously to take hold of the subject of public expenditures, unless it is prepared to inquire into our management of public works and undertakings and to see that no appropriation is made for any works that is not meritorious in its character and deserving of public aid, this country will, in an incredibly short period, be in precisely the same position as that to which the South American republic has been reduced. The hon. gentleman referred to the question of preferential trade with the colonies. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to quarrel with his proposition. I do not think it amounts to much. I think that two months' trade with the neighbouring republic would amount to more than two years' trade with the colonies with which the hon. gentleman has undertaken to make these arrangements. The past experience of this country, the condition of those colonies, the products of those colonies, for export, show that that is the case. The hon. gentleman has also referred to the case of Newfoundland. I am not going to discuss that subject to-day. We shall have that up when the terms agreed upon are submitted to us. But I will say this, that if it had not been for the active interference of the Canadian Government, the Blaine-Bond Treaty would have been in operation. That treaty would have been of great advantage to the colony of Newfoundland. And had it been in force, the colony would have escaped the financial depression that has occurred, while it could have done us no possible mischief. Newfoundland would have been infinitely better off if our Government had minded its own business and let that colony alone than it can possibly be by any arrangement which would make it a part and parcel of the Canadian Confederation. Newfoundland no doubt will become a part of this confederation some time or other, but if the hon. gentleman thinks that he can carry out any arrangement in the existing state of Newfoundland, with the unsettled French shore question in the position in which it is to-day, he will find himself mistaken. My impression is that the people of Canada will not agree to any arrangement by which France will be made for all time to come a substantial factor in the government of this country. So that, unless the hon. gentleman is prepared to show that the question has been satisfactorily settled, before the scheme of union is submitted to this House, I think it will not be acceptable to the people of this country. I do not intend, Mr. Speaker, to trespass further upon the attention of the House in discussing the Address. I think, Sir, that the policy shadowed forth means a very great deal to this country; that it points to additional burdens, additional burdens that at this time we can ill bear, and the proposals of the Government, when they are submitted to us will call for careful consideration by this House.

Sir JAMES GRANT. The Address of His Excellency as presented to this House on this occasion is one that embraces more facts for discussion than any speech from the Throne that I have read for many a year. For that reason I ask the indulgence of this House while I offer a very few observations. The session is significant in many respects. In the first place, on our entering here we found two floral wreaths, one upon the desk of a departed member of the Conservative side of the House and the other a tribute to the memory of an hon. member on the other side. These members have passed away during the short interval that has elapsed since we had the pleasure of meeting here before. In their departure both have left a noble record in the history of this country. The able, I might say the admirable address delivered by the leader of the Opposition on the death of our late lamented Premier, is characteristic of the ability and genius of that great French patriot, who, by his elegance, by his irresistible eloquence on all occasions of this kind, wins the encomiums of this House and this country. I listened to his observations with much pride and satisfaction, inasmuch as he showed that he bore to the members of this House a nobleness of sentiment that is well deserving of the members of this assembly. Then, the observations which fell from the Minister of Finance were a perfect eulogy, in fact a panegyric of a great man, his associate in this House and in the administration of this country. I was not at all surprised that the sad event should call forth from him the expression of such touching sentiments, which must have gone to the hearts of every one who listened to him. On the death of Sir Robert Peel the London "Times" observed, that "statesmanship is the brightest jewel in the casket of the Empire," and certainly, around no one's life's career has a brighter halo been thrown than around that of our departed Premier, the late Sir John Thompson. I trust that now the wealth of the country will flow in the same channel as its tears, in order that a fitting tribute may be given to those who have been left to mourn the loss of so great a man. We have also parted with a dear old friend in the person of Hon. Félix Geoffrion. I must say

I was somewhat surprised that nothing had been said heretofore about that great man. Félix Geoffrion occupied a prominent position in the country for many years. He raised himself from the rank of a humble notary to that of Minister of the Crown by his intelligence and high character, being a shining example of that great French nationality, whose members, by their great perseverance and by their brilliancy of character have assisted the great Anglo-Saxon race, in developing this country from the wilderness which their great progenitor, Jacques Cartier, found as he made his way up the St. Lawrence into the great western country. I have very little more to say upon this subject, but I must say that at no time in the history of Canada has our Chamber experienced greater losses than on the present occasion. It was not my intention to speak at any length upon the trade question, upon the fiscal policy of this country, although there is a reference made in the Address to His Excellency upon the depression of trade. But, after the observations of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) the other evening in which he afforded us the opportunity of conning over the deficits which he said were about to fall upon this country, I cannot but make a few observations upon this point. It is true there is a great depression in this country, as in every other portion of the known world. Such has been the experience of those concerned in trade during the past two years. But I think that of all the parts of the world there is not one that has escaped that depression better than Canada. As a proof of this, I would ask any sensible man to consider the result of the loan made by the Hon. Minister of Finance last year. That was one of the best financial operations ever effected for this country, and that during a time of depression. And what was the cause of his success? It was that the people of Great Britain have confidence in this country, have confidence in our resources and in our people. They know what we have accomplished, within a short space of time, and they are ready and willing to give us the support which we have shown that we deserve. The trade question is doubtless a very important one, and there are some notable facts in connection with it. The depression is said to be due to the fact that we have a system of protection in this country. But, if we go back to the time when Hon. Edward Blake was leader of the Opposition in this country, we know perfectly well that he issued a circular note to manufacturers of this country, declaring that if his party attained power they were not going to interfere with the policy which had been in force. We very well know that Sir Charles Tupper, when he was Minister of Finance, on the floor of this House complimented Mr. Blake on the expression of those sentiments, as it was proof that he himself saw the desirability of continuing the system of protection in Canada. Now, Mr. Speaker, in order to get over the difficulty, our friends of the Opposition undertook the advocacy of various means of raising the revenue in order to see if by any one of these means they could gain the public confidence. The first was unrestricted reciprocity; second, commercial union; third, continental free trade. Every one of these they advocated as strenuously as they were able to do; and although they brought to bear upon these points all the fire, and eloquence, and erudition of which they were masters, still they were not able to commend them to the country. Why? Because the people had not confidence in them; these gentlemen had not shown that these principles would be advantageous to the country; our financial men and the public generally would not adopt those principles, and as a consequence, the Conservative party is in power to-day, having not only the confidence of this House, but also the confidence of the country. Shortly afterwards we remember that they held a convention here at Ottawa, which drew together a great many good men. I know perfectly well that there are good, and sound, and substantial Reformers in this country; there are men in that party who are doing their utmost to advance the interests of the country as well as of their party. But they fail in their diagnosis, they do not thoroughly understand the position, or, if they do understand it, these words may be applied to them:

Convince a man against his will,
He's of the same opinion still.

At that convention what did we see? We heard the hon. leader of the Opposition using these words: "I will go to the mother country and not to the United States for an example." Again, in his Winnipeg speech: "We shall not give in one whit until we succeed in carrying into effect the British system of tariff." And again, in his St. Thomas speech: "We shall not leave a trace of protection; every vestige of protection shall be removed from the soil of Canada." Now, he says he will go to the mother land and not to the United States for an example. Well, Sir, if we look at the history of the mother land, what do we find? Sir, during the last two months, when a general election was in prospect, we found individuals addressing audiences in various portions of Canada, preaching free trade and low prices. That was the motto. What have free trade and low prices brought about? If we look at the history of England, what do we find? That since 1889 they have lost over £60,000,000 in their exports. There are now 3,000,000 acres of land less under cultivation than there were at that time. After fifty years of free trade, the people of England are crying out to-day for protection in almost every part of that country. The Right Hon.

Sir JAMES GRANT.

Mr. Chaplin, who was Minister of Agriculture in Lord Salisbury's Administration, said last February, when addressing the English House of Commons, that they were passing through one of the most remarkable crises in agriculture ever known in the history of England. Mr. Balfour, the same day, endorsed that opinion, and stated that England to-day was passing through a crisis in agriculture, in commerce and in finance such as they had not known during the present century, and he attributed it entirely to low prices, the result of protection. And why? Because the products of almost every country in the world are flowing in there unchecked by any additional taxation, so that the farming community cannot earn an honest living by the sale of their products in competition with the surplus products of other portions of the world. Now, I ask any sensible man, how is it possible for our farmers to go in for low prices when, owing to the protective tariff of the United States and other countries, they cannot sell their products to those countries, and in the only market that is open to them, Great Britain, they still have to compete with low prices? Now, the Montreal "Witness" says: If free trade is introduced, you will have a greater importation of manufactured products into Canada. It is true that we have manufactured products brought in from the United States; we would have them brought in from Europe, and as a consequence our markets would be drugged, our manufacturers would be obliged to close their establishments, the trade of the country would be paralyzed, and thousands of people would be thrown out of employment. "We shall not give in one whit until we succeed in carrying into effect the British system of tariff," says Mr. Laurier. If they carry into effect the British system of tariff, can the farmers of this country continue their support to a party who opposes protection, who will introduce a policy which so reduces the sale of their goods that their best customers, their best trade, will be cut off, and their resources will be paralyzed, as the resources of English farmers are being paralyzed to-day? "We will not leave one trace of protection, every vestige of protection shall be removed," says Mr. Laurier. Now, if there is going to be no protection, where are the 35 or 36 millions coming from to carry on the affairs of this country? I cannot understand where they are going to get the money; the point is not clear. They say, Oh, if we only get into power, we will introduce such-and-such a policy. I want them to say now what they mean. Let them tell the country what they mean, and where these 36 millions are coming from. The leader of the Opposition at Winnipeg, said: We will place a tax upon raw materials, that is where the revenue is coming from. But what will be our position immediately that tax is placed on raw material? What are raw materials? Sugar, cotton, binder-twine—I will mention but a few of them. Take sugar, the largest article of importation into this country. We know well that during the Mackenzie Administration our sugar factories had to shut down with a tax of 40 per cent on the manufactured material and a heavy tax on the raw material brought into this country. The Minister of Finance stated the other day in his address, that if the Administration were willing to bring back the ordinary sugar tariff, they could wipe out the present deficit in this country, and show the people in a tangible form where they were cutting off the revenue in order to meet the wants and requirements of the people and give them cheap articles. The Opposition are crying out for cheap articles. They say they will reduce taxation and give the people cheap articles. They say that if free trade was introduced, the farmers would be able to live without any effort. But once you bring in that free trade and those materials are taxed, as they say, in order to raise the revenue, we will see at once where we will be. Then take the article of cotton. Put one or two cents per pound upon cotton produced in the United States, and you would shut up every cotton industry in this country. I state that without fear of contradiction. I assure you, Mr. Speaker and hon. gentlemen, that it is a very serious problem. We cannot afford to have that tax placed on cotton at the present time. As regards binder-twine made from ordinary jute, that is also a farmers' product, it is not produced here. It is one of those materials very largely used to-day by farmers in tying up their grain. Immediately you put a tax upon it, the farmers complain. But that is not done by the Conservative party, it is contemplated by the Reformers, because they wish to raise a revenue, and the only way they can raise a revenue, according to the principles of free trade, is to put a tax on these raw materials which are now, under the policy of the Conservative party, giving such cheap products to the people of our country, which policy we intend to preserve and which we are determined to protect so far as we possibly can. There is one great principle that it is necessary for our people to uphold, and that is to defend and maintain our defensive tariff, and build up our industries and retain our home market. We know perfectly well what protection has done in the past, and what it is doing in the present. Those who visited the World's Exhibition at Chicago, and saw the extraordinary outcome of the protected industries of Germany and France, must have observed at a glance what those countries have accomplished by adopting the principle of protection. Then, again, if you look at Russia we observe similar results attained. That country had free trade for a time; but in 1819 that remarkable statesman, Count Nesselroff, impressed on the leading authorities that it was desirable to have a change in the tariff system, and since that time that Empire has enjoyed a protective system. Hence, the progress and prosperity of the country, and its satisfactory position, financially, hence the development of its industries and resources, until to-day Russia is looked upon as one of the great powers of the world, and one that is fully and thoroughly determined to maintain that protective system under which its industries have developed and prospered. Let me say a few words with respect to our neighbouring republic. According to Professor Thompson, one of the greatest authorities on political economy within the past century, the tariff of the United States has been changed no less than nine times, and on four separate occasions the whole scaffolding of the tariff system has been broken down and rebuilt. Now, through the Wilson Bill, which gives a higher protective tariff than any introduced into this country, the American people are determined to allow the principles of protection to stand, and that the scaffolding of the tariff shall be retained for at least not less than a quarter of a century. We know well that the people of this country have done everything in their power to promote the principle of reciprocity between Canada and the United States. No less than on fourteen occasions have our public men approached the leaders of the Government at Washington, and only once during that whole period, in 1854, were they successful; and no sooner had that treaty of reciprocity expired in 1866 than it was cut off almost instantaneously, and, notwithstanding the efforts made by British statesmen, notwithstanding the efforts of our Canadian public men, we have not been able, up to the present time, to introduce any principle of trade and commerce that would be acceptable to the American authorities since the abrogation of that reciprocity treaty. Our public men have been found fault with in this connection. The late Sir John Thompson, and the present leader of the House, when they visited Washington during the administration of the late Mr. Blaine, did everything to promote the principles of reciprocity. But they were told: Gentlemen, we cannot grant reciprocity between the United States and Canada unless you discriminate against Great Britain. Those public men, like true patriots, having the welfare of the country at heart, recognizing what Great Britain has done for Canada, and how desirous we are to remain a part of the Empire, said: No, gentlemen, rather than surrender those principles we will return to our domiciles and to the Parliament of Canada, and let the people know that Canada is determined to maintain the power and prestige of Great Britain, and will not surrender any right or interest to any power that will seek to interfere with the trade relations as they now exist between Canada and the mother country. Sir Richard Temple, in one of the admirable addresses which he delivered in Winnipeg only a year ago on the subject of raising a revenue, put the matter so tersely and laconically that I will read an observation from that address, as follows:—

When Mr. Laurier talks about "Free Trade" as understood in England, as possible in the near future, he is "talking through his hat." Both political parties must have resort to customs duties, and the issue between them is not one of "free trade" and "protection," but one of mere detail as to the mode of levying the tariff. The money must be raised somehow, whether Conservatives or Liberals are in power; and the only difference between them will relate not to the system itself, but to the method of its application.

The Conservative Government, if you boil down the issue, are getting a revenue out of the country from taxing the people in the manner which most fully meets the wants and requirements of our population, that of protecting our industries, by fostering our resources, by encouraging our manufactures, by adopting all measures possible to make our people happy and comfortable, by giving them cheap sugar and coffee, and the necessaries of life; but let it be known that the Government intend not to raise the revenue from the raw materials imported into the country, then the labouring classes, our farmers who toil the soil, and those of the people who earn their wages by the sweat of their brow will at once admit that the policy of the Conservative party is to protect and foster their interest by allowing no taxation whatever on those products, for such taxation would tend to paralyze the industries of the people and hamper the advancement of the great interests of Canada generally. Mr. Speaker, I desire, before closing my observations, to say a few words with respect to our colonial conferences. The Conservative party are said to be doing very little for this country, that they are adopting a laissez faire policy, that they are sitting in their seats and are desirous of retaining them, if possible, while doing very little. Are such statements accurate? They are far from it. We know that within the last twelve months the late Minister of Trade and Commerce proceeded on a mission to Australia, New Zealand and other colonies, and as a result of that visit he was successful in bringing about a conference of delegates from the antipodes, who consulted with each other and with Canadian representatives as to the importance of establishing a system of preferential trade between Canada and the Australian colonies. As a result of that conference we have the admirable and succinct statement presented by Lord Jersey. In that statement he met the whole issue. That conference brought about new relationships. Now the colonies understand more thoroughly the working of their trade and commerce, they know what Canada requires, and what they require, and to-day we are preparing to take into serious consideration many methods which would improve and develop materially the trade with this country and the Australasian colonies. I think, at the present time, Mr. Larke is in Australia, looking into the whole question, and shortly we shall receive a statement of his practical experience on these points. Again, we are now considering the desirability of securing cable communication between Canada and Australia; also, steam communication, and other questions. It is reasonable, therefore, to suppose that these efforts put forth by our energetic statesmen, are evidence of untiring energy and zeal, as to our best interests. Then, again, we find that a few days ago another conference was held, one with Newfoundland delegates. True, that a similar conference met here twenty-five years ago. The subject was also discussed at the Quebec conference, where the first principles of confederation were laid down. I recollect perfectly well, in conversing with the late Sir John Macdonald and Sir George E. Cartier, who were the Nestors of that period, men who did more to advance the material interests of this country than any other two men in the present century, that I found those statesmen were imbued with the desirability of bringing into confederation the Island of Newfoundland. Doubtless the day is not far distant when Newfoundland will be brought into the confederation. It is said to be a big island surrounded by fog; but it has a magnificent climate. It has 36,000 seamen constantly employed in their fisheries which produce every year about $6,500,000, and they have a revenue of about $12,000,000 annually. All these will add very materially to the resources of Canada. At the present time we trade with Newfoundland to the extent of only about two and a half million dollars as their products chiefly go to the United States, so that by bringing Newfoundland into our confederation we will be adding largely to our trade. In fact Newfoundland is our third best customer to-day, and if she were in the Union, I have no doubt we would derive as much benefit from her trade, or nearly as much, as we do to-day from our trade with Great Britain. Under these circumstances I trust the day is not far distant when the ancient colony will be a province of our confederation. I look upon union with Newfoundland as important also from a strategical point of view. She is the great protector of the mouth of the St. Lawrence, and she is to the St. Lawrence what Gibraltar is to the Mediterranean. Every day she is growing in importance in that respect, because the Canadian route to the Orient is fast taking precedence over the Suez route. Why are the travellers from the East coming here? It is because we have the shortest route, and the best from a sanitary point of view, because its climatic conditions are ahead of any in the known world. When people find that they can go from Calcutta, India, to London, Great Britain, in a comparatively short space of time by a route which cannot be surpassed at the present day, the shortest route from ocean to ocean, rely upon it that the country which can have the shortest route across a great continent like this will hold in its grasp before many years the commercial supremacy of the North American continent. I have little more to say, Mr. Speaker, further than to advert briefly to the Manitoba school question. It is a question which has disturbed the public mind very considerably within the last few years. It is entirely a matter of law. It is a matter of right. Sir Donald Smith a few days ago, when he addressed a committee of gentlemen who waited upon him in Montreal, put the whole subject in a nutshell, when he said: These people were entitled to certain privileges at the very commencement of confederation, and if we gave them these privileges then, why should they not be continued now. We may legislate upon these points, we may have differences of opinion, but I believe in giving equal rights and privileges to all classes of the community whether they be Protestants or Catholics. In this great country of ours we have two great bodies, the Catholic and the Protestant. Have they not both worked together harmoniously, and have they not both done everything in their power to advance the interest of Canada? Are they not living together side by side and enjoying the company and society of each other? Do we not find Protestants at the head of Catholic institutions, and do we not find Catholics delivering addresses to Protestant assemblies, as Father Dawson did here in Ottawa. Let me tell you to-day, hon. gentlemen, that as a member of this House I feel pleased and gratified beyond expression to be the representative of a Catholic University as I have been for twenty years, besides being the president of a Catholic hospital. I have experienced nothing but kindness from the Catholic people, and I have seen nothing in them but what is worthy of the highest respect. If we extend to them the right hand of fellowship and do what is right and proper, we shall have nothing to fear in this Manitoba school question. It is a question which will be easily settled and which I believe can be settled so as to satisfy the entire people of this country. It is a question that should not be discussed from a political point of view, and those who go on the hustings in this country and attempt to stir up rancour and to disseminate the principles of antagonism should be condemned. This question should be looked at in a broad and comprehensive sense, and I know perfectly well that whether Liberal or Conservative, whether it be English or French, or whether it be Catholic or Protestant, the great aim and object of all will be, and should be, the advancement of the material interest and prosperity of this country. Let us unite together as one people to keep Canada intact from race and religious prejudices, and let us show the world at large that we have a full and thorough determination to make Canada what she should be, a colony of which the British Empire may well feel proud.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is not my intention to follow the hon. gentleman (Sir James Grant) in his discussion of trade matters, because as has been observed, there will be another and perhaps more fitting opportunity to treat on that subject. I wish simply to refer to one statement the hon. gentleman made, a statement which was new to me. He said that in recent years—I forget what year he mentioned—the Hon. Edward Blake, when leading the Opposition, had sent a circular to the manufacturers informing them that if he came into power he did not intend to do anything to disturb existing fiscal regulations. I never heard before of any such circular being issued, and when the hon. gentleman (Sir James Grant) says that it was issued and that it was the subject of discussion in this House, he mentioned something that was entirely new to me. Passing to the earlier observations of the hon. gentleman, I thoroughly agree with him in the fitting tribute he paid to the memory of the late Sir John Thompson and of the late Hon. Mr. Geoffrion. Every member of this House, I am sure, agrees most thoroughly and most feelingly with the second paragraph of the resolution in reply to the Address. With regard to the first paragraph of this resolution, in which His Excellency expresses satisfaction at again having recourse to the advice and assistance of the Commons, I take it that that means that His Excellency's advisers have also satisfaction in that regard, and viewing it in that light, it has occurred to me as rather strange that instead of the member for Ottawa (Sir James Grant) embracing the opportunity of addressing the House now, one of His Excellency's advisers did not seek the opportunity of expressing to us in our hearing the unbounded satisfaction they have in seeing us once more assembled and having our advice available to them. I am glad to know that that is the case, because it was thought at one time that the Ministers had not much satisfaction in the prospect of meeting with the Commons of Canada. It was thought by some people, perhaps not rightly, that the Ministers were unable to make up their minds whether to call Parli-ment together or whether to dissolve Parliament and appeal to the electors. Since, however, the Ministers have their minds made up for them, I am glad to know that it is a source of satisfaction to them because it would not be pleasant if they met Parliament and felt uneasy under the circumstances. I agree with them in the satisfaction we have in meeting together, but I regret that we were not sooner summoned to meet. I believe that every member of this House will admit that this is an inconvenient season of the year for the calling of Parliament. The good precedent set by the Government of Mr. Mackenzie, is one that should be followed by this Government. Not only have we the precedent of the Mackenzie Government in this respect, but it has been insisted upon time and again by members on both sides of the House, that it should form part of the unwritten law of this Parliament that we should be summoned here early in the month of February, it not late in January. But when months are allowed to elapse, and when we find that we are summoned at a time when we should be nearing the end of the session, I repeat that it is a matter of great regret. I know that the Finance Minister, the leader of the House, has given us reasons why we have not been summoned earlier, and as I allude to that hon. gentleman for the first time, I think I can safely congratulate him on the position which he occupies in the House. When it became necessary to reorganize the Government after the lamented death of Sir John Thompson, I may safely say that when the choice was made of him to be leader of the House, it was a choice that was generally expected by, and I think, I may also add will be most cheerfully acquiesced in by the members of the Opposition. The reasons he gave, however, seemed to me to be not the full and precise reasons for the delay in summoning Parliament. I have endeavoured to give all the weight to them that I could. Whether my mind had been warped somewhat by articles which I had seen in the press representing the views of the Government or not, I cannot say; but there certainly was lodged in my mind, and is still there, the impression that the unbounded satisfaction with which we are assured the Ministers greet the assembling of Parliament is a satisfaction of very late origin. If we are to believe current reports, all the Ministers were not in favour of having Parliament summoned at all; and while I know we have been told by one of the Ministers that we are not to believe the full length of the "tail" that Conservative newspapers give to us, yet the same hon. gentleman, in giving the illustration he did, taken from the habits of a lively member of the animal kingdom, did admit that if the animal was there at all, he must have a caudal appendage of some length, greater or less, even if it might not be fifty yards long. I think we have read in the papers also that one at least of the members of the Government threatened to resign if Parliament were summoned—nay, that he did actually resign; and when after a time he was found in his place again, we were told that he had returned—and, sure enough, he is found in his place to-day. Now, that hon. gentleman being a lawyer, and all lawyers, especially constitutional lawyers, being strong in precedents, it was meet and proper that he should have a precedent for his return; and it is alleged that the precedent which he cited was taken, not from English constitutional history, but from the action of a member of the feline race which on one occasion for some cause or other left the family abode, but finally in repentant mood returned, and was received again and forgiven. Whether these things be true or not, the impression has been left on the minds of the people of the country that the reasons given by the Finance Minister are not the full and frank reasons for the delay in summoning Parliament. If they were, and if it was fully determined that there should be a session of Parliament, and the Ministers looked forward to it with such rapturous joy, I would ask the hon. leader of the House, how it was that the usual work in the Government Printing Bureau of preparing the departmental reports was all stopped? How is it that, when Parliament is summoned at this extraordinary late period of the year, and a member has to rise in his place and ask when he may expect one of the most important of the departmental reports necessary for the proper supervision of the acts of this Parliament, he is told that it is not yet ready? How is it that we are told that the Trade and Navigation Returns placed on the Table to-day, have only been issued a few days ago?—nay, that all the public documents which should have been in our possession months ago, are not yet issued? If it was the intention to summon Parliament, what excuse can be given by the Ministers for stopping this necessary work, and hastening the preparation of voters' lists that might not be made use of for many months to come? and why, in addition, should they have gone outside of our own printing bureau and given the printing of many of these lists to other printing offices? These are questions which suggest themselves, and if the reasons the hon. Minister of Finance has given for calling Parliament together are to be accepted, and it was the full intention all along that Parliament should be summoned, how does he account for such strange conduct, amounting to maladministration, on the part of the Government? I also ask how it was necessary that Ministers should leave their departments and wander from one end of the country to the other and appear on public platforms to explain their policy to the people? If Parliament was to be summoned, here was the place where they could speak to the people in the best manner, and where public questions could be debated. Further, I would ask, if it was the intention to have another session of Parliament before an election, how was it that we saw, what I think we never saw before, Ministers and the supporters of Ministers receiving their party nominations in the various constituencies, and setting the election machinery in motion? Why did all these things take place if the reasons and statements advanced by the Finance Minister are to be accepted? To be personal, I might ask the hon. leader of the House himself, how was it, when he had fully determined that there should be another session of Parliament, that he thought it necessary to receive a party nomination for this House so far in advance of the time? I notice that he actually received nominations for two counties; and, if I remember rightly, the reason he gave for declining the nomination in the county he now represents was that he thought it would be for the good of his health. If the election was not to take place for many months to come, and there was to be in the meantime a session of Parliament, I think it would have been better for him, instead of forsaking his old constituency in that way, and leaving the impression on the minds of the public that the climate of King's was insalubrious, to have waited till after this session, and not to have placed that stigma upon his old constituency. These things have raised in the minds of most people a doubt that the Minister was perfectly frank when he stated that it was always the intention of the Government to have a session of this House. I can tell the hon. gentleman that the impression prevails throughout the country, and it prevails largely because of the reported actions of the Ministers themselves, that they had a feeling that they did not possess the entire confidence of the members of the House, and that they also after a time recognized the fact that they did not possess the entire confidence of the people of the country. There became deeply seated in the minds of the people the idea that this country was now governed by a set of men who were in mortal fear and terror of their positions, afraid to meet Parliament, and equally afraid to meet the electorate, and that it was impossible for them to make up their minds on the question until finally somebody in mercy, or for some other reason, took hold of the matter and made up their minds for them. That is the impression which, rightly or wrongly, exists in the mind of many people in this country. Now, the hon. Ministers may ask, What reason have you for supposing that we were afraid to meet the electorate or to meet Parliament? Well, Sir, I think the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in part explains that. One can readily understand that it would be anything but a pleasant task for a Finance Minister who had pointed to the existence of a deficit in the public revenue as a proof of incapacity, to have to meet Parliament and have the fact pointed out to him, as he knew it would be clearly pointed out, that under his administration one of the largest deficits which has ever occurred in this Dominion is upon the Dominion now. He knew that if Parliament met, most effectively would be shown here the line that appeared in the fiscal returns, where it was stated that there was a surplus of revenue over expenditure. He knew that here more effectively than anywhere else that fallacy would be exploded and the facts brought to light. He knew that here it would be shown that not only during the past year there was a deficit of nearly a million and a quarter dollars, but that, comparing the returns of revenue and expenditure for the nine months of this year in comparison with the nine months of last year, there was a deficit already of $3,805,983 to add to that. We can understand the hesitancy of the Finance Minister, who erstwhile was so boastful of his surpluses, to meet Parliament and have pointed out clearly to the people of the country the terrible condition into which its finances have been plunged under his mismanagement. The hon. gentleman made his answer in this House as best he could in the way of attempting to minimize that condition. He replied that there had been deficits under Sir Richard Cartwright when that hon. gentleman was Minister of Finance. True, there were, but the deficits in which occurred under the administration of that hon. gentleman did not amount in all to four and a half million dollars, while in this one year alone we are threatened with a deficit of over $5,000,000. The Minister of Finance drew this further distinction, that the present deficit happened under the pressure of decreased taxation, while under the Mackenzie Administration the deficit occurred in spite of increased taxation. There the hon. gentleman is mistaken. Owing to engagements made by his predecessors in office, Sir Richard Cartwright had to increase the tariff in 1874 on many articles from fifteen to seventeen and a half per cent, but the deficits which happened under his administration were not concurrent with that increase of taxation. If the hon. gentleman would turn up the public accounts, he will see that there was a surplus in that year, and a surplus the year following, and it was only after those two years that the deficits appeared; and during the three years in which they did appear, there was great depression in trade without any extra taxation being put on the people. But in addition to the deficit of $5,000,000 of this year now staring hon. gentleman in the face, and which must be met by increased taxation or borrowing, the Government have added $8,000,000 more to the public debt. We find that we have now a public debt of $250,000,000, or $50 per head for every man, woman and child in the country. We can readily understand that these hon. gentlemen, knowing that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) would be able to point out from official figures the position in which the country stood, and knowing that they could not ignore here, as they did before the session on the public platform, the discussion of questions relative to the well-being of the country, relative to the condition of our finances, should hesitate calling Parliament together. What is the other reason given by the Finance Minister for the decreased revenue, and failure to establish an equilibrium between revenue and expenditure? Carefully avoiding the word "deficit," he used the word "equilibrium" on which to balance himself. He said absolutely what is found in the Speech from the Throne. Really it would be pleasant to find a little humour even in a Speech from the Throne, if we could be expected to make merry in such grave circumstances. What is one of the reasons alleged for this failure to produce an equilibrium between revenue and expenditure? It is the recent reduction and removal of taxation. Now, the hon. Minister himself must have smiled as he dictated that excuse to Her Majesty's representative. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) pointed out on the public platform, not long ago, how he had ascertained by comparison that this reduction and removal of taxation amounted to just three-tenths of one per cent; and after Parliament met and he had obtained access to further information, he found by further comparison that he had made a mistake in his calculation, and been unjust to the Minister of Finance by giving him credit for more than he deserved. Instead of three-tenths of one per cent reduction in taxation, the reduction has been only one-tenth of one per cent. That is the showing which has been made of the finances of the country. It will be for the Finance Minister to make any further explanations that he may devise to account for this state of affairs. I have noticed, as far as I can recollect, all the reasons which he has given so far, and I fail to perceive that he has in view any scheme of improvement or of remedy save his delusive dream of increased economy. On that point you can place no reliance whatever on the hon. gentleman's promises, for last year he made a similar plea, and yet, comparing the nine months of the previous year, we find that not only has the revenue decreased, but the expenditure has increased over half a million dollars. The hon. gentleman cannot shirk this question. On the public platform he has done so, but he cannot do so in this House. The Finance Minister visited Ontario some time ago, but very carefully, in discussing public matters, steered clear of the question of finance. Although this was a subject of all-absorbing interest to the people, concerning which it was his peculiar duty to enlighten them, he preferred to leave this question of the addition to the national debt, this question of increased taxation, this question of the deficit or want of equilibrium, as he euphemistically puts it, between revenue and expenditure aside altogether, and devoted his attention to a subject in which there was something swelling and augmenting, something which could revive a semblance of the old spirit of bye-gone days when the National Policy was in its glory and hon. gentlemen opposite were dazzling the people, with its seductive promises. So, Sir, instead of discussing the finances, we find him dilating at great length upon the enormous increase in our export cheese trade. Well, now, I wonder what that had to do with the question or what credit the Minister was desirous of claiming from the increase of export of our cheese. What impression would he seek to make upon the minds of the people of this country? True, the exports did increase. But the Minister himself will hardly care in this matter, to follow the example of one of his supporters who declared—and I think he fully believed it when he said it—that the hens were laying larger eggs than they did before the National Policy was introduced. The Finance Minister, I know, has too much regard for his own reputation to claim that owing to the beneficial influence of the National Policy there is a larger flow of milk or an improvement in the quality of the milk yielded by the cows. He cannot claim credit, so far as the cheese industry is concerned, for the National Policy, the duty being the same as it was under the administration of Sir Richard Cartwright as Finance Minister. So while the hon. gentleman talked upon questions of that kind it was because he wished to find something he could point to in which the country was advancing, but in all these other matters, in which, instead of making advance we have retrograded, the Minister was found silent and with nothing to say. But Parliament has met, the people's representatives are here; the public documents must soon be laid before us and then the questions must be discussed, as discussed it certainly will be. And, Sir, I think that when it is fully discussed the feeling of alarm at the present condition of affairs which is now in the minds of the people of Canada will be deepened and strengthened, and gentlemen opposite will find that they were wise in their day and generation, if they desired to remain a little longer in office, that they decided upon the alternative, unpleasant though it was to them, of meeting Parliament rather than submit themselves to the verdict of the electors at the time they thought of doing so. I have a word to say with reference to a remark of the Minister of Justice concerning the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). Sir, you will remember that the hon. Minister said that the hon. member for South Oxford found it necessary to arm himself with a certificate of character from the leader of the Opposition when he entered the county of South Oxford again in order to be present at the nomination of a candidate of his party in that county. This is a free country, no man has the right to say that he has the right to a certain seat in this House to the exclusion of other aspirants. More than that, it is an honour to which any man may well aspire to be nominated by one of the great parties in any of our ridings to represent the people in Parliament. And it is not a strange thing that new aspirants might be found seeking the nomination. But my hon. friend did not arm himself with a testimonial from the leader of the Opposition, in order to secure the nomination. But, Sir, reports had been circulated that his leader was not anxious to have him here as—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Yes, hear, hear. He did not ask that for he knew his leader's feelings in the matter. But when that report was circulated, there were men in that county who wrote to see what opinion was held of the presence of the hon. member for South Oxford in this House by his leader and by others. And these gentlemen had a letter from the leader of the Opposition. That letter was not received by the hon. member for South Oxford, who did not need it and never asked for it. And, Sir, I have this to say—that that letter expressed the sentiments of the members on this side of the House, I think I can say universally. And I want to add, moreover, that the hon. gentlemen received the nomination in that county in which the nomination of his party means election, and that he will not have to leave South Oxford and go to some other riding more salubrious in its climate for him than his old riding. And I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Justice this question, having given him light upon that other point: Suppose a report were circulated in his riding by any one desirous of succeeding him and getting the nomination of his party; and suppose that one of his constituents should write a letter to the leader of this Government stating that it was reported that the feeling of the leader was not exactly friendly to the Minister, and that his colleagues were not anxious to have him back, I wonder what answer would be sent by the leader of this Government to the hon. Minister's constituents under that condition of affairs. It would be as well to have that inquired into. I should not be surprised—if we may believe the tale that is told in the Conservative newspapers—that there would not be the same implicit confidence expressed in the letter to that constituent as gentlemen opposite are forced to admit was expressed in the letter to the constituent of Sir Richard Cartwright who asked the leader of the Opposition for similar information.

Mr. FOSTER. That is an unthinkable case.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I do not know that it is quite unthinkable. I do trust, however, if such a letter is written that in his large-hearted forgiveness, if there should have been—which the Minister would naturally wish to deny—any unpleasantness or loss of confidence among them, they will draw themselves together in the face of such a letter, and that they may be able, without too great a wrench to the economy of truth, to give a fair and pleasant answer to the question. Let me say that if the Government are pleased to meet Parliament, the Opposition for their part are equally pleased to meet the hon. gentlemen opposite. We should have been pleased, as I said before, if the meeting had taken place earlier in the year. But even coming as it does we are prepared to come and discuss the questions at issue between us. It seems that we have met under happy circumstances—the Ministers happy to meet Parliament and the Parliament happy to meet the Ministers. I hope this harmony will not be disturbed. But the Minister will understand that while we are anxious to preserve the harmony of the occasion, it would be impossible for us, with a due sense of truth and justice, to refrain from pointing out—in the most delicate manner possible consistent with the facts—some of the iniquities of which they have been guilty. We will do it in the mildest manner possible. That this is our desire is shown by the fact that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in his speech, in referring to these matters, used no words stronger than "villainous." And I think it must be admitted that he could not have modified that while doing justice to himself and to the facts of the case. If we should have occasion to speak of the gerrymander as cowardly, I think the hon. Minister will agree that a proper regard for truth would not warrant us in using any milder terms; for such an act could not be proposed by any British statesman, such a thing could hardly by any possibility enter the mind of a man with a true sense of fair play. And when we have to allude to acts or meditated acts in the same direction, if they should attempt to perpetrate them, the hon. gentlemen will understand that if similar expressions are used on this side, it will not be for the purpose of disturbing harmony, but for the true and proper discussion of the question and a proper labelling of the article they are offering. In the same way, of the Franchise Act, when we speak of it as a most wasteful expenditure of money and a curtailment of the rights of the people, he will understand that we are actuated only by a sense of duty and that we desire only to speak of the thing in such a way that the people may understand its true character. When we speak of their extravagance being gross they will recognize the fitness of the word when they think of the present state of the finances, of the expenditures they have made and the purposes for which they have made them. When we hint that their conduct of public affairs is not wholly without corruption, they will recognize that that is as mild a way as it can be put when we see public buildings erected in constituencies sending to this House supporters of the Government though other grounds for their construction are lacking, and public buildings refused where they are wanted, for no other reason than the fact that the people declare that they cannot conscientiously send here a representative to support the present Government. When we allude to the damage to business that is created through their vascillation, through their lack of nerve, through their lack of decision, the whole country disquieted, not knowing what to expect, Sir, when we have to discuss this, and have to characterize the present Government, viewed in all these aspects as being incapable of filling the position in which they are placed, and when we say that it is time for them to give way to other and more capable men, they will understand that we speak from no selfish motive, but that we earnestly desire it simply in the interest of the people of this country.

Mr. DAVIN. I intend to occupy the House for a very brief period. Sir, I congratulate the leading members of the Opposition on having broken out in a new vein. This evening we have had a speech from my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and if we extract the jokes from that speech—which, no doubt, he thought the plums thereof—very little in the way of argument remains. Indeed, he dwelt so long on the new baby, and discussed its probable fatherhood, and dwelt so fondly on its sex, that I could no help thinking that he dilated on that baby with all the garrulity of a mid-wife. Sir, the other evening the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was, I will say, exceptionally happy. During fifteen or sixteen years of prosperity that hon. gentleman has stood up in this House, and the scowl with which he looked upon the fair prospect was something like that which Milton tells us the leader of the spiritual opposition looked on Eden, when in all its unsullied loveliness, it first met his eye. But Sir, on Friday evening the hon. member for South Oxford appeared in a light and character that were to me a revelation, and which, I can say with the utmost sincerity, was extremely gratifying. Sir, he proved that evening that he was not born under a wholly gloomy star, and, contrary to the universal impression, especially amongst his own party, he made it evident that a genial emotion could play over the sullen surface of that dark and brooding mind. Sir, if one had regard only to the hon. gentleman for South Oxford, one could wish that we had perpetual deficits in order that we might have the hon. gentleman in perennial good humour. Sir, it may be accountable on the theory of my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) who introduced this debate in a speech so eloquent and so effective that we are witnessing joy at the meeting of an old friend. It may be that we are face to face with a psychological phenomenon of great interest, and that while prosperous and happy conditions can only excite emotions of ruin and dismay, the prospect of what is sad and unhappy provokes sentiments of gratulation and delight and gives birth to smiles. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman from Brant (Mr. Paterson) who has just sat down, he, too, was witty; he, too, was sarcastic. But the gem of the sarcasm of that hon. gentleman was the way he rang the changes on the unhappy phrase used by the Minister of Finance, "restore the equilibrium." Why, Sir, he little thought that with his powers of sarcasm he was actually impaling his own leaders, he was actually striking at his own leaders. I have before me here the Queen's Speech for 1877, of which I will read you a paragraph. Now, I cannot do full justice to this Speech, as my hon. friend does to that phrase, because the range of my voice does not quite go up the whole diapason of eloquence like his. This is what I read in the Queen's Speech in 1877 :

Notwithstanding the loss of revenue consequent chiefly upon the diminution of our importations, the reductions effected during the current year have gone far to restore equilibrium between economy and expenditure.

Now, Sir, where is all the scorn which the hon. gentleman heaps on the Treasury benches? Why, Sir, it is your own phrase, or, to adopt the figure of one of the leaders of the Opposition, the hon. gentleman apparently does not know one of his own chickens when it comes home to roost. Now, Sir, it is, so far as I know, an unprecedented thing in my own parliamentary experience that we should have a lengthened debate on the Address, and is quite unusual, unless an amendment is to be proposed; so, very rapidly I want to refer to the speech of the hon. member for Bothwell. He defended my hon. and learned friend the leader of the Opposition for his silence on an important question, and he quoted Sir Robert Peel, who said it was quite time enough for him to prescribe when he was called in. I believe that in going through the country the hon. and learned gentleman who leads Her Majesty's Opposition with so much disinction, also said it would be time enough for him to prescribe when he was called in. I grant you, Sir, that there are times when it is a perfectly proper thing for a leader of an Opposition to say, in regard to a given state of things, that it would be quite time enough for him to prescribe when he was called in. But in regard to this school question, the hon. and learned gentleman is not in the position to-day, he has not been in that position for months back, and if he had been in that position before the remedial order was issued by this Government, he has never been in that position since it was issued. Now, Sir, the hon. and learned gentleman has gone all over the country and he has referred to this school question. He referred to it one time as a legal question, and another time as a question of fact, and at other times he has said, If Protestant schools existed up there, it was an outrage, and he would do away with it. But, Sir, the humblest man that listened to him when he came west, the humblest man that has listened to him all over the country, knows well that the whole time he has crept around this question, looking askance at it, not, as the hon. member for Bothwell said, like the animal that was asked to take the chestnuts out of the fire, but regarding it as a subject that he himself was afraid to touch with a pitchfork. This is the more extraordinary on the part of the hon. and learned gentleman, although he is one of the most accomplished men in Canada, a master of expression, born of French-Canadian parents, I believe, and educated in his mother tongue, yet, I can safely say, if I may dare pronounce an opinion, that in my own native tongue, English, he is a master of expression; but standing in the very first rank in Canada as a master of expression and an accomplished rhetorician, he is also a man ready, at nearly all times, to give lavish and even reckless opinions. We know an occasion when he gave a lavish and reckless opinion in regard to the rebellion in the North-west; we know an occasion when in, 1891, in Boston he gave, what I think, was a reckless opinion, and if this were the place to do it I would say an opinion that one could impugn and arraign. But the question of the Manitoba schools which has now been before this country so long, the hon. gentleman avoided and still avoids giving an opinion. He is not in the position that members of the Government occupy. I am not now discussing whether the Government did right or wrong.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. If there is any comfort in that statement, the hon. gentleman can have it stated again. I will express my opinion, I have already given it; but that is not the point with which I am dealing with at the present moment.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. All the laughter and interruptions in the world cannot divert me from what I am going to accomplish.

An hon. MEMBER. You can divert us.

Mr. DAVIN. I shall dissect the position of the leader of the Opposition; I shall do it calmly and with the utmost respect to the subject. The hon. gentleman, as I have said, is not in the position occupied by the Government. The Government, acting rightly or wrongly, decided that they would ascertain what was their legal position. The matter went into the courts. After the Government had decided to obtain a legal decision as to their position on the question there was no man, no private member of this House, as the leader of the Opposition is, although he occupies a most important position, who was not perfectly free to express his opinion, and a number of his friends throughout the country, as well as a number of the friends of the Government, have given their opinions on the question. But if there could be found a proper excuse for the leader of the Opposition withholding his opinion while the question was before the courts, if he could have argued that as the question was before the courts he was not to be called upon to advise the advisers of His Excellency and so forth, after the decision of the Privy Council had been given, there was not, I may tell the hon. and learned gentleman, among his friends and followers in the west a shadow of doubt as to what his duty was, namely, to declare forthwith his opinion as to what should be done with this question. The hon. gentleman, if I rightly gather his real sentiment by inference from a remark made on Friday, has through his reticence or indecision, even missed his opportunity, in my opinion. If he had then declared that the time had come for remedial legislation he would have gained supporters. I am not saying he should have done it.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. Let the hon. member laugh as he pleases, I shall show from the speech delivered on Friday night by the leader of the Opposition what his ideas are apparently on this question. Sir, if he had then and there decided—I am now speaking how it would have operated politically, and of course we could not suppose he would have so acted if he had not entertained that opinion—and I am speaking now as a critic, looking at his action from a political standpoint—he would have obtained the credit of forcing the Government's hand, and it would have assisted him in Quebec while the Government could have taken no other course than that they adopted. What would have been the result? The hon. gentleman would have stood just as well as the Government stands to-day with Ontario and the west. Where is the hon. gentleman? Still pursuing my role as a critic. He must do one of three things. The hon. gentleman either must endorse what the Government have done, or go one better, entailing disaster to him in Manitoba, Ontario and the West; or the hon. gentleman must declare, and that would destroy him in Quebec, for provincial rights. Apparently the hon. gentleman shrinks from giving an opinion now, although prominent followers have expressed opinions, and although at this moment an opinion from him on the floor of Parliament, an authoritative opinion from him, might go far to induce, what we all desire to see done, Mr. Greenway and his colleagues and the legislature of Manitoba to come forward and deal with this question. I do not believe—and I gather from the expressions made use of by the leader of the Opposition, that such is not his desire—there is any man within my hearing so unpatriotic as to wish that the legislature of Manitoba shall be so wanting in respect to itself as not to approach this question with the solemnity that it demands, considering its character, the number of persons affected, the opinion influenced by it and the authority of the tribunal that launched that question on its lap; that any man is so unpatriotic as to desire to see it sent back to this House with all the unfortunate and irritating issues that might follow its return, and if the hon. and learned gentleman who leads the Opposition were to speak now he would redeem himself from being in the position of a leader who will not lead but allows a follower here and there to instruct him as to what should be done. Yet the hon. gentleman may be for aught I know, quietly and patriotically trying to influence his friends in the Manitoba Assembly to deal with this question, because I gather from his speech that he desires to have this question removed from the arena of political discussion and thus be allowed freely to harp on the trade question in the way he has been doing for some time past and again has done in this House.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. DAVIN. When the House rose at Six o'clock, I was about to call attention to a circumstance that probably indicates that, whether under the influence of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition or not, the Manitoba Government intends to deal with this question. I say here, repeating what I said before, that it would from every standpoint be most unfortunate if the legislature and government of Manitoba should so far forget what was due to the dignity of the province, what was due to itself, and what was due to the Dominion at large, as not to treat with becoming respect and examine with statesmanlike care the message that was sent to them by the representative of Her August Majesty in the Dominion of Canada. Sir, when that message reached the Government of Manitoba, the leader in the Assembly—I think it was Mr. Sifton, Mr. Greenway being ill—moved an adjournment to the 9th of May next. Many persons thought that adjournment too long, but I take no such view. The reason given by the mover for that adjournment was a most proper and constitutional reason, namely: that for a question of this magnitude and importance, and novelty, it was most important that they should have ample time to consider it. But, Sir, what was the spectacle that shortly before the 17th day of this month astonished all Canada and scandalized, not merely the Conservatives of Manitoba and the North-west, but I can say advisedly, because I heard their expressions, scandalized the best men in the Reform party in Manitoba and the Territories. What was it we saw? We saw the Attorney General of Manitoba, the next in command to the Premier, he who is not only one of the jury to consider this important question, not only a Minister, but the legal adviser of the Government and the legal guide of the Assembly: the question one which the House adjourned for time to consider, and on which he would have to pronounce on the 9th of next month—what was our astonishment, and the astonishment of the whole West, to see that gentleman leave his office and leave his province and go down to Haldimand to engage in an election contest in which the school question was before the people, and to there express apparently the strongest opinions that could be uttered on an issue in regard to which he was one of the judges and one of the jury. Here he is, the Attorney General, the law officer of the Government, a man that, therefore, we should expect to be peculiarly circumspect in a case of this kind, here he is in Haldimand behaving like a reckless jurymen, who, obtaining leave to go out and get a drink of water or something else, blabs abroad what he intends to do, and what his brother jurymen intend to do when they come to deliver their verdict, although even if their minds are made up there is ample time for them to come to another conclusion. That was the humiliating position that Mr. Sifton placed himself in. The "Globe" newspaper, in its edition of the 15th of April, the leading organ of the Reform party in Ontario, published the speech of Mr. Sifton in extenso, and, presumably endorsing it as expressing the opinion of the great mass of the Reform party. Now, the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition (Mr. Laurier) said again and again on platform after platform: "I am told that the schools in Manitoba are Proestant schools : and if they are Protestant schools, and if I come into power, I would certainly feel bound to interfere, and I would see that this great scandal was removed." My hon. and learned friend (Mr. Laurier), amongst the many fine mental gifts he possesses, has this remarkable mental peculiarity, or excellence, probably some might regard it, that it is the inveterate habit of his mind to express a proposition by implication. I doubt, however, if the hon. gentleman always sees the proposition to which by implication he commits himself. When the hon. gentleman said : If these schools are Protestant, and if I get into power, I should feel bound to interfere with them, what was the proposition which by implication he committed himself to ? Sir, he committed himself to this proposition, and, in my opinion, it is a logical sequence ; he committed himself to the proposition : that if these schools were secular, if no religion whatever was taught in them, that he would not feel himself bound to interfere at all. However, the hon. gentleman never said that in so many words, and in the speech which he made in this House on Friday last he said :

Now, Sir, my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), and also my hon. friend from Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley), who seconded the Address, dilated at some length on a question which my hon. friend from Simcoe called a question of sentiment : the Manitoba school question. The language of the speech is in that respect very discreet. The elections are over. * * * *

The hon. gentleman goes on to condemn the remedial order because its language was too peremptory and likely to irritate Manitoba. Here again there is an implied proposition behind that, and the implied proposition is : that it would be desirable that Manitoba should approach this question in a spirit of sympathy and with the view of dealing with it finally, and that their so approaching it was imperilled in consequence of the peremptory language of the order. The speeches of the hon. gentleman on the platform would lead us sometimes to think that in his heart he is in favour of provincial rights and secular schools, while his speech of Friday last indicated that he is really in favour of Manitoba dealing with this question, in the spirit at least, if not the letter, of the suggestions of the Privy Council of the Empire. The hon. leader of the Opposition is a statesman, and he is a statesman of experience, and he is a statesman of whom this House and all Canada is proud, and, being a statesman, in his heart of hearts he must desire that the government and legislature of Manitoba shall deal with this question—if dealt with it is to be—and not this House and not this Government, whatever party may be in power. Now, Sir, Mr. Sifton went to Haldimand, and he declared in a speech there, that the condition of things in Manitoba before the year 1890 was something deplorable. He indicated, in fact, in a polite way, that the Roman Catholics there were accustomed, by some sleight of hand, to get a great deal more money than they were entitled to, and to pay less taxes than they ought to pay. (The statement will be found in the second column of Mr. Sifton's speech. I will not read it, as I do not wish to weary the House with extracts.) Mr. Sifton goes on to describe that a sum of $10,000 was paid for management, whereas $60,000 was the appropriation for schools, and he tells us that the Roman Catholic population were in a state of the greatest possible illiteracy. Well, Sir, he fails apparently to see that before 1890 the legislature of Manitoba might have dealt with that ; and, in fact, his speech, even though it was intended to appeal strongly to the people with the view of exciting them, would seem, if looked carefully through, to be a speech made by a man not necessarily in favour of the legislation of 1890, but in favour of such legislation, for instance, as took place in the North-west Territories. What occurred the other day in the North-west Territories ? We had a meeting there of a Protestant bishop, a Roman Catholic priest, a leading Roman Catholic layman, a leading Protestant layman, and the four members of the executive. What was the system they had before them ? What did they arrange for ? They arranged for a programme of instruction from half-past nine in the morning until three in the afternoon, which should be exactly the same in every school in the Territories ; but after three o'clock there should be religious teaching in accordance with the suggestions of the trustees. I was assured by more than one man, and men differing in religion, that at that meeting there was the greatest harmony and the most perfect contentment with the system. In the North-west Territories at the present time, from half-past nine until three, the children in the schools, whether they are taught by Sisters or Brothers, or by young men or young women not in orders, are taught precisely the same things ; and a great deal of what Mr. Sifton says might apply to such a system as that. But what I want to point out is this. Mr. Sifton is very hard on the Dominion Government. In speaking to the people of Haldimand, he tries to make out that the Dominion Government has handed over the legislature of Manitoba a hard and fast system which the people of that province must swallow, and that if they do not swallow it it will come back and will have to be proposed here by this Government. Sir, I know Mr. Sifton by repute, and I think I have the honour of slightly knowing him personally. He is an able lawyer, and probably the ablest, certainly one of the two ablest of the prominent Liberals of that province ; and the speech I am referring to is not one that I would have expected from him. I might have expected the speech of a statesman, but this is a speech of a personality half demagogue and half technical lawyer. Of the Dominion Government, he says :

They are making an order which will consign one-third of our population to ignorance and illiteracy, and it is as plain as the nose on any man's face that the reason why that order has been made is simply for the purpose of buying the votes of the province of Quebec.

Further he says :

These religious exercises, the Act says, shall be held at the public school entirely at the option of the trustees for the district, so that if the trustees do not want to have religious exercises, they need not have any. There is no ground for the idea that these schools are Protestant schools, and that the Roman Catholic people are obliged to send their children to schools where they will be required to attend at Protestant exercises.

Therefore, if the hon. and learned leader of the Opposition can rely upon a distinguished friend and supporter, he would have no reason whatever for interfering. He goes on further to say :

We have been told we must restore a system which will destroy and cripple our educational system, and the Government has sent a member back to Haldimand to ask for re-election. What does this re-election mean? * * * * * * * * You are asked to approve of that Act, and if Dr. Montague goes back to the House of Commons, it will be said that the people of Haldimand approve of the order that was made ; that they approve of the Government imposing the original separate school system, which they are seeking to impose upon Manitoba, and that they declare that the Government and Parliament are bound to act if the legislature of Manitoba refuses to carry out the order, and I have no hesitation in saying that the legislature will refuse to carry out the order.

Of course, the people listening to that would come to the conclusion that what Mr. Sifton meant was that the legislature would refuse absolutely to consider the remedial order. That is what he intended to convey to the audience, but of course it is open to the construction—and a quibbling and pettifogging legal mind might put it forward with the object of conveying that construction “we will not adopt the remedial order in its literalness”—and I intend in a little while to call the attention of the House to this, and make a point in reference thereto. He goes on to say.

When the legislature meets on May 9th, and when the resolution is introduced and passed, as it will be, refusing to carry out that order, the Government of Canada are bound by every consideration of constitutional law and common sense to bring in a bill to carry out that order in toto, in the same terms in which it was passed, to impose on us the system of separate schools which we had prior to 1890. You hear people say that they don't intend to do that. There is no more doubt that the Government of Canada will do that than that I am speaking here.

Mr. DAVIN.

Although the closing paragraph of the decision of the Imperial Privy Council points out that a literal reproduction of the acts bringing separate schools into existence was not at all necessary. Mr. Sifton goes on :

When they passed the Order in Council they committed themselves to the policy which that order contains. They are bound to bring in the necessary legislation. Mr. Ouimet says that the Government will bring in legislation, that it will be passed, and that the old separate school system will be restored in Manitoba. Whether Dr. Montague is elected or not, when the answer comes back from the province of Manitoba that it will not accept the order which has been made, there will be introduced by the Government of Canada a law for the purpose of giving effect to that order, unless something happens in the meantime which will show enough members of the House of Commons that the people of Canada do not intend to stand that sort of thing. What I am here to ask you for is to ask you not to do Dr. Montague any injury, but to say to the members of the House of Commons that the people of Haldimand do not approve of that order being made. I ask you for once to forget whether you are Liberals or Conservatives, and to cast one vote for sound principle and for Canada.

Of course he was not there to do the Secretary of State an injury, but he was there to try to defeat him when he was on the threshold of ministerial ambition. Now, Sir, in view of such a speech as that, I cannot acquit the hon. leader of the Opposition of being wanting in his duty to his party and to Canada in refraining to speak so as to influence the Liberal Government and the Liberal majority in the Manitoba legislature. Demosthenes compared the people of Athens to an unskilled pugilist who always put up a guard where he was last struck. The hon. gentleman, for the last two or three years, has always, in every changing attitude and circumstances, put up the same guard, and we have it now. He cannot speak at this time because it is none of his business to advise His Excellency. But we cannot let him off so easily. The people of Canada, the Liberal party especially, this House, have a right to know what his opinion is on this great question. Instead of that, what do we hear? From such a man, in such a position, and at such a time, on a hundred platforms from Halifax to Vancouver, and here in this House, on this great, this perilous question, we hear nothing but sounding phrases of calculated inanity. But he may be, as I suggested before recess, really secretly influencing hon. gentlemen in the Manitoba Legislature. An hon. gentleman who used to sit in this House, and not far from where I usually sit, is, I am told, in Ottawa. And I am told that the hon. gentleman, the learned and distinguished Attorney General of Manitoba is in Ottawa at present, and it is possible that ere now, it is possible that conferences may very recently have taken place, and that after all it is dawning on the minds of gentlemen in Manitoba, who thought that this question would be a fine club with which to bludgeon Ministers of the Conservative party, might be just as fearful a weapon to destroy leaders of the Opposition. A lengthy interview with Mr. Sifton appears in the Montreal "Witness." The hon. gentleman reminds me of the trap—I do not want to be disrespectful—who comes to you with glozing words to try and get you to give him a shilling or a dinner, but who, when you give him neither, goes from the door growling out curses at you. The hon. gentleman went to Haldimand where there is a strong Orange body. I ran there myself once—and know the county, and a finer body of men you could not find in any other part of Canada. The hon. gentleman went there and addressed them in a long and eloquent speech, for eloquent he could not fail to be. He expected to get their votes, but did not, and he gave in consequence his opinion of the Orangemen to the reporter of the "Daily Witness." It is only because the interview shows a completely different attitude from that which he took in Haldimand, and towards the close a much more statesmanlike attitude, that I refer to it at all. I refer to it because it is a great gratification to me to know that a gentleman occupying so high a position is about to take a much more rational view of his duty than he seemed to take at Haldimand. He was asked by his interviewer how it was Mr. Montague was not beaten. He replied :

People like to shout with the crowd and chiefly with the biggest crowd. I did not think McCarthy would win in Haldimand nor had I a great interest in his winning.

Although he made long speeches and told the people of the bad effect which public opinion in Ontario would have on Manitoba, if the Secretary of State were not elected to stay at home, still he did not wish to do the hon. member for Haldimand the least harm. All he wanted was to kill him politically. Then he went on to say :—

There is a general impression that the people of Manitoba are disposed to trample on the rights of the Roman Catholic minority simply because they are strong in number and without regard to reason or justice. I need not say that that is all nonsense. It was to dispel ignorance of our position that I entered the fight at Haldimand. I think I succeeded in doing that, for the speeches at a bye election are more readily read than similar matter would be if put in the form of a letter to the press.

So it was to do something like what could be done in a letter to the press, only more emphatically, that the hon. gentleman went down to Haldimand. He had no interest whatever in the result. He went on to say :—

The results in Antigonish and Verchères, on the other hand, were highly significant, because the remedial order was made the ground of acceptance of the Government candidate and the people rejected this claim.

How historical that is we all know. The reporter asked him :—

How do you account for the attitude of the Orangemen in the Haldimand contest ?

The answer will be interesting reading to those Orangemen who have recently in different parts of the Dominion been appealed to, on various grounds to desert their old friends :

How do you account for the attitude of the Orangemen in the Haldimand election ? The Orangemen have been passing resolutions all over the country, insisting upon the principle of public schools for Manitoba, offering their moral and material support to the Government and condemning all connection between Church and State.

"All not worth that." Mr. Sifton cracked his fingers contemptuously.

These are the men he was, but a few days before, with honied words seeking to win to his case and whom he was urging to keep the Secretary of State at home. Said the reporter :—

Are the Orangemen unreliable as a political factor ?

"On the contrary," said the Attorney-General, a little bitterly, "they are very reliable—to shout for you, and go out and vote for your opponent."

There is the bitterness—I hope, Mr. Speaker, that you have never felt it, I hope that no member of this House has felt it,—but there is the bitterness of misplaced affection. He goes on to say—and mind now that he can only speak of Orangemen of what he knows of Manitoba Orangemen because he knows them best. He said :—

I know where they are. They are quite reliable. The Orangemen came to our meetings and applauded. Apparently they were enthusiastically in favour of Mr. McCarthy—and I must say that some of them really worked and voted for him—but most of the men who shouted the loudest at our meetings went out and voted for Montague.

And then Mr. Sifton dropped a metaphorical tear and said :—

It is pleasanter to go with the big crowd, you know.

"And is it not a little singular," said Mr. Sifton, smilingly, "that many of the Ontario papers that commended the notion of my entering into the campaign, and patted me on the back for the stand I took, have wavered since they saw Dr. Montague's figures.

Again he drops a metaphorical tear and heaves a sigh :

It is always safe to shout with the crowd, you know.

And the reporter does not add that he lifted his handkerchief to his eyes—but we can imagine that. Now, Sir, what follows is important, for in his interview, away from the passions of the hustings, he shows what are the views of Mr. Sifton in regard to this question. And I commend these views to the people of Haldimand, for they are not the views he expounded upon the platform in that county :

“ But the result in Haldimand,”—

Said the reporter—

—“ makes no difference in your attitude ?”

My attitude was somewhat misrepresented by the press—

I suppose that was not the Ministerial press ; I suppose that was his own, the Opposition press.

Mr. LAURIER. No.

Mr. DAVIN—

“ My attitude was somewhat misrepresented by the press through insufficient care in following my statements. I have been made to say that the Manitoba Government would listen to neither argument nor reason, but took its stand upon the new law, heedless what could be said or urged. Now, my position, and the position of the Government, which I clearly defined in all my speeches, was this : the Federal Government has issued a remedial order. We assume that this is the reasoned decision of the members of the Cabinet, who have given the matter consideration. This order means the restoration of the old school system in its entirety, as it formerly existed. It means the unqualified teachers and an inefficient system. The Manitoba Government will never go back to that. That is what I stated. That is what I now repeat.”

Here we have great Reformers showing by implication what are their real opinions ; and the fact is, Sir, that a man cannot go speaking from Dan to Beersheba and submitting to interviews everywhere, and always keep locked in his own bosom the profound conclusions he has formed upon the various questions he discusses. So it would seem from the latest utterances—this is from the “ Witness ” of Saturday, 20th instant ; and I suppose that it was on the morning of that day or the evening of the previous day that he was met by the reporter—and I commend it to the hon. leader of the Opposition, and I commend it to all our friends in this House, as showing that the Attorney General in his saner moments is a very different man from the Attorney General when heated with passion and determined by hook or by crook and in defiance of all the deencies of political and ministerial life to strike a blow at the Conservative party of the Dominion. When he is speaking with passion upon a platform in Haldimand, he is a very different man from that we see when he is being interviewed at Montreal. Now, Sir, hon. gentlemen who have spoken have all said they would not deal with the trade question. I will follow their example—I also will say that I will not deal with the trade question. But, as I have said that I will follow their example, of course you will naturally expect me to devote the greater part of what I have to say to the trade question. But I will not go deeply into it. And I will tell you why : because one does not need to go deeply into it to expose the propositions of hon. gentlemen and blow them to the winds. Why, Sir, take the speech of my hon. and learned friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills). I am proud to say that I am glad to read what he writes, I like to hear him speak ; I can always learn something from him. But, Sir, Homer sometimes nods ; and my hon. friend fell into the great error of going away from constitutional lore, from May, from Todd, from what Sir Robert Peel and Lord John Russell said on various constitutional questions ; he made the mistake of quoting a book that, I suppose, since his constitutional and political studies have become so exigent, he does not read so often as he used in his earlier days—he quoted from the Bible, and he quoted wrongly. He said, Sir, that the Finance Minister had adopted the scriptural rule, “ Put not your trust in Kings.” That is not what the scripture says : it is : “ Put not your trust in Princes.” But, doubtless, it had dawned on the hon. gentleman’s mind : The Finance Minister is not going to run for King’s ; was there not a quotation somewhere in the Bible about Kings ? is not there a pun I can make, cannot I flash my wit upon this dull House and make its slumbering waves quiver ? Yes. “ Put not your trust in Kings.” Now I will try a proverb—I do not see why Solomon should engross all the proverbs to himself. This is my proverb—Let no constitutional lawyer put his trust in his memory, when he quotes Scripture. Well, Sir, my hon. friend in that speech—which I will say was not characterized by that close-knit reasoning that so often distinguishes his utterances in this House ; it was somewhat rambling—took exception to the Minister of Justice quoting Lord Salisbury’s speech as to what my hon. friend called blue ruin in England. Well, Sir, the hon. the leader of the Opposition came west and told us everywhere throughout that country that he wanted to give us free trade as they had it in England ; but he always added that it would take a long time before we could get there. So that all he could do would be to give us a shadow of free trade as it is in England. But it is not merely Lord Salisbury who tells us that the state of England is deplorable ; nor is it alone the figures brought forward in that eloquent speech of my hon. friend from Ottawa (Sir James Grant), that show us that England is in a deplorable condition. We have in the paper of “ To-day,” a picture of England under free trade, showing that, not merely in the farming districts, but in the manufacturing districts as well, England is in a deplorable condition. Sir, we have here the utterances of a great Liberal on this very question, given in one of the strongholds of free trade, Birmingham. Mr. Chamberlain, one—

Mr. LANDERKIN. Chamberlain ?

Mr. DAVIN. I beg pardon.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Don't mention him.

Mr. DAVIN. I see my hon. friend perceives that in this matter discretion is the better part of valour. Mr. Chamberlain said :

I am inclined to think that in our staple trades—for instance, the coal trade, in the iron trade, in the cotton trade, and above all in the greatest of all our trades, the trade of agriculture—the margin of profit has entirely disappeared. Up to the present time wages have not fallen at all in proportion, but if the present state of things continues, it is simply inevitable either that wages will have to be considerably reduced or that works will be closed, land will be idle, and the numbers of the unemployed will be largely increased. Under these circumstances, which we are bound as courageous men to look in the face, it is not wonderful that people are seeking everywhere for remedies, and it appears to me not to be wonderful either that some people are ready almost to take any remedy which is offered without considering whether the prescription may not be worse than the disease.

I find that there are a number of people, and I think an increasing number, who, under the present condition of trade, are coming to the conclusion that our free trade policy has been a failure—(cheers).

Cheers in Birmingham. I say it is most significant that that sentence should be cheered in Birmingham; and I say here that if the hon. member means to give us a cheap country to live in and free trade, I fancy we shall find ourselves not living in a cheaper country, because at the present time, as has been admitted to me by farmer after farmer in the west, the great staples are cheaper than ever they were; and leading Patrons have said to me that the necessaries of life and the great staples are cheaper than ever they were. So that what I said of the position taken by the leader of the Opposition on the school question, will apply exactly to this trade question. He tells you that the country is in a deplorable state, that it was never in such a bad state as it is at present, but he does not tell you what he will do. Will he say again that he has no right to advise people, that he will only prescribe when he is called in? Surely if he has a panacea that would cure the desperate state of things that he says exists, and is solely traceable to the tariff, why does he not produce it? Why does he not show and explain what changes he would make, and how these changes would affect the result? Now, what does he say on page 30 of the "Hansard"?:

To-day there is a plaintive admission that Canada is suffering, though in a minor degree, from a universal depression. Depression, says my hon. friend from East Simcoe. But then, Where is the virtue of the National Policy?

Now, there again we have my hon. and learned friend's style of political discussion. He states that there is distress, there is depression. Where, then, he says, is the virtue of the National Policy? Now, what is the value of that question? That question is of no value unless he can establish two propositions—that it was the end and aim of the National Policy to prevent depression; and that it was so stated. Why, Sir, nobody ever held that the National Policy could guard against depression; nobody ever laid down that was the object. On page 31, the hon. gentleman speaks in a way showing that he himself does not believe it—he speaks of "cycles of depression which come periodically." Yes, cycles of depression come periodically, whatever tariff you have, whether you have free trade or whether you have protection, they come periodically, for when you have depression in protected America, you have depression in free-trade England; when you have depression in protected France, you have depression in free-trade England. Take the period between 1875 and 1878, you had depression during most of those years. You had depression in England, you had depression in the States, you had depression the world over, showing clearly that the form of the tariff you have has nothing whatever to do with depression. Depression, Sir, is produced by over-production, and over-trading, and the banks becoming stringent and refusing to give accommodation, and the over-trading is stopped, and the over-production is stopped; and, after a time, we get out of the trough of depression and once more go on, whether we have a protective tariff or not. So when the hon. gentleman asked, what, then is the virtue of the National Policy? he betrays precisely the same kind of mental habit that I alluded to before; he implies propositions which, when examined, are found to have no cogency or relevancy whatever. Now, Sir, the hon. member for Bothwell referred to 1873 and 1878, and so did the hon. member for Oxford; and he talked of taxation at that time. Mr. Speaker, I am not going into that, but we know this, that after having added 7,000 or 8,000 miles to our railway system, after having brought about the greatest possible progress in every form of national activity, according to the returns up to and inclusive of 1893, the interest that falls on each individual in Canada is $1.74; whereas, in 1878, it was $1.58; so that about a cent a year, as has been often pointed out, is all that has been added to the interest that each man pays, notwithstanding that we have spanned this great continent with an iron bridge, that we have deepened our canals, that we have progressed within these fifteen or sixteen years at a rate that neither the United States nor England nor hardly any other country I know of, can compare with—all that done, and the interest on the debt increased only a few cents.

Mr. McMULLEN. Bosh.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I will answer that monosyllable with another monosyllable, and I will say: "bray." Now, Sir, I rose mainly to call attention to what I deemed to be the position taken up by a great man, which, looked at from whatever point of view, I could not understand. I will only say this now, that I rejoice to see that thus far the discussion in this House has been approached in a spirit that cannot be too highly commended. I may differ from the positions taken up; I may think there is not enough candour or enough frankness; but the spirit of moderation in which this question has been approached, a question which is calculated, I think, if approached in an improper spirit, to do great harm—the spirit in which it has been approached is, I think, a statesman-like one, a moderate one. In view of what I read from the interview with Mr. Sifton, I think it exceedingly probable indeed that the legislature and government of Manitoba will justify their claim to statesmanship by approaching the question according to the best of their judgment—I do not care how they do it, but, according to the best of their ability—and that they will say, after deliberation, this is what we intend to do; and then, Sir, I consider they will exhibit to the people of Canada, and to the Empire, an attitude worthy of a great province, and the legislature of a great province, and they will help to solve a question which might prove perilous to the peace and the prosperity of the Dominion.

Mr. CASEY. The debate on the Address, as has been pointed out, has taken an extremely wide range, but I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and I ask those hon. gentlemen opposite, who began it? Who has compelled us to enter upon matters in the discussion of the Address, which are usually discussed on the stump? Why, Sir, the hon. gentlemen opposite, the occupants of the Treasury benches, began their stumping excursions through the country so long ago as last November, and continued them, with one sad interruption, up to the beginning of this session. Well, I do not object to this wide range. It has given liveliness and freedom to the debate. I hope it may give more vigour to the debate than has been exhibited by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) who has just sat down. His speech is only another proof of the spirit of flatness, of the spirit of futility, that seems to have lighted upon hon. gentlemen opposite. Why, Sir, in times past, who was more flowery than the hon. member for Assiniboia? Were his speeches not like the prairie in June, full of flowers, glowing with colour, sweet with the odours of Araby the Blest? His voice dropped gems of eloquence, and milk and honey, and that sort of thing that goes to enliven a debate. I will not say that hon. gentleman's eloquence is bald, because it certainly bristles with some assertions which he had better have left unsaid. But if his eloquence was too pointed in some respects, it was very flat and insipid as a whole. The hon. gentleman told the House a great deal about the deplorable state of England, and also in regard to Mr. Sifton's misdoings in Haldimand. Here is where the bristles came into his eloquence. I cannot pass over the hon. gentleman's remarks without saying that they did not become the dignity of a member of this House, or of one who possessed the reputation of a gentleman, for that hon. gentleman said that Mr. Sifton was a pettifogging lawyer and was a tramp—the hon. gentleman compared Mr. Sifton to a tramp, although I now observe he shakes his head. The position held by Mr. Sifton in Manitoba and the North-west is quite equal to that possessed by the hon. member himself, and, moreover, it should be remembered that the gentleman referred to cannot be here to defend himself. The hon. gentleman failed to make the slightest expression of his own opinion on the question of the Manitoba schools, although at the same time he accused hon. members on this side of the House of cowardice in not expressing an opinion. The hon. gentleman is very polished outwardly, but his remarks have given the House very little insight into his true inwardness. He said we were cowardly in not discussing this question, and yet the House is utterly in the dark at the present time in regard to his own opinion on it, although he occupied upwards of an hour. The hon. gentleman said that the leader of the Opposition was confined to three courses on this question: he had either to go with the Government, or against the Government, or else see the Government and go one better. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will condescend to explain to the members of the House from the east the peculiar language of the prairies as to seeing a man and going one better. I have an idea, however, that it means outbidding in some way or other. I submit that a leader having three courses open to him is not crowded into a very narrow corner, after all. But the hon. member for West Assiniboia sees him and goes one better, for he has four courses open. He may not only see the Government, and go one better, agree with it, or oppose it, but he may do what he has done time and again, speak in one direction and vote in another.

Mr. DAVIN. Never. Give an instance.

Mr. CASEY. That is a course that is not open to the leader of the Opposition, who has not learned that trick.

Mr. DAVIN. There is not a single instance of such action on my part.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. member for West Assiniboia made an attack on Mr. Sifton and quoted an interview with him in Montreal, and some speeches in Haldimand, the report of which Mr. Sifton does not acknowledge as being perfectly correct. I think the hon. gentleman was rash in assuming that the reports of Mr. Sifton's speeches, and the interview were exactly accurate. Not many years has elapsed since there appeared in the Ottawa "Citizen" a verbatim report of a speech supposed to have been delivered by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) the night before at Stratford. It not only contained gems of wit and humour, but interruptions and clever replies, also cheers, satirical and applausive. The only unfortunate circumstance lacking to the completeness of the report was that it unfortunately happened that Providence had prevented the hon. member from getting to Stratford on the evening in question. The hon. gentleman, therefore, should not depend too much on reports of interviews and speeches. He further informed the House that the voice and manner of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) were much more cheerful when he had deficits to discuss, and he almost desired to see a continuance of deficits in order to keep that hon. gentleman in good condition, and happy. But the hon. member need not worry about the cheerfulness of the hon. member for South Oxford, for the deficits seem likely to continue and the hon. member (Sir Richard Cartwright) will have plenty of opportunity to manifest cheerfulness. Then the hon. member for Assiniboia went out of his way to prove that his friends in framing the Speech from the Throne on this occasion had been guilty of what must be called gross and undoubted plagiarism, for he quoted from the Speech of 1877 to show that the very language employed in regard to the falling revenue and loss of equilibrium—which is a grand phrase—in our finances at that time had been inserted in the Speech at the opening of the present session. He said that when hon. members found fault with that expression they were simply attacking their late financial leader. It appears to me the hon. member for Assiniboia, in calling attention to that fact was simply proving that the occupants of the Treasury benches had not sufficient originality to invent a Speech from the Throne, which did not require a great deal of ability after all, but had to plagiarise a very old speech. The hon. gentleman, moreover, was very solicitous respecting the prospects of the leader of the Opposition in connection with the school question. He told the House what my hon. friend should have done in order to take advantage of the great opportunity presented to him; he fussed, cackled, and excited himself over that subject in a manner that compels me to parody what he said of the speech of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and say that he spoke with all the garrulity of an aged grandmother. We are not, perhaps, able to divert the hon.

gentleman (Mr. Davin) as he stated we could not divert him from the course of his remarks, but we probably have obtained sufficient diversion for the present from his speech, and I may pass on to the consideration of questions and personages somewhat more weighty. It is impossible for any of us in this House to pass without notice the paragraph referring to the loss which the House and the country have sustained in the deaths of Sir John Thompson and of our dear old friend the Hon. Félix Geoffrion, the late member for Verchères. Of Mr. Geoffrion, I must say that we of the old guard have known him ever since our entry into politics. He was a sort of political foster father to many of us, he was a man on whose judgment we could always rely, whose good sense never failed and whose honesty was never for a moment doubted by any one. I think I may say that Mr. Geoffrion had not a single acquaintance wherever he was known who was not at the same time a personal friend of his. We looked upon him as an example of the sturdy gentleman of the old school, and as a thoroughly sound politician at the same time. I do not think that higher praise can be given to any man. With regard to Sir John Thompson, the news of his sudden death struck us at first as almost an impossibility. Rumours floated about of his death in Windsor Castle at the foot of the throne, in the presence of the Queen some said, and it all seemed so unreal that for a time we could not possibly appreciate it. But when the sad and pathetic details began to arrive; the details of his appearance at Windsor Castle, of the men who travelled with him in the train from London, of those who were with him in the Council Chamber when he was sworn in of the Privy Council; and when we read of his final remark before he fell in death across the shoulder of his neighbour at the table, when we recognized in that remark the courtesy and thoughtfulness for others which always characterized the man, then we were able to feel that the sad news was the cold telegraphic truth, and I need not refer to the shock which the lamentable death produced on the mind of every man in the country who knew him. We were at last compelled to realize the fact that, surrounded by princes and nobles and dignitaries in the old historic pile at Windsor, death had taken away our friend in the zenith of his greatness. While a great deal has been said, and justly said, about Sir John Thompson himself, enough has already been said with reference to the gracious and royal lady who showed her true ladyhood in nothing so much as the care which she took to show her personal respect for the remains of the dead statesman and for his relatives who were left. It cannot be forgotten that the Queen is an extremely busy woman, far busier than most of us in this country can realize, but in spite of the time she had to give to affairs of state and to the necessary ceremonials of the court, she devoted personal attention to the smallest details of respect to the remains of the Canadian statesman. Even beyond all that there was a personal feeling of regard and sympathy and motherliness shown by Her Majesty towards the orphan daughter of the great statesman which did the highest credit to the noble heart of this queenly lady. I believe that it is proper that we should pay a tribute to the kindness of Her Majesty in this matter, and I believe that, without being accused of any undue show of gushing loyalty we can very properly and fairly and justly express our high appreciation of the manner in which ladyhood was exemplified by the Queen on that occasion. Sir, the loss of Sir John Thompson is beginning to be deeply felt already. This session of Parliament is practically only two days old in debate, and I say (without any disrespect to the gentleman who is now leading the House, or to the gentleman who is at the head of the Government and sits in the Senate) that the difference is so unmistakable that nobody can avoid noticing it. The spirit is gone out of the party and the spirit has gone out of its leaders. The speeches from the ministerial side of the House, which used to be so triumphant and even boastful, have been apologetic so far. The speeches from this side of the House, on the contrary, however right or wrong in the opinions they may have advanced, have been confident and hopeful, and I may say aggressive. I will go further, and say that the leader of the House and his first lieutenant, who spoke on Friday last, were supported, or I should say not supported, by their followers in a manner which I never saw paralleled on the occasion of the opening of Parliament. It is within the memory of all of us here how in the old days, when the leader of the House made his first speech of the session, the enthusiasm used to boil over on the back benches and on all the benches between them and the front ones, and how the House used to be crowded to hear what he said. Was it so on Friday last? No, Sir. I will not say that the gentlemen on this side of the House did not give the Finance Minister a good hearing, because they did, and there was a large attendance of Opposition members, but it was sad to any friend of the Government to see the array of empty benches that were behind the Finance Minister and the Minister of Justice when they addressed the House. I can attribute it to nothing but to a sense of the fact that the party has lost its head, that there is disunion on the ministerial benches, that trouble is cropping up in the near future, and that there is an uncertainty among the supporters of the Government and the Cabinet Ministers themselves as to what should be done in the crisis and as to what is going to happen them. I cannot profess to lament that from a party point of view, but I do lament that in such a crisis as this—for it is a crisis in more ways than one—a crisis in regard to our tariff policy and a crisis to a smaller extent in regard to the Manitoba school question, that party should have lost the only man who seemed capable of uniting it together as a solid body for legislative purposes. It is bad for the country when the party that has the majority in the House has not a head able to lead it in straight paths of legislation, and I fear that it cannot be said that the party of the hon. gentlemen opposite has such a head at the present time. Now, I have alluded to the fact that the Ministers began their stumping career long before the House opened. I do not intend to go over a series of stump speeches, but I want to call attention to one fact in regard to these speeches, taking one of the Minister of Finance's more especially for a text. Years ago speeches intended to boom the National Policy were made with the view of proving that something great was being done for the manufacturers, while in this last campaign our friends opposite appeared to think that they must talk to the farmers, and the Minister of Finance seemed to fancy himself specially qualified to address the farmers on tariff questions, and to convince them of the soundness of his policy. He was the farmer's friend, the man who kept out the ravenous wolves in the United States from preying upon our market—the man who kept up the price of wheat, cattle, hogs and every other kind of farm product in this country. But, Sir, his taste had been vitiated to such an extent by practice before protectionist audiences, his mind had been pumped so full of flapdoodle by the agents of the combines that he found himself totally incapacitated for making an impression on an audience of farmers. I will trouble you with only one specimen of the way he attempted to make the farmers believe that they were prosperous and happy. In one of his earlier speeches, at Galt, he said :

In 1891, there are 500,000 more people living in the cities than in 1881. Have you not a market of 500,000 mouths more than you had in 1881? The more the city population is in comparison to the rural population, the better is the home market for the farmer.

There is an argument to be addressed to an audience of intelligent farmers. If that argument means anything, it means that the depopulation of the country parts and the building up of the cities is a direct boon to the farmers. It means that every man whose farm is sold out by the loan company, and who goes to the city to drive a horse or to become a porter in a store or to work in a factory, has become a more valuable citizen to the farmer than he was when living beside him in the country. It means that every farmer's son who deserts the farm and seeks to make a living in the city is doing more good to this country than the one who stays at home and helps to increase the productiveness of the farm. It means that this country would be better off if nine-tenths of the farms were depopulated and lying waste. If his argument means anything, it means that. But the farming community were not to be caught by such chaff as that. It has been ridiculed, and justly ridiculed, all over the country, and I have only alluded to it to show how a bad habit of trying to make believe that everything that has happened under the National Policy has been of benefit to the country, could lead an intelligent man like the Finance Minister to address such stuff to an audience of farmers. The mouth policy, the policy of getting rich by the number of mouths in the towns, is not going to take with the farming community. The hon. gentleman's policy of farmers' protection reminds me very much of the farmers' protection that we used to operate on a small scale about the time of corn planting when I was a boy. We went for protection then, not against the United States farmer, but against the crows, and the protection scheme which we instituted consisted of a lot of posts put up around the corn patch, with a ribbon of basswood bark tied from post to post, and a tall dark figure in the centre, wearing last year's Sunday hat and a seedy long-tailed coat. This was the farmers' protection in the days of my boyhood, and was about as effective, though it but dimly resembled the farmers' protection scheme now. But it is hardly worth while asking what is good policy for the farmers, for the Minister of Finance has abdicated his functions as the controller of our tariff. I used to assert this during the discussions on the tariff legislation of last session. I used to say as item after item came up that it must have been prepared by the special trade which it was intended to benefit. My assertion was pooh-pooed at the time; I was told that the items were framed by the Finance Minister himself. But I hold in my hand positive proof that the assertion was well founded—that the Minister of Finance neither made nor revised our tariffs, that he was only the mouthpiece of an oligarchy, a Venetian Council of Ten who dictated the terms on which the tariff must be framed. I have in my hand the organ of the combines, called "The Canadian Manufacturer," bearing date March 1st, which contains a report of the annual meeting of the Manufacturers' Association on the 27th of February, from which I shall read a few extracts to show that the combines framed the tariff, and not the Minister of Finance or any other member of the Government. The president, in his address, began by referring to the history of the Manufacturers' Association which is co-eval with the existence of the National Policy. He said it had gone on :

With but one single object in view, and that to exert all its influence to maintain and uphold that financial policy of the Government that would in all Canadian industrial enterprises give the home market to the home producer, that would encourage the investment of capital in workshops and factories, and that would give diversified employment to Canadian labour ;

And so forth. The Manufacturers' Association is, then, distinctly for the purpose of maintaining a protective policy, according to the statement of the president of that association. Now, as to the method in which the Manufacturers' Association think that the tariff should be framed, I will give you a quotation to prove that they do not think anybody else should interfere with them in what they consider ought to be done in that regard :

It may be that our present system is not perfect—perfection is not attained in this life—and no doubt many manufacturers feel that it would be to their advantage if certain changes were made in the tariff ; but we do not usually call in quacks as medical advisers when we are ill, neither do we consult with our enemies on important business matters ; and it would not be wise to ask the enemies of protection to correct any incongruities that may exist in the tariff.

In other words, the president of the Manufacturers' Association maintains that nobody but the manufacturers themselves should have a voice in correcting, as he calls it, the incongruities of that tariff. He goes on to refer to the dangers that were passed during the year—the outbreaks of free trade feeling here and there, the death of Sir John Thompson, &c., and then says :

It is comforting to know, however, that in this country there are always those who are able to assume any duties that may devolve upon them ; and although we will long deplore the loss of Sir John Thompson, we congratulate ourselves that in Sir Mackenzie Bowell we have a Premier who is in close touch and sympathy with us, and in whose hands our interests will be safe. We are assured by him and by his colleagues in the Government, that in the future, as in the past, protection to Canadian industries will be the inscription upon the banner under which they will fight the political battles of the country.

Here is something new to the country at large. Here is a fact that the Premier and the Government, who are supposed to represent, and act for, the whole people, have been giving, on the sly, special assurances to the Manufacturers' Association as to their conduct regarding protection. I claim that this is unconstitutional servility on the part of the Minister and his Cabinet. Then the secretary made his report and gave a history of the association's efforts for the last year. He takes care to say a good word for the present Minister of Trade and Commerce. He said :

Some anxiety may be felt that Sir Mackenzie being no longer Minister of Trade and Commerce, efforts to promote the export trade of Canada may not be as active and efficient as under his regime. But there is no cause for such anxiety. As Premier, he will be none the less interested in the matter, and we are assured that the new Minister in that department, Hon. Mr. Ives, will push it, and do as much for it as the most enthusiastic could desire.

They are satisfied with their new Minister. They say he is a pretty good boy, and, at all events, Sir Mackenzie Bowell will look after him and see that he does his duty. Then the secretary tells us how this revision of the tariff came about last year, and to this I would call special attention :

At the time of the last annual meeting of this association, the Finance Minister and the House of Commons were struggling in the revision of the tariff. There had been a fierce and unreasoning demand for such a revision as would, if carried out, have amounted to a revolution ; and it required the best generalship on the part of Mr. Foster and his protectionist colleagues and supporters to withstand the onsets of the free trade enemy. On March 27, the House, sitting in Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Foster introduced his Tariff Bill, which instantly became operative.

Now, we are coming to the point. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, how much that first draft of the Tariff Bill was changed :

Quite a number of amendments were, from time to time, made to this bill, and before its final passage on July 26, it became modified to an extent that gives much satisfaction to the country—certainly to the friends of the Government.

By friends of the Government he naturally wishes us to understand the combines. He goes on to show how these modifications took place :

The Tariff Committee of the association, in the discharge of their duty, and in accord with the usage of this association, entered upon a close and careful examination of all matters brought before it by members of the association relating to the tariff. The situation at that time was critical. An excitement, amounting to a furore, had been worked up by the enemies of protection, and some who had previously declared themselves staunch adherents of the National Policy weakened. It was evident, however, that some changes in the tariff were imperative, and that if they were not inaugurated by the friends of protection, the Government could not survive, and that the enemies of protection would accede to power.

The secretary confesses that if the Government had not made some prudent changes in the tariff it would have been beaten, and this free trade party, which hon. gentlemen opposite say has no power or influence in the country, would have come in and controlled the tariff. The combines saw the case more clearly, than hon. gentlemen opposite. The secretary continues :

It was under these circumstances that the Tariff Committee entered upon their labours, having the counsel and assistance of many of the most experienced members of the association, the result of which was the embodiment of their views in a communication to the Finance Minister, which elicited from him a kindly letter, in which he alluded to it as a well-prepared brief in which all the matters therein discussed had been done full justice.

A well-prepared brief, Mr. Speaker. Who gets the brief? The counsel for one side or the other in a case. What does the counsel get along with the brief? A fee, and a counsel never touches a brief unless there is a fee mentioned in it. It is not possible for me to say what form the fee took in this case—whether it was a promise of money or subscription towards the approaching elections or general support and influence during the elections. But you may be sure, Sir, that when the Minister of Finance took a brief from the combines, he took a fee of some kind or the promise of a fee. The secretary continues :

Perhaps it might be going too far to even surmise the effect these recommendations of your Tariff Committee to the Minister may have had in the final arrangement of the tariff ; but it is but an act of justice to the committee to direct attention to the large number of changes that were made in the tariff along the lines suggested in the recommendations, and that in many instances the language used in both are substantially identical. This is particularly noticeable as regards the iron schedule, the duties upon textiles, the duties upon drugs, chemicals, alcoholic preparations, &c., as well as upon an extended list of miscellaneous articles.

There we have a complete charge. It was not a tariff committee of the Government which drew up these revisions of the tariff, but the tariff committee of the Manufacturers' Association. They made a brief for the Minister of Finance, and they sent it to him by letter. They did more. They sent a deputation after it, to which I will call your attention in a moment. The Minister of Finance not only accepted their suggestions, but accepted their statements of their views verbatim, and put on the statutes exactly what this committee of combines directed him to put on. Then the secretary proceeds :

On February 14, 1894, a largely attended joint meeting of the Tariff and Executive Committees of this association, and of other members, was held in this office, Mr. R. W. Elliot presiding. The meeting was called to take final action on all such tariff matters as had been previously submitted to the association, the business having been previously arranged and prepared for consideration. The brief, as prepared by the secretary, was accepted and adopted as expressing the views of the association, and the secretary was instructed to present the same to the Minister of Finance.

The brief was presented to the Hon. Mr. Foster, at Ottawa, on February 26, 1894. You will remember, Sir, that immediately after 26th February, 1894, the Finance Minister began to eat up his first propositions and to substitute the ones forced upon him by his masters. In view of the state of things, in view of the complete abdication of their functions by the hon. gentleman and his colleagues, the words used by the leader of the Opposition in a speech at Montreal, in which he said that emancipation was the first issue before the people were not a bit too strong. Here we have a class of combines against whom one member of the Government directed a bill a few years ago, but which bill seems to have utterly failed in its object. The Finance Minister takes their brief; he does what they tell him to do, and their will becomes law. I say, Sir, that he is the slave of the combines; I say that the combines who, by means of what is called the National Policy collect taxation for their own pockets instead of for the public treasury, are in the position of the publicans of old in the Roman Empire, who paid large sums yearly into the treasury for the privilege of collecting as much taxes as they could from the people of the different provinces. And these publicans when mentioned in the scriptures, were classed with the sinners. They were not our friends who sold strong drink, but those who paid for the right of taxing the people of the provinces. They were classed with the sinners and properly so, and I class this same sort of people with the sinners to-day. The alliance between the combines and the high tariff Government is an alliance between the publicans and sinners, an alliance as much to be reprehended to-day as it was in the time of our Saviour. I cannot read through all the interesting matter in this report without occupying too much time; but there is one delicious sentence which I think I must read to you, in which the association speaks in the true tone of royalty encouraging deserving subjects, where they are speaking of the new Premier. The association passed a resolution including these words in the way of congratulation, and I ask hon. members to note the royal tone in which they express their pleasure with and their approval of a good and faithful servant. They say:

It is due to him, as head of the Dominion Government, as it is our pleasure that this association should declare and make known to him our entire confidence in his ability to manage the affairs of this country, and that management will be along the lines that he has so closely followed for so many years. And we hereby assure him that in the administration of the great trust that is reposed in him he will have the most cordial support of this association.

I do not think that anything more impudent was ever sown broadcast throughout this country than the language I have read out of this report, in its calm assumption of authority over the Government, and its lofty approval of well behaved members of the administration whom it can trust to carry out its behests. I am sure, Sir, that the publication of this, which is evidently intended to act as an advertisement in the interest of the combines, is really the first gun of the great salvo of artillery that shall blow them out of existence. The reading of these extracts from the report has taken more time than I intended to occupy, and I beg the pardon of the House for detaining hon. members so long. But the extracts I have read indicate, I believe, a condition of affairs of serious, grave, and I might almost say vital importance to the people of this country. I think it is absolutely essential that they should be placed on record in the debates of this House, so that the people may see to what degree of impudence and arrogance our new rulers have attained, how fully they control the Government of the day and how servilely the latter act in regard to them. I thank hon. members for the indulgence with which they have listened to me.

ADJOURNMENT—EXPORT OF CATTLE.

Mr. McMULLEN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. LAURIER. Before the motion is carried, I desire to call the attention of the Government to a matter of some urgency. I refer to certain changes in connection with the cattle trade. Two or three years ago, if I remember correctly, a departmental regulation was issued with regard to the space to be allowed on steamers carrying cattle. The space then ordered was a minimum of 2 feet 8 inches for each animal. That has been the regulation in force from that time up to the present. I am informed to-day by the cattle breeders that this regulation has been altered by the Government, and that the space has been reduced to 2 feet 6 inches, which, as I am informed by men in the trade, is altogether insufficient. I call the attention of the Government at once to this matter. I do not know that the Government is prepared at this moment to give an answer on this point, the Minister of Agriculture not being a member of this House. But I call attention to the change which, as I am informed, is injurious to the trade and ought to be remedied at once, and, if the old order is not restored I will call attention to the matter to-morrow after the hon. gentleman has had an opportunity to consult his colleague the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I can give my hon. friend the information he wishes with regard to this matter. It is true as he has said that last year the space was fixed at 2 feet 8 inches, and that this year, on representation, it is proposed to fix the space at 2 feet 6 inches on the upper deck, the space below being the same as last year. I understand that it is the same space as is allowed on vessels which go from American ports, and the object was to enable steamboat owners to carry as large and consequently as paying a freight as possible, but at the same time under the impression that the cattle upon the upper deck would not be at all injured, so that both interests would be conserved. The cattle men have made and are making their representations. They are here to-day and are being heard by the members of the Government who have this matter in charge, and I have no doubt at all that satisfactory arrangements will be come to in a very short time.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 9.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 23rd April, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House, that the Clerk of the House had received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, a certificate of the election and return

Of the Hon. Walter Humphries Montague, for the Electoral District of Haldimand.

SAFETY OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES.

Mr. MACLEAN (York) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 13) to promote the safety of railway employees. He said: The object of this Bill is, in the first place, to protect railway employees, by making a law that after the year 1900, every train shall be provided with automatic brakes and with couplers which shall not necessitate the men passing between the cars. It also provides for the protection of the general public, to this extent—that every conductor must have had five years' experience as a brakeman and every engine-driver five years' experience as a fireman. I might add that similar legislation has been introduced in many of the States of the Union and almost universally adopted, and that this Bill is presented by me at the request of the railway employees of the country as represented by the various brotherhoods.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Hon. Walter Humphries Montague, member for the Electoral District of Haldimand, introduced by Mr. Patterson (Huron) and Mr. Marshall.

Mr. FOSTER.

THE CATTLE REGULATIONS.

Mr. LAURIER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would claim all the attention of the leader of the House to the subject I brought up yesterday—the regulations with regard to the cattle trade. I understood from the hon. gentleman yesterday that negotiations were now going on between the Government and the representatives of the cattle trade. If my information is correct, nothing has been concluded so far. Now, this is a question upon which there cannot be any delay. The time has come for the shipping of cattle and it is important that the trade should know at once what the regulations are to be. As I understood, the regulations which have been in force for some years have not caused any complaint, but have been quite satisfactory to the shippers of cattle. But now, without notice, so far as I know, the change which I referred to yesterday has been made. It is most important that any action to be taken by the Government should be taken at once, so that shippers may know whether the present regulations are to be maintained or not. As this matter is important to other members than myself, I will move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. FEATHERSTON. When this question was before the House last night, I understood the leader of the House to say that the same space had been adopted as was allowed in shipping from American ports. The American cattle are shipped in a space of 2 feet 6 inches on deck, I believe, as compared with a space of 2 feet 8 inches allowed on vessels from Canadian ports. The reason the Americans can afford to ship their cattle in a space of 2 feet 6 inches is that their cattle are more hardy and stronger on their legs than ours are, because they are fed outside the stable and in the fields and have daily exercise, which enables them to grow more muscle than cattle fed in stable. The American cattle are, therefore, stronger for the sea voyage than our cattle, which are left in the stable for six months in the winter season. I think that in justice to the trade the shippers should be allowed the space allowed to us a few years ago. Since the embargo was placed upon cattle in Great Britain, we have not been able to ship small cattle as formerly. We are, therefore, shipping larger cattle, and that is an additional reason why we require larger space for our cattle going from Montreal and Quebec. The season will commence in a few days, and there are a great number of good cattle this year. If these should be crowded in a small space, it will be very injurious to the trade. The reduction of 2 inches in space which has been asked for, means an increase of about 6½ per cent in shipping capacity. That, taken on a basis of say 40 shillings, with 6½ per cent added, would be about 42 shillings and 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., or let us say for practical purposes, 42s. 6d. I think business men would rather pay the additional 2 shillings and 6 pence for the larger space than ship in the smaller space at existing rates. The additional cost is nothing as compared with the safety of the cattle and the advantage they would have in the larger space. Therefore, I hope the Government will see fit to retain the regulation instead of reducing the space, as proposed. At any rate, I trust the Government will allow 2 feet 8 inches for the earlier shipping months of the season. No doubt, there will be some heavier cattle coming forward in the fall season, but we shall really require a larger space for the spring season. It is impossible to do without the larger space even on deck, to which, I understand, the proposed new regulation is confined.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I think, Mr. Speaker, that this is rather an unusual way to get information asked for across the floor of the House. The leader of the Opposition drew the attention of the House to this matter yesterday, and he was promised that the matter should receive immediate attention and that he would be informed. It was hardly necessary, I think—though, of course, it was the right of the hon. gentleman—to move the adjournment of the House and open a debate on a subject which requires no debate at all. I think the hon. gentleman will agree with me in this, when I state that I met a large deputation of the cattlemen of the country and discussed the matter with them, and when I tell the hon. gentleman that the whole matter is settled—

Mr. LAURIER. Settled in what way?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Settled so that the old regulations remain. In view of the strong representations made by these gentlemen that no changes should be made, the old regulations will stand. I think this should be quite satisfactory to the hon. gentleman and his friends.

Mr. LAURIER. If the old regulations remain and the new ones are cancelled, I am quite satisfied.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the anxiety of the Opposition is hardly warranted by the facts. When the deputation was here yesterday, I had the pleasure of introducing it to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who agreed to take up the matter immediately. I understood that the leader of the Opposition was informed that it would be dealt with immediately, and that information would be given at the earliest possible moment of what the Government would do. There was no delay nor desire for delay on the part of the Minister or the Government, and the fact that the matter was dealt with within twenty-four hours from the time the deputation interviewed the Minister is sufficient proof that there was no undue delay shown by the Government.

Mr. MULOCK. There is also another view of the case. A deputation of the cattlemen some years ago waited upon a committee of the Government and presented arguments which resulted in the passing of an Order in Council allowing enlarged space. The subject was brought up after due notice to the vesselmen and the cattlemen, and after arguments were made by all the parties interested a decision was arrived at. Now we learn that the Government, on an ex parte case made by the vessel owners, decided to revoke the decision which was come to after the hearing of arguments on both sides; and if I am rightly informed, the Government passed an Order in Council or gave a decision revoking their judgment of four years ago. Now, I protest against such hasty action interfering with one of the most important interests of the country, an action instigated by one of the parties alone to the question. The duty of the Government, when the vesselmen made a complaint, was to have summoned the other interests before them, before proceeding to disturb trade and thus produce want of confidence in the stability of the arrangement, and force a deputation to come down here in order to protect their interests. While I commend the Government for retracing its steps, I hope the Government will not again forget what is due to both interests before arriving at a judgment. I commend it for its repentance but condemn it for its rashness in the first instance.

Motion withdrawn.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Bennett for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in answer to his Speech from the Throne.

Mr. McMULLEN. I had no intention of occupying at all the time of the House in this debate, and were it not for some remarks made by hon. gentlemen opposite on matters contained in the Address, I should not now, Mr. Speaker, ask your indulgence. I shall not detain the House by any lengthy reference to the first part of the Address dealing with the loss this country has sustained by the death of two very able men who formerly had seats in our midst. After all that has been said, I need only express my regret at the great loss we have sustained and my sympathy with those to whom death has caused a loss that is indeed irreparable. With regard to the condition of the country at present as shown by the great depression that exists—a depression which is admitted in the Address—we are in the very unpleasant position of having to meet a very large deficit. We have been accustomed to seeing hon. gentlemen opposite coming forward at the opening of each Parliament and exulting with mock bravado over our country's financial condition. But to-day they have to sing a different tune. The Minister of Finance has been forced to admit that a very serious deficit is now staring us in the face. But, he says, that while from 1874 to 1878 a deficit followed increased taxation, from 1894 to 1895, the deficit follows a reduction in taxes. But, Mr. Speaker, the very small reduction which has been made in the taxes of the country is no excuse whatever for the enormous deficit we have to meet. As the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has shown, all the reduction that has been made amounts to one-tenth of 1 per cent. That is the insignificant result which follows the many days and weeks we spent in the revision of the tariff. That is the miserable outcome of the expressed determination of the Minister to make very considerable reductions. We all know how, by the time the tariff was finally got through committee, the anticipated and promised reductions vanished into very thin air, and our taxation stood at almost the original amount at which it stood before we touched the tariff at all. It was a repetition of the mountain in labour producing a mouse. When therefore the Minister of Finance attributes the deficit of this year to the reduction in taxation, he is simply repeating his old game of trying to impose on the credulity of the people. The deficit is unquestionably the result of the general depression, and for that depression the Government is to a large extent responsible. We have had in this country a saturnalia of about fifteen years of political profligacy. Year after year we have gone on enormously increasing the public expenditure and swelling the annual drain upon the resources of our Dominion, until we have reached that point when, with an expenditure of between $36,000,000 and $37,000,000 a year on a population of not yet five millions, even the Finance Minister finds himself compelled to call a halt. Last year the hon. gentleman promised to apply the pruning-knife. He said it would be his duty, as it would be the duty of any wise and prudent house-keeper, when he found that income was being reduced, to reduce proportionally the annual export. Well, we looked, and looked very patiently and wistfully, for the reductions he had promised, but they never made their appearance. Now, I want to remind the hon. Minister of Finance, and I think this is the proper time to do it, that in face of the very considerable deficit we have got to deal with this year, we shall expect considerable reductions when the estimates come down. We want him distinctly to understand that if he is going to ask Her Majesty's loyal Opposition—and we are here, Mr. Speaker, to discharge the duties devolving upon us—if he is going to ask us to consent to the passage of items of a very objectionable and extravagant character such as we have had to discuss and pass in this House in past sessions, he is going to have many weary nights in getting them through this Chamber. We have got a deficit that we are just as anxious to provide for as the Minister of Finance, and now before he issues his estimates is the time to apply the pruning-knife, and if he will apply it vigorously, and cut off all these items of expenditure that the country can well do without, he will realize the advantage of doing so in getting these estimates through the House. My hon. friend, I dare say, is not too robust at any time, his physical strength and bodily appearance are not of that character that would enable him to bear, day in and day out, and week in and week out, the torture and annoyance of fighting estimates in committee. Well, Sir, if he will take my advice and now apply the pruning-knife, and cut off unnecessary items, he will realize the advantage of doing it, and if he does not do it, he may expect that his bodily appearance will hardly be able to cast a shadow by the time he has got them all through this House, if he intends to ask us to consent to such estimates as he has presented to us in the past. Now, Sir, I am one of those who take an active part in the criticism of the public expenditure, and I give him this notice in advance, so that he may be prepared. We want no more grants to Caraqueite railways and Tay canals, we want no more grants of $2,000 a year to High Commissioners in London to feed and wine the lords of London at the cost of this country. We want these items all taken off, and I warn the Minister of Finance that now is the time to do it, and if he wants to escape long and tedious sittings night after night, he had better eliminate from the estimates, when he brings them down, all these objectionable items—

Mr. FOSTER. That is in the nature of a threat.

Mr. McMULLEN—and then we will try and assist him, and in this way we will help him to provide for the enormous deficit. I know very well, that economy is something that hon. gentlemen opposite know very little about. I know that they have not been accustomed to practice that peculiar feature in conducting our public affairs. I have heard the man who now stands at the head of the Government say that on any occasion he would rather justify an increase of $100 than to defend a reduction of $5. I know they have practiced that principle for a great many years. The Minister of Finance says that he expects they have bridged the last deficit we shall see, he hopes we will not have any more. We are so accustomed to such utterances from hon. gentlemen opposite, that we are unwilling to accept almost any of their forecasts. We know perfectly well what they promised us as a result of the National Policy, at its inception. We know very well that we were promised that there would be no more business depression, we were to stop the exodus, we were to turn the balance of trade in our favour, we were to tax British goods less than foreign goods, we were to give to the farmers a home market, to develop our mineral wealth, to attain reciprocity with the United States, to reduce the debt $100,000,000 by the year 1890, and to place 1,000,000 of people in the North-west. Now these are some of the things we were promised in the inception of the National Policy. We have not realized one of them, not a single one have the people of this country realized. Now, Sir, we contend that in view of the failure of all these promises, it is time we should turn over a new leaf and to commence a system of economy, economy in every department. The people of this country are paying about $3,500,000 per year to the inside and outside Civil Service. I think that if the Minister of Finance will go over that list he will find a great many men whose principal work is to draw their monthly salary and endorse their cheques. Now we can dispense with the services of all these men. I think that he can, if he is so disposed, apply the pruning-knife in a great many directions, and cut off many expenses that are now burdensome and unnecessary. You can abolish a large amount of the expenses connected with the Mounted Police, with the feeding of the Indians, with the host of officials in the North-west, with the Land Board at Winnipeg, and with many other things east and west, north and south; there is plenty of room. But I know that it will be a hard matter for the Minister of Finance to get his friends to consent to the necessary reductions, for the simple reason that a great many of them are directly or indirectly related to a number of officials that are now drawing salaries. It is not a pleasant thing to ask his followers to assist him in cutting off the heads of these people, and stopping their drain upon the Dominion treasury; but, Sir, it has got to be done, and if the hon. gentlemen opposite do not do it, they will find that this country will demand that it should be done by some other Government. Now, Sir, I notice in the Speech from the Throne something with regard to Australian trade. The Government have been making efforts in the direction of working up an Australian trade; they have subsidized a steamship company to carry on trade between those colonies and Canada. I would like to know in what line, or in what way, the financial condition of the most depressed portion of the people of this Dominion is to be improved by an Australian trade. I have no doubt that the manufacturers of this country might possibly reap some advantage, but what advantage will the farmers of this country reap by the Australian trade? Why, Sir, I believe that at the present time such supplies as frozen mutton, and beef, and many other things that will come into keen competition with the products of the farmers of this country, have been imported from Australia and entered for consumption in Victoria, B.C. I do not see how these things are going to benefit the farmers of this country. I do not think that it is at all possible for the Government to benefit the farming community of this country by an Australian trade. I cannot understand how it is to be done. There are some matters to which the Address should have made reference but which it does not contain. A Royal Commission has been sitting on the question of temperance and the use and the abuse of alcoholic drink, and although it has cost a great deal of money to the country, the Speech from the Throne does not contain a single word with regard to the intention of the Government respecting the report, or even an intimation as to the date when it is likely to be laid before Parliament. That Commission was issued for the purpose of deferring the consideration of the subject, in order that the Government might not be called upon to deal with it. The Minister of Finance during the early period of his life and when he entered Parliament delivered very strong speeches in behalf of temperance, but from the time he became installed in office until the present he has stabled that particular horse with which he made such a successful entry in public life, which he used in securing a constituency and a seat in Parliament, and that horse has not been saddled by him since that time. Although the Commission has sat on the temperance question, that important matter has been deferred, year after year, and probably it will be again deferred, and, indeed, it is not likely that we shall hear very much about it during the present session of Parliament. An hon. friend reminds me of the adoption of the French Treaty. That appears to have been a step in the wrong direction, and certainly the people did not expect that by the passage of any treaty with a foreign country facilities would be provided for increased consumption of light wines such as are produced and exported by France. Thus it appears we have been retrograding rather than progressing in this respect. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), in the course of his remarks yesterday, appeared to be very anxious to obtain an expression of opinion from the leader of the Opposition regarding the Manitoba school question. He said he was willing to sit at his feet and learn; he evidently wanted to go to the school of the leader of the Opposition. Not only so, but he desired all the members of the Government to go and sit at the feet of the leader of the Opposition and learn from him. I quite admit that the hon. member for Assiniboia would do well to sit at the feet of somebody and learn, for he certainly requires to be schooled, and no doubt he would like to see members of the Government schooled. I desire to say to members of the Government, by way of encouragement, that when the leader of the Opposition opens his school on the Manitoba school question he will admit all the members of the Government as his pupils; but I am afraid that, instead of being fed with taffy, he will punish them with scorpions. The hon. member for Assiniboia also drew attention to what he considered was apparent gratification on the part of the Opposition over the present deficit. I assure the hon. gentleman that we regret very sincerely that the country has to meet an enormous deficit this year, and our regret is as sincere as that felt by hon. gentlemen opposite. We feel as much interest in the general well-being and prosperity of the Dominion as do hon. gentlemen who happen to occupy the Treasury benches, and we earnestly hope that this will be the last year of the deficits, although we are very much afraid it will not prove the case, judging by the reduction in values, falling off in exports, and absence of public works, the construction of which, during the past ten or fifteen years have given considerable employment. The Minister of Finance stated that the time for borrowing had virtually come to an end, and that our debt had reached the highest point. That does not appear to have been the case. Our debt to-day stands higher than at any previous period of the country's history, and the interest which the people are called upon to pay is also a greater amount. Yesterday the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) offered to the House a statement in reference to the per capita interest. That hon. gentleman, however, is not a very skilful actuary, and, judging from past experience, I never can accept financial statements submitted by him, and, on the present occasion, I desire to point out that he has made a very serious mistake. The hon. gentleman stated that the increase in interest was only 18 cents per head. If he will take up the Year-Book, the figures in which must be accepted as accurate, he will find that the statistics do not support his view of the question. During the last year of the Mackenzie Administration, the per capita rate was $1.58. Let the hon. gentleman turn to the Public Accounts for last year and he will find that the amount of interest paid was a little over $9,000,000. He is well aware that, according to the last census, our population was not quite five millions. Making the division, he will obtain a result of about $1.80 per head. If you make the deduction there is a balance of 22 cents in place of 18 cents; and that does not even make up the balance of interest. So the hon. gentleman was quite inaccurate in the statement he presented in regard to the per capita interest. With regard to the references made by the hon. gentleman to Mr. Sifton, I desire to say that I do not wish to justify the action taken by all members of Provincial Cabinets. Those public men, as a rule, are capable of defending themselves, and, no doubt, Mr. Sifton will take an early opportunity to measure political swords with the hon. member for Assiniboia, and give him a castigation such as the Attorney General for Manitoba doubtless considers he deserves. While the hon. member was finding fault with Mr. Sifton for giving away the secrets of his Government, or, at all events, stating what the Government were going to do with respect to the Manitoba school question, he should also have pointed out how the Minister of Public Works of this Dominion went down into his own province and declared before the electors of Verchères that if the Government did not give remedial legislation, he would resign his seat and leave the Government. The public press so stated; if that report is not true, I am willing to allow the hon. Minister to deny it. Thus the Minister virtually threatened the Government of which he is a member, that if they did not adopt a certain course he would resign. Was not that as important action as that taken by Mr. Sifton with respect to the action which the Manitoba Government would take on the school question? I consider that this country never in its history more needed a master-hand to guide it than it does to-day. Where are the men to take the place of the master-hands who have guided the ship of state of Canada in the past? Where are the men to take the places of the Macdonalds, the Tilleyes, the Howes, the Camerons, and the Abbotts? We have none. We have before us to-day virtually a Cabinet of political infants, men but of yesterday, men who have not had any extended experience in banking or commercial life to prepare them for the onerous duties they are called upon to perform. I admit that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) promised to be a funnel to some of them, and to try and infuse brains and wisdom into them, but I am much afraid that the source is so exhausted that the funnel is no longer of any use. I do not think that the hon. gentleman can possibly hope to perform that duty any longer. I ask, in all earnestness, if ever there was a period in the history of this country when a master-hand is required to handle the affairs of Canada, is it not at the present time? We have not in the Cabinet a man of such business training as would enable him to grapple with the national difficulties that our people find staring them in the face. The Minister of Finance himself was never brought up to a commercial life. He performed the important duty of teaching the young the rule of three for a number of years, and he also took an active part in delivering temperance lectures, but that is his only qualification to enable him to discharge the duties of a Finance Minister. Let us look at the Minister of Justice. If there is any office in this country that should be filled by a man to whom the Bar and Judiciary of his country would look to as able to uphold that position, it should be that of the Minister of Justice. He should not be surpassed by any man at the Bar of this country. I would like to ask if the Bar of this country is prepared to look up to the present Minister of Justice as a man whose standing at the Bar, and whose extended experience and training has fitted him to occupy his position? I say that there are dozens and dozens of men in this country who are better fitted for the position, and who ought to be asked to assume its responsibilities, rather than to have it occupied by such a young man, almost a beardless boy, I might say. Then, if you go along and consider the other members of the Cabinet. There are a few of them that I shall not refer to. I do not wish to be personal, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McMULLEN. I admit that I have had to deal personally with some of the Ministers, but I am not going to follow up that line. It is out of respect that I refrain, because if I dealt with the rest of them it would be considerably worse than in the cases of those I have mentioned. In my humble opinion, the country at the present time is not served by men of experience outside of the political arena. I am sorry, for the sake of Canada, that this is the fact, because I believe that it would be better for us if we had men of ability filling those positions.

An hon. MEMBER. And honesty.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes, and honesty. We want honesty above everything else. We have had a reign of dishonesty that has blackened the pages of this country for the last fifteen years, and we earnestly hope that we have seen the end of it, but we are not sure. We had the Curran bridge investigated last year, and we may possibly have another. I am very glad to see that the Minister of Public Works is evidently enjoying my remarks; but possibly before the Public Accounts will be got through, he may hear of something that may cause another turn to his pleasantry, and he won't feel so genial. We have already some little hints of what is brewing, and it may possibly come out. We hope it may come out all right, for we do not wish to frighten the Minister of Public Works, but he had better be prepared. We do hope that we have seen the end of these scandals and disgraces. We want no more Curran bridges, and public expenditures by which the people of this country have been robbed and plundered. They cannot stand that thing any longer. Now is the time for the Government to commence in the matter of general reductions of expenditure. I hope the Minister of Finance will see to it that before his Estimates are brought down he will have them in such a shape that we can endorse them, and that we will not have the prolonged fight which usually takes place when he asks us to pass items that are not intended for the public good. I warn the Minister of Finance that if he asks the members of the Opposition in this House to consent to such items of expenditure as he has proposed in years past, we will fight them to the bitter end before we vote for them.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask the indulgence of the House to give an explanation. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) charged me with an inaccuracy, and he referred me to the Year-Book. The Year-Book is here, and it was from the Year-Book I took my information. The net interest paid per year, according to the Year-Book, was $1.58, and the net interest paid per head, according to the Year-Book in 1893, was $1.74. That is what I said. I think that my hon. friend was calculating on the gross debt, and not to the net debt.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Speaker, if you will allow me to correct my hon. friend, I might tell him that I referred to the Public Accounts of this year, and surely he must have heard me make that statement. If he will turn to the Public Accounts of this year he will see that I am right.

Mr. DAVIN. You referred me to the Year-Book.

Mr. McMULLEN. I referred you to the Year-Book for the amount of interest that was paid when the Mackenzie Government was in power. I referred to the Public Accounts of this year for the interest paid this year, and if my hon. friend will turn up the Public Accounts he will find that the net interest is $9,000,000.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. member, addressing me, said: "If you refer to the Year-Book you will find it to be so and so;" and I appeal to my hon. friends who listened to him if that is not the case?

Mr. McCARTHY. I think, Mr. Speaker, there would be sufficient justification for this debate, unusual as it is in our proceedings, from the fact alone of the time at which the House has been summoned. I am not here to dispute in the slightest degree that the Parliament has been summoned within the year provided by the constitution, and the Minister of Finance in that respect was right when he argued, in answer to the hon. the leader of the Opposition, that there had been no breach of the constitution. But in another sense, and in the more proper sense of the term, I venture to say that there has been a very flagrant disregard of that unwritten law and that unwritten rule which requires the meeting of Parliament at a convenient season. I have looked through the Votes and Proceedings for the purpose of ascertaining at what time and at what period the House has assembled during the last twenty years, and I think it will be found that this is the result. Commencing with the year 1875, the House has met once in the preceding December—that is to say, twice in one year, that was the time of the Pacific Railway contract—five times in the month of January, eleven times in the month of February, once in the month of March, and twice in the month of April; and on these occasions on which the House has been called as late as the month of April there have been elections—once in 1887, and again in 1891. So that in the majority of instances we have met some time in February, and the struggle of late years has been to try to have our meeting in January. This is the first time, without an election, and without any cause or reason so far as we know, that the House has been called as late as the time at which we are now assembled. Now, Sir, this is a matter to which we ought to call the attention of Parliament, and upon which Parliament ought to pronounce, because it is the only means by which the Executive can be checked. It is not a party matter at all. It is not a matter which calls for remonstrance simply from a party point of view, and I should be surprised if there are not members on both sides of the House who will protest against the calling of Parliament at a season so inconvenient, not merely to the great body of the members, but to those of the public at large who have business to attend to at the parliamentary session. The unwritten rule of our constitution, the elasticity which makes it preferable in our judgment to the American system, must be fairly and reasonably worked out, or great and irreparable injury may follow. Now, what justification—because some justification is necessary—has been offered by the leader of the House for the delay in calling Parliament? I have read—for I had not the opportunity of being present—the speech of the hon. Finance Minister and the excuses which he offered to the House for this very extraordinary delay in the convening of this assembly; and what are those excuses? First, the hon. gentleman referred to the unfortunate and lamented death of the late Prime Minister, and the disorganization which necessarily followed that event. Well, Sir, we know that that unfor-fortunate occurrence happened during the early half of December; we know that the present Administration was formed within a few days afterwards; and we know that while technically it was a new Government, it was not new in any other sense. It had the same policy, and the same men with the exception of the leader, were in their places; and I am unable to understand why that change of administration, such as it was, should have delayed the calling of the House together beyond the ordinary time. It appears to me to be a lame excuse, and one which on its face is not entitled to any great weight. The hon. gentleman put forward other causes for delay. The next cause, if I understood the argument, was this—that the Manitoba question was before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, that the judgment in that matter was not rendered until the 29th of January, that it did not reach Canada until the 19th of February, that the matter had to be argued and determined before Parliament could be assembled, that that determination was not made until the 19th of March, and that, immediately upon that determination being arrived at, the House was summoned. Well, I am unable to understand on what principle it was absolutely essential or in any way necessary that this Manitoba question should be determined before the meeting of Parliament. I should like to have something more than the mere statement to show why it was so imperative that this question which has been standing for three or four years, should be determined absolutely before Parliament could be assembled. It could have stood for another year, I think, without any inconvenience to anybody. It would have been far better, I think, for the matter to have stood over than that the legislature of Manitoba should have been summoned here on nine days' notice. The notice was telegraphed, I think, on the 19th, and the Government of Manitoba were called upon to appear here before the Bar of the Privy Council on the 26th. The shortness of that notice, together with the fact that the Manitoba legislature was then in session, and the further fact that the leading Minister in that legislature was on a sick bed and that it was therefore impossible for his Government to give the subject the consideration that was desirable, should in all decency have required the matter to stand; and I am unable for my part to accept in the slightest degree as a valid excuse the alleged necessity of settling the Manitoba school question. The third reason was still weaker than the other two: that was, the negotiations with regard to Newfoundland, as they were not terminated or even commenced before the time that Parliament was summoned. Therefore, that should hardly be put forward as a cause of delay. Bearing in mind everything we know—that everything pointed not to a session, but to an election, and that not merely Opposition but Government candidates were being nominated all over the country—we cannot close our eyes to the fact that this holding of a session was an afterthought—why, we do not yet know. There are various contradictory stories. We are told that the Minister of Justice resigned, or threatened resignation, because of the calling of Parliament. We are told again that that is not so. We are told that the object of a session was to enact the legislation which the remedial order had foreshadowed. Again that is denied. So that we are left completely in the dark as to what is really the reason. But it does appear to me that it is proper for us to call attention to this matter, and to let the Government understand that they cannot postpone the assembling of Parliament to suit their party interests and party exigencies, without remonstrance from the people whose interests we here represent. Now, Sir, we sometimes have to go away from home to get news; there is no doubt about that; and I find in the London "Times" perhaps a more honest and truthful account of what goes on here in Ottawa than is given in the party press which the Minister of Justice has discounted and disclaimed in very strong language, if properly reported. I find in the London "Times" of the 23rd of March this report, cabled from Ottawa by a correspondent who is said to be in very close communication with the First Minister:

Both political parties are astonished at the decision of the Ministry to summon Parliament on April 18. Preparations for a general election were actually proceeding, conventions were being held, candidates were being nominated, and an extra staff of printers were at work at the Government Printing Bureau setting up the register, the revision of which was completed on March 1. It now appears that there is no necessity for pushing on the preparations. Up to Tuesday everything pointed to a general election, but the growing feeling of Ontario against interference in Manitoba school affairs undoubtedly led the Government to defer its appeal to the country.

I also find the following communication to the "Times" of the 27th of March:

Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper has resigned. The announcement has caused great excitement in the city, and strong hopes are expressed that he may reconsider his decision, as, with the exception of the Hon. Mr. Foster, Minister of Finance, he is regarded as the ablest member of the Ministry. He considers an appeal to the country to be the proper constitutional course at present.

And on the 30th March, I find the statement in the "Times" that the differences have been reconciled between him and the First Minister, that a cordial understanding has been arrived at between Sir Mackenzie Bowell and Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper and the latter has withdrawn his resignation. Taking all these statements together, either the Ottawa liar must be the correspondent of the London "Times," or there must be some foundation for the statements communicated—and communicated apparently in good faith, for there was no reason to mislead and there is nothing to mislead in these statements—to that great newspaper. Therefore, on the whole, I beg to say, speaking for myself, that it does appear to me that the delay this session has been wholly unjustifiable and unwarranted. Looking back over the last twenty sessions, the average duration of Parliament has been one hundred days and over. We know that the supplies ought to be voted by the 1st of July. Are we expected to rush things through? or are we called here to do anything? Taking the ordinary average session, we will be here until the 1st of August—long into the summer months. Is there any good reason for this? Is there even any pretense of reason at all in the excuse offered for this extraordinary delay? Has it come to this, that everything we do is done, not with a view to the advancement of the country's interest, not out of any consideration for the welfare of the country, but simply to advance party ends? Has it come to this that not merely are our elections delayed, as we know they are, with the warrants lying in the hands of the Clerk in Chancery for months and months, because the Minister will not name a returning officer and will not appoint a day for the elections until every preparation is made in the constituency, but that even the summoning of Parliament is delayed from month to month in order to suit party ends and exigencies? I think this House will be wanting in dignity and in the respect it owes to itself, if it does not let the Administration understand perfectly that there are rights which cannot be disregarded by any Government and that one of them is that Parliament ought to be summoned, in ordinary circumstances, at a convenient season for the members and the public who have business to discharge. Another matter to which I desire to draw attention is one that has occupied a good deal of time in this debate already, and in entering on it I desire the House to understand that I do not propose by any means to consider the question in all its bearings, but I think it important at this stage to let it be understood clearly here, and I hope elsewhere, what the true bearings of the Manitoba school question are. I was not surprised so much, at least in the constituency where I have been recently campaigning, at the misrepresentations that were made there. I was not astonished that upon the one side the people were told that the remedial order which had been passed by the Government was nothing more than an order passed in obedience to the mandate of Her Majesty. In other words, that it was merely handing on to Manitoba the decision and the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. That was hardly a fair way of putting it before the electors, but after all one was not so much surprised at that as to find in this House the misapprehension which seems to prevail on the part of the hon. gentlemen who have addressed us. It has, I confess, caused me some astonishment, and I hope I will be able to point out that their view is certainly not warranted or justified by anything to be found in the language or terms of the remedial order. My hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), who addressed this House in a very able speech—and I am glad to have that to say of my young friend whom I have known from his boyhood—pointed out in the course of his very able address that all the Government had done and all that perhaps, I suppose, according to that doctrine, it proposed to do, was to hand over the case to the Government of Manitoba; and he went on to utter the fervent hope that the question would disappear from the arena of federal politics and that the province of Manitoba would arrange amicably the rights or privileges of the minority in respect of the matters complained of and which the Privy Council said had been affected. Now that was somewhat the view presented on behalf of my hon. friend, the Secretary of State, in the contest just closed—that the Government were not responsible for the decision; that they were not responsible for their actions; that they had simply handed on to Manitoba the judgment of the Privy Council, and that it was to be hoped that the Legislature of Manitoba would settle that matter amicably, and cause it to disappear from federal politics. Well, I pass from him to the hon. leader of the Opposition. My hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, in his address seemed to be surprised at the language of the Speech from the Throne in which it was said the Government had come to a decision. My hon. friend went on to say that he had read the order pretty carefully and that he could hardly call it a decision. It was simply an invitation to the Government of Manitoba to deal with the question, leaving it to them to apply a remedy to the evil which had been created by their own legislation. The invitation unfortunately was not couched, my hon. friend went on to say, in very pleasant language. My hon. friend, the leader of the House, then followed, and we have another view from him as to the meaning of it. And the view he put forward was this:

What is the case to-day, he asks. That subject is manumitted to the Legislature of Manitoba. Call it dictatorial, call it nerveless, look upon it as you please, it is simply this: A decision of the law; and, if there is a request implied, it is a request implied by courtesy to the better powers which Manitoba has, as compared with this Parliament, to settle the question.

That is the interpretation of the hon. gentleman who leads the House. It is a decision of law, and accompanying that decision of law is the request implied that Manitoba, with the better powers which undoubtedly her legislature has than has this Parliament for settling that question, will deal with it. Then further on, the hon. gentleman went on to say:

Until the ninth of May, when the decision of the Manitoba Government may be come to, and the legislature may be convened to hear it, let Manitoba think over that matter with as little passion and as free from strife and bitterness as possible, let her come to her conclusions, and until that day comes and those conclusions are formulated, I am bound to maintain, as I hope, that she will do her own work as she best can do, and that she will find the way for making smooth these waters, which are now rough and troubled.

Lastly, I will trouble the House with a reference to the statement made by the Minister of Justice, which is more frank, more in accordance with the truth, if I may say so—I am not, of course, implying that the other hon. gentlemen did not say what they thought to be true—but more in accordance with the facts than the views put forward by the other gentlemen to whom I have referred.

Following strictly the lines of the statute, the order had to be in a sense dictatorial, but in no offensive sense. It had to make a direction. It had to state clearly and precisely what was required to be done, in the opinion of His Excellency the Governor General in Council; and any one having experience with the orders of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England will find that, so far as that dictatorial spirit is concerned, all of those orders possess it. It is the language of judgment; it is the technical spirit and nothing more.

Now, which of these definitions is correct? Is it, in the first place, a decision? Is it merely handing over to Manitoba a judgment pronounced by the Judicial Committee? Is it a request courteously conveyed to Manitoba to improve her legislation and to amend her law, or is it a judgment, harsh as judgments must be, because they are technical, and commanding Manitoba to carry out and obey the direction of the Governor General in Council here? Sir, it will be my business, if I can, to make it plain to this House. Now, in the first place, there cannot be any greater misunderstanding than to treat the judgment of the Privy Council as a decree or order to the Governor General, or to this Parliament, or to the Manitoba Legislature. We must not forget, Sir, that the opinion that has been offered by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, is an opinion which was sought from the Supreme Court of the Dominion of Canada. The Government were authorized by an Act passed by this Parliament not very long ago, to obtain for the information of the Government—and, if my hon. friends would look at the statute, they will find that that is the language of the Act, as it was the language of Mr. Blake's resolution, "for the information of the Government,"—the opinion of the Supreme Court upon any question of law or fact. In this case there was no question of fact submitted to the Supreme Court. There were questions of law; and these were submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada, with the view of obtaining from that tribunal information as to their meaning and interpretation; but only for the information of the Governor General in Council. It will not be forgotten by hon. gentlemen who heard the first discussion on that subject—I mean when Mr. Blake introduced his resolution—that Sir John Macdonald, in the very clearest language, declared that he would not be any party to handing over to the court any of the powers or responsibilities which rest upon our Government, according to the principles of responsible government; but that, if it was merely for the information of the Executive, who should still be responsible for their acts, who should be perfectly justified in rejecting the opinion of the Supreme Court or of the Judicial Committee, if they saw fit, then, believer as he was in responsible government, he was willing to accept the principle of the resolution which Mr. Blake proposed. I will read Sir John Macdonald's words:

When I first read the hon. gentleman's resolution hastily it occurred to me, as I daresay it occurred to many hon. gentlemen who hear me now, that it was an advance towards the American system and proposed to transfer the responsibility of the Ministry of the day to a judicial tribunal; but on scanning the resolution in its carefully prepared terms, that impression was dissipated, and I saw that the principal object of the resolution, as I read it, is that the question submitted by the Executive to the judicial tribunal should be enforced, sustained and presented to Parliament, to the public and to the Crown by the fact of this legal decision having been given. * * * * * Of course my hon. friend in his resolution has guarded against the supposition that such a decision is binding on the Executive. It is expressly stated that such a decision is only for the information of the Government.

Now, these were the words of Sir John Macdonald with reference to the resolution, and, if my hon. friends will consult the Act of Parliament, they will find that that Act which was passed in the following session, and in which the language of the resolution was closely adhered to, provides that questions may be submitted to the judicial tribunal for the information of the Executive Government. Sir John proceeded:

The Executive is not relieved from any responsibility because of any answer being given by the tribunal. If the Executive were to be relieved of any responsibility I should consider that a fatal blot in the proposition of my hon. friend. I believe in responsible government; I believe in the responsibility of the Executive. But the answer of the tribunal will be simply for the information of the Government. The Government may dissent from that decision, and it may be their duty to do so, if they differ from the conclusion to which the court has come. * * * I do not think there can be any doubt as to the meaning of the motion of my hon. friend. I think it is so explicit in its terms that no questions can arise as to what its meaning is, and if there were any doubt as to its meaning—there are none in my own mind—those doubts would be removed by the lucid speech of my hon. friend. That speech is of record in the Hansard.

So that, even upon the dry question of law, which the Act of Parliament authorizes the Government to submit to the court, Sir John Macdonald pointed out, and clearly pointed out, that the Government would not be relieved from any responsibility by following the opinion of the court; and that they would be perfectly justified in rejecting, if they thought fit to do so, that opinion even upon the dry question of law which the court might give in answer to questions submitted. Now, Sir, I am not here to make objection at this time—or at any time, for that matter—to the opinion arrived at by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. But what I desire to express, and to make as clear as I possibly can, is that the matter arose in this way: The appeal being presented, or the application being made, to the Governor in Council, under the Manitoba Act, that the Government were authorized and empowered, and they availed themselves of that authority, to obtain from the court an answer to this important question of law, whether there was ground for the appeal as a matter of law, and whether the complaint, assuming that to be true which was stated in the petition, would justify interference by the Governor in Council. The answer to this question could, in no sense, be looked upon as an order from the court which this Government or this Parliament was bound to obey. Sir, we have not got to that yet, and I trust we are not likely to get to it, that this great Canadian Parliament is subject to the direction of any court of law, and our system of responsible government has not yet become so effete that the Government of this country can pretend that they are bound to obey the order of any court of law. There is no court of law can order the Government of this country to do anything. There is no court of law which the Government of this country is bound to obey. I am not meaning to say that they are not bound to obey the law—we are bound. But they are not, in any sense, amenable to any court of law; no order can be obtained against them to compel them to perform any functions. What they do, is done as responsible Ministers of the Crown, responsible to this House for all they do; and it is an attempt to shield themselves from that responsibility, as it appears to me, which has induced them to resort to this theory of the judgment of the Privy Council. The question went from the Supreme Court to the Privy Council, but the answer that is given is of no more binding effect or authority than if it had been given by the Supreme Court of Canada, the Privy Council merely determining that the Supreme Court of Canada ought to have decided the questions in the manner in which the Privy Council has answered them. In other words, they gave the judgment or opinion in answer to these questions which they say the Supreme Court of Canada ought to have given; and the direction, therefore, is that the judgment, or the answers to the questions given by the Supreme Court of Canada, should be corrected and amended in accordance with the opinion of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Now, Sir, how can that be treated? You ask for an opinion and you get your answer. You are at liberty, according to the very highest authority we had, to accept or reject that opinion, and then you do it under the responsibility which we all know and we all believe in as a part of the responsibility that the Executive owe to this Parliament. How, then, can it be pretended that the answers to any of these questions are a command, in any sense or in any way, which the Government of this country were bound to obey? I am free to say that under that decision on a point of law the Government were justified in entertaining the appeal; I am free to say that, in my judgment, after that full discussion that the case underwent, whether the conclusion is right, or whether the conclusion is wrong, the Government, at all events, ought not to be blamed, and I, for my part, do not hold them responsible or blameworthy because they have exercised the jurisdiction which, under the circumstances, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council thought they possessed. My complaint is, that in exercising that jurisdiction they had just as much right to reject the petition as they had to allow it, just as much right to determine against the prayer of the petition as in favour of it; and that for what they did they are responsible, not judicially responsible, but they are responsible as the Executive of this country to the Parliament of this country, and, ultimately, to the people, whose representatives we are. Now, Sir, what are the terms of the order? The terms are to be found in the blue-book which has been distributed, and we may reject all but the last two pages of that blue-book, pages 26 and 27, the report of the Committee to His Excellency the Governor General, dated 19th March, giving the reasons which induced the Government to make this order. But the order itself is to be found on these two pages at the end, pages 26 and 27, and it is so plain, it is so technically plain—it has been drawn with the greatest possible care, it has been drawn and framed upon the pattern of the decisions of the Judicial Committee itself—that there can be no mistake at all as to what it means and what it says. What does it say? It says: "At the Government House, at Ottawa, Thursday, 21st March, 1895. Present: His Excellency the Governor General." Now, if we go back a few pages in this same blue-book, we will find how exact the copy has been, because we find: "Imperial Order in Council. At the Court at Osborne House, Isle of Wight, the 2nd day of February, 1895. Present: The Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, Lord President, the Marquis of Ripon," and so on. Here we have present His Excellency the Governor General, the Hon. Mackenzie Bowell, and all his colleagues who were present on the occasion, I think all being present except Sir Frank Smith, and the late Minister of Militia, whose name I do not see amongst the other Privy Councillors in this list. Now, what is stated here? It is stated here in the first place that the petition was presented, setting forth the terms of that petition. That petition complained that by these statutes that were passed in 1890, setting forth what they were, the effect of these Acts was to repeal the previous Acts of the province of Manitoba in relation to education, and to deprive the Roman Catholic minority of the rights and privileges which it had acquired under such previous statutes; and by the said petition the said Roman Catholic minority pray, among other things:

That it might be declared that the said last-mentioned Acts did affect the rights and privileges of the said Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education; that it might be declared that to His Excellency the Governor General in Council it seems requisite that the provisions of the statutes in force in the province of Manitoba, prior to the passage of said Acts, should be re-enacted, in so far, at least, as may be necessary to secure to the Roman Catholics in the said province the right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support their schools in the manner provided for by said statutes.

In other words, that the separate school system, introduced in 1871, should be restored.

To secure to them their proportionate share of any grant made out of the public funds for the purposes of education, and to relieve such members of the Roman Catholic Church as contribute to Roman Catholic schools, from all payment or contribution to the support of any other schools; or that the said Acts of 1890 should be so modified or amended as to effect such purposes; and that such further or other declaration or order might be made as to His Excellency the Governor General in Council should, under the circumstances, seem proper.

Then it goes on to recite that on the 26th February, the time appointed for hearing, the matter was heard, the petition was read, and the statutes were referred to. Argument was adduced on both sides, and then it goes on:

His Excellency the Governor General in Council has been pleased to order and adjudge, and it is hereby ordered and adjudged, that the said appeal be, and the same is hereby allowed.

Now, I wonder that my hon. friend who leads the Opposition, doubted that that was a decision. Here we have the recital of the petition, we have the further statement that the matter came on to be heard, that it was heard, and that after the hearing of it:

His Excellency the Governor General in Council was pleased to order and adjudge, and it is hereby ordered and adjudged, that the said appeal be, and the same is hereby allowed, in so far as it relates to rights acquired by the said Roman Catholic minority under legislation of the province of Manitoba, passed subsequently to the union of that province with the Dominion of Canada, and His Excellency the Governor in Council was pleased to adjudge and declare, and it is hereby adjudged and declared, that by the two Acts passed by the legislature of the province of Manitoba on the 1st day of May, 1890—

the rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic minority of the said province in relation to education, prior to the 1st day of May, 1890, have been affected by depriving the Roman Catholic minority of the following rights and privileges, which, previous to and until the 1st day of May, 1890, such minority had, viz. :—

(a) The right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support Roman Catholic schools in the manner provided for by the said statutes which were repealed by the two Acts of 1890, as aforesaid.

Now, I ask the attention of the House to the terms of that order, and then we will, by and by, be able to see with what grace the Minister who leads this House asks us to believe that the Legislature of Manitoba had been invited courteously to settle this matter. The declaration is that the rights of the minority were affected, inasmuch as they were deprived of that which they enjoyed before, the rights to build, maintain, manage, equip, conduct and support Roman Catholic schools in the manner provided for by the said statutes which were repealed :

(b) The right to share proportionately in any grant made out of the public funds for the purposes of education.

(c) The right of exemption of such Roman Catholics as contribute to Roman Catholic schools, from all payment or contribution to the support of any other schools.

Now, these were the rights that were interfered with. The order is in these words :

And His Excellency the Governor General was further pleased to declare and decide, and it is hereby declared that it seems requisite—

These are the very words of the statute—

—that the system of education embodied in the two Acts of 1890 aforesaid shall be supplemented by a Provincial Act or Acts which shall restore to the Roman Catholic minority the said rights and privileges of which such minority has been so deprived as aforesaid, and which will modify the said Acts of 1890, so far and so far only as may be necessary to give effect to the provisions restoring the rights and privileges in paragraphs (a), (b), (c), hereinbefore mentioned.

Whereof the Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Manitoba for the time being, and the legislature of the said province, and all persons whom it may concern, are to take notice and govern themselves accordingly.

Is there any possible doubt as to the meaning of that order? Is there a shadow of doubt resting on the mind of any hon. member that the Government, assuming judicial functions—and that is a matter not of so much importance, the form of the Order makes very little difference—has declared, in substance, which no doubt is perfectly true, that the Roman Catholic minority, by the Act of 1890, were deprived of those rights, and that the legislature is now required to restore those rights by the passage of an Act or Acts to supplement the Act of 1890. Now, what is the meaning of it all? What does the leader of the House mean, and what does the hon. gentleman who moved the Address mean by hoping that Manitoba will settle the question? Manitoba has no discretion. Manitoba is commanded to do so and so—you do not leave to the legislature the least discretion. The legislature is ordered and commanded to pass remedial legislation, to restore the school system of 1870, and although it is to be an Act, and although according to the forms it will have to be read a first, second and third time, the legislature has from its introduction until the passage of it to confine itself within the limits of the Order, and there is no discretion allowed. Anything short of that would not obey the Order; anything beyond that would be ultra vires so far as the Order is concerned. All the difference in the world is there between that and passing it over to the legislature, which, if it is the opinion of the Executive here that separate schools ought to be restored, might well have been done. If the Government of the country arrive at the conclusion that the separate school system was better for Manitoba or better in any case, that might have been passed on, to use the words of the hon. gentleman who moved the Address, as the opinion of this Executive to the legislature of Manitoba, and Manitoba with that warning might have taken such a course as to the province seemed fit. But that has not been the course adopted. The Order reached here, we are told, on the 19th, I think, if the report is correct; but before it reached here, on the 16th, the celebrated Council was held on Saturday, being that date. Everybody supposed that the sitting was to decide whether there was to be a session or a dissolution; but when the Council rose Manitoba was summoned by telegraph to appear on the 26th and show cause why a remedial order should not be passed. Formal notice to that effect was sent. So the Government had apparently made up its mind. And is there any doubt, reading what fell from the Minister of Public Works, who has come to be the leading spirit in the Cabinet, who dominates, governs and controls and issues his manifestos, and appears to have obtained the upper hand, that the Government then determined that this remedial order should be passed, and the only question left in abeyance, and that was not apparent to the outside world, was whether a session was to be held immediately afterwards and remedial legislation passed. So far as the Order goes, I am not dealing now, nor do I propose to deal, with its merits; there will be other opportunities before long for dealing with the question of merits, and I am not going to point out why the Order should not have been made, but I am dealing simply with the question of the position in which the passing of the Order has left the province, and that the object and purpose of the Order was to direct Manitoba, without allowing any power of discretion to the province, to restore the school system as it existed, and on disobedience of this order it will, I dare say, be found that this Parliament has only power to implement the terms of the remedial order. What were the terms of the school system of 1871? What was this system which this Government, going even beyond what Mr. Ewart, who appeared for the Catholic minority, asked, desires to restore? Has any man's voice ever been raised in its defence? Has any argument been uttered in support of that system? Hon. members will read by and by when the papers are brought down, Mr. Ewart's argument on behalf of the Catholic minority, and I venture to say that neither he nor any other man has ventured to utter a single word in favour of the Manitoba school system as it existed between 1871 and 1890. What was it? The system of education in the province was the appointment of a school board, the division of that school board into two sections, Protestant and Catholic, the handing over to each of those sections its proportionate share of public money; and beyond the fact that the salary of the Superintendent of Education was the subject of an Order in Council from the Lieutenant-Governor, absolutely all control over education was handed over to those different sections. There were no regulations, no control over the curriculum, no control of any kind; and when you compare the separate school system of Ontario with that which existed in Manitoba the differences are so great that the systems can hardly be compared. In Ontario it is provided that under the Minister of Education regulations shall be made, that books shall be selected and that more or less throughout the whole system of education the matter is subject to the control of the Minister, and again in the same way subject, of course, to the control of the legislature of the province. Again, it is absolutely forbidden in Manitoba that a Protestant shall contribute to a Catholic school or a Catholic to a Protestant school. What happens in places where there are not enough children to establish two schools? You cannot have either. We in the older provinces have no conception of the schools in that country. It was stated, and I give it as an example, that it was recently proposed by the Government of Manitoba to deprive all schools which had not an average attendance of eight children from a share of the public grant, and that is since the Act of 1890; and upon inquiry being made it was found that out of 750 schools 150 would be deprived of their share of the public grant if that law went into force. Divide up that grant and you render the system impossible. So it is proposed to restore a school system in which the public money was handed over to sections, there being no control over it in the slightest degree, a system under which no taxation could be levied on a Protestant to contribute to a Catholic school, or a Catholic to a Protestant school, and the result was almost appalling, for it was found that in Manitoba large sections of the population were practically growing up in absolute ignorance. But that is the system which is to be restored. It is not the separate school system, it is not merely to re-establish separate schools, but to introduce separate schools which are not to be subject to control. But the legislature of Manitoba are by suitable acts to hand over to the separate school section the power to maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support Catholic schools in the manner provided for by the statutes which were repealed. And then we are told: You have given a discretion to the province of Manitoba as to how she is to adjust and regulate her school affairs so as not to leave this question in federal politics. Now, Sir, I have pointed out—and I do not propose to take up the time of the House at this stage with doing more than pointing out—I have pointed out exactly how this matter stands, and I want to emphasize it if I can, that this Government, sitting here as a quasi-judicial body—assuming or pretending, couching their orders in the language of a judicial body as the Committee of the Privy Council is—have directed the legislature of the province to restore the system which I have only very faintly outlined exactly as it was in the manner provided by these Acts, and that the legislature—if any person will take the statute and look at it,—the legislature has either to obey, in which case of course the school system of 1871 will be restored, or to disobey, and in that event this Parliament will be called upon to pass the legislation required to give effect to the remedial order. I have now, Sir, only to make one observation with regard to my friend Mr. Sifton, whose conduct in coming down here and taking part in the election in Haldimand has been animadverted upon by more than one member. If I read rightly the speech of the hon. gentleman who leads this House, he called it an outrage. I did not hear last night the speech from my hon. friend from Assiniboia

(Mr. Davin), but I believe he criticised it in pretty severe terms also. Well, Sir, I would like to know in what sense or in what respect Mr. Sifton is worthy of these severe condemnations because of his interference in the Haldimand election. Is it because that he is a Minister of a local government? If so, what do we say about the Hon. Mr. Pelletier, who took a most prominent part in the election at Verchères.

An hon. MEMBER. And Casgrain.

Another hon. MEMBER. And Beaubien.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And Sir Leonard Tilley in the local elections in Ontario years ago.

Mr. FOSTER. They are not parallel cases at all.

Mr. McCARTHY. I want to know why. Will my hon. friend tell me in what respect they are not parallel?

Mr. FOSTER. In one case the Minister was part of a body which has to give a decision on the question; in the other case he was not.

Mr. McCARTHY. Then I understand the distinction and I am glad to know it. Then there is no wrong in it because he was simply a Minister. As a citizen of Canada, I suppose he had a perfect right to appear in any electoral contest?

Mr. FOSTER. A perfect right.

Mr. McCARTHY. A perfect right, yes. As a Minister of a local government he was not disqualified, but my hon. friend says he was disqualified because he is a member of the legislature of Manitoba, which has not yet given its decision.

Mr. COSTIGAN. And which has asked for time to consider its decision.

Mr. McCARTHY. I take the additional statement made by the Minister of Marine; and has asked time to give its decision. On what principle does that disqualify him? He is not pretending, as these hon. gentlemen did here, that they are sitting in Manitoba as a judicial body. While this Cabinet was pretending that, the hon. Minister of Public Works went down to St. Hyacinthe and advanced his argument and announced that if that judgment was not given which has been given he would abandon the Government and retire from the Ministry. Surely that was far more reprehensible than the case of a gentleman who is not pretending to be a judicial officer, who is pretending only to be a member of the Government as he is, and a member of a legislative body which he belongs to.

Mr. OUIMET. Perhaps the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) would read what I have said, so as not to mislead, or at all events to give a wrong impression.

Mr. McCARTHY. I will do that with great pleasure. I will read exactly what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ouimet) said, for I think I have it here. I find, on looking through my notes, that unfortunately I have not it here—I am sorry for that, because I think it would bear out all I say. My recollection of it is—not pretending to give the exact words—that the hon. gentleman declared at St. Hyacinthe that the Government were a unit on the subject of carrying out the law and the constitution.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McCARTHY. Wait, I am not done. And he declared, that the Government proposed to carry out this matter by its remedial order, and that if that order was not passed, he for one would know what his course was and that he would resign.

Mr. DUPONT. No. I was there, and that is not so.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am only speaking from recollection, and I do not pretend to give the very words, but I think I have given in substance what the hon. gentleman said.

Mr. OUIMET. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I am glad to hear the denial of the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont), who was present, and who heard every word I said on that occasion.

Mr. McCARTHY. What were the words the hon. gentleman did say?

Mr. OUIMET. You read them during your argument before the Committee of the Privy Council, and they do not bear out what you are saying now.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think they do. Now, Sir, I do not suppose that that would make very much difference, because if Mr. Sifton was guilty of an impropriety, I would not stand here to justify it because the Minister of Public Works was guilty of another impropriety. I point out further that Mr. Sifton does not pretend to be holding any judicial position, and again I want to know why Mr. Sifton should not take part in that election. Mr. Sifton has made up his mind as a member of the Government, without meeting the legislature, as he had a perfect right to do, and he announces as a member of the Government, with the concurrence of his colleagues, that they do not—so far as they have any power over the legislature—they do not propose to obey the remedial order. Having made up his mind to that, I think my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) will withdraw the statement that it was an outrage for Mr. Sifton to come down and take part in the contest. If Mr. Sifton is not able to get the legislative body to go with him his duty will be to resign, but so far as he is concerned his mind is made up. He did not require to cogitate over this subject from the time the order reached Manitoba until the 9th day of May. The adjournment for that long date, as he tells me, was simply for the convenience of members who are mostly farmers and who desire to attend to their business before the reassembling of the legislature.

Mr. FOSTER. What meant his quest for legal advice.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not know that he made any quest for legal advice, nor does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) know that he ever made any quest for legal advice. All I can say is : that he announced publicly—and I think that is since confirmed by Mr. Greenway—that the determination of the Government of Manitoba was as a government, to advise the legislature not to obey that order and, under these circumstances, he was perfectly justified. Now, he would be justified under any circumstances in coming down to Haldimand and asking the electors of Haldimand to take such action as would prevent interference with the affairs of Manitoba by the Federal Parliament. I am glad, therefore, to feel now, after that statement, that any reflection on Mr. Sifton must be withdrawn. He had as much right as any other citizen in the country to take part in the contest, he did it openly and above-board, and I think that if any Minister of the Crown representing a legislative body was ever justified in coming to a constituency, certainly it was a member of the Government of Manitoba on a matter of this kind. His speeches have been very largely quoted, and I think it will be found that in them not a solitary reference was made to the general politics of the country. It is perfectly well known that Mr. Sifton is a Liberal. He has been a Liberal all his life. I dare say that, like other Liberals, he is at variance with the Government here on very many public questions. But he was most careful in everything he said to confine his arguments to the appeal made on behalf of Manitoba to the people of Ontario; and, although not successful in Haldimand, I trust and believe that that appeal will be found to be successful elsewhere. Mr. Sifton's statements have been boldly and openly made, and they are uncontradicted, in regard to the lamentable state of things which existed in Manitoba, and which compelled the legislature of that province to introduce the system of schools now in force there; and I think it would be an extraordinary thing indeed if any other legislative body should be found to attempt to control or interfere with it.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I need not assure the House that I have no intention of answering the hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. McCarthy) by any constitutional argument on this subject, to meet the arguments put forward by him. In rising at present I simply ask permission of the House, and of you, Mr. Speaker, to deal for a few moments with the subject from another point of view entirely—first, because I do not think that the line which the hon. member has followed was at all a proper line to take; and, secondly, because I do not think we have reached the stage when we are called upon to discuss the subject at any great length. I may say at the outset that while many of the speakers who have taken part in this debate have alluded to the reference made to this subject in the Speech from the Throne as one calculated to create strife and enmity in this country, there is one consolation to every old member in this House—yes, and a consolation to every Canadian in this country who feels that he is represented in this Parliament—that this Parliament has time and again given proof of its ability to deal with the most delicate questions, and to deal with them in the most intelligent and satisfactory manner. We have had occasion before to discuss subjects which were calculated to create divisions and dissensions in our country that would have had consequences very serious to its peace, and I am sure that every member of this House will agree with me, on looking back at the record of those discussions, that those of us who have taken part in them can congratulate it upon the tone and the dignity that this Parliament has exhibited on all such occasions. Therefore, Sir, I feel confident that the remarks which I offer to-day will be received by my fellow-members in the spirit in which I intend to deliver them. In the first place, I deny the right or the propriety of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) making the appeal which he has made in this House and in the country on the question of separate schools as against common schools, because that question has not arisen. The whole question with which this Parliament has been or may be called to deal, the question with which the courts and the Privy Council have been called to deal, is not whether separate schools are to be established in Manitoba or not. They could not deal with such a question; they were not clothed with the power to deal with it. The whole question was: Have any rights under the constitution under which we live been taken away from any minority? And what has been the answer? The highest tribunal in the Empire has declared that certain rights have been taken away from a minority in one of the provinces. This is the whole subject, and not whether separate schools are better than common schools, or whether they should be forced on the people of Manitoba or not. But I want to take issue with the hon. gentleman on another point, and a more serious one. I want to say in the name of the people for whom to some extent I have the right to speak, that it was a gross act of injustice to the Catholics of this country for the hon. member for North Simcoe, as well as certain newspapers and other prominent gentlemen, all through the time that the question has been under discussion, to inflame the public mind by trying to create the impression that the Catholics of this country have been the aggressors, and have attempted to force Catholic schools upon the country, and to interfere with provincial rights. While I do not want to discuss the question, because the time has not yet come for discussing anything beyond the remedial order that has been passed, let me say here that I fully agree with the hon. gentlemen who have preceded me in expressing the most earnest desire that the legislature of Manitoba will afford the remedy to the evil created in that legislature by its own act, and that the matter may not be brought into this Parliament at all. I will not be so unkind as to suppose for one moment that any hon. gentleman in this House would feel disappointed at such a peaceable solution of the matter. I would not do so cruel a thing to any public man in this country as to charge him with entertaining the hope that Manitoba might not settle this question, and that it might come here to be settled by the Dominion Parliament, with the view of creating dissatisfaction and anxiety in the country. We all trust that the remedial order, having gone to the Manitoba Legislature, will be dealt with effectually by that body. We do not all insist, as did the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House, that the remedial order places that legislature in the position that they must pay the last pound of flesh. If the hon. gentleman were in a position to say that the legislature of Manitoba had refused to take action and that this Parliament was called upon to do so—if he were in a position to say that the legislature of Manitoba had offered any fair and reasonable compromise, with the object of restoring peace and harmony, and that the minority in that province had refused such a fair and reasonable compromise, his argument might have some weight. But I say that it is most unfair and most ungenerous to charge the Catholics of this country with the responsibility of this agitation. There must be a beginning of all things, and there must be reasons for the exceptional legislation to which we are obliged to refer, and out of which this question grows. Every hon. member of this House who is familiar with the history of confederation and the circumstances under which confederation was brought about, knows full well that it was not the Catholics of this country who insisted on this exceptional legislation. We know that as a matter of history, as a matter of record, from the discussions which took place when the whole question of the agreement and the treaty between the different parties to the confederation was under consideration. When that was being considered by the old Canadian Parliament, the Parliament of Upper and Lower Canada, what were the real facts? The Catholics did not say: You must give us certain rights and privileges and make them permanent by law or else we will not go into confederation. No; it was quite the other way. It was the Protestants, the leading men in Parliament at that time, men like the Hon. George Brown, the Hon. Mr. Holton, Sir Alexander Galt—all the prominent men at the time—who insisted, as the first condition of confederation, that the educational rights of the Protestant minority in Quebec should be protected and guaranteed. At that time the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec had certain rights, though not so extensive as those they now have. The Catholic minority in Ontario had certain rights under the Bill of 1862, but more limited than those now enjoyed by the Protestant minority in Quebec. It was then declared by all these gentlemen I have named that before confederation could take place at all, the Government must bring in a Bill dealing with the province of Quebec, and amending right there and then the school law as it then existed in that province. The Protestant leaders in Parliament were not content that the rights of the Protestant minority in Quebec as they then existed should be secured by confederation. They said: That is not enough, we want perfect and full control of educational matters for our minority in Quebec, and unless you amend the law now so as to give us that full and complete control, it will not be binding under the Act of Confederation. Therefore, that was done, and let me say to the credit of the people of Quebec, and their representative men, that no voice was raised during that discussion objecting in the slightest degree to the proposal. On the contrary, they said they were willing to give that, and any further guarantee which the minority might desire at the time. Then followed the proposition that if you gave to the minority in Quebec the protection they asked for on the educational question, why not give the same guarantee to the minority in Ontario? That was a fair proposition to make at a time when the prominent men of the country were assembled together to lay the foundations of a new nation by uniting provinces with different interests, speaking different languages, and believing different religions. The fair proposition was then made to give, on the other hand, the Catholic minority in Ontario similar rights. I am not going to find fault, I am not attempting to draw a comparison in an offensive sense between the Protestants and the Catholics at that time, but I simply state the facts as proving the position I have taken from the first—that the condition of things we have now is not chargeable to the Catholics at all, except in part, but is simply due to the movement made by the Protestants themselves to secure protection to their minority in the province of Quebec. That was agreed to in the first place by the Finance Minister, Sir Alexander Galt, when he pledged himself to it in his speech at Sherbrooke. He was questioned in the House afterwards by the Hon. Mr. Holton, who said :

The Minister of Finance, in a speech at Sherbrooke, had promised that the Government would introduce a Bill to amend the school laws of Lower Canada. The honourable gentleman must be aware that this was a question on which there was a great deal of feeling in this section of the province amongst the English-speaking, or the Protestant class, of the population. He did not like to introduce anything of a religious character into discussions of this House, but in debating the great changes which it was proposed to effect in our system of government, the effect of them upon that class to which he referred must be considered. Among that class there was no phase or feature of these threatened changes which excited so much alarm as this very question of education. Well, the Minister of Finance had said, with great solemnity, as having the authority of his colleagues for it, that this session the Government would bring down amendments to the school laws of Lower Canada, which they proposed enacting into law before a change of Government should take place, and which would become a permanent settlement of the question.

That pledge was carried out. I may quote further what the Hon. Mr. Letellier de Saint Just said, and I do this merely to show the spirit in which this proposition was met by gentlemen representing different nationalities. He said :

I have heard it said that the Protestants of Lower Canada ought to be satisfied with their prospects of the future, because we have always acted with liberality towards them. But that is no guarantee for them, for we would not content ourselves with a mere promise to act liberally, if we considered that our interest or our institutions were threatened by a majority differing in race and religion from ourselves ; and in any case that is not the way to ensure the peace of the country. If we establish this principle, we should say to the Catholics of Upper Canada that they ought to be satisfied with the lot which we provide for them. When we make a constitution, we must, in the first place, settle the political and religious questions which divide the population for whom the constitution is devised ; because it is a well-known fact, that it is religious differences which have caused the greatest troubles and the greatest difficulties which have agitated the people in days gone by.

There were no two opinions on that subject, that, in the best interests of the country these things should be settled at once, so that friction might be avoided in the future. The Quebec representatives, having conceded the Protestant minority the right to so amend the then existing law as to give them full and complete control in the matter of education in the province of Quebec, Mr. Bourassa, whom I am glad to see hale and hearty in his place to-day, moved an amendment to the effect that similar privileges should be extended to the

Mr. COSTIGAN.

Catholic minority in Ontario. That amendment was, however, lost by a very large majority. Mr. D'Arcy McGee said that the Bill of 1863, which had been carried, conveyed to the Catholics of Ontario all that they had asked for in their petition, and he, for his part, had accepted that as a finality, and therefore would not ask to open up that question again, unless special and further privileges were granted to the Protestant minority in Quebec, in which case he thought the minority in Ontario ought to be protected in exactly the same way. Well, the vote was taken, and only a small vote was given in favour of the motion of Mr. Bourassa, showing that the minority in Quebec were exceptionally well treated—not too well treated from a Quebec point of view and from a Catholic point of view, because, as I said, there was not a single dissenting voice representing that province raised against that proposition. Now, much has been said to surround this question with difficulty for the present, but only for the present, for, just as in Haldimand, when the question is understood by the intelligent people of the country, they will finally give the same answer. A great deal has been said with a view to create sympathy for the people of Manitoba, that this would be an interference with their provincial rights, that it is dictation on the part of the Federal Parliament to force separate schools upon an unwilling province, ignoring its provincial autonomy. I will not answer the constitutional argument any further than to say that if this contention were true, you would never have this judgment. The judgment of the Privy Council was surely not in favour of taking away any right from the province of Manitoba or any other province. Then you hear the appeal made that we should leave Manitoba alone to deal with this question. That is what we hope will be done. It is left in Manitoba's own hands. The question is before that province, and we trust the solution will come from there ; that this Parliament may not be forced to take a further step and do the unpleasant duty that may be forced upon it. But why all this sympathy with the province of Manitoba more than with the province of Ontario, with the province of Quebec, of New Brunswick or Nova Scotia ?—for each one of these larger provinces I have named is exactly in the same position as Manitoba, has the same rights and no more. There is no reason why Manitoba should have any more rights than was intended to be given her under the constitution, than was actually given her under the constitution, or than was actually given to the other provinces in the confederation. Just to show how inconsistent it is to carry too far this argument about giving unlimited jurisdiction to the province of Manitoba in educational questions, let us take an analogous case. It might be proper to give Manitoba unlimited power in relation to education, but this is not the time to discuss it. The constitution under which we live has been framed, and our duty is to live under it and obey it—or amend it; but not to ignore it, not to defy it, not to set it at naught. But with regard to this question of unlimited jurisdiction to each province; that has not been carried out, that is not the principle under which we live; that is not embodied in our constitution, but quite the reverse is embodied in our constitution. Not alone Manitoba has not, under that constitution, full scope in the question of education, but Quebec has not, Ontario has not, nor has New Brunswick or Nova Scotia. But that is not the only case. If there is one question beyond every other that affects a legislative body, it is the regulating of the constituencies for its own elections. No one will say that on general grounds a province should not have full control to construct and reconstruct the boundaries of its electoral division for representation in its own provincial legislature. But there is a case where it was thought wise to depart from that rule. That was not done through conspiracy of the Catholic hierarchy, nor through undue influence from Rome, nor at the bidding of Catholic electors, but as an act of liberality by the Catholics of the great province of Quebec. When this demand was made in old Canada that the rights of the Protestant minority in Quebec should be secured, you will find that it was not only on the question of education; you will find that it was on the question of representation. And Sir John Rose said then, though he was quite sure that the minority would be perfectly safe in the hands of a majority, judging from past experience, still there was an uneasiness among the people, because it would be within the power of the provincial legislature, after confederation, to change these constituencies, so that not one single English Protestant representative would be elected for that province. The knowledge of that caused uneasiness throughout the province, and it was thought a guarantee should be given. Every member from the province of Quebec acceded to that view and said: "Yes, we will agree to any arrangement that will make our fellow-subjects perfectly safe in regard to these matters, so that there may be no feeling of uneasiness whatever. Before this was carried there was nothing in the arrangements to guarantee to the English the continuance of the rights they had, other than, as Sir John Rose said, the veto power. But Mr. Holton pointed out that that was a weak, unreliable guarantee. If the provincial legislature passed an Act so disarranging the constituencies as to deprive the Protestant minority of their representation, that Act might not be disallowed. Mr. Holton asked Sir George E. Cartier, who was then Attorney General East., if he himself would advise disallowance in that case. His answer was: Certainly; I would disallow any Act under which an injustice was done to the Protestant minority. Still that was not thought a sufficiently definite guarantee, because the power of disallowance might not be exercised, it might be found not convenient to exercise it. A more perfect guarantee was given by the arrangement of the electoral divisions under section 80 of the Confederation Act, by which twelve of these constituencies were set apart, and up to this day those twelve constituencies are there with their original boundaries, not one of which boundaries can be altered while seven of the representatives object to it in the legislature. Now, in the face of all that affecting the older provinces, how can my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) appeal in Haldimand, or in any part of the country, or in this House—and let me say I am glad that his appeal in this House is very much more moderate and on a higher level than his appeal in Haldimand—for exceptional privileges, rights and powers to be given to the province of Manitoba? I trust these remarks will be understood in the spirit in which they are given. In the first place my object is to protest against any attempt made in this House or out of it, to create disturbance in the country, by crying out that an attempt is being made to force Catholic schools upon a Protestant majority so large as that of Manitoba. I say that this exceptional legislation is a portion of our constitution; I say that if the Catholics enjoy rights, they enjoy them like other subjects; I say that Protestants have their rights specially guaranteed under the constitution in certain sections of the country; I say that for this exceptional legislation Protestants are more responsible than the Catholics; I say that if the exception had not been made in Quebec in the first instance, you would have had no guarantees of a similar kind in the other provinces. Therefore, I ask you to deal fairly, as I know the people of this country are ever ready to do, notwithstanding the efforts to mislead them and to confuse the issue by men who rejoice more in causing strife than in the peace and prosperity of their country, men who have no standing while the country is in a condition of quiet, and who only hope to succeed in the storm and whirlwind of sectarian feeling, men who sow the seed of strife and whose only activity is in sowing that seed for a bad purpose—among them some men who, in the opinion of many, were fitted for better things. Many things, Sir, make us all feel proud of the great deeds accomplished by our late chieftain, Sir John A. Macdonald. They stand as monuments to his memory, and his countrymen are proud of them. But there were some things he could not accomplish. He undertook to make a useful statesman of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). He used his influence, he used his prestige, he did everything he could to promote the interest and the welfare of his young friend at that time, but it all proved an utter failure. That hon. gentleman has disappointed the hopes of that great statesman, and he will disappoint, if he has not already done so, the hopes of his friends in this country in seeing him become a useful public man. Now, Sir, having said so much with regard to the spirit in which we should approach this question, finding that it is not a question that we can afford to deal with in a small and narrow-minded way, the duty of every hon. gentleman in this House is to approach it solemnly, honestly, and candidly, as patriotic Canadians; the duty of every hon. gentleman in this House is to remember that it must have an important bearing upon the future of this country, that it is one fraught with danger and harm, but the harm will be minimized according to the character of the debate, and the manner in which the question may be dealt with if it should come here. Therefore, I say it is the duty of every Canadian, in the first place, to know what the constitution is, what we are bound to do under that constitution; it is the duty of every Canadian in this House, on behalf of the people of this country, to establish this broad principle, that no matter whether a man is a Catholic, or a Presbyterian, or a Protestant—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Explain.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I take that as a confirmation of what I said in starting out because it shows that, having spoken nearly half an hour upon this question, I have said nothing so offensive as to prevent the House from enjoying a very hearty laugh at a little Irish slip of mine. I say that in dealing with this question we should approach it in a broad spirit, in order to establish the confidence of every citizen in this country that the constitution is strong enough to protect him in all the rights he enjoys under the constitution, and that this Parliament, and the representative men in this country of both political sides, can have no two opinions upon that subject. The constitution must be observed, all rights under that constitution must be preserved, so that every citizen in the country may feel that in our constitution he has a safeguard that no demagogueism can destroy.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER moved :

That the Address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by such Members of this House as are of the hon. the Privy Council.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. COSTIGAN.

SUPPLY.

Mr. FOSTER moved :

That this House will, on Thursday, resolve itself into committee to consider of the Supplies to be granted to Her Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. FOSTER moved :

That this House will, on Thursday next, resolve itself into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising a supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not propose to oppose the motion, but I may take the opportunity of inquiring whether the hon. gentleman expects to have the Estimates ready by Thursday.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. FOSTER moved :

That a special Committee of Seven Members be appointed to prepare and report with all convenient speed, Lists of Members to compose the Select Standing Committees ordered by the House on Thursday last, the 18th instant, to be composed of Mr. Foster, Sir Adolphe Caron, Sir Richard Cartwright, and Messieurs Costigan, Haggart, Laurier, and Mills (Bothwell).

Motion agreed to.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. FOSTER moved :

That a Select Committee be appointed to supervise the official report of the debates of this House during the present session, with power to report from time to time; the said committee to be composed of Messrs. Beau-soleil, Béchard, Cameron, Charlton, Davin, Hazen, Innes, LaRivière, Lépine, Prior, Scriver, Sonerville, Taylor, Weldon, and White (Cardwell).

Mr. LANGELIER. I hope the committee will take means to have the translation pushed forward more rapidly than it was done last year or the year previous. It was a perfect farce to keep members waiting so long for the French translation as was the case last year. The translation was not of the best, and its production was such a slow matter that the French version of the debates was practically useless to members. A considerable expense is involved in having the translation made, and if it is to be made, and we all wish this to be done, it should be carried out with such speed as to render the translation useful to the French members of the House, which was not the case during the last two years.

Mr. AMYOT. The hon. member is about the only one in the House who complains of the translation, but he has always failed to quote one phrase or sentence that is badly translated.

Mr. LANGELIER. The hon. gentleman did not understand me. I did not complain about the quality of the translation, but as to the slowness of the production of the French version. I did not say a word about the quality of the translation.

Mr. AMYOT. The translation is more quickly done and better done than at any previous period.

Motion agreed to.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY REPORT.

Mr. CHARLTON. When will the full report of the Geological Survey be laid on the Table of the House?

Mr. DALY. The annual summary report I have just laid on the Table. The completion of the annual report will depend upon the facilities afforded, and I think it will not be ready for some months.

ADJOURNMENT—HUDSON BAY RAILWAY.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the House has done a considerable amount of work in discussing the Address, and if hon. gentlemen opposite will give their assent we will not return to-night. I move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. I will take advantage of this early opportunity to call the attention of the hon. gentleman leading the House to what I consider to be a very grave subject. It was stated in the press some few weeks ago that the Government had passed an Order in Council making advances of money to the Hudson's Bay Railway Company to the sum of $2,500,000. I desire to know from the hon. gentleman if that statement is true.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot recall at this moment the exact nature of the Order in Council, but I will give the hon. gentleman exact and full information at the next sitting of the House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Has any money been paid?

Mr. FOSTER. There has been none paid.

Mr. LAURIER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will place on the Table the order itself.

Mr. FOSTER. I will give full information, certainly.

Mr. LAURIER. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman's memory has failed. This is an important matter, and yet he cannot recollect the terms of the order, and the order should be laid on the Table.

Mr. FOSTER. I will be responsible for full information.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the answer of the hon. gentleman is not at all satisfactory. Hon. members are entitled to know what are the contents of the order.

Mr. FOSTER. The House shall.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The order itself should be produced to the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 5.40 p.m.

PRAYERS.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

Mr. CHARLTON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 14) to repeal the Electoral Franchise Act and to make certain provisions in place thereof. He said: Mr. Speaker, I propose to-day, in moving the introduction of this Bill, to follow the custom of the Imperial House of Commons, and to make some remarks as to the nature of the measure. I am actuated in this course by the fact that for the last session or two it has been a matter of uncertainty whether a public Bill would be reached for second reading. This Bill was put upon the Orders among the first last session, but was not reached again. Under the rules of the House, in certain cases notices of motion are transferred from the place where they properly belong and are placed at the head of Bills and Orders; and it was owing to the operation of this rule last session that the Bill was not reached. I propose, therefore, now to enter upon a discussion of the changes which are embodied in the Bill I am about to introduce. The history of the Act which this Bill proposes to repeal is one very well known to the majority of the members of this House. The session of 1885 was convened on the 29th day of January of that year; the Franchise Bill was introduced on the 19th day of March following, and received its second reading on the 16th day of April. The objection was raised to the Bill at the time it had been introduced—that its introduction came at a stage of the session so late as to preclude a full consideration of its provisions. This objection had no weight with the Government, and the attempt was made to force the Bill through. It will be within the recollection of all who were members of the House in 1885 that one memorable sitting took place, lasting from three o'clock on Thursday until midnight of the following Saturday, and that the attempt was made by the Government to force the Bill through by tiring out the Opposition. The Government party made no pretense of defending propositions in the Bill and left the discussion of the measure entirely with the Opposition; so it became necessary for the Opposition to maintain their ground for the period intervening between three o'clock on Thursday and midnight on Saturday. Numerous attempts were afterwards made to force the Bill through. The Bill finally became law, and the House closed its session on the 20th day of July, so that the Bill was under consideration from April 16th to within a few days of July 20th. Among the propositions of the Bill, as it was first introduced, was one which gave to Indians, without reference to location, or qualification, or character, or civilization, or education, the right to vote. The Bill also gave to women the right to vote. It provided that the revising barrister should be a barrister of five years standing. No matter what his qualifications or character, simply a barrister of five years' standing would serve the purposes of the Government for the responsible position of revising barrister. And the Bill was characterized by the arbitrary power conferred in the mode of making the lists, in the mode of procedure, and in its forms and decisions.

Now, Sir, the chief reason advanced for the introduction of this measure was the desirability of having a uniform franchise throughout the Dominion. It was urged among other reasons, that the voters' qualifications in various provinces differed very widely, and that the Dominion Franchise should be of a uniform character throughout the Dominion; and that it was necessary to introduce a measure which would do away with the existing anomaly. But before the discussion on the Bill ended, and before the Bill became law, it left the qualification of voters nearly as divergent in the various provinces as they had been under the provincial laws. It gave universal suffrage in British Columbia; it gave universal suffrage in Prince Edward Island, and a franchise based upon the possession of personal property—fish nets, boats, &c.—in the other maritime provinces. So that as finally passed, it was, as I say, as widely divergent from the principle of uniformity of franchise, as the original provincial laws had been with reference to the same matter. While this Bill was under discussion, various amendments were offered and rejected. Among these, one of the most important was the proposal to leave with the people the preparation of the voters' lists through their own officers. This was rejected. Another was that no Indians should have a vote who were not enfranchised. This was rejected. Another was that no Indian not enfranchised should be put upon the voters' list without his own consent. This was rejected, and the right was reserved to put Indians upon the voters' list contrary to their wishes and without their own consent. Another amendment was that it would be preferable to use the provincial lists; another was that the county judge in each county should be the revising barrister; this also was denied. Another was that persons having votes at provincial elections should have votes at Dominion elections; another was for providing for appeals to superior courts against revising barristers' decisions. All these amendments were rejected, and the chief amendments of the Bill allowed by the Government were one providing for the punishment of Indian agents that interfered in elections; and another that judges might be revising barristers of their own judicial districts. The character of the change will be thoroughly understood by referring to the provisions of the British North America Act, in sec. 41. By the section it is provided as follows:—

Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all laws in force in the several provinces at the Union relative to the following matters, or any of them, namely:—The qualifications and disqualifications of persons to be elected or to sit or vote as members of the House of Assembly or Legislative Assembly in the several provinces, the voters at elections of such members, the oaths to be taken by voters, the returning officers, their powers and duties, the proceedings at elections, the periods during which elections may be continued, the trial of controverted elections, and proceedings incident thereto, the vacating of seats of members, and the execution of new writs in case of seats vacated otherwise than by dissolution,—shall respectively apply to elections of members to serve in the House of Commons for the same severed provinces.

Under the provisions of this sec. 41 of the British North America Act, extending over a period from 1867 to 1885, the lists provided by the provinces for the election of members to the Legislative Assembly of each province, were used as the lists for the elections for the Dominion House of Commons. Now, Sir, one would suppose, after eighteen years of practice under an arrangement for using the provincial lists, that the Government would scarcely have ventured to make a change in the arrangement without some evidence of popular disapproval, without some evidence that the plan of using provincial lists did not meet with popular favour, and was objectionable in some respects. But it never was pretended that any such popular discontent with the arrangement existed; it never was pretended that the slightest friction existed; and the introduction of this new measure on the part of the Government was purely and entirely without production of any evidence of public feeling in favour of a change. Sir, the Government ought to have been aware that the introduction of this arrangement would be likely to be productive of bad results; they ought to have been aware that in the country to the south of us, upon whose institutions our own were to a large extent founded, a country from which they have borrowed very much of their policy, such as the gerrymandering of constituencies and the National Policy—they have certainly borrowed the worst features of that Government's policy, and they ought to have given some attention to one of its best features—they ought to have known that this same principle with regard to franchise as applied to national elections, had been acted upon in the United States, and their experience in this matter was one which might have afforded to us a valuable lesson if we had been willing to profit by it. The section of the United States constitution referring to this matter of federal qualification for electors, is as follows:—

Sec. 2. The House of Representatives shall be composed of members elected by the people of the various states, and the qualification in each state shall be the qualification recognized for electors of the most numerous branch of the state legislature.

Sir, this Act was professedly copied from the constitutional convention which convened in May, 1787. The matter had been very fully considered by that convention, and various alternate propositions had been made. It had been proposed to have the members of the House of Representatives elected by the state legislature of the respective states; it had been proposed that the state legislature of the respective states should define the mode by which the members for each state were to be elected; and it had also been proposed that the system which was adopted by our own Government in 1885, the system of an electoral franchise to be fixed by the general government, should be adopted. After consideration of these four propositions, the three I have named and the one which was adopted, and after full and mature consideration, the proposition contained in the constitution, that the qualification of electors for members of Congress should be that required for the election of the most numerous branch of the state legislature in the state, was adopted. Now, this provision went into effect in 1790, it has been in operation in the United States 105 years, and it had been in operation in that country 95 years at the time this law was passed in Canada. During that 95 years there had not been the slightest friction, there had never been a whisper of a proposition to change the basis of the franchise. There never has been the slightest indication that the plan had not worked satisfactorily and well; and no man conversant with the situation of affairs in that country will for one moment claim that the introduction of a franchise law, or an electoral law, by the Congress of the United States, providing a uniform franchise for election of members of Congress and President of the United States, a separate list from the list used in the state elections, would have been workable, or would have been continued if it had been introduced into that country. Certainly our own experience in reference to the operation of this electoral franchise law is not calculated to prove that its operation is in any degree beneficial.

Now, when this confederation was formed, the first step taken was to secure the consent of the provinces. The provinces took the initial step, and that initial step is set forth in the preamble to this British North America Act:

Whereas the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have expressed their desire to be federally united in one Dominion.

That was the foundation, the basis of the arrangement, the expressed desire of the provinces that were about to enter into this arrangement; and acting upon that expressed desire, the Imperial Parliament sanctioned and ratified the arrangement with regard to the formation of this Dominion. Now, Sir, the powers possessed by this House, the powers possessed by this Government, are not inherent powers, but they are powers derived from the people, powers derived primarily from the various provinces that expressed their desire to unite in a confederation; and the entity of those provinces, their original jurisdiction, and their having, through their own volition, entered upon that arrangement, is not consistent with the assumption on the part of the Dominion Government of the powers wielded and exercised through the operation of this Franchise Act. By this British North America Act, what are the powers that were delegated to the Parliament of Canada? These powers are set forth in the 91st section of this Act. We see by this same instrument what were the powers reserved to the provinces. These powers are set forth in the 92nd section of this Act, and among the rights reserved by the provinces are rights with regard to civil affairs, are all civil rights. Now, Sir, the exercise of the franchise is a civil right, it is a right that lies at the foundation of all civil rights; and I hold that the interference on the part of the Dominion Government with the principle of the franchise, the passage of that Act which took into their own hands the power of adjusting the franchise, regulating it, settling what the qualifications should be, providing machinery by which voters should be put upon the voters' lists—I hold that the exercise of this power on the part of the Dominion Government, was a violation of that principle in our constitution which gives to the provinces control over civil rights, because the exercise of the franchise is in the highest sense a civil right. This right is one that should be controlled by the people who own it. It is not a right that should be controlled by the Government that seeks to own and control the people. This Franchise Act, therefore, is an attack upon the basic principle of provincial autonomy; it affects the principle of provincial autonomy, because it takes from the representatives of the people the power to exercise for themselves the right to say who shall be voters, what citizens shall vote for the men who are to be sent to Parliament to look after their interests, and to watch their interests in this House. It takes from them the power of exercising in its fullest sense the rights that pertain to them of having representation upon the floor of this House. It is the exercise of a power on the part of the Dominion Government that is subversive of the principle of popular sovereignty, that is subversive of the principle of popular rights; and for that reason I repeat, Sir, that the Franchise Act is an attack upon the basic principle of provincial autonomy.

Now, this Act was professedly copied from the English system. When the Bill was introduced and when reasons were urged by the Government in justification of its introduction, the chief reason put forward by its advocates was that in England they had revising barristers who revise the list and it was proper in this country to adopt the English system, that the English statutes provided who should be voters, what the qualifications of voters should be, what the provision should be in respect to placing names upon the list, with respect to appeals against placing names on the list or removing names, and what the function of the revising barrister should be, and provided the whole machinery by which the electoral lists of the country were arranged. But there was this difference between England and Canada. There was no home rule, there were no provinces there, there was no division of legislative authority between the Imperial Parliament, of different kingdoms or provinces, but there was a union of kingdoms, and power was centralized in the Imperial Parliament as it formerly was centered in united Upper and Lower Canada; and consequently the arrangement of the electoral lists in England was a power that belonged properly to the English Parliament, for there was no other power to exercise it. But the case was different in Canada. We have provinces united in creating this Dominion, we have provinces invested with certain rights that may be termed the rights of home rule, we have provinces united to exercise the functions of civil rights and through whose union this Dominion was erected; and the central Government stepped in and usurped the power that properly appertained to those provinces. I want to point out the contrast that exists between the English law, which appoints revising barristers to finally revise the list, and the Dominion law with respect to the electoral franchise. There have been many statutes passed in England in regard to the exercise of the franchise: the first was passed in the reign of William IV. in 1832, the next in 1843, next in 1865, next in 1878 and next in 1885. Under the provisions of these laws the lists are in all cases made by the overseers of the poor. Those overseers are not appointees of the Imperial Government, they are not officers who owe their appointment and position to the Crown or to a commission, but the overseers are municipal officers just as our township councillors are, and these overseers, the officers of the people, exercising their functions by virtue of the authority emanating from the people making the lists. The overseers require application to be made to them respecting names to be placed upon the list, they receive protests against names being inserted on the list or removed from the lists, they exercise their own discretion in putting names on and leaving names off the list; and after the overseers, these officers of the people, have made the preliminary list, as provided by the law with its carefully guarded provisions, that list was finally revised, not by an appointee of the Crown, but by a revising barrister, who holds office for one year, an appointee of the courts, and whose functions are strictly and entirely judicial. The character of his functions may be shown by a few quotations I shall make from the Act of 1885. That Act provides that the clerk of the peace shall issue instructions to the overseers of the poor annually as to their duties. On page 16 of chapter 15 of 48 Vic., are two precepts which are to be given by the clerk of the peace in counties or the town clerk in boroughs and cities to the overseers of the poor:

Part I. of this precept informs you generally of the persons entitled to be registered as voters, and of the meaning of the expressions used in this precept, and also as to the mode in which you are to make out and publish the lists.

Part II. gives you, in order of time, the several matters which you are required to do.

Then this Act goes on to give the overseers of the poor instructions as to notices and inquiries, instructions as to the list of voters, instructions as to the names and exceptions; and after this list has been prepared by the overseers and by them held to be a complete list, prepared by virtue of their appointment as officers of the people, it is submitted to the revising officer, who is appointed by the senior judge of assize in counties and the Lord Chief Justice at Westminster, London, in the county of Middlesex, and after this judicial revision has taken place the list is ready to use. How does this system correspond with the Dominion procedure? It does not correspond at all. We have no intervention of the municipal officers to make the list; there is no officer exercising judicial functions delegated to him by the courts. There is no point of comparison between the English and the Dominion system. How does the English compare with our provincial system? It almost exactly corresponds with the Ontario system. In Ontario we have similar functions to those exercised by the overseers of the poor performed by the municipal council. The machinery is almost identical as regards the preparation of the list. They receive applications, they hear objections, they hear claims to be placed on the list, they make a list, and they do so as officers of the people. They hold, finally, a court of revision. By power delegated to them by the people to fix the privileges that the people shall exercise, they act, and when the court of revision is held and the list is finally completed so far as the action of the municipal council is concerned, then the county judge comes in and performs the same judicial act as does the revising barrister in England, and he performs functions exclusively and purely judicial. If it is desired to follow the English precedent, we have it followed in Ontario, and substantially followed in all the other provinces, but we have not a single point of comparison between the Dominion procedure and the procedure in England. In Canada the municipal officers do not prepare the list; in England they do. In Canada the municipal officers do not manage the preliminary revision; in England they do. In Canada the municipal officers possess no authority, they exercise no function; in England the municipal officers possess all power but authority connected with the final judicial revision of the list. While the revising barrister is appointed in Canada by the Crown, while he is practically an autocrat in function and act, while there is no check from co-ordinate municipal functions or associated municipal authority, the revising barrister in England exercises judicial functions alone, and he has a check from co-ordinate municipal functions and associated municipal authority. It is more than a check; it is a primary act. This officer in Canada is appointed at the pleasure of the Crown, he holds office during the pleasure of the Crown, and he is entirely removed from all responsibility to the people. This officer in England is appointed annually, he is appointed by the senior judge of the assize, and his duties are entirely separated from the exercise of political functions. In this country the lists are printed by the Government, and in England the lists are printed by the municipal authorities. In this country there is no provision for a safeguard with regard to these lists after the final revision. After the final revision by the revising barrister, and when these lists come back to the Government printing offices at Ottawa, any kind of a fraud or scandal can be perpetrated. The lists can be stuffed at pleasure, and the only restraint placed on the Government is their own sense of modesty and their own sense of honour; not a great restriction. There is no colony in the Empire where the making of a preliminary and final revision of the voters' lists is confided to an appointee of the Crown, and there is no colony in the Empire where the printing of such lists is performed by the Crown. Here the making of the lists, the printing of the lists, and the whole machinery is under the control of the Government, and the rights of the people have been trampled upon. The principles of popular sovereignty and popular rights have not been considered at all in this matter. There are various other objections to this Franchise Act besides those I have already outlined. One objection is, that the procedure is complicated and expensive. Another reason is, that undue power rests in the hands of the revising barrister. There is no proper appeal from his decision. You can appeal from it on a question of law, but not upon a question of fact, and in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of a thousand the question arising before him is one of fact, and not of law. As to the judgment of the revising barrister on that question of fact there is no appeal, and he is practically an autocrat. Although the franchise is a popular right, belonging to the people of this country, yet they have not the slightest participation in the creation of these lists. The presence of the people is ignored, and the whole thing is placed in the hands of a minion of the Government. Another objection to this Franchise Act is, that the expenses are very great and are unnecessary, so great, indeed, that the Government have been ashamed to carry out the provisions of their own law, and have shrunk from giving us annual revisions, because of the inordinate cost. We have had three revisions since this Act passed, in 1885, and we have one nearly completed now. The three revisions that have been completed were, in 1886, 1889, and 1891, and these revisions cost the country $900,000 in round numbers. Besides this expense there was the cost of putting in the plant in the Government Bureau necessary for the printing of these lists, and there are various other items of expense not embraced in the sum I have mentioned. The elections of 1891 were held upon lists two years old. There was not an individual in Canada under twenty-three years of age who was permitted to vote in the general election. This, Mr. Speaker, is an outrage that few free people in this world would stand, and, to bring people to submit to an outrage of this kind, you want fifteen years of the process of debauching public sentiment by that class of legislation and Acts which this Government has been guilty of. Nearly all the by-elections have been held upon old lists. If we had had the coming elections at the time the Government desired to have them, we would have had them upon a list three years old. If this Government remains in power I venture to say that there will not be another revision for three or four years, and every by-election held after the next general elections will be held on antiquated lists. Then, there is another feature about it. The existence of a voters' list for provincial purposes, and the existence of a list for Dominion election purposes is confusing and perplexing to the electors. Many electors who obtain their franchise as provincial voters imagine that that is all that has to be done, and in neglecting to attend to the Dominion voters' lists they lose their votes, the precious and inestimable privilege of every freeman. I know, Mr. Speaker, that the people of the country are sick of this measure, and I venture to say that a great many of the Government supporters are sick of it also. I presume that the average cost of each revision to members of this House is not less than $400, and that is an unnecessary drain upon their resources. Then, the list is not a good list and it is not as much in accordance with the principles of popular representation and justice as are the provincial lists which are made without charge almost, and without cost. The Bill which I now propose, provides for the absolute repeal of the Dominion Franchise Law, and all its amendments, and it provides for the adoption of the provincial lists in each province. If this principle is adopted we have a provincial list which is, first of all, made by the people of each province. The qualifications to vote are established in accordance with the wants and requirements of that people. We discovered in 1885, when discussing the Franchise Act, that we could not have a uniform franchise. The condition of affairs in the provinces varies. In British Columbia and Prince Edward Island it was thought proper to have universal suffrage, and in Nova Scotia it was deemed right to give the fisherman a vote on his net and his boat. If we adopt the provincial franchise, therefore, we will adopt a franchise which is in accordance with the genius and requirements and interests of the people of the provinces. They know what their wants are and they know what their proper basis of representation should be. When they exercise the right of voting for a man to represent them in this Parliament they know who, amongst their people, are entitled to vote. This Government does not need to tell them that. Then, Sir, having adopted that provincial franchise, we have a qualification in accordance with the wants of the people of the provinces. We have a list made by the representatives of these people, and if there is anything in the creation of that list—after all the safeguards of courts of revision and hearing claims to put on, and hearing claims to put off, before municipal officers—if there is anything wrong in that list, then we have the strictly impartial, judicial revision of that list by the county judge. We would have in the provincial lists, a list greatly superior to this Dominion list, made, as it is by a creature of the Government, holding his office during the pleasure of the Government, and, presumably, supposed to serve, so far as he can, without undue stretch of his conscience, the interests of the Government. I may call attention again to the fact that the measure which I now propose is not a mere experiment. We have lived under the use of the provincial lists for Dominion elections from 1867 to 1885. We know there was no friction; we know by actual experience how the law works. We know there was no injustice; we know there was no popular discontent, and we know there was absolutely not the slightest reason for a change in the provisions of the franchise law under which we existed from 1867 to 1885. We know, also, that it worked satisfactorily. We do not talk theoretically about this matter; we appeal to the experience of the past, from 1867 to 1885, as proof of the assertions we make to-day.

Now, Mr. Speaker, why was this system adopted? What could have been the motive of the Government in changing a system that had existed for eighteen years, and that had given universal satisfaction? Why was this law introduced and forced through in the face of the greatest parliamentary fight in the history of this Dominion? Were the Government actuated by a desire to give to the people of Canada greater liberty? I fear not. Why, after providing for the creation of lists by their own creatures, did they, after the first year's experience of printing the lists in the printing offices of their party friends, bring them to their own printing office and have them printed there? And after having provided for such frauds and outrages on the people as might be perpetrated by the revising barristers, if they felt so disposed, why did they go further and provide for the wholesale stuffing of the lists, if they desired to do it, under their own supervision and without any possible check? I say, why did they do these things? Well, I think it is not unreasonable for us to assume that we know why. I think it was a gross political job. This law is one of a trio of political infamy, and it has as its brothers the gerrymander and the boodling transactions of the Government. That was the motive of the Government. I say it boldly, because I believe it to be true, that the only motive of the Government in introducing this Bill was to secure unjust political advantage. Three years before they had introduced that Yankee political cut-throat, the gerrymander, by which they gave power to a fraction more than half of the electorate of the province of Ontario to elect over three-fifths of the representatives from that province in this House. They followed that villainous act with the introduction of this law which I am now discussing, and they practised before and have practised since the system of boodling to such an extent as to make a fine art of it. Why, the Americans, although we got the gerrymander from them, could come and learn boodling from us. They have not got it to the state of perfection which it has reached in this country. There is often a manifestation of the power of the public conscience in that country. Oakes Ames was anathematized because of his connection with the Credit Mobilier frauds. Schuyler Colfax was driven from public life because it was suspected, though never proved, that he had received $1,500 from the Credit Mobilier. Boss Tweed died in prison; Boss Kane, of Brooklyn, is now in Sing Sing. Both of these men suffered for crimes that would have been condoned in Canada, where McGreevy and Connolly have been released because their health suffered from incarceration. Now, I have no doubt that the late lamented Sir John Thompson intended to purge the Government, and he set to work by casting out John Charles Rykert, and then he took McGreevy and Connolly in hand and they were sent to jail. But that gentleman found the evil so deeply seated that he saw that he might have to go further than he had expected. He was something in the position of a little Scotch boy in a Sunday school one day when the lesson was about Ananias and Sapphira. The teacher asked the class why God did not blow strike people dead for lying. After a while the little boy held up his hand. "Well, what is it?" asked the teacher; and the boy answered: "If he did, there wud'na be onybody left." And that is the reason why Sir John Thompson abstained from purging the Government of all the boodlers; he saw that he would not have a colleague left on the Treasury benches; and out of sheer shame he could not continue to punish McGreevy and Connolly, and so they were released. I do not know where Connolly is, but McGreevy is now to come back to receive his reward. He is to be introduced here, and I would suggest that he be introduced by the Postmaster General and the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Turcotte), and that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals form the rear guard and come in behind.

Mr. HAGGART. What about perjurers?

Mr. CHARLTON. If the hon. gentleman has any charge to make, we will consider it in due time. We are now talking about plunderers and boodlers and political criminals of various kinds, and I can refer the hon. gentleman to certain charges demanding investigation which were made two or three sessions ago, and in which some Ministers of the Crown were interested, and to the course taken by the Government on that occasion, when a resolution was introduced by the gentleman who now fills the responsible position of Premier, which resolution practically, on the part of the alleged criminal, drew a new indictment, and then preferred the charges before a court the judges of which were chosen by himself, and the verdict of which was a foreordained conclusion.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have had assertions made here as to the potency of the principles held by our hon. friends opposite. We have heard very often of the triumph of the National Policy, and the strength of that policy in the country; and the success of the Government in the elections has been attributed to the hold which that policy has upon popular sentiment and popular affection. Do you believe, Mr. Speaker, or do I believe that the character of the policy alone has influenced the results of the elections? Have we reason to doubt that the expenditure of vast sums of money have had something to do with those results? We know that the Government have adopted a regular system of raising election funds; we know that they have made contracts with and granted charters to railway companies; we know that they have granted subsidies of land and subsidies of money by Order in Council during the pendency of an election, as was the case in the last general elections; we know that they have added to the public burdens hundreds of thousands of dollars for the purpose of granting additional mail subsidies and land subsidies for railways already completed. We know that they have given to one class of the population special advantages, and have drawn from them, in consideration of those advantages, large election contributions. We know that they have granted various railway subsidies to the extent of millions of dollars, and in almost every case we may reasonably assume that those subsidies have been tolled, and that the toll has been added to the election fund; and in many cases these subsidies have been granted to districts where they would benefit the Government nominees, they were in fact bribes given to ridings en bloc. With the system adopted in the Public Works Department, whereby the contracts were manipulated and the Government corruption fund largely reinforced by sums drawn from that source—I say with this system of corruption and boodling extending from 1872, when a railway charter was sold, down to the present day, in vogue, and with these enormous sums raised and expended in this way. I think we may very properly attribute the success of the Government in 1882, 1887 and 1891, to the lavish expenditure of money in corrupting the electors, rather than to the potency of the appeals made by the Government to the reason of the people. The object of this Bill was to strike out from this trinity of evil I have referred to, one of its most important personages; and I close by asserting that in the interests of the country, for the sake of securing simplicity in the arrangements of the electoral lists, for the sake of securing economy by at once sweeping away an expense of over $400,000, direct and indirect, in each revision of the lists, for the sake of securing efficiency, since no list, prepared as this is by a Government appointee, in the way it is prepared, can equal in efficiency the lists prepared by the people themselves, through their own representatives, and revised with strict judicial revision by the county court judges, for the sake of justice, we should do away with the present imperfect lists, prepared on a plan devised and designed for the purpose of giving the Government an unjust advantage. In the interest, therefore, of the public, the demand is a reasonable one, that we should return to the provincial franchises. The present system, it is clear, cannot be perpetuated. The Government itself introduced a Bill last session which confesses that the assertion I make is true, that this system cannot be perpetuated. It is not in the reason or nature of things that so outrageous a system as this can be continued in this country. Born, as it was, out of a desire to secure unjust political advantage, continued, as it has been, in iniquity, it cannot be perpetuated. Why not meet the inevitable and take the credit—which a succeeding Government will take if this one does not—of sweeping this unjust, this obnoxious measure from the statute-books of the Dominion.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not intend to follow the example of my hon. friend and discuss the principle even of the Bill, much less its details. Not having a printed copy of the Bill, it is impossible, of course, to discuss it intelligently at present. The hon. gentleman has undertaken to follow what he says is the practice in the Imperial Parliament. I am inclined to think, however, without finding fault at all with the precedent or the course he has taken, that while it may be very profitable for the House to have an explanation of what is proposed to be done by this Bill, there is nothing special to be gained by attempting to discuss a measure which is not yet before the House in printed form. I shall not, therefore, at present, say anything more regarding it. The hon. gentleman has made a great many very decided assertions which it will be quite time enough to review when, on the second reading, the House is possessed of the whole Bill, and argument will be more pertinent.

Mr. LAURIER. I have no observations at all to offer at this moment about this Bill, but I think the practice introduced by my hon. friend is the best, that upon the first reading we should have a very full review of the measure.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FRAUDS UPON THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. EDGAR moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 15) to amend the Acts 54 and 55 Victoria, chap. 23, intitled: "An Act respecting Frauds upon the Government." He said: I wish to be brief, so as not to fall under the criticism of the leader of the House, and will, therefore, say in a few words what is the intention and scope of this Bill. In 1891, Sir John Thompson introduced the Act which I now propose to amend—an Act respecting frauds upon the Government; and while it was receiving the consideration of the House, the leader of the Opposition suggested to him the introduction of a clause containing stringent provision against the contribution by public contractors to election funds of any kind, directly or indirectly. That clause had been introduced several times before on this side, but had been defeated by the hon. gentlemen opposite. However, Sir John Thompson took time to consider that provision, and, to his credit, he accepted it, and introduced the suggested clause into his Bill. In that respect, as in some others, he went considerably in advance of his party. The amendment I now propose is one which, I think, at this particular time, should be widely known throughout the country. It provides severe penalties—fines and imprisonment and forfeiture of contract—against any public contractor who, directly or indirectly, contributes in any way towards the election of any candidate to Parliament or towards an election fund. It may be said that that is a provision which it will be very difficult to enforce. I fail to see that. I do not think that if there were grounds for supposing that a public contractor had made those contributions, it should be left to the slow machinery of an election court to discover those things. I believe that the Government or Parliament should appoint committees or issue commissions to make the most stringent inquiries, so that the proper parties might be punished. However that may be, Sir, what I propose in this Bill is to enlarge the power in a way which, I think, ought to commend itself to this House. The Act as it stands applies only to persons having contracts with the Government. I propose to make the penalties apply to directors and officers of railway companies who have subsidies, or loans, or advances, or bonuses, from the Government of Canada. And I think, Sir, that this will meet the view of the House and of the public. I hope at a later stage to discuss the matter more fully.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DOMINION NOTES ACT.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Excuse me; I suppose that the object of the Bill to amend the Dominion Notes Act is to put in the proviso which, in a most extraordinary fashion, was dropped from the measure last year.

Mr. FOSTER. Precisely that.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT.

Mr. O'BRIEN (for Mr. McCarthy) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 16) to amend the Dominion Elections Act. He said: The object of this Bill, Mr. Speaker, may be very briefly stated. Of its provisions—one is a most important one—to make railway companies that carry voters to or from the polls free of charge, guilty of a corrupt practice, and also to make any persons who abet the railway companies in doing so guilty of a corrupt practice. In fact, the object is to put a stop to the practice which is well known to prevail, especially as shown during recent elections, of railway companies making themselves election agents and carrying voters free from one end of the Dominion to the other to please the Government of the day. The other portion of the Bill relates to acts of personation. We have on our statute a clause referring to this offence. The Ontario Legislature has passed an Act which provides for summary process in cases of personation. Any one can easily understand that cases of personation will frequently arise, especially in the more remote districts of the country, where the population is sparse, and where strangers can come in and poll votes on behalf of persons who are not present. This Bill enacts, as an amendment to the existing law, a similar provision to that of the provincial Act, which provides for summary process in regard to personation. These are the main provisions of the Bill. I therefore beg leave to move, seconded by Mr. Bryson, for leave to introduce this Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES—DUAL LANGUAGE, ETC.

Mr. O'BRIEN (for Mr. McCarthy) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 17) to amend the North-west Territories Act. He said: On behalf of Mr. McCarthy, I beg to introduce this Bill, which has been introduced on several previous occasions in this House and which has not yet met with the support which its advocates hoped it would meet with and which they believe it will ultimately meet with. I need say but little with regard to the provisions of the Bill, for they are well known. The object is to give the North-west Territories power to deal with the subject of education and to abolish the use of the French language as official in these Territories. I have said, Mr. Speaker, that this Bill has not met with the support in this House which I hope on the present occasion it will meet with; but I may say if it has not met with the support in this House which we think it ought to meet with, it has met with a very large support throughout the country, except in the province of Quebec.

Mr. AMYOT. Hear, hear.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Which the hon. gentleman who interrupts me so ably represents; and, Sir, the public have come to the conclusion that they are not the demagogues who strive by every means in their power to do away with these distinctions of race and religion which are the cause of nearly all our troubles; they are the real demagogues who fatten and batten and grow into political power and influence by means of these distinctions. Sir, it is within the knowledge of this House that gentlemen who are hardly qualified to fill the position of third class clerks have been put in high office in the Cabinet, and have been retained there from year to year, from one administration to another. Kept there, and kept there why? Not on account of their merits, because nature never gave them any such qualifications as to entitle them to fill these positions, but simply and solely because they represented a certain race and a certain religion. And, Sir, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries is a case in point. The hon. gentleman illustrated his position most admirably on a recent occasion. The hon. gentleman referred—or perhaps it would be more parliamentary to say reference was made—to the power which the late Sir John Macdonald had of judging character and choosing men, very seldom making mistakes in that respect. Well, Sir, Sir John Macdonald made no mistake in the case of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. He made no mistake because he never thought that with all his powers it was possible to make a statesman of the hon. gentleman, but he did believe—and that belief has been justified by events—that the hon. gentleman would make a most admirable placeman. A most admirable placeman he has been, a most admirable placeman he still continues to be. I do not propose to say anything further with reference to this Bill, but I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Denison, for leave to introduce the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 18) to prevent the importation and immigration of foreigners and aliens under contract or agreement to perform labour in Canada.—(Mr. Taylor.)

PURCHASE OF BUTTER BY THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. RIDER asked, 1. How much butter has the Government purchased during 1895 through the Dairy Commissioner, and at what date or dates were the purchases made? 2. Who are the parties from whom purchased, and what was the price paid? 3. For what market was the transaction intended? 4. Has the whole lot been sold? If so, how much, and at what price? 5. What is the total cost to the Government per pound, including purchase price, charges for freight, insurance, storage, commissions, &c.?

Mr. MONTAGUE. 1. The Dairy Commissioner accepted 915 packages of fresh-made creamery butter from eighteen creameries and from five of the Government Experimental Dairy Stations, for shipment to Great Britain on Government account, to introduce and advertise the quality of fresh-made creamery butter there, between the 12th February and 6th April, 1895. The particulars of the latest shipment from Prince Edward Island have not yet been received. 2. An advance of 20 cents per pound was paid. Payments have been made to date, as per sheet attached hereto. 3. Nine hundred and fifteen packages of butter of fine quality, and in packages suitable for export, were shipped to Great Britain; 246 packages of butter, which was of fine quality, but in packages not suitable for export, were or are being sold, in Montreal. What of it has been sold—and most of it has been sold—has realized more than the price advanced on it by the Government. Two hundred and twenty-four packages were received by the Dairy Commissioner in Montreal, which were not strictly fine in quality, or were made before January, 1895. These were taken charge of by the shippers, or are being sold on their account in Montreal. 4. Account sales in detail have not been received from Great Britain; but reports of sales have been received at from 90s. to 78s. per cwt. 5. The accounts for the freight charges from the creameries to Montreal have not yet been received at the department. The amount to be paid by the Government, for freight charges to Montreal and storage charges there, will be less than one-half cent per pound of butter.

In addition to the above, butter was shipped from four Government experimental dairy stations in Ontario and Quebec, and from two Government dairy stations in Prince Edward Island.

SUPPLIES FOR THE CITADEL AT QUEBEC.

Mr. EDGAR asked, In whose name has the contract for the supply of groceries to the Citadel at Quebec been standing in each of the months of the year 1894? To whom have cheques been issued in payment for such supplies delivered during the year 1894; giving dates and amounts and name or names of endorsers in each case? In whose name has the contract for the supply of groceries for the Citadel at Quebec been standing for the expired portion of the year 1895? To whom have cheques been issued in payment for such supplies; the dates and amounts and name or names of endorsers in each case?

Mr. FOSTER. The contract for the supplies of groceries to the Citadel at Quebec in 1894 was awarded to J. B. Provost, and in 1895, to Louis Cantin. Cheques were issued and endorsed as follows, for the following amounts:—

ROYAL COMMISSION ON THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. EDGAR asked, What is the amount of the whole expenses in connection with the Royal Commission on the Liquor Traffic?

Mr. FOSTER. The whole amount paid on account of expenses in connection with the Royal Commission on the Liquor Traffic, so far as advices have been received by the Finance Department, is $89,376.73. There is a further expenditure.

Mr. CHARLTON. Does that include anything for printing?

Mr. FOSTER. It is the whole expenditure so far.

Mr. EDGAR. Then that is not the whole?

Mr. FOSTER. It is not the whole.

Mr. FORBES (for Mr. Flint) asked. Whether the Royal Commission on the Liquor Traffic has yet reported its conclusions to the Government? If so, on what date does the Government expect to lay such report before Parliament?

Mr. FOSTER. I believe this question was asked the other day by another hon. gentleman, and was answered. The same answer applies to this question.

SUIT AGAINST LARKIN, CONNOLLY & CO.

Mr. LAURIER asked. 1. Whether the Government has settled or compromised the suit instituted by the Minister of Justice against the late firm of Larkin, Connolly & Co., and if so, on what terms and conditions? 2. Have the defendants in said suit complied with the conditions of said settlement and paid to the Government the amount so agreed upon? If so, was the payment made in cash or otherwise?

Mr. CURRAN. 1. The action was compromised, pending the trial, by the authority of the Government, upon the advice of counsel for the Crown. By the terms of the agreement, judgment by consent was entered for the Crown for $100,000, and for the defendants upon the counter-claims for $40,000; the latter amount being a set-off, left a balance of $60,000 in favour of the Crown for which by the terms of the settlement the defendants are held liable as follows:—Patrick Larkin for $10,000, payable on the 1st December, 1894, with interest until payment at the rate of 4 per cent; N. K. & M. Connolly for $35,000, payable one-half at six months from the date of judgment and the balance within twelve months, the whole with interest at 4 per cent. The balance of $15,000 stands against Robert McGreevy. As Robert McGreevy was a Crown witness, the remedy against him was not availed of. The judgment was so obtained on the 11th day of September, 1894. 2. The defendants have not paid any portion of the judgment, but the solicitor for the Crown has been instructed to issue process for the collection of the amount due, also for the remainder if not paid when due.

Mr. LAURIER. What was the date of the order for process?

Mr. CURRAN. I have not got that here, but it is within a short time.

Mr. FOSTER.

TRENT VALLEY CANAL.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked. Have any contracts been entered into on account of the Trent Valley Canal? If so, for whom and for what amounts?

Mr. HAGGART. A contract has been entered into for a six and a half mile section, extending from Balsam Lake towards Lake Simcoe, with Andrew Onderdonk. The schedule price of the contract will be, approximately, $429,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is that the only one?

Mr. HAGGART. That is the only one.

CONTRACTS FOR PUBLIC WORKS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked. Have any other contracts for public works been entered into? If so, with whom and for what amount?

Mr. HAGGART. Is it in reference to the Railway Department, or the Public Works Department?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I had reference to the Railway Department more particularly, but I mean it to cover both.

Mr. HAGGART. There is an immense number of contracts on the Interoceania Railway, and on the St. Lawrence and Lachine Canals. Will you specify more particularly?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So far as the hon. gentleman was concerned, I referred more particularly to canals.

Mr. HAGGART. I will have the information to-morrow.

DOMINION GOVERNMENT CREDIT.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked. What is the amount now at the credit of the Dominion Government in Canadian banks? How much in London or elsewhere not in Canada?

Mr. FOSTER. There is now in Canadian banks, $5,929,526.24 at the credit of the Government; in London, $964,172.69.

RAILWAY SUBSIDIES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked. What is the total amount of unexpended railway subsidies voted by Parliament to date?

Mr. HAGGART. The total amount of unexpended railway subsidies voted by Parliament to date, is $8,749,271.81.

B. C. PENITENTIARY—JAMES FITZ-SIMMONS.

Mr. EDGAR asked. 1. Was James Fitzsimmons dismissed or suspended from the office of Deputy Warden of the penitentiary at New Westminster, B.C., by the late Sir John Thompson? 2. If so, was such action based on any, and what, inquiry or report? 3. When will the report and other papers connected with the case be laid before the House? 4. Has James Fitzsimmons been reinstated in his former office, or appointed to any other office, and when?

Mr. CURRAN. 1. James Fitzsimmons was not dismissed or suspended from the office of Deputy Warden of the British Columbia penitentiary by the late Sir John Thompson. An investigation into the affairs of the penitentiary was authorized by a minute of His Excellency in Council of the 22nd May, 1894, and a commission was thereupon issued to the Hon. Mr. Justice Drake to inquire into the administration and affairs of the penitentiary, and by direction of the late Minister of Justice, Mr. Fitzsimmons was relieved of his duties as Deputy Warden, pending the inquiry. He was afterwards, by minute of His Excellency in Council of the 24th October last, retired from office without prejudice to consideration for re-employment in the penitentiary service. 2. Mr. Fitzsimmons was so retired upon consideration of the evidence taken at the investigation, and the report of the Hon. Mr. Justice Drake. 3. When so ordered. 4. He was reinstated in his former office by order of His Excellency in Council of the 25th of March, 1895.

COLLECTORSHIP OF CUSTOMS, MONTREAL.

Mr. BORDEN (for Mr. Landerkin) asked, Is the office of Collector of Customs at Montreal vacant? If so, when did it become vacant? Why is it kept vacant? Have any applications been made for it? If so, who are the applicants? What is the salary? Is it the intention soon to appoint an officer? If not, will the office be abolished?

Mr. WALLACE. The answer to the first question is, yes; to the second, the office became vacant on 15th January, 1893; to the third question, pending the selection of a suitable officer; to the fourth question, yes; to the fifth question, it is not usual to name the applicants; to the sixth question, the salary is $4,000 a year; to the seventh question, the answer is, yes.

WORLD'S FAIR—MR. LARKE'S SERVICES.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Is Mr. Larke, one of the Commissioners to the World's Exposition, Chicago, still in the employ of the Government? When did his services cease as Commissioner to the World's Exposition in Chicago, and when did his present engagement commence? What is his salary? What amount has been paid him for travelling expenses since the date of his present engagement? What, if any, other expenses in connection with his present position have been paid him or his family, or are to be allowed him?

Mr. IVES. Mr. Larke is still in the employ of the Government. His services as Commissioner to the World's Exposition in Chicago ceased on 21st August last. His present engagement commenced on 25th August last. His salary is $3,000 per annum, with travelling and removal expenses. He has received an accountable advance of £200 sterling.

WHARF AT WEST POINT, P.E.I.

Mr. PERRY asked, Have any petitions been received by the Department of Public Works during recess, or at any time, from the inhabitants of West Point, Prince County, P.E.I., asking to rebuild the wharf or pier at that place?

Mr. OUMET. No such petitions have been received by the department.

NORTHUMBERLAND STRAITS— TUNNEL.

Mr. PERRY asked, Have any borings been made during the season of 1894, across the Straits of Northumberland, with the view of further getting information with respect to building a tunnel across the straits from Cape Traverse, P.E.I., to Cape Tormentine, N.B.? If so, how many borings have been so made? What is the amount already expended in borings and other experiments across the Straits of Northumberland in connection with the proposed tunnel? Is it the intention of the Government to expend any further sums in that connection at an early date?

Mr. FOSTER. An effort was made in the season of 1894 to put down a series of borings, but, owing to the season being unusually boisterous, the contractors did not even succeed in putting down one hole. Therefore, no payment was made to them. The amount expended by the Government was $8,557.56. The contractors declined to proceed with the work, they having spent nearly $4,000 in the effort during the season of 1894, and negotiations are now in progress for continuing the work of boring during the season of 1895.

LOBSTER PACKING—LICENSE FEES.

Mr. PERRY asked, Has the Department of Marine and Fisheries extended the time for paying license fees by lobster packers? If so, to what time? Has the order been made public?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The department has not extended the time for paying license fees by lobster packers, consequently no such order has been made public. Packers may, however, proceed with their business if they forward their application and fees for licenses.

CONDUCTORS ON CATTLE TRAINS.

Mr. MULLOCK asked. Whether the Government have discontinued the practice of appointing conductors as Government officers to take charge of cattle trains carrying cattle from the United States to Canada in bond? If so, when?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Minister of Agriculture never appointed conductors as Government officers for the purpose of taking charge of cattle trains. The appointment of conductors as cattle guardians has not been found necessary. The last forms issued appointing such were in May, 1890.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY.

Mr. LAURIER. Before the Notices of Motion are called, I would ask the Minister of Finance if he is now prepared to lay upon the Table of the House the Order in Council with regard to a subsidy to the Hudson Bay Railway Company?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to lay on the Table the Order in Council and papers with reference to the Hudson Bay Railway, for which the hon. gentleman asked yesterday. The Order in Council has connected with it several important papers, and I would much rather that my hon. friend would put a notice of motion on the Order paper. I will have the papers prepared, and by the time he gets his motion carried, they will be ready for the information of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. I suppose I cannot have them otherwise.

Mr. FOSTER. They should all come down together.

Mr. LAURIER. I understood from the hon. gentleman yesterday that although he would not bring down the papers to-day to lay on the Table, yet he would be ready to give some information as to their contents.

Mr. FOSTER. The information that the hon. gentleman seemed to be anxious for was as to whether any contract had been entered into with the Hudson Bay Company, and as to whether any money had passed. Neither is the case.

Mr. LAURIER. I understand that it has been promised, though not paid yet?

Mr. FOSTER. Full information will be contained in the papers.

CENSUS OF THE CITY OF LONDON.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I beg to call the attention of the Government to the fact that, two sessions ago, I moved for the returns from the city of London giving the census for the various industrial establishments there. That order was then passed by the House. Last year I reminded the Government that the return had not been brought down and it was again promised. It has not come down yet. I would like to know whether that order is to be brought down this session immediately or not?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have no knowledge of this matter, but I shall call the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to it.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. FOSTER laid on the Table of the House the reports of the Royal Commission on the Liquor Traffic, and the evidence taken before the Commission.

DRAINAGE ACROSS RAILWAY LINES.

Mr. CASEY moved for :

Statement showing petitions presented to Parliament, during last two sessions, from Municipal Councils, asking for legislation to secure improved facilities for drainage across lines of railway; giving date of presentation, by whom presented, and a copy of each form of petition, with names of municipalities from which each petition was sent.

He said: Mr. Speaker, my object in asking for this information is to call the attention of the House to the fact that a great deal of difficulty has been experienced by private individuals and municipalities in securing outlets for drainage across the roadways of the different railway companies. It used to be supposed that the right of drainage across the railway was governed by the provincial Acts concerning drainage, but since this Parliament has assumed control of all railways, the companies resist that interpretation of the law and claim that they are not bound by the same Acts which secure rights of drainage across the property of private individuals or other corporations throughout the country. Members will recollect that within the last session or two many petitions have been presented from different municipalities asking for relief in this respect, and to-day I have had to present a petition from the county council of Elgin asking that the provisions of the Ditches and Watercourses Act of Ontario should be enforced in regard to railway companies. I intend to call the attention of the House to a Bill on this subject later on, and it is for use in connection with the discussion of that Bill that I ask for the information required by this motion.

Motion agreed to.

"DAIRY PRODUCTS ACT, 1893."

Mr. McLENNAN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee, to-morrow, to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to introduce a Bill to amend the Dairy Products Act, 1893.

Motion agreed to.

LAND GRANTS TO RELIGIOUS BODIES.

Mr. CHARLTON moved for :

Return showing grants made from public lands in Manitoba and the North-west Territories of Canada since 1st January, A.D. 1880, to religious denominations, religious sects, religious corporations and churches; with details as to date of each grant, area of the same, and name of denomination, sect corporation or church to which each grant was made.

He said: This motion was made at an early period of last session, and the return was promised by the Government, but was not brought down. I do not know whether there were any reasons actuating the Minister of the Interior in withholding this return or not, but I hope that this session the information called for will be forthcoming within a reasonable length of time.

Mr. DALY. As the hon. gentleman states, a similar motion was made last year, and the preparation of the return was commenced, and will be finished in about ten days. If the hon. gentleman will allow this motion to drop, the information will be laid on the Table of the House on the order of last session. If this motion is carried, it will necessitate a duplication.

Motion withdrawn.

SCHEDULING OF CANADIAN CATTLE.

Mr. INNES moved for :

Return of all correspondence, reports or other matters on record between the Department of Agriculture and our High Commissioner in London with the British Board of Agriculture or any other Imperial authority in reference to the continued scheduling of Canadian cattle in the ports of Great Britain, subsequent to the return ordered by the House on the 6th February, 1893, and not included in the appendix to the Report of the Minister of Agriculture of the 24th January, 1894.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I may say that the department are anxious to place before the House every information in regard to this subject; but in the report of the Minister of Agriculture all the correspondence of any importance whatever bearing upon the subject is printed. There are some quite unimportant letters in the department which may be brought down if the hon. gentleman wants them. But everything of importance is contained in the report.

Mr. MULLOCK. Further down on the paper there is a motion of mine germane to this subject, and not covered by the motion of my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Innes). It would be a proper subject of amendment to the motion, unless the Minister gives the same answer to me that he has given to my hon. friend. If he chooses to take it as a substantive motion, I have no objection.

Motion withdrawn.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. CASEY moved for :

Statement showing date of appointment of the Royal Commission on Prohibition, names of the commissioners and number of days on which the commission sat. Also, statement of total expenses incurred up to date, on account of such commission, showing, separately, rate of pay per day allowed to each commissioner, and total amount so paid to each; amount paid for travelling expenses of each commissioner, and total travelling expenses; cost of reporting evidence taken by the commission; cost of printing such evidence, and the report of the commission; estimated total amount yet required to meet all remaining expenses connected with concluding the work of the commission.

He said: I have no doubt that some of these particulars may be contained in the report laid on the Table this afternoon, but I wish to have a statement of them in the form asked for here. I have no doubt also that some of the things asked for in this motion will not be so easily accessible in the report itself. I am sure that a statement giving the information I ask for will be very interesting. The public have been watching the proceedings of this commission with great interest and great patience. For years, the labours of the commission have been drawn out—so many years that I confess myself unable, on the spur of the moment, to say exactly how many. Last year we had a report from the party representing the liquor interest on that commission—a gentleman who might be looked upon by prohibitionists as the devil's advocate, Mr. Kribs. He spoke, as he alleges, not for bad spirits, but for good spirits, and we ought to hear from those who are opposed to the selling of all kinds of spirits. It will be very interesting to the public to know how much it has cost us to obtain the mass of information which, no doubt, will be disclosed when this report and the evidence connected with it are published. It has been the duty of these commissioners for this long time past, to make pleasant excursions, not only to all parts of Canada, but to a great many parts of the United States. They felt themselves bound, in virtue of the commission given them, to find out all the liquor dives in every place they visited and to sample the kinds of liquor obtainable there. I do not know how that work was divided up among the total prohibitionists, the moderate prohibitionists, and the moderate drinkers, and those, if there were any such on the commission, who came under none of these categories. It was clearly understood, as part of their duty, that they should go to Scott Act counties, prohibition states, &c., to ascertain if liquor was obtainable in these places, and if so, whether it was fit for human consumption. It was a serious and important duty they had to discharge, and we hope to learn they have discharged it thoroughly. I hope they have ascertained just how much microbe killer in New Brunswick, corn juice in Maine, and cold tea in Prince Edward Island it takes to destroy the nervous system of an ordinary mortal. This information will be interesting, but it will still remain for the country to decide whether it is worth what we have paid for it. We have ascertained to-day from the Finance Minister that the expenditure amounts to something in the neighbourhood of $70,000, and the accounts are not all in. I am asking for an estimate of the probable amounts not yet in, because we should know something approximate to the total cost of the commission, at a very early date.

Motion agreed to.

PONTIAC PACIFIC JUNCTION RAILWAY.

Mr. DEVLIN moved for :

Statement showing the gross earnings of the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway since the 30th day of June, 1894; also, a statement showing the total expenditure of said railway from same period. Also, a statement showing the total expenditure of said railway from the same period on the following accounts respectively:—(a) Wages and salaries of employees; (b) Payments to the president as such; (c) Payments to the directors as such; (d) Payments for other working expenses; (e) Payments on construction account not included in above.

He said: It will, perhaps, be well to give a reason or two why I make this motion. It is not a very pleasant task to bring a matter such as this before this House, but I think it is a question of public duty. I do not wish to reflect in any way on the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway, but desire merely to find out what has been done with the money and earnings of that road. We have had this road before the House, and before committees, on many occasions. It has been the subject of a great deal of discussion, and I do not propose to-day to enter into any of the matters which were detailed in the past, beyond stating this fact that, perhaps, no road in the Dominion has been more generously dealt with than the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway. It has been the recipient of large subsidies from the Dominion Parliament, the Quebec Provincial Government, the county represented by the hon. member for Pontiac, and the municipalities, if I am correctly informed, which are in his county. It has received an extension of time frequently, it is asserted, in regard to provisions which exist in its charter, so that, on the whole, it has been very generously dealt with. In fact, it is said that the road has been built very largely, if not wholly, out of the very grants it has received from the Dominion and Provincial Parliaments. What I am asking for to-day, I know it is not customary for the House to grant, but I think the circumstances I am about to point out will warrant the House in granting the order I am asking for. It appears, and I think my information is perfectly correct, that during the last eight months not a single employee of this road has been paid one dollar of wages, and, if my information is correct, for six months previous, no wages had been paid. This, I may be told, is a matter which does not come under the supervision of the House; but those who are employed by this company know that this road comes to this House and asks for a subsidy, and that to-day there is a subsidy not yet paid, but which has been voted for its construction. I ask that the House shall obtain from this railway company a statement showing what has been done with this money. It is a road which is earning money, for the two railways known as the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway and the Gatineau Valley Railway, belonging to the same company, have—as I am informed—in one year earned more than $16,000 profit over all expenses. And nobody seems to know where this money is going. It is a hard thing for labouring men to thus depend upon a railway company, to work hard for the railway and, in the end, to obtain nothing in return. I may be told that it is quite possible for these men to leave, but employment is not so abundant in Canada to-day that these men can easily secure other positions. It is almost impossible for them to go to the company and make a straight complaint or to threaten the company that they will abandon their positions, knowing that the company may, perhaps, dispense with their services, and thus leave them without employment at all. I bring this subject before the House in the interest of the public. I submit these facts to the Minister of Railways who has already, so I am assured, received certain reports in connection with this road which may enable him to throw some light on the subject. He has, at all events, received a report in connection with the condition of the road, a report which, I am told, pointed out to him that the road was unsafe for public travel and that life was endangered upon it. The hon. Minister shakes his head. Perhaps what I am stating at this moment may not be exactly the case. I shall be glad to be corrected where I am wrong, and at a later period, I will ask for a copy of that report. But what I have stated with regard to the wages is absolutely true—that all the employees of this road, whether conductors, brakemen, engineers, or in whatever capacity they may be employed, have been unpaid for a period of eight months. This is a question that is deserving of the attention and consideration of Parliament. We are ready to vote large subsidies to the railways; it is well that we should know where this money goes which is thus voted by Parliament. True, no formal application has been made to this House by the employees of this road for redress or for protection. But, Sir, I take it upon myself to-day to bring this, I believe the saddest case known in the history of railways in Canada, before this House. These men have their families for whose subsistence they must provide; and they have been obliged to depend during nearly a whole year upon the generosity of friends. I ask the attention of the Minister of Railways to this subject; I ask also that the House will kindly direct that the order for which I move shall be issued. The resolution is seconded by Mr. Rider.

Mr. BRYSON. Before the motion is adopted I desire to say a word. I do not for a moment pretend to rise in defence of the Pontiac Railway Company or of their conduct; but, Sir, I desire to say with every possible respect, that the subject before the House should receive the favourable consideration of every member present. The hon. gentleman who has introduced this motion, I think, deserves a great deal of credit for doing so. The remarks which he offered, which I must say were very patriotic and very touching, with reference to the labouring men, the sentiments he expressed I can endorse. From my own personal observation, I know of very many cases of hardship arising from the men not being regularly paid on this road. That they have not been paid for several months, I believe to be the fact. But, Sir, we must bear in mind that the present company, although it has been largely subsidized, has been operating a railway through a section of country that has not been able to pay more than working expenses, even if it has been able to pay this much. I believe that it is not with the wish or through the act of the president of the railway company that the present state of affairs exists. I have understood that strenuous efforts are being made by the president of the company to meet the requirements of the men, but on several occasions he has been disappointed in raising the necessary funds and has been obliged to disappoint the men. As reference has been made to the county of Pontiac's contribution to this road, of which this House has heard on previous occasions, we are still in the position of having to contribute a large sum of money to the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company, without egress at the western end and without an inlet into the city of Ottawa. I hope the matter under discussion will receive the favourable consideration of the Government. In order to meet what I consider the requirements of the employees of the railways, I have given notice of a Bill which, with the permission of the House, I will soon introduce, to protect the employees of the different railways of Canada in the payment of their wages, in the event of a certain period lapsing in which the railway companies have refused or have been unable to pay their men. I hope that this Bill will meet with the approbation of the whole House. And I hope that there may not be a dissenting voice raised in this House to this motion, as this is an extreme case which the hon. member for Ottawa has brought before the Chair.

Mr. HAGGART. In answer to the hon. gentlemen I have only to state that there is no information in the department except the statement, which is regularly filed, showing the weekly gross earnings of the road. That I will give to the hon. gentlemen. I have instructed the officers of the department to ask the railway company to give the department the information asked for, and when I receive it I will furnish it to him. The proper plan, I think, is that suggested by my hon. friend from Pontiac (Mr. Bryson). It seems a terrible affair as stated by the hon. gentleman, and I have no doubt his statement is correct, that railway employees have been for eight or nine months without payment of their wages and depending entirely upon charity. There ought to be some means by which a railway company carrying on its operations in the country shall be compelled to pay its workmen their wages. I think the plan suggested by the hon. gentleman is a correct one, remedying it in some manner by Act of Parliament. The hon. gentleman went further, and said that information was in possession of the department which showed that this road was in a state not fit to be worked or used for traffic.

Mr. DEVLIN. I said that I had been informed that the department had received a report representing the condition of the road as unfit for traffic.

Mr. HAGGART. Perhaps the hon. gentleman was correct. However, I sent to the department only for information in answer to the question which he put upon the Notice paper. I hardly think his information is correct, because if a report came to the department showing that the road was unsafe and ought not to be used for traffic or travel, it would have been the duty of the officers of the department to draw the attention of the company to it, and take means to prevent them carrying on traffic or business.

Mr. DEVLIN. I think the hon. gentleman's department did send an officer. At all events, there was a Government officer sent, either by this Government or the Provincial Government.

Mr. HAGGART. I will inquire.

Mr. MULOCK. I think it is hardly necessary for the Minister to suggest that the motion be withdrawn.

Mr. HAGGART. No, I do not ask it to be withdrawn. I have sent to the railway company for information, and the moment I get it I will bring it down.

Mr. MULOCK. Because the Railway Act makes ample provision for the Minister obtaining all this information.

Mr. LAURIER. This case is an evidence, if any were wanted, that the manner in which we have been subsidizing railway companies is very loose. We have been in the habit, and are still in the habit, of subsidizing railway companies at the rate of thousands of dollars per mile, and there is no provision in the law at the present time compelling these companies to show to the House in what manner they have invested the charity, as it has been called, at all events, the aid, which the bounty of the country has provided them. This railway has, I understand, been subsidized perhaps more heavily, at all events as heavily, as any other road in the country that I am aware of. It has been subsidized, as my hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Devlin) has said, by this Dominion Parliament more than once. It has been subsidized by the Local Legislature of Quebec, not once, but several times; it has been subsidized by the county of Pontiac, if I remember rightly, to the extent of $200,000; and also, as I understand, by several municipalities besides. But with all these heavy subsidies, provincial, municipal and Dominion, amounting in all, if I am not mistaken, to more than $30,000 per mile, this railway company is not in a position to discharge its most pressing liabilities, not able even to pay the services of the poor men who operate it. I ask the House to consider if, in face of such a revelation, it is at all to be tolerated that we should be asked year after year to give money to these companies and never exact from them a return as to how the money is applied. Sir, the inference is strong that if the money had been properly applied for the building and management of this road, its employees would not be in the sad position they are in at the present time. On one or two occasions I have proposed a motion to this House, asserting that whenever a company receives the bounty of Parliament to aid in the construction of a railway, it should make an ample return as to the manner in which the money is applied, and this revelation is the best evidence of the wisdom of that proposition, which has been on several occasions rejected in this House.

Motion agreed to.

SEIZURE OF SHIPS IN BEHRING SEA.

Mr. LAURIER moved for :

Copies of all correspondence between the Canadian Government and the Imperial Government and between the Imperial Government and the United States Secretary of State concerning the payment to Canadian sealers of the damages resulting to them from the illegal seizure of their ships in Behring Sea by order of American authorities.

Mr. HAGGART.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I want to inquire of the leader of the House, or whoever is particularly in charge of this, if they have any information with respect to certain further demands that are alleged to have been made on behalf of the American Government for reopening this arbitration; or do they prefer to reserve that information?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I rose to call the attention of the hon. mover of this motion to the fact that negotiations are now going on between the Imperial Government and the United States Government with regard to these claims. I hope he will not press the matter, as bringing down the correspondence now would prejudice the negotiations with regard to these claims. They are not only negotiations between Canada and the Imperial Government, but between the Imperial Government and the United States; therefore, I ask the hon. gentleman not to press his motion.

Mr. LAURIER. It is a matter of notoriety that these negotiations have been concluded, and that an agreement has been entered into between the predecessor in office of the present Minister of Justice, and the other authorities concerned, for the payment of a lump sum of $425,000, which proposition has been rejected by Congress. I cannot see that there can be any objection to bringing down the correspondence on this point, or to bringing down all the correspondence which led to the agreement accepting a lump sum. As to the correspondence which arose in consequence of the refusal by Congress to vote an appropriation for the payment of that sum, if the hon. gentleman thinks that it may not be in the public interest to bring that correspondence down, I will not press for it, seeing that other negotiations are now pending. But I think the hon. gentleman will agree with me that in so far as correspondence was concluded by making agreement between the two interested parties, such correspondence ought to be brought down, and can be brought down without prejudice to anybody.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I think, under the circumstances, the hon. gentleman had better not press his motion at present.

Mr. LAURIER. I will not press for anything subsequent to the refusal by Congress to grant an appropriation, but everything antecedent to that it seems to me we ought to have.

Mr. LANGELIER. In connection with this matter, I think the hon. gentleman ought to be in a position to give the House information in regard to a rumour which has been published, not in Opposition papers, but in Ministerial papers, amongst others the "Morning Chronicle," of Quebec, a most important Ministerial paper, inasmuch as it is the special organ of the Postmaster General. The rumour I refer to is that one of our Ministers received a terrible snub at the hands of Mr. Gresham, the Secretary of State of the United States. The whole story was told in the newspapers. When the discussion was commenced it was carried on between the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State of the United States. The Secretary of State at first very plainly endeavoured to snub the Minister of Justice, but without seeming to be impolite. At last seeing he was re-commencing the discussion, he stated to the Minister, according to the newspaper, that it was a piece of impertinence on his part—these were the very words used—to take part in the discussion, the Secretary having previously asked him if he had any credentials from the British Government and having been answered by the Minister that he had not. Then it was, according to the newspaper, that the Secretary said it was a piece of impertinence on the part of the Minister, and he left. Then the paper added that Sir Julian Pauncefote, after the Minister had left, chuckled at the snubbing he had received. I do not think there is any truth in the report, as the leader of the Opposition has already stated; but it will be of interest to know if there is anything whatever in the story, for I do not think the whole of it is true.

Motion agreed to.

STATISTICAL YEAR-BOOK.

Mr. CASEY moved for :

Copy of instructions given to the Queen's Printer and the Dominion Statistician relative to the number of copies of the last edition of the Statistical Year-Book which should be printed, and the method of distributing the same to members of the House and others.

He said : I make this motion largely for the purpose of calling attention to what I consider is a very objectionable order of things in connection with the distribution of the Statistical Year-Book for the past year. I received through the mail a copy of the book when published, and having temporarily lost it I wrote for another copy, and received a reply that no more were to be had. On coming down to Ottawa I inquired of the Dominion Statistician for other copies, and was told that the edition was exhausted. I asked how many copies had been printed and I was informed that the edition was 2,500. I asked if any reserve had been kept for the use of members of the House and was told no, that a few copies had been reserved for each Minister and that the rest were sent to the various applicants for them. I was further informed that, with one or two exceptions, members had not obtained more than one copy each. It appears to me that with an edition of 2,500 copies, 215 members of the House should have obtained more than one each. I may, perhaps, be paying an undue compliment to this publication by complaining that I cannot get a sufficient number of copies. We have been in the habit of saying that this compilation to a large extent is a campaign sheet, and I am afraid there is some ground for this complaint. I do not say the figures in the Year-Book have been falsified, but there are peculiar classifications adopted and peculiar calculations made, which are evidently for the purpose of producing a certain effect upon the minds of the reader. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition suggests that they are not more reliable than the ministerial newspapers, and I must confess there is considerable similarity between the assertions in those publications. Whether the Year-Book copies from the ministerial newspapers, or those newspapers from the Year-Book, it is not for me to say. I may call attention to one instance, the classification of lumber as a manufactured article. Only a few years have elapsed since lumber began to be classified as a manufactured article, it formerly appearing as the product of the forest; and we have seen during late years a most remarkable increase in the manufactured exports of Canada, due entirely to the export of lumber being classified under that head. When you examine the old Year-Books and the Trade and Navigation Returns and the exports of manufactured goods and compare them with the later ones, a considerable boom will be observed under the head of our exports; but if hon. members will consult the edition of the Year-Book for the last year, in which the principle of including lumber under manufactured products has been carried out through all these years, it will be observed that the exports of manufactured goods have fallen off. Whether the Year-Book is a campaign document or not, it is the only record available in the line of classified and compiled comparative tables of our financial and other affairs for use either by the press or on the platform, or for personal use. I urge that with all its faults it is a publication of which hon. members, without distinction of party, are entitled to receive a considerable number of copies, say ten or a dozen to each member. I also urge that the wants of members should be first attended to, because they are responsible to their constituents for the management of the financial affairs of the country and are called upon either to attack or defend the Government. If it should become necessary to print an edition twice or three times as large, it should be done; but with the edition that has been printed, I insist that members should have received the first consideration and have obtained a considerable number of copies. I submit this motion in order to obtain information as to what instructions were given, and to urge on the Government the necessity of revising those instructions for the future. What I said about the distribution of an extra number of copies of the Year-Book is equally true of the Auditor General's Report. Year after year we have to complain that we cannot get a sufficient number of these. It would seem—and I say it without fear of contradiction, because it is the only explanation I can give of it—that the Government are afraid to have too large a circulation of the Auditor General's Report, which is compiled under the authority of an officer directly responsible to Parliament, and of the Statistical Year-Book which is compiled by an officer under their own auspices. The solid facts of the one might perhaps contradict the classification, we may say, of the other. They are both documents which contain information upon which the mind of the country has to be made up at election times, and we should receive more of them than we do now.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Before the motion passes, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) that the Government, of course, are very pleased to give the information asked for in the motion. I have to say, too, that we are somewhat delighted at the fact that after the very great deal of abuse heaped on this Statistical Year-Book in the press supporting hon. gentlemen opposite, that we have heard now in the face of Parliament (and I hope it will be printed in the public press of the country) the highest compliment that could be paid to that statistical record, namely, a desire that a great many more copies of that useful work shall be given to the members of the House. The complaint which has been made by the member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) with regard to the distribution, is one in which members of the Government and members on this side of the House may join. The number printed was limited on account of a desire on the part of the Government to meet the wishes of my hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) and others who are sincerely anxious that the greatest economy should be practised with regard to these expenditures. These books are sent to foreign Governments, to members of both Houses of Parliament, to members of the local legislatures, and to the various Mechanics Institutes, and such societies throughout the country, and consequently the 2,500 copies printed do not go very far. The complaint of my hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey) that he was unable to get a copy of the Statistical Year-Book some time after it was published, might also be made by members of the Government and by members on this side of the House, because, when they asked for extra copies they were unable to obtain them. The certificate of character which has been given to the Year-Book by the member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), and which, I am sure, is concurred in by gentlemen on his side of the House, is such that we shall see whether or not a larger number can be printed and distributed, and we shall have great pleasure in giving some to the member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), in the hope that he will send them out to his constituents so that they shall know with accuracy the facts contained in that publication. I have to say further, that, according to the report of the department, the members of the Opposition have been treated in this matter just the same as members on this side of the House, and as the members of the Government themselves. In fact, if any discrimination has been used at all, it has been shown in favour of hon. gentlemen opposite in order that they have no reason whatever to complain. Certainly, no attempt has been made to withhold these works from them.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Secretary of State has referred to me, and I am very glad indeed to hear from him that the Government are disposed to adopt a system of economy. I must, however, tell the hon. gentleman that our experience in the past, and I am afraid it will be so in the future, is, that the course of the Government in this respect has been to strain at a gnat and swallow a camel. They have done economizing in the matter of issuing the Statistical Year-Book, and I trust they will give evidence of economy in respect to matters very much more important than that.

Mr. CASEY. My remarks on the Year-Book were not those of unqualified compliment to the book itself, but as it was the only tabulated form of statistics we had, we needed it, such as it was. I am afraid the argument of economy which the Secretary of State referred to will hardly pan out. It appears to me that the only economy the Government have been desirous of in the matter, has been an economy in giving information to the public and not economy with regard to the expense.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. To prevent any misunderstanding, I may just observe that although I have not taken the trouble to look at the book for a year or two—having found it about as worthless a record for the purpose of conveying any reliable information, as I ever saw, short of a campaign sheet issued by the hon. gentleman's own special direction and supervision—I beg entirely, on my part, to dissent from any idea that we complain of the economy of the Government in not issuing more copies of this book. I would like to see a decent Statistical Year-Book which could be relied upon, which could be appealed to, and which could be fairly placed in the hands of those desirous of obtaining correct information. I say nothing of the book as regards the last year or two, because I have not looked at it, but the last time I did look at it I found it entirely misleading, and I was sorry for the credit of the country, and for the credit of the Government, that such a thing had ever come out of the Government press.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I would suggest to the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) that he might get an extra copy from the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright).

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If I had the book, it would not be long finding its way into the waste paper basket.

Motion agreed to.

Colin F. McIsaac, Esq., for the Electoral District of Antigonish.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT.

Mr. REID moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 19) to amend the Civil Service Act. He said: The object of the amendments that I propose are, first, with a view to economise in the public expenditure; second, to change the system of examination so as to prevent the chances of candidates committing fraud by impersonation or otherwise at the examinations held annually, as has been done under the present system; third, to extend the limit of age; fourth, the general improvement of the service.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT.

Mr. BERGIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 20) to amend the Dominion Franchise Act. He said: In the county which I have the honour to represent, on the last revised list of voters there are one or two polling subdivisions which contain more than 300, and the object of this Bill is to amend the Act of 1891 so as to make it perfectly clear that the returning officer or the revising officer has power to make an extra subdivision in such cases.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Motion agreed to.

REPORTS.

Commissioner of Dominion Police Force, for the year 1894, under Revised Statutes of Canada, Chap. 184, section 5.—(Mr. Costigan.)

Report of the Minister of Agriculture for the Dominion of Canada, for the calendar year 1894.—(Mr. Montague.)

DOMINION VOTERS' LISTS.

Mr. EDGAR asked, What is the entire cost of the recent revision of the Dominion voters' lists? If the cost is not yet fully ascertained, how much of it is ascertained, and what is the estimate of the Government of the amount of the unascertained expenses?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The amount paid to the revisers up to April 25, 1895, was $148,248.16; the probable amount required to complete payment to revising barristers is placed at $12,000. The amount paid for printing is $35,166.89. All the lists are printed.

Mr. CASEY. No.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. CASEY. The list for my county is not.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Practically, they are all printed,—there may be one or two lists unfinished.

Mr. CASEY asked, Which of the voters' lists for 1894-95 have been, or are being printed elsewhere than at the Government Printing Bureau? Where have they been printed, or are now being printed? Was the printing of them let by tender? What rates have been agreed on for the printing of such lists?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Montreal—St. Antoine, wholly; St. Anne, wholly; St. James, wholly; Maissonneuve, wholly; St. Mary's, partly; St. Lawrence, partly; Hochelaga, partly. Toronto—East, wholly; West, Central, wholly. York—East, wholly; North, wholly; West, wholly. They have been printed, or are now being printed, as follows:—Montreal—St. Antoine, Gazette Printing Company; St. Anne, Gazette Printing Company, balance completed in Bureau; St. Mary's, Gazette Printing Company (part), the Trait d'Union, Journal of Commerce (part); St. James, Journal of Commerce (part), E. Sénécal & Son (part), La Presse (part); Hochelaga, Le Monde (part), balance completed in Bureau; Maissonneuve, La Minerve; St. Lawrence, Journal of Commerce, balance in Bureau. Toronto—Centre, Catholic Register (part); Thomas Moore & Co. (part); West, The Sentinel (part), Thomas Moore & Co. (part); East, the Mail Job Office. York—West, William Briggs; East, J. S. Williams; North, Thomas Moore & Co. The work was not offered to tender. The rates agreed on for the printing of the lists is 3 cents a name, and 50 cents for headings, being the rate allowed for printing supplementary lists throughout the Dominion.

Mr. BRODEUR (for Mr. Lavergne) asked, To whom did the Government intrust the printing of the electoral lists for Drummond and Arthabaska, Megantic and Richmond-Wolfe, for the last revision?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The electoral lists for Drummond and Arthabaska, Megantic and Richmond and Wolfe were printed at the Government Printing Bureau.

TAY CANAL—REVENUE AND MAINTENANCE.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, 1. What amount of revenue was derived from the Tay Canal during the season of navigation, in the year 1894? 2. What was the cost of maintenance and management of the Tay Canal during the year 1894?

Mr. HAGGART. The amount of revenue derived from the Tay Canal during the season of navigation, 1894, was $126.69. The cost of maintenance and management for the year 1894 was: Staff, $1,314.25; repairs, $1,144.64; total, $2,458.89, of which $1,012.67 was for renewing lock gates carried away by the steamer "Rideau Belle," which is an exceptional expenditure.

RAILWAY SUBSIDIES.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, What was the total amount of railway subsidies voted at the last session of the Canadian House of Commons?

Mr. HAGGART. The total amount of railway subsidies voted at last session was $4,661,160; revote, $1,700,580; new vote, $2,960,580.

DISTRIBUTION OF OFFICIAL DEBATES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I want, Mr. Speaker, to call the attention of whoever is responsible for the distribution of our "Hansard"—I suppose that it is the "Hansard" Committee—to a complaint which has been made to me by some gentlemen of the press, and which I think would deserve their attention. These gentlemen tell me that as regards the distribution of "Hansard" to the press, that all they receive are the "Hansard" sheets a fortnight or three weeks old, and then in uncorrected form, so that they are of little use. Now, I think it is very desirable that if we distribute "Hansard" to the press at all, it should be forwarded at once, and I can see no reason at all why this should not be done. For all practical purposes the "Hansard" reports are very fairly correct, and as the unrevised edition is the edition distributed, there seems to me to be no reason at all for holding it back for two or three weeks when it would be of service to these gentlemen if they got it immediately. I do not know which member of the Government holds himself responsible for "Hansard" or who at this moment is the chairman of the committee, but I think it would be well that these "Hansard" reports in their unrevised state should be sent at once to the newspapers which are in the habit of receiving them.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Did I understand my hon. friend to say that after the lapse of two or three weeks the unrevised edition was sent?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is the statement made to me. One gentleman says: "We get the "Hansard" sheets a fortnight or three weeks old, and then in uncorrected form." It struck me as a curious statement, but so it is made. I think what these gentlemen would like to get would be the "Hansard" as it comes out, and although occasionally some of us may find little curious errors—I recollect, for instance, on one occasion when I quoted a saying of Themistocles, it was debited to Mr. Peter Mitchell—still I do not particularly object. I think, Sir, it would be a great advantage to the press—these gentlemen are prominent members of the press, who write to me—to get the "Hansard" as it is issued to ourselves, and no harm would arise from it as they would be aware that it is uncorrected.

Mr. DAVIN. I think the informant of the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) has misled him. The "Hansard" used to be distributed immediately to the press and some hon. gentlemen, one of whom, I think, is present here, represented to the Committee, that the press would prefer to have the revised edition. I may say that I, knowing something about newspapers, stood up and said that that was a very extraordinary way of doing it, because if I were editing a paper I should like to get the full report as quickly as possible, especially as we had no newspaper which gave full reports. Those of us who held that, and I think nearly all of us who knew anything about newspapers held it, were overborne by the strong representations made to us that the press preferred to have the revised edition. I think that the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) will find that the only ground of complaint of his informant is that he gets the revised edition two or three weeks late, and that cannot be helped if he wants the revised edition. If it is the general desire to have the unrevised edition it can be sent to them immediately just as it is supplied to the members, and as it used to be supplied to the press before these representations were made to the Committee.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) must have been somewhat misinformed. The representatives of the press here at Ottawa get the unrevised report immediately, as soon as it is published. The intention is to send to the other papers throughout the country the revised report which cannot be sent for some days of course, because of its being required to be corrected.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understand, then, that any gentlemen of the press who apply for the unrevised edition will get it daily. If that is so, I suppose it will meet the difficulty.

Mr. DAVIN. I think so.

Mr. SCRIVER. The Committee will meet to-morrow and will decide that.

PROCESS OF EXECUTION AGAINST THE MESSRS. CONNOLLY.

Mr. LAURIER. The Solicitor General promised to give us to-day information which he could not give us yesterday, with regard to the date of issue of the process of execution against the Messrs. Connolly.

Mr. CURRAN. The process was issued only a few days before the hon. gentleman put his notice on the paper. You will understand the delay in reference to the first $10,000 which is due, not by the Connollys, but by Mr. Larkin, and which fell due only a short time ago. That is the case with reference to the first payment of the Messrs. Connolly also, so that there was no time lost.

Mr. LAURIER. That is not what I asked. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Curran) told us yesterday that the share of Mr. Larkin had been paid in September, if I remember aright. I asked him to give us the date of the issue of the process.

Mr. CURRAN. Instructions were given about four or five days ago.

Mr. LAURIER. We cannot have the exact data after all. The answer is only "four or five days ago."

Mr. CURRAN. I cannot give you the exact date. It was a day or so before the question was put on the Order paper.

DAIRY PRODUCTS ACT, 1893.

Mr. McLENNAN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee :

To consider a certain proposed Resolution to introduce a Bill to amend the Dairy Products Act, 1893.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LAURIER. Explain this Bill; we have never had a word of explanation on it yet.

Mr. McLENNAN. Mr. Chairman, the object of this Act is to amend subsection 1 of section 5 of the Dairy Products Act of 1893, and for the purpose of marking butter and cheese. I will state to the Committee the changes that I propose to make in section 5 of that Act: First, by striking out the words "any foreign country," in the second and third lines thereof, and adding instead thereof, the words "Canada or the United States," and by adding after the word "produced" in the fourth line thereof, the words, "and the month and year of manufacture thereof," and by adding after the word "legible" in the fifth line thereof, the words "and indelible," and by adding after the word "same" in the sixth line thereof, the words "and in the case of cheese, on the cheese itself before leaving the place of manufacture." If I read the clause as I propose to place it before the House, perhaps it will explain my intention more clearly. The clause will read as follows:—

Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

Subsection 1 of section 5 of "The Dairy Products Act, 1893," is hereby repealed, and the following substituted therefor:—

No person shall sell, offer, expose, or have in his possession for sale, any cheese or butter which is produced in Canada or the United States, unless the name of the country where such cheese or butter was produced, and the month and year of manufacture thereof is branded, stamped or marked in a legible and indelible manner upon the outside of every box or package which contains the same, and, in the case of cheese, on the cheese itself before leaving the place of manufacture, in letters not less than three-eighths of an inch high and one-quarter of an inch wide.

The reason I have put in the words "Canada or the United States" is because these are the countries most interested in the export of butter and cheese from Canadian ports. I have substituted the United States for "any foreign country" because otherwise this Bill might interfere with traders and grocers in this country who keep some French and German cheese for sale. So that I think it considerably simplifies matters to make the Bill apply only to butter and cheese from Canada and the United States. Now, the principal object of this Bill is to secure the branding of the cheese itself with the month and year of manufacture. It is very important that this should be done, because a great many farmers sell their cheese every two weeks or every month and only get the current prices prevailing at the time. Then the cheese passes into the hands of the trade; and in the past two or three years the speculative element in the trade, through the increased facilities of cold storage in Canada and Great Britain, have been in the habit of storing a large portion of the cheese of June, July and the first half of August, and holding it until November, and sometimes until January of the following year. Then it is offered to the trade without representation as to the date of its make, and is sold in the English market as the finest Canadian cheese, at a season of the year when our choice Canadian fall cheese is being marketed. Therefore, it can be easily seen that this placing of the cheese unfairly before the purchasers is injuring our product in the market, and must affect the prices the farmers, who are the producers of this article, would then obtain. The object of the Bill is to secure the branding of the cheese in such a way that the matter will be placed fairly and squarely before the purchasers in the old country, without any deception or misrepresentation, and they will know exactly what they are buying. The English market is the market we have to depend upon for the sale of our dairy products, and it is very necessary, in the interest of that industry, that we should keep faith with the people there. I have it from the best authority—from men who are prominent exporters in the city of Montreal—that about 90 per cent of the cheese coming into Montreal is re-coopered more or less when received in the warehouse and before being shipped, and that about 10 per cent is broken in such a way that new covers or new sides for the boxes, in some cases new boxes, are required. It is easy to see that in such a case American and Canadian cheese might easily become mixed, and American cheese might be placed upon the market as Canadian. This is another reason which makes it absolutely necessary that the cheese itself should be properly branded. This provision is asked for by purchasers in England, and I am sure that the House will agree with me that it is one that we should enact. I have received a copy of a memorial on this subject, signed by sixteen of the leading firms of Bristol, England, who deal in this article, and the honorary secretary of the Bristol Produce Trade Association, in a letter informs me that this memorial has been sent to the Secretary of State. It reads as follows:—

To the Honourable the Members of the Legislative Assembly of Canada in Parliament assembled,

This memorial sheweth :

That we, the undersigned importers of Canadian products, are strongly of opinion that it would be a distinct advantage to both producers and distributors of Canadian cheese if the date and make were legibly and indelibly marked on each cheese before it leaves the factory where made.

Your memorialists, therefore, pray your honourable House to pass a law making it compulsory upon all manufacturers of cheese in Canada to so mark each cheese before it leaves the factory where made.

Bristol, England, 25th March, 1895.

Now, I am sure that every member of this House on both sides is very much interested in the advancement of our dairy interests, and I should be very glad to receive any assistance or suggestion in order to make this Bill as perfect as possible. This is the most important industry we have in Canada, and I am sure there can be no harm in placing this matter fairly and squarely before the people of Great Britain, upon whom we depend for our market.

Mr. McMILLAN. I do hope that a Bill of this kind will pass the House. During the last season, our cheese industry, which is a very important one, suffered very much from summer cheese being held back and placed on the market as fall cheese. I think it is absolutely necessary that all cheese should have the date of manufacture and the name of the factory or manufacturer indelibly stamped upon it. The English market is very susceptible to improper influences, and if it is found that our summer cheese is being held back and put upon that market as fall cheese, it will injure one of the most important industries in Canada—an industry which, during all this time of depression, has held its own and a little more; and it is about the only product of the farm that has done so. I do hope that this Bill will come before the House and become law, so that fair protection will be afforded to those who are honestly placing their cheese products upon the market.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understand that the proposition of my hon. friend from Glengarry (Mr McLennan) is chiefly to compel the stamping of the date upon each package of cheese.

Mr. McLENNAN. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am very glad to hear it. I quite accord with his view that it is absolutely necessary, for the protection of our cheese industry, that no possible chance shall be given for anything that can deteriorate the quality of that great article of export.

Mr. TAYLOR. As will be seen by the Notice paper, I have a motion dealing with this same question. I presume the Bill of my hon. friend has covered the ground which my motion was intended to do, except, in so far as I can gather, no provision is made for inspection of the factories. That is something which, I think, should be added to the Bill before it leaves the committee. There should be some penalty imposed upon the producer, in the case of negligence on his part in not branding the cheese. This is a very serious question. I have a letter from a friend of mine dealing with this question, as regards the shipment from Montreal. He writes :

I notice by the Montreal "Gazette" that you have a resolution before the House respecting the branding of cheese. I presume it refers to Canadian cheese, and it is probably the result of a controversy between the English buyers and the Canadian exporters regarding September cheese. If I remember right, it was claimed by the English buyers that July or August cheese was branded "September make," and placed by the exporters on the English market as being September cheese. This allegation the Canadian exporters indignantly denied, and reported that, if such cheeses were so branded, it must have been done in England and by the English themselves. Without entering into the discussion or even venturing an opinion on the subject, I beg leave to give you some information, which may or may not be of use to you. I know that you are very much interested in the agricultural industries and that you take a deep interest in the cheese production as a staple industry. Therefore, I merely state for your information, that last fall I saw load after load of Canadian cheese sent down to the vessels for export with the words "September make" branded on the boxes in large letters. Whether branded thus in the factories where made or in Montreal warehouses, I know not, neither do I know whether or not it was September cheese. I merely relate the fact that cheese left the port of Montreal with that particular brand on the boxes. I mention it to you in case you may find it of service; if not, there can be no harm done.

From my experience, there is no factory in the country which has branded its summer cheese, September make, but the buyers have purchased cheese in June, July and August, and with the facilities now enjoyed for cold storage they can hold it until the fall, and brand it on the boxes as September make, and it goes home to England as September make, although made in June. We see by the newspapers that a good deal of agitation was caused in England in that regard. I hold in my hand a clipping from the Montreal "Star," containing a telegram dated London, 16th :

(Montreal "Star" cable).—A meeting of the British commission merchants who import Canadian cheese has been called for an early date, to protest against alleged frauds said to be perpetrated on the trade by some of the largest Canadian shippers. These people, it is said, are sending out summer-made cheese labelled as September made, and thereby securing much higher prices for a much inferior article. Such actions on the part of Canadian shippers are, it is represented, sure to imperil Canada's cheese trade with the British islands, as well as other European countries. A deputation is to wait on Sir Charles Tupper, Canada's High Commissioner, and request that the Dominion Government legislate forthwith, to ensure that each cheese, instead of each box, be branded with the date of making. A London dealer to-day purchased 12,000 cheese of the maritime provinces make.

I understand that the Bill makes provision for the branding of the cheeses themselves as well as the boxes, because unless the brand is on the cheese itself there is very little use putting it on the boxes. The cheeses should be branded as well as the boxes, and then, back of that, there should be some means provided for inspection either at the factory or at the boards of trade where the cheeses are delivered. I shall have very much pleasure in withdrawing my motion if this Bill goes far enough to cover the ground, as I presume it does, save that portion referring to inspection. I may just say here that I have another clipping from a newspaper, the official organ of the Wisconsin Dairymen's Association, which admits the superior quality of Canadian cheese :

Mr. N. Simon, of Neenah, Wis., who won such a fine reputation for the making of full cream cheese at the Columbian World's Fair, went to England the past summer to see what he could do in making a market for the fine goods he is making. Let it be remembered that he was in the market largely possessed by Wisconsin cheese only a few years since. The spirit and response he met with was very disheartening and may be stated in the words used by a Liverpool dealer : 'We want no more to do with your Wisconsin cheesemakers. We have tried you and have been swindled. You will send us a few fine cheese, and then first thing we know you dump a lot of filled cheese on us. We shall trade no more with men who cheat and defraud. When we want good cheese, we send to Canada.' What is true of the English market will soon become true of the best home market. "A bad name is soon known to all the earth," says the old proverb.

Whether this fraud be perpetrated by the exporter or the merchant in England, it is in the interests of the Canadian producer that his goods should leave the factory branded with the month and the year of production, and a penal clause should be enforced compelling the producers to do this, and also inflicting a penalty on the purchaser or exporter who removes the brand.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I need scarcely say that the Government recognizes this as a very important matter, and I wish to inform the House that they are seriously considering the question which has been brought to our attention by the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), as well as the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan). There can be no objection whatever to the resolution passing. Indeed, the House is indebted to the hon. member for Glengarry, as well as the hon. member for South Leeds, for the attention they have paid to the subject and the information they have given, and when the time comes for dealing with the Bill, the Government will be prepared to explain their policy to the House. I have now to say that I do not quite understand how far the hon. member for Glengarry proposes to go. If he proposes to deal only with the dairy products which are exported, that is a matter which certainly comes within the jurisdiction of this House. But if he proposes to deal with dairy products sold in the local markets, that might be a matter more particularly under the jurisdiction of the local authorities. Under any circumstances, the Government are quite aware of the importance of the matter, and are giving it due consideration. They are also aware of the importance to Canadian producers of keeping up the character and reputation of Canadian cheese in the British market. And I was glad to hear the testimony given by an hon. gentleman opposite to the fact that the prices of Canadian cheese in Great Britain had not become reduced during the past year, when low prices were the rule. No doubt, the hon. gentleman who spoke is well aware that that fact is due to the very high standing which Canadian cheese obtained at the World's Fair in competition with the cheese of other countries. The Government are giving the matter their very best attention with a view of promoting in the best possible way the dairy interests of Canada.

Mr. DAVIN. I think it would be well if the attention of the Minister of Agriculture was directed to the North-west Territories from this standpoint. In a new country like the North-west it would be very desirable that means should be taken to encourage the manufacture of cheese. We have some cheese factories and, as you are well aware, Sir, our milk is probably the richest milk in the Dominion as cream-producing milk. There is no doubt that cheese is destined to be a staple product in those territories. I would urge upon the attention of the Secretary of State, who, no doubt, represents the Minister of Agriculture here, to consider, seeing that we there are still in a state of pupilage, whether or not now, or not too far in the future, some substantial aid—although it would really amount to a very small sum in the aggregate—should not be given to the districts in order to encourage, for a short time, the manufacture of cheese in those districts. I hope my hon. friend the Secretary of State will bring this subject before his colleague the Minister of Agriculture, Hon. Senator Angers.

Mr. McMULLEN. Undoubtedly, this question of the cheese industry is a very important one, and I am glad to learn from the Secretary of State that the Government intend to give it their best consideration. So far as the character and standing of Canadian cheese in the English market is concerned, that is due more to the record it has made in the English market for itself than to any advantage we gained at Chicago. Undoubtedly we made a very creditable exhibit and gained an enviable name, which will prove an additional advantage. But the Canadian cheese has, from year to year, so risen in the estimation of British consumers that it now enjoys the very highest reputation in that market. I hope it will continue to win the appreciation of the consumers in England, which will keep it in strong demand and maintain its price. With regard to the North-west, and the suggestion which my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has been pressing upon the consideration of the Government, I am sure we should be rejoiced to see the North-west prosper in the production of cheese. However, in my humble opinion, in the present financial condition of this Dominion, I fancy the North-west will have to strike out for itself and manifest the enterprise necessary to build up the cheese industry for which, no doubt, that country is well fitted. The pasture lands of that country are rented at one or two cents an acre to the ranching companies, and if men with the advantages they possess cannot produce cheese without a bounty from the Dominion treasury, I am afraid my hon. friend will long press the consideration of his proposal upon this House before he will gain its sanction. There is another point I should like to see embodied in the Bill when it is brought down, and that is, that not merely shall the name of the factory and the date, but also the province in which the factory is situated be branded upon the cheese. The province of Ontario, and some portions of Quebec have a very creditable reputation for their cheese product, one that it has cost them a great deal to make, and one that is very valuable; and we want to see that that record is not injured by having cheese branded as Canadian which is from districts of the Dominion whose cheese would come far short of the high standard that the best Canadian cheese has now attained in the English market. So, I hope that when this Bill comes down, it will provide for the name of the province, and of the county as well, will be branded upon the cheese, so as to protect those who have contributed so largely to the very high reputation which Canadian cheese now enjoys in Great Britain.

Resolution reported.

Mr. McLENNAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 21) to amend the Dairy Products Act of 1893.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

IMMIGRATION—TRANSPORT OF JEW PEDLARS.

Mr. MARTIN moved for :

Copies of all correspondence between the Department of the Interior and Mr. Schomacher, Rev. T. D. Phillips, Mr. P. F. Daly, Captain Holmes, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and any other persons ; and also all reports received by the said department from any of its agents or other persons as to the transportation of a number of Jew pedlars from Chicago to Calgary with the intention of settling the same upon farms near Calgary, referred to in a letter dated 29th December, 1894, signed L. M. Fortier, addressed to the editor of the Winnipeg "Free Press," and published in that paper on 4th January, 1895 ; also a statement showing what became of said Jew pedlars and how many of them were committed to jail in Calgary, and for what offences.

He said : Last session I introduced a resolution which was carried on the 7th May, asking that information similar to that which is asked for in the resolution I now submit. Although that motion was duly carried in the House, no papers were brought down in response to it : and I desire to enter my protest against the conduct of the Government in regard to that motion, and the system of procedure which they seem to have adopted very generally with regard to resolutions moved by gentlemen on this side of the House, asking for information. I consider that the action of the Government in paying no attention whatever to the resolutions of this House, duly passed, is directed, not against the Opposition, but against the House as a whole. It seems to me that it is very much against the dignity and against the rights and privileges of this House that the Government, having allowed motions of this nature asking for information to pass, should adopt the system that they appear to have adopted as a regular policy, of declining and refusing to bring down the information which has been asked for. I may say that I had occasion, with regard to a considerable number of returns which I moved for last session, to call upon the Government, and other members of this House had occasion to call upon the Government, day after day, asking when the information was to be furnished. The Minister concerned invariably promised that he would look into it, and that was the last we heard of it. It would appear to me that the proper course for the Government to adopt, if they are unwilling to furnish any particular information, is to take the manly course of refusing to allow the motion to pass, and to give their reasons for it. But to burk the natural desire and the rights of members of this House to inquire for information, by the system adopted of allowing a motion to pass and then neglecting to bring the information down, seems to me subversive of the privileges of this House, and I, as one member, protest very strongly indeed against that system. I may say that one motion which was allowed to pass without any opposition, without any discussion, last session, was an order of the House for a return showing the expenses incurred by Ministers of the Crown in their trips through the country for the purpose of obtaining information as to the working of the tariff. After having allowed that motion to pass, the Government, towards the end of the session, coolly stated to the House that they did not intend to bring down the information. In another case a motion was passed at my instance, asking for the expenses of Canada in detail with regard to the World's Columbian Exposition at Chicago. That motion was passed, and also a motion somewhat similar in its terms made by the hon. member for North Norfolk. I had some correspondence sent to me by officials of the department, inquiring whether the two returns might not be consolidated together. I replied that I was quite agreeable that it should be done in that way as long as all the information that I asked for was communicated to the House. In spite of that, Mr. Speaker, and in spite of the fact that Mr. Larke, and I think other officers who were employed at Chicago, were kept here in Ottawa all summer, presumably engaged in the work of closing up the affairs of Canada as to that exposition, that return has never been brought down to this day. Now, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the particular matter as to which I now move, fortunately considerable light has been thrown upon the transaction by some correspondence which has appeared in the public press in Manitoba in regard to this matter. I asked last session for information as to the immigration efforts of the Department of the Interior which had resulted, as I had been informed, in bringing a number of settlers to Calgary, presumably with the intention of locating upon farms and becoming settlers in the country, while, as a matter of fact, it appeared that those persons were Jews, whose occupation in life had been that of peddling, and that instead of coming as settlers to take up farms, those persons, after they had been brought out at a large expense to the Government, had resumed their occupation of peddling, and a number of them had found their way in a short space of time into the Calgary jail. The hon. Minister of the Interior entirely denied, as I understood him, the suggestion that I made. His remarks will be found in the "Hansard" at page 2420 : "I regret exceedingly that the hon. gentleman should have seen fit to give out to the world, through his utterances in this House, that any class in that country are in the condition he describes. It would be well for the hon. gentleman to secure better information on subjects of this kind before undertaking to deal with them.

Now, as to the Jews, of whom he speaks as having come from Chicago to Calgary, he has also indulged in exaggeration. It appears that the intention of the Canadian Pacific Railway agent in Chicago was called to the fact by Rev. T. D. Phillips, late of Ottawa, and for some time residing in Chicago, that there was a number of people, consisting of Germans, Hungarians and Poles, who were in his parish in Chicago, and who were desirous of emigrating to the North-west, or to portions of the North-west states, where they could go upon farms. The information given to the Canadian Pacific Railway was that these people were farmers, that they had been accustomed to farming in the old country, and that some of them had done farming in the States since they came out, and also that they were possessed of money ranging from $300 to $600 each. Upon these representations of the Rev. Mr. Phillips, the Canadian Pacific Railway agent notified the Government agent, Capt. Holmes, of these people's desire, and I will read from Mr. Holmes' report what he says concerning them. It is on page 150 of the report of the Department of the Interior :

Letters having been received from Rev. Mr. Phillips in Chicago, representing some 70 families in Chicago, and from parties in Idaho, Washington and Oregon, I was instructed by the department to visit these places and make arrangements for representatives of these people to visit the North-west. In Chicago I saw Rev. Mr. Phillips and met several of the people about whom he had corresponded. They made arrangements for a mass meeting on the following Sunday evening at Rochester Hall, where I met some 700 people and explained the requirements for homesteading.

I found them a mixed lot, consisting of Germans, Poles and Hungarians principally, with about 25 per cent Jews among them, the remainder being Lutherans, Roman Catholics and other persuasions. They selected four of their number to go to the Calgary district and select land, and asked to have an agent familiar with the country sent with them. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company kindly furnished transportation for the party over their lines, the delegates paying for their own transportation to the boundary and return.

This is the statement of the department as to what really did occur :

As a result of this expedition, some twenty heads of families left Chicago in the month of June and took up homesteads on the line of the Calgary and Edmonton Railroad. They took with them sums of money averaging about $500 per family. Some of them have since sent for their families, and all have been self-supporting.

Then the hon. gentleman proceeded to say for himself :

Now, it appears, as stated here, that 25 per cent of the people whom Captain Holmes met were Jews, and that amongst the delegates was one Jew. It appears that this man did most of the talking, and because he was a Jew and did most of the talking, the press opposed to the Government of that country, naturally concluded that all the rest of the people were Jews. But Captain Holmes' report speaks for itself. He says that these twenty families went there, that they are as good subjects as it is necessary for us to get into that country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, on account of the failure of the Government to furnish the return I asked for, that was the only information that was available on this question. My information was exactly the contrary to that given by Captain Holmes to the department and reiterated by the Minister of the Interior. My information was that these men were taken out, not by accident, not hurriedly, but after the fullest inquiry, after a special agent of the department had been sent to Chicago to investigate the question, after he had met a number of them, after a special agent of the department had been sent with the delegates representing these people to conduct them to the North-west, and to see that Yankee land agents did not get hold of them and take them away en route; that after the delegates returned and reported, a number of people were sent out, 20 heads of families, and the announcement was made that they would really become good, law-abiding citizens. I say in opposition to that view, my information was that those men were not farmers at all, that they had not been engaged in the business of farming, but in the business of peddling, that when they reached Calgary, instead of taking up land they resumed their occupation of peddling, and it has been reported, and I have no doubt it is a fact, that many of them were people of a far from desirable class, and that a considerable number of them shortly after arriving in Calgary were locked up in jail charged with serious offences. This charge was reported by the press in the west, and eventually Mr. Loftus M. Fortier, who is head of this branch of the Interior Department, thought it incumbent on him to write to the newspapers in respect to the very serious attacks made on the Minister in this and other respects, as regards his entire failure to carry out his promise of carrying out a vigorous immigration policy in Manitoba and the North-west Territories. I will quote the letter written by the hon. gentleman's officer. It appeared in the 'Free Press,' published in Winnipeg, on 6th January last, and is as follows :

To the Editor of the "Free Press" :

Sir,—I have before me the leading article entitled "The Department of the Interior Down on Us," which appeared in your issue of the 24th December.

I am glad to find that you did not after all mean to go so far as to state, as might be inferred from your article of the 5th December, that the net result of the immigration work of the department, since Mr. Daly became Minister, plus ten times as much similar work done by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company during the same period, was the arrival in the North-west of "a few pedlars and similar immigrants."

It seems that in using this phrase you were referring to a "particular incident of immigration," and as that incident has impressed itself so deeply on the editorial mind that the columns of the "Free Press" have never ceased dilating upon it, it would perhaps be well for me to take this opportunity of enlightening your readers as to the facts.

You are mistaken in supposing that the incident in question had any connection with the World's Fair. The foundation of our action in the matter was a letter dated the 17th of March, 1893, from the General Passenger Agent of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company at Montreal, stating as follows:—

"I understand from our Chicago representative that there are quite a number of Germans in and around Chicago who might, by judicious work of a Government agent, be secured for the Canadian North-west. * * * * Do you care to do anything in the matter? If so, the agent whom you may appoint might see our Mr. Lee in Chicago, who will give him all the information in his power."

About the same time the department received a communication from a well-known Canadian clergyman, the Rev. T. D. Phillips, formerly mathematical master in the Collegiate Institute here, and who now occupies a prominent position in ecclesiastical circles in Chicago, and, as Mr. Phillips spoke highly of the people in question, and we had, and still have, every reason for attaching weight to any representations made by him, especially when, as in this case, they were so thoroughly coincided in by the Canadian Pacific authorities, the department certainly thought that the matter should at least be looked into, and our chief agent in the United States, Captain Holmes, was sent to Chicago for this express purpose, with instructions to take such action in the premises as he might deem advisable, after consulting with the District Passenger Agent of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Rev. Mr. Phillips, and the people themselves.

Soon after his arrival in Chicago, Captain Holmes reported, in effect, that from his preliminary inquiries he believed there was something in the business; that he had arranged to meet representatives of the proposed emigrants, and that he would at such meeting recommend them to select three or four delegates who could go and spy out the land and report to the others. He added: "In this connection I respectfully submit that, in view of the activity of the agents of the Great Northern and Northern Pacific railways and their efforts to attract settlers to the lines of their roads, this party (of delegates) should not be allowed to leave excepting under escort, as everything depends on their getting to our country before being loaded up with false statements."

On receipt of this report, Captain Holmes was instructed by telegraph to employ the best man he could get as escort, and, entirely on the recommendation of Mr. Lee, District Passenger Agent of the Canadian Pacific Railway at Chicago, and without even knowing of his relationship to the Minister, he appointed Mr. P. F. Daly for this service, Mr. Lee and other prominent railroad men in Chicago testifying to his capability and general fitness. I might quote letters from Mr. Lee and Captain Holmes detailing the whole circumstances of this appointment, but time and space will not permit.

I may say a word or two with respect to this matter. Mr. P. F. Daly is a brother of the Minister of the Interior, and this clerk in the department seems to find it necessary to make very elaborate explanations to the effect that it was entirely without any knowledge on the part of the immigration agent, Captain Holmes, that Mr. Daly was employed to do this service, he being a brother of the Minister of the Interior. I do not see why the representative of our part of Canada in the Cabinet is not entitled to the same rights so far as having his relatives, brothers, cousins and other connections appointed to office as have Ministers of the Crown coming from other portions of Canada. I cannot understand why Mr. Fortier should think it so important and necessary to draw the attention of the public to the fact that this appointment was made by the Government in entire ignorance of the fact that this gentleman is a brother of the Minister at the head of this department. I must say that, so far as my observation goes, Captain Holmes must be a very poor judge of appearances if he was unable to see the strong personal resemblance between Mr. P. F. Daly and his brother, the Minister; but, at all events, from the standpoint of hon. gentlemen opposite, there was nothing wrong in that, and I am simply entering my protest against the idea that Manitoba should not have its rights in this respect as in other respects. The letter continues:

The proposed meeting was held, delegates selected, and in due course the delegates went to the North-west under Mr. P. F. Daly's guidance; they looked over the country, and on their return Captain Holmes again visited Chicago.

I read this letter in full to show the House that this matter received due consideration from the department, that its highly paid agent, Captain Holmes, was instructed to give it his personal attention; and I do this with a view to ask the House to consider whether the officers of the department engaged in this work are very trustworthy, whether their efforts are likely to furnish an adequate return for the large expenditure paid year after year for their salaries and expenses, when this work, undertaken with plenty of time at their disposal and every means of ascertaining exactly what they were doing, resulted in the very lamentable fiasco which is admitted at the closing portion of the letter. The letter continues:

What then took place, and the justification for our subsequent action, will best be explained by the following extracts from a letter from the Rev. Mr. Phillips:—

"They (the delegates) came back delighted with the country."

Evidently they thought Calgary was a very good place in which to do a little peddling. They were also, no doubt, delighted with the Government, which had been kind enough to give them a fine time, to provide a man for their guidance and to show them special attention, and to take them up as delegates to spy out this land flowing with milk and honey. The letter continues :

"They reported to me at once. At Captain Holmes' request, adopted with the earnest solicitation of the delegates, I attended a splendid meeting of steady, well-dressed, extremely intelligent men, in Rochester Hall, on the evening of the 7th (May). * * * I was glad to hear him giving the emigrants the same advice as I had previously tendered them, that is, not to attempt to move, as they had contemplated, four hundred families at once. Accordingly, I have this morning prepared from notes given me by the delegates a list of 83 heads of families, i.e., married men, 58; widower, 1; single men, 24; 48 of them being farmers, the rest—butchers, 2; carpenters, 7; labourers, 6; shoemakers, 4; smiths, 2; teacher, 1; teamster, 1. These with their families, in all about 329 souls, propose to start on or about May the 20th."

Any lingering misgivings the department might still have had about this movement were completely dispelled by the following paragraph in your issue of the 16th of June, 1893, announcing the arrival of the first batch of the people at Winnipeg :—

"IMMIGRATION FROM ILLINOIS."

"A large party of German immigrants from Chicago arrived this morning from the East in charge of Immigration Agent Shoemaker, of Illinois. There are twenty-one adults in the party besides a number of children, and all are in comfortable circumstances. They will remain over here for three or four days before proceeding west. They intend looking over the Red Deer, the Innisfail and the Macleod districts before finally determining where to locate."

Mr. Fortier thinks that the "Free Press" was as much deceived with regard to these people as he admits that the Government and their agents were, but it is only necessary to point out, Mr. Speaker, that in an item of this kind, the reporter of a newspaper, no doubt, gets his information from the agent in charge, and he was simply echoing the opinion of that gentleman in putting this in as a matter of local news. Mr. Fortier continues :

This party went out in charge of Mr. Schumacher (not "Shoemaker"), one of our German officers, and included the persons previously conducted by Mr. P. F. Daly as delegates.

I am sure that your impartial readers will admit that up to this point the department had ample justification for its action in the matter, and good cause to feel satisfied with the immediate and prospective results.

I would say that if the department had trustworthy agents, and if it had a system which was likely to prove successful, after what had been done, they could have been assured that these men were as represented, and that they were men likely to be valuable settlers for the country. What does Mr. Fortier proceed to say :

But, to make a long story short, the reports we soon afterwards received from Mr. Schu-macher, and from one or two others of our agents, convinced us that the Canadian Pacific authorities,—

I don't see that they ever had so much to do with it except in a very general way.

—the Rev. Dr. Phillips, the department, and even the "Free Press," had been deceived in these people, and that in truth they were not at all a desirable class of settlers, and we thereupon dropped the matter, and took care that no more of them went out under our auspices.

Dropping, at the same time, a very considerable amount of the immigration grant for that particular year. Now, Mr. Speaker, this agent admits, practically, that these settlers were not desirable immigrants, and I have no doubt that the facts are as I have stated them, namely, that when they got out there it was found that they were not farmers, that they were not blacksmiths, that they were not carpenters, and that they were not settlers whom it is desirable to encourage to come to our North-west; but that they were not a lot of Jew peddlars who were accustomed to make their money in that business, and against whom there is no particular objection, possibly, except that they belong to a class that it is not necessary to encourage to come to the country, because we have any number of them already. More than that, it appears that they were not even reputable citizens, because I am credibly informed that a number of them shortly after their arrival in Calgary were incarcerated in the jail for somewhat serious offences. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to get proper and full and correct information with regard to this matter. I have stated to the House that I endeavoured to do so last session, but that when I made statements somewhat similar to those I have been making to-day, and without as full information as I have to-day, I was met with the reply from the Minister of the Interior that I was entirely incorrect, that my statements were without foundation in fact, and that this particular immigration to which I was alluding was a most successful one, and that these men were in possession of homesteads, and had become good settlers in the country. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Daly) allows the motion to pass, I hope he will not take the same course that he did last year, and fail to bring down the information. If he is unwilling that the House and the country should have correct information as to the effect of the money spent by his department in regard to immigration work, then let him adopt the more manly course of opposing the resolution, and there will be an end to it. But, if he allows the motion to pass, I hope he will bring down the information fully and completely. Before leaving the matter, I would like to say with regard to the real facts of the case—that I have been able to find out after very considerable trouble, and probably never would have found out fully only for the information volunteered by Mr. Fortier, this clerk in the department—I have to say that I believe that this is a fair sample of the result of the vigorous immigration policy which the hon. the Minister of the Interior has introduced. There is really nothing that interests more the people of Manitoba and the Territories than the very serious problem of getting more people into that country. We have a great many matters brought up in this House with regard to our western territories. We have the difficulties of settlers discussed, we have the great railway problem, the question of the high freight rates charged by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which is considered by many of the people out there to be one of the greatest evils that we labour under; we have all these questions up here for discussion, but what, after all, is the real difficulty that underlies all these evils that come to the surface? The real difficulty is that the country is not filled up with immigrants. Preparations have been made there for millions of people, while the truth is that there are only a few hundred thousand inhabitants. Canada at large has spent large sums of money in opening up that country, in surveying it, in providing it with railway communication, in carrying on government there, in furnishing it with postal facilities, and Canada at large is very much interested in the development of that country which can only come through a large increase in its population. A really vigorous immigration policy is what the country demands. The hon. gentleman promised it to us. He has, it is true, spent the money regularly each year, but he has failed utterly and entirely to provide any substantial increase in the population during the years that he has been in office. In fact, since the Department of Immigration was changed from the Agricultural Department to the Department of the Interior, under his control, immigration has steadily fallen off. The money continues to be spent, lectures are sent over to the old country, and Mr. Fortier, in portions of his letter which I did not read, alludes to the advertisements which are inserted in foreign newspapers, and the large sums of money that are paid out for literature, which is scattered over the old countries. Why, there is one gentleman, a resident of the city in Manitoba in which the hon. the Minister of the Interior made his home before he came here, who is in the habit of now and again opposing the Government, and coming out very strongly in his newspaper against the policy of the Government. After that has gone on for a few months, the hon. the Minister of the Interior knows very well what that gentleman wants, and knows how to stop his attacks upon the policy of the Government. He gets him to write an immigration pamphlet, and he also gets him to print it in his printing office, and this pamphlet is sent over at large expense and distributed in different parts of the old country. That is what the hon. gentleman understands as a vigorous immigration policy. I have no hesitation in saying, Mr. Speaker, that the large sum, comparatively speaking—not larger than it should be, and, in fact, to my mind, much less than it should be—that is voted by this House each year for the purpose of immigration, is almost entirely wasted. The department seem to have the ability to select such men as Captain Holmes, who are capable of going to Chicago and addressing a meeting of pedlars under the supposition that they are farmers, and taking them to the North-west to grow wheat and raise cattle. This is the kind of expenditure which the hon. gentleman has indulged in since he promised to inaugurate a vigorous immigration policy. His policy has been an entire failure; but I hope to see the day when this Parliament and the Government will initiate a policy which will have the result of increasing very largely the population of the North-west. When that is done effectually, then Canada, will begin to be recouped for the sums of money which it has spent in opening up that country, by the taxation which it will receive from the people who settle there. There is nothing wrong with that country. It is admitted by all who have visited it to be a country capable of holding millions, and well calculated to receive the surplus population from other parts of the world. It does not do so. Why not? Will the hon. gentleman explain to us? Does he attempt in his reports to explain why, after all the expenditure he has incurred, his efforts have been so entirely fruitless? He did last session claim that he was to a certain extent successful in bringing a few immigrants to the Edmonton country. I admitted then that he had brought some good immigrants into that portion of the country. So far as the hon. gentleman does successful work, I have no hesitation in giving him credit for it; but I have no hesitation in saying that his vigorous immigration policy, since he has undertaken the work, has been, on the whole, considered fairly, almost an entire failure.

Mr. DALY. I am sure there is not the slightest objection on the part of the Government to bringing down the papers which the hon. gentleman asks for. He complains that certain papers which he moved for last session were not brought down. The motion to which the hon. gentleman refers read as follows:—

Return showing the number of settlers brought into the Yorkton and Saltcoats districts from Dakota, and into the Calgary district from Chicago, and showing in each case the nationality of such settlers, the cost of obtaining them, and the number that still remain and the occupations those remaining are engaged in.

That is an entirely different motion from the one the hon. gentleman makes to-day. But I may say that I was not aware until this morning that this information he asked for was not brought down, and I will lay it on the Table to-morrow. I regret very much that in the pressure of business the matter was overlooked, because I wish the House to understand that the Government and the Department of the Interior have nothing to hide in this matter. But I think the House has arrived at the conclusion that it is a matter of indifference to the hon. gentleman how many Jews may have been brought to Calgary so long as he has an opportunity to get a fling at me. I am the Jew he is after; I think there is no doubt about that. When the papers are laid before the House, I think the hon. gentleman will see that the Department of Interior did everything they could do to protect the public interest in this matter, and if they were to a certain extent deceived, it was not the fault of the department or their officers. Now, the hon. gentleman would lead the House to suppose that we took into that country no people but Jews, and that they all came from Chicago, because in his opening remarks he said that we were bringing settlers into Calgary, that they were all Jew pedlars and that a great number of them were committed to jail.

Mr. MARTIN. I was referring entirely to this particular episode.

Mr. DALY. According to my information, there has been only one of those men incarcerated in the Calgary jail, and that man was incarcerated at the instance of one of his associates, and it was some time after they arrived. I think that three times in the course of his speech the hon. gentleman repeated that we had brought in Jew pedlars, that they were not farmers, and that most of them were incarcerated in the Calgary jail; and it turns out that only one was incarcerated and for an offence not against any of the old settlers, but against one of his fellow countrymen. Now, what are the facts? It appears that on the 17th of March, 1893, the following letter was received by the Deputy Minister of the Interior from Mr. McNicoll, General Passenger Agent of the Canadian Pacific Railway at Montreal:—

A. M. Burgess, Esq.,

Department of the Interior, Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—I understand from our Chicago representative that there are quite a number of Germans in and around Chicago who might, by judicious work of a Government immigration agent, be secured for the Canadian North-west. The agent, of course, would require to be a German. Do you care to do anything in the matter. If so, the agent whom you may appoint might see our Mr. Lee in Chicago, who will give him all the information in his power. In this connection, of course, some German literature would be necessary.

Yours truly,

D. McNICOLL.

In addition to that, there was transferred to the Department of Interior by Mr. Lowe, the Deputy Minister of Agriculture, a letter received by him from the Rev. T. D. Phillips, as follows:—

47th St., Chicago, Feb. 24, 1893.

Dear Mr. Lowe,—I have been approached by some Germans who tell me that they represent a community of four hundred, who think of emigrating to the Canadian North-west early this spring to settle on homestead grants. They are chiefly agriculturists from the neighbourhood of Mensal in Germany. They are certainly not rich, but from what I know of them they are industrious, and would, as far as I can form an opinion, make good settlers. They have artisans enough among them to constitute an independent community. They can muster means enough to carry them to the North-west and probably have a little to start farming with. The one or two of them who have heard through me of the advantages of Canada speak very fair English. Indeed, one of them, my shoemaker, has worked in London. Evidently, they have found, as far as Chicago is concerned, that all is not gold that glitters. They are being pressed by the tremendously increased rents and corresponding increase in the cost of living. It might be worth while to send a German-speaking agent among these people. At any rate, I have promised to do all I can to forward their wise intention of leaving for Canada, and should like copies of any emigration literature published by the department in German. If you will kindly have such sent to me at once, I will see it put where it will do most good. I sincerely hope that beloved Canada will use the forthcoming exposition as her advertising medium. With my regards,

Yours faithfully,

THOS. D. PHILLIPS.

After the receipt of Mr. Phillips' letter, Captain Holmes, the immigration agent in Chicago, wrote as follows:—

I have met a Mr. Leet, who represents some 300 or 400 families, all of whom have been brought up on farms and know the work, but who are now working in Chicago at various trades, such as carpentering, blacksmithing, bricklaying, labouring, and some few at shoe-making and tailoring. They have a meeting called for Sunday afternoon next, at which I am to be present and set forth the advantages of our North-west. They want to send four of their number as delegates at as small a cost as possible, and suggest that the Government should pay their expenses. They are of all religions, and, as I take it, they want a representation of the four leading sects. I told Mr. Leet that, if they selected four men who will pay their fares to Winnipeg and return, via American lines, we will pass them to points west and return to Winnipeg. But this will cost about $36 per delegate, and they cannot afford it. I have told them in reply that if they will pay their railroad fare to Detroit and return, perhaps I can get them free transportation over the Canadian Pacific Railway from that point to Winnipeg and return, but have explained the distance and time required.

The next letter I have is one from Captain Holmes, dated 17th March, 1893. He says :

I had an interview this morning with Mr. J. Francis Lee, Deputy Passenger Agent of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and, after talking the matter over with him, he thinks we can take the delegates from here to Edmonton and return for about $20 each. He thinks we can obtain passes to St. Paul and return. Then a ticket from St. Paul to Gretna and return will cost $20. From Gretna to destination and return, pass over Canadian Pacific Railway. On getting this information, I went down to Kenwood and saw the Rev. Mr. Phillips and Mr. Leet, the delegate who has done most of the negotiating so far. I explained the situation, and Mr. Leet thinks his people will consent to raise the amount necessary to carry this out. This party should not be allowed to leave except under escort, as everything depends on their getting to our country before being loaded up with false statements.

Then, the next step that was taken was as follows. Mr. McNicoll writes on the 22nd March :

I have your favours of the 18th and 20th of March regarding the German colony at Chicago. Our Mr. Lee will be in a position to supply transportation for this party from the boundary line forward to Winnipeg, and give a letter of introduction to our Mr. L. A. Hamilton at that point. I shall also instruct him to arrange the very best terms possible between Chicago and the boundary line. From your letter I imagine that he has obtained a promise from some of our Chicago connections. I trust this will be satisfactory.

I read these letters to show the connection of the Canadian Pacific Railway with this matter. As stated by the hon. gentleman, these delegates went under escort of Mr. P. F. Daly to Calgary, and they came back, according to what the hon. gentleman also read, perfectly satisfied. The hon. gentleman said he did not know why Mr. Fortier in his letter dealt so particularly on the fact that Captain Holmes was not aware, at the time of the employment of Mr. P. F. Daly, that he was my brother. I may say that I do not know myself why Mr. Fortier should have laid any particular stress upon that, because I do not think it is any detriment to the gentleman who escorted the party that he should happen to be my brother. As far as I was personally concerned, I was not aware of his employment, and knew nothing of it until the thing was over, but as regards qualifications, no doubt his long experience as a travelling passenger agent upon American lines was what induced Mr. Holmes to employ my brother for that service. These delegates went to Calgary. They came back, and they held a meeting of some seven hundred people, at which Captain Holmes and Mr. Phillips were present. At that meeting, as detailed in a portion of the letter which the hon. gentleman read, the delegates expressed themselves well satisfied with their trip, and the people came to the conclusion that they should leave Chicago for the west. According, also, to the statement made by Captain Holmes, 83 heads of families, in all 329 souls, proposed to start on the 20th May. The hon. gentleman referred to that, and said that although 329 souls were expected to leave, only 21 adults arrived at Winnipeg. The simple reason, it appears, was that at this meeting, Captain Holmes and Mr. Phillips came to the conclusion, after having received instructions from the department to be very careful in their selection, to select twenty-one families who were ready to go. These people were not, as the hon. gentleman says, pedlars. The majority of them were men who had farmed in Dakota and in the old country, as will be shown by the correspondence brought down. These people went up there, and over twenty adults were in the party. As stated by the hon. gentleman, in reading from the Winnipeg "Free Press," there was nothing to indicate, so far as outward appearances went, that these people were not, all of them, what they represented themselves to be. They went to Calgary and got an insane idea into their head that they should go on to Fort Macleod. But they were persuaded not to go there, because, in order to farm there successfully they would have to go into irrigation, which would be very expensive. They were taken to Witaskiwin, where there are eight heads of families living on their farms, I am advised, and the rest are scattered about on different portions of the territory. As stated by the Winnipeg "Free Press," this has simply been an incident of immigration. It is extraordinary to me that after two and a half years of my administration of the department, neither the Winnipeg "Free Press," which seems to have kept this sweet morsel to turn the editorial tongue over for the past two years, nor the other Grit papers in the country, nor the hon. gentleman, are able to point out any other mistakes or grievous injury I have done except in this matter of having been deceived by these Chicago people. Now, Sir, I presume in every man's business and in every undertaking mistakes are made. The mistake made here was not made advisedly. It was not done through any desire not to do what was right. But if, after the representations which were made by Mr. Phillips and by Mr. Lee, the District Passenger Agent of the Canadian Pacific Railway and other gentlemen who were upon the ground, the department had not taken the steps it did and had made no efforts to secure these people, possibly we would have been held blameable by the hon. gentleman and others for our remissness. But the hon. gentleman is not satisfied to refer to that question alone; but he takes pleasure in saying that ever since I took charge of the department, immigration prospects have fallen off and immigration has declined, and that I have not carried out the vigorous immigration policy that I foreshadowed. Of course the hon. gentleman would not be charitable enough to think for a moment—or, at all events to say—that my administration of the Department of the Interior began about the same time as the depression which has existed the world over ever since. Immigration has declined to every British colony; it has declined to the United States; but it has declined in a less ratio to Canada than to South Africa or to any other British colony. And I think that, considering the amount of money at the disposal of the department, the work done during the last two years and a half is, possibly all that could have been done under the circumstances. The hon. gentleman admitted that, so far as the immigration from the United States is concerned, it is quite acceptable to him. I can only say that the work we did in the United States a year ago and two years ago has borne fruit to a remarkable extent; that the number of people going into the North-west from the United States is very large and is composed mainly of a very fine class—British born, or Germans, or Norwegians, three of the best classes of people that can be brought into any country. The hon. gentleman forgets also, when he speaks of the work of the department and its agents this year and last year, that it takes some time before we can see results from the work that is done. Particularly is this true of the old country, where people are slow to move. Owing to the depressed condition of trade in Great Britain and on the continent of Europe, it is a moral impossibility at this moment to get people in large numbers to make up their minds to leave their present homes. But I am glad to say that the reports of the officers of the department at Halifax and Quebec, who have had large experience, and their statements to me personally, lead me to believe that the old country immigration we have had last year and up to this time this year, though not as large as in times past, is made up of a better class than we have had heretofore. Now the hon. gentleman, I think, would not have done wrong, while speaking on the subject of a vigorous immigration policy, to refer to what has been done by the provincial government of Manitoba, of which he was formerly a member. He contends that that country needs population, and that what this Government should do is to hold out its right hand to people coming in and to do everything possible to bring them here. But what has Mr. Greenway's Government done, and what is it doing at the present time? It is doing nothing, Mr. Greenway has withdrawn his officers from Great Britain and his agents from the older parts of Canada, and he is absolutely sitting in his office and doing nothing, so far as concerns the directing of immigration into that country. I am glad to say that I have it from the mouths and under the hands of Mr. Greenway's colleagues, that, so far as the immigration policy of this Government is concerned, it is not what the hon. gentleman has described. Not long ago we had a delegation here composed of Mr. Sifton, the Attorney General, and Mr. McMillan, the Treasurer. They came down here to meet the Minister of Finance and arrange for the increased per capita grant to the province. The representation made by these gentlemen to the Finance Minister was that the population of Manitoba, up to 31st December, 1894, was 207,000. My recollection is that, according to the census of 1891 the population was but 162,000—that is an increase of about 45,000 in three years.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. May I ask the hon. gentleman if they paid on this estimate?

Mr. DALY. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Mr. DALY. I will explain to the hon. gentleman. The grant was not made on that estimate because the calculation made by the provincial representatives was on the calendar year, and the province was only entitled to be paid according to the estimate for the fiscal year. Deducting from their figures the increase for six months, the number left, if I remember well, was 202,000. Then a doubt arose as to whether their provincial statistics of the natural increase were correct, and a compromise was made as between the Finance Minister and the delegates which fixed the figure at 190,000. But there was no doubt in the minds of Mr. Sifton and Mr. McMillan, that the population of Manitoba, according to the figures they brought down, was 207,000; and I do not think the hon. gentleman from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) will be disappointed—at least I hope not—when the quinquennial census is taken, as it will be next year. Here is an indication that we have had a large increase of population since 1891, according to the figures, not of the Department of the Interior or of the Government of Canada, but according to the figures given to the Finance Minister by the Attorney General and Treasurer of Manitoba. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman complains that we are not getting the worth of our money. I forgot to say that he would give the House to understand that the Government were put to large expense in transporting from Chicago these people of whom he speaks. The total cost, so far as I can ascertain, was not more than $250. The hon. gentleman will see that the only expense in the matter was the living expenses of the agents and of these delegates. So far as the other expenses were concerned, the Government did not meet them; these people paid their own way or got free transportation from the railway. Now the hon. gentleman, in order to get a fling at me, said that there was a gentleman in Brandon, where I live, who was running a newspaper, who used to get away from his party allegiance occasionally, and that the only way I could bring him round was to give him the opportunity of writing an immigration pamphlet which he also printed. Since I came into the department, Mr. Cliffe, proprietor of the Brandon "Mail," to whom, no doubt, the hon. gentleman refers, has never received a five cent piece from the department for printing or writing any pamphlet—

Mr. MARTIN. Or in any other way?

Mr. DALY. No, nor in any other way since I have been at the head of the department. So the hon. gentleman's bubble is pricked and exploded. I want the hon. gentleman to understand that I am not placed in the position of himself and the Greenway Grit editor to write and publish a pamphlet, and it was so badly written and printed that it could not be distributed. Now, comparison is a good thing, I think, Mr. Speaker. This hon. gentleman has tried to establish in the remarks he has made, that the immigration policy of this Government has been a failure. Now let us compare the regime of Mr. Mackenzie with the present, and the work that was done then with the work that is being done now. Let us ascertain what was done by Mr. Letellier, the Minister of Agriculture who presided over the Department of Immigration from 1873 to 1875, and let us ascertain from the comparison whether this Government is doing good or poor work. I maintain it is doing much better work than was done during the Mackenzie regime. Now in 1875, which was Mr. Letellier's third year in office as Minister of Agriculture and Immigration, he had to deplore a steady falling off in immigration since he assumed office. He stated in his report for that year that the number of ordinary settlers, that is immigrants from beyond sea, was less in 1875 than in any year within the period of ten years with respect to which he gave information; but in spite of that, the special Mennonite immigration in 1875 numbered 3,285 souls. Now, what are the figures? In 1873 there were 39,560 immigrants; in 1874 26,080. In 1875 they fell to 16,932, a decrease of 34.3. From 1873 to 1875 the decrease was 54.20. Now during those years when Mr. Letellier only got 39,560 he spent $234,000; when he got 26,080, in 1874, he spent $251,000. In 1875, when his immigration fell down to 16,932, he spent $296,692. In addition to this the Parliament of Canada made a grant of $70,000 for immigration to the Maritime Provinces in that year. Now, in recent years the appropriation has only been about $200,000 a year, and with that $200,000, in 1892, we got 27,810 immigrants; in 1893, 29,455; in 1894, 20,680; with an expenditure of $200,000 per annum, as against a total expenditure in three years by Mr. Letellier of $851,814.59. Now, in 1875, under Mr. Mackenzie's Minister of Agriculture and Immigration—when they were not bringing Jew peddlars into Calgary, because people could not get into that country owing to the vigorous railway policy of the Government—they brought 1,631 indigent immigrants who were assisted into Montreal by the department at an expense of $5,789.91, showing, as far as the policy of this Government compared with the policy of the Mackenzie Government is concerned, that with less money we have had greater results; and if the results have not been as satisfactory as I am sure I would like, and as the other members of the Government would like, and the people would like in this respect, it is not the fault of the administration of the department, it is not the fault of the departmental agents. We are in the same condition as are people in other countries looking for immigrants, and as I said before, the immigration into the United States has declined in a greater ratio than it has into Canada. In conclusion, I have only to say that the hon. gentleman can have all the information he asks for at the earliest possible moment, so that the House will be in full possession of all the facts pertaining to this question of Jew peddlars as the hon. gentleman terms them, taken from Chicago to Calgary. I hope that the few contradictions I have given to some of the statements made by the hon. gentleman will convince him that he has not stirred up such a mare's nest as he thought he would do when he placed this notice on the paper.

Mr. MARTIN. I have only a word to say in regard to what the hon. gentleman has brought forward, and I would not have anything more to say if he had not introduced considerable new matter into the discussion. As to the question that I brought before the House, I do not know that the hon. gentleman has made any statement at all inconsistent with those that I made. But I would like to ask the hon. gentleman why it was that, knowing all these things, being fully conversant with all these matters, being fully aware that my statements of last year were true and correct, that the department had been deceived, and that the money, $250, or whatever it may have been, had been entirely wasted and thrown away, when he stood up in his place and gave a flat contradiction to everything I had to say one year ago, or thereabouts, with regard to this matter—I ask him why it was that he did not think it well to make the admissions then that he has made to-day, namely, that the department had been mistaken, and why he did not throw himself then upon this House, as he has done to-day, and ask to be forgiven for that particular mistake. I think the hon. gentleman would do well, when he makes a mistake, to admit it. I have to agree with him that it is not always possible to be correct, but it is to be remembered that a year ago the hon. gentleman came boldly before this House and denied all these statements and charged me with making false and exaggerated statements for the purpose of bringing contempt upon his department, and contempt upon him personally, and now he comes here, a year after when I had obtained an admission from an officer in his department which he could not go back upon, and admits that I was correct, and says that after all it was not a very bad mistake, it was not so bad as it might have been. There is something a little peculiar about this pamphlet. As I say, this was only one of several letters which Mr. Fortier, the head of this department, wrote to the "Free Press," and the "Free Press" published a number of editorials dealing with this matter. The hon. gentleman is possessed, according to general repute, of an organ of his own in the city of Winnipeg, called the "Nor-Wester." Incidentally it may be mentioned that the sheriff sold it out the day before yesterday. This newspaper published in pamphlet form the correspondence between Mr. Fortier and the "Free Press," and the "Free Press" editorials, headed as follows: "Hon. Mr. Daly's efforts to promote immigration—Aspersions of the Winnipeg "Free Press" and answers from an officer of the Department of Interior at Ottawa." This was published for general circulation, but for some reason or another, whether at the hon. gentleman's request I do not know, a request came from some quarter to suppress it, but a copy was sent to me with the following notice upon it: "By request this pamphlet has been withdrawn from general circulation." I admire the sagacity of the hon. gentleman himself, or of some wise friend of his, who induced his overzealous friends in Winnipeg to withdraw from general circulation a pamphlet containing these letters, containing, according to his own admissions to-day an exposure of the way in which the department, through its own officials, had allowed themselves to be swindled and misled. Now, the hon. gentleman has made some references to the policy of the local government in discontinuing their expenditure for immigration purposes. Well, I do not know that this is the place for discussing the policy of the local government. On a number of occasions I have protested against the hon. gentleman's continual desire to discuss the local politics of Manitoba in this House. I have said before, and I repeat it, that I do not consider that this House is much concerned with the local affairs of Manitoba, as to whether its local government is good or bad, or whether my actions when in the local government were good or bad. I am at all times prepared to discuss those matters, but I do not think the hon. gentleman improves his position by bringing them forward here. Since, however, he has referred to them, I will say that the local government has discontinued any expenditure for immigration purposes because they have come to the conclusion that as long as the present policy of the Dominion Government towards that country is continued, it is entirely hopeless to endeavour to get any immigrants into that country. They have come to the conclusion, from actual experience, that money spent by the Dominion Government in endeavouring to induce people to go to Manitoba and the Territories has been absolutely thrown away, because those people are not content with the circumstances in which they find themselves placed. They are entirely discontented with the tariff and also with the monopoly which hon. gentlemen opposite have imposed on them in connection with railway freight rates; and under these circumstances, I think the local government acted wisely, they not having much money to expend owing to their means being very limited, in making no further expenditure for immigration purposes at the present time. However, when the time comes, as we hope it will soon, when the tariff policy of the country is changed, when the position of settlers in the Northwest is made more favourable, and they will be able to look forward to an era of prosperity on account of a change of policy in the fiscal affairs as well as the general administration of Canada, then, no doubt, the local government of Manitoba will undertake to again carry out the immigration policy which they pursued for a number of years past. The hon. gentleman has endeavoured to argue that he is entitled to credit because it has been represented here by the local Ministers of Manitoba that the population of that province has considerably increased during the two years and a half following the census of 1891. The hon. gentleman is entitled to no credit whatever for that fact, because, while it is true the population has moderately increased, as is claimed by the local Ministers, that increase is not due in any appreciable extent to immigration from the old countries of Europe, but to immigration from Ontario, Quebec and other provinces of the Dominion, and I do not imagine the hon. Minister will undertake to claim that any expenditure on his part for immigration purposes has been devoted to removing people from one part of Canada and planting them in another. That, however, is where the increase has come from, so far as Manitoba is concerned, and also, of course, from the natural increase of population. The hon. Minister made some reference to the Mackenzie Government, and he compared his administration of immigration affairs with the administration by that government. It has been so often shown that the immigration registered at the Atlantic ports afforded no index whatever to the number of immigrants settled in Canada, that it is utterly useless to make any comments on that point. The hon. gentleman is himself well aware that the number of immigrants reported as arriving at the ports of Halifax, Quebec and Montreal, is no index whatever as to the number settled in Manitoba and the North-west, and in fact a very large proportion of those immigrants are brought there through the efforts of the Canadian Pacific Railway to obtain a fair share of the transcontinental travel for their railway. It is well known that train load after train load, landing during the years since the hon. gentleman has assumed control of the Immigration Department, have passed over the Canadian Pacific Railway and settled in Dakota, Oregon and California, and generally upon the Pacific coast. To-day the city of Winnipeg has a claim pending before the Immigration Department which illustrates in some degree this point, and when it was announced a short time ago that a general election was about to take place, we had strong hopes that the claim would be paid, as the hon. Minister has promised to pay it time and again.

Mr. DALY. No.

Mr. MARTIN. The people of Winnipeg certainly have that understanding—they understand that the Government will pay the account. This incident, I say, illustrates my contention. An immigrant train arrived at Winnipeg containing a large number of immigrants who were found to have among them several cases of small-pox. The whole batch of passengers were taken out, housed on the prairie and isolated for the necessary time in order that all fear of contagion might be removed. This was done at the expense of the city of Winnipeg, thousands of dollars being so expended, and this expense was brought upon the city by the action, jointly, of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Government, through the Immigration Department, and under these circumstances, the claim is one which the Government very properly has been asked to meet. It turns out that every one of the immigrants affected with small-pox, and thus kept at large expense by the city of Winnipeg, was ticketed to some point outside of Canada, that, in fact, those immigrants were Dakota settlers, who had been brought in, I cannot say by the Government, but they were included in the return which the hon. gentleman has been reading of arrivals at our Atlantic ports, but who were booked through to Dakota and other Western States. So I do not consider that any comparison which the hon. gentleman may see fit to make between the administration of the Immigration Department by the Mackenzie Government and by himself has any bearing on the question. If the hon. gentleman will show what proportion of the immigrants who landed at our Atlantic ports actually settle in Canada, and what portion simply pass through owing to the activity of the agents of the Canadian Pacific Railway in securing a share of the transportation from the Atlantic to the Pacific, we shall then have some means of making a comparison.

Mr. DAVIN. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) has greatly laboured to point out that there was some great difference between the explanation given between the Minister of the Interior and the explanation given last session. If the hon. gentleman will refer to "Hansard," he will see that both explanations are precisely on the same line, and the only difference is that one is an explanation with a little fuller information, as one might naturally expect after time was afforded to obtain fuller knowledge on this subject. In regard to the point frequently made about the immigration to the North-west and to Canada generally, I should like to point out that in the United States they have precisely the same difficulty to face that we have, a difficulty that has frequently puzzled, and indeed excited the political indignation of the hon. member for South Oxford. It is this: that when we come to calculate the immigrants who have come in and the natural increase of population, we are ready to ask, where have the people gone? The United States immigration, according to their returns, for the decennium, was 5,571,643. The census showed a total population of 62,622,250. This is a ratio of 24.80 per cent increase, including immigration. Mr. F. A. Walker, the superintendent of the United States census of 1870-1880, and one of the recognized statisticians of the United States, has shown that the natural increment of that country ought to have been during the ten years stated, 18,246,673, and when the immigration is added, the total addition should be 23,818,286. The actual figures were only 12,466,467, leaving 11,351,810 lost or not accounted for. So that Uncle Sam has precisely the same problem before him, to account for a loss of population, as we have in Canada. In Canada we say when we think some millions should have been here who are not here, that they have gone to the United States; but as we have lost a large number of persons, or we suppose we have lost them, and think they have gone to the United States, the eleven millions the United States have lost in ten years have certainly not come to Canada. Where have they gone? It may turn out that our theory of natural increase, which is often made so much of, has really no scientific basis at all.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not know whether I correctly heard what the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr.

Davin) stated, but if his statement be correct, that statisticians estimate the natural increase of the United States in ten years, from 1880 to 1890, at eighteen millions, I beg to call the attention of the hon. gentleman and the attention of the House to the fact that that would be an increase very considerably more than 3 per cent per annum, a rate I never heard given by any man who deserved to be called a statistician or who possessed any information on the subject worth noticing. As my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) suggests, that is an increase which may take place in a rabbit warren, but hardly, I think, in a civilized community. However, I am not concerned with the gentleman's calculations. I have, however, Mr. Speaker, a word or two to say in regard to a statement made by the Minister of the Interior. The hon. gentleman gave us the estimated number of immigrants who had arrived under his regime, which he compared with the number of immigrants who were stated to have come into Canada under the Mackenzie Administration. Now, we have only one way of ascertaining the results likely to accrue from the administration of the hon. gentleman, and that is by comparing the results which are likely to accrue with those which we know to have accrued during the ten years from 1881 to 1891. During that decade, at a cost of many millions of dollars to the people of Canada, the department over which the hon. gentleman presides stated to this House and to the country, not once, but ten times over, that they had imported intending settlers into Canada to the number of 886,000 souls. When the census returns were taken, we found that of these 886,000 only 150,000 answered to the count; so that for every six immigrants reported by that department only one materialized. I propose to apply to the hon. gentleman's statement today a comparison between it and the statements of the department that he presides over in these ten years, and I very much fear, although I should be glad to be disappointed, that the results will be precisely the same, and that for every six immigrants claimed by the present Minister of the Interior, but one will materialize.

Mr. DALY. I wish to answer one remark made by the hon. gentleman, as I do not wish to be misunderstood. The hon. gentleman asked me as to whether I had agreed to pay the bill of the city of Winnipeg, and I replied that I had not. I do not want to be understood that I refused to pay the amount that was in dispute as between the city and the Government, and its liability, and without prejudice, it may be possible that some arrangement can be made with the city of Winnipeg. But the Government, or the department, does not hold itself liable in any way whatever.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. MARTIN. I suppose the settlement depends upon the date of the elections.

Mr. DALY. Not at all. That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. CHARLTON. One word with regard to the census statement made by my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). He tells the House that the increase in the United States in the last decade was 24.80 per cent, and that the immigration was in round numbers 5,000,000, and he draws a comparison between the condition of things in the United States and the condition of things here, favourable in his estimation, to Canada. If the immigration amounted to 5,000,000 in the United States, it represents an increase of 10 per cent, and, deducting that increase from the total increase of, in round numbers, 25 per cent, it left a natural increase in the United States of 15 per cent. If we compare that with our own record for the decade ending in 1891, I think we will hardly have as favourable a showing. We received, according to our own statistics, in that decade, 886,000 immigrants, amounting to an increase of 18 per cent upon the population with which we commenced in the year 1881. We had, according to our census returns, a total increase of 11.66 per cent, or we lacked 6 per cent of having, in our total increase, as great an increase as our immigration returns show that we derived from immigration. We should have had an increase of 18 per cent from immigration, and, with a natural increase equal to that of the United States, we should have 15 per cent more, and the increase from immigration and natural increase in Canada, upon exactly the same basis as the United States, should have been 33 per cent, whereas it was only 11.66 per cent. Whatever may be said of the condition of affairs in the United States, certainly the showing, so far as we ourselves are concerned, is a most unsatisfactory one, if we did receive that number of immigrants. If we have, in addition to that, a natural increase of population of 2 per cent a year, our increase of population should have been nearly or quite 1,800,000 in ten years, and this number would fall considerably short of a natural increase of 2 per cent per annum added to an immigration of 886,000, in place of this we had a meagre increase of 11.66 per cent of 508,000 souls; being over a million and a quarter short of what it should have been if our immigration statistics were correct. The less that is said about the condition of affairs in Canada, and the fewer comparisons that are made with other countries as regards increase of population the better for ourselves. We certainly need no better evidence that the condition of affairs in this country is not satisfactory than the evidence furnished by our census; and if we have received even one-fourth of the number of immigrants that are stated, and we cannot reach a total increase of 12 per cent, something is radically wrong, and patriotic Canadians should set themselves about the task of ascertaining what the trouble is, and of providing a remedy.

Motion agreed to.

TARIFF STATEMENTS.

Mr. AMYOT moved for :

Statement showing : 1. The several items on which duties have been totally abolished under the Canadian tariff, from 1879 up to date ; 2. The date of such abolition ; 3. The amount of duties so abolished for each item ; 4. The total amount of duties which would have been paid into the public treasury had the duties been maintained, taking as a basis the quantities imported each year since the abolition of such duties.

Mr. EDGAR. I was going to suggest an amendment which I have no doubt the hon. mover of the resolution would accept, as it would make the return much more complete. If he would insert, that the several items upon which duties have been increased also should be added, then we could get more information.

Mr. AMYOT. If the hon. gentleman will give me notice of his motion, I will give him an answer.

Mr. WALLACE. It will not be possible to furnish all the information asked by the hon. member (Mr. Amyot). For instance, item 4 of the resolution says :

The total amount of duties which would have been paid into the public treasury had the duties been maintained, taking as a basis the quantities imported each year since the abolition of such duties.

In the revision of the tariff last year, we have made in many cases an entirely different classification, so that it would not be possible to give all the information asked for here, but we will be glad to supply the hon. gentleman with all the information that we can.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Amyot) ought to inquire what is the amount of the deficit that would have existed at the present time if the rate of duties remained as they were in 1878.

Mr. AMYOT. My motion is very simple, and I do not know why the members of the Opposition take such an interest in it. I only want the information for myself, and then, perhaps, for the country.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. AMYOT moved for :

Comparative statement showing, side by side, the Canadian tariffs : (1.) Of 1868—31 Victoria, chap. 44 ; (2.) Of 1874—37 Victoria, chap. 6 ; (3.) Of 1879—42 Victoria, chap. 15 ; (4.) Of 1894—57 Victoria, chap. 33. The said statement to show in separate columns the duties under each tariff, and the items admitted free.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think this is a very fair motion, and the information the hon. gentleman wants will be of use. But I think there should be a column reducing the ad valorem and specific duties to an ad valorem basis, so that the comparison might be intelligibly made. It would save a good deal of trouble and inconvenience.

Mr. FOSTER. On the basis of the prices ruling at the time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. On the basis, if you like, of the prices ruling at the time and now.

Mr. FOSTER. There would be a good deal of work in that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There would be some work, but it would be of use.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. AMYOT moved for :

Statement showing :—1. The several items on which the duties have been reduced, by the Canadian tariff, from 1879 up to this date ; 2. The date of the reduction ; 3. The amount of the reduction on each item ; 4. The total amount of the duties which would have been paid into the public treasury if such reduction had not been made, taking as a basis the quantities imported each year since the reduction of such duties.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I would like to know how the Minister would interpret the third clause here—whether he would mean, as I suppose my hon. friend means, the amount of duties collected, or the percentage of reduction. It seems to me that we ought to have the total amount of reduction, and if so, I do not see the necessity of the fourth paragraph, because we could easily ascertain what it calls for from the third.

Mr. WALLACE. I would also suggest that the amount of the reduction on the abolition of duties be included.

Motion agreed to.

RETURN ORDERED.

Return showing in detail all moneys paid or allowances made to Hayter Reed from 30th June, 1879, to 30th June, 1894, for salary, rents of houses, offices or other buildings or quarters in Manitoba or the North-west Territories ; with copies of correspondence relating thereto, whether the said Hayter Reed was proprietor of such building or buildings, and if not, who was ?

The authority under which such payments or allowances were made.

All allowances made to or received by the said Hayter Reed from the Dominion Government from 30th June, 1879, to 30th June, 1894, in any way for board, fuel, light, rations, forage for horses, or servants and wages when absent from his headquarters, and when not absent, separately.

The authority under which such allowances were made; the authority, if any, given to the said Hayter Reed to use himself, or allow to be used by others, horses, carriages, cattle, agricultural implements, seed oats or other grains or other things, the property of the Dominion of Canada, or to exact service from employees of the Indian Department for his benefit or convenience; and copies of all correspondence and instructions given to the said Hayter Reed in connection therewith.—(Mr. McMullen.)

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FOSTER. As the next motion on the paper will probably cause a little discussion, and as it seems unnecessary for us to come back to-night for the business we have to do, I would ask the hon. gentleman to postpone it until to-morrow, and I would move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. McMULLEN. This is a matter which I wish to reach at as early a day as possible.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman will reach it to-morrow without doubt.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. Minister of Finance remembers that he expected to give us the Estimates to-day. I suppose they are not ready.

Mr. FOSTER. They are not quite ready.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will they be ready to-morrow?

Mr. FOSTER. It may be to-morrow, or it may not be until Monday.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Could the hon. gentleman give us any idea when he will deliver his Budget speech? A number of gentlemen in the country who wish to hear it would like to know.

Mr. FOSTER. Barring accidents and the like, I hope to be able to make the Budget speech not later than Friday of next week.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. A statement was made to-day that a number of returns ordered by the House last session had not been brought down. As a matter of practice, I think the Government ought to lay on the Table of the House all the returns which were ordered during the previous session, and which have not been brought down, or they ought to submit a statement specifying what orders have not been complied with. An order of this House is a serious matter, and the Government cannot surely intend to disregard it. I think there are a good many orders that have not been brought down.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Some of two years' standing.

Mr. FOSTER. If some are of two years' standing, it might not be necessary to bring them down now.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 6 o'clock, p.m.

Mr. WALLACE.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 26th April, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House, that the Clerk of the House has received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, a certificate of the election and return of Thomas McGreevy, Esq., for the Electoral District of Quebec West.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. LaRIVIERE presented the first report of the Official Report of the Debates of the House, as follows:—

The Committee recommend that their quorum be reduced from eight to five members.

Mr. LaRIVIERE moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. LAURIER. The House, I think, will expect the hon. gentleman to give some explanation of the reason for the proposed change. Five seems to be a very small number to constitute a quorum.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. It is the same number as last year. We find it very difficult to obtain a quorum of eight members, and this is simply following the practice of former years. I may add that a sub-committee has been appointed to take into consideration complaints made with respect to delay in publishing the reports during the past sessions and former sessions, with a view, if possible, of remedying any defect.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION NOTES.

Mr. FOSTER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 22) to amend the Dominion Notes Act. He said: The object of the Bill is to remedy an omission which took place somewhere between the passing of the resolution and the consummation of the Bill. The resolution as it passed this House contained both clauses of what was to be the Act, but the second clause was subsequently omitted, which made it necessary that the Government should keep for every issue over $20,000,000, dollar for dollar in gold. The Finance Department have lived up to the spirit of the Act during the year, and this Bill is to make the necessary amendment.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE RAILWAY ACT.

Mr. BRYSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 23) to amend the Railway Act.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentleman explain the object of this Bill?

Mr. BRYSON. This Bill is one to which reference was made a few days ago, and is framed with a view to secure payment to employees on lines of railway. The Bill will be printed in a few days and distributed. No doubt it will meet with opposition from certain railway companies, but there is no desire on the part of the promoter of the Bill to arouse any objection in that respect. The Bill is purely and simply to meet the special wants and requirements of cases that have come before us with respect to certain railway lines that have been operated during several months without payment being made to the employees.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How does the hon. gentleman propose to remedy the difficulty; what is his proposition, or the substance of it?

Mr. BRYSON. It is to amend the Railway Act, and it is provided that after a railroad has been operated for a certain number of days, or say three months, without payment being made to the men, the railway committee shall have power to appoint a receiver to take over the road and see the men are paid. That is the proposition.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE CRIMINAL CODE.

Mr. COATSWORTH moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 24) respecting union labels, trade marks, terms, designs, devices or forms of advertisement, and to amend the Criminal Code of 1892.

Mr. LAURIER. Explain the Bill.

Mr. COATSWORTH. The object of the Bill might be shortly stated in this way. Under the Trades Mark and Designs Act, business firms or persons engaged in business have a right to secure for their own use certain marks by which they will designate their merchandise. The Trades and Labour Unions have found that it will be to their advantage to have designs or marks of such a kind as would indicate merchandise manufactured by members of the union. It is not considered that this will come within the scope of the present Act, and the object of the Bill I have introduced is to practically extend the Trades Mark and Designs Act, so as to include this class of designs and trades marks. The reference in the title to the Criminal Code of 1892, is to extend the provisions of the Criminal Code of 1892, so far as they relate to the Trades Mark and Designs Act to the proposed Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CANADA AND NEWFOUNDLAND.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to invite the attention of the leader of the House for a moment to an important telegram which appears in to-day's papers with respect to the colony of Newfoundland. A number of newspapers have telegrams upon the subject, but the Montreal "Gazette" has one which professes to be more official than the rest, and with the permission of the House I will read the telegram, and ask the hon. leader a question or two upon it. The following is the telegram:

St. John's, Nfld., April 25.—The Legislature met to-day. Hon. Mr. Bond, in the Legislative Council, and Hon. Mr. Morris, in the House of Assembly, made the following official announcement:—

"The delegates appointed by the Government of this colony to proceed to Ottawa to discuss the terms of union between this colony and the Canadian Dominion, have reported to the Government that the terms handed in by them as a counter proposal to those admitted by the sub-committee of the Privy Council of Canada are still under the consideration of the Government of the Dominion, and they will, therefore, not be in a position to furnish a full and comprehensive report of the proceedings of conference until further information has been received.

"In order that ample time may be afforded for receiving a final answer from the Government of the Dominion of Canada, it is recommended that the Legislature be adjourned for a fortnight from this date."

That is the nature of the official announcement, and then follows a telegraphic despatch which is not reported to be official, and which says:

It is reported that two of the terms proposed by the Newfoundland delegates are reserved for further consideration by the Dominion Government, one of them being very important. All the other terms were arranged satisfactorily.

I would ask the leader of the House, in view of the importance of this subject, and the desirability of any terms which may be agreed upon being submitted at an early date to the electorate, whether he would take the House into his confidence now and inform us, first, what terms have been already agreed to; second, what are the points upon which the Government of Newfoundland and the Dominion Government are at variance; third, what are the proposals of the Dominion Government and the counter proposals of the Newfoundland delegates on these disputed points; and fourth, whether a final answer, as referred to in the despatch, has been sent by the Dominion Government to the Newfoundland Government on the two disputed points. I do not propose to enlarge upon the importance of the question now, but I hope the hon. gentleman will give us the fullest information he can upon these questions.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I know that my hon. friend (Mr. Davies), when he thinks over it for a moment, will not press his questions to an answer. He has asked four questions, and it would be impossible for me to answer them without bringing down negotiations which are not yet quite concluded. It would not tend towards the successful outcome of the negotiations if I were to answer the hon. gentleman's questions categorically, as he has asked them. The Government will bring down and lay before the House, when the negotiations are fully completed, all the information, but at the present time, I should not feel it at all right, in justice to what we all wish, namely, the successful outcome of the negotiations, that I should answer the hon. gentleman's questions, and I hope he will not press them further.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) With your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman, if he will not bring down the papers, whether he will answer my last question as to whether a final answer has been sent by this Government to Newfoundland on these two questions.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I might answer that by saying that nothing can be said to be final at the present time.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) My point is: Whether this Government has since the delegates left here forwarded to the Newfoundland Government their answer on questions which, when the delegates were here, were the subject-matter of discussion but not decided upon.

Mr. FOSTER. I can answer that in the negative.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is another point which perhaps the hon. gentleman might give us some information about. Have any negotiations been going on, or are negotiations going on at present with the Imperial authorities with respect to the settlement of what is known as the French shore question.

Mr. FOSTER. No negotiations are going on directly between the Dominion Government and the Home Government. These negotiations have for some time been conducted, and are still being conducted I suppose, by the Newfoundland Government.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), that although he does not feel prepared to submit the papers to-day, he gives an assurance to Parliament that whatever final answer is sent to Newfoundland will be communicated to this Parliament at a period, at any rate as early as the Newfoundland Legislature can get it? It seems to me ridiculous that delegates returning from here to Newfoundland should communicate to their people the terms which are in dispute and the ultimate settlement of these matters, and that we are only to know of it here by telegrams from Newfoundland.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman may rest assured that the Parliament of Canada will be taken into the confidence of the Government just as soon as the legislature of Newfoundland is taken into the confidence of the government there.

THEFTS FROM THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. FAUVEL (for Mr. Choquette) asked, Whether the Government have held an inquiry with a view to ascertaining the amount of the thefts committed within the last few years in the cars and sheds of the Intercolonial Railway at the station at Rivière du Loup; if so, what has been the result? 2. Have the Government been informed that the man, Germain Dufour, who was sent to prison last year for stealing goods from the cars and railway sheds at the said station, had accomplices; and if so, is it their intention to prosecute such accomplices? 3. Has an inquiry been held in relation to the aforesaid thefts, and if so, what witnesses were heard? Who was entrusted with the inquiry, and what was the result?

Mr. HAGGART. No formal inquiry was held and no witnesses were examined with a view to ascertaining the amount of thefts committed within the last few years in the cars and sheds of the Intercolonial Railway at the station at Rivière du Loup. The railway officials who looked into the matter last June obtained sufficient information to warrant the arrest and prosecution of the man Germain Dufour, and Léon Dubé was arrested as an accomplice. Dufour was convicted, but Dubé was discharged by the court. I have no information in regard to any other accomplices, but if sufficient reliable information is obtained against any one, they will be prosecuted. Claims for freight missing at Rivière du Loup to the amount of $375 were paid, and it is thought this freight was stolen.

EXTRA WORK ON THE SAULT STE. MARIE CANAL.

Mr. FAUVEL (for Mr. Choquette) asked, 1. What amount has been paid by the Government to the contractors for the Sault Ste. Marie Canal for extra work? 2. Have the contractors now claims pending against the Government for extra work? If so, what is the amount, and is it the intention of the Government to pay them?

Mr. HAGGART. No amount has been granted to the contractors of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal for extra work. The contractors have presented no claims against the Government for extra work, but they have intimated that they intend to present a claim for extras.

ST. JOHN RIVER FISHING REGULATIONS.

Mr. COLTER asked, 1. Whether it is the intention of the Government to change the fishing regulations in the St. John River, New Brunswick? 2. Has the Government, or any member of the Government, given any pledge to have the fishing regulations changed in that river? 3. At what point in the St. John River is the tidal boundary fixed by such regulations?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The Government contemplates changing the fishery regulations in the St. John River, N.B. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries has signified his intention of having the fishery regulations changed in that river. The fishery regulations do not fix the tidal boundary in the St. John River, but under the authority conferred upon him by section 8, subsection 6 of the Fisheries Act, Chap. 95 Revised Statutes, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has by formal notice published in the "Canada Gazette" defined the tidal boundary for salmon net fishing within the estuary of St. John River at a line drawn from Crock's Point or Lunt's Ferry, to the opposite shore.

CARAQUET RAILWAY.

Mr. MULOCK asked, What were the gross earnings and expenditure respectively of the Caraqueet Railway for the year ending 30th June, 1894?

Mr. HAGGART. The gross earnings of the Caraqueet Railway for the year ended 30th June, 1894, were $18,083.09. The gross expenditure for the same period was $18,289.68, a loss of $206.59.

THE SUPERANNUATION LIST.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for :

Return showing : 1. The names of all superannuated officers on the superannuated list on the first day of January, 1895. 2. The date of their appointment as permanent civil servants. 3. The amount of salary at time of appointment. 4. The number of years in the service. 5. The amount of salary at time of superannuation. 6. The date of their superannuation and number of years added to time of service, if any. 7. The amount of annual retiring allowance granted. 8. The gross amount paid into the fund by each retired officer on the list on the 1st of January, 1895. 9. The gross amount drawn by each superannuated officer on the superannuated list up to the 1st of January, 1895. 10. The age of each superannuated officer on the list on the 1st of January, 1895, at the date of his superannuation.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection to that passing ; but in order that we may have the whole subject before us, I am going to ask the House to amend the motion by adding another section as section 11, as follows :—

The names of all persons who have been on the superannuation list since the Act came into force and have died before the 1st of January, 1895, and the information concerning each which is asked for in the preceding nine paragraphs with respect to those mentioned in paragraph 1.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not find fault with the amendment. I only desire to express my hope that the return will be brought down before the expiration of next year. Will the hon. gentleman, if he adds this amendment, undertake that the return will come down within a reasonable time, so that my hon. friend will have it in hand for use this session?

Mr. FOSTER. I will do the best I can to facilitate it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like a little more definite promise than that.

Mr. FOSTER. When a man says he will do the best he can, what more can he promise?

Mr. McMULLEN. My only object is to secure a full statement in regard to the operation of the Superannuation Act, and I hope the hon. Minister of Finance is not loading down my motion with additions which will prevent its being brought down to the House in time for consideration this session. I brought this subject before the House last year, and at the request of the First Minister, I allowed the Bill to stand over, simply because the Minister of Finance was not in his place. I earnestly hope that nothing will be thrown in the way of allowing Parliament full opportunity of giving expression to its views on this matter. The Minister of Finance, having stated that the return will be laid on the Table in good time to accomplish this end, I shall make no objections to the addition he proposes to my resolution. If, however, the hon. gentleman cannot give assurance that the return will be placed on the Table in time, I hope he will separate his resolution from mine, and I shall be happy to support it, but I do not think he should encumber my resolution with something that will prevent the return coming down in time.

Mr. FOSTER. My purpose is not at all to prevent the return being brought down, but simply to have a full presentment of the case, if there is to be one at all. My hon. friend must see that his will be only a partial one.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have no objection.

Mr. FOSTER. The return will be prepared with all reasonable diligence.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What advantage will be secured by the proposed addition which will not be secured by the paragraphs one, two and six, in my hon. friend's motion?

Mr. FOSTER. All the information asked for is with respect to persons who were on the superannuation list on the 1st January, 1895. I want to know what superannuation has been going on from the beginning of the Act. My amendment will cover those passed away and not now on the list.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not see what that has to do with the subject we are dealing with now. My hon. friend is asking for information showing the present state of the superannuation list, with a view to legislation. The hon. Minister must have some other object.

Mr. FOSTER. We want to know the whole burden.

Mr. CASEY. There is no pretension with regard to those who have died, and are off the superannuation list. The hon. member for Wellington seeks for all necessary particulars with regard to those to whom we are now paying superannuation. That, it seems to me, covers the whole case. I have known of motions loaded down in this way by tacking to them information which the mover did not require, and which the case did not require. Whether the intention was to prevent the coming down of the information asked for, it has had that effect, at all events, in many cases before now under the same pretense of presenting the whole case. I think the suggestion of the hon. member is perfectly fair. If the Minister wants other information, he can get it, but the information asked for should be given separately.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

P.E.I. STEAM SERVICE.

Mr. PERRY moved for:

Return showing the date the steamer "Stanley" commenced running in the fall of 1894, between Charlottetown, P.E.I., and Pictou, N.S., the date they commenced running between Georgetown, P.E.I., and Pictou, N.S. The date of each trip, both from Charlottetown and Georgetown to Pictou. The number of mail bags carried each trip. The number of passengers carried to and from Prince Edward Island. The receipts on account of passengers. The amount of freight carried both ways and the receipts therefor. The total expense and total receipts in connection with said steamer up to 15th April, 1895.

He said: I have already brought this question before the House on several occasions, but I am sorry to say that, so far, there is no improvement in the service. We all know that there has been a good deal of humbugging in this matter. If we could only have Dominion elections every year, no doubt something would be done. The steamer "Stanley" is a fine vessel, very well adapted for winter navigation, and the captain and crew give general satisfaction; but we must bear in mind that the Government are not so powerful of late as they used to be, and their powers, in the best of times, were limited. They have no power or control over the ice and elements, and when the ice packs, the steamer "Stanley" has great difficulty in making crossings. With the exception of a few interested parties in King's County, and, I dare say, some in Pictou, the constituency of the hon. Minister of Justice, every one can see that the "Stanley" is in the wrong place, and that she ought to be brought more to the centre of the island, either between Cape Traverse and Cape Tormentine or Summerside and Cape Tormentine. The press, as a general rule, have made strong protests against running the steamer between Pictou and Georgetown, and are of opinion that there is much better chance of crossing between the Cape and Summerside. The Government itself, I believe, was under that impression. They gave a charter here some years ago to a party in New York to establish a ferry between West Point, P.E.I., and Richibucto, New Brunswick. The Government would be bound, the moment the contractor commenced operations, to give $75,000 a year for twenty years, I think. They would be bound, the moment the contractor that they were prepared to enter into the contract, and therefore the experiment remains untried. The only place tried so far is between Georgetown and Pictou, and that, to a very large extent, is a failure. The people of the island are very much inconvenienced during the winter. They are sometimes five to twelve days without mail communication. Is that the way the people of Prince Edward Island should be treated? The Government, having agreed to carry out the terms of confederation, should try the next best thing, they should make experiments, not only in one place, but in different places, and ascertain which is the most favourable route. That they have not yet done. They think nothing of spending three or four, or five or six million dollars to carry out the terms of confederation with British Columbia. They think nothing of throwing the whole Dominion into a state of agitation in order to carry out the terms of confederation with Manitoba. They have had to try their hand at putting down rebellion in the North-west. Now, I am not prepared to say that we on the island are ready to go into rebellion. But the Government had better take care what they are doing. Although we are small in number, we are a strong and determined people. The Government ought to know that we are not to be trifled with. I say,

Sir, that the time will come when patience will cease to be a virtue. The Government are bound in honour, if they have any honour, to carry out the terms of confederation with Prince Edward Island in the best possible way. And I say that so far they have trifled with the people of the island. It is true they have given us the steamer. But we know very well that the steamer is not giving the satisfaction which the people of the island would expect. We know the humbug that goes on when the steamer is prevented from crossing and the mails ordered from Pictou to Cape Tormentine. The steamer will make a trip or two. Then the ice prevents the steamer from crossing, and then the Postmaster General will order the mails to be carried back to Cape Tormentine. Hence the delay. Is that the way the Government expect to satisfy the reasonable demands of the people of Prince Edward Island? Is that the way they expect to fulfil their obligation to the people of the island? What is the reason, I would ask, why the Government will not try the experiment of having the "Stanley" left at Georgetown and getting another boat, to cost from $30,000 to $50,000, specially constructed for travel between the capes? Or send a Government engineer to cross every day with the ice-boats and make a report as to the possibility of a steamer crossing between Summerside and Cape Tormentine? We have the report of two or three engineers as to the feasibility of crossing between West Point and the Cape. They say we can cross there every day. Why, then, are the Government not prepared to spend a few thousand dollars to do justice to the people of the island? It is a dangerous thing for the Government to administer the affairs of the country in such a way as to dissatisfy even the smallest province. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance, the other day, was good enough to answer the question which I asked. I wanted to know how many borings had been made last summer between Cape Tormentine and Cape Traverse? I wanted to know also the expense of the work, and also whether any more borings were to be made at an early date? I do not know what the Minister of Finance meant in the answer he gave me. I am not sure that he knows what he meant himself. He must have thought that any answer would be good enough for the people of Prince Edward Island. He said:

An effort was made in the season of 1894 to put down a series of borings, but owing to the season being unusually boisterous, the contractors did not even succeed in putting down one hole.

I do not know that the season was any more boisterous than previous ones. I am not aware that it was more boisterous than the season of 1892, when Mr. Palmer, the English engineer, succeeded in boring nine or ten holes. That was the summer that the then Senator Howland, now Lieutenant-Governor of Prince Edward Island, was appointed as banker for Mr. Palmer. He had authority to purchase goods, implements, machinery—everything necessary for Mr. Palmer's use, at his own prices and charge Mr. Palmer with all, and, I suppose, to sell what was left of them at a reduction of 50 per cent to his friends in Summerside. How the Government got rid of Mr. Palmer, I do not know. He was here in Ottawa a long time on sufferance, and I suppose they had to smuggle him away, as they were smuggling Chinese the other day between St. John and Vanceboro'. I am not aware that they have paid him one cent. What kind of contract did they make with the gentlemen who were employed on this work last year, I should like to know? Why did not they bore in 1893? I can understand the reason. It is well known that in 1893 we were not on the eve of a general election. But in 1894 every person—except the Finance Minister himself—expected that we were near a general election, and I expected that the Government would strain a point to have a lot of men in the service and a lot of money expended. But, Sir, knowing that we were not to have the elections until the summer of 1895, the Finance Minister did nothing. Then the hon. gentleman goes on in his answer to me:

Therefore no payment was made to them.

No doubt he means, to the contractors, but I do not know who they are. He says further:

The amount expended by the Government was $8,557.56.

I suppose this includes the Palmer contract and all the others. I do not know; it is very vague.

The contractors declined to proceed with the work, they having spent nearly $4,000 in the effort during the season of 1894.

Does the Minister of Finance mean to tell me that the contractors expended $4,000 last year, and did not bore one hole? Why, Mr. Palmer, who was condemned and sneered at by the Government and by Senator Howland, only spent $8,000 in boring ten holes. Here this gentleman spent $4,000, and the Minister himself acknowledges that they have not bored one hole. Well, I hope they have security for this money. I hope this is not going to be an addition to the large deficit that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has got to stare at, that ugly-looking animal. He says:

Negotiations are now in progress for continuing the work of that boring during the season of 1895.

Now that lets the cat out of the bag. We are going to have an election in 1895. I believe we are, and that is a very bad verification of what is going to take place.

Now, I want the Minister of Finance to understand that it will take many years, at the rate he is going on, to build that tunnel. Why, Sir, I could not begin to figure the remoteness of the distance when that gigantic work will be completed at this rate of progress. My impression is that the Government of to-day are not able even to comprehend the magnitude of the work, that they are afraid to deal with it, that they just keep it there in that state of agitation in order to serve their political ends at the time of an election. At all events, pending the building of that tunnel, or pending the period when the Government will give up the idea of building it—I do not know which they mean to do, I believe they do not know themselves—but pending that period, I say the Government has a right to do justice to the people of the Island, in ascertaining where the best place for crossing is; and if they find that it is more feasible to cross between Cape Travers and Cape Tormentine, or between Summerside and Cape Tormentine, or between West Point and Richibucto, why not bring the boat up there? Leave the boat at present on the Georgetown route, and take a smaller boat, or send an engineer across in the ice-boats. These ice-boats begin to cross as soon as the ice is made, and they cross the whole winter. In fact when these returns are laid upon the Table, the House will be in a better position to understand the great drawback that the people of Prince Edward Island are put to. Now, Sir, we found a few days ago, about the first week in April, that we could have sent our potatoes from the west end of the island into the Boston market for 80 cents per bushel. Buyers were then paying from 35 to 40 cents. But we could not ship our potatoes at that time, and to-day prices are down to 20 cents, and because we have no means of communication there, we lose 100 per cent on the price of these articles, and our farmers are out of pocket in the price of their products by 100 per cent. Where is their remedy? The Government are deaf, they will not hear, they will not listen to our complaints, but they will take the taxes out of our people, they will rob them. They are neither afraid nor ashamed to tax the poor farmers of Prince County at the rate of 30 and 35 per cent, and, in some cases, to 70 per cent. They are not ashamed to do that. I say, Sir, that the Government have a right to give the people of the island some return for their taxes; they have a right to do them justice. The Government know as well as I do that they have broken the solemn compact with Prince Edward Island. They have been told by Lord Granville that they have not performed their solemn compact with the people of Prince Edward Island, and his Lordship advised them to carry out without delay the terms of confederation, not to be sleeping, not to be following the old policy of trifling with the people of Prince Edward Island, but to go to work at once, and see what is best to be done. Sir, my impression is that the Minister of Finance to-day has no more notion of spending another thousand dollars there to make borings between the two capes, than he had last year, or the year before. For him to tell me that it was so stormy during the whole summer of 1893, and the whole summer of 1894, that they could not work, is something that I, for my part, am not ready to swallow. I pay no attention to such statements, I have hardly a name to characterize them. It is simple mockery; it is a delusion, it is an imposition, it is political impudence on the part of the Minister to tell the people of Prince Edward Island that during last summer there was not one day when an engineer could bore a hole in the Straits of Northumberland between Capes Traverse and Tormentine. Sir, I wonder that he did not blush when he made such a statement as that. I did not believe him, I do not think he believed it himself. To say that there was not a day in 1893, nor in 1894, when a gang of men could not bore a hole there. The man in whose way an obstacle was placed, did bore nine or ten holes. There is no common sense in his statement, and if the Minister has nothing better to offer the people of Prince Edward Island than a stone when they ask for bread, it is time to tell them that they may go adrift. Let me tell him that if he wants peace and quietness in the island, if he wants to keep the people loyal—I do not mean to the Government, I mean to the constitution—he had better do justice to them, and the sooner he does it, the sooner will the people of the island give them credit for it, and the sooner will he promote the welfare of the island. Why, Sir, this Government thinks nothing of spending money by the million in carrying out the terms of confederation in British Columbia. Are the people of British Columbia dearer to the Government than the people of Prince Edward Island? That may be the case, from one standpoint. British Columbia, I understand, sends a unanimous representation to this House to support the Government, but unfortunately for our tunnel, the people of the island are not of that way of thinking. If the Minister of Finance thinks he is going to coerce the free, independent and loyal people of Prince Edward Island to his own way of thinking, by refusing to give them justice, he is much mistaken. He knows nothing at all about the people of Prince Edward Island. Now, there is a paper published in Summerside called the Summerside "Journal." I am sure the Minister of Finance knows the editor well, and the editor of that paper knows the Government well. Why, Sir, he draws milk out of the Dominion treasury at the rate of $1,500 per year—I do not know for what, I believe for nothing at all. He has a long editorial advising the Government to change the route from Georgetown to Pictou, and bring the boat, or some other boat, between Cape Traverse and Cape Tormentine, or between West Point and Richibucto. I will not read the whole article. It so happens that I have a little more faith in this paper than my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition has in the Tory press generally. It is in the winding up of the article where the poison comes in :

We believe that it now lies almost entirely with the electors of Prince County themselves to bring this question to a head, and to have the proposed route opened up. While questions like this should be above the petty level of party politics, such is not, we regret to say, always the case.

The fact is we want representatives at Ottawa in sympathy with the Government, to support our claims and to see that we get our rights. The present Government will, we feel confident, be sustained at the approaching election. The signs of the times point to such a result, much more positively than they did at the last election, when the Government was so handsomely sustained. Let the people make no mistake on this point. Every Conservative should stand true to his colours, and every Liberal or waiverer who wishes to be on the winning side should cast his vote for the Conservative nominee.

Is not that a bribe, is not that intimidation? Hon. members will observe the statement regarding the members of the Conservative party standing together, but as regards Liberal waiverers we have none of them.

East Prince, then, should rally to the support of such a man as Mr. R. Hunt,—if he gets the nomination, and we have no doubt he will,—

I believe he did get it.

—who deserves well of the constituency, and who, when elected, will be in a position to see that the rights and privileges of the people of this constituency and of this county are secured to them. If you elect Mr. Hunt, who has already done a great deal for this county,—vastly much more than any outside man has done or can do,—and who in Parliament can do a great deal more, and he, acting in conjunction with Mr. Josiah Wood, of Westmoreland, other favourably disposed representatives, will have a winter mail route at once opened at the capes, maintaining this service by means of the "Stanley" or some other equally powerful steamer.

If the people were so fortunate as to obtain the parliamentary services of that Goliath, Mr. Hunt, in connection with that Goliath, Mr. Wood, the people of the island would have all the influence they required. But it must be remembered that the Goliath, Mr. Wood, was not able to keep the snow clear from his railway during last winter, and so the mails could not be carried over it to the capes for eight, ten or twelve days. Mr. Wood did not like to spend the requisite money; he thought it would be too expensive to clear the road over which he has control, and which was largely subsidized by the Dominion Government for the purpose of carrying the mails and passengers between the capes. But if Mr. Wood thought proper not to expend a few hundred dollars to accommodate the people of the island, it was very convenient for him to get the railway built largely by the Dominion Government, and also a pier built at a cost of something like a million dollars of the public money. But what is the utility of these efforts to accommodate the public service when we have no crossing from Cape Traverse to Cape Tormentine? The report contending that the necessary work could not be built was a piece of the greatest jugglery I ever knew in my life. I believe the present Government will do nothing to improve the service. For nearly twenty years this matter has been brought to their notice, but no redress has been given to the people of Prince Edward Island. To-day they are as badly off for lack of winter mail communication as they were under the old regime. They still have to fall back on the ice-boats. Last winter was blustery, and during some days the boats could not cross. That, however, was not the fault of the boatmen, who are mostly islanders and are hardy and trustworthy men, always able and willing to do their work efficiently. How much they are paid, I do not know. We propose to ascertain this from the return asked for. In my opinion they are paid very indifferently, whereas they should be well remunerated, as they risk their own lives and have the lives of passengers in their hands while crossing. I do not mean to say that they should obtain as much salary as the Minister of Finance, $8,000 a year, but they should be well paid for the work they do, and at all events they should be better compensated than I believe they are at the present time. I have endeavoured to show that the point where the winter crossing should be is not between Georgetown and Pictou. At all events the Government should ascertain with all care where the best point for crossing is, not from hearsay, not by placing a man on the top of a lighthouse and accepting a report made by such an individual, but by sending competent and trustworthy men, men appointed by the department or by the Government, to different points, to ascertain the most suitable point. Such officers would find that between Capes Traverse and Tormentine a crossing could be made every day; a similar state of things would be found to exist between Summerside and Cape Tormentine, and I believe there would be no trouble in crossing in a common boat almost every day between West Point and Richibucto. If the report favoured the West Point route, then the Government should enter into a contract with the American Company, of which Dr. Bertram is at the head. If the report favoured the Summerside route, that should be established. If the report favoured the route between Summerside and Cape Tormentine, the crossing should be established there. I know the representatives of King's County will be up in arms and fight the proposition, and no doubt they possess influence with the Government which they support. They are personally interested in having a steamer cross at Georgetown, which is in the east of the island. Cape Traverse or Summerside route would be in the centre of the province; but I cast all these sectional questions aside, and I contend that the Government should ascertain where the most feasible crossings are, and then, regardless of any sectional interest, they should establish a crossing at that point which is best adapted to the purpose, according to the report of the engineers.

Mr. YEO. With reference to the motion proposed by my hon. friend and colleague (Mr. Perry), I would like to say as one of the representatives of Prince Edward Island, that I have no fault to find with the work done by the steamer "Stanley." She has done her work well, but she falls very far short of carrying out the terms of confederation which were agreed upon when Prince Edward Island entered the union. I think, Sir, it is worthy the attention of this Government, or of any other government which may come after it, to consider the necessity of trying whether a better communication cannot be made between Cape Tormentine and some point in Prince Edward Island. It is the opinion of practical and experienced men that the route from Cape Tormentine to Cape Traverse, or to Summerside, is by far the most fitting for winter communication. It may be that the Government do not care to put such an expensive boat as the "Stanley" on there, she is of heavy draft of water, and for other reasons perhaps not just suited for that purpose, but I think they should at least experiment with some powerful steam tug. We know it is a very short distance between the mainland and Prince Edward Island at these points. Summerside has a good natural harbour, it is a large shipping port in summer, and there are many reasons why it would be a suitable landing point in winter. If Summerside cannot be reached, Cape Traverse is near to Cape Tormentine and could, in the opinion of many, be reached at any time by a powerful and suitable steamer. I trust the hints which have been thrown out by my hon. colleague (Mr. Perry) will be acted upon. He has made some reference to the tunnel, and although perhaps it does not come up under this particular motion, I may say a word in reference to it. I believe the most sanguine advocates of the tunnel in Prince Edward Island have come to the conclusion that the Government have only been trifling with the matter so far, and that the promises made in the year 1891, were made solely for the purpose of influencing the elections of that year. I hope we are not going to have a repetition of this thing now. It seems strange that during four years the Government has not been able to obtain the information which they promised to obtain in the year 1891. The Minister of Finance told the House the other day that we had very boisterous weather in the Straits of Northumberland during the season of 1894, and that it prevented borings being made. Well, I do not know that the weather was unusually bad, but I do believe that if there had been an earnest attempt made to complete the borings there should have been no difficulty about it. If the intention of the Government is not to take this matter up seriously, I consider that there has been a wilful waste of public money. I, in my opinion, cannot help thinking there was no good reason why the borings were not completed in the season of 1892, and I hope and trust that we are not going to have a repetition of what took place previous to the elections of 1891, in view of the elections which are to take place in the near future. The people of Prince Edward Island are tired of this sort of thing. When anything is proposed which is for the benefit of the province the people want it to take some practical shape, and not to have it dangled before them previous to an election and lost sight of until another general election is coming on. I trust that whatever Government we have—whether we are unfortunate enough to have the present Government or not—steps will be taken to test the practicability of winter communication between Cape Tormentine and Prince Edward Island. Until that has been done the people of the island will not be satisfied. The nearest points are, I think, about seven miles, which is a very short distance compared with that to which the "Stanley" now has to navigate. We know there has been a very large outlay of money on the New Brunswick side, and to a large extent it is thrown away unless there are some means of communication between that province and the island. I am sure that the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) will bear me out in saying that there is a very strong impression in New Brunswick, as well as in Prince Edward Island, that the route from Cape Tormentine to some point on the Prince Edward Island side is the most favourable one for winter navigation. If Summerside could be reached there is a good harbour there, and railroad facilities, and in many ways it is the most central and best part of the island at which to land in winter. I hope that the Minister of Finance will give an assurance that an attempt will be made to put a powerful steam tug on that route to test this matter, which is a very important one to the people of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. FOSTER. The returns will, of course, be brought down with all convenient speed, and perhaps occasion will occur, after this information is before the House, for a second discussion, because I imagine this is, so to speak, only a preliminary canter engaged in by my two hon. friends (Mr. Perry and Mr. Yeo). I believe, however, that my hon. friend (Mr. Yeo) has not quite treated the Government with his usual fairness. He has intimated that last year there was not an earnest attempt made to finish the borings which have been in progress for some years in the straits. I will just put a case to my hon. friend and he will come to his own conclusions on that point. Suppose that my hon. friend (Mr. Yeo) had entered into a contract with the Government by which he was to bore a certain number of holes in the straits during the season, and that if he finished the work he was to receive $6,000, and if he did not finish the work, he was not to receive $1. And if he went there and spent 90 days or more at the work, would he think it reasonable that he would go down and dilly-dally away his time all summer, and pay his men, and spend nearly $4,000, and in the end not do the work and not get any pay for it? I think when the matter is put in that practical way to my hon. friend, that he will say that the attempt was an earnest attempt. A company as good as could be got took the contract, a company with, I think, as good equipment as there is in Canada for that kind of work, and that company worked there during the season. Whether the weather was specially boisterous or not, the facts are that it was sufficiently boisterous to prevent them from getting one single hole sunk. They spent the summer there, they went to an outlay of $4,000, and they have not received a dollar, nor will they receive a dollar from the Government in reference to it. That is proof positive to my mind that the Government was in earnest in the first place, and that the contractors were in earnest in the second place. My hon. friend (Mr. Yeo) must give us credit, and I think he will give that company credit, for making an earnest attempt to carry out the borings. A contract will be entered into again, is now being entered into, with, I think, the same company, to make another attempt this year. They propose to get at it earlier than last year and they have the hope that probably as seasons differ, this season may be more propitious for the work and that they may be successful and recoup themselves to a certain extent, at least, for their great loss of last season.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What is it all for?

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Mills) cannot have been listening to the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. He must have been out of this House. He must have been out of this House every session when Prince Edward Island members were urging upon the Government to undertake this work, and keeping them up to the point of getting this information; and now my hon. friend from Bothwell rises, with that mild and innocent way of his, and wants to know what all this is about. I commend him to the hon. gentlemen from Prince Edward Island on his side of the House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have told him that it is for an election.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that all my hon. friend from Prince wants this boring done for?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am afraid it is all the Government wants it done for.

Mr. FOSTER. And my hon. friend backs him up in undertaking to keep the Government to the scratch. My hon. friend from Bothwell must settle that with his colleague from Prince Edward Island.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I thought it was to add to the deficit.

Mr. FOSTER. No, there are some things that must be done, deficit or no deficit; and we must do justice to Prince Edward Island and have these borings in some way or other.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) I am glad this return with respect to the steamer "Stanley" is asked for, as it will show the importance of the work which that steamer is doing in a very efficient manner between Georgetown and Pictou. A great deal of stress has been laid upon the necessity of sending the "Stanley" to other places to test the practicability of her running from Cape Traverse to Cape Tormentine, or from Cape Tormentine to Summerside, or from the West Point to Richibucto. I agree very much with the remarks made by the hon. junior member for Prince that the steamer "Stanley" is too expensive a boat, and has cost this country too much, to undertake such hazardous experiments. In the first place, she is not properly constructed for shallow water, and would not be suitable to ply between Cape Traverse and Cape Tormentine. If the Government thought well to experiment in this matter, of course it would be much better to get a powerful tug with less draught of water. In the summer time such a boat might make the passage between the capes successfully; but I very much doubt whether any other boat could be found to cross at the capes so efficiently as the "Stanley" has done up to this time between Pictou and Georgetown. The hon. senior member for Prince says that the ice packs where the "Stanley" crosses. That shows me how very little he knows about the matter. The ice packs between Pictou Island and the Island of Prince Edward in the narrow Straits of Northumberland; but farther below, owing to the wider expanse of the gulf, the "Stanley" can make her passage across at nearly all seasons. During the past winter she could have run steadily all winter, with the exception of about ten days, in the depth of winter, when she was laid up for the cleaning of her boiler, and so forth, and when there was very little freight moving. She does her work well, she is ably managed and well manned. When this return comes down, I think the amount of freight she carries will be shown to be very large. I have no doubt she is a very great accommodation to the merchants of Prince Edward Island in getting their shipments made and their early spring goods in. Attempts have been heretofore made to get the "Stanley" to run between Pictou and Charlottetown, but I think it will be found on examination that this steamer received more damage in the attempt to run to Charlottetown a year or two ago, owing to the importunities of interested parties, than she has ever received on her Pictou-Georgetown route. I might as well get up and argue in favour of the steamship "Northumberland" carrying her freight from Point Duchene to Charlottetown. The steamer "Stanley" at present carries a very large amount of freight and passengers by the Pictou-Georgetown route; and the number of days that intervene between the time she is able to go on the Pictou-Charlottetown route and the time the summer boats commence to run, is so trifling, that I would urge the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to continue to run the "Stanley" on the Georgetown-Pictou route as soon as the proper season arrives in the fall of the year, and to advertise that she would run on that route until the spring boats are put on again. A great deal of unnecessary annoyance is given to passengers as well as in the carrying of freight, by the uncertainty that sometimes prevails owing to interested parties wishing to have the steamer taken off the regular route in order to run to Charlottetown. The hon. senior member for Prince thinks the capes route is a better one than the route between Pictou and Georgetown. Well, I have no objection to the Government experimenting on that or any other route: but I think it would be a very hazardous undertaking to take the steamship "Stanley" off a route on which she is giving great public satisfaction, to put her on a route that has not yet been proved to be good. The hon. member accuses the members from King's of being in favour of the Georgetown-Pictou route from motives of local interest. The matter may have that appearance, but for my part I look upon that route as the only one that has so far proved to be practicable; and until some other route is proved to be practicable, I will continue to support that route. I would like the hon. gentleman to amend his motion by adding the following:—

And the amounts received for freight and passengers carried by the said steamer from Pictou to Charlottetown in the spring of 1894 and the spring of 1895 respectively.

That is, the freight she has carried after she has left the Pictou and Georgetown route to go to Charlottetown.

Mr. WELSH. As far as the "Stanley" is concerned, she is a very fine boat, and well managed, and I think the Government has done right in keeping her on the route between Georgetown and Pictou. I have had a good deal of experience crossing that gulf for over fifty years, and I know that at present the only feasible place to run the "Stanley" is on the route between Georgetown and Pictou. There has been some agitation going on in Prince Edward Island for a southern railroad from Charlottetown to Murray Harbour. If the railway were completed, and a little improvement done to Murray Harbour, by removing the bar, there would be sufficient water for that boat to run from Murray Harbour to Pictou. This would shorten the distance nearly one-half. But as that is looking a long way ahead, the Government are quite right in keeping the "Stanley" employed between Georgetown and Pictou. She is a splendid boat, and a credit to the country. As regards changing the route of the "Stanley" and making her ply between any other ports than Pictou and Georgetown, that would be nonsense. For instance, between Capes Tormentine and Traverse, there is no harbour. The Government have built a harbour at Cape Tormentine, which is a considerable distance in the winter from running ice, but on the island side there is no harbour, and I doubt very much if there ever will be a harbour there for a boat like the "Stanley." Even now, the water at Cape Tormentine pier is not sufficiently deep for the "Stanley." Again, Summerside harbour has not enough water, nor has even Shediac. But certainly, as my hon. friend from King's County (Mr. Macdonald) has said, I have no objection to the Government making experiments by running a boat drawing less water between Shediac and Summerside, or any other ports. But they will find a difficulty even in trying that experiment, because a boat of less power than the "Stanley" and less draught of water would not be able to force her way through the ice. The "Stanley" draws seventeen feet of water when she encounters heavy ice, and it would be absurd to take the "Stanley" away from her present route, and try her on any other route between the island and the main land. The senior member for Prince (Mr. Perry) has said that there is a good road between West Point and Richibucto. There is no harbour there fit for such a boat as the "Stanley." Again, at times, the West Point and Richibucto route, according to the wind, would be open, and at other times the eastern part of the island would be open. The north-west winds drive the ice, and fills the gulf between West Point and Richibucto, or it clears the ice from the route between Pictou and Georgetown, but a nor'easter again fills up between Pictou and Georgetown and clears the western end of the island. It would be very difficult for me to give an opinion on any of those experiments. I think the "Stanley" has performed almost all that the most sanguine expected she would do. I think she has done wonders, and I believe that most of the detention we have suffered on the island in the carrying of mails has been due to Mr. Wood's railway. He built a road from Sackville down to Tormentine, which is a very servicesable one when kept clear. But we had some heavy storms last winter, and were detained some ten or twelve days because that railway was not running. It was buried under the snow. I have crossed there for over fifty years, and I have never seen the day when the mails, carried by sleigh and horse, were ever detained on the road. Now, we have a railway, and we have to wait a certain number of days while Mr. Wood is shovelling it out. This railway cost a lot of money—over $7,000 a mile in subsidies, and I believe that Mr. Wood gets paid also for carrying the mails, and it is certainly monstrous that our mails should be detained five or ten days while the railway is being shovelled out. Mr. Wood, when his road ceases running, should forward the mail by horses or some other means. Let the blame be put on the right shoulders. As for the "Stanley," I can say nothing but good of her. The Minister of Finance and I had something to do with her construction. I think he will find that my suggestions and estimates have always come out correct, and in planning the "Stanley" I take a little credit to myself. I assisted the Government engineer, and the Government in planning her, and I am proud to say she is a success, and has done more than, I think, the most sanguine people ever expected. Notwithstanding that, under the terms of confederation, the Government are bound to keep up winter communication. They have not done so. They have not carried out the agreement, and we have, consequently, an account against them to a pretty healthy amount. A few years ago a deputation came up here—a good Conservative deputation; one of its members is in the Government, I believe. They claimed some $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 from the Dominion for non-fulfilment of the terms of confederation. The Government refused to grant the claim, and the island sent a deputation to Her Majesty's Government, to plead for redress. It cost the colony a large sum of money to send those delegates over, and all they accomplished was to obtain a recommendation from the Home Government to the Dominion Government to deal generously with the colony. As yet, however, we have had no settlement, but I have always noticed that when a Conservative from Prince Edward Island asks anything from the Conservative Government of the Dominion, he does not get anything for the colony, but gets a good position for himself. One of the delegates was appointed Chief Justice of Prince Edward Island; the next one was appointed judge of county court; and the last one of all was made a member of the Government, but the island has not got a cent. These people will be well rewarded by the island. I have never seen these gentlemen going through the island backing any political candidate who was not defeated. I have given the Government, for a number of years, some very good suggestions about the winter crossing, and if I can give them any suggestions again I shall be happy to do so for the good of the Dominion. I agree with the hon. member for King's that it would be bad policy to order the "Stanley" from Georgetown to Charlottetown before the captain thought it was proper and feasible. I quite agree with him in that, and with the junior member for Prince County (Mr. Yeo). I do not know whether the Government will bring down in the Estimates a sum for the Southern railway from Charlottetown to Murray Harbour, and thus shorten considerably the mail route, but as I look forward to represent that section of the country, I shall take care that their interests are attended to.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I did not intend to take part in this discussion, but some of the remarks of the hon. member who last addressed the House perhaps require a little correction on my part. The hon. gentleman said that the trouble with Prince Edward Island mails during last winter was all due to the mismanagement of the road of which I, fortunately or unfortunately, happen to be president, the road running from Sackville to Cape Tormentine. The hon. gentleman said that after the severe snowstorms we had last winter, the road was left not shovelled out for some five or ten days, and that it was owing to this that the Prince Edward Island mails were detained. I am sorry the hon. gentleman did not take pains to ascertain the facts before making his statement. There was no case during last winter—and we never, within my recollection, had a more severe winter or one in which there was more difficulty in contending with the snow upon the road—when the road was closed for more than three days at one time. That is to say, there was one occasion when, during a severe storm, it was three days from the time the train left Sackville until it reached Cape Tormentine. That was the greatest detention of the season. And, if I am correctly informed, the Prince Edward Island Railway was snowed up during the same time. Besides that, if the hon. gentleman had known the facts, he would know that there was only one day during that time, the last day when it was possible for the ice-boats to cross between the capes. So that, as a matter of fact, the detention of the Prince Edward Island mail through delay on the road from Sackville to Cape Tormentine, was only one day. I would not be the least afraid that the statements of the hon. gentleman would receive any credence or have any injurious effect in the locality where the road is situated, for every one there knows the facts, knows that every effort which any company could possibly be expected to make is made to keep the road open and to keep the trains running regularly in the winter time, especially when we are carrying the Prince Edward Island mails; and I believe that, up to last winter, there has never been a case when the mails have not been delivered with perfect regularity. The present winter was unprecedented in the maritime provinces, at least within my recollection, for the heavy storms that occurred; yet there was only the one occasion of which I speak when there was a delay of three days between the time of the train leaving Sackville and reaching Cape Tormentine. Now, with regard to the general question which hon. gentlemen have been discussing—the propriety of making an experiment with the steamer “Stanley” between the capes—I must say that the result of such observation as I have been able to make and such information as I have been able to gain lead me to believe that such experiment with the steamer “Stanley” or some other suitable steamer would yield good results. The navigation of the straits in winter time, of course is, to a large extent, experimental. The results of the experiments that have already been tried have established a few facts. The steamer “Stanley,” if I am correctly informed—and I have made careful inquiries of those who are competent to express an opinion on the subject—is capable of making her way through any floating ice that is ever found in the Straits of Northumberland. She is also capable of making her way through the ice which is usually formed in the bays and along the coasts either on the mainland or on the Prince Edward Island side. The condition of things which renders it impossible for the “Stanley” to cross is caused by the ice jams which sometimes form some miles in extent—heavy floating ice closely packed, through which it is impossible for the “Stanley” or any other steamer to make her way. On the present route there is a point, I think, somewhere near Pictou harbour, though I do not know the place exactly—those who have crossed tell me it is called the Bight—where the ice packs form. When the “Stanley” gets in one of these packs or jams it is impossible for her to make her way out again. Now, if the facts I refer to are true, and the “Stanley” can cross at any time provided the ice is movable, provided there is any open space at all in which she can move backward or forward, and that she can make her way through any board ice which forms there, I am satisfied she can make daily crossings between Cape Tormentine and some point in the neighbourhood of Cape Traverse on Prince Edward Island. During the last two or three years, when my attention has been more particularly drawn to this subject, I have made most careful inquiries from those best acquainted with the locality, and their statements go to show that in that part of the straits these solid ice jams never form. I have made it a point myself to visit the cape repeatedly during the last two winters, and have observed the condition of things there, and I have never, even in the most severe weather, seen the straits completely closed with ice. In the narrow portion where the ice has to pass through between the capes where the whole width of the straits is only seven miles, the ice is sometimes closely packed, but immediately below, not a mile below, there is always open water to be seen, the ice floating about in it. It does appear to me that this experiment is worth trying. I am not prepared to say. I think perhaps it is not for any member of this House to say, whether the steamer “Stanley” is the most suitable boat for that purpose. But I really think, from the experiments which have already been tried, from the facts which we have with regard to the condition of things between the capes, that the experiment should be tried with some suitable boat. But I must say, from the information which I have been able to gather during the last two years, and from my own observation of the condition of things there, that I believe this experiment would prove successful, and would give the people of Prince Edward Island during the winter time uninterrupted mail communication every day in the winter season, unless, of course, it might be an exceptional day in a very severe storm, when travelling was impossible.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman intimates that the unfortunate delays which took place in delivering the mails between the mainland and Prince Edward Island last year, were not owing to the want of proper accommodation on the railway that he controls, and, of course, I have no evidence at my hand to contradict his statement. All I desire to say is, that the people of the island were informed by the authorities there, when they were some eight or ten days without a mail at all, that the main reason of it was that the hon. gentleman's railway was all closed up with snow, and that he would not shovel it out, or did not shovel it out, and to that cause they were to attribute, to a large extent, the non-delivery of our mails, and the great inconvenience which the commercial public underwent by reason of that non-delivery. Now the hon. gentleman advocates the experiment of placing the "Stanley" on the route between Capes Tormentine and Traverse in winter. I regret that I cannot concur in that advice. The "Stanley," as my hon. colleague has explained to the House, is a most excellent boat, which cost a great deal of money, some $150,000, and it would be an unjustifiable experiment on the part of the Government to risk a boat costing that sum of money in that dangerous navigation such as we know exists between those two capes. Now, Sir, some years ago the Government came down here and proposed to the House to make a connection between the island and the mainland at this narrow point, and instead of constructing contemporaneously public wharfs on both sides, and showing they were in earnest in this experiment, they let a contract and spent $250,000 in constructing a public wharf at the end of my hon. friend's railway on the New Brunswick side. There it has remained ever since. Last summer it was largely eaten up with worms, and a very large expenditure was incurred, some thousands of dollars I think, up to the end of the year, in repairing it; how much after the end of the year, I do not know, but I am putting a question upon the Order paper to find out. But while they have spent this quarter of a million of money in building a public wharf, ostensibly—

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I think my hon. friend must be mistaken about that. It was only some small repairs put in.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I hold in my hand the Public Accounts, and if the hon. gentleman will turn to page 18 (Roman numerals) he will find among sundry works charged to the Dominion of Canada, "Cape Tormentine Harbour, $236,860." And if he will turn to the receipts and expenditure for the year, he will see that in the financial year ending June 30, 1894, there were $5,636 spent upon repairs for that very work. The hon. gentleman cannot contradict the facts.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). Was it for repairs, or was it for finishing the work?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It says on Cape Tormentine Harbour.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). It does not say repairs?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What was it for?

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I do not know just now.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman say he does not know?

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). My recollection is that the work was not finished in the previous year.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman will please draw a distinction between the balance sheet of the Dominion of Canada where the amount is charged to capital expenditure, $236,869, and the current expenditure of the year, which he will find in the other place to which I referred him, of $5,636. The hon. gentleman knows that the statement I make, that the wharf was largely eaten up by sea worms, is correct, and it had to be repaired. I am not complaining of the repairs, because the work, if it had to be done, had to be kept in repair. What I am complaining about is the manner in which that quarter of a million of money was spent. That wharf never should have been built there, and never would have been built there, not a single man in this House would have dared to vote a dollar for its construction, excepting that it was proposed to be built in order to carry out the terms of union with Prince Edward Island, and to keep up communication between the mainland and the island. Nobody would have proposed to build a wharf costing a quarter of a million of money at the end of a private railway owned by the hon. member for Westmoreland. The thing would be too much of an outrage altogether. But it was built, nevertheless, ostensibly as part of the communication between the island and the mainland; but there never was any wharf built on the island side, and it has remained there simply as a part of the hon. gentleman's railway, and for the benefit of that railway alone. That is the simple truth about that matter. Now, I think myself that the hon. Minister would be well advised, owing to the many statements made by the residents in that locality, if he would try the experiment of putting a good strong steam tug there in winter. A great many men whose opinion I value have expressed the belief that that route can be kept open longer in winter, in the month of February, than it can between Georgetown and Pictou. But while I would be sorry to see the "Stanley" put there as an experiment—I think it would be unjustifiable to risk such a valuable vessel in such a dangerous place—I think the Government would be justified, in fact I think under the circumstances they are bound to place a good strong tug boat there, and test whether it is practicable or not, and if it is not practicable, then let it be done away with.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). You could not do it if you had not the wharf.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You can surely try the experiment whether a tug boat can run there in winter without a wharf. If there is a wharf there she must be run to that given point, must she not? If she cannot touch the wharf, she is no good at all, and you can make a harbour in the border ice equally attainable as a wharf would be, and the experiment therefore could be tried with a good strong tug boat. If it succeeds, well and good, building a wharf might then be justified afterwards. If it fails, what then? Does the hon. gentleman propose to ask this House to spend another quarter of a million building a wharf before we know whether a communication can be kept open? Surely not. Like my colleague here, I never like to ask for the expenditure of any money in Prince Edward Island unless there is a reasonable assurance that it will be done in the public interest and for the public benefit. I do not believe in wild-cat schemes. Now, the Minister of Finance spoke about the good faith which the Government had kept with the people of the island in the initial steps they have taken towards forming a conclusion as to whether a tunnel should be built or not; and the hon. gentleman asks us to believe that they were really and sincerely in earnest last year when they sent down some contractors there to spend the summer, who never bored a single hole. They had no competent man in charge. If they were in earnest, why did they discharge the only man that was ever competent to do the civil engineering there, Mr. Palmer, who, in the previous year, had bored eight or nine holes, and who, if they had left him there, would have finished the work? The hon. gentleman would long since have been in a condition to make up his mind. I am very much afraid that if this present Government remains in power, the construction of the Prince Edward Island tunnel, and the introduction of free trade will be somewhat coterminous. I think the hon. Minister the Secretary of State in his statements up in Ontario, placed the proper time for the introduction of the free trade system into this Dominion, at about five centuries hence.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That had reference to your party getting into power.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Although one year had elapsed since that time, leaving only 499 years, I am very strongly inclined to think that the Prince Edward Island tunnel, and the introduction of free trade by hon. gentlemen opposite will be coterminous. The fact is, the work which the Government are doing down there, or are pretending to do, is a laughing stock, and a burlesque. Public money is being spent there in pretending to sink holes in the straits. This has been going on two or three years. One year, eight holes were sunk, the next year not one, and this year, I believe, the Minister of Public Works has intimated that contractors are going to work again. I should like to ask whether the Government have a competent man to supervise the work, or is another year to be dawdled through, and, at the end, the work to be in the same position as now. I think hon. gentlemen opposite would be well advised so far as the "Stanley" is concerned in leaving it largely to the experience of the mariner in command to decide the places between which she shall run. Although there are times when, between Georgetown and Pictou it is impossible for a crossing to take place from day to day, still, I have never been able to convince myself that there are any other ports equally as available as these ports. But, beyond giving the Government proper credit, to which, I think, they are entitled, for having constructed the "Stanley," and I like to give them credit when they are entitled to it, I do not think they have taken any steps whatever to implement the terms of union between the island and the Dominion. If the hon. gentleman had not spoken before I did, I should have liked to have asked him to state whether the Government are prepared to yield to the island any part of the claims she has made on account of non-fulfilment of the terms of union. No doubt the island will expect now more than at any previous period, to obtain a favourable answer, because the hon. gentleman has signified the interest he takes in that part of the Dominion by introducing into his councils a gentleman who does not represent the people, it is true, although he has tried many times to do so, but who holds a seat in the Senate, and one, also, at the Privy Council. I have no doubt that that gentleman now, having weight in the councils of the nation, will press the claims of the island as he pressed them before; and I hope the hon. leader of the Government will be able to give some assurance that the claims of the island will receive that treatment which they deserve. If the Government are not able to concede the whole claims made by the island, I trust they will be able to allow a part; the hon. gentleman has been as silent as a sphinx to-day, nevertheless, we trust that our claims will receive recognition at the hands of the Government. It is still open to the hon. gentleman to intimate whether the claims of the island have lately been considered by the Government, whether the Government have made up their minds to acknowledge them, and, if so, to what extent, and as elections are coming off in the near future, it is desirable that this information should be obtained, so that the electors may be able to pass an opinion on the decision arrived at by the Government.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

SCHEDULING OF CANADIAN CATTLE.

Mr. MULOCK moved for:

Copies of all despatches, letters or other communications that have passed between the Imperial and Canadian Governments since the 1st of July, 1892, in regard to the scheduling of Canadian cattle by Great Britain or the removal of such scheduling.

He said : I would remind the Government that this motion, when it speaks of all communications in the past between the Imperial and Canadian Governments, covers, in my view, any communication between any officer of the Canadian Government, such, for example, as the High Commissioner, and the Imperial authorities.

Mr. FOSTER. It might not be possible to bring down every communication that has passed between the Government and the High Commissioner in London. Confidential communications often pass between them, and, of course, we must be the judges as to the papers to be brought down ; but everything pertinent, and which can possibly be brought down, will be submitted.

Mr. MULOCK. Part of the correspondence took place between the High Commissioner and the Imperial authorities. Some correspondence took place, no doubt, between His Excellency and the Secretary of State for the Colonies. But the correspondence between the High Commissioner and the Imperial authorities I regard as communications between the Canadian Government and the Imperial authorities, the High Commissioner being an agent of the Dominion Government.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes ; if the communications are pertinent, they will be brought down. Communications between our Government and the British Government are carried on governmentally, and copies of the despatches are sent, also to the High Commissioner, and often he, being on the spot, acts on behalf of the Government in pressing the views which have been expressed in the despatches forwarded by this Government.

Mr. MULOCK. That may be the practice, but I have seen in the newspapers that some correspondence took place between the High Commissioner and the Imperial authorities. That correspondence I wish included in the return.

Mr. FOSTER. All of that, I dare say, will be included.

Motion agreed to.

BRITISH COLUMBIA PENITENTIARY.

Mr. MARA (for Mr. Corbould) moved for :

1. Copy of the instructions to Mr. Justice Drake, 1894, relative to the inquiry into the management of the British Columbia Penitentiary.
2. Copy of evidence given before the Royal Commission held before Mr. Justice Drake, in 1894, relative to the management of the British Columbia Penitentiary.
3. Copy of the report of Mr. Justice Drake thereon.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MARA (for Mr. Corbould) moved for :

Copies of all correspondence with the Department of Justice relative to the reinstatement of James Fitzsimmons, as Deputy Warden of the British Columbia Penitentiary.

He said : In moving these two resolutions, I express the wish of the hon. member for Westminster (Mr. Corbould), which I may say is also endorsed by every other member from British Columbia, that no unnecessary delay will occur in the bringing down of these papers.

Mr. FOSTER. They will be brought down at once.

Motion agreed to.

GRATUITY TO MRS. DR. ALLEN.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved for :

Orders in Council, letters or documents having reference to the application of Janet Conger Allen, widow of the late Dr. Allen, for the usual gratuity of two months' salary payable on the decease of any public servant while in office.

He said : Respecting the motion, I may say that I understand that the circumstances of the case are somewhat these. The Controller of Customs, I believe, recommended this in the usual course, and it seems to have been refused, or I understand that it has been refused, on the score that Mrs. Allen was not at the time living with her husband. Well, I think we need hardly enter into a discussion of the domestic relations of the parties, and my impression is that these gratuities in the case of officers dying in the service have been heretofore granted as a matter of course. I do not remember at the moment any similar application being refused, and I think that that being the case, Mrs. Allen should hardly have been put to a disadvantage by reason of the fact that the late lamented Dr. Allen and herself did not entirely agree. However, perhaps the Controller of Customs knows something further about the matter and can make a statement now.

Mr. WALLACE. The two months' gratuity which the law provides shall be paid, was paid to the daughter of Dr. Allen and not to his widow.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It has been paid ?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I was misinformed on the point.

Mr. FOSTER. Do you still wish the papers.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, the papers had better be brought down.

Motion agreed to.

PAYMENT TO THE DOMINION BY THE PROVINCES.

Mr. FRIOR moved for :

Return of all moneys paid into the Dominion treasury by the several provinces of the Dominion and the North-west Territory, showing the amounts paid by each province, under their proper headings, from 1st July, 1884, to 1st July, 1894. Also, a return of all expenditures made by the Dominion Government in the above several provinces and the North-west Territory during the same period, under their different proper headings, exclusive of any expenditures on the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Intercolonial Railway.

He said : I may say that last year I applied for a somewhat similar return, but I found that it did not give sufficient details to be of any use. I trust that the Minister of Finance will see that this return, if it is allowed by the House, will be brought down in as short a period as possible so that it may be of some use during the present session.

Mr. FOSTER. It appears to me that most of the departments will have something to do in preparing the return, so that it may take a little longer than if it belonged to one department. I will try to expedite it all I possibly can.

Motion agreed to.

THE SUPERANNUATION LIST.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for :

Return showing the names of the several parties superannuated from the 31st December, 1894, to the first day of April, 1895, the amount of superannuation allowance granted to each, the number of years' service, their age at retirement, and the number of years added to their time of service, if any.

Mr. FOSTER. I presume that my hon. friend will see that the papers he calls for will be included in the one already ordered by a motion passed. He will find, I think, that the return with regard to superannuations which I laid on the Table the other day will give him the information he asks for.

Mr. McMULLEN. The report laid on the Table of the House only covers up to the 31st December, 1894, whereas this resolution asks for the present month.

Mr. FOSTER. All right.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 5.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 29th April, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House, that the Clerk of the House has received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, a certificate of the election and return of

C. A. Geoffrion, Esq., for the Electoral District of Verchères.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

C. A. Geoffrion, Esq., for the Electoral District of Verchères, introduced by Hon. Mr. Laurier and Mr. McIsaac.

ACT RESPECTING THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. McCARTHY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 25) further to amend the Act respecting the House of Commons. He said: Mr. Speaker, the Bill which I ask leave to introduce is for the purpose of restoring to the House the control over its own proceedings which by recent legislation it has, I think, substantially lost. It will be remembered that originally a writ could not be issued to fill a vacancy in the House of Commons without the authority of the House itself. That was the original rule and law regulating parliamentary proceedings, and it was based on the well understood doctrine that the House of Commons was the best judge and had the absolute and sole control over its own proceedings, and guarded its own privileges and dignity. I find that it was in 1770 that the Act was first passed permitting the Speaker of the House during recess between the sessions of Parliament in case of a vacancy occurring by death, to issue his warrant, and the recital of the Act was: That many inconveniences have happened and much disorder has been occasioned for want of more speedy elections of members to the House of Commons in the room of such who have died during the recess of Parliament. Now, that was the first time that Parliament delegated to a Speaker the right to issue a warrant for the issue of a writ. That was subsequently amended in 1784, and the law of 1784 is practically the law to this day with some slight changes. By that amendment the Speaker was authorized to issue his warrant in the events mentioned in the Acts, provided,—and that proviso, I think, emphasizes the importance that Parliament attaches to controlling its own affairs—that if under the procedure a warrant could not issue before the meeting of the House, then the Speaker had no authority to issue his warrant. I may explain that Mr. Speaker, by reminding the House that before the warrant issued the Speaker had to place a notice in the Official "Gazette" stating that he had been informed of the death of a member, or the elevation of a member to the Peerage, and what is meant is, that if the time for that publication had not elapsed, the Speaker was not authorized to issue his warrant. Now, Sir, some time ago this House delegated to the Speaker the same power that is to be found in England without the limitation which probably is not necessary here, and it also went further for some reason that I am not able to understand, and it authorized the Speaker in case of a vacancy occurring during the sitting of the House to issue his warrant without the authority or command of the House. I propose, Sir, to deprive you of that power. When the House is sitting, the House itself is the proper body to take care of its own privileges, and it is only when the House is not sitting, I think, the Speaker as the mouthpiece of the House ought to have the authority to issue a warrant. Then, Sir, I propose to leave with you the power to issue your warrant during the recess. Much abuse has grown out of what I think was not originally contemplated with reference to the issue of the writ. Your warrant, I believe, has always been issued promptly; but it lies in the office of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, sometimes for weeks, sometimes for months, and sometimes for nearly a year; and why? Because under the provisions of the Elections Act the Governor in Council is empowered to fix the day of nomination and to appoint the returning officer. Now, I think that was intended at the time to apply to the general elections, and to the fixing of one day for the holding of them. We also know that by reason, as it was thought, of the partisanship, displayed by the local officials, this House thought proper to vest in the Governor in Council the power to appoint the returning officer. I am not proposing to interfere with that power more than to provide that if the Governor in Council, within a certain number of days after your warrant has reached the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery—I have stated three days, but if that is not long enough or too long, the House can easily modify it—does not fix the time for holding the election, and name the returning officer, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery shall direct the writ to one of the sheriffs of the district, a part of which or the whole of which is in the electoral district; so that in the event of the Governor in Council not naming a day within the time specified, it will devolve upon the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to name a day and to direct the writ to the officer of the law who in England always acts as returning officer and who in Canada always acted as such until the question of local partisanship arose. Now, that this matter has a practical side appears very clearly from facts which we all know. I find that in 1888, Mr. Barron brought this question to the attention of the House, and gave a pretty full and complete statement of delays which had occurred in the issue of writs by reason of interference or the want of action on the part of the Government. Some of these instances it may be worth while to recall to the attention of the House. In Yarmouth, for instance, the judge certified the seat vacant on the 13th of August, 1887, but the writ did not issue until the 18th of November following. In Dorchester the return of the invalidity of the election was made in August, 1887, but the writ did not issue until the 21st of December following. Recently we have had other examples of a still more striking character. Sir John Macdonald died on the 6th of June, 1891, and for several days this House was draped in mourning out of respect for the leader whose death we all lamented; yet I remember perfectly well that at the end of that long session you, Sir, had to announce that you had never been officially informed of the death of Sir John Macdonald, and consequently had no authority to issue your warrant. You had no authority to place upon the journals of the House the fact that the leader of the House had died, although this Chamber had been at the time draped in mourning in honour of him, and although the body had lain in state in the Senate Chamber for several days; and it was not until the 19th of December, six months afterwards, that notification was given to you as Speaker, and you issued your warrant for a new election, and the election was held on the 11th of January, 1892. Then, the death of Mr. Hearn, the late member for Quebec West, was announced in this House on the 17th May, 1894, references being made to it by both the leader of the House and the leader of the Opposition; and on the 16th of July attention was drawn to the fact that no warrant had yet been issued for a new election. I remember that I was very much surprised at the time. I do not desire to reflect upon you, Mr. Speaker, but I remember you saying that although you had heard of his death, you had no official statement of it which could be recorded on the journals. The consequence was that no warrant issued till more than two months after his death, and the writ did not issue for nearly a year after, and the election was not held until April, 1895. These facts show the necessity of the House looking after its own proceedings. We all trusted to your doing it, instead of doing it ourselves, as we ought to have done. Now, this is not a party question. We are all equally interested in protecting the privileges and the dignity of this House; both sides ought to join in doing that. I do not wish to cast any blame upon the hon. gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches, because whatever party occupies that position, this power is likely to be used or abused for the promotion of party interests. What we are bound to do as representatives of the people is to see that this House takes care of its privileges, and my desire in introducing this measure is that we should have restored to us the power we have inadvertently lost. It appears to me clear that the Speaker should have authority to issue his warrant when the House is in session; but it appears to me equally clear that he should have authority to do so when the House is not in session, without being subject to control or interference from any outside authority, as he is practically now, by the power of the Governor in Council to fix the day of nomination and to appoint the returning officer.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SEIGNIORY OF SOREL TENANTS.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (for Mr. Bruneau) asked, What are the names of the tenants of lands belonging to the Dominion Government in the Seignior of Sorel?

Mr. DALY. The names are Léon Leduc, Marcel Proulx, Chevalier Labelle, Edward W. Kittson, E. A. D. Morgan, Alfred Knight, Hon. J. B. Guévremont, Narcisse Lavalée, Corporation of Sorel, François Labelle, Alex. Laforest, J. P. Senecal, Bernard Gravel, Robert Nelson, William Saxton and Pierre Cournoyer.

MR. F. SHIELDS—POSTMASTER OF MILTON, N.S.

Mr. FORBES asked, 1. Has Mr. Shields been removed, or has he resigned from the office of postmaster at Milton, Queen's County? 2. Has his successor been appointed? Who is he, and when does his appointment take effect? 3. Why has the issuing and paying of money orders at the post office in Milton, Queen's County, N.S., been stopped?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Shields has been removed from the postmastership of Milton, Queen's County. Mr. Ira Freeman has been appointed in his place. His appointment will take effect as soon as his bond is received. The issuing and paying of money orders at the post office in Milton, Queen's County, N.S., was stopped on account of irregularities on the part of the late postmaster.

PORT DE BERT, N.S., POSTMASTER.

Mr. FORBES asked, Whether the Government has received a petition for the appointment of a postmaster from the inhabitants of Port De Bert, Queen's County, and do the Government intend to make any appointment in reply to such petition?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. A petition has been received and the matter is now under inquiry.

TRANSATLANTIC MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (for Mr. Langelier) asked, Whether the Government have granted a contract for a more rapid transatlantic postal service; if so, to whom, and on what conditions was such contract awarded, and have the first steps been taken in execution of the contract, and what steps?

Mr. IVES. There has been no new contract or arrangement.

METAPEDIA AND CAPLAN MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. FAUVEL asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to grant a contract for carrying the mails from Metapedia to Caplan, in the county of Bonaventure, to the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway, now in active and constant operation since June, 1894.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The matter is still under the consideration of the Government.

CLARK AND PAISLEY—CUSTOMS OFFICIALS.

Mr. DENISON asked, 1. Whether Messrs. Clarke and Paisley are, or were employed in the Custom-house, Toronto? 2. If so, at what date did they enter the service? 3. What are their respective ages? 4. Have they passed the necessary examination as provided by the Civil Service Act?

Mr. WALLACE. There is a man named Joseph L. Clarke employed at the Custom-house, Toronto. No person by the name of Paisley is, or has been, employed at the Toronto Custom-house. Mr. Clark has been employed since the 27th November, 1893. He is forty-six years of age. He has passed the preliminary Civil Service examination.

MR. EDWARD GUILBAULT.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (for Mr. Bruneau) asked, Whether Mr. Edward Guilbault is employed by the Public Works Department? If so, what is his position? Where, and how long, has he been employed? What is his salary, and where is his office?

Mr. OUIMET. Mr. Edward Guilbault is employed by the Public Works Department in Montreal as clerk of works, and as such has charge of the different public buildings in that city, and the repairs and other works that require to be made to them. He was first appointed at $75 per month on the 1st of August, 1892, and since then his pay has been increased to $3 per day. His office is in the Montreal Post Office.

RED GRANITE.

Mr. GILLMOR asked, What proportion, if any, of the manufactured stone, valued at $32,578, stated in the Trade and Navigation Returns of 1893-94 to have been imported from Great Britain, consisted of red granite monuments or red granite in any form?

Mr. WALLACE. Collectors are not required to return to the department, statements of the distinctive classes of manufactured stone recorded under that heading in the classification of imports. The department has no record of red granite monuments or red granite in any form as distinguished from granite or freestone, dressed, or manufactures of stone, N.E.S., and cannot supply this information.

GRANITE AND FREESTONE.

Mr. GILLMOR asked, What proportion, if any, of the 391 tons of "granite and freestone, dressed, and all other building stone except marble," stated in the Trade and Navigation Returns of 1893-94 to have been imported from Great Britain, consisted of red granite from Scotland?

Mr. WALLACE. Collectors are not required to return to the department, statements of the distinctive classes of manufactured stone recorded under that heading in the classification of imports. The department has no record of the importation of granite and freestone, dressed, and all other building stone except marble, imported from Scotland. All imports of this nature are included under the general heading of imports from Great Britain.

JAMES ANDERSON.

Mr. SUTHERLAND asked, (a) Whether one James Anderson, of Sutton, is in the service of the Government? (b) If so, what are his duties? (c) How long has he been in such service? (d) How much has he been paid for such service? (e) What is the rate of his remuneration?

Mr. DALY. One James Anderson, of Sutton, is not in the service of the Government.

CANAL IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (for Sir Richard Cartwright) asked, 1. What amount will be required to complete the improvements now in course of being made on the several canals of the Dominion? 2. Do the Government intend to deepen the canals and channel of the St. Lawrence to any greater extent than is requisite to complete improvements now in progress?

Mr. HAGGART. In order to complete the St. Lawrence system of navigation, it will require as nearly as possible, $6,000,000. It is not the intention of the Government to deepen the canal to any greater extent than what is requisite to complete the present improvement.

RAW SUGAR IMPORTS.

Mr. FRASER asked, 1. What was the total quantity of raw sugar imported into Canada during the year 1894 under 14 standard? 2. What was the total quantity in 1895, to date, under 16 standard? 3. Was all the raw sugar imported in these years refined in Canada?

Mr. WALLACE. The total quantity of raw sugar imported into Canada, duty free, under fourteen Dutch standard, for the nine months ending 28th March, 1894, was 221,218,780 lbs.; from that time until June 30th, 1894, under number sixteen Dutch standard, 82,751,029 lbs. Total, including both grades, 303,789,809 lbs. The total quantity of sugar under sixteen Dutch standard imported during the nine months of 1894-95 is 220,712,442 lbs. I cannot say whether this raw sugar was refined in Canada. As the tariff admits such sugar free without any proviso as to how it shall subsequently be dealt with, the customs has no further supervision over it.

ST. PETER'S CANAL.

Mr. FRASER asked, When will the St. Peter's Canal be open for navigation?

Mr. HAGGART. The wooden floor and lock gates of St. Peter's Canal are eaten away by the sea worms to such an extent that it became imperative to renew them. To accomplish this work it is necessary to unwater the canal, to do which, dams had to be built at each end of the lock to keep out the water of the Atlantic and Bras d'Or lakes. Tenders were invited for the work, and the contract was awarded to Mr. Sylvester O'Donoghue, whose tender was the lowest. He went to work framing the lock gates, built the dams, and provided pumps with which to unwater the locks, but after several attempts to pump it out, he gave notice that he could not succeed and abandoned it. The necessary steps under the contract were taken to carry the work to completion by day's labour, at the contractor's expense. A re-letting would have caused a great loss of time, and, consequent longer obstruction to navigation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND.

Mr. Thomas Monro, one of the department's ablest hydraulic engineers, has gone down to St. Peter's to advise with Mr. McCarthy, the engineer in charge of the work, as to the best method of overcoming the leaks which have given the contractor so much trouble, and it is expected that the works will be carried out without delay, but, at the present state of the work, it is not possible to give a date on which the canal will be opened for traffic, but the hon. gentleman may be assured that there will be no unnecessary delay.

ARTHUR H. McBRIDE.

Mr. MARA (for Mr. Corbould) asked, Was Arthur H. McBride, late warden of the British Columbia penitentiary, retired from office without prejudice to consideration for re-employment in the penitentiary service? If so retired, is it the intention of the Government to reinstate him?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. McBride was retired from the office of warden, but not without prejudice to consideration for re-employment in the penitentiary's service. It is not the intention to reinstate him.

WILLIAM A. CAREY.

Mr. MARA (for Mr. Corbould) asked, Was Wm. A. Carey, late accountant of the British Columbia penitentiary, retired from office without prejudice to consideration for re-employment in the penitentiary service? If so retired, is it the intention of the Government to reinstate him?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Carey was retired from the office of accountant, but not without prejudice to consideration for re-employment in the penitentiary service. It is not the intention to reinstate him.

VOTERS' LISTS—OUTSIDE PRINTING.

Mr. CASEY asked, What amount was paid for the printing of each voters' list, and part of list, printed outside of the Printing Bureau?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The following is the list asked for by the hon. gentleman:—Toronto Centre, $333.60; Toronto West, $886.71; Toronto East, $616.29; York West, $801.25; York East, $497.58; York North, $282.55; St. Antoine, $366.63; St. Anne's, $346.20; St. Mary's, $233.43—that being the cost of printing part of the list, the rest being printed in the Bureau; St. James', $323.28; Hochelaga, $264.62—the same remark applies to this as to St. Mary's; Maisonneuve, $420.57; St. Lawrence, $194—the same remark applies to this as to St. Mary's. This printing is done at the usual rate of 3 cents per name and 50 cents per heading.

Mr. CASEY. Per heading means?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Heading for each polling subdivision.

Mr. LAURIER. Is that all the printing of voters' lists done outside ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

AGRICULTURE—INSPECTING PHYSICIAN.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, What is the name of the inspecting physician, Agriculture Department, recently appointed in place of W. S. Harding, recently superannuated ? What was his former residence ? Where does he now reside, and why has the salary been raised from $1,200 to $1,400 ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Dr. J. E. March was appointed in the place of Dr. W. S. Harding, superannuated. His former residence was St. John, N.B. His present residence is the same. The salary has not been raised. Dr. Harding received $1,200 a year, with an allowance of $600 a year for boat service, in all, $1,800. Dr. March is paid $1,400 a year including boat service.

REPORT.

Auditor General for the year ending 30th June, 1894.—(Mr. Foster).

PRINTING BUREAU—REPORTS, BILLS, ETC.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Can the hon. leader of the House inform us when the other reports will be brought down—for instance, the report of the Department of Railways ? I do not wish to intrude upon the attention of the House, but I may point out, with regard to the Marine and Fisheries report that it is generally brought down at a time so late in the session that it is practically useless to those members who wish to devote attention to it to gain information for the criticism of the estimates. And surely the Railways report ought to be down by this time ; I cannot understand what is keeping it back. Here we are practically at the beginning of May, and the reports which it is absolutely necessary for members to study before they can criticize the estimates, and which ought to have been in our hands before, are not yet before us. This is the beginning of the third week of the session. Ordinarily Parliament should have met in February, and the reports should have been ready then.

Mr. HAGGART. The Railways report will be down to-morrow or next day.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought I had a statement with regard to all these reports, but I do not seem to have the paper by me. With reference to the Marine and Fisheries report, my hon. friend knows that the statistics are brought down to the 31st of December instead of to the 30th of June, as in the case of most of the departments.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That excuse is brought forward every year.

Mr. FOSTER. But it is a fact. My hon. friend knows that. The same is true of the Post Office report. I have a report from the Queen's Printer that, on the whole, the printing is further ahead this year than it was last year at this time. I think I can promise that all reports will be in the hands of members in a very short time.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. member will see that the explanation, while it might have been a good one in the month of February or March, is by no means a good one now.

Mr. FOSTER. It takes a good deal of time to tabulate these figures. The hon. gentleman knows that they do not all come in on the 31st December.

Mr. MULOCK. Speaking of the matter of printing, it seems to me that there is unnecessary delay in the printing the proceedings of this House. Take, for instance, the Public Bills and Orders. A large number of Bills have been introduced, and though a week has elapsed in some cases, there is scarcely any of the printing done, so far as the Order paper shows. The first Bill on the paper is not printed. The second, I think, is printed in English.

Some hon. MEMBERS. English and French.

Mr. MULOCK. I see ; that is printed in English and French. None of the other Bills are printed until we come to item No. 7, which is marked as printed in French. Now, I am aware that item No. 4 on the paper represents a Bill of only a page or so in length. If the Queen's Printer is to regulate the proceedings of the House by the order in which the Bills are printed, I think it is time we should know it. The Government had better see that these Bills are brought down printed in the proper order. How is it that one Bill is printed and another not printed ?

Mr. FOSTER. The Government have nothing to do with that.

Mr. MULOCK. Who has to do with it ?

Mr. FOSTER. The Clerk of the House.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not admit the right of the Queen's Printer to order the proceedings of the House—

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think that is a fair thing to say of the Queen's Printer.

Mr. MULOCK. That is going to be the result of this way of doing things.

Mr. FOSTER. The Queen's Printer is an honourable man, and I am sure he would not do such a thing as that suggested by the hon. gentleman. The Clerk of the House has this matter in charge, and no doubt he is carrying on the work as rapidly as possible. I would not make any imputations against the Queen's Printer.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think it is quite unfair to charge the Queen's Printer, who is not here to answer, with delaying the work in his charge. I spoke to him with regard to the printing for the session, and he tells me that the work is done immediately he gets the Bills from the House; and I have no doubt that he represents the case as it is. He assured me that not a moment's delay would be allowed.

Mr. LAURIER. There is no imputation against the Queen's Printer.

Mr. FOSTER. It was stated across the floor of the House that the Queen's Printer had no right to print one Bill and delay another.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER. That is not an imputation against the Queen's Printer. It may be the result of the system. Is there a system followed by the Queen's Printer? Is there a system by which the work is brought out regularly? This is a question in which the House is interested, and we ought to be informed. My impression is that no system is followed.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If I may be allowed, Mr. Speaker, what I resented on behalf of the Queen's Printer was what the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) perhaps did not intend to say, namely, that the Queen's Printer was arrogating to himself the right to say in what order the proceedings of Parliament should be printed. The Queen's Printer does not arrogate to himself any such right or privilege, but prints the proceedings in the order in which they are received from the Clerk.

Mr. MULOCK. What I intended to say was this: the Bills are not reported in the Order paper as being printed in the order in which they stand on the paper. I am not blaming or criticizing any officer. The practical result of this is going to be that the right of members will be interfered with by the irregularity or lack of system on the part of some official outside the House. That I object to.

Mr. McCARTHY. It may be that the Law Clerk is not able to get the Bills out in order. All Bills have to go through the hands of that officer, and there may be some delay occasioned in that way. I know that such is the case with a Bill introduced in my behalf. The Law Clerk has written to me calling my attention to an omission in the Bill. It is, of course, important that Bills should be printed as introduced, and there should be no favouritism shown in priority of printing.

Mr. FOSTER.

DEPARTMENTAL REPORTS—DISTRIBUTION.

Mr. CHARLTON moved for:

Statement showing the several dates in the years 1888, 1889, 1890, 1891, 1892, 1893, 1894 and 1895, when the Public Accounts, the Trade and Navigation Returns, and the Report of the Auditor General, were ready for distribution to members of the Senate and the House of Commons.

He said: I desire to say, in connection with this motion, that there is an order of the House relating to the issuing of these departmental reports, which seems to have been, to a considerable extent, disregarded by the Government, especially in the present year. That order was issued in the year 1887, and is to be found in the first volume of the "Hansard" of that year, page 295. It was issued on the 5th day of May, and the order with regard to the preparation of blue-books and departmental reports, is as follows:

That the rule now in force requiring the withholding of blue-books and departmental reports till the assembling of Parliament results in the suppression, often for periods of many months, of information relating to public affairs which the public interests require should be promptly made public.

That the blue-books and departmental reports for each fiscal or calendar year should in future be made public as soon as practicable after the same are prepared, and that no unnecessary delay should be permitted to interfere with the issuing of the same.

That the Finance Department cause to be inserted in the "Canada Gazette" at the close of each month a statement of the revenue and expenditure for the month, and also for the unexpired portion of the fiscal year, distinguishing between expenditure upon capital account and expenditure on account of consolidated fund, and giving statement of gross debt and net debt.

That the Customs Department cause to be inserted in the "Canada Gazette" at the close of each month a statement of exports, of imports, of immigration and of navigation for the month, and also for the unexpired portion of the fiscal year.

That the Department of Railways cause to be inserted in the "Canada Gazette" each week a statement showing the gross and net earnings of each of the Government railways for the preceding week, and also for the unexpired portion of the fiscal year.

Now, after the passage of this resolution in 1887, the departmental reports were issued with a tolerable degree of promptitude and in tolerably good season for several years; and the requirements of the House with regard to the monthly statements in the "Canada Gazette," I believe, have been pretty fairly met since the time this resolution was adopted. We have had monthly statements of the expenditure, monthly statements of the receipts, monthly statements of the condition of the debt, &c. But the spirit of this resolution with regard to departmental reports has not been observed, and notably in respect to issuing these reports of the last fiscal year. We received the Public Accounts at least seven months after the close of the fiscal year; we received the Trade and Navigation Returns nine months and a half after the close of the fiscal year, and they were not issued and placed in the hands of members of this House until the assembling of Parliament this session. The Auditor General's Report, which is one of the most important of all the reports, has just been laid upon the Table to-day, in the third week of the session, and after ten months have elapsed since the close of the fiscal year. Now, this is an entire disregard on the part of the Government of the order of the House with relation to the issuing of these reports. It is unnecessary for the Government to set up the defence that this report could not have been issued sooner. They have had work performed in the Printing Bureau in the preparation of the voters' lists, which are now ready, and may not be required for months to come; the whole force of the department have been placed upon these lists, and scores of men have been brought in from outside to hasten their preparation, and the publication of the departmental reports has been allowed to stand aside during this time. Now, it is fair to presume that the intention of the Government when they entered upon the hastening of the publication of these lists, was to have an election; but if that were their intention, why should they withhold from the people the very information which was necessary for them to possess in order to be able to pass upon the conduct of the Government? Why should we not have had the Trade and Navigation Returns, a most essential report? Why should we not have had the information contained in the Auditor General's Report? Suppose we had gone to the country, and neither of these reports were issued, what sources of information would the public have had? What sources of information had the voters in this country to enable them to decide whether the Government were worthy of the confidence of the people or not? I hold that the Government in this respect has been remiss in its duty to the people, that we should have had these reports, that the fact that they are not issued till within almost two months of the commencement of another fiscal year, is a reflection upon the promptitude, upon the capacity of the Government, because it is a proof that they have failed to carry out the instructions of this House and the requirements of the law. I ask for these returns for the purpose of learning to what extent the Government have fallen short in their duty in this matter, in the issuing of three of the most important reports, the Public Accounts, the Trade and Navigation Returns, and the Auditor General's Report; I wish to know the date of the issuing of these various reports in each of the years since that order was passed in 1887. We may then be able to make a comparison between one year and another, and learn from this comparison to what extent the Government have fallen short of the discharge of their duty in this present year.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Before the motion is passed, I would like to say a word in reference, not only to the returns indicated in the motion before the House, but to returns that have been ordered by the House. Now, last session there was a return ordered by the House, on the 10th April, to the following effect:—

A return showing the nature and number of the returns ordered by this House during the past three sessions and not yet brought down, together with the reason why they have not yet been brought down.

That return was passed on the 10th April last by this House, and up to present time it has not been brought down. On the 28th May, another return was ordered by this House, with all the form and all the dignity that the House could give in passing it, and yet the Government have not yet brought it down. You would not imagine, Mr. Speaker, that it was a long return, you would not imagine that it would entail very much hardship upon the department. It is as follows:—

A return giving a list of all the articles, with the value of each, and the total value of all, imported from the United States during the last fiscal year, for the use of the Government in the public service.

You would not imagine that the Government here would import so many things and such a variety of articles from the United States that it would be impossible to make a return of the amount of such goods imported, within a year afterwards. Now, I think this is trifling with the House, it is trifling with the dignity of the House. This is not the position a Government should occupy in their relation to the House. They have had time, ample time. Those motions did not entail a great amount of labour; if they did, there must have been a great amount of importations from the United States, and according to the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, that would be a terrible offence to Canada. We would like to know exactly how much they have imported. When this House orders returns we would like to have them brought down, and I do not think the Government are treating, either their own supporters or the members on this side of the House, with courtesy, in withholding these returns. Constitutionally, I think you will agree with me that it is their duty, when a solemn order is made by the House, to obey that order. If they are not qualified to do it, or if they think it is good tactics for them to disobey the order of the House, I think the House should take notice of it, not only members on this side but members on the other side, because the dignity of the House has been infringed upon.

Mr. McMULLEN. I waited for a few moments, entertaining the hope that the Minister of Finance would offer some explanation in reply to the statement made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). However, the hon. gentleman does not appear disposed to make any response. With respect to the Auditor General's Report, which has been laid on the Table, I think the Government is clearly responsible for having delayed its presentation and thereby delayed business that properly comes before the Public Accounts Committee. The hon. Minister is quite aware that the duties of that committee are largely based upon the Auditor General's Report for the past year. The committee has not yet been called together, although we are in the third week of the session, and that most important committee, one of the most important as regards the public interest, has not been called upon to meet by the Minister of Finance. I think the reason is to be found in the fact that the Auditor General's Report forms the basis of the investigations held, and therefore it has not been laid on the Table. It is clear to my mind, notwithstanding statements made to the contrary, that during the early part of the year the Government were preparing for an election and not for a parliamentary session. This is clear from the fact that the blue-books and other returns are not yet ready for presentation to the House. No doubt the hon. gentleman had to visit Queen's in order to obtain an exchange of constituencies.

Mr. FOSTER. Your knowledge is imperfect.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman went to Queen's. Finding the condition of things were not very safe in King's, he had to be personally present to see if some other arrangement could be made so that he could leave that constituency, that had politically cradled him, and find another constituency.

Mr. FOSTER. What has that to do with the Auditor General's Report?

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman's attention was drawn away from making preparations to meet Parliament. Indeed, the Government did not at that time think of holding another session. This is a matter of vital importance to the House. It is not fair or courteous to members that the Finance Minister should in this way trifle with the House as regards the presentation of the Auditor General's Report. The hon. gentleman made a little fun in presenting the report by drawing attention to the fact that it is a report regarding which I had made inquiries. I desire to remind him that there are many other hon. members who bestow considerable study upon that blue-book as well as myself, and we find the more we study it the greater need there exists for observing evidences therein contained of extravagance. Hon. gentlemen opposite would do well to study it; outside the Minister of Finance and a few members on the Treasury benches, I question whether its pages are very carefully looked over by hon. gentlemen opposite. It is trifling with the House, it is not treating the House with the courtesy and dignity which are its due, to call Parliament together, and when members come here to attend to their important duties to find important papers such as the Auditor General's Report are not ready to lay on the Table of the House. The truth is, the Government had an idea of an election, not a session of Parliament, and it is well known that there were two rival factions in the Cabinet, one fighting for an election and another for a dissolution, the former being led by the Minister of Finance. The hon. gentleman, in reply to the leader of the Opposition, who asked for explanations as to the personnel of the Cabinet, said the hon. gentleman was already full of information, obtained through the press. Hon. members are no doubt full of information, also obtained from the press, with respect to the struggle that went on in the Cabinet as to whether an election should be held or a session of Parliament. The faction that advocated a meeting of Parliament was victorious, and hon. members were commanded to attend here, and although this is the third week of our attendance, we have only to-day received the Auditor General's Report, which is one of the most important blue-books of the session. Hon. members would now like to know when the Minister of Finance is going to call together the Public Accounts Committee. Possibly he may take three weeks more before summoning the committee. Even after it has been called the Minister of Justice may adopt similar tactics to those pursued by him last year, when he raised all sorts of technical objections to the proceedings of the committee being conducted in such a manner as to reach the bottom of the inquiry being made, and time and again hon. members had to appeal to the House for further instructions in order to complete their investigations of public matters. If three weeks are allowed to elapse before the Public Accounts Committee is called together and the session is of an ordinary length, the work of the committee will not be more than half completed before the session will close. It is impossible that in order to frustrate the work of the committee, the presentation of the Auditor General's Report has been delayed three weeks. Is it because the Finance Minister wishes to prevent certain inquiries into expenditures during the past year that he has withheld this report, and now possibly may be tardy in calling together the Public Accounts Committee and allowing it to get to work? It looks very much as if it would prove to be the case. We contend that this course is not in accordance with the ordinary usage of Parliament, and that this report should not have been kept back and the business of the Public Accounts Committee delayed for lack of it.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. member who moved the order of the House for this information cited the Order of the House, I think, in 1887, in which certain information which up to that time had not been placed before the country in the interim, and so far as the reports of the department is concerned was not made public until they had first been presented to the House. Under this Order, the former were to be published monthly, and the latter given to the public immediately, without the formality of first laying them on the Table of the House. Now, with reference to these monthly statements. My hon. friend was good enough to say that the Order of the House in that respect had been fairly met. I ask my hon. friend whether or not that part of it has not been fully met? I think he must answer in the affirmative, that these monthly reports have been issued regularly and fully. The Order of the House has, therefore, been fully complied with, so far as that part is concerned.

Mr. CHARLTON. Not in all cases; there was a misleading statement one or two months ago regarding the surplus.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think so. I think the quarrel there seemed to be that the department gave more information, and not less, than it was called upon to give. My hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) says that there has been a total disregard of the Order of the House with regard to the printing and making up of the departmental reports. I think his language is altogether too strong in that respect, and I do not think he will prove his charge, when the returns for which he asks have been brought down. Of course, there are years in which a larger amount of printing is done at the bureau than is done in other years, and necessarily, some portion of the work must be delayed. This has been one of these busy years at the bureau, when it became necessary to have the voters' lists printed. My hon. friend says that he thinks the Government must have had an election in their eye, and that, hence, they hurried on the printing of the voters' lists.

Mr. CHARLTON. My hon. friend said it was necessary to have the voters' lists issued, but I ask him if it would not have been better to have the voters' lists a little later and the departmental reports more promptly?

Mr. FOSTER. Whether the statement of my hon. friend is true or not that the Government had an election in their eye, I am quite sure that the Opposition had an election in their eye, and, judging from the variety and scope of their movements, they seem to have had it in both eyes; they were full of it, in fact. In times when Parliament is approaching the legal limit of its term, the voters' lists should be ready for any emergency that may occur, and, in this regard, I have no hesitation in saying that the lists were of more importance than even some of the departmental reports, and, consequently, prominence and despatch were given to their printing. An election might take place. It is impossible to guard against an election always not taking place without the departmental reports being brought down. My hon. friend seemed to think that the rule should be that no election should be fought until the departmental reports are ready for the country. That could not be always the case, because it is impossible to get these reports out for several months after the term for which they give the information has expired. An election might be brought on in that interval, and the reports could not possibly be placed before the country. I think my hon. friend will find that the departments have been reasonably diligent in getting their reports before the Printer, and I am quite sure that the Printer has used his best efforts in the work of his department in having them published as soon as he possibly could. The Report of the Auditor General is a very large volume. The Auditor General is an officer of the House. The Auditor General has his staff, and he uses it to the best of his ability, and with the greatest despatch, and he prepares his report, and it is printed, as he gets it before the Queen's Printer. The report is before the House now, and it is here, before the House could possibly have called for its use in investigating the Public Accounts, or in discussing the Estimates. My hon. friend says that the Public Accounts Committee should have been called together earlier, but I think he will find that that committee has not usually been called together any earlier than it will be this session. It would have been called together even earlier this year if hon. gentlemen opposite had not delayed two or three days in discursive and varied remarks on the debate in answer to the Address. So far as that committee is concerned, it has not been, and will not be, unduly delayed.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You did not refer to the Orders of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend refers to Orders of the House which have been made, and to which the returns have not been brought down. I quite agree that returns ordered by the House should be brought down, and I will look into the complaint. One of the principal Orders was that which called for a list of articles imported from the United States for the use of the Government. If any have been imported, they were imported by each of the departments, and the officers of the different departments would have to prepare the return, but I presume that what has really delayed that return was the search for articles imported from the United States for the use of the Government. They are, I imagine, so few, that it has taken a long time to hunt them up. So far as the Government is concerned, they have no desire to delay any of the Orders of the House, and I have given instructions to my department to prepare them with all possible diligence.

Mr. LANDERKIN. When will the Major General's Report be brought down, and where is the Major General now?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know when his report will be brought down, and I must confess to a total ignorance of the present whereabouts of the Major General.

Mr. CHARLTON. The Minister of Finance has made a very ingenious presentation of the case from his own side, and he makes use of the fact that I admitted that the monthly reports have been fairly made, and condemns me for not having given to the Government unqualified praise for having done the duty laid upon them in that respect. I qualified my remarks because on one or two occasions the information given in these monthly reports has been misleading, as was shown during the debate upon the Address. The hon. gentleman tells us, also, that the preparation of the voters' lists was a matter of more importance than the issuing of departmental reports. Solomon says, that for every purpose there is time and a season, and the issuing of the voters' lists is highly important under certain circumstances; highly important at the proper season, and highly important when elections are about to be held; but it is not of sufficient importance to cause the setting aside of the publication of the departmental reports under present circumstances. These reports to which I have referred should have been issued by the first day of January. There was no probability, there was no possibility, that an election would be brought on before that date, and if the Government had properly attended to its duties under the direction given by the Order of the House in 1887, the information contained in the three reports to which my resolution refers would have been in the hands of the members of this House, and in the possession of the country, by the time six months had expired from the close of the financial year, that is to say, by the 1st of January this year. The fact that the Government, in place of discharging its duty in this regard, was preparing the voters' lists, and was apparently about to ask the country to bestow that confidence in it which it refused to give to the country, in making known what its policy and what its conduct had been, was something that should hardly meet with the approval of this House. I deny the assertion made by the Minister of Finance that the issuing of the voters' lists at the time they were being prepared was of more consequence than the preparation of the departmental reports. If this House was to meet on the 18th day of April, it made no difference whether the voters' lists were ready then or at the end of the financial year on the 30th of June, but it did make a material difference to the country and to this House whether or not the departmental reports to which I refer were ready when the House met. This is special pleading on the part of the Minister of Finance. It was a matter of more importance under the circumstances to perform the regular duties of the Government and to let stand aside something that was not pressing, than to do that which was not of pressing importance and to leave that done which was essential to be placed before the public men of this country because it is information as to the condition of public affairs and as to the manner in which the Government managed its duties, which can be obtained only from those reports. I contend, Sir, that the Government are worthy of the condemnation of this House because they have failed in their duty in this respect, and have made use of powers in a way not consonant with the public interest. We have had the Government printing office worked to its fullest capacity to print these lists, and some of them have been printed at outside printing offices. The work has been rushed through with such headlong haste that I believe the lists will be found to contain many errors; and this necessary departmental work has had to wait until the Government decided not to hold an election, and realized that the work of preparing the voters' lists was useless, or could have been postponed. When this return is brought down, I think we shall find that these reports have in previous years been issued earlier on the average than they have been this year; and the inference we are justified in drawing from that is that the Government have not exercised this year the same diligence as in previous years.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Last session I obtained Orders of the House for three or four returns, but as yet not a single one of them has been brought down. If the Government do not intend to give us the information we are entitled to, I think they had better refuse to grant the Orders and then we shall know just what to do. Several times I went to the committee room through which the returns were to come, and I was told repeatedly that they were not there. It would be better for the Government to refuse to grant the orders than to grant them first, and then throw impediments in the way of our getting the information.

Mr. MULLOCK. It seems rather singular that the House should be called together for the despatch of business when the Government are not prepared to make the proper returns and render an account of their stewardship, as they are bound to do. They appear not to have known their own minds. They have done those things which they ought not to have done, and they appear to have left undone those things which they ought to have done.

Mr. EDGAR. There is no health in them.

Mr. MULLOCK. And there is no health in them—I accept the amendment. They have prepared voters' lists which were not wanted, and left unprepared the public returns which were wanted. Now, we want to know what is the matter with the Government.

Mr. BENNETT. They are all right.

Mr. MULLOCK. They think they are, when they assemble Parliament and bring us to sit here day after day with no business to discharge. What an exhibition before the country! A Government prepares for an election when it is not ready, and calls Parliament together when it is not ready. We may well ask, have we got a Government at all?

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS RETURNS—WEST KOOTENAY.

Mr. MARA moved for:

Return showing the amounts paid in Customs duties at Waneta, Nelson, Kaslo and the Boundary, Kootenay River, from 1890 to 1894 inclusive, giving the amount paid yearly at each outport.

He said: My object in moving for this return is to call the attention of the Government to the claims of that portion of the Kootenay district known as West Kootenay to be made a port of entry, instead of being tacked on, as it is at present, to New Westminster. In looking over the Trade and Navigation Returns for last year, I find that $168,150 is credited to New Westminster. Of this I am satisfied that over one-half, probably three-fifths, has been paid by West Kootenay; but not only does that district not receive credit for this large sum which it contributes annually to the revenue, but the merchants and customs officials there are subject to the annoyance and inconvenience of having their Collector of Customs living in a town five hundred miles distant. For several years past I have urged the Government to make Nelson a port of entry, and the reasons which I advanced in 1890 and 1891 hold good today. The town is situated at the foot of Kootenay Lake, it is the terminus of a railway which connects with several trans-continental lines. It has two banks, and the Provincial Government have offices there; it is, in fact, what would be called in Ontario a county town. In view of its many claims, I hope the Government will lose no time in making Nelson a port of entry for the West Kootenay district. Whatever reasons the Government may have had in the past for not doing so no longer exist.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would suggest that the hon. gentleman add to his motion the names of the Customs-house officers and the salary paid to each. That will save giving notice for another resolution.

Mr. MARA. I have no objection to the amendment, although I cannot see what bearing it has on the motion I have made. I simply wish to show the Government and the House the large amount of customs duties collected at these outports. The amount, I am satisfied, is large in proportion to the salaries, and my hon. friend from Wellington cannot make a point on that. However, if he wishes the amendment, I have no objection.

Mr. WALLACE. The Government have no objection to bring down the returns asked for at once. The attention of the Government has been called by the hon. gentleman to the importance of that district, and we have also had the importance of it brought to our attention from other sources, so that I found it necessary, during the early part of the year, to send a special officer out there, not only to regulate the various ports of entry for the collection of revenue, but also to prevent smuggling, which, I was informed, was carried on in that portion of British Columbia. The revenue received during the last year has been exceedingly large, showing the importance of that mining district, and I have received reports during the past two or three days showing a very large increase in business there, and showing that mining prospects there are developing to a greater extent than ever before. It is contemplated by the Government to make Nelson a port of entry instead of continuing it as an outport of New Westminster, and those other places will be outports of Port Nelson.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

ANTICOSTI ISLAND.

Mr. FORBES moved for:

Return giving the names of the owners of Anticosti Island, and showing what coasting, fishing and other privileges appertaining to said island belong exclusively to the owners thereof.

He said: I ask for this return because it is reported by cable from London that a French syndicate is trying to purchase the island. This island is situated in the midst of the Gulf fisheries, and is of great importance to the bank fisheries both as a baiting station and as having excellent fishing grounds within its limits. If it passes out of the control of Canada to a French syndicate, who, I am told, are acting directly on behalf of the French Government, that may be of serious consequence and fraught with danger to our provincial fishermen. Within the limits of the island there are splendid shoals, on which cod and other deep sea fish gather for feeding purposes. I would ask the Government to bear in mind that it is claimed that certain coasting, fishing and other privileges belong especially to the owners of this island. It would be well, before any further steps are taken in the negotiations going on, for the Government to inquire into the matter, and ascertain the value of the island and desirability of its being retained by Canada for the benefit of our fishermen. I trust that when the papers are brought down, we will be able to prove that the island is of such importance, especially to those engaged in the fisheries, that our Government ought to retain control of it, as if it passes to the control of a foreign nation the bounty system to all fish exported therefrom and now in force in St. Pierre may be brought into practice to the injury of our fishermen. It may be made a French colony practically and French fishing vessels may make it their headquarters under the Canadian flag drawing a French bounty and thus have an undue advantage over other Canadian fishermen.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection to the motion, but I cannot promise my hon. friend all the information he asks for. I do not know that I can promise any of it. I do not know that we have any means of finding out or knowing who the owners of the island of Anticosti are. I do not think there are any coasting, fishing, or other privileges appertaining to the said island that belong exclusively to any one there more than they would on the mainland. Altogether we have very little information with regard to this island. Commander Wakeham is here, who knows the history of the island well, and what information we can get will be brought down.

Mr. FORBES. It is generally conceded that the fishing and coasting privileges appertaining to the island are the same as these appertaining to the mainland, but I am informed by the agents of the liquidators in London who are managing the island, that they have special privileges which were granted by treaty or other concession when the grant was made. I do not think they use them to the injury of the fishermen, but it would be well not to let these privileges fall into the hands of a foreign power.

Mr. FORBES.

Mr. LAURIER. I believe there is something in what my hon. friend has said. The present owners of this island claim that they are vested with all the powers originally vested in the owners by the French Government. If I am correctly informed, this island was ceded by the French Government, and the owners claim not only rights which exist at present, but the feudal rights which existed at the time the cession was made. Under the feudal law in Lower Canada, in former years, the seignior claimed valuable concessions as to fishing, etc., but my impression is that those rights were extinguished by the settlement of the seigniorial tenure. Whether that be the case or not, I have reason to believe that the present owners claim they are entitled to the same privileges as were granted to the first owners.

Mr. FRASER. I trust the Government will lose no delay. I understood that the island was owned by some English capitalists in London. I met a gentleman who was engaged there for a part of the year in canning, and he informed me that it was owned in London, but there should be no doubt about the rights of that island, so far as the fishing interests of the Lower Provinces are concerned. I trust the Government will not lose any time in getting all information possible.

Motion agreed to.

MILTON, N.S., POSTMASTER.

Mr. FORBES moved for :

Copies of all correspondence relating to the resignation or removal of the postmaster at Milton, Queen's County, and of the appointment of a successor in the office to Mr. Francis Shields, the present acting postmaster.

He said : I had intended, in moving this resolution, to make some remarks with regard to the removal of this officer and to ask why it was that the delay has occurred in appointing a man to manage the money order department in the town of Milton ; but the hon. Minister, in his answer to the question I asked has given the reason for that delay. The hon. gentleman stated that the delay was due to the fact that the appointee to the office had not yet filed bonds satisfactory to the department. I am surprised to hear that, inasmuch as the new appointee is a man of good character and standing in the community and, I trust, will make a most worthy officer. It is a pity that the citizens of the town are deprived of the privilege of getting their money orders cashed or of getting money orders for transmission elsewhere. I do not want to call in question the motives of the Government, but it is alleged in the locality that there are other reasons for the delay than that stated, reasons which are beneficial to the party of the Government only, and relating to the late holder of the office. The motion may be dropped if it is desired.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I have no objection to bringing down all the papers which are not of a confidential nature relating to the matter referred to. As for the information which the hon. gentleman hinted he had received, I must tell him that it is altogether different from that which I gain from the reports of the department. In my reply to the question of the hon. gentleman, I have already given the reasons why the postmaster at Milton was dismissed.

Motion agreed to.

LIVERPOOL, N.S. HARBOUR.

Mr. FORBES moved for :

Copies of the engineer's surveys and reports made during the last three years on the harbour and river at Liverpool, Nova Scotia, and of the best means of improving the same and of deepening the channel or entrance to said river, together with any plans and estimates prepared in reference thereto, and of all correspondence to any or from any member of the Government referring to said harbour or river and survey.

He said : I move for this return for the reason that I believe that within the last twelve or fifteen months a special engineer was sent to examine the harbour of Liverpool and report on the best means of overcoming the obstruction to the entrance of the river, called the bar. The report was very carefully made by the engineer, I understand—I have not seen it, but I am so informed by the officers of the department. I think this would be a necessary document for the House to have in its possession and it would be advantageous for the people of the county of Queen's to be made acquainted with its contents. I would like to know if the Government intend to act upon the report of the engineer, but I shall have the privilege of asking with regard to that on a future occasion. It is known to the Minister of Public Works that for some years past there has been great need of dredges on the south shore of Nova Scotia. Some years ago the dredge under the control of the Public Works Department was lost, wrecked in some way, I believe. The department proceeded to get another. I believe they bought a hull, but that also was lost. Since then tenders have been called for a new dredge, which has been under construction for some years ; but we cannot expect it to be finished until after the general elections, although I am glad to know that my repeated efforts in that behalf that this dredge should be provided as promptly as possible are heeded by the Government. It is most necessary that the careful attention of the Government should be given to the harbour of Liverpool. I hope that the report, when it is brought down, will show that this work can be done efficiently and cheaply, and that the Government will carry out what the engineer proposes. I do not think that the Minister will object to lay before the House, and thus before the public generally, what plans are proposed with regard to this harbour. There may be points upon which the citizens of the place can assist the Government by suggestions based upon their local knowledge.

Mr. OUIMET. In answer to the hon. gentleman, I may say that the survey of the harbour of Liverpool has been made, and an inquiry made as to the best means of improving the facilities of entering the port. The engineer has made his report, which is now before the department, and which will be produced at an early day for the information of the hon. gentleman. I may tell the hon. gentleman that, as a result of that inquiry, the chief engineer of the department made a report on the 17th January, 1894, stating that a deep water wharf at Liverpool would cost $50,000, and the re-opening of the channel by dredging about $8,000. I am glad to be able to inform the hon. gentleman that the new dredge for the Maritime Provinces will be ready in the course of the summer.

Motion agreed to.

INDUSTRIAL ESTABLISHMENTS, N.S.

Mr. FORBES moved for :

Return giving the names of the various manufacturing or industrial establishments in the counties of Queen's and Shelburne, Nova Scotia, as mentioned in the last census returns, together with the names of the owners thereof and employers therein.

He said : A motion for an order similar to this was passed by this House as far back as the 25th of April last. On the 29th May, as I got no satisfaction, and no return was brought down, I had the honour of writing to the chief statistician, who, in a letter of May 30th, acknowledged the reception of my letter, saying he had transmitted it to the Deputy Minister of the department, as an official answer was required thereto, the letter being of an official character. I got a most official letter, dated June 1st, 1894, from the secretary of the Department of Agriculture, in which :

He begged to inform me that my letter was submitted to the Minister of Agriculture, and Mr. Johnson's report in connection with the same; and that he is desirous of informing me that the Minister of Agriculture refers me to the Minister of Finance, and that he will personally see me respecting the same.

Well, I had the honour of calling upon the Minister of Finance, and having an interview with him, on the 1st June, and he stated to me that he was mistaken in informing me that this return was ready, that he had understood from Mr. Johnson, the chief statistician, that it was ready; but he found now that Mr. Johnson referred to some other return, and that as the finances of the Government for this purpose were exhausted, he would be unable to prepare it for me. That was nearly a year ago, and since that time the Government have been sitting at the receipt of custom, and have received a considerable amount of money, have received a sufficient sum to farm out lists of voters to be printed in other offices than that of the Government, and I do not understand why the return cannot be brought down. I do not know whether the Government are making any excuse in reference to the Order which I am asking for to-day: but I trust that in future the Government will see its way clear to finance enough money to bring down this return. We want to know where these manufactures are, we want to know who these bloated manufacturers might be that live in our country. We have searched for them in various ways and tried to get information, but we have found it impossible even to discover the factories themselves, nor can we get the slightest information from the statistician of the department, or the Ministers of the Crown in the House. I do not hesitate to say that we shall be able, if we get these returns, to find these factories in some shape or condition, in some place or other, within the limits of the country, if they have not emigrated. It is in order that people may know where these institutions are, and who are employed in them, and the amount of capital invested in them, that I beg to make this inquiry. It is nearly a year since the Government have had the Order of the House, and the only excuse I have heard them make is the want of finances.

Mr. MONTAGUE. In answer to the hon. gentleman I may say that the Government desire to furnish every information that is of a proper nature, that is asked for. I have no doubt that the information which was asked for by the hon. gentleman last year would have been brought down had it not been for the circumstance which he himself has mentioned, namely, that the vote out of which the cost of preparing these returns is taken, became exhausted. As the hon. gentleman knows, it is considerable work to collect these statistics, as they are given in the census, and, consequently, it costs quite a large sum of money to do so. As to the manufacturing industries to which he has referred, and their nature, it is a subject which has been frequently discussed in the House, and made a great deal of in the country; but, after all, while not desiring to open up a wide discussion of the question, I have only to say to the hon. gentleman, and to others who have also discussed the same subject, that it is a technical attack upon the census, and is not one in which there is half as much, or a tenth as much as the hon. gentleman would make out. There must be some classification of individuals and of industries which exist in the country, and I have to say to the hon. gentleman that, although the Canadian census classified those callings as industries the classification is not nearly as wide and not nearly as inclusive as is the classification in the English census, or in the American census. It is true that many of these industries included in the census are not industries requiring the employment of a large number of people, but, all the same, they are industries employing a certain number of people; and I am sure that neither the hon. gentleman himself, nor any other hon. gentleman would ask that these should be excluded altogether from the census. As to the return, I shall see that the information is brought down as quickly as possible. But I would ask the hon. gentleman to amend the language of his motion in what, I think, is simply an inadvertance. He asks for a return giving the names of those employed in the industry. The enumerators take the names of the parties as they reside at their houses, but they do not take the names of those who are employed in each industry. We can give the number of those who are employed in the industries, but not the names.

Mr. FORBES. Certainly, that should be remembered.

Mr. FRASER. I would suggest, while the Minister is about it, that he bring down an Order I got over a year ago for the same purpose. Now, the bringing down of my order could not be a matter of finances, because a child in an infant school could do it in an hour; but if the finances do not permit, I will be pleased to pay the bill myself, because it would not be very extravagant on my part. It cannot cost much to give all the industries in my county. Let me say in connection with this, that I think there should be a method by which, when all these returns are brought down, the member who gets the motion of the House granting it, should be notified. We do not know whether we are going to get it or not, and there should be some system by which the member who obtained the motion of the House, should be notified. The returns are said to be laid on the Table of the House, but I do not find them there, and cannot get them. I know that, technically, they are laid upon the Table, but I think we should be notified where we could get them, and in that way there would not be the same difficulty.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will try to have the return brought down the hon. gentleman speaks of.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think if the hon. gentleman will get out these returns which have been promised to the House, and which have been ordered by the House, he will find that the census cannot be explained just in the way that he has indicated, and which has also been mentioned by these gentlemen who have charge of this particular branch of the Department of Agriculture. There are, I think, if I remember rightly, 800 industrial institutions reported for the city of London. There is a very large amount of capital invested, and one would suppose, from the character of the returns, that that capital had all been directed towards these particular industries, since a protective system of taxation has been adopted. The hon. gentleman, and those who are seated upon the Treasury benches, as well as the hon. gentlemen who are supporting them in this House, and others out of the House, have maintained that a great impetus has been given to industrial enterprises in this country by this system of protective taxation. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is very important that we should have some other than the generalized statement which we find in the census returns brought down to us. If we had the information in detail, it would go very far to dissipate the contention which has, from time to time, been put forward by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. Why, Sir, I believe it will be found that every seamstress who has obtained employment from some merchant tailor, or some dressmaker, for work to be done at her own house, is represented as a manufacturing establishment, an industrial enterprise. In one instance I was told of a party who was engaged in sharpening saws, who was permitted to go into a little deserted tenement where he carried on his sharpening operations, his outfit consisting of two or three files and a vice, and he is put down as a manufacturing industry owing its existence to the National Policy; and the cost of the deserted tenement, and the lien, too, are portions of the capital that are invested in this enterprise. Now, it is important to know just how far the census, in the various towns and cities of Canada have been made up in this kind of way, and when we get the returns in detail from a few centres of business, we will be able to judge more fairly, and the hon. gentlemen themselves will have an opportunity of being disillusionized with regard to the importance of their protective policy as a means of stimulating industry in this country.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I wish to correct the hon. gentleman, who, I think, is himself suffering from a mild and pleasant delusion. The system which was adopted in connection with the census, so far as classification of those industries is concerned, is the same that was adopted in the previous census, and consequently for purposes of comparison the hon. gentleman's argument does not affect the census. In the next place, I wish to say to the hon. gentleman, as his statement has gone to the House and the country, that the increase shown in the number of employees engaged in the industries has not taken place in the smaller industries to which the hon. gentleman has referred, but the increase has taken place most materially and almost wholly in industries which have an output above $2,000, and the greater part of the increase in industries where the output is more than $10,000. If the hon. gentleman will analyse the census, he will find I am correct.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the cost of the dwelling house is taken as part of the capital, the hon. gentleman may make the amount $2,000, as the whole amount of capital is frequently a sewing-machine.

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to challenge the statement made by the Secretary of State, that the Canadian census follows strictly the lines followed in the English census. Will the Secretary of State declare to the House that in the English census an establishment containing one operative is entered as a manufacturing industry?

Mr. MONTAGUE. An establishment containing one boy, who does nothing more than split kindling wood, is called a manufacturing industry in the census of other countries.

Mr. McMULLEN. Not in that sense.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am prepared to lay the English census before the House, and to show that the Secretary of State cannot establish what he has stated, for such an entry is not made in that sense. The entry is not made on the same line as the hon. gentleman has stated. With respect to returns ordered, there are many places for which returns have been ordered regarding the number of manufacturing establishments, and the information not supplied. We have the number supposed to exist in my own town, and it is found impossible to hunt up even one-half the number, and I have no doubt the same statement would apply to other places of which hon. members have spoken. But I can easily understand that the Government were unable to find money to pay for the preparation and printing of returns if the facts would not redound to the credit of the Administration. Under other circumstances, they could have obtained the money by Governor General's warrant, but it was not deemed desirable that the country should be thoroughly posted as to those infant industries, so the Governor General's warrant was not called for.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Will the Secretary of State be kind enough, without an Order of the House, to bring down the information asked for last year in regard to industries in the town of Wingham? In the census I find that we have manufacturing industries there. Although I have been there 53 years, I have been unable to find half the number mentioned, and I want the Government to come to my rescue.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will give the hon. member the same answer I gave the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser), that I shall be very glad to bring down the information desired.

Motion agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY— THE ESTIMATES.

Mr. FOSTER presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message as follows :—

ABERDEEN.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, Estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending 30th June, 1896, and in accordance with the provisions of "The British North America Act, 1867," the Governor General recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

Government House,
Ottawa, April, 1895.

Mr. FOSTER moved :

That the Message and the Estimates be referred to a Committee of the Whole House in Supply.

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to inquire if the Estimates laid on the Table are now ready for use of members of Parliament? The Minister of Finance laid on the Table of the House to-day the Auditor General's Report, but that report is not yet available to members.

Mr. FOSTER. The Estimates are ready, and the Auditor General's Report is also ready. Copies will be ready for members at supper time.

Motion agreed to.

MONEYS PAID TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for :

Return showing all sums of money paid to any member of Parliament, while a member of this House, outside of his sessional indemnity and mileage, from the 1st of January, 1879, to 1st of January, 1895, and to whom and for what service or purpose paid.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I would ask my hon. friend if he would have any objection to amending the motion by putting "1873" in place of "1879"?

Mr. McMULLEN. I have no objection. I hope that the Minister of Finance will see that the return is brought down.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, yes; that goes as a matter of course.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

SAVINGS BANKS DEPOSITS.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for :

Return showing the gross amount of money on deposit in each of the Dominion savings banks, including Post Office savings banks, on the first day of April, 1895.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I desire to call the attention of my hon. friend to this fact. As regards the Post Office Savings Banks, the gross amount of money on deposit in each cannot be supplied for the 1st of April, 1895, but it can be given for the 30th June, 1894, the last date upon which the ledgers were balanced. I will bring down whatever information we have up to the last date.

Motion agreed to.

MONTANA CATTLE ENTERING INTO CANADA.

Mr. MULOCK moved for :

Copies of all letters, telegrams or other communications since the 1st of January, 1893, made or sent by Donald McCauley or any Government agent or any other person in the Alberta district, to the Government or to any member, officer or employee of the Government, and of all letters, telegrams, or other communications, since said date, sent by the Government, or any member or officer of the Government, to Donald McCauley or any Government agent or other person in the Alberta district, concerning the entry of cattle into Canada from Montana.

He said : I have received advice which may or may not be correct—I am not testifying as to its correctness at this moment—to the effect that there is certain commingling of herds. Canadian cattle finding their way across to Montana and being rounded up, separated from the American herd, and brought in again to Canada in that way. It might be called smuggling, perhaps, and in that case cattle are not subject to quarantine regulations or to inspection. I have received certain particulars telling me in one case of a number of cattle said to have been brought in during the last year in that way. You will understand, Mr. Speaker, I am not now pledging myself to the correctness or otherwise of the information. I understand that Mr. McCauley is, amongst others, in the service of the Government, and I merely use his name as that of a person who would probably be in communication with the department on this matter. I am told that Mr. McCauley has made a report either to the Government direct or to his immediate superior officer, and in that case I presume it would find its way into the hands of the Government here.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The records of the Department of Agriculture have been looked into and no such person as Mr. McCauley appears on the correspondence register, and I am also informed that there has been no correspondence with any person since January 1st, 1893, concerning the entry of cattle from Montana.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman is, I suppose, not playing upon words when he uses the words "entry." Technically the word "entry" might be regarded as the legitimate entry of cattle through the Custom-house. I use the word in the largest possible sense referring to cattle coming into Canada, and I think if the hon. gentleman will look in the departments he will find records, unless some officer has been derelict in his duty. Perhaps the hon. gentleman only looked in the Customs Department under the term "entry." I have a very specific communication upon the subject, which I think is accurate, though of course I cannot say at this moment. It may be necessary for me to ask the House at a later period to bring witnesses to investigate the matter if no returns have been made. So perhaps the hon. gentleman will let the order go, and if after this explanation it is found that there are no records, perhaps he can make a statement in answer to the order.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I was not objecting at all to the order.

Motion agreed to.

ST. LAWRENCE AND ADIRONDACK RAILWAY—SUBSIDIES.

Mr. BERGERON moved for :

Return showing the amount of moneys given as subsidies to the St. Lawrence and Adirondack Railway Company.

He said : My object in making this motion is simply to direct the attention of the Minister of Railways to the fact that this railway, which runs from a point in the county of Huntingdon, I believe, down to Valleyfield, has not for a long time been operated in such a way as to accommodate the people of that district, who by their petitions aided the company in obtaining subsidies from the Government. At the time the subsidies were granted this railway was said to be for the public advantage of Canada and for the advantage of the people of the district through which the railway passed ; but at the present time it is of no value to those people whatever. It is a very well built road, but it has been simply operated as a part of the New York Central system for the carrying of passengers between New York and Montreal via the Canada Atlantic Railway, and the trains have always passed through the parishes in my county without stopping. Now, I am told an arrangement has been made by the New York Central with the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway by which a connection is made with the Grand Trunk in Huntingdon and with the Canadian Pacific Railway at St. Constant, from which point passengers are carried into the Windsor station at Montreal. So that this line does not serve the people between Huntingdon and Valleyfield ; and those people, on whose behalf I make this motion, contend that whenever we grant subsidies for railways, they are granted because the railways are to be not only for the benefit of Canada, but for the benefit of the locality through which they are constructed.

Mr. HAGGART. The only information in the department which I can furnish is the amount of the subsidy which was granted to this railway. I believe it was $85,000 ; but the mileage being over-estimated, only $65,000 was applied, and the rest has lapsed. This subsidy, I suppose, was given to this railway for the reason that it would help to develop that particular section of the country, and the hon. gentleman states that it is now being used entirely as a through line, and that its trains do not stop at all in his county. It is entirely out of the power of the Government to remedy that. Perhaps the hon. gentleman could suggest some remedy in the form of an amendment to the Railway Act, which would provide that the railways to which Government subsidies are granted should forever afterwards be obliged to a certain extent to accommodate the people of the district through which they run, and be under the control of the Department of Railways in some way. At present we have no control over them.

Mr. LAURIER. This is another case which shows the necessity of putting some limitation or restriction upon the lavish manner in which we have been supplying money to railway companies. It is the second case which has come before the House this session, of railways which we have subsidized, turning out to be of no benefit to the public whatever.

Mr. EDGAR. Surely the Minister of Railways cannot contend that it was not in the power of the Government when they made this grant under Order in Council to attach conditions to it which would have compelled this railway company, if they expected to receive the grant, to give the public proper service. That is where I think the Government have been at fault in their dealings with a great many of these railway subsidies. Nothing could be more pitiful than the Minister of Railways, though controlling a majority in this House, getting up and telling one of his own supporters that the Government are absolutely powerless and can do nothing to help those people, after having given $65,000 of public money to this railway. I believe the Government are responsible for having omitted to protect the public when making these grants.

Motion agreed to.

TARIFF STATEMENT.

Mr. EDGAR moved for :

Statement showing : 1. The several items on which duties have been increased by the Canadian tariff, from 1878, up to this date. 2. The date of the increase. 3. The amount of the increase on each item, whether specific or ad valorem. 4. The total amount of the duties which have been paid into the public treasury by reason of such increase.

He said : This motion is on very much the same line as the one carried the other day on motion of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot). He moved for statements showing the reductions in the Canadian tariff, while I move for a statement showing the increases. The only difference between the two is that the reply to this motion is much simpler, as it does not require any elaborate calculation, as in the case of reductions, to show what would have been paid if those reductions had not been made. We have simply to show what the increased payments have been under these increased rates ; and I am sure, after what the hon. leader of the House has told us to-day about the earnest desire of the Government to deal fairly with all the orders of the House and bring down the returns with great promptitude, that they will take occasion to justify that statement by allowing this return to be brought down at least as promptly as the return moved for by the hon. member for Bellechasse.

Mr. WALLACE. The only objection that could be made to the motion is that it involves an enormous amount of work.

Mr. EDGAR. That is what I thought.

Mr. WALLACE. I have a report from the department which says that it would take three expert clerks three months to prepare this return, that the officers of that branch are now working over-time, and that they would have to lay aside their regular work to prepare this return.

Mr. EDGAR. Can the hon. gentleman estimate how long it will take to show the reductions made which the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) moved for ?

Mr. WALLACE. The reductions are very large in amount. On sugar it is many million dollars, and on teas the same.

Mr. EDGAR. I am sure that this return is one of very great importance, and that if it does cost a little money the money will be very well spent. I do not advocate extravagance, but I think here is a case where information of great importance to the people should be obtained, even if it takes two or three extra hands to get it ready.

Mr. FOSTER. I would point out another objection. That is, when the hon. gentleman does get the return, he cannot, by any manner of means, have information which would be satisfactory to himself or any one else, as regards the total amount of the duties which have been paid in to the public treasury by reason of such increase. If the hon. gentleman can show any possible way by which he can get a definite, satisfactory answer to that question, he will do more than I possibly can. You can tell what the duties have aggregated on cheese or coffee, or hardware, but it is impossible to tell what duties have accrued on the different items in a list of over a thousand articles by reason of an increase of one per cent, or a dollar a ton. The many variations both in values and quantities make that impossible. If the hon. gentleman will read the Budget speech of my predecessor in the regime of Mr. Mackenzie, he will see that my predecessor found it impossible to declare to the House what was the exact effect of any addition he made to the duties. The first three items can be easily given, and the information is definite, but the last item is one which will be of no earthly use as a comparison or as a means of exact information.

Mr. LAURIER. This is an objection which, if there is anything in it, should have been taken on a former occasion. The motion of my hon. friend is similar to one which was carried a few days ago, except that in his motion, the word "increase" is used, whereas, in the former motion, the word "decrease" appears. If the hon. gentleman will refer back to the motion of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) he will find that it calls for a statement showing the several items on which the duties had been reduced from 1879 up to this date. The present motion asks for the increases, instead of the reductions. Instead of asking for the dates of the reductions, he asks for the dates of the increases. Instead of asking for the amount of the reduction on each item, he asks for the amount of the increase. Instead of asking for the total amount of duties which would have been paid into the public treasury if such reduction had not been made, taking as a basis the quantities imported each year since the reduction of such duties, he asks for the total amount of the duties which have been paid into the public treasury by reason of such increase. The motion of the hon. member for Bellechasse was carried without objection the other day. It was very plain why this motion was carried. It was to furnish a campaign document intended for campaign purposes, which would show the reductions made by a paternal Government ; but when we ask for the counterpart, when the Government is asked to show not only the reductions, but the increases, and the consequences of the increases, my hon. friend says that is going to complicate matters, and give a great amount of work. Well, the amount of work will be the employment of three clerks for three months, and I hope the country can yet afford to stand that expense. If we have a deficit of five million dollars or six million dollars, this additional expenditure will not increase it very much, and it will not be too much to give for the information.

Mr. WALLACE. With regard to the motion to which the hon. gentleman has referred, I stated in the House at the time that it would not be possible to furnish the information asked for by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot). I quoted the fourth item of his motion, asking for the total amount of duties which would have been paid into the public treasury had the duties been maintained, taking as a basis the quantities imported this year since the abolition of such duties. And I said that in the revision of the tariff last year we had made, in many cases, an entirely different classification, so that it would not be possible to give all the information asked for.

Mr. LAURIER. The motion carried all the same.

Mr. EDGAR. I have looked up the reference, and I find that this remark of the hon. gentleman was not made on the motion of the hon. member for Bellechasse concerning the reductions in the tariff, but was made in reply to another motion, asking for a return of the items upon which the duties had been totally abolished.

Mr. WALLACE. The same principle applies.

Mr. EDGAR. But the hon. gentleman did not apply it to this motion.

Mr. WALLACE. I did. I remember quite distinctly saying that the same objection would apply to the other.

Mr. EDGAR. Well, "Hansard" does not say so. All we find in "Hansard" is the suggestion by the hon. gentleman that the amount of the reduction on the abolition of duties be included.

Mr. WALLACE. I said in addition to that, that the same objection would apply to this motion as to the other.

Mr. EDGAR. I did not hear it, and the "Hansard" reporters did not hear it. However, in order that there may be no difficulty in getting information, I would be quite willing to leave out item four, and take only the first, second and third paragraphs of the motion. I can move for item four at another time, if, on looking into the matter, we find there is less difficulty than the hon. gentleman imagines.

Mr. FOSTER. No use getting it if it is no use.

Mr. EDGAR. No. With the permission of the House, I would ask that the fourth paragraph be struck out.

Mr. MULOCK. If the rejection of the fourth paragraph is to result in there being no return at all, it is better to have it dropped. But the return will be incomplete without it. We are told by the Government that the work involved in preparing a list of the increases of duties and the gross amount collected from the people by reason of these increases, will be so onerous that it will take the available staff three months to prepare it. According to the Controller of Customs, it will take three expert clerks three months to add up the amount extracted by this system from the people. That is an important, a significant admission. We have it for the first time now. Heretofore, it has been customary for hon. gentlemen to go on the platform and tell the people that they had lowered the tariff, that they had prepared such a beneficent tariff that no matter what it might be on the statute-book, it resulted in cheapening all the necessaries of life. Now we have the Controller of Customs telling us that the increases are so enormous in detail and in the aggregate, that they have not sufficient staff in the department to add up the figures in the next three months, so as to inform the people what these increases amount to. That information is, consequently, to be withheld from the people. We are to have a statement showing the reductions, but it is not possible for the Government to show the total amount of increases. They find no difficulty whatever in making a statement of the reductions, because these are so comparatively infinitesimal that the Government could not offer any reasonable excuse for refusing to give them; but when they are asked to show the other side and furnish a return which will discredit the statements they made during the late political campaign, they have not got sufficient staff to compile that information.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think both of these motions ought to be amended. The one before us should be amended now, and a supplementary return moved for with regard to the other. We should have a return showing the increases and the decreases in the tariff between 1873 and 1878 as well. It would add considerably to the cost of the return to get the increases during that period, but the decreases would cost nothing.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I quite agree with the Secretary of State that there should be an amendment in that direction and that it will require more force on the staff. There are more Cabinet Ministers than there used to be, and some of them might be employed to work out this problem. It would at least have the advantage of keeping them at home. I don't know that the Controller ought to seek refuge in Uncle Sam's domains, at critical periods in the history of the country, leaving the country to get on as best it may. I would give that hon. gentleman more work in order to keep him busy and keep him at home and out of mischief, rather than allow him to go to the United States. I don't want Ministers going to Washington for every little thing that turns up, even to avoid an election campaign. I would suggest that not only should the return cover the cases where the change was made from specific to ad valorem, but also those in which the duties were changed back from ad valorem to specific. We saw a good deal of that last session. I examined into the matter pretty closely during the recess, and I found that nearly all the items that were changed from specific to ad valorem were changed back from ad valorem to specific in the committee. Another irregular thing is that there were six more items in the Bill as finally passed than were in it as passed by the committee. I do not know whether the Controller found the extra ones in Washington or not, but certainly I can find no record of them in "Hansard."

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

BONAVENTURE—COMPULSORY PILOTAGE.

Mr. FAUVEL moved for :

Copies of all correspondence of the pilot examiners of the county of Bonaventure with the Department of Marine and Fisheries since 1890, and petitions to the said department from the inhabitants of the said county regarding compulsory pilotage.

He said : In support of this motion I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the facts. We have a new Minister of Marine and Fisheries, having been deprived of the services of the one who formerly held office. I am not in favour of compulsory pilotage throughout the country. I think we should open our ports to the mercantile navies of the world, and do away with compulsory pilotage, in order to attract navigation to our ports. But the grievance I have to bring before the House is this : The county of Bonaventure where I reside, lies between two provinces, New Brunswick on one side, Quebec on the other. In the province of New Brunswick they have compulsory pilotage, and on the north side of the Baie des Chaleurs there is no compulsory pilotage. An Order in Council was adopted appointing three examiners of pilots in my county, and they have adopted some laws and formulated some rules which have been sent forward to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, asking that, in order to encourage suitable men to adopt pilotage as a business in the county of Bonaventure, compulsory pilotage should be adopted for that county as it is on the other side of the Baie des Chaleurs in the province of New Brunswick. On the south shore there are the ports of Caraquet, Bathurst, Dalhousie and Campbellton, and the sum of $1 per foot is exacted for pilotage dues in those ports, whereas on vessels coming to load on the north shore, there is no compulsory pilotage, and those following the business of pilotage have no work to do, for vessels coming into those ports refuse to take pilots. Why should the Minister of Marine and Fisheries decree and an Order in Council be passed, that pilotage should be compulsory on one side of the bay and non-compulsory on the other? Some of my constituents feel this to be a grievance, and have petitioned that the same rule be applied on both sides of the Baie des Chaleurs. As a ship-owner, I am speaking against my own interests, but as an Englishman I want fair-play for all. I would ask that the Order in Council should be passed carrying out the recommendation of the board of examiners establishing compulsory pilotage for vessels of a certain tonnage. The only reason why there is a difference on the two sides of the bay is that local influence has been brought to bear by large ship-owners who do not wish to pay pilotage for their ships. But as a matter of justice, if it is compulsory on one side it ought to be compulsory on the other.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I did not clearly understand the hon. gentleman whether he insists upon compulsory pilotage in the harbours of Bonaventure or not, or whether his point is that he wants to have the same rule applied on both sides. The question of pilotage, I understand, has been dealt with a good deal from a local point of view in the public interest. Representations come from certain harbours, and if they strongly insist upon optional pilotage, and that seems to be in the public interests, optional pilotage is adopted. We have compulsory pilotage in the harbour of St. John, for instance. An investigation has lately been held there with a view to decide which is best in the public interest, compulsory or non-compulsory pilotage. A full investigation has been held and testimony taken on both sides, and the report is expected every day. So far as this motion is concerned, all that I can say is that the papers will be brought down and the subject will receive every consideration.

Motion agreed to.

CAPE BRETON RAILWAY.

Mr. CAMERON moved for :

Copies of all petitions, correspondence and reports in regard to making Point Tupper the terminus of the Cape Breton Railway on the Strait of Canso, and with respect to the construction of a branch line of the Government railway to Hawkesbury.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman say what is the length of the proposed line talked of in his motion?

Mr. CAMERON. The proposed line is about half a mile.

Motion agreed to.

CATTLE TRANSPORT THROUGH U. S.

Mr. McMILLAN moved for:

Copies of all correspondence and papers by or on behalf of the Dominion Government with the United States authorities, since the last session of Parliament, respecting permission to transport Canadian cattle over American territory for shipment to Great Britain from American ocean ports, and copies of any regulation respecting the same.

He said: The Government have received great credit in some quarters for making arrangements whereby Canadians can transport their cattle through American territory in bond to Portland, whence they may be shipped to Europe. I speak under correction if I am wrong, but I have been led to believe that it was the Grand Trunk Railway and not the Government that has been able to get this concession from the American Government. Now, I hold that the Government should take some steps to make further regulations whereby we may be allowed to send our cattle to Boston or to New York. When we have to send them to Portland, we are confined to one railway and to one shipping company that takes cattle from Portland to the old country. If we were allowed to take our cattle to Boston or New York, besides being allowed to take them through American territory during the winter when we cannot ship from Montreal, we would get the advantage of competition between different railway lines, as well as having the right to ship from American ports. Now, if I am correct in stating that it was through the Grand Trunk Railway that this arrangement was made, I must say that the Government of Canada have been very neglectful of the agricultural interests when they did not approach the American Government to get this arrangement made at an earlier date. Time and again hon. members have brought before this House the benefit it would be to Canadian farmers if we could get our cattle shipped in bond through the United States to American ports. If the Government have ever made an attempt in that direction and failed, it shows that it is high time that other people should take their places, because it shows that a railway company is doing better for the agricultural interests than the Government themselves. It is a striking commentary on the Government that makes such large expenditures of money in order to procure facilities whereby the people may take their manufactured goods out of this country to foreign countries. I have been very much surprised, Mr. Speaker, at hearing some statements that have been made. I am glad the hon. Minister of Finance is in his place, as I want him to hear what I have to say. I was never so much astonished as when I saw a statement he made before the Colonial Commissioners that we in Canada had been utterly unable to furnish British Columbia with the meat that they required, especially mutton. Let me say, that after visiting that country I could not understand the reason why the Minister made such a statement, because they had only to turn from Calgary across the Rocky Mountains, the cattle that go from Fort Macleod east, in order to supply British Columbia with all the beef, at least, that they require. The quantity of American mutton that goes into British Columbia is very small, indeed. But this Government are willing to sacrifice the farmers' interests in order to carry out a pet idea of theirs, and so they have been unwilling to approach the American Government in order to make such arrangements as would really benefit the Canadian farmers and the cattle interest of both the east and west without costing one cent of money. I do hope that the Government will take the question up and get further arrangements made whereby we can ship cattle from Boston or New York, which will give us not only a choice of routes, but competition between companies, both for carrying them through American territory and across the ocean.

Mr. McMULLEN. This is unquestionably an important matter, and I think the country will feel indebted to my hon. friend for moving for these papers. I expected that some hon. gentleman would rise to reply on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture, but the Government do not appear at all disposed to say anything in explanation of their indifference with regard to providing facilities for the exportation of cattle from Canada. Any person who knows anything about the exportation of cattle must know that during the winter season the stock has got to take a long route by rail to Halifax, which unquestionably is a detriment to the animals which have to stand in the cars during that long journey. It is singular that the Government have not taken the necessary steps to secure from the Americans a relaxation of their quarantine regulations regarding cattle for export from Canada through the United States to England. For some years this arrangement has been in force, and the result is that our Canadian exporters have been subjected to very high rates of freight, rates in excess of those that have been charged from Portland and Boston, and some other American ports. The reason of this was that the whole export trade of this Dominion in cattle was virtually focussed at the port of Montreal. Exporters had no choice of route, because there was no competition. The steamship companies, of course, had the right amongst themselves, whether they did it or not, to arrange as to prices and to space, and no doubt they took advantage of the circumstances to charge increased prices. It is certainly to be regretted that the Government have not seen it their duty to make an effort to secure facilities for the exportation of cattle by the ports mentioned by the hon. member who made this motion. What he says is quite correct. The Government have made arduous efforts in the way of securing facilities for the export of manufactured goods from this country. They have sent Mr. Larke to Australia at an annual salary of $3,000 per year, and his travelling expenses, in order to promote trade with that country. As it is now six o'clock, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

RETURNS ORDERED.

PRAYERS.

CANADA AND NEWFOUNDLAND.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to get some information from the hon. leader of the House on the subject of the negotiations pending between the Dominion and Newfoundland, which I asked a question or two about the other day. The hon. gentleman then informed me that it would not be in the public interest that the details of those negotiations should be made public; and he went on further to give the assurance that the terms would be submitted to this House simultaneously with their submission by the Newfoundland Government to the Newfoundland Legislature. Now, there are one or two points upon which I think we ought to have information which the hon. gentleman could give, and which it would be decidedly in the public interest should be given. One of these points the hon. gentleman may consider to come within the proviso he attached to his remarks the other day. That point is whether a demand was made by the Newfoundland Government that in case of union a bounty should be paid by the Dominion on fish exported from that province, and whether any term had been inserted in the provisional terms binding Canada in any way to pay such a bounty. I do not ask the hon. gentleman to state the details, but simply the fact. But there is a point very much more important than that on which I think this House and the country at large ought to be informed, and that speedily.

Mr McMULLEN.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Thomas McGreevy, Esquire, Member for the Electoral District of Quebec West, introduced by Mr. Taylor and Mr. Fréchette.

CANADA AND NEWFOUNDLAND.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I notice in the correspondence from Newfoundland, published in the Dominion newspapers of yesterday, that a semi-official statement has been published in Newfoundland to the effect that the Newfoundland delegates to Canada demanded that this bounty should be paid. The correspondence does not state to what extent the demand was complied with or whether it was complied with at all; but the inference is left from the reading of the despatches that it has been complied with, and the people of Newfoundland have had pressed upon them the fact of this concession as one of the reasons why they should enter confederation. But there is a point that seems to be vastly more important than this—a point going to the root of the whole negotiations.—that is, that it is not contemplated to submit the terms of union to the people of Newfoundland at all, but to carry them through the existing legislature there, who were not elected on the terms of union, and never had the question before them. If this is so, it is a most important point. The hon. gentleman may say that the terms of union do not contain anything relating to this point at all. That is what I want to know, because I think there ought to be a provision of that kind in them, providing for the submission of the terms of union to the electorate, and the opinion of this House should be expressed in no uncertain voice upon that point. We have already had one province legislated into this Dominion, unconstitutionally in a sense, constitutionally in another sense, but certainly against the will of the people. I think it is not the desire of any one in this House to have another Nova Scotia difficulty such as this Dominion had to contend with once before. The reasons given why the terms of union should not be submitted to the people of Newfoundland are the most childish, and they will not bear a moment's thought or consideration. One is that the people down there have no money to pay for an election. That seems childish and ridiculous in the extreme. But the next reason even beats that. It is something appalling to have it said that the people are not in a position, that they are unfit to pass judgment upon the point at all. I would read from the correspondence—

Mr. IVES. If my hon. friend will permit me, I would like to ask whether this speech is in order upon the Orders of the Day being called.

Mr. SPEAKER. I suppose the hon. gentleman proposes to conclude with a motion.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the objection is raised, I shall conclude with a motion. I did not wish to do more than call the attention of the Government to these two or three points, and I am only speaking long enough to make them intelligible. The correspondence from which I have obtained my information further says:

There is another consideration which renders it most undesirable that the question should be decided by the people at the polls. If the election is to be rushed through in three weeks, it is utterly impossible in that time to inform the people, especially in the outlying districts, of the nature and advantages of the terms offered, so as to enable them to pronounce an intelligent judgment in the matter. At present they are totally ignorant regarding the question, and saturated with the old ridiculous notions and prejudices. The bulk of them could not be got to understand the danger in which we are, and the consequences of failing to meet our liabilities on the 1st of July. They would vote, therefore, recklessly, and so precipitate ruin. The antis, who are for the most part irresponsible persons, know this, and calculate on winning by an appeal to their prejudices and passions. Such a great and important question, therefore, should not be submitted for decision to such a tribunal, who are utterly unprepared to judge it on its merits.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I hope I speak for every member of this House, on either side, when I say that there is not a man here who would not repudiate the suggestion contained in these remarks. If the people of Newfoundland are not to come into this Dominion of their own free will, after having had a fair and honest opportunity to pass judgment on the terms it will be an evil day for the Dominion of Canada. We cannot afford to repeat the experiment we once tried in Nova Scotia, which left a deep feeling in that province against Canada, which has not passed away to this day. The fires are smouldering there yet, and could be fanned into a flame in a moment. It would be a very serious thing for Canada if such an experiment should be repeated in the case of Newfoundland. I therefore hope that I may be able to hear from the hon. gentlemen that, with the knowledge they have of the full consequences which flowed from forcing Nova Scotia into the union against her will, provision has been made in the terms for the submission of those terms to the people of Newfoundland before the House there will have power to carry them into effect and bring about a union with Canada. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. FOSFER. I am somewhat surprised at my hon. friend. I did not think that he would, on newspaper rumours or writings, or correspondence or telegraphic despatches to the press, without one iota of official basis and not purporting to have any official basis, undertake to precipitate a discussion here with reference to the negotiations between Canada and Newfoundland; and thus, by obtaining some statement regarding such rumours and reports, hope to come a little closer, each day, I suppose, to what are the terms which have been discussed between the two countries and which have to be kept secret for the present by the Governments of both countries. There is not a word in what the hon. gentleman has read to show that the Government of Newfoundland or the delegates, who form the majority of the Newfoundland Government, have divulged one sentence of the negotiations between the two countries. There is not the least sign of that. It is all simply newspaper correspondence, telegraphic rumours, press despatches, not coming from any official source whatever, and not purporting to have any official authority. Out of this, the hon. gentleman has manufactured two grievances. One is by implication against the Canadian Government, that they have promised a bounty. Another is that they have allowed Newfoundland to be its own judge as to what position its Government should adopt with regard to the acceptance or submission of any terms which might be agreed upon, and he bases this grievance on the supposition, taken from the newspaper correspondence, that the Government of Newfoundland is going to take a certain course. There is not one iota of official information in what the hon. gentleman has quoted to show what the intention of the Newfoundland Government is, and what the hon. gentleman desires to find out is whether this Government, in discussing the terms, have assented to any such proposition as that embodied in the telegraphic despatches which the hon. gentleman has read. Now, I must say, in the first place, what I said before, that it is not proper for the Government to give us, and must refuse to give to the House at present—and I do so with a full sense of the responsibility attaching to that declaration—anything with reference to the negotiations which have taken place between the delegates of the two Governments, or anything with reference to what terms were discussed and what were or were not agreed upon. I do not think my hon. friend will press that. I do not think it would promote the successful outcome of these negotiations, which we both desire, and I do not think I can give any categorical answer to my hon. friend. I do not think he has any right to ask, upon mere newspaper reports, that we should do so here before the Newfoundland Government is prepared to lay the terms before its legislature. I might say to my hon. friend that what we have agreed to do, is to lay simultaneously before both Houses the negotiations, and we shall adhere to that agreement.

Mr. LAURIER. The House and the country, I am sure, will regret the attitude taken by the Government on this occasion. I quite recognize the principle that details of the negotiations should not be laid on the Table at present. But there are certain broad principles which are supposed to underlie these negotiations, and when it is stated in one of the organs of the Government that the negotiations are to be concluded in a manner altogether foreign to what we are entitled to expect, it is the duty of my hon. friend and of every member of the House to ask whether or not these principles are to be adhered to or violated. I agree with my hon. friend that it is perhaps a misfortune to us that we should have to take information from the organs of the Government instead of from the Government themselves. The hon. gentleman says the details are not to be communicated to the House until the proper time, but he would not violate any secret of office or any principle if he would inform the House at present that no official negotiations are to become binding until the people of Newfoundland have been called upon to pronounce on the question. I do not say that the people of Canada should be called upon to give their opinion, because the people of Canada years ago determined to take Newfoundland into confederation as soon as Newfoundland was ready. That is a part and parcel of the treaty of confederation. Not so, however, with the people of Newfoundland, and certainly I cannot understand why the hon. gentleman will not say that on no consideration will he be a party to any agreement which would force Newfoundland against her will into confederation. Much as I believe confederation would be desirable, I would object to the people of Newfoundland being forced into it as the people of Nova Scotia were. It would be in the interests of both parties to say at once that there is nothing to be feared in that respect, but that the popular will must be ascertained before sanction is given to any negotiations between the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I confess I am astonished at the position taken by the hon. gentleman, because while we have not asked him to state to the House what are the terms contained in the offer of the Government, we have asked him whether certain statements which have been sent abroad by the newspaper press representing the Administration are true.

Mr. FOSTER. And when you have your answer to that, you will have something of the terms.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Sufficient for the days is the evil thereof. If there was anything of interest to the people at large, anything which we think highly improper or unconstitutional and that further requires elucidation, of course this House would be derelict in its duty if it failed to inquire of the Administration what course the Administration was taking. I admit the Administration is the proper organ of Parliament for the purpose of carrying on these negotiations, but I contend the Administration is after all but the organ of Parliament. It is subordinate to Parliament; it is responsible to Parliament for the manner in which it discharges the duties constitutionally imposed upon it. If to-day there was any report that the Government of England, in its negotiations, intended ceding away to some foreign state an important portion of the Empire, does any one suppose that the rule which requires Parliament not to intervene in the negotiation of a treaty would apply in such a case as that? Would it stop Parliament from making inquiry as to whether the Government would be likely to take a course permanently detrimental to the Empire? Nobody would maintain such a proposition. The questions put by my hon. friend are perfectly apposite questions on the present occasion and should be answered. The hon. Minister of Finance gives us an answer which shows the views of the Government upon this question. He in fact says, that whether the people of Newfoundland are to be consulted or not is a question which concerns Newfoundland, and that it is a question for Newfoundland to determine. Sir, I deny that proposition: I maintain that this House is interested in that question, that this House is interested in knowing, whether the Government that are negotiating on behalf of Newfoundland are taking a course without the approval of the inhabitants of Newfoundland. If Newfoundland comes in as a discontented province, does any one pretend to say that it would not seriously affect the future of the union? Therefore, Sir, we are not less interested in this matter than Newfoundland is. Those who desire the annexation of Newfoundland—and I suppose that every member of this House is willing that Newfoundland shall be admitted upon certain conditions, upon conditions that have already been foreshadowed upon this side of the House—are not willing that Newfoundland shall be dragged into union by force or fraud or importunity or purchase, or in any other way contrary to the will of the people. That being so, we say that the hon. gentleman ought to inform us whether it is proposed to take Newfoundland in against the wishes of the great majority of the people. There is another important question my hon. friend has put. The attention of the Government is called to the fact that it is proposed, on behalf of Newfoundland, to pay for all time to come a large amount as fishery bounties to the people of Newfoundland to enable them successfully to enter into competition with the fishermen of France. If that is so have we not the right to know it?

Mr. FOSTER. You will know it in due time.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman says we shall know it in due time. If the Government is to commit treason against the people of this country, are we to wait until that treason is effected before we speak? I say, no. If the Government are making an onerous bargain, one that would be adverse to the interests of the people of this country—a people already burdened and scarcely able to keep their heads above water, as the hon. gentleman knows, as the state of the hon. gentleman's treasury at this moment discloses—if that is so, is it not evident that this House has long been derelict in its duty in allowing the Government to assume absolute control of its affairs and to grant or withhold such information as may seem to it proper? Sir, the Government of this country has passed into the hands of men who are not capable of conducting the country's affairs. The hon. gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches are not qualified for the duties of Ministers of the Crown, and this House would be derelict in its duty if it did not watch the proceedings of these gentlemen at every step to see that the interests of the party whom the Administration represents and undertakes, unsuccessfully, to lead, and the interests of the country are not being betrayed in the negotiations being carried on at this moment. I say that the House is entitled to the information which my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) has asked for from the Administration.

Mr. WELDON. I think that the conduct of the Administration will compare favourably with the conduct of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) on this occasion. No more proper answer than that given by the Minister could have been given. The Ministry who undertake, on behalf of Canada, the negotiations with Newfoundland must take the responsibility for those negotiations, and afterwards must answer to this House. They are not bound to communicate at this time the information demanded by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). There is no hon. member in this House who knows that better than the hon. member for Bothwell, whose studies make him familiar with parliamentary law and practice. There is not one of the two hundred and odd members who sit here from whom such expressions come with such impropriety as from that hon. gentleman. One would suppose, to hear the hon. gentleman, that this Parliament and this country were bound hand and foot by the negotiations already entered into. Does the hon. member not know that every statement made, every proposition agreed to, every undertaking given by the Ministers of the Crown in Canada which may lead, at a future day, to confederation with Newfoundland, is subject to the ratification of this Parliament? Where, Mr. Speaker, is the danger; where is the cause for alarm? I should not have thought it necessary for the hon. gentleman to take the people of Newfoundland under his protection. But the point he raises can be discussed in its own time when this House is asked to ratify the terms of union. If he finds that the people of Newfoundland have not been protected by the Administration and Legislature of Newfoundland, if her Ministers who have represented her are unequal to their work and do undertake to bring the province into confederation without a popular vote, the hon. gentleman, if he will bide his time, will have an opportunity in this House to make his objection. But if he undertakes to protect the people of Newfoundland from their own Administration, if he seeks to take them under his wing at this time, he has no means of knowing but that his kindness will be wasted. I listened with surprise to the statement of the hon. gentleman for Queen's that the repeal feeling in Nova Scotia, after 28 years of union, still existed. The hon. gentleman says that the embers of discontent are still there. Mr. Speaker, they are as dead as the ashes as Julius Caesar. That was proven eight or nine years ago when Mr. Fielding appealed to the province on the cry of repeal, and managed to get a majority by a snap vote. But the next year, when the province was roused, he got his answer, and he crawled away into a hole and admitted that the repeal feeling was dead. I live half the year in the province of Nova Scotia, and I claim to speak with as much authority, though I claim no more authority, than the hon. gentleman from Queen's. From my knowledge of the case I flatly but respectfully contradict his statement and say thankfully that the repeal sentiment is hopelessly dead in Nova Scotia.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It may or may not be true—of that I cannot speak—that the repeal sentiment in Nova Scotia is dead as Julius Caesar, but I do know that funeral obsequies of that sentiment cost Canada a great many millions of dollars in the past and may cost her a great many millions of dollars in the future. Now, Sir, I beg to point out that my hon. friend has not asked for information as to details, at any rate he expressly intimated that he was prepared to accept the explanation of the Government on the one point which might be called a point of detail—although a point of grave importance. But there remains the question of principle, upon which this House has had ample experience and full warning, and if the Government is going to disregard the example which was set us by the unfortunate case of Nova Scotia a good many years ago, that is quite another matter. Sir, we had our warning in that case of the extremely evil results that always follow from dragging a free people into confederation by a catch vote of their Parliament without referring the question to the people. So far as the provinces of Ontario and Quebec were concerned, the matter was kept before them, as I well remember, for several years. The amplest discussion took place in Parliament and in the press. Speaking for my own province, I believe I am literally correct in saying that not one single petition, not one single manifestation of popular disapproval was made from Ontario against confederation. Had there been any expression of disapproval, we should have felt it our duty, I believe, to consult the people of Ontario. In the case of Nova Scotia we know that there were these expressions of disapproval. I believe that the greatest and most numerous signed petitions ever presented to the Crown by any colony were those from Nova Scotia against confederation laid before the British House of Commons and presented to Her Majesty by the late Joseph Howe. In this case, the danger is greater still. I believe I am right in saying that the proposition for union with Canada was presented to the people of Newfoundland—yes, my friend beside me tells me that this question was before the people of Newfoundland years ago—and decided in the negative. Under such circumstances it is in the highest degree important that it should be distinctly and clearly understood, and that no time should be lost in letting it be understood by the legislature of Newfoundland, that the opinion of this legislature is that the people should be consulted. I say that my hon. friend, in doing as he has done, has discharged his duty to Canada and his duty to Newfoundland as well. I spoke of the mischiefs which arise upon a Parliament being manipulated, or the possibility of a Parliament being manipulated and thereby bringing about a union against the wishes of the people, as exemplified in our own case. There is a more important case than that, and one more widely known, in English history. There is a far greater example of the effect of neglecting the wishes of the people and deliberately purchasing—as we know to our cost, they can be purchased upon occasion—the representatives of the people in order to bring about a political union which the people did not approve. What is the ultimate cause of the great question agitating England to-day, but the result of the proceedings of Lord Castlereigh a hundred years ago in dishonestly bringing about a union between Great Britain and Ireland, to which the majority of the people, Protestant and Catholic alike, were well known to be opposed? We do not want to have another spectacle such as that in the British Empire, least of all do we want to have it in Canada; and therefore I say my hon. friend is in his right, that he is quite justified in what he says and that he shows he understands and appreciates the true bearings of this question, when he takes the earliest opportunity of calling the attention of the House to the fact that it is ruined, and, we fear unfortunately on too good grounds, that this arrangement is to be put through without consulting the people of Newfoundland, and asking us to take warning by the results of our own failure and of the evils which have followed a similar disregard of popular rights in the still larger sphere of the mother country.

Mr. FLINT. Were it not for the few remarks that fell from the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), I would not venture to make any observations at this time. But I must say that as a matter of fact the observations which fell from the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), were literally correct. It is not a question solely for the people of Newfoundland, but it is a question, so far as we are concerned, entirely for the people of Canada as to whether Newfoundland shall come into this union freely and constitutionally, or whether it shall come in under similar circumstances to those under which Nova Scotia was brought into this union. We are perfectly well aware of the means by which confederation might possibly be carried through the legislature of Newfoundland, means like those by which confederation was carried through the legislature of Nova Scotia, by means of bribery and corruption, by the promise of senatorships, and judgeships, and other offices which are in the gift of the Dominion Government. Had the wishes of the people of Nova Scotia been consulted at the time of union many hundreds of thousands of dollars would have been saved to the people of Canada, much heart-burning and ill-feeling would have been saved to the people of Nova Scotia, and a loyalty to the Government of Canada would have existed there which, I am happy to say, proud to say, does not exist in Nova Scotia, and cannot exist, until the generation which witnessed the infamous manner in which Nova Scotia was brought into this union, has entirely passed away. I hope and trust, that if Newfoundland comes into this union, the cardinal principle, outside of all matters of detail, will be that she shall come in by the will and by the wish of the people. I consider that it would be the duty of this House, and especially the duty of the Liberal party in this House, to fight to the bitter end any attempt to ratify the terms of union in this Parliament, which were not previously ratified and sanctioned by the people of Newfoundland. Twenty-eight years have passed away since Nova Scotia entered the Canadian confederation, and my hon. friend says that the repeal sentiment is as dead as Julius Caesar. I admit that circumstances over which the people had no control, such as the accumulation of national responsibilities, the overwhelming influence of the British Empire, and the difficulties connected with a repeal of the union, together with the passing away of many of those who were interested in the question at the time, have, to a large degree, diminished the opposition to confederation with Canada. Let us glance over the history of those twenty-eight years; and let us consider the manner in which Nova Scotia was brought into the union, and the ill-feeling that resulted; do we wish that repeated in the case of Newfoundland? Should not the Dominion Government, if at any time Newfoundland makes a proposition for union, state that a fundamental principle upon which such a measure could be consummated, should be that the people of Newfoundland should first be consulted? I say it would be a disgrace to the Dominion of Canada to enter into a union with Newfoundland until the people were first consulted, and had freely accepted and endorsed the terms of union. This is a preliminary question, it is not a question of detail, it is a constitutional question, and I trust that hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House will so express their minds, both in Parliament and out of it, as to give the Government to understand that no such scheme will be tolerated by Canada as the admission of Newfoundland without the consent of the people first being obtained.

Mr. EDGAR. Although this is not a question of detail, although it is a broad underlying principle of any negotiations, still, it appears that the Government have assumed the position that they will keep the House and country in ignorance of what they have done up to the present time. Well, Sir, let that be so; I say it is a good thing for the country that there has been a discussion today on this point; it is a good thing for the country that the leading men, at least on this side of the House, have risen from their places and given the Government a warning, and given the people of Newfoundland an encouragement, that we will resist any attempt to force them into a union as Nova Scotia was forced. That much, at any rate, has been accomplished, although the Government are, as on so many other occasions this session, keeping as dumb as oysters when information is asked from them. But there is another point which occurs to me, and which the people of this country should remember. There may be outside pressure upon Canada, and upon Newfoundland also, to consummate a union. The Imperial Government have got into great difficulty with Newfoundland, they have difficulties under the French treaty, they have the difficulty of the unfortunate financial condition of this island, and they, of course, have brought pressure, naturally enough, upon Newfoundland to come here and seek for confederation with Canada. I believe as firmly as I believe anything, in the advisability of rounding off confederation by bringing in Newfoundland, but, Sir, I want to do it on fair principles. If there has been any pressure from Downing Street, or anywhere else, to force this country or Newfoundland into a union, except what the people of the two countries may desire and constitutionally express such desire, I for one shall oppose a union under such circumstances. I dare say that English statesmen may think that they might repeat in the case of Newfoundland what was done in Nova Scotia. They may be urging that line of action; perhaps this Government does not know anything about it, if they are; but I would just warn them against dangers of that kind. No doubt, the Government are the proper authorities for the people of Newfoundland to approach in opening up these negotiations, but are they altogether equipped for that purpose? Have we not seen, in connection with these very negotiations, an extraordinary statement in the newspapers—a letter from the Secretary of the Privy Council asking one of the fathers of confederation where he could find the papers of the Quebec Conference relating to Newfoundland? It appears the Government have not got the very basis of negotiation in their possession. They have allowed to disappear from the archives the whole of the papers connected with the negotiations with Newfoundland in 1864; and, Sir, this Government is evidently not too well equipped and should not refuse to listen to advice from this side of the House in that matter, and I hope they will not refuse.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

MINISTERIAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. LAURIER. Perhaps this would be a fitting occasion to receive the ministerial explanations which were promised a few days ago.

Mr. FOSTER. The subject has been so long deferred, at the request of the hon. gentleman, that I had quite forgotten it. However, it will give me great pleasure briefly to state to the House what has taken place. Shortly after the death of the Right Hon. Sir John Thompson, I think the day after the receipt of the news of his death, His Excellency the Governor General called upon the Hon. Mr. Bowell, who had been acting Prime Minister in the absence of Sir John Thompson, and after consultation with him, asked him to undertake the duty of forming a Government, and to that the Hon. Mr. Bowell acceded. His first step was to consult with his former colleagues, those who had held office under the late Premier; and the result of his consultation with them was that they all, without exception, signified to him their willingness to co-operate with him in every way—with one exception, which I may mention now, that of the hon. Minister of Militia, Mr. Patterson, who had before then expressed his desire to be relieved of the duties of the office as soon as possible, and who reiterated his request at the time; but through the persuasion of the Hon. Mr. Bowell, he consented to retain his position. The vacancy caused by the death of Sir John Thompson was filled by the appointment of Sir Hibbert Tupper, who was Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and who took the portfolio of Minister of Justice. The vacant seat in the Cabinet was filled by Mr. Dickey, member for Cumberland, who became a member of the Government and took the position of Secretary of State. On account of the position of Prince Edward Island, lying off from the mainland, somewhat isolated, it was thought well to have the advantage of the presence of a gentleman from that province in the councils of the country, and Sir Mackenzie Bowell was fortunate in securing the services of Senator Ferguson, who became a Minister without portfolio. Sir John Carling having intimated his desire to retire from the Ministry, he holding a position without portfolio, his request was acceded to, and the hon. member for Haldimand was asked to take a seat in the Cabinet, for the time being without portfolio, in place of Sir John Carling. Afterwards some changes were made. The hon. Secretary of State in the former Ministry took the position of Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and the position of Minister of Militia, which became vacant shortly afterwards by the retirement of Mr. Patterson, who again preferred the request he had made before to be allowed to retire, and whose resignation was accepted with regret by the Premier, was filled by the appointment of Mr. Dickey, who had first been appointed Secretary of State, and then the Hon. Mr. Montague was invited to take the position of Secretary of State. I think these explanations cover all the principal changes so far as I recollect them, and so far as I have been authorized to present them to the House. If there are any other questions the hon. gentleman desires to ask, I am prepared to answer them.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not think there would be any object whatever gained by asking the hon. gentleman for more information. This session the hon. gentleman and his colleagues are not anxious to give information. When a few days ago it became my duty to ask for these explanations, to which by right we are entitled in this House, the hon. gentleman told us that we were chock full of information already. The hon. gentleman has evidently just spoken in the same frame of mind; and it is manifest, from the manner in which he made his explanations, that if he had to speak at all he could not add anything to the treasury of knowledge we already possess in that line. The statement the hon. gentleman made was as bare, dry and non-committal as he could well make it; to make it less bare, less dry, and less non-committal the hon. gentleman would have required not to speak at all. I quite admit that the country was chock full of information on this subject, that we were well loaded up by the ministerial press; but after the character given to the ministerial press by the Minister of Justice, whom I regret very much not to see in his seat to-day, and by the Minister of Finance himself, it will not be a matter of surprise if we did not rely with implicit confidence on the information then supplied to us, and if we harboured the suspicion that while being loaded by the press, we had been loaded the wrong way. And what was a suspicion has become a certainty. From the statement given by the hon. Minister of Finance, it is clear and evident that what we were somewhat suspicious of before was correct, that as regards the formation of the Government the country was deceived in one most important particular, and in one most important respect, because the information now given by the hon. gentleman shows a very wide divergence from that given to the country at the time. The hon. gentleman has told the House to-day that His Excellency applied first to Mr. Bowell, now Sir Mackenzie Bowell, to assume the duty of forming an Administration. With this Her Majesty's Opposition has no objection at all to offer. Mr. Bowell had always been an important member of the Administration, in fact he was at the time of Sir John Thompson's death the oldest member, and I believe the only remaining colleague of Sir John Macdonald at the time of the formation of the Administration in 1878. That under such circumstances, he being one of the leading members of the party in power, His Excellency should apply to Mr. Bowell to form an Administration, was not unnatural. But what was told us by the press? That was not the statement given in the official organs. It was that another hon. gentleman, whom nobody expected to be called by His Excellency, had been called to form an Administration—the Hon. Frank Smith. Sir John Thompson died on 12th December; on the following day Mr. Bowell was called to form the Administration. On the following day the following despatch from Ottawa, which was evidently authorized and inspired, appeared in the ministerial newspapers :

Ottawa, December 14.—It has transpired to-day that previous to the calling of Hon. Mr. Bowell last night to form a ministry, His Excellency the Governor General sent for Sir Frank Smith and consulted with him as to the task of the formation of the new government. Sir Frank, while highly appreciating the honour, informed His Excellency that he had no ambition in that direction, and suggested that he should call on Hon. Mackenzie Bowell as the most suitable person to be entrusted with the task. In conversation with the "Gazette" correspondent to-night, Sir Frank Smith said :—"Yes, it is quite true that His Excellency did me the honour of consulting me with the forming of the new ministry, but I told him at once that I was not a candidate for the office of Premier, as it would not suit me. I then suggested that he should send for the acting Premier, Mr. Bowell. We had a long talk, but of course I don't feel at liberty to repeat what transpired. I think," continued Sir Frank, after a pause, "that I could not have given His Excellency better advice. I have known Mr. Bowell for a great many years, and although he has been a strong Orangeman and very earnest and outspoken in his views and opinions, as he has a perfect right to be, yet I have never known him to say an offensive word about Catholics, or to do anything which they could regard as offensive. I look upon him as an honest and fair-minded man, and I think the country will be quite safe in his hands."

From the statement given by the leader of the House to-day it appears that this was a most fallacious and mendacious paper. I am not surprised that it proved to have been false. It was perfectly incredible, as stated in the official organs of the Government, that His Excellency should have called on Sir Frank Smith to form an Administration. I do not intend to speak disrespectfully of Sir Frank Smith. I am glad to know, and I admit it, that Sir Frank is a man of ability in his own sphere—in his own sphere, I say, but politics or statesmanship or parliamentary government is not his own sphere. Sir Frank Smith has been a successful business man ; but I am not aware that he has ever given any special attention to politics. If Sir Frank Smith had known the elementary principles—I will not say the elementary principles, but the elementary proprieties of parliamentary government, he would not have gone blabbering as he did to newspaper reporters. If he had been officially consulted, which was not the case according to the statement of the hon. Premier made in the Senate and repeated by the leader of the House, he should have known that he should not disclose what passed between His Excellency and himself, without having first obtained His Excellency's assent. It is quite possible and indeed quite probable and it might happen that Sir Frank Smith had not been consulted, but had had a confidential conversation with His Excellency, a private interview; but to go as he did and exhibit his own self-sufficient importance was, to say the least of it, nothing short of an impertinent vulgarity. But, Mr. Speaker, in that impertinence there was design. It was done evidently to do service for the Conservative party. The design is found in the last words of the interview of Sir Frank Smith. It evidently dawned upon the minds of the wise men who surrounded Sir Mackenzie Bowell after he had been called to office—I say that it evidently became manifest to the wise men who surrounded him—that perhaps an impression might be entertained in some quarters that the orange colour was rather predominant in the formation of the new Cabinet. It is well known that Sir Mackenzie Bowell has been all his life an active member of the Orange order, a Past Grand Master.

An hon. MEMBER. Grand Sovereign.

Mr. LAURIER. It is well known that Sir Mackenzie Bowell has been all his life an active member of the Orange Order, and the Order was already well represented—not exactly in the Cabinet, but very close to the Cabinet—in the person of the present Grand Master, and evidently it was thought that so much orange colour in the new Cabinet made it offensive to some eyes, and it was supposed that it would be very, very clever, indeed, if it were given to the world that a prominent Roman Catholic had been called by His Excellency, and that that Roman Catholic, instead of accepting the honour for himself had given his certificate to the Past Orange Grand Master. It was thought it would be very clever, indeed, if it were made to look as if a little mixture of green was adjoined to so much orange colour. Well, Sir, I do not object ; nobody, I am sure, objects, that Sir Mackenzie Bowell and Sir Frank Smith should parade before the public their mutual admiration. But it becomes intolerably objectionable when these gentlemen attempt to cover their little political manoeuvres behind the name of His Excellency the Governor General. The Conservative party has been too long in the past in the habit of taking advantage even of the ordinary proprieties of parliamentary life to foster party ends and party purposes ; but when it comes to this, that falsehoods are invented, circulated, and published, and that the name of His Excellency is connected with these falsehoods, then, I say, it is high time that these proceedings should be branded, as they ought to be branded, with all the opprobrium which they deserve. I am sorry, for my part, Sir, that upon this occasion, the Minister of Justice is not in his seat. I have waited for some time because I thought that these explanations should not well take place in his absence. He is not here, and, therefore, I will not say a word of what I intended to say were he present. As to the other Cabinet changes to which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) referred. I have not much to say, because they are simply little family arrangements which concern gentlemen opposite, and as to which we have no observations to offer. I will only say this. It appears that my hon. friend the Secretary of State now occupies a situation which it had been supposed was reserved for one of the three gentlemen who have long been waiting, and patiently waiting, at the door of the Council chamber. If rumour is to be credited—I do not know as to that, for I may be wrongly informed, or I may be rightly informed—but, if rumour is to be credited, we are told that there was a rivalry between these three gentlemen as to which of them should enter the Cabinet first. But while they were disputing at the door, there happened what sometimes may happen under such circumstances: there stealthily came from behind another gentleman, the member for Haldimand, who, with one single jump, cleared over the heads of the Solicitor General, the Controller of Customs, and the Controller of Inland Revenue, and landed safe, and on his two feet, right in the Council chamber. This is, to say the least of it, an acrobatic feat which shows in that somewhat corpulent gentleman great agility and suppleness of limbs.

Mr. LEGRIS. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, before the order of the day is called, I would like to draw the attention of the Government, and especially of the French members of the Cabinet to the fact that the debates have not yet been published in French. After two weeks of session, and considering that the English version has already reached its one hundred and thirtieth column, we feel that we are not treated as we should be, because we have not yet received the French version.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, diverting again to the explanations which we have received from the leader of the House, I think it can scarcely be denied that these explanations—

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish to call the attention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Edgar) to the fact that a motion for the adjournment of the House having been negatived, and no intervening proceeding having taken place, there cannot be any other motion for adjournment. Let me point out what the rule is with regard to this matter:

In case of ministerial changes, explanations are generally allowed to be made in both Houses when Orders of the Day are called by the Speaker. When the Premier or member leading the Government in the House makes such explanations, it is usual to permit the leader of the Opposition to make some remarks on points arising out of the former speech. In fact, considerable latitude is allowed by the indulgence of the House on such occasions in the Canadian Commons. In the English Commons, it is irregular to permit any debate, after the ministerial statement has been made, unless some question is formally proposed to the House, and the same practice obtains in the Lords—a motion for the adjournment being made when a debate is expected.

Of course, if the House desires to hear hon. gentlemen continue this debate, I cannot prevent it, but I wish to point out what the rule is with regard to it.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I can appeal, I believe, to your own memory; for the twenty years that I have sat in Parliament, this debate has always been carried on upon the Orders of the Day being called. This has been done time and again, and we are simply following a practice which has been universal.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have not made any observation with regard to the speech of the leader of the Opposition. It is quite in order, I think, under our practice, but a general discussion seems to me to be entirely out of order on a matter of this kind.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It has gone on very frequently, Mr. Speaker. Your own recollection, as well as mine, will recall to your mind that considerable discussion on the question of ministerial explanations has been allowed.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have no objection at all, if the House desires it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will not dispute your ruling, more particularly as I suppose it will be very easy for my hon. friend (Mr. Edgar) to make any remarks he has to make as we are going into Committee of Supply.

Mr. LAURIER. I just point to the practice, and I simply ask your ruling on this, Mr. Speaker, so that we can be guided by it in the future. If you wish that we should stop here, we shall do so.

Mr. SPEAKER. My opinion—I only express my own opinion—is that after the leader of the House has given the ministerial explanations, it is quite in accordance with our practice that the leader of the Opposition should offer such observations as he chooses with regard to them, but if the debate is to be continued, it seems to me that the House must concur, practically unanimously, in the continuance of the debate, provided no motion can be made; and, as I have already pointed out, a motion for the adjournment of the House having been negatived, and no intermediate proceedings having taken place, another motion for adjournment cannot be made at this stage.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Will the leader of the House have an opportunity to explain his explanations? He has not been able to make them clear. He has overlooked a portion of the explanations which he should have given.

Mr. COCHRANE. If he did he would not be able to get it into your head.

Mr. LANDERKIN. There is no skim milk in it.

Mr. COCHRANE. Nor any brains either.

Mr. EDGAR. In accordance with your suggestion, Mr. Speaker, I shall not offer any observations just now, because I do not care to do so at the sufferance of the House. I will take an early opportunity to speak upon the subject again.

SUPPLY--MINISTERIAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. EDGAR. Before that motion is carried, I would like to say a word or two about the position of the Government. Certain explanations have been given as to the formation of the present Cabinet, which only appear to me to illustrate and emphasize the fact that the omissions from the present Cabinet are much more striking and conspicuous than the appointments which have been made to it. If I may be permitted, and I hope I can do so without offence, I would like to say that during the past few years, when so many changes have taken place in Cabinets, there has always been a fear among the members who sit to your left that they might be deprived at any moment of the services of an able and impartial speaker by his translation to a ministerial position of greater political activity; but, somehow or other, the Government have omitted to strengthen themselves in this way in the very province where, I think, they required strengthening the most.

There was a change in the Ministry, slurred over hastily in the explanations we have just heard, to which I would like to draw attention; I mean the omission from this Cabinet of the hon. member for London (Sir John Carling). The hon. gentleman has had a remarkable career in his time—a prominent career. He was a member of the Canadian Parliament ten years before confederation. The hon. First Minister of to-day was not a member of Parliament until confederation. The hon. member for London is, however, five years younger than the hon. First Minister; and while Sir John Macdonald ruled in Ontario the hon. member for London was his right hand man for that province. When Sir John Abbott formed his Government, he continued the hon. member for London in his office of Minister of Agriculture. Sir John Thompson deprived him of that position, but kept him in the Cabinet. It is hard to tell why the hon. member deserved that treatment, because in the meantime he had boldly resigned his seat in the Senate, and had contested the City of London, and caused himself to be elected, or at least returned, for that constituency. Now, the Experimental Farm was his hobby, and he was fond of his position; but that was taken away from him, and all that he received in place of it, so far as we know, was the barren honour of a third-class knighthood. But, Sir, he resented that treatment; he resented it in a very marked manner, because I find that although he occupied a seat in this House during the years 1893 and 1894, he, a Cabinet Minister, never once, according to "Hansard," opened his mouth during all that time within the walls of this Chamber. If that was not sulking in his tent, I do not know what was. However, it was reserved for his junior, a long way, in political experience, the present Prime Minister, to deal him the final blow, when he formed a Cabinet in which the hon. member for London had no lot nor part. How well he might quote these words about his colleagues:

'Tis all very well to dissemble their love,
But why did they kick me downstairs?

Mr. FOSTER. Is that original?

Mr. EDGAR. The application is original, because all this time the hon. gentlemen were expressing the highest esteem and affection for their colleague, and admiration for his political experience and the work he had done in London, especially; but still they kicked him downstairs.

Another vacancy has recently been created in the ranks of the old guard. The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Patterson), who I am sorry to see is not here, gave up his position. His colleagues also professed, and still profess, a great regard for him; but they put him on the shelf, and they propose, it is said, to reward him with the position of Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, of all places. Why, Sir, what sort of a welcome might a member of this Cabinet expect in Manitoba just now, considering the strained relations existing between Ottawa and Winnipeg? The hon. member for London can complain of being kicked downstairs, and, I think, the hon. member for West Huron has very just ground to complain that he is being kicked upstairs. Well, this gilded plum has fallen into the capacious lap of the hon. member for Haldimand. It is a high compliment to that hon. gentleman that although so comparatively young in politics and of short political experience compared with many others, he has been taken and placed over the heads of some sixty or seventy Conservative members in these two Houses of Parliament. It is a high honour to that gentleman, but what about the Controllers? Can it be that they are not in the line of promotion? Must they always, like the Peri, stand disconsolate outside of the gate of Eden? However, there are some compensating advantages in that position. One of the Controllers, at any rate, has felt himself entirely at liberty to seek consolation for his disappointment and relieve the bitterness of his heart by strong public condemnation of the policy of the Cabinet. And all the while, with commendable regularity, he is drawing his salary as a member of that Administration.

Then there is the Solicitor General. Is he, too, out of the line of promotion? Why, in England, when there is a vacancy in the office of the Attorney General, the Solicitor General, as a matter of invariable custom, gets the position. The Attorney General there is the same as the Minister of Justice here; but when the office of Minister of Justice became vacant, there was no promotion for the Solicitor General. I am the more surprised too, after the remarkable display of erudition by that hon. gentleman the other day, which we must all have noticed, when, in answering a question connected with the Department of Justice, he was so hypercritical, so remarkably skilled in the use of the English language that he had to confound the humble individual who is addressing you by refusing to accept the vernacular English which I used in asking the question. I had asked if a certain officer had been suspended or dismissed. The hon. Solicitor General said no, he was neither dismissed nor suspended, but he had been, by direction of the late Minister of Justice, relieved of his duties as deputy-warden pending inquiry. He was not suspended, however. I hope hon. gentlemen on this side will take note of that, and take their vocabulary from the Solicitor General, and do not forget to dot their i's and cross their t's when putting a notice on the paper. That is what the hon. gentleman said about the word "suspended," but what about the dismissal? He said the official was not dismissed. Yet this is what happened to that official, according to the same answer: "He was afterwards, by minute of His Excellency in Council of the 24th October last, retired from office without prejudice to consideration for re-employment in the penitentiary service." He was retired from office by Order in Council, but he was not suspended or dismissed.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Is his pay going on?

Mr. EDGAR. I do not know about that. Perhaps the Solicitor General will explain. What a slight was cast by the appointment of the hon. member for Haldimand upon all these stalwart Tories of Toronto who have been, again and again, and yet again, following their leaders, like a flock of sheep, into the party fold. I am talking of the electors, of course, yet all these electors must bow to the wisdom of the decision of Sir Mackenzie Bowell, even though he decided that all the military glory which reflects so much lustre on the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Denison), and the high financial standing of the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn), and the ponderous legal light of the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) must count for nothing, but must all pale their ineffectual fires before the beams of the rising sun of the member for Haldimand.

Again, Sir, what has become of the claim of my hon. friend, the gallant member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale)? What has become of the still more long-standing and well-understood claims of the distinguished surgeon-general from Cornwall (Mr. Bergin)? Sir, what has become of the claim to the appointment of Minister of Agriculture, so well understood, so often expressed, by the other front row statesman over there, the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule)? Then we turn to the Senate, where it was expected that that old war-horse from Niagara, Senator McCallum, would have had promotion at last into the Cabinet. Why, to my certain knowledge that hon. gentleman has for the last thirty years carried on a hard fight in Niagara, and at great expenditure of substance too. And is this the reward of all his efforts? Then there is another senator, the hon. gentleman from Hamilton (Mr. Sanford), who seems to be overlooked in this arrangement. I cannot say that the hon. gentleman has engaged in personal election contests himself, but he has certainly received the credit of being very liberal in supplying the sinews of war to others who have engaged in those contests. We should also remember this, that he must have suffered a great deal of anguish of heart when he tore himself away from all his old political friends, the Liberals, in Hamilton just before he was appointed to the Senate. There is this, however, to be said about him, that if he does not get promotion to the Cabinet, it is pretty well understood that he might be prevailed upon to accept whatever modest share on the next Queen's Birthday honours may fall to his portion.

Now, there is the new Minister of Militia (Mr. Dickey). I am sorry he is not here, but we all know that, like the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), he has shown occasional fits of independence in this House. But now his days of kicking are over. He is harnessed to the plough, and he must keep in the traces. He must pull straight in the furrow or get turned out to grass again, and I predict that though he will kick and squirm a good deal this session, he will take his medicine like a man, and we will find him at the end of the session in the position he now occupies. Such is the soothing effect of office.

Now, I am very sorry indeed that the Minister of Justice is not in his place to-day. Still I really thing that the circumstances connected with his position are of such very great public interest that I will refer to them. That has been called, in some of the newspapers, a bolt from the blue; perhaps it may be more correctly described as a bolt from the Bleus. Now, so far, I have been referring only to actual Cabinet changes, but not to mere Cabinet tricks, where the performer is bound hand and foot in a Cabinet, and in that Cabinet makes a great deal of noise for the benefit of the public, and, shortly afterwards, is found in the same Cabinet, bound as tight as he was before. Towards the end of last March, the ministerial press announced the resignation of the Minister of Justice. The Ottawa "Citizen," the home organ of the Government, announced it. The Montreal "Gazette," the Montreal organ of the Government, announced it. The Toronto "World," the junior organ of Toronto, and under the immediate direction of my hon. friend the member for East York (Mr. Maclean), announced it. The Toronto "Mail and Empire," the amalgamated, purified, sanctified, senior organ of the Government in Toronto, also announced it. And the St. John "Sun" also, I am told, and, I suppose, all the other Government papers that I did not see, followed suit.

The Montreal "Gazette," at the same time, lectured the hon. Minister of Justice in good round terms. It "deplored that he should suddenly choose to play the role of Lord Randolph Churchill, and throw up his cards." The correspondent of the Toronto "Mail and Empire" also referred to the matter in a similar way. Speaking of the resignation, he said:

This, it is said, is not the first time he has threatened to step down and out when his ideas were not acted upon, and that there are in the Cabinet some who look with disfavour upon the appearance of dictation from the young Minister of Justice.

Then, the "Mail and Empire" went on to say:

It happens that a bye-election will shortly take place in Antigonish—

And it was so far astray as to go on:

—when an opportunity will be afforded for the entrance of a new man from that province to fill the vacancy.

So that they provided, entirely to their own satisfaction, not only for the Minister of Justice going out, but for some one else coming in.

Can there be a shadow of doubt in any one's mind that these attacks upon the Minister of Justice were inspired by those whom the "Mail and Empire" describes as "those in the Cabinet who look with disfavour upon the appearance of dictation from the young Minister of Justice"? If the Minister of Justice does not recognize the handiwork of his colleagues, every one else does. Now, this was by no means the only obituary notice which the Minister of Justice received at the hands of his friends. The Toronto "World," with great enterprise, published a cartoon which I hold in my hand. In it the Minister of Justice is represented with his head laid upon a pillow, a bandage marked "sore" being bound about his head; and, towering above him is the stalwart form of the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), who is called "the man for the place." In the same cartoon is a letter, purporting to be signed by "Public Opinion":

Dear Charley,—

I wonder whom they can mean by that?

Dear Charley,—If your head still troubles you, and you do not feel like going back to the office at present, do not let it worry you; I have a man in view who can fill your place very nicely.

Yours truly,

PUBLIC OPINION.

And there is the man in view, a man in our view to-day, the hon. member for Albert, who came to the rescue of the Minister of Finance to-day just as if he was already the Minister of Justice.

Why, Sir, what happened? Just what his colleagues who turned the party sleuth-hounds of the press upon him knew would happen—he returned to office with great humility. Sir Mackenzie Bowell's triumph was complete and, to use the language of another cartoon in the same issue of the "World," "the cat came back." Naughty newspaper boys had been pelting it; the roofs where it had wandered were lonely and cold, and it came back meekly, glad to be allowed to lie down again behind the kitchen stove, and ready to purr gratefully whenever its masters might be good enough to stroke it, or give it a saucer of milk.

And, Mr. Speaker, there are wars and rumours of wars in the Cabinet, and about the Cabinet. If walls had tongues, as they are said to have ears, what a magnificent harvest of gossip the Ottawa newspaper correspondents would have if they walked through and appealed to the walls of the Cabinet chamber. The echoes of fierce disputes are there, as they are through the town. And I must say that the partisans of the different gladiators stick up staunchly for their men. For instance, the partisans of the hon. Minister of Public Works will not for a moment admit that in any of these fierce struggles for principle which sometimes go on in Cabinet councils, as we know, he was ever floored by the Minister of Railways. And, Sir, to borrow a simile from my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), everybody can see he has not got a "haggard" look upon his countenance. But, Sir, his supporters can point, at any rate, with triumph to the evidence of his skill and statesmanship when, a short time ago, he unloaded a horde of friends and relations to fatten and batten upon the Curran bridge at the expense of the Department of Railways, that very Curran bridge affair bringing disgrace upon the Minister of Railways as an administrator. I do not wonder that the friends of the Minister of Public Works are proud of his achievement. Then, Sir, on the other hand the admirers of the Minister of Railways staunchly maintain that in disputes, arguments—could I say arguments ad hominem?—that arise in the Cabinet councils, the Minister of Railways is ready and willing, to use a metaphor borrowed from the sporting newspapers, to handle his opponents without gloves. Now, Mr. Speaker, is this the Cabinet that is going to lead the Conservative party through the rugged crisis of a general election? Why, Sir, without any disrespect to the hon. gentlemen, I would like to recall for a moment the names of some members of former Conservative Cabinets since confederation, whom we have had leading the Conservative party in this House and in this Parliament. Let me mention the names of a Cartier, of a Galt, of a Hincks, of a Macdonald, of a Macdougall, of a Tilley, of a Tupper, of a Howe, of a Campbell, of an Abbott and of a Thompson. And may I ask, Who fill their places to-day? Comparisons are so odious that I will not make them on this occasion; but, Sir, what more is this than a scratch team brought together under a second-class captain? How can they expect to win against champions from all the provinces who, not only in this House, but in the provinces, have ranged themselves under a great and brilliant leader, and who, whenever the Government choose to bring on the elections are ready for the fray?

Mr. LANDERKIN. I would like to say a few words on this important question. I would like to get the attention of the Minister of Railways for a moment. I always like the audience to look me in the face. I do not like to drive them into exile. I am, however, scarcely prepared to speak on this subject, because I have not had time to count the Ministers this session. They are getting so numerous, it takes a good while to do it. I do not know how many have salaries, and how many have portfolios, and how many are without portfolios. Some who have not portfolios are not in, and some who have portfolios are in. I think in some way or another, nearly all of them have emoluments in some form—I hope they have. Now it is a singular thing that the Government have ignored, in their explanations, one who has held a portfolio, or has had a seat in the Cabinet without portfolio for so many years, one who has been a strong prop and a strong stay to that party—I refer to Sir Frank Smith. They would parade him through the papers, and put his name in the mouth of His Excellency, but when they come to the House, they desert him and state that he was not in it, that he had never been consulted. It is all very well, he is only Irish, and apparently they have no feelings. You can kick them about as a football, and use them as you will, but when the explanations are given, he was not there at all. Why did they put his name into the mouth of the press of Ontario, and into the mouth of His Excellency, and never say a word about him in this House? Is Sir Frank Smith a ball or a kite that they can play with? Is it because of the peculiarity of his race that they can treat him as they please? Now I notice that their friends held a convention in a very important constituency, in the county of Grey—you all know that is very important—it was not in the riding that I represent, which is the most important. I may tell you, but it was in the North Riding of Grey. They had a convention, and here is what the Liberal-Conservative Association declared:

It was moved and seconded, that this association hereby express its thanks to the Hon. Sir Frank Smith for recommending the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell to the Governor General as Premier of Canada.

The people in the country are willing to thank him, but the Minister of Finance, in his explanations, does not name him. He slights him, ignores him, passes him by without a word, but is willing that their followers in the country shall put it on record at their conventions that Mackenzie Bowell now reigns through the grace of Sir Frank Smith. That is the position he occupies, but to-day they ignore him, and have not a word to say about him. Now as to the position in the Senate, as to the characteristic ability that has marked the members of the Cabinet in the Senate, as to those they have taken in and those they have left out, there is some consolation, as my hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) says, to Senator Ferguson of Niagara. When the ribbons were passed round, he was not one of those entrusted with a department. But there was something to console him, because Senator Ferguson from Prince Edward Island was given a seat in the Cabinet without portfolio. If they could not give it to Senator Ferguson from Niagara, why, he would be a very unreasonable senator if he was not satisfied when they gave it to another senator of the same name. How absurd it is to suppose for a moment that he would feel unkindly at being thus passed over. Now the Minister of Railways looks more beaming this session than he did last session. He has had his way, to a certain extent, in the formation of the Cabinet, and it is just as well, I think, that the House should understand the reason—he has now a spring chicken in the Cabinet. He is very fond of chickens, and he smiles whenever that rooster crows. It was very painful for him to pass over the heads of all those who have given long and faithful services in the House, and to supplant the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Patterson) by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague). They all love the hon. member for Huron so much, every one of them, and in giving their explanations, how sorry they are to part with him, they express deep regret for his health. It is sad to think of it, a young man obliged by the state of his health to retire from the Cabinet. And to think that it was a spring chicken that crowded him out! And the man that they loved so much, that they prized so much, that they valued so highly for his able services to the Crown—he has gone out, and they are all so very sorry that he has gone. Now, there is another thing. Of all the old names, of all those who have fought for their country and their party in Nova Scotia, when we look over the districts, and look at the men, and look at the character and ability of those who have been here for a long time, we wonder that in the distribution of favours by the Cabinet, some of them are not recognized. Mr. Dickey was taken in. I would not say a word against Mr. Dickey; he has only been here a short time, while there are others from that province who have been here a long time. In an interview it was stated that he was a relation of the Tupper's, and that was one reason why he got into the Government. But the hon. gentleman disowned that allegation, and said he was only related to Lady Tupper—and that was one of the reasons, as it appears, why he was super-added over the heads of older statesmen in the country. But let me say a word as to the members for Toronto. Think of Toronto, with a population of 200,000, the centre of law and commerce, and everything else in the province of Ontario, represented by men of ability—a nice place for Ministers to go for an outing, for they are finely entertained by the city, but Toronto, ever since I have been in this House, has been as dumb as an oyster. It never speaks through its representatives; it is singular how Toronto, in all its career, has friends only on this side of the House, indeed, the only prestige it gets is from members sitting on this side. Of course, there are many members sitting in the House to-day who live in Toronto, and they obtained distinction in their different fields, but they do not seem to be in favour with this Government. It does seem singular how the great centres are passed over. There is the great centre of Montreal. That centre appears to be well satisfied if it gets a Minister in the outside service, it is satisfied with a Solicitor General; and a suburb of Toronto gets a representative in the outside service as Controller of Customs. The Controller, I understand, has constitutional questions on hand at the present time. I understand he has been consulting constitutional authorities; this is owing to certain movements that are contemplated; but I have not any fear of the Controller, so long as the salary holds out.

The constitution will never break him, it will never cause him to be rash; there are five thousand golden reasons why he will not forego his position. After all, that is a nice commingling of Roman punch and Orange marmalade over there on the Treasury benches. The Government seems to be formed more on that principle than on any business principle—that is the business basis on which it is formed, and it is the basis on which the last two Governments were formed. This was never so apparent under Sir John Macdonald's administration. But I might as well tell some of their own friends this—get into one or other wigwam as quickly as possible. It does not matter about your parliamentary experience, but get into one of the wigwams, get the catch word or pass word, whatever the Controller or Solicitor General calls it, and it will be all right. Sometime, when I have leisure, I will prepare a speech and deliver it to the House, showing the number who have portfolios, the number who have not portfolios, and I will give a short sketch of their life and times. It will be very interesting reading, if I can only make it readable; it will only be my fault if it is not interesting, because the subject is an interesting one to follow.

Mr. CASEY. The so-called explanation which came from the Minister of Finance recalls to us the phrase used, I think, by Tallyrand, who said language was given to man for the purpose of concealing his thoughts. In this case, language seems to have been given to the Minister of Finance, not only for the purpose of concealing his thoughts, but also of concealing the facts that should have been explained by him on this occasion. The hon. gentleman passed over the consultation that must have taken place between His Excellency and Sir Frank Smith, and he also passed over a number of other important points. The hon. gentleman has not told the House how it was that Sir Mackenzie Bowell, rather than himself, was chosen to be the leader of the new Administration. No doubt, Sir Mackenzie was the senior member, in years, but I think I am stating what is constitutionally correct, when I say the position of Minister of Finance is a senior position in the Government to that of Minister of Commerce. Why was it that the leading member of those who survived was not called on to form the Administration? Perhaps some light may be thrown on this by a casual remark, a jocular remark of the late Sir John Thompson at the Board of Trade banquet in Toronto some years ago. Referring to the Finance Minister, who was beside him, he referred to him as "my friend Cassius." We are not all as well read in Shakespeare as we were when we were boys, and it may not be out of place to recall the words referred to in that illustration given by the late Sir John Thompson.

Antony and Caesar were talking about Cassius, and Caesar says to Antony, after referring to the cause :

Let me have men about me that are fat ;
Sleek-headed men, and such as sleep o' nights.

Let me interrupt Shakespeare for a moment, to suggest that it was from this point of view that His Excellency called in as an adviser, in a confidential manner, if not as constitutional adviser, Sir Frank Smith. Sir Frank filled the bill in that respect. Caesar goes on to say :

Yond Cassius has a lean and hungry look ;
He thinks too much ; such men are dangerous.

Antony says :

Fear him not, Caesar, he's not dangerous ;
He is a noble Roman, and well given.

In that respect Sir Frank Smith would again have filled the bill, but Caesar it not satisfied. He says :

Would he were fatter. But I fear him not ;
Yet if my name were liable to fear,
I do not know the man I should avoid
So soon as that spare Cassius.

* * * * *

He loves no plays.

As thou dost, Anthony ; he hears no music ;
Seldom he smiles ; and smiles in such a sort
As if he mocked himself, and scorned his spirit
That could be moved to smile at anything.
Such men as he be never at heart's ease
Whiles they behold a greater than themselves.
And therefore are they very dangerous ?

It may be that His Excellency, or who ever suggested to His Excellency the choice between Mr. Bowell and the Finance Minister as the leader of the new Government, may have had Shakespeare in his mind, may have thought that the Finance Minister filled the role of Cassius better than he would have filled the role of Premier, that if he were chosen to lead the party, some future friend of a dead Caesar might say of that politically dead leader :

Look, in this place ran Cassius' dagger through.

However, it may be, we have Cassius in this House and the Premier in the other Chamber, and, in my opinion, any disadvantage from appointing the Finance Minister as Premier would have been largely balanced by the advantage of having the Premier on the floor of this House. We should not have the Premier in the Senate. Matters are constantly coming up in this House which require the master's eye, and which require information which only the master can give. He should be here in the face of those who alone can turn him out of power or maintain him in power, and not in the lotus eater's valley at the other end of this building, where it is always afternoon, they never sit in the evening. My hon. friends who have preceded me referred to the rejection of Sir John Carling from the Cabinet, and in that connection to the proper filling of the position of Minister of Agriculture. We certainly do miss the genial face of Sir John Carling from the Cabinet benches. We have missed him from his place in the House this session altogether, although he has been present in the city, and perhaps the reason of his absence is that he does not feel as heartily as formerly towards those who have given him the cold shoulder. If it were found necessary to omit Sir John Carling from the Cabinet, I think the change in the Ministry of Agriculture suggested by my hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), that of giving the portfolio to the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), would have been a good one. If we are to have a Minister of Agriculture who has the misfortune to be a protectionist and a Tory, we should at all events have one who has some knowledge of agriculture, such as we may expect from the member for East Grey. We think he would make a much better Minister of Agriculture than the Quebec lawyer who at present fills that position, with all respect to the hon. gentleman in question. Reference has been made also to the admission of the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) into the Cabinet as Secretary of State, and my hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) seems to be at a loss to know why he (Mr. Montague) was taken in. Well, Sir, it is not hard to see why the hon. member was taken in, first without a portfolio, and afterwards with a portfolio. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Edgar) ought to know that the present Secretary of State has the qualification of all others which is specially lacking amongst his colleagues, and that is that he can actually make a speech, and a stump speech at that. I do not say "speeches" for I have never heard from him more than one speech during one campaign, or more than one speech during a session of the House ; but at all events he can make a speech, and he can put some humour in it, and he can hold the attention of the House and elicit cheers and smiles and laughter, and sighs, perhaps, also, and that is a thing which no other member of the Cabinet seems qualified to do unless it be the Finance Minister himself. You may be sure, Sir, that in a Cabinet where speaking ability is so extremely conspicuous for its absence, the ability to make a good tea meeting, camp meeting, stump speech, is a qualification which will bring its full price. It has brought a good price in the case of the new Secretary of State. I do not see why my hon. friend from Ontario (Mr. Edgar) was so obtuse as not to recognize that that was at least one reason why the member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) was admitted into the Cabinet. Another reason may be connected with his professional ability. The Minister of Finance complained that during the debate on the Address the leader of the Opposition had said nothing from which anybody could make up a prescription that he could get filled at a political drug store. Now, Sir, we plead guilty to that indictment. It is not our business on this side of the House to make prescriptions which are to be filled at a political drug store. It is, however, quite different on the other side of the House. Their policy has been one of prescriptions to be filled at a political drug store for years back. What medicine has been more commonly shoved down the throats of the electors of this country, what medicine has been better advertised, beyond Williams' Pink Pills and Paine's Celery Compound, than the well-known "Foster's specifics." I hope I am not breaking the privileges of Parliament in using a name which happens to be similar to that of the Minister of Finance. But we have heard of "Foster's specifics" in the political world as a sure cure for all ills that might be remedied by tariff changes. There are specifics for the woollen trade, specifics for the cotton trade, specifics for the iron trade and others too numerous to mention. The Government may have retained the professional services of the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) for the concoction of these specifics, and so he was admitted to full standing in the Cabinet. The position of the Controllers has been alluded to, and it has been alluded to in a jocular vein, and, indeed, it is rather hard to avoid alluding to their position in that vein, when we see them like so many good little boys sitting upon the door steps of their father's mansion waiting for the crumbs that fall from the Council chamber after luncheon, and waiting for the prospect of being admitted within the charmed precincts when they are fully grown up. But, Mr. Speaker, there is a serious side to it after all. The Controller of Customs, for example, wields all the power that used to be wielded by the Minister of Customs. He is one of the most important executive officers in this country. He is, besides this, at the head of an organization—I believe his proper title is, the Supreme Grand Sovereign of the Orange Society—which is at daggers drawn with the Administration of the day on the most recent point of its policy, and one of the most important points of its policy. Here is this gentleman constantly receiving resolutions from Orange lodges stating that they will resist by moral and material assistance the enforcement of the ministerial policy in the province of Manitoba, if it is enforced. Yet that hon. gentleman sits upon the door-steps and picks up the crumbs, swallows them, and digests them at his leisure. He might well consult constitutional authorities as to whether he can honestly sit as a member of the Government, even though not a member of the Cabinet, while his views are diametrically opposed to the opinions of his colleagues. But, whatever information he may get from constitutional authorities, the fact remains that it is a political and moral scandal for that gentleman to receive the salary of a member of a Government while he is known not to be in harmony with the most important feature of its recent political policy. It will be for him to explain his position to the Orange lodges to whom he owes his entry into public life, and any prominence he has since obtained in public life, and to explain to his constituents, to this House, and to the country at large, what reasons he can properly find for such a scandalous position as he now finds himself in. Sir, there is one other point on which, before I sit down, I wish to ask for ministerial explanations. It does not concern changes in the Cabinet, but it is a point upon which I wish to give the Government the earliest possible opportunity to explain themselves. It appears that rumours have got about that the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) has been asking for a senatorship. That hon. gentleman appears to have written to the Government to clear him from that imputation, and a letter is published, addressed to him, as follows:—

Privy Council Office,
Ottawa, April 2, 1895.

A. McNeill, Esq., M.P.

My dear McNeill,—I have no doubt you have seen, as I have, notices in the papers that you had been or were to be offered a senatorship. I know of no man in the Commons whom I would rather see elevated to the honourable and responsible position of a senator than yourself; but the rumour must have been set afloat by persons having some ulterior object in view, as no such offer has been made, nor has it been considered. Certainly, a senatorship was never asked for by you, either directly or indirectly. Moreover, such a step is precluded for the present by the fact that there are no vacancies that have not long since been promised.

Sincerely yours,
MACKENZIE BOWELL.

Now, Sir, there are ten senatorships vacant—for the divisions of Trent, Ontario; Rougemont, Quebec; Sunbury, N.B.; DeSalaberry, Quebec; London, Ontario; Bedford, Quebec; Inkerman, Quebec; two in New Brunswick, and one in Nova Scotia; and we have here a letter published over the signature of Sir Mackenzie Bowell that all these vacancies have already been promised. This is a point on which, I think, we have a right to ask for ministerial explanations. As we have not the Premier in this House to ask about them, we must ask the hon. gentleman who represents the Government here, the hon. Minister of Finance, to tell us who the gentlemen are who carry about appointments of senatorships in their pockets. Are they members of this House of Commons? Are they candidates in the ministerial interests in the different constituencies, who are promised that if they fail to be elected to this House, they will be shelved in the other? Are they men who have contributed or are expected to contribute to party funds? Who are these ten gentlemen who have been promised the ten vacancies, and when are the appointments going to be made?

Mr. LAURIER. Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, there is another matter to which I desire to call the attention of the hon. leader of the House. We are now called upon to vote to Her Majesty the supplies which, in the opinion of the Administration, will be required to carry on the public service; and we have a right to expect that the hon. gentleman, before he proceeds with the Estimates, will declare whether or not these Estimates constitute the whole intended expenditure for the year. In former years, the Opposition have protested, though not sufficiently, I am sorry to say, against the practice of the Government of bringing down, in addition to the Estimates, resolutions involving the country in large expenditures, amounting sometimes to several millions of dollars. This is altogether a wrong practice. The hon. gentleman is aware, as I am, that the only constitutional method which can be pursued in this matter is for the hon. Minister of Finance, when he brings down his Budget, to lay before Parliament a statement of the whole expenditure which he intends to ask from Parliament during the session. As we are now going into Supply, I think it would be well for us to revert to the sound practice of hearing from the hon. gentleman whether the Estimates now brought down constitute the whole expenditure which is to be asked of Parliament. Not more than five or six weeks ago, we had it from the hon. Minister of Finance that the Government, by an Order in Council, passed only at that date, had pledged the credit of the Government to an expenditure of not less than $2,500,000 in the shape of a subsidy to the Hudson Bay Railway. Now, I do not at all hesitate to say that such an Order in Council, passed under such circumstances, is one of the most flagrant constitutional outrages that ever was perpetrated by any Government of any country. Why, Sir, a statute was passed only a few years ago, granting aid to that company towards the construction of the Hudson Bay Railway, under certain terms which, up to the present time, have not been carried out; and, in the face of the letter and spirit of that statute, the Government take upon themselves to pass an Order in Council altogether at variance with the terms then agreed to by Parliament, and promising an expenditure of not less than $2,500,000 for the same purpose. The Government have not dealt fairly with the House in that respect. When we asked for information with regard to that matter, the hon. gentleman did not give us the frank and clear answer which we had a right to expect from him, but he rather equivocated—he did not know what the terms of the Order in Council were. Strange to say, he apparently forgot all about this Order in Council, which was to grant so large an amount, and which must have been fresh in his memory. Now, are we to have this expenditure imposed upon the country or not? This is the proper time to ask this question, when the hon. gentleman proposes that the House shall go into Committee of Supply. We are face to face with a very serious situation in this country. We have a deficit which my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) expects to be not less than six millions of dollars. Even if his figures be controverted, we know that there is a very large deficit which we have to meet. Now, this is another reason why, without going any further, I call upon the hon. gentleman to tell us whether the whole of the expenditure which is to be brought down is contained in these Estimates. I do not speak of the Supplementary Estimates, which are supposed to be within a moderate sum and which the House will be prepared to vote under any circumstances. But apart from that, I would like to know whether or not we are going to have any more demands made upon us.

Mr. FOSTER. I think my hon. friend is asking me a question in advance of the time. I have already announced to the House, in answer to a question from the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) that I propose to make the Budget speech on Friday. On that day I shall be prepared to state as frankly and fully as the hon. gentleman can wish what we propose to do, so far as expenditures are concerned, and to explain generally the financial condition of the country and what we propose to do in the future. At present I am not prepared to say what measures will or will not be brought down, which may involve some expenditure over and above what may be provided for in these Estimates. I am not called upon, I think, either to say at this date whether or not additional Estimates will be brought down. These are matters which pertain properly to the exposition of the Budget, and on that day they will be very fairly, and I think very fully, taken up. I am not indisposed, however, to say to my hon. friend, so far as these Estimates are concerned, that they contain all the Estimates that will be brought down for 1895-96. It has been the custom heretofore to bring down the main Estimates and follow them up with Supplementary Estimates for the services for the coming year. That, I hope, will not be followed this year. These Estimates include all the sums that will be provided for the different services mentioned for the year 1895-96. I am quite prepared to make that statement, although I am not called upon properly to do so before the exposition of the Budget. With reference to other matters that may hereafter engage the attention of the Government and which may, if the House thinks proper to pass them, involve expenditure, I am not prepared to state at this moment whether any such will be brought down or not. The hon. gentleman was very strong in characterizing my course with reference to the Hudson Bay matter. He said that I equivocated. I did not. All my desire was to give full and complete information to the House. I quite understood the general tenor of the Order in Council which had been passed with reference to the Hudson Bay Railway. But there were some points I did not have in my mind, and I preferred to refresh my memory before giving an answer which might not be complete. The papers have been called for and will be brought down; and when they are, my hon. friend will find that he has gone too far in criticising the action of the Government as he has done. The Government has done nothing that any constitutional Government responsible to Parliament has not a perfect right to do. When the papers come down, my hon. friend will be in a position to judge better, and his criticism will, I am sure, be better tempered and more just than it has been to-day.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I trust the hon. member will in that case give us the papers at the time he makes his financial statement.

Mr. FOSTER. They will come down, I think, to-morrow.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. For the rest, I think my hon. friend will be justified in accepting the explanation of the Finance Minister, which I understand to be this—and I repeat it because I desire there should be no misunderstanding. I understand that the hon. Minister of Finance, in the first place, does not intend to bring down any Supplementary Estimates for the service of 1895-96. That is a very proper thing on which I congratulate him heartily, and in which I renew, if it be of any value to him, the expression of my desire to support him against any assaults on the treasury, either from this side of the House or from that. As to the still more important statement which he has made, that also, I think, is a step in the right direction, and I trust that he will fully redeem the pledge he has now given, and will lay before us, when making his Budget speech, a full and frank statement, as he says, of all the liabilities which we will be called upon to incur. I am sure my hon. friend will receive that pledge with the satisfaction I do, and I trust we will not have the slightest occasion to criticise the way the hon. gentleman fulfils it. There is, however, another matter to which I may as well take the opportunity of calling the hon. gentleman's attention. Bearing in mind that this is the very last of April, it would be well—because I presume the hon. gentleman must be by this time perfectly well aware of the needs of the country—that he should bring down any Supplementary Estimates that may be required for the services of the current year now about to expire.

Mr. FOSTER. I am trying to get them down before the Budget.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That also is satisfactory. I may, however, take the opportunity of calling the hon. gentleman's attention to the Governor General's warrants. The total amount of these is not very large.

Mr. FOSTER. Very small.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It ought to be small. The Governor General's warrants, in my opinion, were very gravely abused some years ago. I do not say that they were abused by the hon. gentleman, for I think he has been more correct in the issuing of them than were his predecessors, but they have been very gravely abused indeed, and it was becoming a perfect scandal that large sums of money, not voted by Parliament, were being expended under Governor General's warrants, in circumstances utterly in defiance both of the spirit and the letter of the law. On the present occasion the amount is not very large, but I noted one thing which seems to me to border, to say the least of it, on unconstitutionality. That is that two of those warrants were for sums of $80,000, or nearly $80,000, and the bulk of them were issued the day Parliament met. That may be technically within the law, but I doubt whether it was ever intended to defer the issuing of Governor General's warrants until the day Parliament met. If the urgency was such as to call for warrants, it would be better to obtain the authority from Parliament for granting such urgent supplies. As far as I remember two of these were dated 18th April.

Mr. FOSTER. One, I think.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Two, I think. However, whether one or two, the principle is the same. The child is not a very large one, but at the same time I do not think the baby should have been there. It is far better, if emergencies do occur close to the meeting of Parliament, instead of using that special provision of the Governor General's warrants, to obtain—and the House is usually reasonable in such cases—the grant from the House. These warrants are intended to meet unforeseen expenses occurring when Parliament is not in session, but when you wait until two hours before Parliament meets—because I take it these were passed at the Council immediately preceding the meeting of Parliament—it would be far better not to use the Governor General's warrant for such purposes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The explanation of the Minister of Finance will, I think, be received with general satisfaction. If I understand it rightly, and I desire to be clear upon the point, we will be enabled to enter upon the discussion of the Budget with full knowledge of all the appropriations which the Government propose to ask from Parliament for the services of the year 1895-96. That I understood from the hon. gentleman, and that certainly is very satisfactory. But I did not quite gather from the hon. gentleman that when making his financial statement he would assure Parliament that Parliament would not be asked to pledge the credit of the country to any liabilities further than those stated in the Budget speech.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not intend to say that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) We will be therefore in this position, that while the hon. gentleman will state to the House all the moneys that he intends asking for the services of the year 1895-96, it will still be open to him, consistently with his explanation to-day, to bring down, as has been done during the past years, within the last few days of the session, when everybody is weary and most of the members are going home, railway appropriations running up into millions. Now, Sir, I want to ask the hon. gentleman if he intends to turn over a new leaf in that respect, and receive our congratulations on doing so, as he has done with regard to the bringing down of the Supplementary Estimates? So far as he has gone he has done well, and, as my hon. friend has said, will receive the support and approval of every member on this side of the House. But it is desirable, very desirable, that he should go further. It is intolerable that after this House has been in session two, or perhaps three or four months, the Government should come down with resolutions appropriating sums of money for this railway and that railway and pledging the credit of the country to an amount as, for instance, last session, of upwards of four million dollars. I remember that after I had remained here as long as my health permitted—after serving here for four months I was broken down in health and had to go home—I left without the slightest knowledge that the Government intended to bring down these resolutions. But, some time after that, down they came with a demand of three or four million dollars. I do not understand that the hon. gentleman has given any promise in that regard, and I would like to understand from him what his position is in the matter. The hon. gentleman knows that it will be impossible to carry on the discussion of the Estimates and pass them through the House with reasonable facility if it is felt that the Government are keeping back from the members knowledge of the fact that they intend at the last moment to ask the House to pledge the country for enormous sums for these railway subsidies. The hon. gentleman will see that, to be consistent, he must begin a reasonable course with regard to the subsidies, as he has done with regard to the Estimates. If he does not do so, it will be impossible for him to ask the gentlemen on this side of the House to give him those facilities for the voting of the supplies that he might otherwise be entitled to ask. I do not think the hon. gentleman should ask to go into supplies without giving an explanation upon that point. Now, passing from the question of the railway subsidies to private corporations, I understand the hon. gentleman to say that all the grants and votes which the Government intend to ask Parliament to give for the building of Government railways are to be found in the appropriations brought down. This will be a matter of surprise in some portions of the Dominion. I can speak particularly of Prince Edward Island. A gentleman who has received the proper certificate of fitness for the Senate, having been twice rejected by the people at the polls, has been taken—

Mr. FOSTER. It showed very bad taste on the part of the people.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Twice rejected by enormous majorities—I believe there are few men in the maritime provinces against whom larger majorities have been recorded. But, Sir, this gentleman was taken into the Government, without portfolio. He deemed it his duty to hold public meetings in different parts of the province, at which meetings he was accompanied by a brother senator. He came there as a member of the Government and called large public meetings to discuss, among other things, the extension of the Prince Edward Island Railway by the construction of what is known as the Southern Railway. Resolutions were passed at these meetings calling upon the Government to build the road, and the people were led to believe—without any direct statement made by the member of the Government—that the Government would, at an early day, prepare plans for this purpose. The elections were then supposed to be coming on, and from one end of the country to the other through which the proposed railway passes meetings were held and the public mind was agitated and the people were led to believe that this road was to be built, and, mind you, at the earliest moment, Parliament was going to appropriate the money for this purpose. Well, Sir, every public man who did not give his full consent and approval to this proposal was denounced as an enemy of Prince Edward Island. Some of us waited very patiently to see how far the pre-election promises of these gentlemen would be implemented by the Government, of which Senator Ferguson was a member. And to-day, Sir, we have the Estimates brought down, and we are told that they are the total and represent all the appropriations that the Government intend to ask for for 1895-96, and not a word in it, not a dollar, for the Southern Railway in Prince Edward Island, which, just before the election, was about to be constructed. I call the attention of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Macdonald)—who has received re-nomination for that county in the Conservative interest—to this interesting point. He put a notice on the Order paper the other day of a motion for a return of the petitions and papers in connection with the proposed railway, which the people were led to believe was to be built at once. The people suppose that the hon. gentleman has given notice after having had some private information as to what was to be done about these pre-election promises. I hope that when he comes to move his resolution he will offer some explanation why the Estimates for 1895-96 are solemnly silent with regard to the appropriation for the building of that road. Are the people of Prince Edward Island to be humbugged a second time? Just before the elections of 1887, the tunnel was promised us in a very vague and indirect way. But in the year 1891 we had positive and direct assurances given by the leader of the Government and by his first lieutenant, Sir Charles Tupper, that if the people of the island would support the Government they would have the tunnel built. All these promises vanished into thin air. The tunnel now is known to be a perfect farce, a political burlesque now completely played out. The tunnel scheme is not able to win them a single vote this year, and they know it. And so the new member of the Government holds public meetings throughout the whole section to be served by the Southern line, and, though he does not himself say that the railway is going to be built, he smiles upon the passage of resolutions asking the Government to build it, while his co-senator, with all his energy, expresses his conviction that the Government will build the road. But now we find that, so far from the promises then made being implemented, the Government are absolutely silent, and do not propose a vote of a single dollar for the construction of the Southern Railway in Prince Edward Island. The construction of that railway can be justified. A few years ago I called the attention of the Government to the singular fact that one-fifth of the island was without railway connection, and pointed out how I thought the accommodation could be provided at a very small cost. I pointed out, further, the admission, the clear, distinct and official admission made by Sir Charles Tupper—I think, in the year 1889, the year when he brought down the proposal of the additional grant of $20,000 a year to Prince Edward Island—that Prince Edward Island was entitled to a large additional sum of money for the construction of railways in lieu of it, and this was the reason why I thought the Government would take up fairly and honestly the construction of the road, and would give the people railway accommodation. Hon. gentlemen were then under the impression that the Dominion Government had paid for the construction of the railway in Prince Edward Island. That false impression has, I think, at last been dissipated. It is the case, Sir, that Prince Edward Island has paid for the construction of her own road, while other sections of the Dominion, Cape Breton and other adjoining places, have had similar roads built by the Government of the Dominion. It was also known that the very many millions of money which we have spent since Prince Edward Island came into the Dominion, in constructing railways in other parts, and the very many other millions we have spent in subsidizing railways in other parts of the Dominion, were expenditures from which Prince Edward Island got no benefit whatever; and it was reasonably argued, I was going to say, irresistibly argued, that under the circumstances the people there had a claim for the extension of railway accommodation. Instead of that, Sir, I find to-day that we are being humbugged again, humbugged upon the tunnel, humbugged upon the railway. The Governor in Council again passes an Order in Council facilitating the construction of more railways in the North-west, for instance, the Hudson Bay Railway, which, when undertaken, will cost many millions of dollars. But the promises which a member of the Government made in Prince Edward Island, or permitted to be made in his presence, and with his sanction, have not been implemented, and are not to be implemented. Sir, I hope the hon. member for King's County will be happy in the prospect, I hope he will convey assurances to the very many electors down in that county who have been watching, and waiting, and hoping, and praying, for this railway extension—I hope he will be enabled to satisfy them that there are good reasons why it should not be given, and ask them to go on voting for the same Government that has humbugged them in the past and will continue to humbug them in the future.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) We have listened to a long harangue from the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) with respect to railway extension in Prince Edward Island, in which he tries to make this House believe that an hon. gentleman who has a seat in another branch of this Parliament, and who has a seat in the Cabinet of this country, has held meetings throughout the length and breadth of Prince Edward Island with a view to promoting railway extension, and to leading the people to believe that the railways were to be constructed by the Government. Now, Sir, I attended some of those meetings myself, and I can assure the House that I am not aware, and was not aware, until

I heard the hon. member's speech this afternoon, that the hon. gentleman to whom he referred, the Hon. Senator Ferguson, had called any of those meetings, or had advocated, or promised the construction of railways throughout the province. The people of the province of Prince Edward Island had a perfect right to call meetings whenever they saw fit, or for whatever purpose they saw fit; they had a right to call meetings for the purpose of promoting, or asking for railway extension wherever they thought it was required; and they had a perfect right to ask the Hon. Senator Ferguson or any other man to come forward and address the electors on the questions of the day, and to put the policy of the Government before them. I think, Sir, that if there is anybody to be censured with respect to the extension of what the hon. member for Queen's called the Southern Railway extension, I think it is the hon. member for Queen's himself; he accuses the Government of bringing this matter up before the elections for the purpose, as he says, of humbugging the electors. But, Sir, if there ever was a man who humbugged the electors on a question of this kind, it was the hon. member for Queen's. In 1891 he held a meeting in his own constituency, in a place called Caledonia, where he advocated an extension of the railway system to the southern section of the country, and promised the electors at that time that when he came to Parliament he would do his utmost to advocate the said railway, but from that time to this, the hon. member's mouth has never been opened with respect to that subject. So I say that if anybody is to be accused of humbugging the people with respect to railway extension, it is the hon. member for Queen's. There is, no doubt, quite a feeling in the province of Prince Edward Island with respect to railway extension, and I think there is a great deal to warrant them in looking for that railway. The hon. member for Queen's calls upon the Minister of Finance to proclaim at once what he is going to do in the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He has told us.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) Well, I think if there is anybody in this House who is pleased to find that there is not a dollar in the Estimates, so far as we have yet seen, to provide for railway extension in Prince Edward Island, it is the hon. member for Queen's. Sir, it matters little to him whether the people of Prince Edward Island have a right or claim to railway extension; he would very much rather not see an appropriation placed in the Estimates, because he knows very well that the policy of himself and his party is opposed to railway extension in any of the provinces. There is no man in this Parliament who has proclaimed more loudly his opposition to railway extension in the lower provinces, than the hon. member for Queen's. That hon. member and his party have heretofore raised their voices on all occasions against this railway extension. Now, I contend that the Government has a perfect right to grant railway extension where the interests of the country require it. We in Prince Edward Island claim that we have not participated in the benefit of the large expenditures that have been made in other provinces of the Dominion, consequently we think we have a claim on the Government of Canada for consideration, and that being the case, we have a perfect right to ask for an expenditure of this kind. It may be said that a claim of this kind should go to the local government in the way of an increase of subsidy; but the fact is that, while I should like to see railway extension in the island, I would be very sorry indeed to see an appropriation by this House to meet the claims of the province put into the hands of such an extravagant government as the Liberal Government of Prince Edward Island. When they came into power three or four years ago, they found the province with a very small debt indeed, but they have now rolled up the debt until it is enormous in its proportions; and besides, they have put on an enormous taxation such as had been heretofore unknown in Prince Edward Island. However, their conduct in this respect is only in keeping with Liberal administration in the other provinces of the Dominion.

Motion agreed to: and House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Governor General's Secretary's

Office $11,012.50

Mr. FOSTER. There are no changes in this estimate from last year. There is the same number of clerks. The increase of $150 is made up of statutory increases.

Office of the Queen's Privy Council of Canada $32,855

Mr. FOSTER. There are twenty statutory increases at $50 each, making $1,000, and one at $30. There is an additional first class clerk at $1,400, making $2,430. Then from that there is taken the difference between the salaries of Messieurs Bliss and De Lanaudiere, $400, and the salary of one third class clerk, which is dropped, leaving a net increase of $1,380.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As to these particular small increases of $50 per annum, we know very little about the efficiency of the clerks, and I am not going to criticise them. But I am bound to say this, and it applies also to the other estimates in connection with the Civil Service, that we are at present expending about one million and a half for civil government, as it is called, which is very nearly double the amount it was found necessary to expend under this head sixteen years ago. There has been no pretense whatever made that the work of governing the country is double now what it was then, nevertheless our expenditure has gradually grown until it is about double the expenditure of 1878. I can not believe that the work of the Privy Council office should require either an expenditure of $33,855, or a staff of thirty clerks. I do not remember at the moment the amount voted in 1878 for that particular department, but I recollect that $800,000 was asked for the services for which $1,449,000 is now required. In 1878 the expenditure for Civil Government amounted to the sum of $823,000, as against an expenditure to-day of $1,449,000. I would not have complained, nor would the country, of a moderate increase, but it is utterly and entirely disproportionate as compared with expenditures in previous years, and the Privy Council is one of those offices in which, with reasonable care, a very much smaller amount would have sufficed. When we consider the percentage which one million and a half bears to the sum total available, deducting fixed charges, hon. gentlemen will see that a charge of $1,449,000 is altogether a too high percentage on the total controllable expenditure. I place that amount, at the present moment, at between ten and twelve millions.

Mr. FOSTER. About twelve millions.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As a matter of business, the Finance Minister must admit that on an expenditure of ten or twelve millions an outlay of one million and a half for Civil Government is too high a percentage, and one altogether out of proportion to the whole amount, and would be so considered in any business enterprise. I know businesses where a vastly larger sum than our controllable expenditure is handled at an expense not exceeding one-tenth of that incurred at the present time by the Government. This is a case in which from various causes the expenditure has grown, and the hon. Minister seems to be quite unable to devise any scheme for cutting it down. Looking over these items, I find no reduction is made in these various departments.

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. All the reductions are made on the contingencies.

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The total decrease is $30,000, and very little of that occurs in the departments themselves, it being almost wholly under the head of Civil Government contingencies. We have seen contingencies cut down many a time, but when we have subsequently seen the Auditor General's Report, the amount expended, notwithstanding the efforts of the Finance Minister, has appeared to be much the same as usual. I am afraid something of the same kind may occur again.

Mr. FOSTER. Do not allow your fears to get uppermost.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My fears are based on a tolerably lengthy experience of what has taken place in the past. The committee will observe that I am not speaking altogether without warrant. I find that the Queen's Privy Council for Canada cost about $14,000 in 1878, as against as nearly as possible, $34,000 to-day. The sum total was $18,000, but that included the salary of the President of the Council for nearly eight months, which reduced the actual amount to about $14,000. I put it to the Minister of Finance as a matter of business whether he thinks, if the Privy Council office could be properly managed in 1878 with $14,000, I am not justified in suggesting that $34,000 is too large a sum to ask for this year of grace 1895? I think in that, as well as in other matters connected with Civil Government, if the hon. gentleman is disposed to apply the pruning-knife, there is ample room for doing it, and although I do not want the service to be neglected, I cannot but think that if twelve clerks in 1878 were able to perform the work, thirty clerks is too large a number for the service during 1895-96.

Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Office of the Queen's Privy Council of Canada..... $33,855

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice that there are some increases in this vote. I think it is just as well that I should now call the attention of the Minister of Finance to the enormous expense to which the country is annually subjected for our Civil Service. It appears from a report laid upon the Table of the House last year that we have about 4,300 permanent civil servants employed in this Dominion. There are from 880 to 900 in the city of Ottawa, with an average salary of $100 a month, and the average pay of the entire number of civil servants in the inside and outside service is about $813 a month. Now, considering the reductions that have taken place in the cost of the necessaries of life, I think that instead of increasing the salaries of civil servants by $50 a year, we should go in the other direction, and reduce them. In view of the cheapened prices of everything the civil servants have got to buy at the present moment, and considering also our crippled financial position, there is no reason why they should expect this annual increase in their salaries. The Minister of Finance has to meet a deficit of nearly $6,000,000, and instead of meeting it by increasing taxation, he should, in my opinion, seek to find means to reduce expenses in every direction. The Minister of Finance says that these are statutory increases in this vote. If they are, I would suggest to him that he should bring down a bill to reverse the order of things, and, in place of increasing the salaries by $50 a year he should decrease them. I find that in this department one man gets $1,800; another, $1,600; another, $1,550; another, $1,400; another, $1,200; and so on down to $950. Putting all these together, they are very respectable allowances for these people, in view of the present condition of the country, and the cheapness of living, compared with what it was a few years ago. I wish to know whether the Minister of Finance intends to continue this system of giving annual increases of $50, or whether it is the intention of the Government to alter the condition of things, and allow men a reasonable salary to the extent of what their services are worth, and fix it at that. The duties performed by most of these clerks are merely of a routine character, and, after two or three months training, they can discharge these duties as well as if they had served six or seven years. They are duties that any third-class teacher in a common school, in most cases, after a few months training, could perform well. In some cases, technical qualifications are required in the civil service. I can well understand, but that must be so in comparatively few instances. I do not think the Minister will even contend that ordinary civil servants become so efficient by practice that they are entitled to an increase every year. Is it the intention of the Government to suggest to Parliament that these annual increases should be stopped?

Mr. FOSTER. It will be noticed in reference to the Privy Council office that the increases are almost entirely statutory.

Mr. McMULLEN. I admit that.

Mr. FOSTER. They are such as are authorized by law, and such as, for a series of years, while this Act has been in force, have been allowed. There is no doubt at all that a large part of the increase in the expense of the Civil Service is not because of an addition to the number of clerks, but rather from these annual increases, spread over such a large number of employees. We find that although quite a large number of clerks have been dispensed with, yet the total expense shows but a very slight decrease, and that is due to the fact that the reduction in the number of employees is nearly off-set by these statutory increases allowed to the different clerks. It has been the rule in the Civil Service to get these annual increases. It is authorized by law, and it is found to be in practice simply a rule to give an increase if a clerk has done his work fairly well, and has not been guilty of any dereliction of duty which would make it necessary to punish him by the refusal of an increase. In cases where the increase has been refused, it has been refused rather as a punishment than otherwise. Now, with reference to the higher class clerks, I do not think they are over-paid. My hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) has spoken of the decrease in the cost of living, but if the hon. gentleman will settle in Ottawa, I think he will find that the cost of living has not decreased in this city. Those clerks who have families to educate and to maintain find it very difficult work in nine cases out of ten to do so, and to have very much left over. What I want to impress upon the mind of my hon. friend is, that they are not growing rich on these salaries, but quite the reverse. The talent which the better class clerks—there are a very great many of them who are most excellent clerks—the talent which they give, if it had been for an equal number of years employed in other lines of life, would have brought them, in most cases, better salaries and better living than they get here. When we come to the class of clerks who do simply routine work like writing, my own personal opinion is that that branch of the service might very well be reformed—that instead of having a system of third-class clerks, commencing at $400, which is certainly not too high a minimum, and going up by yearly increases to $1,000, we might effect very large economies by adopting a system of writers under which young men and young women could be employed temporarily to do the work. They would have youth on their side, and, being temporarily employed, they would be anxious to please and do their work well. In that class of the service, the most efficient work we get is probably from the temporary help employed in that way; and for $400 to $600 we could get that work done just as well as it is done to-day by $1,000 clerks. That is my private opinion, and I hold it very strongly. When you come to the class of clerks who do technical work, or trusted work, and who have to employ a good deal of mental capacity and independent investigation, I do not think that our salaries, as a rule, range high. On the contrary, I think they are quite moderate. I do not think we could command that class of service for lower salaries. The Government has discussed this matter and is now giving some attention to it, though the opinion I have expressed has not been made the opinion of the Government, so far as I know, and I do not mean it to bind the Government; but it is my idea of one way in which the service might be rearranged to bring about economies without impairing the efficiency of the work done.

Mr. McMULLEN. I want to challenge two or three statements made by the hon. Finance Minister. He says the salaries paid by the Government to the Civil Service for the work performed are as low, if not lower, than the same persons would get if employed in other lines of life; conveying the idea that those people are making sacrifices to serve their country. I do not believe it. From a return laid on the Table of this House last year, I find that we had 4,408 civil servants altogether employed in the service of this Dominion, and our wages bill last year was $3,587,639.36, making the average salary paid to each of these people, $813.89. Now, I would ask the Finance Minister to name any other class in this country who receive an average salary of that amount. Do ministers of the Gospel get it? I think not. Do school teachers, or bank clerks, or wholesale or retail clerks get it? I think not. Then why is the country asked to increase the salaries of these people every year by $50 each?

Mr. FOSTER. My hon friend must be fair. He would lead the House to suppose that all these 4,408 clerks receive the $50 increase. They do not, by a very large proportion.

Mr. McMULLEN. I understand that. A certain proportion of the number get a yearly increase of $50 until their salary reaches a certain point, after which they do not get any increase. But there is no reason why this system should be kept in force. The hon. Finance Minister says that it is done under a statutory arrangement. Well, if we have a system that militates against the interests of the people of this country, I think it is time that statute was amended to bring it more into harmony with the interests of the people. If we pay our civil servants as much as is paid to other men in ordinary lines of life, that is all they can reasonably expect. Their work is no harder and their hours are no longer, they get Saturday afternoon to play themselves; and, considering everything, I think we ought at once to change the statute that authorizes these increases. The Finance Minister says that living in Ottawa is expensive. I dare say it is. It may be a little more expensive than living in other places; but I have come to the conclusion that if a man is disposed to live carefully, he can live here just about as cheaply as in Toronto, Hamilton, or Montreal. The ordinary commodities that enter into every-day use can be got as cheaply here as anywhere else. If a man is disposed to keep up a mansion, there is no doubt that it will cost him considerable money; but a civil servant is not obliged to do that. I think the law with regard to these increases should be at once amended so that the people of the country will not any longer have to tolerate the enormous drain upon their resources, caused by these increases in the civil service.

Mr. FRASER. My criticism would rather be in the opposite direction. I believe that when you get a good man you should pay him; you cannot get a good man unless you do pay him. At the same time, a man should only get what he is worth. For example, the deputy head here receives $3,200. In the town from which I come there is an amalgamated company with a capital of $5,000,000, the manager of which does not get within $500 of that, and he does his work well. I do not know whether $3,200 is too much in the city of Ottawa, but I do know that $3,200 should get a first-class man. Granted that he is a first-class man, I submit that twenty-nine assistants in that small business are too many; and my criticism would be: get good men, have less of them, and let them work. I have no doubt that not one-half of those twenty-nine men do a solid day's work. For example, in the very works of which I speak, there are not more than ten to do the whole work of that company from the beginning to the end of the year, and they do it on salaries that do not amount to more than a third of those I have mentioned. The Government do not seem to understand that the business of the country should be managed like the business of ordinary men. The men working for the country should get good wages but they should also work. A great many are put into the Government offices to satisfy political friends of the Government. I venture to say that there are establishments in London which do a business of ten million to fifteen million a year, and where the salaries are not as large as those paid in the Privy Council. The business there cannot be anything like that done in the Railway Department. There are too many men employed there. I do not say that a good man should not get a fair wage, but he should work just as long and as well for the Government as he would for other people. In New Glasgow, the manager of the agency of the Bank of Nova Scotia, which does a large business there, only gets about $1,500 a year, and yet he has all the responsibility of a bank agent. I do not say that that is enough, but you would get the very best men for that. I think that all the civil servants should bear their share of the difficulty that we are now encountering. I think that this is no time to raise wages, when we have a decreasing revenue. Take up the papers and you will find them full of complaints of dull business. A man has a large staff of employees, and business is decreasing, and what does he do? He simply tells those men the condition of things.

Mr. BERGIN. What about lawyers' fees?

Mr. FRASER. The doctors will charge the same whether times are good or bad, and the hon. gentleman is not a competent witness on this occasion. I am not sure that the method proposed by the hon. Minister is correct. In this country, we must follow the example set by England, and subject candidates to the most rigid examination before admitting them into the public service. And when they are in, let them feel secure; let them feel that they will not be removed when they do their work, and then we will have such officers as they have in England. Another detriment to the public service is the fact that when a man knows that he owes his position to his political connection or influence, you cannot get satisfactory work out of him. I think that $32,000 is too large a sum for this one office. I do not think that value is given for the amount, and I am quite satisfied that some of the employees do not give value for half the amount paid them. The hon. Minister could well decrease the number and have the work done just as well. I think this will apply to many other departments. I repeat, if we had here the system that prevails in England of subjecting candidates for the service to a very rigid examination, and not allowing the appointments to depend on the political influence of the candidate, we would have a much more efficient public service.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. Minister of Finance has told us what his views are with regard to Civil Service reform, and the scheme which the hon. gentleman has suggested is one which the former leader of the Opposition, Mr. Blake, brought before this House, and which the hon. gentleman and his friends opposed. That scheme to employ writers instead of third-class clerks in the same way that writers are employed in England. Now, the hon. gentleman has suggested that scheme as, in his opinion, a preferable system to the one which now exists. If the hon. gentleman contemplates a reform of that sort, he must also contemplate very considerable change in the service, and, in my opinion, a very considerable change might advantageously be made. But what I rose to ask the hon. gentleman was to discuss at this point, in connection with the suggestion he has made, what way he proposes to deal with the Civil Service as it now exists. There is, I am told, a very much larger number of persons in many of the departments than are called for, and a larger number than is required to do the work within reasonable hours. How does the hon. gentleman propose to reduce the numbers? Does he propose to superannuate those who are really supernumeraries in the public employment? Does he propose to give them a credit for a little period of time, and give them time to look out for other employments. Or does he propose to discharge them without remuneration or superannuation allowance? This is a very serious question. The hon. gentleman has a large deficit. In my opinion, he could increase the efficiency of the Civil Service by very careful revision of the service. How does the hon. gentleman propose to carry that system out? I think that, seeing the hon. gentleman has gone as far as he has in suggesting changes that will bring about improvement, he should tell us how he proposes to deal with the service as now constituted, in order that he may enter upon the path of improvement which he has indicated.

Mr. FOSTER. Do you want to have a discussion upon the matter?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman, having gone that far in the first item, ought to tell us how he proposes to deal with those matters, because I understand that the Government contemplate placing a very considerable number of those now in the public service upon the superannuation list, and I do not think that that would be exactly what the public will be disposed to favour.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think that we will make any progress, just at this particular stage, by having an academic discussion on this matter.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is practical, not academic. If we had the proposal before the House to abolish third-class clerks and put in writers in their place, the question would come up and be considered in all its details.

Mr. FOSTER. I took very good care to say that, while that was my own opinion, it was not a matter that the Government had decided upon. I have my own views with regard to how that might be accomplished, and, at the proper time, I shall be glad to discuss it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This is the time.

Mr. FOSTER. No; there is no measure before the House. The hon. member will have an opportunity, I daresay, to discuss this question upon some measure, upon which, as he will admit, the discussion will be more germane than upon the Estimates, which are prepared according to the law as it is. I do not think it would be well for me to take up time in discussing what might be done in certain contingencies.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are we to understand that, in addition to the measures mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, the hon. gentleman intends to propose a Civil Service reform Bill?

Mr. FOSTER. I did not say I did. But there is notice on the paper of legislation upon this subject, and these Bills will come before the House for discussion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did not see that mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. I would like to know to what clause of the Speech the hon. gentleman refers.

Mr. FOSTER. I was not speaking of a Government measure.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the hon. gentleman is not speaking of a Government measure, it seems to me he is trifling with the subject, knowing as we do, the usual fate of such Bills introduced by private members. But I want to call attention to another important point which ought to be explained to the House before this vote is passed. I called attention, before the House rose at six, to the enormous sum asked for the Privy Council service. I say, having had some experience in this matter as well as the hon. gentleman, that I cannot understand or conceive how $34,000 can be honestly wanted for the Privy Council office, nor do I understand how it can take thirty men to do the work that was done, and quite well done, a matter of fourteen or fifteen years ago, by less than half that number. It appears to me to be simply nonsense to tell this House that the work of the Privy Council office can equal that, for instance, of the Auditor General's Department. The Auditor General has a great amount of work to do, which results in the production of an enormous volume. He has to supervise the whole of the expenditure of this country, and, to examine all the vouchers, he must have a considerable staff. We find that, whereas the Auditor General's office requires the services of twenty-six men, the Privy Council requires the services of thirty. While the Auditor General asks for $27,000, the Privy Council asks for $34,000. Who is the President of the Privy Council at present?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Prime Minister.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course, the leader of the House answers for him. I would like to ask what is the work done by the twenty-six men in this office, exclusive of door-keepers and messengers? I can understand that there might be reason for employing seven or eight of these clerks and two or three of the superior officers. But I cannot understand how these twenty-six men can keep themselves employed unless the Government have themselves adopted a complicated system of red-tape for the purpose of embarrassing business and hampering the departments. I cannot understand what the Privy Council can require these thirty people for, including door-keepers and messengers. As I said before, the Auditor General's Department requires only twenty-six men, and the work in that office must be much greater and more laborious. I should say that the work of the Finance Department, if properly done, ought to be double or treble as voluminous, as it is probably double or treble as important, as that of the Privy Council office. Going further down, I find the Customs Department has only thirty-two men. Why, the Department of Railways and Canals, a very important department, requires only thirty-two people. I do not see that there is any proportion at all preserved here. We ought to have reports of the work done by these departments. I do not attach a great deal of importance to the number of letters written myself, for most of them are of a purely formal character, and could be dashed off at a very rapid rate by a competent clerk or type-writer. But we ought to know what the work of the Privy Council is, to require the services of one deputy head, one chief clerk assistant, one Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, four first-class clerks, six second-class clerks and thirteen third-class clerks, besides door-keepers and messengers.

An hon. MEMBER. And private Secretary.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course the private secretary is not supposed to be attached to the Privy Council office. I will not say much about him, but then he is not counted among the thirty, although allowance for him is included in the vote. The Minister of Finance should be prepared to state to the House in what work these parties are employed. As I say, I cannot see how these twenty-six clerks can be kept busy, day in and day out, throughout the working portion of the year.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not head of that department, and am not so familiar with its work as I am with that of my own department. But the hon. gentleman himself, if he thinks a moment, will have a better idea of this work probably than my hon. friend behind him (Mr. McMullen) who criticised it—making the statement that there did not seem to be work for a considerable number of men, that it was not like a department or business establishment. For instance, take an insurance society which is carrying on a large business, and take the work which centres at the head office. By looking into work of that kind you can get but a very little idea of the labour which is necessary in a department like this. My hon. friend said it was not a department. It may not be a department in one sense, but, at the same time, there is a vast accumulation of work. Just think for a moment that for every recommendation which for its carrying out requires the sanction of the Council, or the consideration of the Council, the papers have to be sent over, they have to be passed through the hands of the officers, they have to be copied. The work of all the different departments converges in this department and necessitates a large volume of clerical and routine work. I have here a statement of the work that is done. My hon. friend refers to 1878. At that time the permanent staff was thirteen, at present the permanent staff is about thirty. The number of entries registered in 1878 was 2,056; in 1894 the number was 4,447—more than double. The number of Orders in Council passed in 1878 was 1,195, in 1894 it was 4,061; that is, 3½ times as many. The number of folios in Orders in Council in 1878 was 2,273, while in 1894 it was 16,974; about 5 times as many. The number of folios copied in 1878 was 11,000; in 1894 it was 115,406; about 10½ times as many as in 1878. The numbers of references to departments made in 1878 was 329, and in 1894 3,006; being 7½ times as many. The salaries for the thirteen permanent officers in 1878 amounted to $15,000, while in 1894 the salaries were $32,575. The permanent staff is a little more than double what it was, the salaries are just about double, but the work is about from four to ten and one-half times as great as it was in 1878. The amount of labour involved in copying all these Orders in Council, all the references that go back to the different departments, all the despatches and references that have to be sent to the provincial governments and the Home Government, contribute a great deal to the work to be done by this department. The work converges there. If we think of it for a moment, we will see that it is not a sinecure. And the work performed in the Privy Council differs from that of the other departments in this respect, that the Privy Council officers and clerks have to be there when the Council is at work, while in the other departments the officers have their regular hours of duty. When the Council work is heavy, as it is in eight months out of the twelve, these clerks have to be there just as long as the Council is there, and are there often from early in the morning until six o'clock, and sometimes later at night. They are obliged to work on holidays. The Government in 1894, being a working Government, in contrast to that of 1878, as is shown by the amount of references, Orders in Council, and the like of that, have to work on holidays; these men then have to come back and do work as well. I am inclined to think that in 1878 the hon. gentlemen opposite had a jolly good time, that they did not bother themselves about Council work, because the records of the department show that not a great deal of work was done, although one-half of the total amount of salaries was paid. If you take thirteen and divide it into $15,000, and take now 29 and divide it into $32,000, you will find that you paid your clerks more royally, and I am inclined to think you lived higher in those days, in the precincts of the Council, than we do to-day. The comparison is entirely against my hon. friend, and instead of no work being now done, there is a vast deal of work; and instead of there being no increase of work, the appreciation is very large. My hon. friends forget, it is so long ago since they occupied that chamber, the kind of work and the nature of the work, and the accumulation of work, which must take place if the Government are to do the business of the country. They forget, as well, that in all these respects the business of the country has greatly enlarged since 1878. The correspondence which takes place has very largely increased. I am inclined to think, from conversations I have had at various times with the deputy, and from some little investigation I made into the work, that this staff is not simply there for show, but that actual work is done, and that the clerks are kept at their work, and kept hard at work as well.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should be inclined to think, in listening to the hon. gentleman's figures, that he and his colleagues had been applying themselves to increase the amount of work in the circumlocution department with exceeding little profit to the people of the country. Now, I do not hold that it is the business of the Privy Council of Canada to be concerned with petty clerks' work. The Privy Council, in my judgment, ought to meet chiefly for the discussion of important questions, and not to debate every little trumpery appointment, every little trumpery detail which ought to be left to the judgment and placed at the discretion of the Minister; but now this is made the excuse for reams of correspondence, and references, and all the rest of it. If the hon. gentleman be correct, as I assume he is, in saying that 11,000 folios did the work of the Privy Council in 1878, and that 110,000 or 120,000 folios are required to do it now, I would say that the work was done ten times better in 1878 than it is now. I do not think it is a merit or a credit to the Government that you have multiplied all these references, that you have multiplied all this unnecessary work, and that you have charged us $33,000 for doing what was a great deal better done, and a thousand times more honestly done, in 1878, than is done by these hon. gentlemen. Sir, we know perfectly well how these hon. gentlemen have been occupying themselves. We know the contracts they have made, we know the means that have been used by the hon. gentlemen for the purpose of carrying the elections. We know their various devices, and I do not wonder that it has taken whole seas of ink and whole deserts of paper to cover up and conceal the artifices they have had recourse to. I can well understand that 120,000 folios are all too little to hide the tracks of the hon. gentlemen. However, I do not at all consider that this multiplication of work in the Privy Council is in the slightest degree likely to increase its efficiency in carrying on the business of this country. I entirely differ from the hon. gentleman in holding that all these petty references go to show that the work is better done. They go to show that there is a great deal more red tape about it, and that is all. In looking through these Estimates, in observing the increase which has marked every single one of these items within a very few years, we have the best possible proof that the business of the country is not better done. As the country grows, the expenses ought to be less in proportion to the population. The hon. gentleman knows that the expenses of this country have largely increased in proportion to population. The population has hardly increased by 25 per cent in the 16 years, but the actual taxation has increased 200 per cent, and the nominal taxation 100 per cent.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I find by the Estimates of 1878 that there were then eight clerks in this department. There are 26 at the present time. The expenditure at that time for clerks, door-keeper and messenger, 12 in all, was $16,300; to-day it is $33,855. Now, the hon. gentleman has spoken of the increased amount of work. We were told this last year. We made some inquiry, and the Minister who had charge of these Estimates last year gave us information. What did that information disclose? It disclosed this fact, that every Minister, instead of discharging those duties which the law has put upon him as a Minister, as the head of a department, has practically transferred the work, and the duties with regard to appointment, and with regard to many matters that are purely departmental, to the Governor in Council. Sir, it is a highly irregular proceeding.

Mr. FOSTER. For instance, what?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). With regard to subordinate appointments that belong to the department, with regard to many matters that are matters of detail. I cannot recall those that were given to us last year, but a number of them were mentioned here last year that I know as a matter of fact were discharged as departmental matters, that are now being discharged through the Privy Council.

Mr. FOSTER. Will my hon. friend allow me to interrupt him? He must make the objection more definite. In criticising this item, it will not do to say that certain things that ought to be done by the department were formerly done by the department and are now transferred. What things? There has been no change in the system. What subordinate appointments can he mention that were made formerly by the Minister and are now made by the Council?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am not prepared to say. I am prepared to say this, however, that if the hon. gentleman will produce the work of that department for a single month, we will be able to show him that much of the business that is now being done in the Privy Council, was formerly done by the department.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend has changed his ground. He made the allegation that it was so; now he says, if you will produce the record we will show you it was so.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I said the Minister who had charge of these matters last year mentioned the facts to the House. I dare say that anybody who will take the trouble to turn up the "Hansard" when the Estimates of this department were under discussion last year, will see that it is so. The hon. gentleman cannot pretend to say that the amount of business is ten times as great as it was in 1878. What makes the business of the Government ten times as great as it was then? The statement bears upon its face its own refutation. The population is not ten times as great in 1895 as it was in 1878. The wealth of the country has not increased ten fold; the circumstances of the country have not changed so as to have imposed enormously-increased duties on the Government as compared with previous years. It goes to show that the Government have recently made the transaction of business cumbersome and expensive, and it is important that the Government should get back to that simple and more expeditious method, and also cheaper method of transacting business which previously prevailed. In 1878-79—and the charges for that year were larger than during the previous year—there was one deputy head, one chief assistant, one first-class clerk, two senior second-class, and three junior clerks, or, as they are now called, third-class clerks. How does the staff stand to-day? There is one deputy head and clerk of the Council, one chief clerk assistant, one Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, who has been transferred to this department; four first-class clerks, where there was one before; one second-class clerk, who is a draughtsman; five second-class clerks, and thirteen third-class clerks. There is no comparison between the constitution of the staff in 1878-79 and that of 1895-96, and there is certainly nothing in the public service to account for this extraordinary charge.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has made no case at all. He commenced by making assertions in a general way, but when he came down to particulars he had no particulars to give.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I had.

Mr. FOSTER. It is not the genius and tendency of Government for the Council to assume to itself work to the detriment of the departments. It is rather the genius and tendency of Government for the departments to take work themselves and perform it without burdening the Executive Council with it. I ask the hon.

gentleman to give a single class of work which has been transferred from the departments to the Council, and which had not been performed during the time the Government of which the hon. member for Bothwell was a member, a single case not required by the law under which the appointment is made, and under which the salary is paid. The hon. gentleman could not do it, and he has not done it up to the present moment. Unless the hon. gentleman comes down to something like a definite statement, and keeps clear of generalities, which are very glittering, but yet have very little force, he has not made out a case, in fact, he cannot make out a case. When the hon. gentleman came down to the charge of extravagance as to salaries, his own statement showed that the Government of which he was a member had, in proportion to the work done, more employees, and paid higher salaries than, on the average, is paid to-day for work done. So the hon. gentleman, outside of declamation, which was plentiful and windy, has not made out a case against the department, but, on the contrary, has made out a case against himself.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Suppose the hon. gentleman brings down a statement of the work last month before Parliament met, and let hon. members see what it covered, and of what the references were composed. Let the hon. gentleman bring down a month's work as a sample.

Mr. FOSTER. You would not be able to hold a caucus.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will find some hon. members who will be willing to sacrifice themselves to study the papers. I suggest that the hon. gentleman should give us a sample of the business that engaged the attention of himself and his colleagues during one month before Parliament met. This should include the various Orders in Council—indeed, we will be content with them. Let the hon. gentleman bring down honestly one month's Orders in Council, and let the House see what the hon. gentleman and his colleagues did, and what work there was to be performed by thirty clerks.

Mr. FOSTER. You have the record of a year, which is surely better than for a month.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We understand what the record for a year may be; we understand what four thousand references may be worth. We should like to see the genuine article itself. If the hon. Minister will bring down one month's Orders in Council, without reservation, mental or otherwise, we will be satisfied. My hon. friend will make a motion to that effect, if the hon. gentleman will go so far as to promise to comply with it. How many times did the hon. gentleman and his colleagues meet in Council during February, for example? Did they meet three times?

Mr. FOSTER. Now you are asking for information.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We know perfectly well how these matters are managed. It is quite easy for any of the departments to make as much work as it requires to make a showing.

Mr. FOSTER. Something like one or two of your months in 1878.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Here is a volume of 2,000 pages—the Auditor General's Report. We know well the amount of work that enters into that volume, work which requires not four thousand, but forty thousand references to the various departments. Yet this labour is performed by twenty-two or twenty-three clerks under the supervision of the Auditor General. Does the hon. Minister of Finance mean to tell the Committee that the legitimate work of the Privy Council office is likely to be greater than that passing through the office of the Auditor General? If he does, the Privy Council must have become a most extraordinarily hard-working institution.

Mr. FOSTER. So it is.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps it is. Very strange things pass in the Privy Council office, as we know. We do not dispute the hon. gentleman's word, but we should like to see examples of the work. If the hon. Minister will bring down a month's Orders in Council, we shall be satisfied, for we are curious to see what the character of the work really is.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I think the Minister of Finance and the hon. members who have discussed this matter have been labouring under a misapprehension as to the number of employees in the Privy Council office. I call the attention of the Minister to page 2 of the Auditor General's Report. He will find that instead of twenty-nine or thirty persons being employed as clerks and messengers in that department, the number is fifty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That includes contingencies extras.

Mr. McMULLEN. I should like to know why it is necessary to keep a door-keeper and messenger for the Privy Council at a salary of $700. Does the Minister mean to say that it is necessary to pay such a salary? Could not the hon. gentleman fill the position for a less sum?

Mr. FOSTER. No. The man who keeps the door is an old and faithful servant; he is not there as a boy, he has been there for a series of years, has grown old and gray in the service, and has now reached the salary of $700. The hon. gentleman will not say that is too much. Nor will the hon. gentleman say that the Privy Council should sit without having a door-keeper and some one to attend to messages.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Am I to obtain that sample of that work done?

Mr. FOSTER. We will take the matter under consideration.

Mr. McMULLEN. No doubt it is necessary for the Privy Council to have a door-keeper in view of the racket that goes on in the committee sometimes, a faithful servant to keep the doors closed when necessary, and to allow members to escape when required. I think if the Government were disposed, they could make reductions in some of these departments. The people of the country are looking to the Opposition to discharge the very onerous duty of pointing out where reductions can be made, and it is highly desirable that the expenditure should be reduced to the lowest possible point. The hon. gentleman has gone back to 1877-78, when the country was passing through a crisis, which did not, however, compare at all with the serious condition of the country at the present time. The Minister of Finance must also remember that living is very much less now than formerly, and we ought to cut our expenses down in every possible shape and way to meet the altered condition of things and the enormous deficit that has to be provided for. I compliment the Minister of Finance on the fact that he has made some reduction, but I hope he will not change his mind as he did on the tariff items, and bring down further votes to burden the country. I am also glad to know that there will be no Supplementary Estimates for the year we are now considering. We want the Government to understand that we will press for reduction in every single estimate in which we consider a reduction should be made. I intend personally to take that course for the reason that when the Minister of Railways was out on a stumping tour a short time ago, he stated in connection with the Tay Canal, that there never was a single objection made by any member of the Opposition to the expenditure of that money. I am not sure just now whether he was correctly reported or not, but at all events I will find out before the session is over. If the Minister of Railways is correct, then the Opposition did not discharge their duty in not protesting against the scandalous expenditure of money on that ditch. However, my opinion is that it was very strongly protested against. It is our duty to see, and we will see, that no money is wasted in that manner again. I am quite certain the country expects a great deal more from us, than they expect from the Government in the direction of reducing expenses. The Minister of Finance twitted the Opposition that they had been so long out of office that they had forgotten a great deal of what transpired in the Council Chamber. The hon. gentleman had better not be over-certain of the perpetuity of the position he now occupies, because to my mind it is very risky indeed. The Government was in a tight place a short time ago, and I have no doubt that if the walls of the Council Chamber could speak, they could reveal secrets as to the anxious discussion which took place as to whether the Government should dissolve Parliament or call the session. It was only after a long and continued fight that they came to the conclusion that it was better to choose the less of two evils and try to get through with a meeting of Parliament. My own opinion is that when the electorate has an opportunity of pronouncing upon the conduct of the Government for the last ten or twelve years, the gentlemen of the Treasury benches will find that they are not secure in their positions, and that they will have to discharge the duties of an Opposition, which I am quite sure they will not discharge as well as we have done. We have no desire to delay the business of Parliament, but we have a duty to perform and we will perform it. If the Minister of Finance presents any item that in the opinion of the Opposition should not be passed without extended criticism, we will in the interests of the country indulge in criticism. We take this course not because we expect to make any favourable impression on the minds of the Government and its supporters, because they are past reforming, and there is no hope of economy from them; but we want the people of the country to know that we are in favour of retrenchment and we do not want to leave ourselves open to the charge that we failed to urge reductions where reductions should be made.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I wish to call the attention of the leader of the House to the statement made by the Prime Minister last year. Sir John Thompson said:

The work of the Privy Council has been greatly increasing, and is greatly increasing from year to year. As those hon. members who have been members of the Cabinet know, a great many matters which might be disposed of by the departments come to the Privy Council to receive the consideration of the whole Cabinet.

I hope the hon. gentleman will be satisfied that he is mistaken, and that my statement to the House is perfectly correct.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend is a very poor logician if he thinks he has made an argument out of that quotation. It may be quite true that a good many things which might be disposed of in the departments do come to the Privy Council, but that might have been equally true, and was equally true when hon. gentlemen opposite were in.

I asked my hon. friend to point out a single class of business which is now given over to the Council from the departments, which was not formerly sent to the Council also. The hon. gentleman has failed to do this.

Mr. FRASER. I think that the logic of the Finance Minister has failed him. It is the place of the Minister of Finance to show that these same things to which the Prime Minister referred last year were performed by the late Government. As we do not know what is performed by the present Government it would be impossible for us to do so. The onus of proof is on the Finance Minister.

Mr. FOSTER. The onus is always on the attacking party.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then the onus is clearly on the Minister of Finance.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I have taken the statement of the Prime Minister last year. The Prime Minister last year said: That the work of the Privy Council has been greatly increased and is increasing from year to year, and he gives as the reason, because the business that might be transacted by the Ministers in their departments is brought to the Council for the purpose of being transacted.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is a question of a good deal of importance underlying this which is worth a word or two. Apparently the hon. gentleman is departing—as the Government to which he belongs has departed, in the past and is likely to depart more in the future—he is departing wider and wider from the English system of cabinet government. That system, as he will find if he wishes to make inquiry, is this: That the heads of departments are held in a very large measure responsible for the management of their departments, as in my judgment they ought to be; that references are not made to the Privy Council for trifling matters, but on questions of really grave importance. The Privy Council is or ought to be an august, or at least a respectable body, and it ought in all conscience not be convened together for little matters of detail. Its functions,—and I think that this is the view held by most of our constitutional writers—its functions ought to be to deliberate on matters of grave moment to the state. I don't think that it is at all a desirable thing that the time of thirteen or fourteen gentlemen, or whatever the number who are eligible to sit there may be, should be taken up in discussing little matters of which the individual Minister ought to be a far better judge than his colleagues. I think their time ought to be used for the consideration of grave and important questions. If you allow the Privy Council to be turned into a mere chamber for the purpose of registering routine matters, you destroy the usefulness of the Cabinet to a great extent. I know that that system has made considerable progress of late years, and I do not think it is at all an improvement on the old plan or the plan which prevails at present in England. I think the plan of giving a Minister reasonably full control in his own department and holding him responsible if he makes a mistake will be found far more conducive to the public service than shifting the responsibility to a board and saying: "This was passed by the Council and no one in particular is responsible for it." Let each Minister run his own department and be responsible for it, and let the Cabinet deal with important questions.

Mr. LISTER. Year after year for the last twelve or fifteen years the Opposition have been trying to discharge their duty in pressing upon the Government the necessity of practicing economy. Year after year the Finance Minister for the time, and other members of the Government have tried to explain the remarkable extravagance that has characterized their Administration, and have made promises of reformation; but my experience has always been that our arguments have been fruitless. Year after year, instead of showing economy by reducing the number of public servants, the Government confront us with increases. This economical Government have found it necessary to have some seventeen Ministers to administer the affairs of less than 5,000,000 people, while other governments throughout the world are able to do a great deal more than this Government with from five to seven Ministers. It is only two or three years since this economical Government, while the present economical Finance Minister was in it, found it necessary to take away from the Minister of Inland Revenue the office he held, and appoint a Controller of Customs, a Controller of Inland Revenue, and a Solicitor General, in addition to the officers who were then discharging the duties of those offices. We have also a President of the Council. Nobody can take exception to the Prime Minister occupying that position at present, but we cannot forget that only a short time ago it was held by the hon. Mr. Ives. It is a hard-worked office, no doubt. I do not know whether he is the Minister who remarked that he was very hard-worked—that it took him twenty minutes a day to discharge the duties of the office, for which he was receiving from the people of this country about $8,000 a year. These hon. gentlemen are not content with increasing the members of the Administration, but every Minister who comes into office has a few friends who have done him yeoman service and whom it is necessary to provide with places. The consequence is that year after year, instead of the public service standing about still in point of numbers, it shows an increase in numbers and a consequent increase in cost. The hon. Finance Minister tells us that the gentlemen in the public service are hard worked—that they earn all the salary that this Parliament votes to them from year to year. I am not going to raise an issue with the Minister of Finance in regard to that; but I will say this, that there is no difficulty whatever in getting any number of people to fill any position that becomes vacant in the service. As a matter of fact, there are three or four thousand people who have passed the Civil Service examinations and who are waiting for their turn, hoping year after year that they may be appointed; but the time never comes, and they find ultimately that much of their life has been wasted. To say that the Civil Service of this country is an efficient one is to make a statement in which there is no truth. The system of appointment is pernicious in the extreme. Instead of making appointments by competitive examinations and only for necessary positions, the Government appoints its friends regardless altogether of the date of examination or the merit of the applicant—regardless altogether of any consideration, except that of finding places for their friends, where they may have a sure living and by which they may be provided for when they cease to work at all. So that I do not think the Civil Servants are entitled to any particular sympathy. As a matter of fact, they are paid better than any other class of servants in this country; and the best proof of that is that there are thousands of people anxious to enter this service—anxious to sacrifice themselves, if we are to take the words of the Finance Minister, for the benefit of their country. The policy of the Government is the multiplication of the offices in order to find places for their friends. It is a system of nepotism which I believe is unparalleled in any other country in the world. I believe there is not a single Minister on those benches to-day who has not three or four or more relatives and friends in the public service. The consequence is that when a man prepares himself and takes all the pains and time necessary to qualify himself for a public position, unless he is fortunate enough to have some friend in the Government or some friend of the Government, it is needless for him to apply for a position. Why, Sir, a young man in London who some five or six years ago passed his examination for the Civil Service, and applied to a friend of your own too, could not obtain a position because he was not able to get sufficient influence. He applied and applied, year after year, to be taken into the Civil Service, but in vain. He had passed an excellent examination and was in every way qualified for the position, but he failed and failed, and ultimately became thoroughly despondent. He wrote to me, and I said to him:

“Unless you have a friend in the Government it is no use of you to apply at all. If you have a friend in the Government or a prominent supporter of the Government, your application will be successful.” The hon. gentleman says that the Privy Council department requires thirty clerks having salaries ranging from a thousand dollars to twenty-four hundred dollars. He gave us to understand that these thirty men did an enormous amount of work in this particular department, and the hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Somerville) tells us that in addition to those thirty, there are some twenty others employed in this department.

Mr. FOSTER. It is not so.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I refer the hon. Minister to the statement—he can read it in the Auditor General's Report. There are fifty clerks and messengers.

Mr. FOSTER. Employed through the year?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. In the Privy Council Department through the year.

Mr. FOSTER. During the year.

Mr. LISTER. I do not know whether by the year or the month, but at all events thirty people are employed to do work; and I venture to say that the work done in that office is not equal to that done in a leading bank in this city. And in addition to these hard-working individuals, it appears that the Government have twenty others, who either work all the year or at different periods during the year, so that with a force of fifty men the Government is still adding to the cost of the Privy Council. The cost has increased from $12,000 in 1878 to $33,855 in 1895. This is only in keeping with every other act of this Government. In every branch there is nothing but extravagance and some say corruption. I do not wonder that the Minister of Finance would not bring down the proceedings of the Privy Council for the last month. It is said that this Government, in the face of an Act of Parliament, passed an Order in Council, when they thought that there was going to be a general election—and if there had been, the public would have known nothing about this Order in Council,—giving $2,500,000 to a railway company in the North-west. It was said that there was a little bargain or at all events it was done in secret. The public knew nothing about it and the Government appear uncertain at the present moment whether they will carry it out or not. It is said, moreover, that a member of the Government was one of the incorporators of that Hudson Bay Company. Whether that member of the Government has any interest in it now or not, I do not pretend to say, but the effect of the Order in Council is this, that the contractors have gone to Winnipeg and commenced, in form at all events if not in substance, the work which they say they are entitled to begin under the agreement with the Government, whether the Government goes on with the work or not, there will be a claim. If it does not go on with the work, the claim will be for damages. There will be a reference to special tribunal, and the result will be that Canada will have to pay the piper. This country will have to pay damage, whether damages have been sustained or not. The claim of this company is one which this country will not suffer and which the Government itself is divided about, and which its followers are divided about. The scheme is one which the Government evidently intended, at all events, at one time, to proceed with, had they not thought it more prudent and judicious to call the House together. The House has met, the scheme is made public, and I doubt if the Government has courage enough to go on with it. It is the duty of the Opposition to criticise the Estimates. We would be wanting in our duty if we did not do so, and I only say in addition that if the Government will try to force through the House expenditures which cannot fairly be supported, the Opposition would be faithless to its trust if we did not oppose this in every way possible.

Department of Justice $23,585

Mr. FOSTER. There are four statutory increases. Then there is a decrease caused by the appointment of Mr. Stewart as Inspector of Penitentiaries, showing a net decrease of $870. The clerk, Mr. Fraser, was given last year the sum of $200 as a recognition of his services; and it was intended at the time that that should be afterwards made a part of the regular Estimates, and that he should receive that amount in addition to his salary, as was done in the case of Mr. Power. They are both excellent clerks, and the late Minister of Justice had determined to recommend to Parliament to raise the salary of Mr. Fraser permanently, as done with Mr. Power.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Why should the Civil Service Act be overridden in the case of this officer.

Mr. FOSTER. Of course the Civil Service Act would only give him an increase of $50, but owing to the excellence of his work and the work he is doing, the Minister decided to ask Parliament to give him an increase of salary. He is a lawyer of excellent standing.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He may be all that. There are a great many lawyers of excellent standing quite ready to serve, I am sorry to say, for a much less sum than $2,275, or whatever sum Mr. Fraser is entitled to. I doubt very much the wisdom of deliberately setting aside a provision of the Civil Service Act. I do not know anything about the qualifications of the gentleman, whether they make him an especially valuable officer or not; but I do know that to-day, unfortunately, there are an immense number of legal men of very high attainments who find it exceedingly difficult to realize a salary of that amount. I do not think that the mere fact that he is a deserving officer warrants the Government in proposing to override the Civil Service Act. That is a very grave thing, indeed. All through last year's Estimates, I remember, were to be found items to be voted "notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act to the contrary." Now, that is extremely objectionable. We cannot judge from these very general statements that, "so-and-so is a good officer," and it does appear to me rather invidious that any one man should be singled out in this way. The filling of these offices should not be the cause of overriding the law we have deliberately passed for regulating the emoluments of our Civil Service.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not think that this system of granting salaries for private secretaries for subordinate officers should be encouraged. We give $600 for a private secretary to the Minister of Justice. And the Solicitor General, who unquestionably must occupy a subordinate position, is granted a similar amount for a private secretary. Next we shall have the deputy of each department asking for a private secretary also. It is in this way that these increases are made. This increase is proposed in order to give it to some man who thinks that he would be better off with $600 in addition to a probably ample salary, and it is given in a manner inconsistent with the provisions of the Civil Service Act. We should not allow these things to be repeated; it is neither just nor necessary. I should like to know what duties this man performs in addition to those of an ordinary clerk? Where is he supposed to go in order to perform the double duty? We have here, in the commencement of the Auditor General's Report, a list covering three or four pages, showing that we have about 500 Civil Servants in this country who are virtually drawing double pay in some shape or form. This thing was commenced some years ago with a few names only, but as members of the Civil Service see others drawing pay for work performed outside of their regular office duties, they seek opportunities of the same kind, and so the number is increased. There is no justification for treating the Civil servants in this way, overriding the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

Department of Justice—Penitentiary Branch $5,675

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There have been some changes here. If the hon. gentleman is not prepared to go into them in detail, perhaps we had better wait until the Minister of Justice is here.

Mr. CURRAN. That has already been explained by the Minister of Finance. The inspector is a new appointee in place of Mr. Moylan, who receives $2,600 instead of $3,200 paid to Mr. Moylan. The other officers are the same as before, except that the messenger has been dispensed with, and that $300 has been applied to contingencies under the title of clerical work in the penitentiaries branch.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Where is Mr. Moylan ?

Mr. CURRAN. He had to be superannuated.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Why ?

Mr. CURRAN. On account of long service.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Was he not in good health ?

Mr. CURRAN. I believe he was.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What was his age ?

Mr. CURRAN. I do not know exactly, but he was considerably over 60 years of age.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Why, you are that age yourself.

Mr. CURRAN. The hon. gentleman imagines that he himself and I were born about the same time. That is a mistake.

Department of Militia and Defence $44,875

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I observe Mr. Chairman, that by a curious dispensation the estimates for the Militia Department have been reduced, that is to say, the amount spent on the militia is about 20 per cent less, but in order to handle the reduced amount the expenses of the department are increased some two or three thousand dollars.

Mr. FOSTER. There is nothing but statutory increases.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Here we have another case of a department going on increasing until we have a central body of 33 officers to manage a total expenditure of about a million dollars. It does appear to me that this is another case in which the amount spent on the headquarters staff is out of all proportion to the work they have to do.

Mr. LISTER. Is there to be an annual drill and camp this year ?

Mr. FOSTER. This item is only for the staff. The Minister of Militia and Defence is not here, and I cannot answer the question. The Minister will be here in a little while.

Mr. McMULLEN. Will the Minister explain the reductions. It is well that we should understand why these reductions are made.

Mr. LISTER. What is the increase owing to ?

Mr. FOSTER. I gave that. There are sixteen statutory increases, making a total increase of $800. Then there is a difference in the salaries of messengers and third-class clerks, making a reduction, so that the whole increase is less than the total of the statutory increases.

Mr. FLINT. There are a large number of statutory increases. I would like to inquire if these are likely to go on in this department, because it seems to me that there ought to be, and I suppose there is, a stage when the statutory increase ceases. Now, if any department is to be cut down in order to reduce the expenses of government, the Militia Department is the one in which large decreases should most easily be made. For we are not a military country. If I understand correctly the nature of the decreases in the other appropriations for Militia service, a large amount of work which has been customarily put upon the militia of the country, is to be dispensed with. Now, the temper and feeling of the public generally is in favour of diminishing rather than increasing militia operations in the country, and I should think this was a favourable opportunity for the Government to provide for decreasing the expenditure of the staff at headquarters. There is a slight increase, but I think that in no department could a substantial decrease, a permanent decrease, be better justified than in this department. If there are sixteen clerks, and perhaps more, entitled to statutory increases, we can see that in time this will amount to a considerably larger sum than we have in the Estimates at the present time. Could the Minister give us an idea as to what extent that is likely to grow ?

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose it will follow the rule that is followed in the other departments, and the trend of the law as long as the law remains as at present. Statutory increases go on from year to year until they reach the maximum, and they then cease until a promotion takes place. If that takes place, the increases go on until the maximum of the next class is reached. When they are superannuated, or die, the statutory always stops.

Department of the Secretary of State	$44,350 00
Department of Printing and Stationery	28,162 50

Mr. FOSTER. There are twenty-one statutory increases at $50, one at $37.50, and the difference in salary of a third-class clerk transferred, making a total increase of $1,437.50. Then, taken from that there is the difference between the salaries of Messrs. Welsh and Lalonde, and those of their successors, $275, on account of transfers. Then, there is the difference between the salary of Mr. Campbell and the estimate, $287.50, making a net increase of $1,150.

Mr. FLINT. Would the Secretary of State give us an idea of the nature of the work devolving upon the large number of clerks provided for in this estimate? From the discussion which took place upon the duties of the same class of officials in the Privy Council office, it would seem to me that here there were more offices than are absolutely necessary. It seems to me that the department of the Secretary of State ought to do a large amount of the work which is sketched out as work done by the officers of the Privy Council. Although large salaries are paid, and no doubt very good men are employed in those offices, yet it appears to me, from the explanations given by the Minister of Finance, that this was largely copying work. The number of folios, and the enormous number of letters written, seemed to constitute a class of work not calling for as high a range of education or talent as is actually at the disposal of the Privy Council office. It seems to be clerical work, copying work, registration, and work of that kind. Now, if the Secretary of State would give the House some idea of the nature of the work done by the large number of clerks out of the twenty odd in his department, perhaps it would be more satisfactory to the House in voting this Estimate.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I must ask the indulgence of the House, and of the hon. gentleman to a certain extent, as I have not had time to become thoroughly acquainted with the services performed in the department. But, so far as I have gone in my investigation—and I may say I have endeavoured in the short time I have been there to get knowledge of the work which is done—I think there is more work done there than I supposed when I took charge of the department. But if the Estimates are allowed to pass now, I think I shall be able on concurrence to suggest some changes which may bring the expenditure of the department lower than it is at the present time. I may say with reference to the work which is performed, that there is a correspondence branch as well as a branch for registration, copying, &c., and that the officers for whom salaries are asked to be voted now, are those who are engaged in those branches. I think I had better not discuss each individual officer, because I would, perhaps, prefer to discuss that later on when I come to suggest to the House some changes which I think I may be able to make.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is a reasonable proposition, but we have the good fortune to have present the hon. gentleman who was Secretary of State during the entire period when the expenditure was incurred last year, and up to a very recent period of this year. I am sure the Minister of Marine will be happy to come to the rescue of his colleagues in the department, and to give us a full account of the work which is done in that department, which he presided over with great honour and credit for so long a time.

Mr. LISTER. The office of the Secretary of State, of course, is not looked upon as one of the chief offices of the Government, yet the number of men employed in that department seems to be quite equal to, if not more than, the number employed in many offices having much heavier work to do. I do not pretend to understand all the duties that the Minister has to discharge in that office, but it seems to me that his principal duties are granting patents to joint stock companies. Probably there are many other duties to perform. At all events, it is not looked upon as one of the chief offices of the Government, such as the Public Works, or the Railways, or the Finance Department, or the Department of Militia and Defence. On looking at the Estimates, I find that the cost of managing that department is considerably more than the cost of managing some of the other departments. This is evident in comparing the cost with the cost of managing the same department in 1879. In 1879, when the printing was included, the total cost was $32,550. I find by the Estimates here that the printing and other expenditures of the department are separate. The expenses of the department proper, according to the Estimates, are $44,350, and that of printing amounts to $28,162, making something over $72,000 to meet the expenditure of that department in 1895.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The printing of the department, including forms, blue-books, and all that kind of thing, is given in the Estimates for contingencies.

Mr. LISTER. But the stationery in 1879 was included. Of course, this $28,162 covers the printing bureau and stationery also. In 1879, the stationery was included under the Department of Secretary of State. There would be the additional cost of the officers of the printing bureau. At all events, there has been a very extensive increase in the cost of this department since 1879. Possibly there may be a great many more letters to be written, and a great many more entries to be made. But it only cost $32,550 in 1879. The clerks could have done that work, and probably found time to do double the amount of work. It seems to me the expenses of the department have been very large, considering the standing of the department itself.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think we must get the Minister of Marine to give some explanations. At any rate, I think he ought to give us a general idea of the work in his department. It would not be reasonable to expect the present Secretary of State to be au fait in that matter, but it is reasonable that the gentleman who presided so long over it, should be able to tell us what was done. I notice that there is a great variety in the salaries given to the various extra clerks, with regard to which I would like some explanation. I thought the remuneration was fixed; but I observe that some of these clerks receive $1 per day, and others, $2, and others, $2.50 per day.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The clerks who receive the larger amounts possess some technical knowledge, such as that of engrossing.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That explanation would apply to the Secretary of State's Department, but I do not think it will apply to the other departments. All these men are entered as extra clerks without any explanation as to special qualification, and their salaries vary very greatly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Those receiving the larger sums have all technical knowledge, and a special report has to be made by the deputy before they can be paid over a certain sum.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Secretary of State in 1878 had charge of the Mounted Police—part of the time—and also of the Stationery Department. The expenses of the Secretary of State Department alone amount to $43,350. The Department of Secretary of State, including that of the Controller of the Mounted Police and including the Stationery Department, was $11,000 less in 1878 than at the present time. The Controller's Department has increased from less than $3,000 to about $11,000.

Mr. FLINT. I hold in my hands the report of the Secretary of State. We all remember that this report is generally a very small document. It consists simply of a list of companies incorporated by letters patent, with a few other particulars. The total amount of the revenue of the department for 1893 was $9,563, made up from fees on charters of incorporation, applications for patents, copies of documents passports, &c. The department appears to be almost altogether a clerical one and not an administrative department, and the amount of labour and the character of the work appear to differ very largely from most of the other great departments of the country. The estimate of $44,500 is a very large one for the payment of deputy ministers, clerks and messengers in a department of this kind. A new department has been established, called the Department of Trade and Commerce. Whether the officer at the head of that department has yet ascertained the duties devolving upon it by law and those which should be assumed by it, I do not know; but it occurred to me at the time the department was organized, and the point has more forcibly forced itself on my attention since, that the duties it had assumed should have been placed under the care of the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State in all countries is the most important officer, and the duties discharged by his department correspond to those now divided between three departments, namely, the Privy Council Office, the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Secretary of State. When the cost of the clerical force in these three departments is considered, we are forced to the conclusion that the Government is very extravagant in the vote it asks to carry on the duties of the Secretary of State Department. I submit for the consideration of the present Secretary and his colleague, whether they cannot evolve some method for combining these three departments, so that the total expenses may be reduced, and at the same time efficiency of the service be maintained. The total expense of these three departments must exceed $100,000, and the amount of responsible and administrative work performed is exceedingly small, and the work generally of a clerical character. I am disposed to be exceedingly indulgent toward the new Secretary of State, but I very much distrust the promises made with respect to explanations on Concurrence. We know the conditions existing at that time, and that explanations received are of a very perfunctory character. Perhaps, however, when some other estimates are before the Committee, we shall receive full explanation from the new Secretary of State or his predecessor as to what appears to be an unnecessarily large number of officers in that department.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is another matter to which the attention of the Minister of Finance should be called, and it is this: Under the head of the Department of Secretary of State we have a deputy head, two chief clerks, eight first-class clerks. I do not understand what possible justification there can be for employing in one department eight first-class clerks. The Department of Finance, which is certainly a not less important department, has only five first-class clerks in 1894, although I believe there is an estimate providing for one additional clerk. Why should a first-class clerk be necessary to discharge the duties in the Department of Secretary of State? Certainly, there is not first-class work to employ eight first-class clerks, and the expenditure appears to be a deliberate waste of the public money. I doubt whether there is really any occasion for more than two or three first-class clerks at the outside.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I wish to say to the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), that the promise I made to give explanations and all information that could possibly be obtained with respect to the department over which I have so recently been placed, was not a promise intended not to be kept. I must apologize again for appearing before the Committee not possessing full information with respect to matters which have been discussed. When discussing any subject I always endeavour to give the best information possible I can obtain, and I can promise the Committee that with respect to departmental affairs I shall pursue the same course. I have no hesitation in saying to the Committee that I had hoped to have investigated personally the affairs of the department with a view to making every reduction possible, and I promise the Committee that I shall do that, and at a later stage of the session I may be able to give my investigations to the Committee, which will be an answer, I hope, to the objections made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and which present themselves to my mind in somewhat of the same light.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is quite right so far as the Secretary of State is concerned for this statement to be made, but it must be remembered that the ex-Secretary of State has been in the House and occupied his late position during several years. The Minister of Marine ought to be able to give this House a reasonable explanation for the extraordinary disproportion in the number of first-class clerks in the Department of the Secretary of State. I call the attention of the Minister of Finance to the fact that there is nearly double the number that he required up to the present year in his own department. For instance, in the Auditor General's Department there is but one first-class clerk there, as against eight first-class clerks in the Department of the Secretary of State. There is really, so far as I can see, no earthly ground of justification for it in the business done by that department.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think after the promise given by the Secretary of State—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is not an answer, if the hon. gentleman will excuse me. It is a very good answer for the present Secretary of State, and if there was not another Minister present who filled the department for half a dozen years I would accept it without question. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries who has been a half dozen years there must recollect enough about the work of his former department to be able to give some explanation to the House, and the House has a right to get it. The present Secretary of State is reasonably excused, but his predecessor who held the office up to within four weeks ago ought to be able to answer.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I do not know whether I am always successful in giving the information asked for from me in connection with my department, and in this case in connection with a department I formerly had charge of; but the House will admit, I hope, that I am always ready to give such information as it is in my power to give. If I did not answer the question of the hon. gentleman immediately, it is because I thought that he would have accepted the statement made by my colleague, the Secretary of State, who said: that he was not long in charge of the department, that he had used every possible means to become familiar with it with a view to making certain reductions in the staff, and possibly in the expense, and he promised that he would be able to submit the result of his inquiry before concurrence. I did not think it would be convenient for me to discuss the organization of the department in advance of the report which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) would make to this House. I might, for instance, point out in one direction that the number of first-class clerks might be decreased, or that the chief clerks might be decreased, but I do not want to anticipate, and I am quite sure hon. gentlemen will think I am right in not anticipating, the decision the Secretary of State may arrive at. We have both discussed the matter together with a view of arriving at the most economical arrangement to be made in that department, and my colleague has my assistance and my co-operation. He is looking into the matter, and having assured the House that he is doing that with the intention of bringing about what hon. gentlemen opposite want, namely, a reduction in the expense, I think the hon. member (Sir Richard Cartwright) ought to be satisfied with that, and ought not expect me to discuss the matter now under consideration by the present Secretary of State.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Minister of Marine has given a very weak excuse for the evidences of extravagance with regard to the number of first-class clerks in this department which he has presided over for several years. Whenever these salaries have been before the House we have always pointed out where reductions could be made. Now the present Minister of Marine, who was Secretary of State for a number of years tells us that his successor will devote his consideration to reductions in the expenses of this department. That is a confession from the Minister of Marine that he never studied the question of economy when he was Secretary of State. He allowed matters to run riot and the expenses to go as they pleased, but he expects the present Secretary of State to look after the duties that he should have attended to. If you turn to the Auditor General's Report, page R-2, you will find that there are forty employees in the Department of State, and that sixteen of them including the Deputy Head each draw an average salary of $1,700. It is an outrage that in this department where merely routine work is performed there should be sixteen clerks drawing such a very high salary. It demands some explanation from the Minister of Marine. Surely he was not asleep all the time that he was Secretary of State, and he must have taken some note of what was going on and of what these men were doing. Does he think that the committee should be asked to accept the excuse he has offered? I do not think he does. Before this vote passes we are entitled to some explanation of this extraordinary state of affairs.

Mr. LISTER. If the statement of the former Secretary of State is correct, it is a very wise thing on the part of the Government to have removed him to some other department. I agree with those who preceded me that the present Secretary of State is to be excused. It is not to be supposed that he is familiar with all the details of the department, but it is somewhat remarkable that within four weeks after his appointment he announces to the House that he is considering what reductions can be made in that department, and that he will inform the House when he has made up his mind upon that point. I must confess that it does not reflect much credit upon the ex-Secretary of State, and it is to be hoped that in the Department of Marine and Fisheries which he now has the honour of filling, the accessions to the public service and the increases of pay and so on, will not be repeated in that department as it appears to have been commenced in the department which he has left. The report of the department itself shows that the duties of the office are of the most clerical character, and it is astounding that we should find there some forty gentlemen to perform those duties, when we find other departments performing enormously more work with a smaller number of officers. I should be sorry to charge the ex-Secretary of State with filling the office with supernumeraries to feed upon the public, and pretending to do something for their pay while in fact doing nothing. The work of that department consists in attending to certain correspondence between the different governments, executing patents for public lands, preparing patents for joint stock companies and preparing certain returns; but all the work from beginning to end is of the most clerical kind. The Secretary of State of course being a Minister of the Crown, is not supposed to devote much of his time to the duties of the office; but I think the ex-Secretary of State owes it to himself and to the House to answer the questions which have been asked, and to account in some way for the enormous staff at present in that office, where it appears so little skilled labour is necessary.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My hon. friend might have added that in proportion to the small amount of skilled labour, so is the excess of highly paid labour. It is not a trifling matter that this department appears to have in proportion the largest number of first-class clerks of any, perhaps the Department of Interior alone excepted.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is hardly fair to claim that the ex-Secretary of State, who now sits in the House as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, should be au fait with the department at the present moment. He has been out for a number of months.

Mr. MULOCK. He spent this money.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am speaking now of the Estimates for the coming year. He has been out of the department for several months, and my immediate predecessor is the present Minister of Militia and Defence, who is at present absent, owing to illness in his family. On both sides of the House there appears to be a desire that this department should be run economically. I can assure the House that I share that desire, and I intend to meet it as well as I can in my management of the department.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then I think the item had better stand until the hon. gentleman considers his method.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that would be the better way, instead of arranging it on concurrence.

Department of Printing and Stationery $28,162.50

Mr. McMULLEN. Under whose charge is this department?

Mr. MONTAGUE. This is under the charge of Dr. Dawson. Of course, it is in my department. I fancy it is very well managed and no reductions can be made in it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There are some small additions; what are they?

Mr. FOSTER. Just statutory.

Mr. MULOCK. I think it is time to stop these statutory increases, which are becoming an enormous burden on the country. The salaries of men are increased without reference to merit. All a man has to do now is to grow old, and he gets his reward. The industrious and efficient get no more than those who may be slothful and inattentive. I think the time has arrived for that system of statutory increases to be entirely revised. Every page of our Estimates is full of them, and they go on rolling up like snowballs. I think the people have spent about all the money they are willing to spend in this way; and in addition to economizing in that direction, I think there should be a doubling up not only of employees but of departments. I never could see the wisdom of multiplying departments and Ministers of the Crown, as has been done lately. You have increased the number, counting the Controllors, to fifteen, each having a deputy and a complete office outfit. We have eleven Ministers drawing in all $88,000, another Minister drawing $9,000, and three Controllors drawing $18,000; making in all fifteen members of this House drawing $115,000 a year, and having a special interest in retaining their offices. Fifteen out of the House in the pay of the country—not independent men. Add to that the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker, and you have seventeen; and dear knows how many more are in expectation of offices of one kind and another. What has become of the independence of Parliament? The whole business seems to be now run in order to provide situations for people in the Government or in the service of the Government. The time has arrived, I think, when there has got to be a doubling up. Of course, we have ample proof that the fifteen are not required, in the fact that they are hardly to be found in their departments at any time except when the House is sitting. During the last year they were on circuit most of the time and they have changed their departments so frequently that in the course of one year we have seen, I think, three changes in one department. Not long ago the Department of Militia and Defence was represented by the present Premier, and there were also two ex-Ministers of Militia in the House, all of them having been in the office in one year, and yet the whole three of them together could not explain one little item. The other departments are in pretty much the same position. I would like to know what the duties of the Controller of Customs are. How much time did he spend in his department last year? He was one of the travelling troupe going around the country. It is quite clear that the duplication of offices is simply to provide speakers to go about the country advocating the cause of the Government of the day. If accurate statistics had been kept for the last year, I believe it would appear that the members of the Government have not been spending half of their time in discharging the duties for which they are paid. If that is the case, I think the country is entitled to an entire re-arrangement of the system of representation in the government, which will bring down the cost of governing to the needs of the people. I do not see why the country should be called upon to pay salaries to men simply to go out on the stump, perhaps because there is nothing to do in the department, or because they are not required in their department. I do not see that the country should be called upon, under the circumstances, to pay at the rate of $115,000 a year for services of this kind. If you compare the cost of government in that supposed extravagant country to the south of us, you will find that we have rapidly overtaken the extravagance of the United States, to say nothing about the comparison that could be made with other wealthier countries than Canada. If we are going to return to an economical system of Government, we cannot do better than begin at the very top. The extravagance at Ottawa during the last few years has found its way through every part of the country. It has been imitated in the provinces and municipalities, and a vast amount of the debt and depression which to-day confronts us is directly attributable to the bad example set at headquarters. I do not care what government is in power, it is due to the country now that we should begin our economy at the top, and then our rulers will have a good excuse for extending that system throughout all branches of the service. What is the use of the Government talking about economy when they do not begin it themselves, if they are really desirous of economising and limiting expenditure to the needs of the country, they will begin by reducing the heads of the departments; and until they do that, in my judgment, it is a selfish species of economy when the Government maintain unnecessary ornamental offices and figure-heads, and then profess to be deeply concerned about economical administrations.

Department of the Interior..... $98,454

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think that the hon. gentleman has dispensed with some half a dozen of third-class clerks. What has he done with them?

Mr. DALY. The first change is in the first class clerks. One of the decreases is caused by the death of the late Mr. Wm. Mills. That position has not been filled, and the clerkship is done away with. Two offices were rendered vacant by death last year and they have not been filled. A reduction has been made by the retirement of Mr. Lacoste Lacasse. Another by the retirement of Mr. Poper. Another by the retirement of Mr. Hatch. Those three men have been superannuated and their places not filled.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Are they all young men?

Mr. DALY. Thirty-eight, forty-seven and forty-six years.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are those three superannuated?

Mr. DALY. Yes, and their offices abolished.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Really, that appears singular to superannuate men at these ages. Surely they might have been used in the places of the lot of extra clerks of whom we have had such a superabundance always drawing pay. What superannuation is allowed?

Mr. DALY. I think Mr. Hatch $400, Mr. Poper, $260 and Mr. Lacasse $240.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then, these gentlemen receive about a thousand dollars for doing nothing.

Mr. DALY. They are entitled to it under the Civil Service Act.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It was not intended for cases of that kind. This looks like a gross abuse of the Act. We have always contended that the Department of the Interior was, perhaps, the most extravagant department; and small as the economy is, we are glad to see that there is some economy going on in that department. But most assuredly I do not think it is a proper use to make of the Superannuation Act to superannuate men like these when you could employ them in other departments. This is the kind of work the Privy Council is engaged in, and which causes it to require 120,000 folios to carry on their work.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This shows the House that the question I put to the Minister earlier in the evening is not academic, but practical, and its importance is illustrated by the statement the hon. gentleman has just made. He has indicated that three permanent clerks in his department, for whom he has no work to do, had to be superannuated. What is true in the Department of the Interior may be equally true in a very short time in a large number of the departments, and the House ought to consider whether this is the way in which reductions in the staff of the various departments are to be made. Is it by discharging such men as these, no matter what their age may be or the length of their service, and placing them on the superannuation list, and making them a charge for the rest of their lives upon the Treasury? That is a question upon which the Government ought to have a policy and be prepared to submit that policy to the House. If we are to take the statement just made by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly) as the policy of the Government, then it is clear that the House cannot too soon consider it. Are we disposed, by a reduction of the staff in the public service to put several hundred parties as pensioners on the public treasury? That is a question that the House has practically before it in the statement which the hon. gentleman has just made. I do not say that you should engage a person permanently in the public service and then discharge him at a moment's notice, and without compensation. The condition of things brought about by the hasty and ill-considered appointments to the public service that have been made beyond the public requirements, is now practically forcing itself upon the attention of the Government, and, at this moment, upon the attention of the committee of this House; so that we are called upon to consider whether we are to get rid of the supernumeraries in this way, or whether we may, with justice to them, get rid of them in a way less expensive to the public treasury. I do not think that it is anything of which a young man ought to be proud that he has been made a pensioner upon the public service for the remainder of his life. He ought not to be discharged at a moment's notice, without some consideration being given to his case. But the fact is that you have such, the fact is that you have in the department of which the hon. gentleman is the head—I do not say that he is personally responsible—a large number of persons beyond the actual requirements of the department if it is efficiently organized. And, that being so, it has seemed to me of the first consequence that this House and this Committee should consider, in the interest of the country, what is to be done with these supernumeraries. The Government have the question practically before them, according to the statement which the hon. gentleman has made, which shows that the expenses of the department are apparently reduced for this year by the transference of three officers from that department to the superannuation list.

Mr. FOSTER. I think a reasonable view to take of it is this: If these men have, by reason of age or incapacity, become unfitted for their work, I think it is clearly better to put them on the superannuation list and save their salaries, than to keep them at full salary. The cost to the country is not nearly so great in that particular.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is that the only alternative in the reformation of the service, either to superannuate them or retain them?

Mr. FOSTER. There is another—to give them what is called a reasonable gratuity. It might be reasonably considered in some cases whether that step should be taken. But I think in every case, care should be taken to discriminate. With regard to the three clerks mentioned by my colleague the Minister of the Interior, he seems to have come to the conclusion, and no doubt upon good grounds that the best way was to superannuate those gentlemen, that that is the best way to take care of them with the least burden upon the treasury. We have now spent some time in discussion, and have not done a great deal of work. But, for my own part, I do not feel disposed to ask the House to remain too long; and if we are not able to get through in a reasonable time, it is hardly worth while to keep the House to unreasonable hours. I would like the House to meet as promptly as possible at the appointed hour. I believe that half past seven is the hour for meeting in the evening. That seems to be considered a little early. But I was here, as was also the chairman of committees, at a quarter to eight, and if we could get to work at that time it would be something of a gain. Then, if we have a mind to work we could get through a good deal in the course of two or three hours in the evening.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Our usual hour for meeting in the evening has been eight o'clock.

Mr. FOSTER. After eight, more frequently, in practice.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is better to name an hour, and I think we can meet any time the hon. gentleman chooses. I am glad to hear that the hon. gentleman proposes to meet punctually. I think he will find that, for the convenience of all, eight o'clock will be a better hour than a quarter to eight.

Mr. MULLOCK. I would like to ask the hon. Minister to bring the particulars showing the exact dates of the appointments of these gentlemen and the Orders in Council on which they were superannuated.

Mr. DALY. Their combined salaries were $2,912; the superannuation allowance is $1,100, making a saving of $1,812 a year. I have no objection to inform the hon. gentleman—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is a rather important subject, and the hon. gentleman had better bring down the facts in detail.

Mr. DALY. I have the facts here, and could give them if the House was not about to adjourn.

Mr. McMULLEN. The remarks of the Minister of Finance with regard to the superannuation, in my opinion, call for some reply, and I shall take the opportunity to reply to them on a future occasion.

Resolutions reported.

ADJOURNMENT—THE CENSUS.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Before you put that motion, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words with reference to an article which appeared in this morning's "Citizen," and I do so because it is pretty evident from the character of the article that it has been inspired in a certain department of the Government in Ottawa. I do not charge any Minister of the Government with having inspired the article; but it is perfectly clear to any one who reads it that this article originated with an important officer of the Department of Agriculture. That article charged myself and other members of the House with an exhibition of ignorance in the discussion which took place here yesterday, a very brief discussion, on the subject of the census. Now, while I do not accuse the writer of that article with being ignorant, I wish to show to the House that that charge does not apply, either to myself or to the hon. gentlemen who, on this side of the House, referred to the census. It is pretty clear that, although the writer may not be ignorant, he was not disposed that the public should be accurately informed. In speaking of the census of the city of London, I said the census was inaccurate and misleading, and in proof I say the census shows that the number of industrial establishments in 1881, was 317; that the number of persons employed was 4,917, and that the capital invested was $1,511,723. In the census of 1891 there were 804 establishments, with 6,045 employees and $1,847,353 capital invested. Now, it will be observed that there is more than 100 per cent increase in the number of manufacturing establishments. The increase was 433. The increase in the number of employees is 1,128, or two and a half to each one of those establishments. In 1881 the product of manufacture in those establishments was $8,660,627, and although the number of establishments has increased more than 100 per cent, the product of manufacture in 1891 was $425,420 less. So that the 433 new establishments employed two and a half persons each, the product was $775 each, and it was $425,420 less than it had been ten years before. Yet we were told by the Secretary of State, who spoke yesterday, who spoke under the inspiration of the officers of the Government, who ought to know, and who ought not to undertake to mislead the House or the country, that a new classification was being made, which would show that these manufacturing establishments that had less than $2,000 capital, were not to be included in the census calculation that was submitted to the House, and which showed you, Sir, that the amount of capital of each of these 433 new establishments is $775.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. Is the hon. gentleman going into a discussion of the census without making any motion?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am going to exercise my right, and to disabuse the public mind of the misstatement, the untrue statement, the untrue charge of ignorance, that was made against myself and others on this side of the House. I am doing so, not because it appeared in a newspaper—for if it was written by the ordinary editor, I would not have taken notice of it—but I know, from the character of the article, whence the inspiration of the article came, and I wish, not only that the country should be disabused of the attempt to mislead it, but that the thoroughly dishonest manner in which the census had been made up should be made known to the public.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, What is the gross amount of our imports to the first days of April, 1894 and 1895? How much of above were entered for consumption to said dates? What are our gross exports up to the first days of April in 1894 and 1895? How much of above consisted of the produce of Canada to said dates?

Mr. WALLACE. The gross amount of our imports during the year 1893-4 to 1st April, was $91,341,482; the gross amount of our imports during the same period in 1894-5 was $80,987,079. The value of importations entered for consumption for the year 1893-4 to 1st April were $86,370,739; the value of importations entered for consumption in the year 1894-5 to 1st April was $78,126,603. Our gross exports for the year 1893-4 to 1st April were $89,606,033 in value. For the corresponding period of the present year, our gross exports were $86,271,861. During the said period of 1893-94, the value of the goods, the produce of Canada, exported was $78,915,138; and for the corresponding period of the year 1894-95, the value of goods, the produce of Canada, exported was $79,492,649.

GENERAL BOOTH'S PROPOSED CANADIAN SETTLEMENT.

Mr. O'BRIEN asked, Has any correspondence or other communication taken place between General Booth, of the Salvation Army, and the Government with reference to the establishment of a settlement in any part of Canada by General Booth, of persons brought by him from England? If so, has any arrangement been made with General Booth of such a nature as is above referred to, and what are the terms proposed?

Mr. DALY. Further than an interview with some members of the Government in which Mr. Booth discussed the scheme, no correspondence or other communications have taken place between General Booth of the Salvation Army, and the Government with reference to the establishment of a settlement in any part of Canada by General Booth, of persons brought by him from England.

BEHRING SEA ARBITRATION EXPENSES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, What has been paid on account of expenses of Behring Sea Arbitration to date? How much remains to be paid, or is claimed by the British Government?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I presume the hon. gentleman means the total expenses. The total expenditure on account of the Behring Sea question, to date, is $134,191.68, which sum includes about $45,000 for counsel fees in the case of a schooner "W. B. Sayward," which was seized and taken to an American port. The Government is not aware of any further expenses claimed to be due.

REVENUE AND EXPENDITURE FOR APRIL.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have to thank the hon. Minister for the ten days' statement, but, no doubt the whole House will be interested in the answer to the question of which I have given notice. What was the amount of revenue received during the months of April, in 1894 and 1895, respectively? What was the expenditure chargeable to the Consolidated Fund during same periods?

Mr. FOSTER. Revenue—April, 1894, $2,442,537.98; April, 1895, $2,896,500.84. Expenditure—April, 1894, $2,183,624.90; April, 1895, $2,375,801.60.

FISHING REGULATIONS IN THE GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE.

Mr. FRASER asked, 1. Does the Government propose to change the Order in Council of the 10th April, A.D. 1894, respecting "Fishing Regulations for the Protection of the Cod Fishing in the Gulf of St. Lawrence," so as to permit vessels of 100 tons and upwards the use of two traps? 2. Does the Government propose changing said regulations so as to allow vessels of 50 to 80 tons two traps? 3. Does the Government propose to make the above changes during the present fishing season? 4. If the Government does not propose to make said changes, what changes, if any, do they propose making?

Mr. COSTIGAN. 1. I beg to state that it is not proposed to make any further changes in the Order in Council of 10th April, 1874. It has already been changed so that vessels measuring over 100 tons shall be allowed two traps. 2. The Government does not propose to allow vessels of from 50 to 80 tons to fish two traps. The other two questions are answered by above.

CARRYING THE MAILS IN CAPE BRETON.

Mr. FRASER asked, 1. How much has been paid for carrying the mails from Hawkesbury, Inverness County, to Sydney, Cape Breton, during the years 1889, 1890, 1891, 1892, 1893 and 1894; giving the amount for each year? 2. Who was the carrier of said mails for each of said years, and was the work done by tender and contract? 3. Are the mails now carried by the Cape Breton Railway? If so, when was the change made? 4. Are the present carriers required to use as many horses and use similar carriages as were in use in 1879? If not, where is the difference?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. 1. In 1889, $5,724.88; 1890, $6,270.73; 1891, $9,000; 1892, $9,000; 1893, $9,000; 1894, $9,000. 2. John Morrison was the contractor from the beginning of 1889 until the 1st March, 1894; since that date Mr. J. S. M. Morrison has held the contract. Mr. John Morrison acquired the contract originally in 1885 by transfer from Mr. P. S. Lindsay, and on its expiration in 1889, the service was left in Mr. Morrison's hands under yearly agreement. The agreement was transferred to Mr. J. S. M. Morrison on 1st March, 1894. 3. Mails have been carried by the Cape Breton Railway since 1st June, 1892. 4. The requirements as regards horses and vehicles have not been changed since 1885.

THE DREDGE "LAVAL."

Mr. DEVLIN asked, 1. What was the contract price and the total cost of the dredge "Laval"? When was the contract given? To whom, and when was the work accepted by the Government? 2. Were any claims in connection with this dredge made by workmen employed at its construction? If so, by whom, and what was the amount of such claims? 3. Were the claims paid? If so, to whom, and who signed the receipts? 4. Had Edward Watters, of Hull, a salary in connection with this work? If so, the amount, and by whom drawn? 5. Are all claims settled? If not, whose remain unpaid?

Mr. OUIMET. 1. The contract price for hull alone of the dredge was $21,000; for boilers, $3,700. The balance of the work including the engines, fitting up of the dredge with frame, buckets, &c., was done at our shops at Sorel, and the total cost of the dredge was $39,552.78. 2. The contract for the hull was given to P. G. Watters, of Hull, on 20th June, 1892; and for the boilers, to P. G. Powers, on 7th July, 1892. 3. Claims for wages were preferred by a number of workmen, to the amount of $363.41, for work done for the account of contractor Watters, between September 23 and October 14, 1892, the latter being the date at which the department took possession of the hull of the above dredge. 4. Subsequently claims were also made by certain parties against Watters, their employer, for work done up to the 22nd July, 1893. These latter claims were as follows:—Albert Turgeon, $1.25; P. Laine, $1.25; Wm. Watters, $29.50; Edward Watters, $58.64; Willie Watters, $67.80; P. G. Watters, $90.50; Pete Watters, $43.08; James Highland and horse, 4½ days, $7.88, making a total of $299.90. These claims were not recognized by the department. 5. The claims amounting to $363.41 were paid to the parties themselves by the departmental paymaster, and the workmen have themselves signed the receipt. This sum was charged to the contractor. 6. In the amount of $363.41 paid as above, appears an item of $31.14 claimed by and paid to Edward Watters, as carpenter, for 20¼ days, at $1.50 per day. He received the money personally, as shown by the pay-list. The total amount paid to the contractor P. G. Watters, is $19,363.41. This sum includes the $363.41 paid by the department for wages due by the contractor, and at the latter's request. I suppose the hon. gentleman does not wish me to read the names, and the number of days' work, and the amounts paid to each of these men.

Mr. DEVLIN. No; I will be satisfied if the hon. Minister says that the men themselves were paid, and that they signed the receipts for the amounts.

Mr. OUIMET. Yes. I will send the list over to the hon. gentleman.

IMMIGRANTS FROM MICHIGAN TO ONTARIO.

Mr. DEVLIN asked, 1. Has the Government promised to aid a colonization scheme promoted by Rev. Father Paradis, or a company represented by him, in transporting immigrants from Michigan to Verner, or other places in the district of Nipissing, Ont., and if so, to what extent? 2. What steps, if any, has the Government taken to see that the immigrants so assisted were properly placed?

Mr. DALY. 1. The Department of the Interior has deposited with Mr. J. D. Roland, president of the General Colonization and Repatriation Society of the province of Quebec, the sum of $1,000 to be expended by the said society in furthering colonization, and the scheme promoted by Father Paradis, subject to the conditions that no portion thereof shall be expended in transporting the immigrants, the understanding being that they will either pay their own way or be granted free transportation by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. 2. The duty of seeing that the immigrants in question are properly placed, lies with the promoters of the movement and the Government of the province of Ontario, as they are to settle on provincial and not Dominion lands.

CENSUS OF MANITOBA.

Mr. LaRIVIERE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to have a census of the province of Manitoba taken in the year 1896?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The answer is, yes.

THE SIX NATION INDIANS.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant) asked, How many copies of the Report of the Department of Indian Affairs have been sent to the Six Nation Indians, and to whom have they been sent?

Mr. DALY. Fourteen copies were sent on the 19th inst. to the Indian Superintendent at Brantford, for distribution among the chiefs.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. EDGAR asked, What was the cost of the "Maintenance of way and works" on the Intercolonial Railway for the year ending 30th June, 1894?

Mr. HAGGART. The cost of "Maintenance of way and works" on the Intercolonial Railway for the year ending 30th June, 1894, was $656,758.04.

FISHERY REGULATIONS ON ST. JOHN RIVER.

Mr. COLTER asked, What changes are contemplated by the Government in the fishing regulations on the St. John River, New Brunswick? In what way, and to whom, has the Minister of Marine and Fisheries signified his intention of having the fishing regulations changed on that river? When will such changes take effect?

Mr. COSTIGAN. 1. The changes at present contemplated are shortening weekly close-time for shad and gaspereaux by making it begin on Saturday night instead of Friday night; allowing an increased depth of shad and gaspereaux nets to be fished; reopening the sturgeon fishery there; reopening the bass fishery there. 2. By letter to the inspector of fisheries for the district in which the St. John River is situated, and to the petitioners. 3. As regards the shad and gaspereaux fisheries, at once; as regards the sturgeon fishery about midsummer, after the expiry of the close season; and as regards the bass fishery, in the fall.

PORT OF TIGNISH.

Mr. PERRY asked, What is the amount collected and paid in by the wharfinger at the port of Tignish, Prince Edward Island, for the year 1894?

Mr. COSTIGAN. No return has been received from the wharfinger at Tignish for 1894.

Mr. PERRY asked, What is the amount of expenses incurred in keeping up the signal station at Tignish breakwater, Prince Edward Island, including the keeper's salary for the year 1894? Who is in charge of said signal station?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The whole cost is $50.54. George Conroy is the signal agent. $45 covers the salary and $5.54 covers the expenses.

Mr. PERRY asked, Has a lighthouse-keeper been appointed for Tignish breakwater light, Prince Edward Island, in place of Isidore Gaudet (deceased)? If so, who is he? What is the date of his appointment and what salary is he getting?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. Joseph S. Richard was appointed light-keeper on the 18th June, 1894, at a salary of $130 per annum. Mr. Richard has since resigned, and an officer will be appointed immediately to take the vacancy.

GOVERNMENT INSPECTOR OF WHEAT AT FORT WILLIAM.

Mr. MARTIN moved for :

Return showing the names of the Government inspectors of wheat at Fort William, the number of cars of wheat inspected during each of the years from 1887 to 1894, both inclusive, the number of bushels of wheat shipped out of the elevators at Fort William during each of said years, the average quantity of wheat in store in the Canadian Pacific Railway's elevators at Fort William during each of said years, the fees allowed for inspection, and the quantity of grain allowed to be taken from each car as a sample by the inspector.

He said : Considerable discussion has taken place, particularly in the province of Ontario, on the question of payment of public officials by fees. I desire to draw the attention of the House and the country to the case of a public official who is paid by fees and whose emoluments are simply enormous. Hon. members will understand that nearly all the wheat shipped from Manitoba and the Territories passes through the Canadian Pacific Railway elevators at Fort William. This wheat is inspected according to law by an official appointed by the Dominion Government. The fees received by the inspector are paid by the owners of the wheat, but, of course, in the end they come from the farmers of the country that produce the wheat. The fees for inspection amount to 60 cents per carload for inspecting wheat into the elevator, and 40 cents per thousand bushels for inspecting wheat out of the elevator. I ask in this motion for accurate information, so as to be able to ascertain exactly the emoluments of the gentleman who has the good fortune to hold the position of Government inspector at Fort William. I may, however, give a rough estimate, which I believe is fairly accurate, of the emoluments received by that official. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), last session, and I think this session, placed a notice on the paper, intimating his intention to introduce a Bill to cut down the salary of the Governor General. The official to whom I refer in my motion receives fees running up quite closely to the payment which the Governor General receives under the law, according to the information I possess. The number of carloads of wheat shipped at Fort William last year numbered something like 20,000. At 60 cents per car the fees of this inspection would amount to the modest sum of $12,000. Then, this wheat during the course of the year, most of it during the course of the fall and winter succeeding the season in which it is harvested, is shipped out by lake and rail, the larger portion going out by lake. The inspector is allowed 40 cents per thousand bushels for the wheat he inspects out. On 20,000 carloads the fees would amount to about $4,800. That makes the total fees received, on an estimate of 20,000 carloads, $16,800. But this is not all the emoluments received by this official. A certain quantity of wheat is taken from each carload for the purposes of inspection, and this wheat is stored by the inspector, and afterwards sold, and this amounts, so I am informed, to several carloads, for which the inspector is able to realize something like $1,500 or $2,000. This brings his emoluments up to $18,000 or $19,000 per annum. But that is not all. Most men would be fairly well satisfied with an income of that amount ; but this gentleman is able, through his position, to control absolutely all the fire insurance upon the grain in the elevators at Fort William. I am informed by gentlemen who operate in wheat that they find it in their interest to do their insurance entirely through the inspector, and while I have no accurate means of giving the House the exact amount made by the inspector out of the insurances, my informant states, and he is a man who is very reliable, that he is satisfied the commissions on insurance fees will amount from $8,000 to $10,000 a year, so that altogether the fees obtained by the Government inspector at Fort William run from $25,000 to $30,000 per annum. The House will understand that only a few minutes are occupied by the inspector in inspecting a carload of wheat. He has an instrument which he shoves down into the wheat, pulls it out and examines it. It only takes a very few minutes and the inspector is able to do the great bulk of the work, so far as the inspection of the work is concerned. In very busy seasons he has, I believe, to employ a few assistants, but his total expenses would not, if my information is correct, amount to more than perhaps $1,000 or $1,500. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have not brought this matter before the House for the purpose of finding any fault with the inspector. I do not consider that he is to blame in any degree for the state of circumstances which exist, for no man would refuse to take the fees which he is entitled to collect by law. So far as I know, the gentleman who is there has given satisfaction. I have no complaint to make against him, and certainly he is not to blame in the slightest degree for taking what the law allows. It may be considered perhaps, that he is pressing his rights a little far in obtaining these insurances upon the grain, and I think he should be prevented from doing that. At the same time I do not know that it is any great injury to the shippers of wheat that he should have that monopoly, but still, it does seem that there must be something very wrong indeed when it is possible for one man to make $25,000 or $30,000, a large portion of which—all the fees, at any rate, for inspection—comes in the end out of the unfortunate farmers of the North-west, who have a very hard time to make a living at present. This is not all, Mr. Speaker. Nearly every car load of grain is inspected twice. It is inspected at the city of Winnipeg and again at Fort William. I do not say every car load is inspected twice, but a great many car loads are inspected at Winnipeg and at Fort William, so that there is a double charge. The inspector at Winnipeg also gets 60 cents a carload, which, as the House will understand, in the end, comes out of the farmers. There has been more or less discussion as to the necessity for those two inspections. It might be thought, perhaps, that one inspection would suffice, but the answer that is made to that, and I must say there is some point in it, is, that the inspector who inspects the grain out of the elevator must inspect it into it, because if grain were taken into the elevator at Fort William upon the inspection of the Government inspector at Winnipeg, it might occur that when it was inspected out by a different man the quality of the grain would not pan out. Under these circumstances it seems to me that the very strong criticism which has been directed, more especially by the Patrons of Industry, to the comparatively very moderate emoluments received by registrars and sheriffs and other public officials in the province of Ontario, sinks into insignificance compared with the emoluments received by those officers of this Government. I do think that if this Government were not busy in every conceivable way, except in looking after the interests of the people, and the effect of their laws upon the people, that they would not allow fees of the magnitude of these to which I refer to be imposed on that class of the community for whom I speak in this House. As I have said, the figures which I give are estimates, but I believe that they are tolerably correct. At any rate, they were given to me by gentlemen who are well versed in the grain trade, and I think the House and the country will be surprised to find that there is an official, a man requiring no very great amount of education or ability or skill, drawing such a revenue. After all, it is a very simple thing indeed to judge of the quality of wheat, and there are dozens and hundreds of grain buyers making from $60 to $70 a month in Manitoba and the Territories, who are quite as competent in this business as the inspectors, and in saying this I am not saying a word against the qualification of Mr. Gibbs, or of Mr. Horne, the inspector at Winnipeg. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the same fate which met most of my motions asking for information last session will not be meted out to this one, but that the Government will in a reasonable time bring down the information I ask for. I hope also that the Government will take into consideration the necessity of making very considerable reductions in the amount of the fees to be paid for this inspection. Twenty thousand cars of wheat is nothing compared with the number of cars which we expect shortly to ship over the Canadian Pacific Railway from that country, and as the number of cars increase so do the emoluments of the inspectors, and, as I have pointed out, the amount of work done in inspecting each car is so small that the fees received are almost clear profit. Another point, Mr. Speaker, which I have almost overlooked. I have been informed that Mr. Gibbs intends in the future not to do the insurance himself—or perhaps he has not directly done the insurance in his own name—but that he intends to make some arrangement with his son to do it. Though this may be the case, practically he controls and gets the benefit of the commission on the premiums upon all the insurance on the wheat in these elevators.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). There is no objection, Mr. Speaker, to bring down the papers which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) requires, with the exception, perhaps, of the return he asks for, of the number of bushels shipped ex-elevator from Port Arthur, because some of the grain goes into the elevator and is not inspected. Now, with regard to the exorbitant salaries to which the hon. gentleman has drawn the attention of the House, I think he must be mistaken. If he will look at page 26 of the Commissioner's report he will find that the amount drawn, instead of being about $20,000, as he says, is actually $8,770.90, out of which the inspector has to pay his assistants. It must not be forgotten that the inspection of grain at Port Arthur, especially the inspection of the large quantities now shipped from that port, is a matter of comparatively recent date. There was a time, not so very long ago, when the fees were very much below even the amount I have mentioned here as appearing in the report for the current year—in 1889, $3,691; in 1892, $2,902, and so on. Whatever the actual fees are, I will see that the statement is brought down in time for any further discussion which the hon. gentleman may wish to have in connection with this matter. I have no reason whatever to defend the excessive fees obtained by any officer in any branch of the department over which I preside; quite the contrary. I may say that during the two years that I have been at the head of the Department of Inland Revenue, this matter has been brought to my attention, and I am myself of opinion that when the fees reach a certain figure they should be either reduced, or else the amount in excess should be placed to the credit of consolidated revenue. I have scarcely had time to look into that subject, along with a great many others in connection with which I propose to recommend some changes ; but that the hon. gentleman is altogether in error in the figures he has quoted to the House, I have no doubt. With regard to what appears to be a reflection upon the officer in question, that he sells the samples of grain which he takes, I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken, because every inspector must keep those samples, in view of the possibility of questions arising between the sellers and purchasers of the cargoes of wheat, as to which he may be called in evidence. The Act does not regulate the quantity of grain the inspector is to retain. Presumably he retains sufficient to answer all the purposes of inspection. I have never heard of any complaint of that kind by any shipper of grain regarding the conduct of Mr. Gibbs. With regard to the double inspection of grain at Winnipeg and at Port Arthur, referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg, that is not a subject germane to the motion which the hon. gentleman has made. As I have said, I have no hesitation in bringing down everything in the possession of the department in relation to this question.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Who fixes the amounts charged for inspection ?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The amount is fixed either by the statute or by a regulation under the statute. I will inquire into that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to call the Controller's attention to the fact that, after all said and done, on the main question the hon. member for Winnipeg is very nearly correct. His statement, if I remember it correctly, was that the officer received $12,000 for the inspection of 20,000 carloads, at the rate of 60 cents per carload. The hon. Minister says that is altogether incorrect—that the amount received was $8,700. If the export of grain from Manitoba proceeds in anything like the increasing ratio which we all hope it will, it is clear to see that an enormous charge might easily be made in favour of this particular official. It is very probable, as the hon. gentleman says, that this business has grown up rapidly within the last two or three years ; but if the process of inspection be such as is described by the hon. member for Winnipeg, I do not know that it would be a very difficult thing for one man to inspect 20,000 cars in the course of a season, which I suppose would extend over 150 days or thereabouts; spring and fall. That would not amount to a very great number per day, and would certainly not be beyond the power of one man to inspect ; and in such cases the charge is altogether excessive in proportion to the work required to be done. I think the suggestion the hon. gentleman makes, that in all cases some limit should be fixed, is a very useful one ; but, having reference to the state of the North-west, I think that instead of making use of this inspection as a means of getting revenue out of the North-west farmers, the rate should be reduced from time to time to such a figure as would afford a decent but not excessive remuneration to the officer employed. What that might be is, of course, for the department to ascertain. The more cars that are inspected, the lower, I presume, the rate could be made. There is no doubt that from time to time just such cases as the hon. member for Winnipeg has brought up will occur ; and, unless the matter is carefully watched, large sums of money may go into the pockets of individuals which ought never to be exacted from the farmers or other parties concerned, but which, if exacted, should undoubtedly go into the public treasury.

Mr. MULOCK. One other branch of the case brought up by the hon. member for Winnipeg was not alluded to by the Controller. The hon. member for Winnipeg stated that the inspector was also engaged in the insurance business. If that is the case, I submit that that ought to be brought to an end. My hon. friend sees no objection to that. I do. Where a public servant is engaged in some private business more or less connected with the subject-matter of his official duties, complications are sure to arise. That must be the case here. We hope that every year there will be an increase in the output of grain from Port Arthur. It is not a case of allowing fees to be collected at isolated or remote points in the North-west, where there will be an uncertain amount of business ; but at Port Arthur we trust there will always be a sufficient flow of business to employ one man all his time ; and I submit whether the time has not arrived when this officer should be put under a reasonable salary and be required to perform his duties in person instead of farming them out, and engaging in other lucrative occupations. If he is engaged in earning $10,000 or whatever it may be in insurance, he must certainly be neglecting the business for which he is employed. The country is entitled to his full time in the discharge of the important duties for which he is engaged, and he has no right, in my opinion, to embark in outside business such as insurance, quite apart from the complications which are likely to arise. When it is added that this fee is a direct tax upon the farmers of the country, it should be only necessary for the matter to be emphasized in the House to induce the Controller to deal with it as he has promised to do.

Mr. FRASER. There is one other reason why no officer should be permitted to carry on insurance business, particularly in connection with the grain trade. If, as has been hinted, it is found convenient that insurance should be given to this man, it is easy to know why ; for if it is not given, the grain may not be inspected in a way to suit the man requiring the inspection. If this officer is engaged in the insurance business, I think he should be at once stopped. Anybody can see that when this inspector says to a shipper of grain, give me the insurance, the shipper will do so, although he might insure in an office at the same or, perhaps, at a lower rate. The shipper, however, wants to get his grain passed, and will not, therefore, refuse to place the insurance with the inspector. This may open, also, a door to fraud by enabling the inspector to charge a larger premium, provided he will pass grain which otherwise he might not pass.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). As I said before, I have for some time been considering the advisability of making a change. As the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has truly observed, this is a trade which has grown up within a comparatively recent period. As far as the matter of insurance goes, I never knew before that the inspector was engaged in the insurance business, and it is very singular that no objection has been made before on that score.

Mr. MARTIN. I fancy there is no danger whatever of any objection being made by any shipper of grain, because those gentlemen who have given this information have asked most particularly that their names should not be mentioned. It is easily seen that a large shipper of grain is entirely at the mercy of Mr. Gibbs. I believe he has done his duty fairly well, but when it is known that he takes insurance on the grain, you may depend that he will have the insurance, because it makes no difference whatever to the owner of the grain whether he pays the premium to Mr. Gibbs, or some other insurance agent. I had no intention of saying that I thought this action on his part was right. What I said was that I could not blame him very much, but I think the Government should prohibit him absolutely from having anything to do, directly or indirectly, with the insurance on the grain. It is most unfair to other gentlemen engaged in the business. The hon. gentleman has said that the fees only amount to some $8,000. If so, my information is quite inaccurate. I gave it to the House as it was given to me by more than one gentleman engaged in this business. I cannot see how it is possible that the fees should only amount to $8,000, because, supposing there were only 10,000 car loads of grain inspected, the fees should certainly amount to more than $8,000. And it is well known that, according to reports furnished to the public—I do not know how accurate they are—12,000,000 bushels have been exported from Manitoba over the Canadian Pacific Railway, apart from what went out over the Northern Pacific to Duluth, and that, according to newspaper reports, is a very moderate amount for recent years. I fancy that there must have been, last year, and for several years previous, at least 12,000,000 bushels that went out of the country in that way; and, in that case, my estimate of $16,000 or $17,000 for fees must be strictly accurate. As to the question of selling the samples, I gave my information to the House as it was given to me. I do not know that the dealers in grain have any particular fault to find with that. I did not mention it in that sense, but simply as showing an additional prerequisite to swell the emoluments of this gentleman. I am very much pleased, indeed, at the attitude taken by the hon. Minister, and I hope he will give this matter very full inquiry, and that the result will be to put the inspector on a salary, which, in my opinion, would be very much the better way, so that he would know exactly what he has to get, and the question of a large or small amount of wheat would have nothing to do with his salary. If there be a large amount, he will simply have to pay so much more for assistance. I should only charge fees sufficient to reimburse the Government for the necessary expenses in connection with the matter. That is all that ought to come out of the farmers who grow this wheat.

Motion agreed to.

FREDERICTON AND ST. MARY'S BRIDGE COMPANY.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for :

Return showing the amount of money collected for tolls, fees or rents of any kind by the Fredericton and St. Mary's Railway Bridge Company in each year separately, up to the close of their last year's business; the amount of money paid the Dominion Government as interest on the $300,000 loaned to the company, and the arrears due to the 30th June, 1894, and the amount since paid, if any.

He said: I wish to draw the attention of the House to a few facts in connection with the formation of this company. It appears that this company was chartered in 1885. It was chartered for the purpose of building a bridge across the St. John's River. The chartered members were Thos. Temple, who is a member of this House, Egerton R. Burpee, Alexander Gibson the elder, Alexander Gibson the younger, and Fred S. Hillyard. These five men are the charter members of this company. The House will notice, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Temple, who is a member of this House, and the two Gibsons, have a controlling interest in that board. The capital stock of that company was named in the charter at $400,000, with power to increase to $500,000. The charter authorized the company to go into operation when $200,000 was subscribed, with 10 per cent paid up. The board formed with a capital, paid up, of $20,000. In 1887 the Government gave the company a loan of $300,000—this company with its paid-up capital of $20,000—with interest at 4 per cent. It appears that they paid the interest the first year, at least I cannot find that there is any balance of interest for that year. Sir Charles Tupper was Finance Minister at that time. I think it was in May, 1888, the present Finance Minister took the office which he has held ever since. The company went on and constructed the bridge, together with 2 1-10 miles of railway as part of the work. The cost of the whole structure, bridge and railway, was $419,586. Now, the money that was contributed for the purpose of the work was as follows:—The capital stock, as I have stated, was $200,000, 10 per cent paid up on which made $20,000. The Government loan was $300,000; the company issued bonds—under the authority of the Dominion, no doubt—for $50,000. These bonds were placed on the market and, no doubt, realized the full amount. The Dominion gave them a free grant of $30,000 in the year 1889. These amounts make a total of $400,000 raised by the company to construct the work, the total cost of which was $419,586.

Mr. LISTER. The alleged cost.

Mr. McMULLEN. The alleged cost, yes. Well, Sir, according to the last report filed with the Department of Finance, the company has a floating debt of $19,975, so, taking into account their floating debt, and the actual cash received, the company has in hand a balance of $389. The company has not paid a cent of interest to the Government for the last five years. The interest, at 4 per cent, comes to $12,000 a year. This year, I presume, as last year, the interest will be charged to a special account. I notice that the Auditor General brought the condition of this company before the Finance Minister for the purpose of ascertaining why this interest had not been collected. The reference to the matter will be found in the Auditor General's Report for 1893. He says:

I do not find that anything has been paid on account of the arrears due for interest by the Fredericton and St. Mary's Bridge Company. What action has been taken by your department to obtain payment of these arrears?

Now, the Finance Minister, I understand, replies:

I beg to say that the arrears of interest by the Fredericton and St. Mary's Bridge Company have been charged to a special account.

That is the reply of the Finance Minister, and not a single dollar has been paid. Again, the Auditor General has drawn the attention of the Finance Minister to the condition of this account, and the Finance Minister, on another occasion, says that the company has been written to with regard to the arrears, and that no answer has been received at the Finance Department. Now, Sir, this is a most extraordinary transaction. Here we have a company formed with the very flimsy basis of $20,000 paid-up capital. We have the Government of the country in control of the funds of this Dominion granting to the company $300,000 of the people's money for the purpose of constructing this bridge. In addition, the company is granted a bonus of $30,000 in order to enable them to carry out this work. And, putting all the sums together, allowing nothing for the amount of tolls that they have received, we find that the company have an actual balance left in their hands. In considering this case, you must take the position as it stands to-day. What is its position? It owes the following sums:—Government loan, $300,000; accumulated interest on that loan, $72,000; bonded debt, $50,000; floating debt, $19,975; in all, $441,975—against a work that the company, in its own report to the Government says cost $419,586. So that the work stands with a debt against it, including what the Dominion holds and the bonded debt, but without counting anything on account of stock, of $22,389 more than the entire cost. Now, Sir, the Finance Minister. I understand, has recently paid a visit to this particular county of York. I understand that the Conservatives there have done him the honour of nominating him to become the representative of the county in which this bridge is located. I understand, also, that Mr. Gibson, who, I am told, has been in the past a Reformer, has pledged his word that in the coming contest he will support the Finance Minister. Whether it is Mr. Gibson, the elder, or Mr. Gibson, the younger, we do not know—there are two of them that sit on that board, and they, with the powerful backing of the present member for the county form the majority of the board. So the Finance Minister stands a good chance, no doubt, of being elected in that county. Now, is it possible that this Dominion of Canada, with its present financial embarrassments, with the great strain to which the people are subjected in order to raise the enormous sums to provide for our annual expenditure, and to meet demands in the way of interest on the public debt, is going to sacrifice $72,000 of accumulated interest in order to find for the Finance Minister a comfortable and easy seat? Are these the terms on which this nomination has been given to the Finance Minister? Well, Sir, it looks very like it. It is a very singular coincidence that from the moment the Finance Minister took the position he now occupies, not one farthing of interest has ever been paid upon that investment. How is that? Why is it that, although interest was to be paid yearly, from that until now not one farthing has been received? How is it that these men have not been called upon? Where have the receipts for tolls for this bridge gone? They have under their statute power to arrange tolls and power to collect tolls, to be approved by the Governor in Council, which I have no doubt they have done. Where have these tolls all gone? Where is the money? Into whose pocket has the money thus collected found its way? I think this certainly requires an explanation at the hands of the Minister of Finance; and I question very much if, in face of the facts disclosed by the public records, it is possible for him to give the people of this country a satisfactory explanation with regard to this whole question. It is an outrage that the people of this country, in their straightened circumstances, have got to consent to drains of this kind upon their resources for the purpose of finding comfortable and easy seats for Ministers of the Crown. We are coming to a pretty condition in the country. It is a pretty state of affairs when the Executive of this country take public money in this way to make comfortable seats for themselves. I hope the Minister of Finance will explain to us what he intends to do with this particular bridge. We all heard that he proposed to put the author of the scheme, perhaps, in a comfortable place. We don't know what he is going to do. However, we would like to know. In view of the Finance Minister becoming a candidate for that riding, we would like to know whether the country is going to be called upon to lose this money, and is going to take the bridge over. I must say that from the statement presented to the House, the company is indebted to the amount of $22,389 over and above the cost of the whole structure. Now, is the Minister going to take it over? If he does, he will have to pay the bonded debt, no doubt, of $50,000. What is he going to do with it? Is the whole thing going to be smothered over on condition that the county of York will give an easy seat, without much of a contest, to the Minister of Finance, and continue him in that seat, and is the country to be called upon to sacrifice the accumulated interest upon this particular loan, and possibly the principal as well? We shall all be glad to hear what the Finance Minister has got to say with regard to this transaction.

Mr. McMULLEN.

Mr. LISTER. If the hon. Minister desires to speak, I will wait for him.

Mr. FOSTER. I would not like to take away your privilege.

Mr. LISTER. I am not at all surprised that the Minister is loath to say anything upon the subject now before the House. I am not at all surprised that the present member for the county of York (Mr. Temple) is also silent, because, Sir, if the statement of my hon. friend who has made this motion, at all approaches the truth, it is almost incredible that any man or body of men could be found parties to a transaction as disgraceful as this. Why, Sir, what do we find? We find, as a member of this bridge company, the hon. member for the county of York, a staunch supporter of the Government, supporting them strongly when they are right, and more strongly when they are wrong. We find him always backing up the Government in this House, no matter what proposition they may bring forward. Sir, my hon. and industrious friend behind me has given the House and the country some little inkling into the peculiar methods of these hon. gentlemen. We find that the hon. member for the county of York, who always supports the Government, has been purchased by a bridge at Fredericton.

Mr. FOSTER. Order.

Mr. LISTER. Rewarded, then, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. FOSTER. Order.

Mr. LISTER. Recognized, then. The services of the hon. member for the county of York have been recognized.

Mr. FOSTER. Order.

Mr. MULOCK. What is the point of order?

Mr. FOSTER. The point is simply this, and I should think the hon. member and his friends would see it. He has deliberately stated in the House that an hon. gentleman who sits on this side of the House was purchased, that his support was purchased by a loan which was made to a company for the purpose of building a bridge. The hon. member has not taken that statement back. I think he ought to take it back.

Mr. LISTER. Well, I won't say purchased; I will take that back. I will say recognized. At all events, whether I say purchased or not, is of very little consequence. If it pleases the Minister of Finance, I will withdraw the word purchased. At all events, we find that the hon. member for York, sitting behind the Government, has supported it in all its acts, and there may be a question as to whether all its acts will bear the closest scrutiny. At all events, Mr. Speaker, we find the astounding fact, that a member of this House, supposed to be an independent member of Parliament, solicits from the Government, and the Government gives him—because it is virtually that—gives to his company a present of $30,000 of the money of the people of this country, for which they have not received value to the extent of one farthing. We find this company, with a nominal capital of $200,000, have the magnificent sum of $20,000 paid up—it is so reported. Whether it was ever paid up or not, it is difficult to say. But at most the paid-up capital of the company was only $20,000. We find them with a paid-up capital of only $20,000 in a scheme involving an expenditure of nearly half a million dollars, and the Government consider the company's financial standing sufficient to justify them in making them a present of $30,000 of our money. And what more do they do? They lend upon that visionary scheme $300,000 more of the people's money, making $330,000 in all, taken out of the treasury of Canada and placed in the hands of three or four individuals, one of whom is a member of Parliament and a supporter of the Government, and another of whom is his son-in-law. We find four men composing that company; we find two of the Gibsons, the hon. member for York, and one other gentleman, composing what is known as this company. And we can draw the inference, if we like, that there may have been influences brought to bear on the Government to give this remarkably favourable consideration to the speculation of the hon. member for York (Mr. Temple). They lend them the money. We are told in this House by the then Minister of Finance that this is a good investment. We are told we are getting 4 per cent for our money and it is sure to be paid, and we can borrow money in England at 3½ per cent, making the desirable and profitable bargain of ½ per cent on the interest. We lend them the money, I repeat; the company goes to work and builds the structure. They are in possession of it: they are the recipients of what profits may be made out of the tolls collected, and for one year these generous beings pay the Government of Canada the interest on its investment, amounting to $12,000. The old Finance Minister leaves the country, a new Finance Minister takes his place. Not a dollar has been paid since this new Finance Minister has occupied the comfortable seat he now fills. He has allowed this company to go on year after year and make default; not one shilling has been paid into the treasury by this company, and we find two or three feeble letters written by the Finance Department, in a way begging this company to do something about the interest. Year after year it goes on, until the attention of the Government is called by the Auditor General to the fact that the interest has not been paid. A letter is written, another letter is written; no response is made to those letters. Time runs on. The life of the present Parliament is about expiring, it will be soon dead, and we find a shuffle of the cards. There are no more letters written, there are no more demands made on the company to pay what they owe to Canada. Time runs on, and the elections are coming along. My old friend the member for York (Mr. Temple) would certainly like to pass his latter days in that receptacle in the other end of this building. I read that, at the nomination the hon. gentleman told the electors of York that he did not want to be a candidate again, a significant statement. No doubt the hon. gentleman has the promise of a senatorship in his breeches pocket at this moment. The

Mr. LISTER.

Finance Minister goes down to King's. Things are not as nice there as they used to be. They tell me that down in King's his last election cost him almost a king's ransom, and we know that he has not very much money to spend in that sort of way. A candidate comes before him, and with a discretion that does him infinite credit he abandons his old county of King's and says it is for the good of his health—and perhaps it is. He goes down to York. He finds the present member for York, who tells the people there that, having served them so long, he does not think he will serve them any longer, and after due time and all proper proceedings are taken, the Finance Minister becomes the nominee of the Conservative party in the county of York. And the hon. gentleman takes it with more avidity than he otherwise would have swallowed it, because, forsooth, Mr. Alexander Gibson has promised him his support. Alexander Gibson, the cotton king of the province of New Brunswick, at one time a Liberal, the man who lost his principles when they came, as he thought, in conflict with his interests—he tells the Finance Minister that he shall receive his support and influence, and the Conservative press of this country, from one end to the other, tell the people of Canada, for the purpose of affecting, no doubt, the Liberal vote and showing what prominent and influential men are abandoning that party, that Alexander Gibson, a Liberal of the Liberals, is now going to support the Minister of Finance. Under these circumstances the hon. gentleman consents to be the Conservative candidate for the county of York. Let me tell the hon. gentleman this, that if all accounts are correct, if all reports are true, he will probably back out of that county before the election and seek a seat which he can secure with more ease probably than the seat in that county. We have this sum of $300,000. What does it amount to when you look at the Sault Canal? What does it amount to when you look at the Sheik's Rapids and other little works down there? It is a mere drop in the bucket. What are $300,000 to the people of this country? It may be true that in almost every city in Canada during the past winter the charitable people have been called upon to establish soup kitchens to save the poor from starvation, yet we are told day after day that the country is prosperous and the people are happy. That may be so. And then, what does $300,000 mean, what does it amount to to the people of this country? What does a gift of $300,000 amount to when made to the four gentlemen who compose this company? What does it matter if we allow them to take all the earnings of the bridge and the road and put them into their own pockets, instead of paying the honest debt they have contracted with the people? It all amounts to nothing when weighed in the balance with the Finance Minister in one cup and that in the other. Are the people willing that, to secure and retain the services of the Finance Minister, we should give to those four gentlemen $300,000 or $400,000 of the money of this country? Sir, with a wonderful sagacity, and in order that the books may be kept clear and not show a deficit, and not show that these men are not paying up their debt, the Finance Minister said, Let us open a special account; we will charge up the company and debit them with the interest, and at the same time credit them in the old account as having paid the interest. So, as a matter of book-keeping, it would appear that the money has been paid, when, in fact, it has not been paid, and it remained for the remarkable financial skill of the Finance Minister to invent a device and scheme whereby a debt not paid would appear to have been paid in the books of this company. Sir, it seems to me that if the statement of the hon. gentleman is correct, the transaction we have under consideration to-day is the most disgraceful one we have had during the present Parliament. Why, the Curran Bridge was not a circumstance to it. There they stole from us $200,000; but here, if we do not enforce our rights, the result will be that in fact this company will have stolen from us $330,000, and $70,000 added, making over $400,000. If the people of Canada are willing to submit to jugglery of this kind, if they are willing to have their money expended in a way like this, then we shall have to abide by what they say; but my hon. friend, in bringing this matter before the House and exposing this transaction, has done something that entitles him to the thanks of the electors at large, because I believe there is hardly one man outside the Government who had any conception of the transaction which has been brought to light.

Mr. TEMPLE. I desire to reply to the statement of the hon. gentleman, that I have been purchased—

Mr. LISTER. I took that back.

Mr. TEMPLE. That statement having, however, been made, I shall be obliged to follow it out. I can tell the hon. gentleman that I never obtained one cent or anything else from the Government. So far as the company is concerned, they have sunk on the bridge $120,000 of their own money. That is the position in which the matter stands in regard to the bridge. My hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has not got the statement right. If he will go to the Railway Department, he will find there a report with reference to all the tolls collected every year. Now coming back to what my hon. friend says about my being purchased. I can tell that hon. gentleman, as I have already said before here, that I never was purchased by this Government, no, not to the extent of one single cent; but I have been offered by one of the leading men in the party opposite, that if I would only join them: "We will take your bridge and pay you your money." That is a fact and I state it here as if I were on my oath.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. TEMPLE. I would not expose that man. He is one of the leading men you have got in your party.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. TEMPLE. No, I will not. It would blind you with astonishment if I were to give you his name.

Mr. MULOCK. Name.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think, Mr. Speaker, that as a matter of fairness the hon. gentleman (Mr. Temple) should give the name, because he has made a statement which casts an implication on this side of the House, and there may be a number of gentlemen who will feel a little delicate about it. The member for York (Mr. Temple) never should have made this statement without being prepared to back it up by giving the name.

Mr. FOSTER. He need not give the name if he does not like.

Mr. CHARLTON. If he refuses to give the name the inference will be, perhaps, that the statement is not as well founded as it might be. I would say something stronger about it if it were not against parliamentary rules.

Mr. TEMPLE. I did not say he was a member of this House, but he is a member of your party.

Mr. HAZEN. Mr. Speaker, although I do not now reside in the county of York I may say that for many years of my life I did reside there, and I was residing there when this bridge was built, some nine years ago, I think. I happen to know some of the facts in connection with it, and that being the case, I think I might be able to remove some of the impression that may have been created upon this House by the hon. member from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) and the hon. member from Lambton (Mr. Lister), by the statements they have made, if I give just a few facts in connection with the reasons that led to the construction of that bridge, to the formation of the company that built the bridge, and to the loan by the Government of $300,000 to that company. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that before this loan was made to the Fredericton and St. Mary's Railway Bridge Company, a loan had been made to a company for the purpose of constructing a bridge across the falls at the mouth of the River St. John. That loan, I believe—speaking now without having looked into the matter lately—was in the neighbourhood of $400,000, and it was for the purpose of constructing a bridge that would connect the railway system on the eastern side of the River St. John with the railway system on the western side; thus giving complete railway connection from the upper provinces right down to the lower provinces, whereas previously there had been a break at that point, and passengers, and mails, and freight had to be ferried across the river or across the harbour. Every cent of interest on that loan has been paid to the Government. It resulted satisfactorily and successfully. The tolls which the bridge company collected from the railway companies using that bridge were of such a character that then and up to the present time, they have been able to pay every cent of the 4 per cent interest, and so the investment has been one that has been profitable for the Dominion. Soon after that you recollect, Mr. Speaker,—the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) and the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) were in the House at the time and they will recollect also—a Bill was passed and a subsidy was granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway for the purpose of constructing what was known as the Short Line Railway to the maritime provinces. The Bill with respect to the Short Line provided that this railway, after leaving the south side of the St. Lawrence near Montreal should traverse a portion of Quebec province, then cross the state of Maine, and then go from Harvey, which is a point on the Canadian Pacific Railway line via Fredericton, to Salisbury. To enable the Canadian Pacific Railway to go via Fredericton to Salisbury at that time, it was absolutely necessary that the St. John River should be bridged at Fredericton. The gentlemen who composed this company, Mr. Gibson and the other gentlemen, having in view the fact that the legislation of this House for the construction of the Short Line Railway was based entirely upon the idea that that road should go from Harvey via Fredericton, to Salisbury, got incorporated for the purpose of bridging the River St. John at Fredericton; it being understood at that time that the Canadian Pacific Company were not willing to build that bridge themselves out of their subsidy. The gentlemen I have referred to got incorporated as a bridge company and applied to the Dominion Government for a loan of $300,000 on terms similar to those of the loan made to the St. John Bridge and Railway Extension Company, which, as I have explained, built the bridge at the falls on the River St. John. There was every expectation, there was every reasonable probability, there was more than reasonable probability at this time, that this Short Line Railway, according to the vote of this House and the subsidy granted by this House, would cross the River St. John at Fredericton, and go from a point on the Intercolonial Railway to Salisbury, which is about 11 miles west of the city of Moncton. Having that in view, these gentlemen incorporated themselves as a Bridge Company, borrowed the money and constructed that bridge. They had every reasonable expectation, in consequence of the Short Line Railway being constructed by the route fixed by Parliament, that the tolls they would receive from the cars and passengers and freight would give them ample money to pay the interest on that loan, and also give them interest on the money which they themselves were out of pocket, and probably leave them, as they had reason to expect, a fair margin of profit for their own enterprise in investing their money and carrying on the work. I submit also, Mr. Speaker, that at the same time the Government of this country of that day had every reason to expect that that road would be built, and that they would get every cent of interest upon the money they loaned to that Bridge and Railway Company. But things did not turn out as they were expected to turn out. It will be remembered in the first place that the Canadian Pacific Railway, for reasons of their own, constructed their line across the province of Quebec, and across the state of Maine down to Mattawamkeag, and then followed the existing lines to the city of St. John. They declined to build the line from Harvey to Salisbury by way of Fredericton. If I recollect aright, Mr. Speaker, legislation was then introduced into the House of Commons by the then Premier, Sir John Macdonald, with a view of constructing that work independently of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but that legislation was thrown out and voted down when it came before the hon. members of the Senate. So I submit, Sir, that at the time this work was undertaken it was undertaken in good faith on the part of the promoters, who never would have put a dollar of their money into it had they not thought that this road from Harvey to Salisbury would have been built via Fredericton. Not only was it undertaken in good faith, and the best of commercial good faith on the part of the promoters, but it was also undertaken in good faith on the part of the Government of the day, who at that time had every reason to believe that the arrangement entered into with the Canadian Pacific Railway would be carried out, that this road should cross the country there and would have to cross the bridge at Fredericton, which would result in the tolls being of such extent that they would be sufficient to pay interest to this country on the $300,000 which it had loaned to the promoters of this undertaking. These are the facts in connection with the building of the bridge. As it is at present, the bridge is used now by only one line of railway, I think—that is, the railway known as the Canada Eastern, which runs from Chatham, in the county of Northumberland, to the city of Fredericton, in the county of York. That road passes over the bridge to reach Fredericton, and the tolls are collected upon the cars, the passengers and the freight that cross it. But, unfortunately, the sums received in tolls from the Canada Eastern Railway—and I am informed that fair rates are charged—have not been more than sufficient. I understand, up to the present time to keep the bridge in repair and to pay the ordinary expenses connected with its maintenance, although I believe the greatest possible economy has been exercised by the gentlemen controlling the company. But I submit that the money expended upon this bridge has not been wasted. I submit that, from the fact that one railway uses it in order to reach the city of Fredericton, instead of transporting all its freight and passengers by ferry across the river, the bridge has been of considerable advantage, not only to the people of Fredericton and its vicinity, but to the people of different parts of the province who are interested in the business of that railway—a business which I understand is steadily developing, and has developed considerably during the last year. That road and bridge will in future be used for other purposes. At the last session of the legislature of New Brunswick a subsidy and charter were granted to Mr. Leckie, a gentleman well known in Nova Scotia in connection with the iron industry there, who has acquired large coal areas in the county of Queen's, N.B., and who has given assurances that he intends to develop those coal areas and ship the coal to the western parts of this country via a railway he proposed constructing from Grand Lake to Fredericton, and this bridge making connection with the west at Fredericton. If that bridge were not there, no such idea would have entered into the mind of Mr. Leckie or any other sane man, because, without it, it would have been impossible to transport the coal to western points from the coal mines in the county of Queen's. Therefore, I have no doubt that a considerable amount of revenue will accrue to the Fredericton and St. Mary's Railway and Bridge Company from the tolls that will be collected upon that coal, if Mr. Leckie's statement is correct, and I have no reason to doubt its correctness. Hon. gentlemen opposite have spoken about the loan to this bridge company as a most corrupt transaction, and as though the money had been voted for corrupt purposes. Knowing what I do, though I never had any personal interest in the bridge, I desire emphatically to deny that there was anything corrupt in the original loan made by the Government to this bridge company. The loan was made with a fair reason for believing that it was in the interest of the country that the bridge should be built, as it has been in the interest of the province of New Brunswick, and for believing that, from a commercial point of view, the loan would be a fair investment for this country to make. But, Sir, the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), very unfortunately, went out of his way to make a personal attack upon Mr. Gibson, one of the members of that bridge company; and the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) spoke of Mr. Gibson as though for the first time Mr. Gibson was going to give his support in the next election to the present Government. If these hon. gentlemen had inquired in the province of New Brunswick, they would have ascertained that in 1887 Mr. Gibson gave his influence, in the county of York, in favour of the candidate supporting the Conservative Administration, and that it is not because the interest has not been paid on this loan that Mr. Gibson was influenced in 1887 or is influenced to-day to support the Conservative Government, but that he is influenced by the same consideration that has influenced very many of the leading men of the province of New Brunswick to withdraw their allegiance from the party of hon. gentlemen opposite—because they believe that the policy of that party is not in the best interests of the country; and, as men having a stake in the country—and no man has a larger stake in the lower provinces than Mr. Gibson—and desiring to see the country advance and progress, they believe it is their duty to cast in their lot with and do all they can to support the Government now in power. It is most unfortunate that hon. gentlemen opposite should make these attacks upon men of the character and standing of Mr. Alexander Gibson. It is most unfortunate, Sir, that hon. gentlemen opposite should be led to adopt such a course simply because Mr. Gibson is now opposing them. When he supported them, they were only too happy to have his support, and the Liberal party of New Brunswick could not find words of praise strong enough in which to speak of that hon. gentleman. I have no hesitation in saying that New Brunswick has never had a citizen to whom it owes so much as it does to Mr. Alexander Gibson. We have other men of wealth in that province. We have had men who acquired wealth in that province just as Mr. Gibson did, but in very many cases, after acquiring a certain amount of wealth, they were content, and made no further effort, and in too many cases, went to other countries to spend their means. But in Mr. Gibson's case, although he might, ten or twelve years ago, have retired with an independent fortune, amply sufficient to support himself and family in affluence for the rest of his days, and to leave adequate provision for his family after his death, yet he was so enterprising that he would not take his ease, and well-earned rest, but he took a large amount of money made out of his lumber business, invested it in a cotton mill, and operated that mill successfully, steadily and continuously, thus giving employment to hundreds of people, and affording a large home market to the farmers of that locality. We have never had a man in that province who has done so much to develop its resources, who has given so much employment to labour, and who has exemplified so fully, in every sense of the term, the ideal of a good citizen, as this gentleman who is now abused and slandered and vilified by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish to offer a few words in reply to the statement made by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen). The statement he has made requires, indeed, very little reply. He has virtually acknowledged the whole corn. He has acknowledged that this was a speculation entered into by those men. The Government backed them up in the speculation, and risked the money of this Dominion. These gentlemen would not have risked their own money.

Mr. HAZEN. They risked $120,000 of their own.

Mr. McMULLEN. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon.

Mr. HAZEN. If the hon. gentleman refers to the $50,000 bonds issued, I am informed—and have no doubt my information is correct—that these bonds are simply held by Mr. Temple and Mr. Gibson, that they put their own private money into the enterprise, and have never put the bonds on the market.

Mr. McMULLEN. If the Government are compelled to take over the bridge, they will have to pay the bonds. No doubt about that. So that it matters very little, so far as Parliament is concerned, whether Mr. Gibson or Mr. Temple holds the bonds, or who holds them. That, I think is quite clear. With regard to the statement made by the hon. member for York (Mr. Temple) that the company have spent $120,000 of their own money, if that be the case, then the returns which the company is compelled by law to submit annually do not show any such expenditure. They only show that these gentlemen have contributed $20,000 paid-up stock; and if there is any more than that paid up, they have made a false return, because the returns do not show anything in excess of the $20,000. My hon. friend, when he rose to address the House, tried to draw a herring across the track. He tried to excuse the company and the Government for the imprudent expenditure and the advances which had been made to erect this structure, by saying that the company anticipated that the Canadian Pacific Railway short line from Harvey to Salisbury would cross this particular bridge. I suppose the company anticipated that the tolls which they would then receive would make the speculation a good one from their point of view. If the Canadian Pacific Railway had used the bridge to the extent anticipated, the speculation would have been, for them, an excellent one. Mr. Gibson is a very wealthy man, and no doubt he could furnish the whole $300,000 himself, but it appears that he is a very prudent as well as a wealthy man. No doubt he thought it was more prudent to utilize the money which the Government advanced at a low rate of interest than invest his own funds. It would be much safer, from his standpoint, to be merely a small stockholder, and utilize his friend, Mr. Temple, to secure from the Government a loan at a very low rate of interest. In this he was successful. They obtained this loan in 1887, and in return Mr. Gibson joined the ranks of the Tory party, and has supported them ever since.

Mr. HAZEN. If you knew Mr. Gibson, you would not attribute such motives to him.

Mr. McMULLEN. The one thing was concurrent with the other. He got the loan in 1887, and he gave his support to the Tory party in 1887. Another thing that is admitted is that the Government made the advance of $300,000. The Government surely knew that they were dealing with wealthy men, but they did not attempt to secure this country against loss by holding the directors personally, as well as the company as a corporation. They did not do that. They ran the risk of making an advance of $300,000 on the very flimsy basis of $20,000. The hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House says that Mr. Gibson is immensely wealthy. Well, he was still not willing to put his own money into the concern, and the Government did not require that he should become personally responsible in any way for the amount they were advancing to the company. It appears to me that this investment is a clean loss to this Dominion. It is on a par with the Tay Canal and the Caraqueet Railway, and many other investments which hon. gentlemen opposite have made of the country's money in undertakings which are, year after year, proving to be absolutely useless. I notice in the assets of the Dominion that this is set down as a valuable asset, as something upon which the country is receiving interest every year, and one of the things we are supposed to hold against our enormous debt. Now, the Government would be just as well justified had they assisted a company in the North-west to control a town site in anticipation of the Canadian Pacific Railway running through it, and then, after the Government had advanced the money, the railway was run in another direction, the speculation failed, the site remains in the hands of the owners.

Mr. HAZEN.

and the Government find they have advanced a loan on a worthless security. This bridge was a pure piece of speculation on the part of a sitting member (Mr. Temple) and those associated with him—on the part of Mr. Gibson as well as on the part of his son-in-law, Mr. Hilliard. It was a family affair, and through the influence they were able to exercise on the Government, they got the Government to put $300,000 in a place whence it will never be drawn. That bridge will stand at Fredericton as a monument of political folly, extravagance and recklessness, and this amount of the people's money, which the Government invested, advanced on a basis of $20,000 security, will be for all time a positive and absolute loss. We have many other exhibitions of that kind throughout the country. We see them on the right and on the left as we pass through from east to west. My hon. friend said that Mr. Gibson was a very wealthy man. I am glad to hear it. But it is rather singular that a man of his wealth should, in connection with an hon. gentleman who has a seat in this House, submit to this exposure and to the scandal which must attach to them rather than pay the $72,000 interest, and by keeping this business secret a little longer, prevent, for the present, at least, the miserable exhibition which has been made in connection with this whole matter. This is one of the many things that are coming to light from time to time. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been so long at this kind of work, that their secrets are fairly well covered up, but from time to time, transactions are disclosed which show plainly how the affairs of this Dominion are managed. Sir, corruption and bribery are rampant from one end of the country to the other. We can say truly, in the language of the Good Book, that from the head to the foot, from the Atlantic to the Pacific—

Some hon. MEMBERS. What verse ?

Mr. McMULLEN—there is nothing but wounds and bruises and putrefying sores. The whole body has become corrupt, and the people are beginning to realize the condition of things, and, from time to time, as corruption oozes out in connection with the Fredericton Bridge Company, and the Tay Canal, and the Curran Bridge, and other "jobs" of that kind, the country is beginning to get enlightened as to how its affairs have been, and are being, mismanaged.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not rise for the purpose of discussing this matter on the information—naturally somewhat partial and incomplete—that has been presented to the House by the hon. gentleman who made the motion. When the papers are brought down, as they will be, I shall take the opportunity of having something to say on the subject. I must, however, congratulate my hon. friend and gentlemen opposite generally upon the tactics which they have commenced to develop, the tactics of assailing persons who are not in a position to reply; of attacking officer after officer of the Government instead of attacking the responsible political head who is in the House, and who is the only person who should be attacked, of attacking private gentlemen of unblemished character, of a long life of usefulness, of probity and of honour, and of setting them in the category of men of no principle, men who are seeking to be corrupted and to corrupt others. If hon. gentlemen opposite think that is a good course to pursue, let them pursue it. I do not think they will make much of it in this House; I do not think they will make much of it in the country. What right, as a gentleman, what right as a man, has my hon. friend who sits opposite to me, and who has moved this resolution, to pursue such a course? What right, as a member, has he to rise and, out of a business transaction developed in the records of this House and growing out of legislation passed years ago, a transaction that has been before the House every year, and open to that gentleman as a member of the House—and you may say it is wise or unwise, that is a matter which can be fairly and rightly debated—what right has he or any other gentleman to rise and declare that wounds and bruises and putrefying sores are the unvarying conditions and characteristics of political opponents, and that he finds these same things in the transaction which he is discussing to-day? What right has he to impugn the honour and honesty of a man immeasurably above him—Mr. Gibson—a man whose work has not been, like that of the hon. gentleman, to find wounds and bruises and putrefying sores where they do not exist save in his imagination, but whose life has been one continued series of works of usefulness in the development of the resources of his own province, the province of New Brunswick, adding to its material wealth and bringing wages and prosperity into thousands of homes in that country which, but for him, would not have been so well off? When that gentleman supported the party of hon. gentlemen opposite there was nothing too good to say of him. So long as there was a prospect that he would support them, there was nothing too high to say in his praise. Only a few months ago an hon. gentleman high in the councils of the party, a gentleman sitting opposite me to-day, made a pilgrimage with others to the city of Fredericton for political purposes. They made speeches in the city hall, and then in their best bib and tucker they made a pilgrimage to the cotton mill owned and carried on by Mr. Gibson, went through it from bottom to top and praised everything about it, praised the gentleman himself, and, returning got upon a public platform and praised the public spirit and enterprise of Mr. Gibson, who was so great an employer of labour. That is one phase of the matter. But to-day it is different. The colleagues of this hon. gentleman who moves this motion applaud him when he calls a man, immeasurably above him, a corruptionist, applaud him when he throws his vile insinuations against gentlemen outside of this House, as well as inside of this House. Those in this House, I am glad to say can defend themselves. But I ask whether that is a fair or honourable species of warfare? Very ingenious was the hon. gentleman's attempt—but very bald and open—to connect me with this transaction. He gives me credit for great sagacity, for great long-headedness. Nine years ago, it would seem, I was laying the pipes for the purpose he sets forth. I happened to be a member of this House at that time, and then, according to the hon. gentleman, I was laying pipes against the time, eight or nine years in the future, when I should want some other constituency than the one I had been representing up to that time. And to-day it is plain, according to the hon. gentleman, that there was a bargain, a corrupt bargain, and that the Finance Minister was in it as well. I am not at the present time going to defend myself against a charge of such a nature and coming from such a source. By and by, if it comes from gentlemen who have more standing—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER—when it comes from gentlemen, who have probably more of that weight and character behind them to make it a point to be considered whether an assertion that they make in this House might not have some weight in the country, then it will be time for me to say something with regard to it. At present, I do not propose to do so, considering the source from which the charge has come and the evident lack of weight behind the charge. When all these papers are brought down and all the information is before the House, I shall have something to say about this matter. Meantime, I would say to hon. gentlemen opposite that I think they might pursue better tactics, that they might act more in accordance with the courtesies of this House than to assail public officers who have no seats here, than to assail private citizens and public benefactors whose character is above reproach, simply because these gentlemen do not see eye to eye with them or feel as they do upon political affairs, than to throw out insinuations of wrong-doing where they have not a single scintilla of evidence. They may find fault with the business sagacity of a Minister, they may find fault with the policy of the Government. That is one thing and a perfectly proper thing to do. But to assail the characters of honourable men, to send through the party press and into the public mind the vile poison of their insinuations, is something which it is better for a political party or a statesman not to do, in my opinion. I repel and resent any insinuations of that kind when they come from a quarter which renders them dangerous, and I shall always hold myself ready to do so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think that before he is done with him the hon. gentleman will find that the charges made by my hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) are not to be lightly set aside. My hon. friend has won for himself, though the hon. gentleman may not know it, a very high and well-deserved reputation throughout this country as a man—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—yes, a high and well-deserved reputation as a man who has stood upon the floor of Parliament, times without number, against overwhelming odds, for the purpose of uplifting his voice against those who were despoiling the people of their inheritance. My hon. friend's record will bear comparison, and good comparison with that of the hon. Minister of Finance himself. My hon. friend behind me did not climb into power on the shoulders of, what shall I call them?—"association," perhaps, would be resented, but he did not climb into power as the professed champion of an object for which, since he got into power, he has done very little. So far as regards Mr. Gibson, I am perfectly prepared, and so is every man on this side of the House, to give him all the praise he may deserve for enterprise, for anything that he may have done honestly and genuinely to promote the welfare of his province, or of the country at large. I believe he has done much in that way. I am quite prepared to give him all credit for it. But, Sir, Mr. Gibson, as well as other people, has his moments of weakness. Mr. Gibson, as well as other people, possibly desires to obtain for himself a little larger—gratuity shall we say, or assistance shall we say, or recognition shall we say, from the public treasury, than, perhaps, citizens of less wealth are likely to secure. Sir, this particular transaction is a very old friend of mine, and, as perhaps the hon. member for York knows, this is not the first time it has been before us. It is not the first time I have had to comment upon it, it is not the first time that very extraordinary statements, some of which I have under my hand, were made by former Ministers, Sir Charles Tupper, Sir John Macdonald, and the hon. member himself, when these matters were under discussion before us. Now, Sir, I can understand that the Minister of Finance, as a Maritime champion, thinks that the time has come when New Brunswick should do something worthy of the high position she occupies in the councils of this country. Has not Ontario got her Tay Canal? Has not Quebec got her Curran Bridge? And as for New Brunswick, I think she might have been content with her Caraquet Railway. But, Sir, I am inclined to think that this bridge, when properly looked into, will overshadow even the Caraquet Railway. Now, this is one of those numerous transactions, which have been alluded to, in which the Government have allowed themselves to be seduced, or, shall I say, have seduced members of Parliament in equivocal and compromising positions. You will find, if we had a commission of inquiry with power to examine into it, that the history of the subsidy to the Fredericton and St. Mary's Bridge Company is probably only too true an exemplification of the history of a vast number of railway subsidies which we have been granting for the past nine or ten years. Now, what are the facts about this—facts, mark you, which have not been denied at all, or refuted, in reply to my hon. friends. Now, it may be that a considerable sum of money has been dropped in the railway, but there is no doubt whatever that when this bridge was intended to be constructed, we are told, and I have the statement here, that it was to cost $375,000; we were told that $75,000 of it were to be provided by the promoters, and that the Government were to pay $300,000, not after it was completed and the cost ascertained, but as the work went on, to the tune of at least 80 per cent. Those were the terms of the Order in Council which I have got here. Then, Sir, the Government came down and gave $30,000 in one lump to the gentlemen who were only to have expended $75,000. More than that, the hon. gentleman wanted to know why it was that these gentlemen, Mr. Temple and Mr. Gibson, and the rest of them, desired to build this line. If they will refer to the "Hansard" of 1889, and to page 1620, they will find that a certain conversation took place between myself and the hon. member for York on that subject. The hon. member was very candid. He admitted that all they were going to put into it was $75,000. The hon. gentleman admitted that they were going to get $300,000 from the Government at 4 per cent, and he went on to state:

I am in hopes the profits will be thousands of dollars when we have the Short line built.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Apart from the Short line, what profit does the hon. gentleman, who is largely concerned in this road, expect to achieve? What is the annual income likely to be got from the toll?

Mr. TEMPLE. The cost of keeping up the bridge will not exceed $2,000 a year, and we expect to get $30,000 a year out of it.

Mr. TEMPLE. I wish to say one word with reference to that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman will excuse me. We will give him a plentiful opportunity as soon as I am done. We will be delighted to hear from him, and I am sure from this side of the House he will be welcome to speak not only once again, but twice or three times, if he wishes. The point I wished particularly to make was this: It is not what the hon. gentleman has realized out of this, not what has materialized, but what he expected to obtain. Even the then astute leader of the House, Sir John Macdonald, expressed doubts whether the hon. gentleman would get all he expected from it. Sir, what did these gentlemen expect to get? They expected that the road would cost them at the outside $75,000, that the cost of maintenance would be $2,000, and they would make $30,000. Now, deducting the $12,000 that they were to pay, it is plain that they expected to get over 20 per cent on an expenditure of $75,000, which was afterwards reduced by the $30,000 I alluded to. Sir, if there ever was a case in which gentlemen played heads I win, tails you lose, it was the case of Mr. Gibson and the hon. member for York. Now, there are a great many questions which arise, and which I think, in another place, ought to be made the subject of an investigation. In the first place, I should like very much to know the true value of that bridge, valued by a genuine and independent expert, not in the employ of the Government, but some person whom both parties could trust. I have heard—although I do not pretend to say that I will dispute good evidence to the contrary—I have heard that if that bridge was to be built to-day it could be built for far less than $375,000, which was stated by Sir Charles Tupper as the estimated cost of it. I am aware that it is a very easy thing to show an expenditure on paper very considerably in excess of the true cost. We know that in a great many cases items can be put in so that the actual cost of a bridge may be a very different thing indeed from the reported cost of a bridge. That may or may not be; but we would desire, in addition to that, to know particularly—and this the Minister of Finance ought to be able to tell us—where these $50,000 bonds come in? Are they ahead of our $300,000 or are they behind this $300,000? If they are ahead of this $300,000, then I do not concede that, even if the hon. member for York and Mr. Gibson have placed any money in this, they have run any appreciable risk. If they come behind, why, Sir, they are pretty much at the mercy of the Government of which the Minister of Finance is at present the leader. Now, there is another thing we want to know. So far as I understand it, 90 per cent of the capital stock of this company has not been paid in. I do not know in what proportion it is divided between Mr. Gibson, senior, and Mr. Gibson, junior, the hon. member for York and the hon. member for York's son-in-law; but this I do know, that if 90 per cent have not been paid up it was the duty of the Government, it was the duty of the Finance Department, it was the duty of the Minister of Justice in particular, if his attention was called to it, to have taken steps, when this interest fell due to call in the balance of the 90 per cent, which is apparently uncollected to this date. That appears to me, if it is in the hands of a gentleman of such high standing as Mr. Gibson, to have been their clear duty. Before this matter closes, I would therefore like to know what steps have been taken on the part of the Government to realize the uncollected 90 per cent. Perhaps the hon. member for York, who is, I understand, still a shareholder, can give us this information. But, Sir, that is not the only important point connected with it. Now, I called attention, not once, not twice, but many times over, without reflecting on the hon. member for York, to the very inconvenient position in which that hon. gentleman, as largely concerned in a bridge company of this kind, is placed towards the Government. It is not desirable, it is, in my judgment, wholly contrary to the Independence of Parliament Act, that any man should hold a seat in this House, from whatever province he comes, who is to all intents and purposes a defaulting debtor to the Government; and, so far as appears—and I did not hear the hon. member for York deny the charge—so far as appears, if he has not paid up the balance of his subscription, the hon. member for York clearly stands in that position. The truth of the matter is, that as a business transaction this thing is utterly indefensible. If the former bridge was only going to cost $375,000, was it worth the while of the Government, first of all, to advance the loan of $300,000, then to give a gratuity of $30,000. Sir, the Government had no business to advance a cent upon it. What sort of security was that? Which of us as a business man would advance $330,000 when those who constructed it were only going to spend $40,000 or $50,000 more. Sir, if there ever was any justification at all for the loan, it was the bounden duty of the Government to have built that bridge and to have owned it. For my own part, I will not enter on that side question, because I have not the requisite knowledge to say whether this was a railway bridge which it was really in the interests of the country to construct. That may or may not be. But I do say that if there ever was any justification for a loan, there was an absolute necessity in that case that the Government should have built and owned the bridge. I say this, that the position in which, whether by his own course, or whether by the fault of the Government, the hon. member for York was placed, was one that rendered his position in the House fatal to his usefulness from that time. The hon. gentleman was placed in a false position; the hon. gentleman, I repeat, was in the position of a defaulting debtor; the hon. gentleman could not be a free agent, nor can any other hon. member who has been the recipient of large sums from the Government, or who has received great favours—because this was a great favour on the showing of the hon. gentleman himself, from the Government—even if those favours have not resulted, as the hon. gentleman tells us they have not resulted, in enabling him to make a very large sum of money at an almost infinitesimal risk to himself. What did the hon. gentleman risk? The hon. gentleman and the friends with whom he was connected, risked, or supposed they risked, $40,000 or $50,000 for the sake of making, as they supposed, a return of $16,000 or $18,000 a year. There are a great many business men who would like to take such a chance, who would consider it a great favour when they were advancing $40,000, or $50,000, or $60,000, to find a generous creditor who would lend them $300,000 at 4 per cent. I repeat, and this is a point, at all events, that cannot be contradicted, that all such transactions to which members of this House are parties are fatal to the independence of the members, and ought, if justice were done, to involve their instant withdrawal from this House.

Mr. MULOCK. There is only one point to which I wish to draw the attention of the House. This item of $300,000 is included in the assets of the Dominion. In the Public Accounts, which I hold in my hand, this is put down as a good asset, equal to its face, and on this representation it is deducted from the debt of the country. That is either a true representation of the value of that asset, or it is a false one. I am not going to say it is incorrect, I will assume it is true. I will assume, for the purpose of my argument, that the asset is a good and valuable one, or we must discredit all the sixty-two millions, or a considerable portion of the securities in which our funds are invested, not, of course, those which are our own debentures. Taking, therefore, the Public Accounts as containing a fair representation of the value of our assets, I should like to know why the Finance Minister, under these circumstances, has not done his duty in realizing upon a security which is now six years in arrear for interest. I want the Finance Minister to tell this House, if he does not desire the investments of our public funds to be discredited by this act, because many of our investments consist of securities of a semi-private character like this one, why he allowed six years interest to accumulate. He must be aware that the Act of Parliament under which this loan was made required that a first mortgage be taken by the Government upon this property to secure this debt; and, reading the debates on the question, I find that Sir Charles Tupper pledged himself to the House and the country at the time that this mortgage would contain a stipulation that upon default being made, whenever it should happen, the Government, as mortgagee should be entitled to realize on the security by realizing on the mortgage. Assuming that what was pledged to the country by the hon. gentleman's predecessor was carried out, I suppose we have a mortgage. Can the Finance Minister say whether there was a mortgage taken to secure the money or not?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know the facts of the case.

Mr. MULOCK. It is most extraordinary that, with a security six years in arrears, the Finance Minister should tell us to-day that he does not know the facts of the case. Can any better proof of his inability to grapple with transactions of finance be advanced? A sum of $300,000 of the public money was advanced, and six years of arrears of interest accumulated, to which the hon. gentleman's attention was called by the Auditor General on more than one occasion, and to-day the hon. gentleman tells the House that he does not know whether there is any security or not for the loan; and yet, not knowing whether there is any security held by the country, he tells the House that the loan is absolutely safe. I should like to know on what evidence he bases that opinion, when the hon. gentleman has just told the House that he does not know whether there is any security or not. What is his explanation to-day? It would be unfair to hold him responsible for the original investment, except as a member of the Government, and the hon. gentleman entirely misapprehended the point when he stated that we would seek to charge him in 1887 with having been trying to lay pipe for his candidature in 1895 because of this loan. No, that is not the point; but I commend the hon. gentleman for his tactics in trying to evade the point at issue by turning attention to that feature of the transaction. The Minister of Finance should explain why he has not proceeded to collect the debt now due. It is his duty, and it was his duty in 1892 when the Auditor General called attention to the matter, and it was his duty from that year ever since till 1895, to collect that debt. Let the hon. gentleman tell the country why he did not collect it. That is the point at issue. The Minister of Railways seems to think that this is not a vital point. It may not occur to him that the people would wish to collect the debts due; but I submit, as the representative of the section of the people who pay for these investments, and whose money has been invested, that the time has arrived when the country should not be called upon to buy seats by such lavish expenditure, and at such demoralization of public morality.

Mr. FOSTER. What do you mean by buying seats?

Mr. MULOCK. I mean to say this: That the Finance Minister, if he were a faithful steward of the public funds, would have realized upon the security and collected the interest due to the country, instead of stating to the House that he knows nothing about it, and opening a special account and representing that this was a good asset, and doing that on the eve of applying to these gentlemen for political support to enable him to get a seat in this House. That is what I mean.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has asked several questions, and expects to get answers to some of them, and not to others. He will receive a full answer with respect to the whole business transaction when the papers are brought down, and if there is any discussion we shall then be able to see exactly what the facts are. The hon. gentleman made an insinuation. His insinuation was not a manly one—it was one of the nature that he frequently makes. When I asked him courteously to explain what he meant by saying that this was a transaction for the purpose of buying a seat, he made a turn around and came back in a subdued and milder form, not in the same language, but his intimation was that the transaction was carried out for the sake of buying a seat for the Finance Minister.

Mr. MULOCK. Why do you not collect the interest?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is now asking a question which any hon. member has a right to ask. When the hon. gentleman insinuates that inaction was for the purpose of buying a seat for the Finance Minister, he is making a statement in an unmanly way, a statement which no gentleman should make, a statement which he cannot prove.

Mr. MULOCK. Why did you not collect the interest?

Mr. FOSTER. There are certain questions that an hon. gentleman can ask, and if the hon. gentleman would wait at that question and go no further, he would be, in my opinion, all right. When he goes further, and insinuates, what he will not state in his seat and on his responsibility as a member of this House—

Mr. MULOCK. Yes. I would state it on my responsibility. I do not shirk from stating it on my responsibility.

Mr. FOSTER. Then make your charge and state it on your responsibility. I have heard these insinuations before.

Mr. HAGGART. And a good many of them will be put a stop to, too.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, then, after this little breeze has passed, I will answer the hon. gentleman with reference to the bridge. The bridge was a public undertaking and a grant of money was passed by Parliament, after discussion in Parliament, to the company who undertook to build the bridge. That money is at the rate of 4 per cent. It is secured upon the bridge structure itself.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Whereabouts does the $50,000 come in? Does it come in before or after the $300,000?

Mr. FOSTER. That I do not know, but I imagine that the Government has the first lien. The tolls to be collected were relied upon, I suppose, to pay the interest, and to pay as well a return to the gentlemen who formed the company and put a large amount of money into it. The anticipations of my hon. friend from York (Mr. Temple), which was alluded to by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), did not result as he anticipated, and the simple facts of the case are, that owing to certain conjunctures of circumstances the bridge has been used by but one of the roads, instead of two or three railroads which it was supposed would have used it. The tolls have simply, as I believe, about paid for the working expenses of the bridge and therefore no money has been going into the pocket year by year, of the persons who form the Bridge Company. They are not getting wealthy from any results that are coming to them from the bridge. A part of the interest has been paid and a part has not been paid. Now, I am asked: Why don't I collect the interest? There was but one way I suppose in which one could do that. You could foreclose, and take the bridge structure. Does the hon. gentleman think that that would be a profitable transaction for the Government?

Mr. MULOCK. There is another way. That is not the only way.

Mr. FOSTER. One thing I wish to say in relation to that. I do not at all hold the opinion that this is a totally unprofitable investment. I believe that ultimately that bridge will be used—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose I have a right to say what I believe.

Mr. LANDERKIN. And I have a right to applaud you.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, if it is applause; but my hon. friend has such a peculiar way of making applause that I almost took it for something else. I believe that the bridge will yet be a paying bridge. I believe that the railway companies will use it, and that the resources which are about to be developed, and which will make their way across that bridge will make it so that the company will be able to pay its interest to the Government, and by their management may get something to themselves. It is better that it should be done that way, even though we have to wait a little longer for a return on the money, than that the Government should foreclose the mortgage and take the structure over. Hon. members have brought the charge that this was put in the Public Works as an asset.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. MULOCK. Excuse me.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MULOCK. I rise to a point of order. The hon. Minister of Finance interrupted me and I gave place to him for the moment but I did not finish my speech.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. MULOCK. When the Finance Minister desired to make an explanation I allowed him to do so, as was due to him, but I just want to put him one further question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. It is six o'clock.

Mr. MULOCK. I did not finish my speech. I wish to put the Finance Minister a question on this point. He tries to explain why he has not collected the interest, and he says that the only source from which he could collect it was by foreclosure. Now the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has pointed out that there are $180,000 of subscribed capital uncollected, and if the hon. Minister allows years to go by, what becomes of the liability of this $180,000 of security? I would ask him to explain if he has looked into that asset, or supposed asset, in order to realize on that. That is not a source of revenue.

Mr. FOSTER. All this comes from going into a long discussion before the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) has any information on the matter. My hon. friend has no reliable information as to $180,000 subscribed capital being liable to be called upon. I will finish what I had to say when my hon. friend (Mr. Mulock) interrupted me. He intimated that this was given a false place in the Public Accounts, and that it was held out in the Public Accounts as a good asset worth its face. That is not true. Those who make up the Public Accounts have no right to leave it out as an asset because it is an asset. All the assets are placed in the Public Accounts, but there is also in the Public Accounts columns given of assets which are paying interest, of what they do pay, and of those that pay no interest. These are simply matters of book-keeping. I would not think that the officers of the department would be for a moment justified in dropping that out as an asset.

Mr. MULOCK. It is deducted, as worth its face, from the liabilities.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

OBSERVANCE OF THE LORD'S DAY.

Mr. CHARLTON moved second reading of Bill (No. 2) to secure the better observance of the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday. He said: In moving the second reading of this Bill, Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the House at any great length. The question has been discussed here upon more than one occasion, and the reasons for the passage of the Bill have been very fully urged. The Bill may be termed an old one; yet it is not as old as the principle upon which it is founded. That principle has often been ineffectually urged here; it may be ineffectually urged again; but if that is the case, it is not the first great truth that has been urged and rejected by multitudes of men; and I believe to-night, as I have always believed in presenting this Bill, that the principle upon which it is founded is a sound one, and that the legislation it calls for would be beneficial to the country. Last session for the first time a limited measure of success was secured for the Bill in this House, through the support and courtesy of the then First Minister, the late Sir John Thompson. Two sections of the Bill, one relating to the closing of canals and the other relating to the publication of Sunday newspapers, were allowed to pass the House; and this partial success I consider was a very important one, for the reason that the principle of the Bill was affirmed by the House, and also for the reason that the two sections carried were in themselves of very great importance. To-night I ask, as I did then, and as I have asked upon other occasions, that the Bill be accorded fair consideration upon its merits, and that no prejudice that may exist against the mover of the Bill because of active party hostilities in which at times he may have been engaged, may be allowed to prejudice the interests of the Bill itself. Some years ago, when I urged another Bill in this House, I made a similar request to the then Prime Minister, Sir John Macdonald, and that right hon. gentleman indignantly spurned the idea that he would allow himself to be influenced in his attitude towards any measure by personal considerations regarding any member by whom it might be presented; and I ask the exercise of the same spirit to-night. I ask for this Bill the consideration which it deserves upon its merits, entirely dissociated from any consideration as to the member who presents it or what may be urged against him.

Last year this Bill, after it passed this House, was taken in charge in the Senate by the hon. Mr. Allan, who, in introducing it there, made use of this language with reference to it:

This is a bill, which, as the hon. gentlemen are aware, has been before the other House of Parliament, I think, for more than two sessions. It has been very thoroughly discussed there, and has been amended and altered to a very great extent, so that it comes to us with most of its original provisions cut out, and indeed, I may say, in such an emasculated condition, that I do not think it can provoke much opposition from any one.

Well, this is a very fair instance of damning a thing with faint praise, and it seems to have thrown a wet blanket on the Bill in the Senate, and for this and other reasons it not only failed to pass that body, but failed to receive courteous treatment. Mr. Allan was followed by Senator Almon, and the chief reason urged by that hon. gentleman against the Bill was that it had been introduced into this House by an American, and he proceeded to indulge in a diatribe of abuse against me—scarcely touching the character of the Bill, but pouring out the vials of his wrath against me because of a malignant slander against me which just the day before had appeared in some of the newspapers, and which my credulous friend in the Senate accepted as gospel truth—I refer to charges against me, made in connection with the securing of free lumber at Washington in exchange for free logs. It was unfortunate for the Bill that its presentation in the Senate was contemporary with the publication of this statement. Then followed an apology from the Hon. Mr. Allan, who proceeded to say:

There is no question about it that the bill and its treatment for the last two years in the House of Commons has been very materially affected by the unpopularity of the gentleman who had charge of the bill there; but when the bill came up to this House it was impossible for me to decline to take charge of it.

That was certainly very generous and warm support of the Bill, speaking ironically. The natural effect of this was seen in the fate that the Bill met. The leader of the Senate, the Hon. Mr. Bowell, now the Premier of the Dominion, made the following remarks, among others:—

I look upon the bill as unnecessary. If it were in order, I should be inclined to express my disapproval of the bill in even stronger terms than the hon. member for Halifax has used.

Later on he said:

It is only another evidence of what one might designate—if it were at all in order—arrant hypocrisy.

Again he said:

There can be no doubt the object of the gentleman promoting the bill must have been to show to the world how good a man he was.

Well, Sir, I have only to say that this assertion, that my object in presenting and promoting this Bill is to secure popularity, is too absurd to be entertained for a moment. No man can stand up in face of this House and urge this Bill without realizing that he is undertaking a thankless task, that he is swimming against the stream and beating the air. If he takes this position for the sake of securing popularity, his conduct is idiotic, for popularity is not to be obtained from it, and that degree of sympathy which is required to win popularity is not to be found, I fear, in the country, and certainly not in this House. The assertion, therefore, that my motive in presenting this Bill is to secure popularity in the country and the applause of my fellowmen, is simply preposterous, for I have received nothing of the kind. On the contrary, I have ever felt, in presenting this Bill, that I was doing something which, if I consulted my own tastes and regard for popularity, I would shrink from doing. I am sorry the leader of the Senate so far forgot the dignity of his position as to attribute to a member of this House hypocrisy and a desire to show to the world how good a man he was in presenting this measure. I might account for the promptings of the hon. gentleman, but prefer not to do anything in that line. The promoters of the Bill in the Senate asked for a second reading and a reference to a committee, and the Senate declined to accord to the Bill this courtesy, but summarily and incontinently kicked it out of the House. And the Hon. Mr. Miller, in speaking to the Bill, previous to a vote being taken, said: "The sending of such a Bill to the Senate is simply an insult which can be only resented by adopting the motion of the hon. member for Halifax, which I intend to vote for." The Bill had received the assent of this House, and whatever might be its character, the conduct of the Senate in refusing it the courtesy of a second reading and reference to a committee was not only an indignity placed upon the mover and seconder of the Bill, but upon this House which had sanctioned it. We all remember the ordeal through which the Bill passed in this House. It went to the Senate ultimately in an amended form. The condition of affairs was such last session that it was doubtful whether public Bills would be reached at all, and when the Bill was in committee, that was the last occasion upon which it could be reached for consideration, so that whatever was to be done had to be done there and then, or else nothing could be done. The Bill from the necessities of the case left this House in an imperfect shape, and it was the proper function of the Senate to have referred that Bill to a committee and to have amended it in such a shape as to correct any imperfections resulting from the hasty action of this House at the last moment, when it was necessary to run the Bill through or shelve it for the session. The hope that was entertained that a calm consideration and fair treatment would be accorded to the Bill in a committee of the Senate was not realized, and I can only express sorrow for the evidences and exhibitions of passion and prejudice which characterized the conduct of the Senate in its treatment of that measure.

Now, Sir, I present the Bill again to-night. I present it, not because I expect that it will be popular, not because I feel that it will carry me upon a wave of sympathy, but because I feel it my duty to do so, and because I believe it to be a measure which will confer great benefits on this country. I present it as a matter of conscience and duty, and as I will continue to present it so long as I am a member of this House, whether it be received with favour or disfavour. I now wish to urge very briefly because I do not intend to enter into a long discussion, some of the reasons why this Bill should receive the favourable consideration of this House. It is a Bill which, in the first place, is in the interest of labour. It is in the interest of the labouring man that he should be allowed his weekly day of rest, and it is, unfortunately, the case, that a very large number of the labouring men in this country are not masters of their own conduct in this respect, and without the intervention of the law to protect them, the exactions of capital and of employers who have no regard to the rights of labour to a weekly days' rest, will compel the men to do violence to their conscience and to labour upon that day. I present the Bill because it is in the interest of morality, and because it will promote public and private virtue. The observance of the Sabbath, I need not tell any intelligent member of this House, is something calculated to elevate the moral tone of the people, and to create and promote public and private virtue, and for that reason I present it. It is, in the highest sense, in the interest of the state. It is in the interest not only of the labourer, not only of the citizens, but of the state. Of all the institutions of the state, of all the interests of the state, this measure is, in the highest degree, a safeguard. I wish to say that this Bill, as presented to the House, is not a religious Bill. Although the sentiment in favour of Sabbath observance is founded upon religious convictions, yet this is not a religious Bill, and the word "religion" is not mentioned in it at all. The Bill deals purely with civil and natural rights. It does not profess to say that man shall be religious; but it does profess to say he may be religious, and, if religious, is entitled to have his rights of conscience respected. It proceeds upon the principle that a weekly day's rest is a physical necessity. It proceeds also upon the principle that a weekly day's rest may not be secured by all men, without the intervention of the law to protect them in that right. Of course, the weekly day's rest is based upon a divine command, but the Bill does not treat that side of the question at all. The Sabbath rest confers, in the first place, individual blessings. The first statesman in this Empire, Hon. W. E. Gladstone, attributes the marvellous preservation of his physical and mental powers to his observance of the Sabbath day, to his dismissing all cares and labour and everything that appertains to his week-day life upon the Lord's day, and spending that day entirely disassociated from all worldly cares and occupations. The testimony of all men who have had experience is that the observance of a weekly day's rest confers physical blessings of the greatest possible importance. And, in addition it confers social and national blessings. We may compare the civilization of our day with the civilization of heathen nations—heathen nations which have existed with civilized institutions longer than our own, heathen nations which had a culture and refinement in a certain sense. But if we compare our civilization with that of Rome or Greece, or any of these ancient nations, we will see, upon the one hand, fraud, lust, murder, robbery, rapine—we will see a condition of society that we are preserved from knowing about, because it was so thoroughly vile and odious that we cannot produce upon the printed page what was the ordinary and regular condition of affairs then. Contrast that with the civilization of to-day. The change is due to Christianity, the change is due to the observance of those commandments which God has given to men, and among the most important of those is that to remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy. So we have the individual and national and social blessings which I have portrayed. And if I am asked: What warrant have we for the enactment of this law, I reply: This professes to be a Christian nation, and if we profess to be a Christian nation, that is a sufficient warrant for passing a law that Christianity and the founder of Christianity demand shall be observed. And if we are asked for precedents for this enactment, we turn to the history of the British Empire, and we find upon the statute-books of that Empire, more than thirty laws regarding the observance of a day of rest, laws dating back as far as eight hundred years ago. We find enactments in this direction in almost every colony of Great Britain, and in forty of the forty-two American States. We find that almost wherever there is a Christian nation, wherever Christian institutions are recognized by the law, a precedent for the enactment of the kind I refer to to-night exists. If we have the question raised as to the proper day, without attempting to enter now upon a theological discussion as to whether the change from the seventh day of the week to the first day of the week is proper, suffice it to say that this change has been accepted by almost all Christian denominations, accepted by the Catholic church and by all the Protestant churches with one or two trifling exceptions in point of numbers. So we do not require to deal with the question of the propriety of the change, because the propriety of the change is recognized in such a way that we are bound to accept and recognize it. And if we inquire as to the authorities that recommend the observance of this day, we have the authority of the oldest and most binding code of law, the decalogue; we have this law embodied in the ten commandments. We have the authority and support of all the great names in all the churches. The sovereign pontiff has expressed his opinion that Sabbath observance is necessary. Leo XIII. issued an encyclical in favour of it. You can hardly find a prelate of that church in the United States who is not a strong supporter of the Sabbath rest. I attended the meeting of the Sabbath Rest Congress in Chicago, and was associated there as a vice-president with Archbishop Ireland, who delivered a strong address upon the subject. And one of the best papers read before that Congress on the suppression of Sunday newspapers was that of Cardinal Gibbons. All the great names in the Protestant church favour the enactment of such a law. I could give scores of names of statesmen and public men and business men, names that would carry weight in any assembly, who are in favour of the enactment of such a law as I propose to-night.

It may be asked: Why not leave the observance of this commandment, the observance of this Sabbath rest to be a voluntary matter. Why interfere with individual conscience? Why put a law upon the statute-books to say that a man must do what we admit he ought to do. The law does not say that a man shall be religious, that he shall attend church, that he shall belong to this denomination or that, that he shall read the Bible. The object of the law is to provide that if a citizen wants to be religious, if he wants to attend church, if he wants to exercise his right of conscience, he shall have the privilege of doing so, and the law will protect him in the exercise of that right. Obedience to the commands of the Divinity is voluntary. A man has the opportunity to disobey every command put upon him. Of course God never laid a command upon man or made a requirement of him that it was not in his interest to observe; but he is free to accept or reject the commandment. And the human law may go just as far as to give to the citizen its protection, if he wishes to obey the commands and discharge the duties placed upon him. That is the object of this law, and that is its only object—not to compel a man to give attention to a certain line of religious observance, but to permit him to do so and to secure for him the right of conscience and his right to a weekly day of rest.

It is said some times that such a law as this is inconsistent with the principle of liberty and the principle of justice. Now this law, I think, is not inconsistent with the principle of liberty, and not inconsistent with the principles of justice; because, upon broad grounds, it seeks to promote the public welfare, and it will inevitably have that result. It seeks, first of all, as I have said, to secure for the citizen the enjoyment of his rights of conscience. If he believes he should not work on the Sabbath, the law steps in and says that he shall not be dragged out to work, as thousands of men are against their will. If he wishes to go to church with his family, the law says he shall have the opportunity to do so. This law is not inconsistent with the principles of liberty because it seeks to educate citizens and prepare them for their duty in the state. It is calculated to form and continue just and stable institutions. Where we have no Christianity we have no just institutions nor stable institutions. Where Christianity prevails, and so long as a country conforms to its dictates, we can have nothing but just laws and stable institutions, and stability and justice of institutions rest upon the recognition of Divine authority and compliance with Divine commands. And it is not inconsistent with the principles of liberty because it is calculated to foster and promote private virtue and public virtue, individual virtue and national virtue—an article we are very much in need of in this country, an article we cannot have too much of. Anything that will tend to the establishment and maintenance of public and private virtue is in the highest interest of the state and ought to command sympathy and support of every public man. And it is not inconsistent with the general interests of the country because it is calculated in the highest degree and will be efficient in the highest degree in promoting material prosperity. Find a community where morality prevails, where religion is respected, and you find a community of great material prosperity. This law should commend itself to our respect and good wishes because, above all other instrumentalities, it is calculated to promote the material welfare and prosperity of the state. Now, it is a remarkable fact, Mr. Speaker, that of late years, notably within the last four or five years, there seems to have been a very great revival in favour of Sunday rest. That movement was first inaugurated, on the continent of Europe, in the international Sunday Congress that was held at the time of the Paris Exposition, and in the Federated Labour Congress which met under the auspices of the Emperor of Germany in 1890. Since that time laws of this character have been passed in Belgium, in Holland, in Germany, in Hungary, in France, in Spain, in Norway, in Denmark, in Sweden, in Russia and in Italy.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Laws of the same character as this?

Mr. CHARLTON. Not entirely. But a law of this kind is a recognition of the principle if it secures only one of the rights for which we contend. The Bill I present to the House does not go so far as to give all that the advocates of Sunday rest require. But any one of the laws I refer to recognize the principles that Sunday rest is a sound public rule and makes enactment to secure to some extent at least, the observance of that rule. For instance, in Holland the publication of newspapers on the Sabbath is prohibited. In Hungary the publication of newspapers is prohibited. In all the cantons of Switzerland the publication of newspapers is prohibited on the Lord's Day. In Switzerland employees are guaranteed 52 days rest in the year, 17 of which shall be on the Sabbath, and the companies denying them this are fined from 500 to 1,000 francs. No employee is permitted to work upon that day, it is obligatory upon the company to give it. So, without entering fully into the details of the provisions with regard to these various Sunday rest enactments in Europe, suffice it to say that all these nations are moving in that direction, and every one of these powers have passed laws to a greater or less extent recognizing the principle. For instance, in France the Catholic party are advocating a Sunday rest with the greatest energy and the greatest devotion, and the French Assembly have given a week day's rest in the army and many departments of industry. They would not say Sunday rest, but they have provided a weekly day of rest; and, out of difference to the infidel sentiment of France, they did not recognize any religious sentiment or name in the matter at all. But a weekly day of rest is given to the army, a weekly day of rest is given by enactment to the labourers in the sewers of Paris, given to women and children in factories, and to various other classes of employees.

Sufficient, however, for this branch of the matter. Now, Mr. Speaker, the Dominion Government has no Sabbath Day rest legislation, and I think it is high time we took our place abreast of all these other powers in this march of progress, and gave some evidence that we are progressing in this direction. Originally, the provisions of this Bill that I presented to the House, covered fully the ground of Sabbath observance. That Bill, I think, was introduced and was under discussion in the House on three or four different occasions. It was finally referred to a select committee, and in that committee a great many of its original provisions were eliminated. The ground was taken that in any matter where the Dominion Government had not exclusive jurisdiction, we should not exercise jurisdiction. Wherever provincial jurisdiction could be brought to bear upon the provisions that were contained in the Bill referred to the committee, these provisions were struck out. Only four provisions were retained, four provisions which it was held were under the jurisdiction of the Dominion Government. One of these provisions was with regard to the closing of the canals on the Lord's Day. Another was a provision with regard to the suppression of the publication and circulation of Sunday newspapers. It was held by some members of the committee, and I think it has been held by some of my friends on this side, that this was a matter that pertained to provincial jurisdiction, but it was in reality, in the opinion of the committee, a matter of national importance, of national scope. The Dominion Government controls copyright, controls the admission of literature, it exercises control over the mails, and it was held that on the same principle it should control the publication of newspapers. On the question as to the propriety of prohibiting the publication of Sunday newspapers, a great deal of influence was exerted by the facts brought out in relation to this evil in the United States. It was pointed out that in the United States about 1,000 daily Sunday papers are issued, and it was shown beyond doubt that their influence upon the public sentiment and upon society is a most pernicious one; that the existence of a Sunday newspaper, in fact, is incompatible with the retention of the Sabbath; that it not only destroys all taste for religious reading, but that it creates a taste for gossip, sensational stories and effervescent trash. They destroy all taste even for solid literature of any kind, and were justly characterized by the greatest American editor, Horace Greeley, as social demons. Now, this Sunday newspaper evil in the United States has been chiefly instrumental in breaking down the good old Puritan barriers that were established in that country against immorality and Sabbath desecration, and the result is that a striking contrast exists between Canada and the United States in the matter of Sabbath observance, and that contrast, largely in our favour, is due, so far as the United States are concerned, to the demoralizing and debasing influence of its Sunday newspaper press. That is something we desire to avoid introducing into this country, and the Bill provides :

Whoever shall, upon the Lord's Day, in the capacity of a proprietor, publisher or manager, engage in the publication and issuing of any newspaper, journal or periodical for the purpose of sale or distribution, either by carrier or through the mails, upon that day, and whoever shall engage in the sale of any newspaper on that day, shall be deemed guilty of an indictable offence; but nothing in this section shall be held to prevent the gratuitous distribution of a religious publication upon the Lord's Day.

The next provision of this Bill is the one with regard to railway traffic, and in this respect the Bill does not profess to go as far as it should go. It does not attempt to grapple with the evil fully, but we are content with doing what we are able to do. The position of our railways is somewhat peculiar. Nearly all of them are connected with American lines, either to the east or west, or both; nearly all of them have passenger arrangements and freight arrangements with American roads; and to have passed a Bill that absolutely cut off freight traffic with those lines connected with American railways, would, unless there was concurrent legislation in the United States of the same character, be fatal to a certain extent to our roads. So this Bill, with regard to the curtailment of railway traffic, simply provides that no local passenger trains shall be run upon the Lord's Day, that no local freight trains shall be run, that cars shall not be moved from station to station, and that, so far as we can control the traffic within our own borders, it shall cease upon that day. I may say, with reference to this matter, that this Bill has never received the protest of a single railway manager in Canada. It was submitted to Sir Joseph Hickson, and he suggested some additions to the sections, and they were incorporated in it. Mr. Van Horne has never raised a voice against it, nor has any railway manager in Canada ever said aught against the provisions of this third section of the Bill with regard to the curtailment of railway business.

The last section of the Bill, the fourth section, is one with reference to excursions, excursions upon the Lord's Day by steamer and railway, or by railway. Now, it is a noticeable fact that our railway managers in this country have not encouraged Sabbath excursions. I believe the Grand Trunk Railway has never permitted them at all. I had a conversation upon one occasion with the manager of the Michigan Central Railway, Mr. Ledyard, and he told me he had always set his face against railway excursions on the Lord's Day, and never would permit them. He thought they were demoralizing, and, although he was obliged to ask from his employees more Sabbath labour than he desired to do, yet to place voluntarily upon them additional Sunday labour in the shape of excursions, was something that he never would do, and never had done. That is the sentiment of most, if not all, railway managers in Canada. Now, with regard to excursions, we hear a great deal about the desirability of permitting people to go out and take a little fresh air, and worship God in the country, &c.; and I am not prepared to say that an orderly and decorous excursion into the country, to a beach, or something of that kind, in the summer, is as wicked as some things might be. But we must bear in mind that the embryo excursion of this character goes through a process of evolution, it grows worse and worse, and it ends up in such excursions as were prohibited by the police in San Francisco, where hoodlums, men and women, went out and terrorized the suburbs of the city upon the Sabbath, and came back drunken and infuriated, with the lights turned down in the carriages, and there were such scenes of scandal and dissipation that these excursions were suppressed as a nuisance. So with excursions in great cities, the class of people that patronize them are not the ordinary law-abiding population, but they are the roughs and scum of society. Their influence, as shown in some American cities, is debasing and demoralizing, and the process of evolution carries the excursion on to the excesses that I am speaking of. An excursion is not a restful thing on the Sabbath. Men and women who go out on an excursion usually come back bedraggled, tired and worn out. Hugh Millar, the great Scotch geologist, once said that he noticed that the class of workmen who stayed at home and attended church and Sabbath school, usually came up fresh, and vigorous, and alert for their work on Monday morning, but that the excursionists came back at night tired, dissipated and dissatisfied with themselves, and were unfit for work on Monday morning. That is the effect of excursions, as a rule.

Mr. AMYOT. Do you exclude the omnibus?

Mr. CHARLTON. I am talking about railway excursions and steamboat excursions. I do not suppose the Bill will reach those who want to go out in an omnibus, or to take their own carriages. Now, I promised I would not detain the House long upon this Bill, and the extreme unpopularity of the measure, I think, is sufficiently evidenced by the reception of this news. This Bill I present to the House with the profound impression that it is a Bill in the highest interests of Canada, that it is a Bill not calculated to force the observance of the Sabbath according to the views of any particular religious sect, not calculated or prepared to interfere with any man's right of conscience or right of action, but it is a Bill that will place this country in line with other Christian countries that believe in the observance of a day of rest. It is a Bill designed to secure for the labourer, who cannot control the situation himself, that rest which is a physical necessity to him, and which is a mental and a spiritual blessing. It is a Bill that is calculated to promote the welfare, to increase the happiness and to increase the harmony that should exist in this country. It is a Bill, in my opinion, in the highest sense conducive to the general good of Canada, and I present it not as a puritanic or drastic religious measure, not as a Bill forcing on any class of the community any man's particular views with respect to religious observance, but I present it as a Bill calculated to secure for the toiler his right to rest, a right he can not enjoy without the protection of the law, as a Bill calculated to array this Dominion upon the side of justice, truth and right. I present it as a Bill that recognizes that there is a God who reigns and has authority, and whose commands are worthy of respect and worthy of some degree of attention; and presenting the Bill in that sense, and believing, as I do, that it is calculated to secure the results of which I have spoken in presenting it, I now move its second reading.

Mr. FOSTER. So far as I am concerned I have no objection to the hon. gentleman having the discussion upon the motion to go into committee, and taking the second reading, if it be the wish of the House, as affirming simply the principle of the Bill. I do not think there is any disposition on this side of the House to oppose the Bill simply because it comes from the hon. gentleman opposite, but the Bill may be found to contain objectionable and unworkable provisions. When it comes before the committee it will be for the House and the Government to see that the Bill is made a workable one.

Mr. LANGELIER. I do not intend to oppose the second reading of the Bill, because it is simply affirming its principle. That principle is a very good one, we all admit. We all agree that Sunday cannot be too well observed, just as we all agree that God cannot be too well adored. We do not agree, however, as to the mode of keeping Sunday. The details of the Bill will, of course, come before the committee, and I intend to oppose as strongly as I can many of its provisions. I consider they are tyrannical, and if they were passed they would bring us back to the inquisition of Spain, to a time when the people were compelled to go to mass or go to jail. This Bill is of the same kind as regards many of its provisions, and I shall do my best to oppose such a law being imposed on this country, at all events on the province of which I am a representative in this House. But I repeat that I do not want to oppose the principle, which is simply affirming that Sunday should be well observed, in which we all agree; but I do not agree with the way in which the mover provides that Sunday should be observed. We think there are other ways of observing Sunday than those held by the hon. gentleman, and I do not think any one has a right to impose on me, as this Bill would seek to do, a certain method of observing Sunday.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to ; and House adjourned at 8.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION.

Mr. SPROULE moved :

That the first report of the Standing Committee of Agriculture and Colonization be concurred in.

Mr. LAURIER. What is the report ?

Mr. SPROULE. It is in favour of leave being granted to employ a shorthand writer to take down the evidence.

Motion agreed to.

DRAINAGE ACROSS RAILWAY LANDS.

Mr. CASEY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 40) concerning drainage on or across railway lands. He said : In explanation of the Bill I may say that different municipalities and land owners in Ontario, and doubtless in other provinces also, have found considerable difficulty in obtaining outlets for natural watercourses and other drains across lines of railway since nearly all the railways in the Dominion have been declared to be under the jurisdiction of this Parliament. The railways have contended, since that took place, that they are not subject to provincial laws regarding watercourses and drains ; and so, when it has been necessary to carry a municipal drain or sewer, or the outlet of a natural watercourse, or of a drain from some person's private property across one of these lines of railway, the railway company has been able to dictate its own terms to the parties requiring facilities for drainage. In some cases they have made rent charges for the mere privilege of constructing drains on or across their lines, even when the landowner bore the whole cost of securing the outlet. In other cases they have refused to enlarge outlets for existing drains when these drains themselves had to be enlarged for the public benefit. In more than one instance litigation has arisen over these conflicting claims, and it has not been finally established by the decision of the highest courts, whether railways under the jurisdiction of this House are subject to provincial Acts respecting drainage. The Act I wish to introduce contains only one clause, and is for the purpose of declaring that railways under the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada are and shall be subject to the legislatures of the different provinces and territories of Canada which make laws concerning drainage across railway lands. I will give further explanations on the second reading.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD.

Mr. SPROULE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 41) to amend the Act respecting the adulteration of food, drugs and agricultural fertilizers.

Mr. CASEY. Explain.

Mr. SPROULE. The object is to prevent bee-keepers from feeding sugar to bees for the purpose of manufacturing honey.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 38) respecting the Hamilton Distillery Company (Limited).—(Mr. Sproule.)

Bill (No. 39) to amend the Hamilton Township Loan Society's Act of 1885.—(Mr. Sproule.)

Bill (No. 43) to determine the hours of labour for workmen and labourers employed on public works.—(Mr. Lépine.)

VOTING BY EMPLOYEES.

Mr. RIDER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 42) to facilitate voting by employees at elections of members of the House of Commons. He said : The Bill provides that workmen or employees shall have the right to leave their work for the purpose of voting on any day during which a Dominion election is held. It seems there is no provision made in the Franchise Act whereby they can absent themselves from work, except at the noon hour when they go to meals, as the hours for voting are between 9 a.m. and 5 p.m. Consequently they have no other opportunity during the day when they can go and deposit their votes. The Bill provides for giving two hours during which the voter may absent himself from his work for the purpose of voting. Of course such changes as are thought desirable, may be considered when the Bill reaches the committee stage.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

COMMERCIAL TREATIES AFFECTING CANADA.

Mr. FOSTER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 44) respecting commercial treaties affecting Canada. He said: The object of the Bill is to carry out what was alluded to in the debate upon the Address. It is to make provision for the admission, at the same rates as are granted to France under the treaty which has been passed by Parliament, of the same articles to nations which have the most-favoured clause treaties with Great Britain; and to give power also to allow these same products from colonies to come in at the same rate as they come in from France.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can the hon. gentleman state to what extent that will increase the loss of revenue that may accrue under the French treaty?

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend may remember that a full statement was made last year. I do not remember at the moment.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That point was not included, I think.

Mr. FOSTER. Perhaps not, but I am not able to state that at present. When the Bill is read, I will have all information.

Mr. LAURIER. Before the second reading, it would be well to have the correspondence moved for the other day.

Mr. FOSTER. It will be brought down.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

JAMES ANDERSON, OF SUTTON.

Mr. SUTHERLAND asked, (a) Whether one James Anderson, of Sutton, was in the service of the Government? (b) If so, how long was he in the service, and when did he cease to be in the service? (c) What were his duties? (d) How much has he been paid for such service? (e) What was the rate of his remuneration?

Mr. DALY. James Anderson, now of Sutton West, Ont., was in the service of the Government as Crown timber agent for Manitoba, the North-west Territories, and Keewatin, from June, 1879, to 1st February, 1882, receiving a salary of $100 per month, total, $3,200. During the same period he acted as fisheries inspector, receiving therefor $25 per month, total, $800. From the 25th May, 1887, to 1st January, 1888, he acted as assistant to the Half-breed Commission in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, receiving a salary of $3 per diem, total, $600. He was employed as an immigration agent as follows:—From 11th April, 1892, to 13th June, 1892, at $75 per month, total, $200. From 1st July, 1892, to 29th May, 1893, at $75 per month, and from 30th May to 30th June, at $100 per month, total, $926.61. From 1st July, 1893, to 30th June, 1894, at $100 per month, total, $1,200. One week, 6th to 13th July, 1894, $25. Total, $7,011.61. Mr. Anderson ceased his connection with the service on the last mentioned date.

SEIZURE OF TOBACCO IN TEMISCOUATA.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, 1. Whether, in the autumn of 1892, a seizure of tobacco was made, by Customs Department, on the premises of Charles Bertrand, merchant of Isle Verte, in the county of Temiscouata? 2. What quantity of tobacco was seized? 3. Did the department dispose of the said tobacco, or did they return it to Mr. Bertrand? What penalty did Mr. Bertrand pay, in view of the said seizure?

Mr. WALLACE. The records of the Department of Customs do not show any seizure of tobacco from or on the premises of Mr. Charles Bertrand, either during the year 1892, or at any time since.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Was any seized before?

Mr. WALLACE. That is very indefinite. The question was from October, 1892. There was none seized during the whole of 1892, nor at any period since.

SEIZURE OF TOBACCO FROM ALPHONSE THIBAUT.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, 1. Whether within the last three years any seizure of tobacco was made, by the Customs Department, on the premises of Alphonse Thibault, merchant, of St. Louis de Ha Ha? 2. What quantity of tobacco was so seized? 3. Did the department confiscate the tobacco, or did they return it to Mr. Thibault? 4. What penalty did Thibault pay to the Government, in view of the seizure?

Mr. WALLACE. 1. Yes. 2. Fifteen pounds. 3. The tobacco was confiscated. 4. No penalty, except forfeiture of tobacco.

VACANCIES IN THE SENATE.

Mr. FLINT asked, 1. How many vacancies are there in the Senate at the present date?

2. To whom have the senatorships referred to in the following letter been promised :—

Privy Council Office,
Ottawa, April 2, 1895.

A. McNeill, Esq., M.P.

My dear McNeill,—I have no doubt you have seen, as I have, notices in the papers that you had been or were to be offered a Senatorship. I know of no man in the Commons whom I would rather see elevated to the honourable and responsible position of a Senator than yourself; but the rumour must have been set afloat by persons having some ulterior object in view, as no such offer has been made, nor has it been considered. Certainly a Senatorship was never asked for by you, either directly or indirectly. Moreover, such a step is precluded for the present by the fact that there are no vacancies that have not long since been promised.

Trusting that you may be successful in the contest before you.

I remain, etc.,
Sincerely yours,
MACKENZIE BOWELL.

3. When will the said appointments be made?

Mr. FOSTER. 1. I believe there are at present ten vacancies in the Senate. 2. I do not know. 3. As soon as they conveniently can be.

TRENT VALLEY CANAL.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron) asked, 1. What has been the cost of the Trent Valley Canal, including the amount of the present contract, since confederation? 2. Has there been a permanent survey of the canal made as to location? 3. What is the depth of water obtained in the completed portions of the canal? 4. What has been the cost of maintenance for the year 1894? 5. What have been the receipts to the Government from the canal in 1894?

Mr. HAGGART. 1. Cost of the Trent Canal since confederation to date, $803,252.82. Amount of present contract, $492,059.15. Total, $1,295,311.97. 2. There has been a location survey of the canal made. 3. The depth of water on completed portions of the canal, is 6 feet. 4. The cost of maintenance for the year ending 30th June, 1894, was: Staff, $3,833.51; repairs, $4,988.59; total, $8,822.10. 5. The receipts from the canal for the year ended 30th June, was $1,286.45.

PAPERS RELATING TO THE DISCHARGE OF MR. LOISELLE.

Mr. BRODEUR (Translation) asked, 1. Whether it is the intention of the Government to lay before the House, this session, the papers relating to the discharge of Mr. Loiseau, as postmaster of St. Angèle de Monnoir, as requested by the resolutions of this House in 1892 and in 1894? 2. If so, when will the said papers be brought down?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) In answer to the hon. member, I may say that the papers referred to in his question have disappeared from the office of the Secretary of State and have not yet been recovered. I already had the honour to give the same answer to the hon. member. The only paper in the Post Office Department is the Inspector's report, which is confidential.

POST OFFICE INSPECTOR—DISTRICT OF MONTREAL.

Mr. BRODEUR (Translation) asked, 1. Is the position of Post Office Inspector for the District of Montreal vacant? 2. If so, since what date has it been vacant, and why has it not been filled up before this time? 3. Have members of this House made application to the Government, or to members of the Government, for that position?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In answer to the hon. member, to the first part of his question, my answer is: Yes. The vacancy exists since September 1st, 1893. The selection of a man to fill the vacancy is still under consideration. Many letters were received asking for the position. None of these was addressed to the department by any member of this House.

CIVIL SERVICE PROMOTION EXAMINATIONS.

Mr. BRODEUR asked, Whether an Order in Council has been passed whereby the Government have abolished promotion examinations for the Civil Service?

Mr. MONTAGUE. No Order in Council has been passed doing away with promotion examinations. But an Order in Council was passed doing away with the examination that would have been held in the present month, because the vote for such examination during the present year was exhausted.

SENATORSHIPS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, Whether the following letter was written by the Premier to Mr. McNeill :—

Privy Council Office,
Ottawa, April 2, 1895.

A. McNeill, Esq., M.P.

My dear McNeill,—I have no doubt you have seen, as I have, notices in the papers that you had been or were to be offered a Senatorship. I know of no man in the Commons whom I would rather see elevated to the honourable and responsible position of a Senator than yourself; but the rumour must have been sent afloat by persons having some ulterior object in view, as no such offer has been made, nor has it been considered. Certainly a Senatorship was never asked for by you, either directly or indirectly. Moreover, such a step is precluded for the present by the fact that there are no vacancies that have not long since been promised.

Trusting that you may be successful in the contest before you.

I remain, etc.,

Sincerely yours,

MACKENZIE BOWELL.

Mr. FOSTER. It was.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, At what dates the several Senatorships below named became vacant:—Trent, Ont., Billa Flint; Rougemont, Que., W. H. Chaffers; Sunbury, N.B., John Glasier; De Salaberry, Que., Jos. Tassé; London, Ont., Mr. Leonard; Bedford, Que., Mr. Stevens; Inkerman, Que., J. J. C. Abbott; New Brunswick, — Botsford; New Brunswick, John Boyd; and one in Nova Scotia—ten in all?

Mr. FOSTER. The vacancies in the Senate and the dates thereof, on the 1st of May, 1895, are as follows: Ontario, Hon. Billa Flint, died 15th June, 1894. Quebec, Hon. W. H. Chaffers, died 16th July, 1894. New Brunswick, Hon. John Glasier, died 7th July, 1894. Quebec, Hon. Joseph Tassé, died 17th January, 1895. Ontario, Hon. Elijah Leonard, died 14th May, 1891. Quebec, Hon. G. G. Stevens, died 15th April, 1892. Quebec, Hon. Sir J. J. C. Abbott, died 30th October, 1893. New Brunswick, Hon. A. E. Botsford, died 19th March, 1894. New Brunswick, Hon. John Boyd, died 4th December, 1893. Nova Scotia, Hon. T. D. Archibald, died 18th October, 1890.

FREDERICTON AND ST. MARY'S BRIDGE COMPANY.

House again resumed further consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. McMullen for:

Return showing the amount of money collected for tolls, fees or rents of any kind by the Fredericton and St. Mary's Railway Bridge Company in each year, separately, up to the close of their last year's business; the amount of money paid the Dominion Government as interest on the $300,000 loaned to the company, and the arrears due to the 30th June, 1894, and the amount since paid, if any.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). There is a further point of information required. I therefore move, in amendment, that the following words be added to the motion:—"Also, any copy of any mortgage security held by the Government in respect of said loan."

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. MULOCK moved second reading of Bill (No. 5) in further amendment of the Act respecting the Senate and the House of Commons. He said: Inasmuch as this Bill is but a repetition of the Bill which I had the honour to introduce last session it will not be necessary, I assume, for me to make any extended explanation. I may remind the House that the Revised Statutes of Canada, Chapter 11, which provides for payment of members of Parliament, clearly contemplates the mileage being an indemnity for expenditure, and nothing else. Hon. members will find on reading the statutory declaration required to be made by members that they are obliged to testify as to the distance they travel from their homes to Ottawa in order to attend to their parliamentary duties, and the payment of mileage to members is based upon the distance between their homes and the capital. It is a varying sum, not a fixed sum, independent of expense, but it is a variable sum, dependent upon the expenses that may be incurred, and it is at the rate of so much per mile. There is growing up in Canada a system of railways giving passes to the public, including at times members filling representative positions, among others, members of this Assembly. Now, when one thinks of some of the powers and duties exercisable by this Assembly, I think it ought to suggest to us, that we should, if possible, eliminate from our minds every influence that is likely to bias us in the exercise of our discretionary powers, which are at times almost judicial. For example, to-day two Bills were introduced into Parliament by my hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey) dealing with the question of railway law. If you take the Railway Act you find it has been built up year by year in dealing with important matters of public and private concern, and in this Assembly, and in all assemblies having similar powers, there is a constant contest between the people and between corporations which ask for privileges which are to a certain extent regarded as infringements of the rights of the people. I make these remarks not intending to say or to have it thought for a moment that this Assembly, or any individual member of it, has at any time been biased by the existence of the practice to which I allude. But, Sir, when we find that the public are criticising the acts of members of this House in receiving passes from railway companies entitling them to free passage to Ottawa and return to discharge their duties and at the same time drawing from the treasury of the country, mileage never paid to the railways; when, I say, we find public criticism of a character likely to degrade the high standing that Parliament ought to occupy in the opinion of the people, I venture the proposition that the time has arrived when we should seek to guard our own dignity and remove a practice that exposes Parliament to such criticism as this. For example, I have in my hands a cutting that I procured from a paper the other day, a somewhat severe one, perhaps, but yet one which may to some extent be warranted in the minds of newspaper critics by the practice in question. I maintain that it is due to ourselves that we should not allow it to be possible for such things as I am about to read, to be written, or for such sentiments to be entertained by the people. This extract is, I think, from the Ottawa "Journal," but at all events it has appeared in the press of the country and the particular newspaper is immaterial. After referring to the question of railway passes, it says :

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

The Toronto "World" thinks that the acceptance of passes by members of Parliament should be made a criminal offence. And certainly, so long as legislators who use passes continue also to take the country's mileage money for expenses in travelling to and from their legislative duties, there is actually moral, if not legal ground for criminal proceedings. Call it embezzlement, or call it obtaining money on false pretenses, either charge could be put perilously near substantiation in a court of law. The country cares little for the mileage, of course. That is a trifle. What we have both cause and need to be concerned about is the influence which passes exert upon members, consciously or unconsciously, when railway matters are before the House and railway men lobbying in the corridors and the city clubs and hotels.

Now, Sir, I am not admitting the correctness of the suggestion in that article that the acceptance of a railway pass has produced any such biased judgments as are here suggested. No person is in a position to make that statement, but we do know this: There is high authority for the statement that "gift blinds the eye," and it is our duty, I think, to avoid even the appearance of wrong-doing, by abolishing a system such as this which exposes Parliament and its members to criticism of this character. I am sure that I am voicing the sentiments of the overwhelming majority of the House in the view I am presenting and the action I am taking. I do not take this action in criticism of any hon. gentleman's course. I do not consider I have the right to sit in private judgment upon my fellow-members here, but in all humility I present this motion to the House, trusting that it will receive unanimous approval. You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that my Bill simply deals with the question of mileage, and provides that the members shall not be entitled to draw mileage money out of the public treasury, unless they shall have first paid it. That is the extent of the measure. I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Charlton, the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. CASEY. I wish to call attention to one point, at this stage. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) says that this Bill refers solely to the question of mileage, and merely provides that no member should be paid mileage who has travelled on a pass. I beg to call the attention of the House to the fact that that does not describe the scope of the Bill. The first section of the Bill says :

1. No member of the Senate or of the House of Commons shall travel by any railway to or from Ottawa, in connection with his attendance at the session of Parliament, either free or at any rate of fare less than that allowed to the general public.

Then the Bill goes on to provide that the form which we have to sign before drawing our indemnity shall contain the following declaration :

That I have not travelled by railway to or from Ottawa in connection with my attendance at the said session, either free or at any rate of fare less than that allowed to the general public.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman is quite correct in that. The first section provides that the members shall not travel to Ottawa and return, in respect to their parliamentary duties, at any rate less than that given to the general public, and that they shall not be entitled to draw mileage until they have made affidavit to that effect.

Mr. CASEY. Yes, but it not only provides that the member shall not have his mileage until he has made an affidavit to that effect but it really provides that he shall not travel on a pass at all. It prevents his travelling to Ottawa on a pass whether he draws his mileage or not.

Mr. MULOCK. Certainly, it does

Mr. CASEY. It would also prevent his drawing any portion of his indemnity unless he could certify that he has not travelled to Ottawa on a pass at the opening of a session. I wish to have this point clearly understood before the Bill goes to a second reading, because we should know what the Bill is before we vote upon it.

Mr. FOSTER. If the House proposes to vote upon this measure now, without further discussion, I do not wish the vote to be taken without emphasizing the objection which has been raised by my hon. friend opposite. I do not think that this House will pass, I do not think that it ought to pass, any mandate prescribing how a man should travel or should not travel with reference to his fare upon any railway. What this Bill sets out to do is to affirm the principle that a man must travel in a certain way and in no other way. You can put a penalty upon a member of Parliament who travels by a pass, the penalty being that he shall not draw his mileage unless he makes a declaration that he has not travelled by a pass; but I object to our passing a law which provides that a member of Parliament shall not travel by a pass. A member may come here by bicycle if he chooses, he may come by carriage if he chooses, he may walk if he chooses, he may beg his way if he chooses; he may come here just as he likes. We cannot interfere with that. But it is another thing to say whether or not he shall draw his mileage if he travels in a certain way. If it is considered a part of the principle of the Bill that a man shall not travel in a certain way, whether or not he is willing to take the penalty of so doing, I do not assent to its going to a second reading; but I do not think that is what the hon. gentleman meant to do by his Bill.

Mr. MULOCK. Do you ask me to say what I meant?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. I mean that a man shall not travel to Parliament and back free, or at a lower fare than that charged to the general public.

Mr. WILSON. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he means that this law shall apply when the House is not in session?

Mr. MULOCK. No.

Mr. FRASER. I think there is a good deal in the principle of the Bill. When there is an indemnity provided for members of Parliament, I think it is only fair that that indemnity should be used for the purposes for which it is granted. Either do away with that and pay the members their actual outlay in coming here, which would be the better way, or else do another thing. While the objection may apply to railway companies, I submit that there is no danger in travelling on a half pass upon the Inter-colonial Railway or on other Government railways. But there is another difficulty. Suppose a man comes by boat a good part of the way, and gets a pass for that part of his journey; is not that just as bad as travelling by railway on a pass, and should it not be included?

An hon. MEMBER. Or by bicycle.

Mr. FRASER. Oh, there is no man here except myself who could come on a bicycle, and there should be no legislation for my particular self. But I was going to point out that if there is much to be said for the principle of the Bill, let it apply to steamboats as well as to railways. On this question, I have my own individual opinion. In certain countries, and countries pretty far advanced, every railway and steamboat company is required by statute to pass a member of Parliament. There may be much to be said in favour of such a law, and if it were the law, this Bill would not be necessary. But if we are going to have a Bill, let it apply to every member whether he comes here by coach, by steamboat or by railway. I know, for example, that one man has to travel forty or fifty, or a hundred miles by coach, which he gets free. If the driver of the coach chooses to pay that much compliment to the member simply because he carries the mail, I submit that there is as much crime in that as in travelling free by railway. Let the Bill be universal in its application. I do not think it goes far enough.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). If the Bill is not perfect, let us go into committee upon it and see what we can do to improve it. While I do not wish to judge any of my fellow members, I will support this Bill, for two very substantial reasons. In the first place, this Parliament votes every year over $33,000 for mileage of its members. That money is voted for a certain purpose, and it is intended to reach certain corporations in this country; but we are given to understand that they do not get it. If the revenue of those companies were increased by $33,000 every year, they would be in a position by that much to give the general public reduced travelling rates.

An hon. MEMBER. Too fine.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). It is not too fine; and when you put to that $33,000 a year the additional thousands of dollars a year which they lose in fares by reason of these passes, the railway companies would have an income of a quarter of a million dollars a year which could be devoted to the reduction of railway fares in this country. If we take up this matter and try to remedy the evil, we can do it in two ways. If we vote the money for the railways, let us give them the $33,000 or $34,000 every year; or let us capitalize that amount and give them the lump sum, and then make it the law that railways shall carry members of Parliament free; and let us insert a clause in every future charter incorporating a railway company, making it a condition precedent to the granting of the charter that the company shall carry members of Parliament free. Let us take up this question and deal with it. Let us try to preserve the respect of the people for this Parliament, and to do so we must remove the stigma—and I say, with all respect to the House, that it is a stigma—that while the railway companies of this country refuse to reduce the rate of travel to the general public, we by our action are depriving those railroads of an income to the extent of at least a quarter of a million dollars a year. Therefore I hope the House will go into committee on this Bill, consider it, and if it is defective in any respect, try to improve it.

Mr. EDGAR. There is no doubt a great deal to be said in favour of the principle which appears to some extent to underlie this Bill. I think it is pretty hard to justify members drawing a mileage allowance and not paying any fares on railways or steamboats or coaches. But I think the Bill goes a good deal further than that. I should be glad to have it referred to committee, and put in a shape which strikes me as being more reasonable. I would suggest that a clause be added to the schedule and declaration which we have to make in drawing our indemnity, something to this effect: That I have purchased a railway, or steamboat, or coach ticket to and from Ottawa in connection with my attendance at said session, at a rate of fare not less than that allowed the general public. So that unless a member bought a ticket to and from Ottawa, he would not be entitled to draw his mileage allowance, and I suppose that would be reasonable and fair.

Mr. OUIMET. If the intention of the hon. mover of this Bill is to prevent hon. members from receiving money in the shape of mileage for travelling expenses, which they have not paid, I think there would be a much simpler way of reaching that object, and I would suggest this remedy. Have an amendment passed providing that members will only be paid their actual expenses from their home to the capital and back, say twice every session. Sessions are now so long that it is only reasonable that they should be given the advantage to go home at least twice during each session. If we were to pass an amendment to the House of Commons Act providing that the members shall be paid for actual expenditure while going to the capital and coming back, say at least two or three times during each session, the evil which my hon. friend proposes to cure will be at once remedied in a fair and direct manner. There are a good many members of this House who, perhaps, are not very much interested in this, because they can have, and are entitled to have, passes in other capacities. How are you going to reach these men? Are you going to say that the president or director of a railway company is not entitled to travel free even on his own road, when this privilege is granted to other gentlemen, not members of this House, but holding similar positions in railway companies? That would be utterly ridiculous. It is proper that a member should not receive money for expenses which he has not incurred, but the remedy I have indicated would meet that point. I think the last suggestion, that made by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) is a reasonable one. If we look to one of the foremost countries in Europe, we will see that in that country all the members of the Senate and House of Representatives are entitled, by virtue of their position as representatives of the people, to travel free on every railway in that country, both during the session and outside the session. That would be a reasonable rule to follow. There is certainly something invidious in the fact that a certain number of members of Parliament are given passes, while others, who stand in the same position as regards these companies—and I will not go the length of saying that the giving of a railway pass by a company will influence the vote of any member of this House—are not given them. The fact that the majority of the members are given passes by these railway companies, while a few are refused, is certainly invidious. It would be a much more reasonable and manly stand to take before the country, to state that, after all, the members and Senators, who represent their country in this House and Senate, should be entitled to travel free on the railways of this country, all of which have received large subsidies of public money. It would be a fair proposition to lay before the country that while we refuse to pay anything in the shape of mileage, we should arrange to have every member of Parliament entitled to free travel from these companies which have received subsidies. I am certainly of the opinion of those hon. gentlemen who think that this Bill does not meet, at all, even the apparent intention of the hon. mover; and I should not be very much astray if I were to show that he has made the application of the principle in his Bill so stringent that the Bill must, of necessity, be rejected by this House, either at this stage or later.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not think that the criticism indulged in by the hon. Minister of Public Works as to the alleged motive of my hon. friend the member for North York (Mr. Mulock) is either merited or in good taste. I think that the principle enunciated in this Bill is the correct one.

Mr. OUIMET. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, I did not allege any motive. I only stated that it appeared to be so.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman stated that the hon. member for North York had introduced a Bill couched in such language and framed in such a way as to make its rejection by this House a fore-ordained conclusion, and that he had purposely introduced the Bill for the purpose of securing a certain amount of eclat and applause in the country, without, at the same time, any intention of having it become law.

Mr. OUIMET. I said that he had missed his shot.

Mr. CHARLTON. That impression is conveyed by the hon. gentleman's language. In the discussion, two suggestions were made regarding amendments, but the ideas thrown out by hon. gentlemen as to what would be proper are entirely out of place at this moment. The time to effect changes in this Bill is when it reaches the Committee of the whole House, and the question for the House now to decide is whether we shall adopt the general principle of the measure. If the majority of members believe that passes should, under no circumstances, be allowed, or if they should take the position that passes should be allowed as a matter of right, let them adopt such amendments, or, if they prefer the Bill as it is, let them vote for it. If, however, they believe that the principle of the Bill is not a correct one, let them vote against it. We will be prepared to receive, should the Bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole, such amendment as may be found advisable, but there is no use making any suggestions at this stage. But if we do not give this Bill its second reading, we will be open to the insinuation of having shown our hostility to the entire measure under cover of objections to some of the details. Let the Bill receive its second reading; let it receive the support of those who believe that the system of passes is an evil, and the opposition of those who believe that it is not an evil. Let us cease this discussion as to details of the Bill, which is totally purposeless at this moment, and either reject it, or else pass it and let it go to committee, where its details can be considered.

Mr. WELDON. My remarks on this subject shall be very brief. I rise merely to support the view so well expressed by the Minister of Public Works, which I very heartily share. I think that we sometimes, inconsiderately, make a mistake and are unjust even to ourselves, and lead the people of the country to think that we are much less worthy men than we really are. Now, the members of this Parliament seem to me to be particularly free from the reproach of being greedy or grasping.

Mr. CHARLTON. That is left for the Government.

Mr. WELDON. If the hon. member will allow me;—I did not interrupt him. It is 22 years since the indemnity of members was fixed at its present figure. I do not think that you will find a legislature in any of the British colonies—I have had occasion to look into the facts with regard to a great many of them, provinces of Canada and of Australia, and of other colonies—where they have exhibited such self-sacrifice and consideration for the public as to allow the amount of indemnity to stand unchanged for 22 years. In this country, as we know well, our sessions have grown longer and the cost of living at Ottawa has greatly increased. This shows a public spirit, a spirit of personal sacrifice and some degree of patriotism in the members of these successive Parliaments, which the public should not forget, and which, at all events, should protect them from the reproach of being too greedy or grasping, or forgetful of the public interest and too careful of their own. I think that the suggestion of the hon. Minister of Public Works is well worth considering. It was only the other day that I read that the Italian railways are governed by a similar law. The Italian Parliament has passed a law compelling every railway system—I think there are four great railway systems in the kingdom—to give free passes to all members of the Italian Parliament in session and out of session, on grounds of public policy. They hold it to be in the public interest that those deputies who live in the southern provinces of Italy should have every facility to travel in the north, and conversely. In other words, the breaking down of provincial feeling and the development of national feeling will be helped by such a law as this. I know that a good sentiment exists here, and I think it is a mistake to give out to the country that we are less worthy men than we are.

Mr. FLINT. I think it will be generally conceded that the tone of the discussion shows that the principle of this Bill is favoured by the House, although we may have suggestions to make in committee as to the best means of reaching the end desired. But I think it would be highly advisable, in the interests of the House, to accept the principles enunciated by the hon. mover of the Bill. We all know that the payment of mileage is made upon the principle of indemnity allowed to representatives for one journey to Parliament and return. Whether the mileage allowance is sufficient to admit of members making repeated visits to their homes may be open to question. There can be no doubt than in a long session of Parliament it would be advisable, highly advisable, that members should be allowed to visit their homes on more than one occasion; otherwise the sacrifices which many professional men would be obliged to make would be more than they could be fairly asked to make as representatives of the people. I think there are objections to the form of this Bill, and I think it will be conceded by those who have thought much of the matter that the subject ought to be considered on a larger basis than appears to be attempted in the motion before the House. We are aware that in the United States the question has assumed another form altogether, and that legislation has been enacted dealing directly with the railway and transportation companies; and I think the suggestion that the Government, on some future occasion, should take that matter into consideration, ought to be favourably received. After all, no matter in what form this Bill may be passed, there can be very little doubt there would be many ways in which members of Parliament, if they desired to do so, could evade its provisions. But if a measure is passed dealing with railway and transportation companies, and insisting upon the principle that no free pass of any kind shall be granted by these companies, then we shall be able to deal with this question, I believe, upon a reasonable basis. In such a case, the legislature does not select any particular class, making an invidious distinction between it and other classes of the community. We know that journalists and large numbers of people connected with the transportation interests, and others as well as members of Parliament, are allowed free passes by railway and transportation companies. The figures that might be adduced, too, shows the loss to the shareholders of these companies would be much larger than those given by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean). Now, if Parliament sincerely desires to protect the companies from this loss, suggested by the hon. member, it will be dealing properly by passing stringent legislation forbidding the granting of passes to any individual, members of Parliament included. That done, each will stand in his true relation with regard to the mileage indemnity he draws for coming to this House. I think that is the only fair and reasonable manner in which this question can be viewed—not dealing with ourselves invidiously, but dealing with all classes of people who use these means of transportation. There is no doubt the principle of the measure is sound and that any member of Parliament travelling from his home to Ottawa and back should not draw mileage and at the same time travel free. I do not know that there is any provision in this Bill with regard to intermediate visits that a member might make to his home during the session; it provides only that mileage shall not be drawn if he travels to and from his home on a pass. However, the principle of the Bill being sound, the House may accept it, and then amend the measure in committee in such a manner, if possible, as to remedy any real grievance while not causing a greater evil than it overcomes.

Mr. DENISON. Although I approve of the principle of this Bill, there may be some parts of the details that I would not altogether approve of. The suggestion made by the Minister of Public Works is one which, I think, would hardly work out in practice, for this reason: If we allow the members' expenses for three trips, it will be practically about the same thing as our mileage is now, as the mileage under present rates, I take it, would carry a member three times to his home and back. While I approve of the principle of the Bill, I think it would be better to follow the suggestion made by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), that is, to take our mileage away from us, capitalize it, and divide it among all the railways of Canada in proportion to the amount of mileage that we get over these railways; and then pass a law in this House saying that every member shall travel free during the whole year, and as often as he likes, with the object of encouraging them to travel about the country and make themselves acquainted with the different sections, and its capabilities, rather than that they should remain at home in their own county. Now, we know that the Canadian Pacific Railway is grumbling about the bad times, and the Grand Trunk Railway is also grumbling about bad times, and under these circumstances, they would drop into such an arrangement, and be well pleased to carry it out. It would certainly be a fair one, because we would be taking nothing from them that we would not be paying for. I feel satisfied, too, that this move would meet with the approbation of the country at large, because it does seem to me that the remarks that have fallen from the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) are apropos. Now there is another point. The Grand Trunk Railway issue half passes, while the Canadian Pacific Railway issue the full pass, and that shows to my mind that they must look upon it as an object to retain the half fare, or to give the full fare, according to the interest of the company. If we adopted the system of carrying all members free, we would be adopting the plan that has been pointed out by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) as existing in France. I believe the same idea has been carried out in Australia, and I hear, also, in Italy. I shall be glad to support the principle of the Bill.

Mr. COCKBURN. So many objections have been made to the Bill introduced by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) that there seems to be no possibility of amending it. It is lost already in the multitude of objections that have been made to it, both by members on the Government side of the House, and on this side. I do not wish to add any other objections, but it would strike me that under the Bill which is here proposed, I could travel from Hull away to Vancouver and back again to Hull, and yet I could not be brought under this Bill. I think with my hon. friend from Albert that something must be allowed to the honesty of the members of this House; and any attempts to force legislation of this character would, I think, simply tend to lower the character of the House. I am not prepared to go the length of adopting the French system, and enacting that all railways shall carry us free, because it is to be remembered that the greater number of railways in France belong to the Government, whereas here the roads are private enterprises. It is true, as my hon. friend remarks, that we have subsidized all our railways, and I can only hope that we will have fewer to subsidize in the future.

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). I would ask the hon. member why private companies should carry members of Parliament free?

Mr. COCKBURN. If I choose to carry any member in my carriage, or on my back, or in my arms, I am at perfect liberty to do so. It is my business, and nobody else's.

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). I would ask the hon. gentleman another question. If Parliament votes money for an indemnity for these railways, why do the railways not get it?

Mr. COCKBURN. I am not aware that the Government votes any indemnity to the railways. I might have come here without ever getting into a railway car at all. I suppose, under this rule, I would not be allowed even to travel here on my own bicycle. Sir, the whole proposition is so faulty that I am almost driven to the conclusion that the hon. member was riding for a fall, and were it not for his strict honesty of purpose, as well as his integrity, and his strict adherence to the minutiae of facts, I should have been led to the conclusion that he wished to pose before the public in the light of an over-virtuous man, and that in view of the coming elections in North York, he wished to receive the support of the Patrons.

Mr. LAURIER. This question has taken a wider range than I supposed at first sight it would, when the Bill was introduced by the hon. member for North York. For my part I am bound to say that the Bill goes much further than I supposed, from a hasty glance at it. I had supposed the intention of my hon. friend was to prevent any member who travels on a pass, from drawing mileage under the statute, which would seem natural enough. But the Bill goes much further than that, and forbids a practice which is now universal in this House. I may say. Well, this is a question of public interest, and may be discussed upon its merits, but if I may judge from the temper of the House at this moment, the Bill is not likely to be discussed in that spirit. I daresay that the House was taken, perhaps, somewhat by surprise in the discussion which has taken place. There seem to be so many different opinions regarding the proposition. I would suggest, under the circumstances, that the debate be adjourned at the present time, so that an opportunity may be given to the House to consider it, and that when it comes up for discussion at a future time, its purport may be better understood, and that it may receive an unbiased judgment from the House, such as its importance deserves. I, therefore, move that the debate be now adjourned.

Mr. MULOCK. I desire to reply for one moment to the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn). This is not the first occasion on which the hon. gentleman has considered it his public duty. I presume, to analyse my motives in the discharge of my duties here. He may have a perfect justification in his own mind for it. I wish him to understand, and I wish the House to understand, that I am not responsible to him for my motives. I am responsible to those whom I represent, and to the public as a whole, and to the extent of the little infinitesimal part that he forms of the general public, I am responsible to him, but only to that extent. The principle of this Bill is a sound principle, in my judgment. I would go further if I thought there were any prospect of a further proposition being admitted. I maintain that the directors of a railway—if we want to deal with a large question—have no right to part with the earning power of their road, except for value. They may give it to business men for the sake of securing trade, whether they fail in their object of giving free passes to members or not. What must be the manifest object of railways in giving passes to members of Parliament having powers? The hon. member for Centre Toronto, as soon as ever he had ceased to be a member of this House, would find his pass cut off.

Mr. COCKBURN. No.

Mr. MULOCK. Well, he may have a way of securing it, but I fancy that most of the members who have passes, would find that privilege terminated with the termination of their seats in this House. As long as they have not got something to give in return, they will get no passes.

An hon. MEMBER. Motive.

Mr. MULOCK. That is the object of the railway. I am not saying it is successful. Now, hon. members have shown great astuteness in finding defects in this measure; they have shown great interest in it. Some of them have shown great anxiety to promote the object in view, but unfortunately this measure has not been framed in a way to commend itself to the judgment of its critics. There is a simple proposition in it, and that proposition is that members of Parliament shall not receive gifts from possible suitors at their hands before this House—suitors for favours, shall I call it? or for legislative grants, or for subsidies, or for substantial aids, and so on. The principle of the Bill is that railway companies shall not present free gifts to persons in these judicial positions. I believe that is one of the positions which members of the Government fill. That is the principle of the Bill, and it is a very simple principle, and a set of words could easily be found which would fit, if hon. gentlemen think the words here suggested do not fit, but which, I submit, do fit and attain the object sought to be secured. If it is meant by the adjournment of the debate that it is for the purpose of killing the Bill, I should prefer a division being taken this moment on the principle. If the suggestion to adjourn the debate simply means that the Bill will come up in its regular order again, I have no objection to the adjournment. The hon. leader of the Opposition says he simply moved the adjournment of the debate in the ordinary course. The Bill will, therefore, occupy its place on the Order paper, and, as I do not wish to be unreasonable, I am willing to accede to the motion for the moment.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not rise for the purpose of calling in question the principle of the Bill or the propriety of the legislation proposed ; but I think the question is a very much wider one than is indicated in the Bill now before the House. Parliament is, no doubt, an important factor in the government of the country, and so is the press. We are all more interested often in reforms which affect others than in those which affect ourselves, and so, while the press has with great unanimity expressed itself in favour of the abolition of passes so far as members of Parliament are concerned, I have not seen it anywhere suggested that passes should be abolished so far as the press is concerned. And yet I believe this is necessary in order to secure fair and independent expressions of views.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). The press, in taking passes, give full value for them, and the railway companies find it to their advantage to grant them ; and, as regards giving passes to members of Parliament, they give them for the same reason.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman does not mean to say the press is bought by passes ?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Perhaps the hon. member wishes to convey the idea that questions affecting the interests of railway corporations from whom passes are received, are always very fairly considered in consequence of the receipt of such favours, and perhaps the railway corporations are more fairly dealt with if passes are granted to the press than they would be if they had not been received. I do not know whether that is the view which the hon. gentleman wishes to convey to the House or not. But what I rose principally to call the attention of the House to is that a large portion of the time of the House every session is taken up with the consideration of questions of a private character, private and local Bills, Bills incorporating companies of various sorts, and Bills amending Acts of incorporation. Now, according to the immemorial usage of the House of Commons in England, every member of every committee that sits upon a private Bill receives in compensation for his services one guinea each sitting of the committee, this sum being received, not from the public treasury, but from the company interested. The question is whether the railway corporations of Canada consider themselves as doing anything more in granting passes than compensating members for their services on the committees where the legislation required by these companies comes up for consideration. It seems to me—I am not saying one word against the principle of the hon. gentleman's Bill, I am not saying whether the Bill should go much further or not—the whole question is whether a company should be at liberty to grant passes to anybody, if it has received aid from the public chest, may very well be considered. But I think there is a great deal to be said, if we do not adopt the British practice of charging those who have private legislation to promote, for the purpose of securing that private legislation—for we all must bear in mind that the session is a good deal lengthened owing to this private legislation, for which no member receives one dollar as compensation from any one, except the favours they may receive from the railway corporations in the way indicated—in favour of the proposition of the hon. Minister of Public Works. It is very important that every man who represents this country, whether poor or rich, whether he can afford to travel at his own expense or not, should have an opportunity of visiting every section of the country and making himself familiar with the character of the different sections. I believe the vast majority of members would be very much less qualified to discharge their duties on questions which come before them, if such a privilege did not exist. I think, therefore, it is in the public interest that this course should be taken. Whether the present practice that exists to some extent is the best one, is, of course, fairly open to argument and consideration, but I see no reason why a member of Parliament should be called upon to devote his time and attention and abilities to serve private parties and corporations without receiving compensation, any more than any other party in any other business of life should be called upon to act. My hon. friend near me (Mr. Lister) says that is in the agreement when an hon. member is elected. It is not in the agreement when he is elected, that he shall do this work gratuitously, or that he shall be compelled to devote his time to mastering the application of private parties for legislation in their interest only. If it is, I am bound to say that I could name a great many hon. members who do not conform to the agreement, who do not attend committees, who do not discharge their duties in this regard. But the country has committed to us the power of revising and reconsidering that agreement ; that is one of the powers with which we are entrusted, and the very object of the hon. gentleman's Bill is to exercise that power. We may exercise it in one direction or exercise it in another. I rose to call the attention of the House to the serious duties which we are called upon to discharge, the value given for all that is received, and to submit to the House whether, when we reach this subject again, we should not consider it from a larger point of view than that suggested by the Bill.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I desire to say one word and to make one suggestion on this subject. I have listened with some interest to the discussion. I approve entirely of the underlying principle of the Bill of my hon. friend ; but I am bound to say, from my experience I believe that, do what you please, it will be evaded in many ways, and that the only possible mode of obtaining perfect freedom from the charges made is that suggested by the hon. Minister of Public Works. However, I would add to that these two considerations: I think it should be limited to roads that have received subsidies from the Government, which will pretty well cover all the railways in Canada of which I know anything; and I would not adopt the suggestion of the member for York (Mr. Maclean) and make the railway companies a further present, but I would suggest to the Minister of Finance that in that case he might well restore the whole indemnity to the public chest. That would make a moderate saving which ought to be saved under such circumstances.

Mr. CASEY. The mileage, not the indemnity.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The mileage, not the indemnity. I do not expect to carry out such a reform as that. But the mileage in such cases might very properly be restored. Now, Sir, practically speaking, we have only two railways in Canada, as one may say, the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway.

An hon. MEMBER. What about the Intercolonial Railway?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Intercolonial Railway, of course, which is Government property. The Grand Trunk Railway, as everybody knows, stands in our books indebted to the tune of $30,000,000 odd, and we, by gifts of one kind or another have given the Canadian Pacific Railway to the extent of close upon $100,000,000. There is no injustice; on the contrary there is every reason and good ground, as pointed out by my hon. friend, upon broad grounds of policy for adopting the system which prevails in many countries on the continent and elsewhere, of enabling members to travel freely from one part of the country to the other—I won't say in Jamaica cars, but at any rate in reasonably comfortable fashion.

Mr. FOSTER. Pullmans not included.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, I do not include Pullmans. If the House desires to remove the scandal which I know has accrued, and which may accrue from the unequal distribution of passes known to exist, the best way to do it is by adopting the suggestion of the Minister of Public Works. I think there is a great deal in that which ought to commend itself to this House.

Mr. HAZEN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make one or two remarks in regard to something which was said by the hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill (Mr. Mulock), and which was emphasized by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean). Those gentlemen said that these railway companies never gave anything for nothing, that their reason for giving passes to members of this House must be manifest, and in effect that the companies were influenced by the idea that members on both sides of the House in receiving passes would be disposed to take a more favourable view of legislation affecting railway interests that might come before the House. Sir, I do not believe that there is a single member of this House who, if he for one single instant entertained that view and believed these passes were sent him by railway companies with a view of influencing his judgment on their legislation, but would at once return the pass and indignantly refuse to travel upon it. I feel that in saying that I am speaking my own sentiments and the sentiments of gentlemen sitting around me, and I have too high respect for the gentlemen sitting on the other side of the House to think that they would adopt any different course. I would prefer to think, and I do think, that in giving these passes the railway companies are actuated by motives of an entirely different character, because I cannot for one moment understand that they would believe that gentlemen who are chosen by the public to sit in Parliament would be influenced in legislating by any such small consideration as a railway pass. I prefer to think, Sir, that in giving these passes the railway companies are actuated with this idea: That they want to show their appreciation of the very generous and liberal treatment that has been accorded to them by the public of Canada in the past in connection with the subsidies that have been given to them by the representatives of the people in this House of Commons. It is for that reason, I believe that, from year to year, they send these passes to the representatives of the public. Mr. Speaker, I also wish to dissent from another idea that was put forward by the hon. member from Toronto West (Mr. Denison) to the effect, that if this House sees fit to pass legislation providing that it shall be the duty of railway companies to carry members of Parliament free of charge as in France, then we should capitalize the amount of mileage that is paid to members and give it to the different railway companies in proportion to their mileage. I dissent from any proposition of that sort. If the House chooses to pass such legislation, if the House after consideration and discussion, thinks it desirable to provide that all companies receiving Government aid in future, or that have received Government aid in the past, should carry members of this House, and of the Senate free of charge, Parliament has the right to do that. I do protest against the idea that in such a case we should capitalize the present mileage money and divide it amongst the different railway companies in Canada. From every standpoint I believe that this is a proposition that should not be assented to. There is great force, in my opinion, in the statement of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), that a man is a better legislator in

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Canadian interests who has had an opportunity of making himself acquainted with the Dominion from one ocean to the other. If hon. members in this House had an opportunity of travelling over the country, of seeing the different provinces and of meeting the different peoples, it certainly would have a great effect in removing any sectional or narrow provincial feeling that might exist in their minds, and it would result in making them more broad-minded, and from the information they obtained more capable of dealing with the many questions that may come before the House. If, as a matter of right, and not as a matter of favour, members who cannot afford it, had the privilege of travelling over the country and making themselves acquainted with its various wants, they would undoubtedly be able to more intelligently discuss many of the questions brought up in Parliament. For instance, during the coming summer there is to be a large exhibition held at Regina, in the North-west Territories, and it certainly would be an advantage to members of this House if they could go to that exhibition and see the products of the western country displayed there, and meet the people and become acquainted with those resources of our western country, which they have not been able to realize from personal observation in the past.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, I should not have troubled you with any further remarks only for the purpose of making it clear that the reason I object to the second reading of this Bill is not on account of the proposal to take away the mileage from those who get passes, but on account of the other principle, the main principle involved in the Bill itself. I shall not discuss alternate proposals about mileage, and so on, at this stage of the Bill, but I want to ask the House to remember that if they give this Bill a second reading in its present shape they accept the principle that passes are a bribe to legislators, because this Bill makes it illegal to accept passes, and the hon. gentleman who moved the Bill (Mr. Mulock), and the hon. gentleman who seconded it (Mr. Charlton), have made it clear that in their opinion, passes were intended as bribes to members of this House. These hon. gentlemen stated that they did not wish to imply that any member has been bribed by these passes, but if so, what is the meaning of the whole Bill? If passes do not bribe members, what is the objection to our having passes? Those hon. gentlemen say that the objection is, because people will think that we are bribed or something of that kind. If we think that these passes are meant as a bribe, if we think that we are bribed by these passes, then, I say, let us vote for this Bill. But, if we feel on the other hand, that passes are merely such compliments as may fairly be tendered by corporations under the control of this Parliament, and assisted by this Parliament, to men who are making the laws of the country, very well, let us throw out this Bill. At all events, Sir, let us think very seriously before we give our vote to affirm the proposition, and the corollary of that proposition enforced by the speeches of the hon. gentlemen, that passes are given to members in the nature of bribes. I think the House will consider a long time before it declares its adherence to that principle. When the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) introduced this Bill he told us that it was merely a Bill to prevent members drawing mileage when they travelled on passes. The Bill itself is something totally different from what the hon. member told us it would be when he introduced it. If it were merely what he said it was at first, I should certainly have supported the proposal to give it a second reading and go into committee to consider the mileage question. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says that some members will excuse their opposition to the Bill as a whole by their opposition to some of its parts. Perhaps he would include the stand I am taking under that heading. My opposition to the Bill is to its principle, and not to the details with regard to mileage, which I am perfectly willing to consider, which I think is a fair thing to consider. For this reason I support the motion of my hon. leader for adjournment, in order that the House may think over the matter carefully before it commits itself to the whole principle involved in this Bill, and in order that the House may realize what it would mean to pass the Bill to a second reading in its present shape. But I wish to call attention to one remark made by my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean). He tells us that the railway companies get value from the press for the passes which they give the press, and he believes that passes are offered to members of Parliament for the same reason. Well, Sir, that is a great confession on behalf of the editors and proprietors of newspapers to come from the editor of so great and influential a journal as the one which the hon. gentleman controls; and he must do something for the railway company from which he gets a pass, that he would not otherwise do. If the press are influenced in this way, let the press hold their tongues about the giving of passes to members of Parliament. The same principle might apply all around. If it is an understood thing that every compliment in the shape of a pass implies some unfair return from the man who receives it, then I say let him among you that has never received a pass cast the first stone at the other members of this House, and not those who have been the recipients of passes for years. Discrimination in regard to the granting of passes is another thing. If I thought that a railway company was giving me a pass while refusing passes to other members. I trust I would have self-respect enough to refuse it. I understand that that was done by a gentleman on the other side of the House, which resulted in the practice being made general. But so long as it is the rule, I cannot see that there is any scandal at all in members of Parliament receiving passes, and I hope the House will look at the question without regard to any agitation which is going on in the country, or to the catching of a vote here or there. If we adopt a principle which is equivalent to saying that we cannot take passes without being bribed by taking them, I believe that the people will think that we are and have been bribed by taking them, and I for one do not propose to occupy that position.

Mr. LISTER. I must utterly dissent from the proposition laid down by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), when he states that the second reading of this Bill means that we would confess ourselves guilty of being bribed as members of the House by taking passes.

Mr. CASEY. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. If he understood me to express myself in those words, I did not mean to do so.

Mr. LISTER. Those were almost the exact words the hon. member used. I do not think any one can charge that any member of this House on receiving a pass would give any advantage to any railway company seeking legislation at its hands. No man knowing this House would, I think, venture for a moment to make any such statement. But there is such a thing as being careful about the semblance of wrong-doing. There is no doubt that the gentlemen of the press throughout the country, backed up by an influential portion of the population, have for some time made this a prominent question. They have charged that members of Parliament and members of the legislature of Ontario have been seeking passes for which they have given no consideration, and if they have given no consideration, they have no right to receive them. In other words, they have received them for expected favours from the different railway companies throughout the country. There is no doubt that that feeling to a great extent pervades the electorate of the province of Ontario; and it is a question for this House whether it is doing a duty to itself to allow such a feeling to pervade the minds of the electorate, and whether it would not be more dignified for us to say that no passes shall be taken at all, as has been done by the legislature of New York State in the past year by an Act which provides that no member of the legislature shall accept a pass from a railway company, and no railway company shall undertake to give one. It is a question whether we would not be placing ourselves in a better position by putting such a law on our statute-book. The hon. Minister of Public Works has suggested that an amount might be allowed to each member for the actual travelling expenses of three trips backwards and forward between his home and the capital during the session. That would probably be a solution of the matter. It does seem open to objection that members should receive free transportation, and at the same time charge the Government with it. If it is provided as a right that the railway companies shall grant passes to representatives during the session of Parliament, or during the whole year, I believe we shall be asking from the companies nothing more than we are entitled to. As the representatives of the people, it is important, as has been stated by different speakers to-day, that we should get over parochialism and provincialism, and become familiar with every section of this great Dominion; and we know that many members of the House are financially not in a position to do that at their own expense, no matter how much they might desire to do it. I believe the country as a whole would derive benefit from such a law. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) in introducing this measure has given the House an opportunity to discuss the question; and I have no doubt, when they come to think over it—for, as the hon. leader of the Opposition says, the Bill is a surprise to many who have not given the subject much consideration—I am satisfied that the House, when this measure comes before it again, will be in a position and a temper to discuss it in a fair and proper manner, consistent with its dignity and with what it has a right to expect from the transportation companies of this country.

Mr. CHRISTIE. I shall not detain the House a moment. I simply desire to state that I heartily approve of the principle of the Bill, and shall have much pleasure in voting for it.

Mr. McMILLAN. A considerable amount of discussion has taken place in the part of the country where I reside with regard to railway passes, and I believe the feeling in that section is that a member of Parliament should not be entitled to receive both his mileage and free railway passes. If I endorse the principle of this Bill, I do not at all admit that, in so doing, I am acknowledging that those who have received railway passes have accepted bribes, because I do not believe that there is a single member of this House whose vote has ever been influenced in the slightest degree by the receipt of a railway pass. There should, however, be some legislation to set this matter at rest. The question was put to me at a meeting in my riding last fall, and I admitted that from some of the railway companies I had a pass, and, from others, I had a part of a pass. I believe it would be well to do away with the mileage altogether, and make it imperative on every railway company to give passes to members of Parliament. No member who has not travelled to a considerable extent throughout the country can be as good a representative as one who has visited the different parts of the country. I think the principle of this Bill is in the right direction, and when the question comes up of abolishing passes, I shall cast my vote in favour of the Bill. The Bill is in the right direction, and I think the hon. member for York (Mr. Mulock) is entitled to the thanks of the House for having introduced this measure.

Mr. McMULLEN. I quite endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon). I do not think there is any class of men in the Dominion who are more poorly paid than members of Parliament. Members of Parliament have to act generously both at home and abroad, and to discharge the many duties which devolve upon public men, and I have no doubt I state the experience of every member of this House when I say that being a member of Parliament is an expensive job. With regard to the effect on members, of free passes, I have had a seat in this House for over twelve sessions, and, during all that time, have had the privilege of attending the Railway Committee, and I do not think there is a member in this House—I have never known one in my experience—who has been influenced one iota in his vote on railway matters by the receipt of a pass. For my part, I have never swerved a hair's-breadth from what I believed to be my right and duty with regard to any railway legislation, and, therefore, I am not disposed to make any imputations on the conduct of others. But there is a very strong feeling in the country on this question, and I think we ought to meet that public sentiment, at least to some extent. I am quite ready to vote for the principle of the Bill introduced by the hon. member for North York, simply because the people of the country seem to think that members of Parliament are in some measure influenced in their votes by the fact that they have been supplied with passes by the railway companies. It is not at all complimentary to us that such a feeling should exist, but the fact is there, and I am quite willing that the privilege of travelling on a pass should be taken from us. With regard to the railway companies, there is one point that has not been touched upon. Some of the companies realize that it is to their advantage to grant passes to members of Parliament. A large number of members bring the members of their families to Ottawa for the session; they have to take berths in the Pullman cars, and, of course, all this creates extra travel and profit to the lines over which they come, and they come, no doubt, over the lines on which the members themselves have free passes. Then, when delegations come to Ottawa, these, no doubt, accompany their representatives over those lines on which the representative has a pass. So that in giving this privilege to members of Parliament, the railway companies are, in very many cases, really consulting their own interest, and increasing the traffic over their line. I shall vote for the principle of the Bill, and I took this opportunity to say a few words in case I should not be in my place when the Bill comes up again. But when I am here, the principle of the Bill shall certainly have my support.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the hon. member for North York is more than justified by the existing state of the facts in introducing this Bill. I have hardly heard a gentleman on either side prepared to endorse or defend the existing state of affairs. I am sure that whether we think members of Parliament sufficiently indemnified or not, no one desires to take public money out of the treasury by a side wind. If our indemnity is not sufficiently large, let us meet the matter openly and squarely, like honest men, and increase it. If it is sufficiently large, let us not draw from the treasury money for disbursements which we have not made. As a matter of fact, all the members of this House, I think, travel on passes. I, for one, would not have accepted a pass if I had not been informed at the time that it was made general, and given to all the members. I would have put myself in an invidious position if I had accepted a pass which was not made general. There was a time, about three years ago, when these passes were given as favours to individual members. At that time, many refused them, but when they were given generally, as a matter of right, they were taken by everybody. The fact, however, that a large majority of the members used their passes while drawing their mileage allowance is an evil which requires a remedy, but whether my hon. friend has gone too far or not in other directions is a matter for consideration. I am strongly in favour of the proposition that members of Parliament should receive passes as a matter of right. The hon. Minister of Public Works mentioned France, the hon. member for Albert mentioned Italy, and I myself saw, in a very able article in Harper's Weekly two years ago, a list of states having a similar law. There are, at least, three or four of them; and I think it would be a very good thing if we adopted a similar system. My hon. friend on my right (Mr. Mills) says he believes that the system now prevails in Australia and New Zealand. Whether that is so or not, does not affect my opinion. I do not want a precedent, for I think that such a measure can be defended as right in itself. I thoroughly concur in the sentiment expressed by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Hazen) that members of Parliament are not consciously influenced by the possession of a pass. But there is more than that in the matter. If these passes are given as a matter of favour, and not received by the members as a matter of right, there are many people outside who will believe that the members might be so influenced; and it is as important that we should remove that impression as it is that we should be honest ourselves. We should be above suspicion. I believe—I know—that members I meet with are not influenced in the discharge of their duties by the possession of these passes, but there is a large number of people outside who believe that they may be so influenced. And this feeling will continue if the passes are given as a matter of favour and not as a matter of right. Therefore, I am in favour of the proposition that the $33,000 which is drawn by the members of the Senate and of this House for travelling allowance should be returned to the treasury and saved to the country. But I am not in favour of the proposition made by my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) that the travelling fees should be capitalized and given as compensation to the railway authorities. I do not see any justice in that, whatever. We have paid, as an hon. gentleman remarked, towards the Grand Trunk, the sum of $25,000,000 by way of subsidy. We have paid to the Canadian Pacific Railway, $62,000,000 by way of subsidy—

An hon. MEMBER. And a land grant.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And a land grant, as the hon. gentleman says. Therefore, these two leading and controlling railways can very well afford to give the country's representatives, who come here to discharge their duties, free passes over the road. My own personal impression is that it will be to their advantage to do so. But I am not concerned in that; I think it is a right we have, and I think the indirect results will be beneficial to them and to the country also.

Mr. INGRAM. Judging from the discussion thus far one would suppose that a member of Parliament coming to Ottawa paid no railway fare at all. So far as I am concerned, I am prepared to make the statement that every cent of mileage I pay out to the railway company in travelling from my constituency to Ottawa and return. The amount I receive is in the neighbourhood of $70, and that I pay out as I have stated. Therefore, it is not right to say that we pay no fares to the railway companies. There is another point in connection with the free-pass system. It strikes me that it is somewhat a compliment to our constituents as well as to ourselves. How many hon. gentlemen in this House would go from Ottawa to their homes for the purpose of consulting their constituents as to legislation that is brought before this House? Not very many, indeed, would go, unless they had private business of their own. But, by returning home to consult their constituents they very often save their constituents the expense of coming to Ottawa for the purpose of furthering their own business. It is quite true that all our constituents are not wealthy men. It is also true that some of our constituents have business to transact at Ottawa, business that they cannot transact by letter, but only by conversation with their representatives. In such cases, these gentlemen are having a favour conferred upon them. And I cannot see for the life of me, what difference it makes to our constituents whether we travel on a pass or not. So far as the mileage is concerned, if other members paid out as I do, I cannot see how any fault could be found. Those members residing within three or four or five hundred miles of Ottawa come and go frequently between the capital and their homes. But take the case of those living beyond that distance—take our British Columbia representatives, or those from Nova Scotia, or Prince Edward Island—these gentlemen neglect their business entirely by coming to this House. They have not the opportunity to visit their homes that gentlemen have who live within, say, five hundred miles of Ottawa. They neglect their business, and the indemnity is not sufficient for such members. These gentlemen are, to some extent, indemnified for their loss of business in coming to Ottawa to attend this House, and those who reside within a shorter distance have the advantage of visiting their homes often. So far as concerns the public clamour with respect to the free-pass system, it strikes me very forcibly that some hon. gentlemen are followers instead of leaders of public opinion. If there is one thing more than another that I admire Sir Oliver Mowat for, though I differ from him, politically, it is for the stand he took last session. He is a Conservative in thought and spirit, and, at the last session of the legislature he stood up boldly against an agitation which did not commend itself to his judgment. So, if hon. gentlemen in this House, instead of veering with every wind that blows, would stand upon the platform and defend what they know to be right in principle and practice, there would be less of this agitation, and fewer third and fourth parties in this country, and we should not have the time of the House taken up in discussions of this kind.

Mr. CAMERON. I have only a word to say. I think that discussions of this kind should not be frequent in this House. The original intention in granting mileage, I have no doubt whatever, was that it should be part of the indemnity to the members of Parliament. It was never intended, and I do not think it is intended now, merely to cover travelling expenses, for every one who has had anything to do with Parliament for a number of years must know that the mileage granted to members of Parliament covers more than actual expenses. The mileage for members of the Nova Scotia Legislature is 20 cents per mile, and from the outset it was considered as part of the indemnity. Those who live at a distance and who have to visit their homes, were, in the judgment of the Nova Scotia Legislature, entitled to some compensation, at least, for the distance which they had to travel more than those who are near the centre of legislation. This has been well stated by my hon. friend who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Ingram). I quite concur with the views expressed by my hon. friend from Albert that every railway company that has been subsidized by this Parliament, should grant free passes to every member of Parliament. I contend that this question of mileage to members of Parliament should be considered apart from travelling expenses, and should be considered a part of the indemnity given to members of Parliament who come here from a distance, because in that case they would have to some extent an advantage which they deserve on account of the disadvantages which they suffer in coming here.

Mr. BAIRD. There is one peculiar feature about this question, and that is that nine-tenths of all the carrying under free passes of members of Parliament in Canada is done by one company. Now, if that company is doing it from a sense of duty, they are doing more than their duty as compared with others, and it is a fair conclusion that the others should be forced by legislation. If it is intended that we are to travel free, let us travel free by force of legislation and not by favour of the railway companies. The distribution of free passes by managers or directors of a company is very much like the distribution of Government patronage, a hard thing to manage. Those who do not receive them have a feeling of jealousy; and I am aware that there are often broad slurs cast upon members of Parliament throughout the country when they are showing their free passes among their friends. Therefore, I feel strongly inclined to favour the principle of this Bill, and I would urge that the legislation that has been proposed, or something in the same line, should be passed.

Mr. SPROULE. The Bill seems to me opportune at the present time, from the fact that an agitation has been going on in the country during the last year or two, strongly in favour of doing away with free passes. If I remember correctly, it commenced in some newspapers in different parts of the country, and it was then taken up by the class known as the Patrons of Industry; and their paper, called the "Farmers' Sun," which is, I understand, controlled at present by the hon. member for North York

(Mr. Mulock), has been very strongly advocating that principle.

Mr. MULOCK. Let me say to the hon. gentleman that the extent of my interest in the "Farmers' Sun," the Patrons' newspaper, is that of a subscriber at $1 per year.

Mr. LAURIER. Fifty cents.

Mr. MULOCK. Fifty cents, or whatever it is.

Mr. SPROULE. I am glad to hear he is only a subscriber. They might have sent it to him free, thinking he was not well able to pay for it. I am glad to give him an opportunity of setting himself right on this matter, because I may tell him that the impression is abroad in the country that he owns and controls the "Farmers' Sun," and that he is inspiring the articles that appear in it, and that he is endeavouring to cater to the principles that are promulgated by that association. I do not say this in disrespect to the hon. gentleman, but for the purpose of showing the public that he is not actuated by any interested or improper motive. However, I say that the Bill is opportune in view of this agitation obtaining so largely in the country to-day, because there is an opinion prevalent that somehow or other members of Parliament are influenced in giving favours to railway corporations on account of their travelling on railway passes. If that is the prevailing opinion throughout the country, and if there is an appearance of evil in it, there is certainly nothing wrong in passing a Bill to do away with that privilege to the members of Parliament. I think, however, with a great many others, that the Bill goes a great deal too far, because it makes you take a solemn declaration, not only that you have not travelled on a pass, but that you have paid the consideration that the general public are paying for travelling, it may be on railways, it may be on steamboat lines, or it may be on any other lines. Now, I understand there are many men who travel on railways at reduced rates because they are members of the press, like my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean). I do not know whether he has the privilege or not. It is true, he says that he gives consideration for it. If so, he must give consideration in one of two ways, either by writing up the road so as to give it a good advertisement in the country, or by defending something in its management in consequence of which it saves money in an indirect way. In that case I assume that he is culpably guilty of something that is wrong, just as a member of Parliament would be if he gave something to a railway company in consideration of the passes he used in travelling over their line, so that the one is no better than the other. We know that commercial men are entitled to travel at reduced rates, but they could not do so, if this Bill became law. Then, some consideration is usually given to exporters of cattle, who are allowed to travel over railways at reduced rates, but they could not do so if this Bill became law; and, if they were members of Parliament, they could not take the declaration that is provided here they should take. Now, some have said that it would be better if we made it compulsory on the railways to allow members of Parliament to travel free. That is exactly my opinion. I believe to-day that every railway corporation in the country should be compelled to carry members of Parliament free from one end of the country to the other, while they remain members of Parliament. Some say that it should be confined to Government railways. I do not agree with them. It is not the Government railways to which consideration is given, for they belong to the country. We have given very large consideration to the Canadian Pacific Railway; so we have to the Grand Trunk Railway, and to a hundred other railways over the country; and many of them have received aid from the provincial legislatures. They have got consideration from the Parliament of Canada or from the provincial legislatures that mean a great deal of money to them. Why, we give them a charter, and that means a great deal, because it allows them to take away our rights, and to expropriate our property, and to do many things that private individuals have no right to do. From these privileges they receive a great deal of money; and yet in return for it they may give us no consideration. Therefore, I say that, when a railway company, whether it is a private company or is a Government railway, comes to this Parliament for a charter, one of the conditions of the charter should be that every member of Parliament and every member of a provincial legislature should travel over that road free of charge. I agree with those hon. gentlemen who say that it would make members of Parliament more efficient legislators if they were enabled to travel free over the country. They would become men of broader views, they would know better what they are talking about, and they would understand the condition of affairs in different parts of the country much better than they do to-day, because, by reason of their limited means, they are unable to expend that amount of money in travel to enable them to become as intelligent legislators as they ought to be. Then, again, it would be putting all members upon the same footing. Take my hon. and respected friend from North York (Mr. Mulock), who introduced this Bill to-day. Many will say it is a matter of no consequence to him; he is a millionaire, and he can well afford to pay his own fares on railways. He can travel from here to British Columbia, or down to Prince Edward Island, and it is a matter of no consequence to him, because he has more money than he can spend during his lifetime, no matter how much he travels, and will still be able to leave a fair amount to those who come after him. But there are many other members of Parliament whose means are limited, and who would be unable to travel were it not for the advantages they receive from free passes, and, in my opinion, they ought to have the right to travel free on all the railways of the country. Now, I say that if it is the sentiment of the country to-day that some injustice is being done by members of Parliament when they travel over railways on free passes, we should do away with the present system by passing a law giving each member of Parliament the right to travel freely over all railways during the time he is a representative of the people. Many countries that are not so far advanced in intelligence and in independence as Canada, have done that already, and I do not hear any complaint from the railway companies who have to carry them free. Therefore, I say that we should not be far wrong if we took the further step and extended the right to all. Even if this debate is adjourned, I say it is the duty of the Government, or it is the duty of those who are charged with the responsibility of passing legislation in this House, to bring in a Bill making it the right of members of Parliament to travel free over all railways in the country. Then every man will be put upon the same footing, whether he is a millionaire in this House, or whether he is a man that can get reduced railway fares because he is a member of a railway corporation, or a director, or president of a company, or is connected with some transportation lines that will be giving consideration to railways in return for which they will give him the privilege of travelling over their road free. It will be putting all upon the same footing, and then the man who is unable to pay his fare will have the same advantages as the man who is well able to pay his way, and to whom it will be no hardship if this consideration is taken away.

Mr. CURRAN. I think there is no difference of opinion on either side of the House regarding the proposition that railway passes should not be given to members to influence their vote. There seems to be now a very general idea that the railways of the country who have received public aid should be compelled to give free passes to members of the House. I am led to make this observation by the fact that a very great compliment has been paid to the hon. member for Bellechase (Mr. Amyot). I remember that hon. member some years ago introduced a measure embodying the same view, and he was heartily laughed at by both sides of the House. There were very few hon. members who were willing to support the idea at that time, but I think nothing could be more desirable than the proposition made, because it has already been pointed out that hon. members will be enabled to travel over the country and become acquainted with the various sections. When members of the House have visited other parts of the country than their own, and questions come before the House in reference to places they have visited, they will take much more interest in legislation proposed, they having become acquainted with them otherwise than merely by depending on geographical knowledge acquired from books. The idea suggested, and which I ardently hope will be carried out and put in the form of legislation, is a good one, and in the meantime I am satisfied that after this debate has been adjourned it will be possible to reach the minor point, which is perhaps the one more prominently before the public eye at the present moment, and while we do away, as is suggested in the Bill before the House, with the abuse complained of, legislation will be enacted so that members shall not receive money for travelling expenses which they have not actually disbursed, at the same time the broader principle enunciated by hon. members on both sides of the House will be carried into law, namely, that the various railway companies that have received aid from Parliament shall give free passes to members of Parliament wherever their lines run. This being a great step in advance of what has been agitated for in the press, and one which should be carried out without delay.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I closely followed the observations of the hon. gentlemen who spoke before me in reference to this question. I have singled out in their speeches four objections to the giving of passes by the railways to the members of this House. The first objection, and the one which impressed me most, was made by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). The public sentiment, he said, was adverse to the giving of passes to members of this House. I have, indeed, Mr. Speaker, much respect for the Patrons of Industry, but I must say that so far as the province of Quebec is concerned, there is not much foundation in such a statement, and that there the people do not feel so strongly as in Ontario against these free passes. In the province of Quebec, it is considered that members may be quite honest and independent although receiving free passes from any railway. The hon. member for North Wellington stated that we were entitled to such a rate for travelling expenses, that we were paid our mileage and that, such being the case, we should not get passes from the railways. Well, Mr. Speaker, in my humble opinion, and I think all my fellow members of the province of Quebec will agree with me, I think the amount we get for mileage does in no way compare with our travelling expenses, from our place of living to Ottawa. I will take my own case as an illustration. Sorel, where I live, is one hundred and sixty miles away from here. I get $32.20 for mileage. Each week, I am compelled to go to Sorel for my professional business. When the session lasts three, four, five or six months, there is no member of this House who can fairly assume that $32 is sufficient to cover my travelling expenses between Ottawa and Sorel. And three-fourths of the members of this House are precisely in the same plight as I am. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, hardly two years ago, we have given the best evidence that mileage is no impediment to our thorough independence in this House when our friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) brought up a Bill to cut down the rate of passage on railways to two cents a mile. The Bill was thrown out, and I impugn no member of this House, but I was among those who, in spite of free passes, voted with my friend and colleague from East York to reduce the rate on railways. In my opinion, this matter is merely brought up to catch the votes of the people, and it should not engage the attention of an earnest Parliament. For this consideration, I for one—and I am pleased to think that I am voicing the opinion of my fellow-members from the province of Quebec—shall vote against this motion.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). Before this debate terminates it is desirable that the House should hear the views expressed by a gentleman who has been for a long time in public life. This question came before the Ontario Legislature at its late session, and Sir Oliver Mowat gave expression to his views, as follows:—

Sir Oliver Mowat sympathized with the object of the mover of the Bill, whose desire was to keep the House pure. A good deal had been said about this matter in the last elections, and it was striven to create the impression that the members of the old parties in the legislature were bad. He thought a good deal of that impression had been dissipated from the mind of the hon. member for Frontenac since he entered the House. There was no occasion for the Bill. It had not been shown that any evil had resulted from the system. Passes were not given to those members of the legislature who were friendly to the railways alone, but all received them. They were given as a matter of courtesy. It might be, perhaps, that the granting of passes had worked evils in other countries, but he had the satisfaction of believing that such did not occur in this, nor, he believed, in any British country. He did not know from his experience of anybody being influenced by the receipt of a pass.

I think we might commend this utterance to members of the House.

Mr. LAURIER moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

REPORT.

Annual Report of the Minister of Railways and Canals, for the past fiscal year, from the 1st July, 1893, to the 30th June, 1894.—(Mr. Haggart.)

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 5.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 3rd May, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 45) respecting the Great North-west Central Railway Company.—(Sir James Grant.)

Bill (No. 46) to incorporate the Trans-Canadian Railway Company.—(Sir James Grant.)

Bill (No. 47) to incorporate the Canadian Order of Foresters.—(Mr. Taylor.)

Bill (No. 48) to incorporate the Dominion Atlantic Railway Company.—(Mr. Stairs.)

Bill (No. 49) respecting the Windsor and Amapolis Railway Company (Limited).—(Mr. Stairs.)

Bill (No. 50) respecting the Manitoba and South-eastern Railway Company.—(Mr. La-Rivière.)

Bill (No. 52) to amend chapter 50 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, being an Act respecting the North-west Territories.—(Mr. Martin.)

THE CRIMINAL CODE.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 51) further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892. He said: Perhaps the House will be satisfied if I say on this occasion simply that the amendments contained in this Bill are the result of the working of the code, and in compliance with suggestions received from those concerned in the administration of the law, such as judges and attorneys general. Perhaps the most important clause is the first. It relates to the section of the code concerning gambling houses; and, in the prosecution, a case has excited some attention. Hon. gentlemen may have observed that the provision of the code was defeated by conducting part of the operation across the border, while the gambling house itself was within Canadian territory. It is to meet a difficulty of this kind that the Bill has been introduced. There are also some clauses which were clearly omitted by accident when the code was under consideration, in connection with arrests without a warrant; and when certain sections were dropped, obviously without any intent to drop them. They are of a cognate character to the clause which provides for arrests in the case of thefts of different kinds, and without a warrant. Those, I think, are the chief amendments.

Mr. LAURIER.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the Bill provide where the criminal is to be placed when he is being tried? Formerly a felon was placed in the box when tried, but an offender charged with a less offence was not. The code makes no provision for this.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is no clause relating to that, but I shall be very glad to consider one when the Bill is in committee.

Mr. LAURIER. I remember that this was discussed on a former occasion, and it was pointed out that under the old Act offences formerly deemed felonies might be classed as misdemeanours.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. LAURIER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I beg to remind the Minister of Finance that he promised the House the other day that before he proceeded to deliver the Budget speech, the Order in Council respecting the Hudson Bay Railway would be laid on the Table of the House. The hon. gentleman cannot forget that in the course of the last discussion on this subject, he not only gave hon. members to understand, but he distinctly told us that before he delivered the Budget speech members would receive not only all particulars respecting the Order in Council, but the Order itself. I observe that the Order in Council has not been brought down yet; and I also observe that the other House has received more privileges than this House. I observe that the Premier yesterday went elaborately into the tenor of this Order in Council. It seems to me that there is no reason whatever why if the Senate should be furnished with this information, it should be withheld from the Commons whose province it is specially to watch financial matters. We shall be very glad to know from the Finance Minister what can be the object of making this invidious discrimination, and why the Senate should be more favoured than the Commons of Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. I am very sorry that the return asked for has not been brought down. Yesterday I particularly asked that it should be made ready, so that it should be on the Table to-day. The papers have been prepared; they are in the Secretary of State's office, and should have been brought down yesterday, but the Secretary of State will send over for them directly and they will be brought down. It was on the Order of Proceedings that they should be laid before the House yesterday, and a similar statement to that made in the Senate, and any other information should be given.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. PERRY. I wish to draw the attention of the House to an editorial which appeared in the "Mail-Empire" the 25th of last month, in which it falsified a statement I made in the House having reference to the carrying of mails between the island and the mainland.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would draw the attention of the hon. member to the rule which precludes the reading of anything appearing in a newspaper commenting on the debates that occur in this House.

Mr. PERRY. The statement was made that I said the people of the island intended to secede from confederation if a tunnel from the island to the mainland is not built. I made no such statement, and I declare it is a malicious and false misrepresentation. I stated that the people of the island were very loyal to the Government of the day, loyal to the constitution, and I feel called upon, as in some sense responsible for the Liberal party in the island, to affirm that the Liberals in the island are as loyal as any other people in Canada. I hope and trust that no such statement in the future will be made.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

Mr. FOSTER moved :

That the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

He said : Mr. Speaker, the revenue was estimated last year when I delivered the exposition of the Budget, at $36,500,000. The actual revenue which has accrued is $36,374,093, being less than my estimate by $125,307. On looking at the items of increase and decrease in the revenue for the past year, it will be found that Customs realized $19,198,114, being a decrease over the Customs yield for the preceding year of $1,755,889. Excise yielded $8,381,088, being an increase over the preceding year's collection of $13,724. From Miscellaneous there was derived $8,795,489, a decrease of $51,751. The total decrease as compared with the preceding year was $1,793,915. It has been customary for a number of years to read the principal items of increase or decrease respectively, and I shall follow that practice this year. In the other chief item of taxation, Excise, there has been as already pointed out a slight increase on the receipts of 1894. It will be noticed that the decreases are pretty generally spread over the list of imported articles; the increase being principally in the articles I have named, and not nearly so extensive in their scope. Taking up the Trade Returns, there are two or three points that may be emphasized. The total imports were less than the preceding year by $8,611,047. The dutiable imports were less by $7,094,389. The total imports of merchandise were less.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are you including coin and bullion in the total imports?

Mr. FOSTER. In the total imports, the coin and bullion are included. The total imports of merchandise—there coin and bullion are not included—was less by $6,099,919, but the free imports show an increase over the preceding year of $994,470. In looking for the reasons for the shrinkage or diminution in the Customs revenue, I suppose we will all agree that they may be found under three heads—namely, either reduced consumption, or shrinkage in values, or in addition and in conjunction with that the reduction of taxation which follows in ad valorem duties upon the shrinkage in values. Now, it may have been the opinion of some that a large proportion of the fall in revenue was due to under-consumption, but if you take into account the figures that I gave as to the imports of dutiable goods and merchandise, especially, and also take into account the shrinkage in values which is known and acknowledged, I think we shall easily come to the conclusion that so far as imported goods were concerned in the year 1893-94, as to their bulk or volume there was very little less consumption of them in Canada than in the year preceding. I look, therefore, for the chief cause of diminution in the Customs revenue, as compared with the preceding year, to a shrinkage in values of imported goods, and the consequently lessened amount of duty paid upon the diminished or decreased value. That would be easily apparent. Suppose that dutiable goods to the amount of $70,000,000 are brought in, and that there is a shrinkage of value, compared with the succeeding year, of 5 per cent; if the duties of the preceding year were 30 per cent, the same rate of duty applied to the value diminished by 5 per cent would give you a very considerable fall in the revenue to be derived. It is from this source that, I think, the largest part, by far, of the diminution of the duties from Customs has arisen. If we go to the Excise, we will find in reference to it, that there was a slight decrease in the duty upon the spirits. The following comparative statement gives the transaction in the several articles usually included under this head, the amount taken for consumption, and the duty accrued thereon as reported by the hon. Controller of Inland Revenue :—

The duty accrued, as will be seen, has declined somewhat, but sufficient has been received from methylated spirits to counteract this, and to give us, besides, the small increase before-mentioned of $13,725. The diminution of $50,840 on malt was due, of course, to the decrease in the duty on malt. Altogether, the excise shows a slight gain of

Mr. FOSTER.

$13,725, a gain arising from the profits upon the sale of methylated spirits, a branch of industry which is carried on under the supervision of the Excise Department. It has been customary to give a table of the comparative consumption, by population, of spirits, beer, wine and tobacco. It is for this year as follows :—

	Spirits.	Beer.	Wine.	T'b'co
Average from 1867...	1·087	2·832	·137	2·154
do for 1892-93..	·740	3·485	·094	2·314
do for 1893-94..	·742	3·722	·089	2·264

The detail this year shows for 1893-94 a consumption of spirits of ·742 ; of beer, 3·722 ; of wine, ·089 ; and of tobacco, 2·216, showing, in spirits, a very slight increase, in beer a considerable increase, in wine a slight decrease, and in tobacco a slight decrease. If you take the per capita consumption in 1893-94 and compare it with the average of 1867, it will be found that in the case of spirits, the reduction is equal to about 31 per cent, the decrease of wines is 35 per cent, while there has been a decided increase in the per capita consumption of beer, and a slight increase, not very much, in the per capita consumption of tobacco.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. May I ask what you call the present population of Canada, in making that per capita statement ?

Mr. FOSTER. The present population would be a little over 5,000,000. I do not remember exactly the odd figures, but it is over five millions. The next source of revenue is Miscellaneous, which shows a decrease of $51,751 ; but we must recollect, with reference to that, that 1892-93 showed a very large increase over the preceding year, an increase amounting to $319,775 ; so that the revenue derived from miscellaneous works and investments still stands at about $270,000 more than that of any year previous to 1892-93, during the existence of confederation ; and the whole decrease of $51,751 as compared with 1892-93, is more than accounted for by an abnormal falling off in the revenue from fines, forfeitures and seizures. So that, taking that fact into account, miscellaneous receipts have been larger in the year 1893-94 than in the preceding year, and larger than in any previous year since 1867. Now, that fact is worth noting. As we look through the receipts, it appears that although there was a falling off in the receipts of the Fisheries Department, which, however, were larger this year than in any preceding year except 1892-93, and in the fines, forfeitures and seizures, which are variable, in casual revenue, in cullers' revenue, in gas revenue, in interest on investments, in revenue from insurance, in revenue derived from the industries in the penitentiaries, and in post office revenue, there have been increases ; while in the revenue from public works, which include railways and canals, the loss was only $58,700 ; and yet from this source the revenue remained the highest of all but two years since 1867, namely, the years 1889-90, and 1892-93. Now, the receipts under Miscellaneous may be denominated earnings, coming as they do from our public works, railways, post offices and investments ; and they form a very good index to the state of business and the financial health of the country ; and it is gratifying that in the year 1893-94, when what has been called hard times have been prevalent the world over, and Canada has had to bear a share with the rest of the world, our revenues from these sources have—if you take out the falling off from forfeitures, fines and seizures—been larger than those of the preceding year, and larger than those of any other year since confederation. I come now to the expenditures for 1893-94. They amount to $37,585,025, an excess over those of 1892-93 of $770,972. This might at first glance be cited as an evidence of extravagant expenditure on the part of the Government in a year of financial stress, and a want of prudence and foresight in managing the controllable expenditures. But if we look into the items which have chiefly caused this increase, we shall find that there is another reason for it. Of this increase of $770,972, in expenditure, $405,707 is due to interest on debt, $35,846 to sinking fund, which is a laying up against debt, and $270,889 to subsidies to provinces, which if taken from this treasury go to help the different provincial treasuries. These items all told make a sum of $712,442, which is within $58,530 of the total over-expenditure of 1893-94, as compared with that of 1892-93. But there is another point bearing upon this. Previously, there were certain branches of the service which were earning, and in which the departments were in the custom of selling what they made, buying stock with the receipts, for the purpose of making again, and at the end of the year handing over the balance on hand to the Receiver General. Two years ago it was thought well to stop that system and have appropriations made for every expenditure, and have the receipts on account deposited at once with the Receiver General. Under this head there came methylated spirits, the expenditure on which last year was $88,654, which sum appears among the expenditures of that year, whereas in the preceding it did not appear at all. As we had a revenue for methylated spirits during the year of over $100,000, the expenditure on this account is, of course, not an over-expenditure. The same remark applies to the sum of money which has been placed in the hands of the Department of Agriculture in the form of advances for the purchase and sale of dairy products, for which $36,000 was appropriated last year against $6,000 for the preceding year ; so that although this sum appears among the expenditures and consequently counts as an over-expenditure in the comparative statement, it is not an over-expenditure in reality. It is simply what we may call a returning vote, which goes out and comes back again, which formerly went out and came back without an appropriation, but which last year was estimated for and became an appropriation. The same is true to a certain extent with regard to the sum of $74,210, which was expended for binder twine, machinery and stock in the penitentiary at Kingston. That was an extraordinary outlay. Last year there was no income to set off against it; but it was a preparation for income, and up to the 31st of March this year, the sum of $16,400 has been received on account of sales made in the penitentiary, and in the coming season which we have just entered, it is estimated that over $40,000 will be received from these sales. Then, there is a post office over-expenditure of $96,058, and an over-expenditure on account of premium and exchange in connection with the debt of $13,428; but against these are increased receipts of $35,800 from the post office, and $24,000 on account of premium and exchange. Summing up these remarks, the whole result is, that although there was an increase in the expenditure of 1893-94 of $770,972, of this amount $712,442 is statutory, for interest, sinking fund, and subsidies to provinces, and $198,864 is extraordinary for methylated spirits, dairy advances and binder twine machinery, which had formerly not been, but which last year were, included in the Estimates, but against which the sum of $101,000 for methylated spirits, $36,000 for dairy products, and during the course of this year about $56,000 for the sale of stock manufactured at the Kingston penitentiary, operates as a set-off. We find that there has been a decrease in expenditures, in charges of management, in the Fisheries Department, in Legislation, in Lighthouse and Coast Service, in Militia and Defence, Miscellaneous, Mounted Police, Pensions, Police, Railways and Canals, Superannuation, Adulteration of Food, Culling Timber, and in Dominion lands. There has been an increase in interest and Sinking Fund, which are statutory, in the Administration of Justice, which is largely statutory, in Agriculture, owing to the dairy advances, without which there would have been no increase, some increase in Civil Government, Geological Survey, Immigration, Quarantine, Indians, Mail and Steamship Subsidies, Marine Hospital, Ocean and River Service, Penitentiaries, Public Works, Subsidies to Provinces, which are statutory, Customs, Excise, Post Office and Weights, and Measures. So that the $36,374,693 of revenue failed to meet the expenditure of $37,585,025 by $1,210,332, which measures the size of that unwelcome visitor, as a deficit has been called. But we must recollect this, that if there is a deficit on the year's operations of $1,210,332, there is included in the expenditure the sum of $2,131,360 for sinking fund, which is so much laid up against debt, so that the result, translated into the vernacular, of last year's revenue and expenditure, is simply this, that with the revenue we met all the expenditure for the services of the country outside of capital, and laid up against the debt $921,028.

Mr. FOSTER.

There is also another consideration that may be noted just here, namely, that although there is a deficit of $1,210,332 we have a net surplus from 1887-88 to 1893-94 of $7,476,843. There is also one other fact of very great significance. It is this: that in the year 1893-94 303,793,677 pounds of sugar were imported for home consumption into Canada. If the rate of duty which was charged in 1890-91 and then taken off, had been imposed on that imported sugar last year, the duty which would have accrued would have been $4,821,205. This would have swept away the deficit and left $3,610,873 to go against the diminution of the debt or for capital. The net result to the people of Canada is this, that while it has cost them $38,324 as an interest burden to carry the deficit, they have saved into their pockets $4,821,205. The expenditure on capital last year, 1893-94, as compared with 1892-93, was as follows:—

	1893-94.	1892-93.	Increase or Decrease.
R. R. & Canals...	$3,612,913	$2,782,490	+ 830,423

Our debt on the 30th June, 1894, stands at $246,183,029, which is established as follows:—

	Debt.
Capital expenditure, 1893-94	$5,094,003

	6,634,689

	2,132,700

Debt, 30th June, 1894	$246,183,029

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It might be convenient to state here why you charge $330,000 to management last year.

Mr. FOSTER. I will state that when I come to touch the loan, which I will do shortly. The total addition to the debt is $4,501,989. Adding that to the additions in former years, and we have from 1890 to 1894 inclusive, a total addition to the debt of $8,652,987, which is an average of $1,730,597 per year. But that addition to the debt is not all what would be generally taken in business matters as an addition to the debt. When you make a loan there are three courses you may pursue. You may put your loan upon the market in such a way that you may realize a premium from it. You may put it on the market so that you sell it at par, or you may put your loan upon the market below par—and this last, on almost all counts, is considered by far the preferable way. But if you put your loan upon the market below par, the amount of discount which you pay, although it is charged to capital, and has been always so charged in our books, is really only the result of what you consider to be the best means of floating your loan. You may incur it, or you may not; and it is, to all intents and purposes, an advance payment of interest, which you would not otherwise pay if you floated your loan at a larger per cent. and, therefore, had no discount. Well, of that class of expenditure on loans, there was $330,353 for the year 1893-94; $139,951 for 1892-93; and $1,122,541 for the year 1891-92. And then there was a transfer for the North Shore Railway bonds, which is simply a matter of book-keeping. They gave us no revenue before though they appeared as assets, and, consequently when they were written off appeared as an addition to the debt; but, nominally, they were assets, and $970,000 is the sum of that transfer. That makes $2,662,845 for these objects. Taking that from the total creation of debt, 1890-4, you have a creation of debt for the public service of the country of $6,090,142, or a yearly average of $1,198,028. Now, the point I wish to make is this: In the first place, the average yearly addition to the debt in these five years is small, being $1,739,597. The amount of capital expended in widening and deepening the canals, alone, in these years, amounting to $8,868,343, or more than the whole amount of the additions to the debt incurred between 1890 and 1894. I now come to the revenue and expenditure for 1894-5:

REVENUE AND EXPENDITURE, 1894-95.

Total revenue for 1893-94.....	$ 36,374,693	Total expenditure	$ 37,585,025
Revenue up to 20th April, 1894.....	29,261,171	Expenditure to 20th April, 1894.....	25,085,570
Revenue up to 20th April, 1895.....	26,266,757	Expenditure to 20th April, 1895.....	25,984,658
Revenue, 20th April, 1894, to 30th June, 1894	7,113,521	Expenditure, 20th April, 1894, to 30th June, 1894	12,499,454
	33,380,278		38,484,113
Add anticipated betterment.....	419,722
Total actual and estimated revenue, 1894-95	33,800,000	Subtract anticipated less expenditure	184,113
Expected deficit	4,500,000		38,300,000

There are certain signs of betterment which, I think, justify me in estimating an appreciable increase of the Customs revenue during the period I have mentioned of the current fiscal year. After carefully looking over the matter, I have estimated the sum, in round numbers, at $500,000. But, to bring the result out in round numbers, and avoid multiplication, I have put the amount down at $419,722, which will make the total revenue for the current year, actually accruing, and estimated by me to accrue, $33,800,000, as stated. On the other hand, I have estimated, after looking as carefully as possible into the works that are in progress—and I have been very conservative in my estimate so as not to make the mistake of under-estimating the expenditure—that there will be a reduction of $184,113 in expenditure, as compared with last year. This makes the total actual expenditure, $38,300,000. Subtracting one from the other by an arithmetical process for which we are all competent, we find the deficit expected for the present year, $4,500,000. Now, it may have been noticed that the expenditure for the year up to the 20th April, of the year through which we are now passing, is greater than that of last year, by a considerable amount. I wish to read the principal items of the increase, to show that it has not been an over expenditure that was controllable. The interest on debt, accounts for $179,203; legislation, revision of the voters' lists, $155,566. The undertaking which we made with the British Government, and which we are carrying out jointly with the British Government at Esquimalt, is responsible for expenditure of $143,356. Subsidies to provinces, $178,957. Excise, $64,989—in the item of methylated spirits. This makes a total of $722,072 on these items, part of which are statutory, and, as regards the Esquimalt expenditure, a matter of agreement, and as regards the Excise, chiefly a matter of book-keeping, and the revenue accrues on the other hand, as I have stated. The increase on account of legislation is for the revision of the voters' lists.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How long will the Esquimalt expenditure continue?

Mr. FOSTER. I think another year will finish it, or nearly so—that is the extraordinary expenditure; after that there is maintenance of the school of marine artillery, which is jointly kept up. Now, in looking to find the reasons for the decrease in Customs revenue, we have been discussing, I find that the imports for home consumption to 1st April, 1894, were $86,370,739, and to 1st April, 1895, they were $78,126,603.

showing a loss in the current year, compared with last year, of $8,244,136. So that during the current year more will have to be accounted for as to the decreased revenue by lessened consumption; but yet, taking into account the great fall in prices, which the London "Economist," a very conservative and very reliable paper, estimates at 7½ per cent for the year, taking that into account, it will be seen that so far as volume or bulk is concerned, the consumption of this year has not fallen much below the consumption of the preceding year; and it is satisfactory to know that up to the date I mention, April, 1895, the exports of Canada have been greater by half a million dollars than the exports of Canada for the same period last year. The chief reason for the reduction in customs collections, then, is the one that I noticed with reference to the preceding year, the great shrinkage in value, and the reduction of duty, a reduction of duty which arises from these causes in the current year namely, the reduced duties of last year, the change to ad valorem from specific in a number of articles, the lessened duties that accrued on the lowered value from the ad valorem duty, and the greater quantity of free goods, goods that were formerly dutiable, but which were placed upon the free list, as compared with the preceding year. Against the deficit of $4,500,000 of the current year, we have also to note the fact that I noted with reference to the deficit of the preceding year. So far as returns go up to date, and an estimate being made for the remainder of the year, the year 1894-95 will see an importation of 310,000,000 pounds of sugar for home consumption. If that sugar had been dutiable at the rate of 1890-91, the duty that would have accrued upon it would have been $4,900,000; so that if that duty had been kept intact, and all the other reductions had been made that were made, we would still have had sufficient to prevent any deficit for the present year, and have allowed a small sum over for capital account. So that the account of the people vs. the state in this transaction is simply this, that the people will have kept in their pockets, by the removal of the duty, $4,900,000 which they would otherwise have paid, and that the interest that will be paid for carrying the deficit is but $142,500; that is, they will have paid for carrying the burden of the deficit $142,500, and have saved in taxes to themselves nearly $5,000,000. If you take capital expenditure up to the 20th April, 1895, there was expended on railways and canals, $1,967,435; on public works, $71,021; on Dominion lands, $69,508; on railway subsidies, $1,226,613; making in all, $3,330,579. It is estimated that to the end of the year there will be an expenditure of $1,669,421, which makes an estimate of the capital expenditure for the year of $5,000,000. Add to that $5,000,000 the deficit of $4,500,000, and you have $9,500,000, from which if you deduct the sinking fund, you will have for the current year an addition to the debt of $7,300,000. Now, Sir, if we take the debt addition from 1890 up to the end of 1895 on this basis, it will amount to $15,952,987. But there is this point to be considered by the House, as it will, of course, be considered by the country, that taking the three articles of glass, anthracite coal and sugar, there have been taken off by the reduction of duties in the way of glass, the removal of duties on anthracite coal and on sugar in those years, the sum of $23,656,270. So that had the duty on glass, anthracite coal and sugar been kept exactly as it was in 1890—or in the case of anthracite coal the duty which was removed a few years earlier—the account would stand thus: that the people would have paid into the treasury $23,656,270 of taxation, which would have extinguished the debt addition of $15,952,987, and left seven and three-quarter millions as available to decrease the public debt. I say, Sir, without fear of successful contradiction, that you cannot find an example in the history of a modern country where, in five years, so large a reduction and removal of taxation has taken place as has taken place in the Dominion of Canada since the year 1890.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What a calamity.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope my hon. friend will not treat this matter with levity.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The public will not.

Mr. FOSTER. No, I am quite sure the public will not; the public will appreciate the statement that is now being made. There are some considerations which, at this stage, I wish briefly to present to the House as to the general condition of the country in the year which has passed, and for better comparison, in the series of years that has passed, during which we may be said to have been passing through a period of depression in trade and in industry. I do that for two reasons: in the first place, for the sake of having a true and clear conception of what has actually been the results; and in the second place, of setting that true and clear conception against what is given throughout the country in the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposed to us, as being indications of a period of distress arising from a bad trade policy, and bad government management, such as Canada has never before, in their own words, experienced or passed through. Sir, one of the very best indications of the condition of a country is the position that its credit takes and maintains in the money markets of the world. Now, Sir, it so happens that in the very midst of the depression and demoralization of trade which has been visiting the world, and visiting Canada to a certain extent, it became necessary, in October, 1894, for Canada to put a loan upon the London market. That loan was put on the market in the midst of financial and trade depression which had had the effect of loading a large amount of money, an almost unprecedentedly large amount, into the vaults of London, money, Sir, which would not be tempted out of its hiding or hoarding place, except by the very best of securities, and consequently affording the best test of the condition of the securities of a country which came for a loan to that market. At a time when the colonial securities were at their lowest, when the securities of our sister colonies were very low indeed, when Canadian trade was decreasing, and our revenue was diminishing, the monthly statements to that effect being in the hands of the moneyed men in London to be read and known by all, when the value of securities was never so carefully investigated and so keenly weighed, and when good securities stood for something in the period of their best testing time, a loan was put on behalf of Canada on the British market of two and a quarter millions at 3 per cent, at a minimum of 95. What happened? This, that the tenders received for that loan were the most widely distributed and had the widest scope among real, individual, bona fide investors of any loan that has ever been placed by Canada on the British market. No less than 566 different tenders were sent in for that loan. Although two and a quarter millions were asked for, nearly twelve millions of pounds were offered. The highest went at £99 12s. 6d. or nearly par, nearly 50 per cent of it went at £97 8s. 6d., while the average was £97 9s. 2d.; and when you take the discount and cost and calculate the rate of interest, it appears to be 3½ per cent, the best loan that was ever placed on the British market by Canada. Now, that counts for something; and the mere recital of that fact will go further than many hours of windy declamation and strong assertion which may be indulged in by the enemies of Canada, or by its professed friends for political and party purposes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman has not, I believe, placed the prospectus of the loan on the Table of the House yet.

Mr. FOSTER. No, I will bring it over. A short time after that, the United States put an issue of bonds on the market, and the rate of interest which those bear and which the United States have to pay is within a fraction, in fact I think it is absolutely, 3¾ per cent, whilst the Canadian loan went on the British market at 3½ per cent. If we look at the difference in the circumstances we may find certain reasons why the loan of the United States went at a higher rate than it otherwise might have gone; but the fact remains that a great country like the United States, putting out an issue of sixty millions of bonds, the payment of which was undoubtedly secure, have had to pay 3¾ per cent, while Canada pays but 3½ per cent on her loan. Another evidence of the condition of Canada is to be found in its savings.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. member for Bothwell says "hear, hear." He does not believe that such is the case—he treats the idea with contempt. But when his colleague was Minister of Finance from 1874-78, he did not treat an argument like that with contempt; he put it forward as a very strong point in favour of a better condition of affairs than some of his opponents argued as existing. The hon. gentleman thinks a great deal of Liberal traditions, of Liberal precedents and Liberal principles as they are exemplified by the present Government in Great Britain, and he has only to read the telegraphic despatches of the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer yesterday to find that he went into an elaborate argument to show that the position of Great Britain was not so bad as had been stated, and the argument on which he relied was the increase in the savings of the people. Without doubt it is an argument which has weight. How does that hold with respect to Canada? Simply in this way, that whilst from 1874 to 1878 there was a decrease during that period of hard times, which may be compared with the period through which we have been passing, of $353,057, or 4½ per cent; yet in the five corresponding years in Canada there has been an increase of $41,271,908, or an increase of 21 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. May I ask the Finance Minister of what the forty-one million consist? Does the hon. gentleman mean the Government Savings' Bank deposits?

Mr. FOSTER. No, I mean all the savings of the people. Post Office Savings' bank, the Dominion Savings' Bank, savings in our chartered banks, on deposit, on call or for a fixed time, and of the District Savings' Bank of Montreal.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And loan societies?

Mr. FOSTER. No, I do not include them in that comparison, although I might do so.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. The failures are also a fair indication of the condition of the country. What do we find to be the result in Canada? In 1890 the failures for the year, according to Dun, Wiman & Co.'s report, represented liabilities of eighteen million dollars; in 1894, there were $17,600,000, or a decrease of 2 1-5 per cent; the same authority gives the liabilities in 1874 as $7,696,000, and in 1878 as $23,908,000, an increase of 210 per cent. If hon. members will take a fairer comparison, and take the average from 1874 to 1878, they will find that it was $22,297,000, while the average from 1890 to 1894, was only $15,690,000, there being a yearly average in excess during the period from 1874 to 1878 of $6,500,000 as compared with the period from 1890 to 1894. We can also take up the condition of trade, and I am here to say that the condition represented by the results arrived at, from a careful comparison of the course of trade in Canada during the last five or six years, is eminently favourable, and is one of which we have no reason to be otherwise than proud. Let us take the trade of last year. It shows for last year an export increase to Great Britain of $4,500,000, to France of 100 per cent, although the amount is not very large----

Mr. LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. Still it is an increase, and I am very sorry to find the leader of the Opposition has nothing but ridicule to pour on any attempt to increase our trade with France. Surely he must have forgotten the province from which he comes. There is an increase in exports to Germany from three-quarters of a million to two millions; there was also an increase with Spain, Italy, Belgium, Newfoundland, the West Indies, South America, China and Japan, Australasia and other countries; and the only decrease in our exports last year was to the United States, a large decrease, and to Portugal, and a very slight decrease with our trade with Holland. I say that hon. members may look over the history of our trade returns and they cannot find in any previous year a state of things showing such a universal and widely extended increase in our exports to the different countries with which we trade as is found in the statement I made of our trade of last year. As to our imports, there is an increase in our trade with Germany, Spain, Italy, Newfoundland, South America, China and Japan, and Switzerland, and remarkable to say, there is a decrease in our exports to the United States of $8,000,000, and a decrease of imports of $5,000,000, being $13,000,000 in all, but which will be remedied somewhat, I have no doubt, when the era of extremely low prices passes and the effects of lessened tariff, owing to the legislation of Congress last year, are felt. There is an increase with our trade of Germany from $4,576,000 to $7,887,000 in a single year, or an increase of over 72 per cent. Sir, it will be found that in 1889, which was about the time that this wave of depression commenced to flow over the world, the exports from Canada were of a value of $89,000,000. You will find them last year one hundred and seventeen and a half millions, an increase of twenty-eight and one-half million dollars ($28,500,000) for that period. What more? The exports last year were, by value, $117,500,000, the largest of any year since confederation, with the exception of 1893, when they were one hundred and eighteen and a half millions ($118,500,000), but if you take the decrease in price into consideration, it is evident and cannot be gainsaid, that the volume and bulk of exports last year was the highest since confederation. Take imports, if you please. In 1889 they amounted to one hundred and nine and a half millions ($109,500,000); they amounted last year to one hundred and thirteen millions ($113,000,000), an increase in the period of three and a half millions ($3,500,000), not taking into account the decreased prices, and consequently there was an increased volume or bulk. Now, I say that the volume of trade in 1894, taking exports and imports, was as high as in any preceding year in the history of confederation, and I say that if prices had been equal to what they were five years ago even, that these trade returns of last year would be in value what they are in bulk and volume: the largest of any of the years during which the Dominion has been carrying on its business. There is another indication, a very good indication, the indication which is shown by the great carriers of the country. Take the railroads and the shipping, and what do we find? We find that from 1889 to 1894, the railway mileage has increased from 12,628 to 15,620, the mileage travelled from 38,800,000 to 43,700,000, the passengers carried from twelve and one-fifth millions (12,200,000) to fourteen and a half millions (14,500,000), the tons of freight carried from eighteen millions to twenty and seven-tenths millions, and the earnings from $42,000,000 to $49,500,000. And comparing the earnings, the freight carried, and the passengers carried this last year with the two preceding years below which they come, they still fall short of these two years by an exceedingly small amount compared with which the decreases in the United States are far and away above the decreases that have occurred in Canada. If you take the coasting vessels and the tonnage trade of the country, what do you find as well? You find that there has been a constant increase in the tonnage of vessels in and out, exclusive of coasting. In 1890 it was 18,446,000 tons, in 1892, 18,692,000 tons, and in 1894, 20,353,000 tons. Certainly, the tonnage is increasing, and if it goes and it comes, it is fair to suppose that it is carrying backwards and forwards. If you take the tonnage of coasting vessels in and out, the same increase is shown, namely, 22,797,000 in 1890, and 26,560,000 in 1894. Sir, you can take something else to show what has been operating during these five years that some look upon as a peculiar time of stress and trial in Canada.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But they are deluded.

Mr. FOSTER. A good many of them are deluded. Some of them see their delusion and others are so blind that they cannot see it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Minister sees it.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. The per capita of Customs collection in 1888-89 was $5.01 per head, while the per capita of Customs collection in 1893-94 was $3.82 per head, or a reduction of $1.19 per head of the people in the amount that they have paid for Customs comparing 1889 with 1893, and yet the imports in 1893-94 were larger than the imports in 1888-89. Taking the per cent of imports dutiable and free for home consumption, in 1888-89, it was 21.65 per cent, while in 1893-94 it has been reduced to 17.13 per cent, a decrease of 4½ per cent in the rate of Customs impost during these years. Take the actual duties collected on $109,673,447 of imports in 1889, namely, $23,784,523, and take the duties collected upon the $113,000,000 in 1893-94, which amounted to $19,379,822, and you have a saving upon an importation larger by three and a half millions, amounting to $4,404,701 in Customs imposts alone. That reduction has been going on in taxation. That has not been coming out of the pockets of the people, and it is due to the fact of the reductions in taxation that we made when the revenue was buoyant, and it is therefore so much remitted to the people. Take this one other consideration. If the same percentage of Customs, 21.65, which was collected in 1889-90 had been collected every year since then, there would have been paid in Customs duties $125,112,895. As it is, there was paid in $108,588,092, leaving a saving to the people of $16,524,803 by the reduction in the tax rate from 21.65 to 17.13. Taking leave of this, which I call the absolute view of the condition of Canada, let me summarize it in brief in this way. In five years the imports have increased in value by $3,500,000, and they have increased in volume by a large amount, of course, owing to the decrease in value. The exports have increased in value by $28,000,000, and in volume, of course, much more, and are in 1894, as I said, the highest in value since confederation, with the exception of 1893, and the highest in volume of any year in our history. We have net surpluses during that period from 1890 to 1894-95 of $7,476,843. We have taken off taxation on sugar alone, $14,000,000; we have taken off taxation on two other articles to the amount of three and three-quarter million dollars, and we have taken off a large amount on items generally in the tariff, the revision of which took place last year. We have increased the debt by $8,600,000. The interest on the public debt, however, has been increased by only $100,000, I mean the net interest; while the per capita net interest has fallen from $1.86 to $1.79. No banks have failed in that period in Canada through the stress of hard times, not one. Our industries have been well maintained. Want and poverty have been practically unknown in Canada, and comparatively the Canadian people have out-riden the storm with vessel less battered and sails less tattered than any other country in the world. And in the very midst of the financial and business tempest, Canada ran her flag of credit in the very centre of London up to the very highest notch from which it has been unfurled from the time the Canadian provinces united. The tide, I believe, has now turned. Prices are recovering, confidence is growing, trade is increasing, the demand of the consumer is strengthening, revenue is beginning to mend, as I have pointed out; and working on her well laid basis of rich and varied resources; with the wide facilities for transport with which Canada is splendidly equipped, with a sound fiscal policy, a careful, prudent, financial management, Canada is today emerging from the temporary and not very dark clouds of depression into a brightness of prosperity which shall surely surpass any period in her previous history. Now, Sir, there is another view which may be taken of trade. You may look on this matter relatively. You may compare Canada with other countries of the world—and let me ask your attention while I do that, very briefly. If you look over the great trading countries of the world—Great Britain, France, the United States, the Australian colonies—what has been the history of their trading during these five or six years of which I have been speaking? Briefly, it is this: Great Britain's exports of domestic manufactures in 1890 amounted to £263,530,585; they have steadily decreased, until, in 1894, they amounted to £216,194,239, a falling off of £47,336,346, or £230,370,217. The imports into Great Britain have fallen off from £420,691,997, in 1890, to £408,505,718, in 1894, a fall of £12,186,279, or, in round numbers, $60,000,000. The exports of France have fallen in the same period from £150,136,000 to £131,001,000; and those of Germany have fallen from £166,405,000 to £158,000,000. The exports of the United States have fallen from $1,015,732,011, in 1892, to $869,204,937 in 1894; and the exports of the Australian colonies have fallen from £72,500,000, in 1891, to £65,000,000, in 1893. The imports of France have fallen from £177,476,000, in 1890, to £164,779,000, in 1894; those of Germany have fallen from £208,105,000, in 1890, to £198,000,000, in 1893; those of the United States have fallen from $827,402,462, in 1892, to $654,994,622, in 1894; and those of the Australian colonies have fallen from £72,000,000, in 1891, to £53,000,000, in 1893. Reduce these figures to percentages, and you have this surprising fact: That in Great Britain the decrease in exports from 1890 to 1894 has been 18 per cent; in France, 13 per cent; in Germany, 5 per cent; in the United States, 15 per cent; and in Australasia, 10 per cent; while, in the same time, the exports of Canada have increased 22 per cent. The imports of Great Britain have fallen off 3 per cent; those of France have fallen off 7 per cent; those of Germany have increased 2 per cent; those of the United States have fallen 21 per cent; and those of Australasia have fallen 26 per cent; while the imports of Canada as to value, are exactly where they were in 1890. There is another point of view which we may take—that is, to compare Canada with herself, which is a more satisfactory comparison, so far as the truth goes, though it may not be so pleasant to all of us. From 1874 to 1878 there was a period of acknowledged depression in this country. It has often been spoken about since that time. It has formed a subject of comment from many a hustings and platform, and has been written upon occasionally by the editors of newspapers. But, of late, one set of speakers, and one set of newspaper editors have begun to say and to write that the period from 1890 to 1894, in depression and hard times, and general badness in Canada, far eclipses the period from 1874 to 1878. Let us go to the law and the testimony. In April, 1874, the Finance Minister of that time made his Budget speech in this House, standing about where I do. In that speech, looking back and taking leave of 1872-73, he spoke of it as “the last year of plenty,” with a surplus of $1,600,000. Of 1873-74, in the midst of which he stood, he said:

We have stood still, but we have not retrograded. Although we may fairly expect that our people will grow rapidly in wealth, we cannot look for any great increase in their numbers. To avoid serious deficits, a very large amount of additional taxes will be necessary.

He provided for $3,000,000 additional taxation, and in that year, 1873-74, his expenditure went up by about $4,000,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No.

Mr. FOSTER. He says he was not responsible for it; but that is what the Public Accounts show. His additional $3,000,000 of taxes brought his surplus down from $1,600,000 to $888,775, in the year 1873-74, and to $935,644, in 1874-75. His capital expenditure amounted to $10,000,000, and his addition to the debt to $8,476,502, in 1873-74, and to $7,683,000, in 1874-75, and his trade fell $17,000,000. In February, 1875, he made his second Budget speech. He dandled his diminishing surplus upon his financial knees, and prophesied that next year it would be no smaller. He excused the falling imports by proving that diminution was not retrogression—a fact which he must bear in mind at present. He comforted commercial men by hoping that they would find “new fields of trade which would partially compensate them for that which we have for the present failed to obtain from our friends on the other side of the line.” In February, 1876, he spoke again, commencing by saying:

It would be both idle and dishonest on my part to attempt to conceal from the House that the circumstances under which we meet are such as to deserve our very gravest consideration. It is, unfortunately, too true that we are now passing, and have been passing for several months, through a commercial crisis of great and almost unparalleled severity. * * * * There are cases of great hardship existing in the country.

We were, he said, in the midst of “a commercial squall or tornado, if you will”—$20,000,000 less trade for the previous year; $700,000 more expenditure imminent; face to face with a greater fallen trade, a greater loss in revenue, and a greater increase of expenditure. He could only console himself with the comforting intimation that though “depression has overtaken the manufacturing and commercial interests of the country,” yet shrinkage in value was a matter which it was impossible “for him or any other Finance Minister to guard against in advance”; and that “as they (the people) get better bargains for their money than before, it is, on the whole, an advantage, and not an injury to the people”; and, therefore, that “what is bad for the revenue is, on the whole, good for the country.” Driven by his opponents as to his trade policy, he declared:

It does not matter whether your market is four millions or forty millions or four hundred millions, over-production will always produce distress. Nor does it much matter for that particular purpose whether free trade or protection is the policy.

And with these excuses, and these platitudes, he marched on to the doleful tune of a two-million deficit, a twenty-seven million drop in trade, a three-quarter of a million increase in expenditure, and an eight and a half million addition to the debt. In February, 1877, he came to the front again, and declared “that the year 1875-76 was one of an exceedingly critical character, which would be long remembered in our financial history.” Well it might be. Trade was diminishing, and went on to diminish. Revenue was decreasing, and gave no hope or anticipation of rising again. The only things that were rising were the taxes and the debt, and they were rising with dizzy rapidity. Still, the Finance Minister at that time was hopeful. He pitched his song to a cheerful key, and said “there was good reason for supposing that we had seen probably the last of the depression.” He marshalled the facts of increased circulation, deposits in the savings banks, life insurance growth, exports, and the consumption of sugar and tea, as being reasons why the country was not in so bad a condition after all. He then praised his loan, bearing four per cent interest, issued at ninety-one and costing 4.75 per cent, laid on further taxation of about half a million dollars, ventured the prediction that the ship of state was weathering the storm, and drawing moderately close to clear water, and proceeded to bask in the after-glow of past deficits, and to warn himself by anticipation in the coming effulgence of the one and a half million deficit that was dawning upon him. In 1878 he opened with a financial jeremiad such as had never before been, and never again will, I hope, be indulged in by a Finance Minister.

It is nearly four years since, as Minister of Finance, it became my unpleasant duty to point out to the House the grave financial difficulties which beset our position, and the necessity of submitting to considerably increased taxation if desired to provide for the liabilities we had incurred. Unhappily, grave as were the forebodings I then expressed the depression which actually took place surpassed the extent of that upon which I had calculated. It is not often in the commercial history of any country that we are called upon to chronicle so great a reduction not merely in the total volume of our trade, but also in the revenue derived therefrom, as we have seen within the last two or three years.

He declared that the volume of trade had been reduced by $50,000,000, and the customs revenue by $3,000,000. But, worse than that, he declared that the natural growth of trade has been retarded $30,000,000 to $40,000,000 more and the revenue correspondingly; and when he again gave notice of a deficit, and when his announcement was greeted by laughter and smiles from more than one in the Chamber, he rebuked them with great gravity for their unseemly levity in smiling at the mention of a deficit. That is the picture, as painted by the Finance Minister of that period himself, from 1874 to 1878. He announced the deficit of one and a half millions for the year 1876-77, an addition to the debt of $8,700,000, and laid down the weapons of his warfare in 1878, with a deficit of over a million in esse and another of nearly two millions in prospect, with expenditure increased by one million and the debt by another seven millions. After all I have quoted, we may hope that now, when we have just passed through a commercial depression, but one which, I contend, was not so severe—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Passed through?

Mr. FOSTER—Yes, for I believe firmly we have passed through that depression and turned the corner, and that from this time on, affairs will mend. I do not give my own authority alone for that. Not at all. But there is not a financial paper in the United States, there is not a responsible newspaper in Canada, commercial or otherwise, which does not every day contain editorials and statements in its news and financial columns, giving exactly the same forecast and prediction. To sum the whole matter up, and I put it in the form of a table which can be easily used for ready reference, take the two periods of 1874-79 and 1889-94:

Exports fell	$ 18,000,000	Exports rose	$ 28,000,000

After taking discounts, commission, and all charges into account—a large list—he put upon the market in London a loan at a net rate of interest of 4.75, which the country has been paying ever since. The last credit loan marks for the second period, 3.16 per cent. The net deficits in the first period, was five and a half million dollars; the net surplus of the second period is seven and a half million dollars. The average failures in the first period amounted to twenty-two and one-fifth million dollars, and in the second period, fifteen and one-half million dollars. The increase in failures and liabilities on account of failures, in the first period, was 210 per cent; the decrease in the second period was 2¼ per cent. The savings decreased 4½ per cent in the first period, and increased 40 per cent in the second period. There was no remission of duties in the first period, but a constant laying on of burdens. In the second period, the remission on coal and sugar and glass amounts to $18,000,000. Now, I shall ask the attention of the House for a moment to the position of our debt, and I wish to put upon record a simple and brief statement, so that any one who reads that statement may not fall into the error that the whole of the debt, as it exists to-day, has been incurred by the Dominion for Dominion purposes, and I wish as well to show briefly the purposes for which the debt has been incurred. There was assumed for the four provinces, in 1867, $77,500,000 of debt. There has been assumed for the provinces, since—and that is something with which nobody quarrels, because it is a subsidy to the provinces to help the provincial governments to carry on their legislation, relieved them of the necessity of imposing heavier taxes—there has been assumed since then an additional debt of $31,930,148, making a total of $109,430,148 assumed on behalf of the provinces. The total net debt on 30th June, 1894, amounts to $246,183,029. Deducting from this the amount assumed for the provinces, and you have a net Dominion debt, from 1867 to date, incurred by the Dominion for Dominion purposes, amounting to $136,752,881. This gives a yearly average of a little over five million dollars. What have we to set against that? Upon the Intercolonial, more than 1,000 miles in length, the capital expenditure has been $44,966,424. On our canals, the great waterway and artery of the central part of this Dominion, at the expenditure on which nobody cavils—nobody would be content as a Canadian if these canals did not exist, and if they were not deepened and improved to suit the needs of commerce—on our canals we have expended $41,709,038. And the Canadian Pacific Railway, which was reviled and abused and looked upon as the most desperate scheme that sensible men ever conceived and placed before a body of legislators, but which has approved itself, which has shown its utility, which has established its essential necessity to this country, so that to-day you can find no two opinions as to the advisability of completing that road and as to the wisdom of the policy of constructing it—upon that work we expended in capital $62,604,535. This makes a total of $149,279,997. That is to say, on these three works alone, the commercial arteries and veins of this country, we have expended $12,527,116 more than the whole debt created by this country since confederation, outside of provincial allowances. Besides that we have the Dominion lands opened up. We have the public works that have been built, we have the parliament and public buildings; we have the Prince Edward Island Railway; we have the Northwest Territories purchased and opened up and other services and works representing in connection with railways and canals, a grand total of capital expenditure of $166,369,288. Thus you will find that $28,616,407 more than has been added to the Dominion debt has been expended on capital account for the services of this country. Now, Sir, that is a plain statement of the debt as it stands, and, taking that into account and the assets, the first three items that I have mentioned, if there were no more, there is sufficient justification for the assumption and maintenance of a net debt of $137,000,000. When you come to another view of the case there is something more to be said. If you will take the actual interest, you will find that whereas in 1868 we paid 4.51 per cent, in 1894 we paid 2.91 per cent. The net interest paid per head, 1868, was $1.29; in 1873 it was $1.31; in 1878 it was $1.58; in 1889, $1.86; and in 1894 it was $1.79, or 7 cents less than in 1889. The cheapening of money, the lowering of the rate of interest makes the burden of the debt smaller in proportion to the size of the debt, so that at the present time, with our credit, we can carry almost twice the amount of debt that we could have carried in 1867, and have the per capita burden no more. The net interest paid in 1888-9 was $8,843,539, and in 1894, $8,994,788, only about $100,000 of an increase. Standing at this point and looking out upon the future, we are confronted with certain obligations and we should not be fair to ourselves, if in making a financial statement we did not include these obligations. I propose to do so. We have obligations current to the amount of $6,543,400; being in the shape of subsidies to the International Railway Company, to the Qu'Appelle and Long Lake Railway Company, to the Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company, to the China and Japan Service Steamships, and to the Australian Service Steamships, which are provided for by yearly appropriation and which amount to $6,543,400. We have railway subsidies under contract of $2,257,059; also railway subsidies granted, but not under contract, which the department tells me will probably come under contract, amounting to $2,587,257. Then, to finish the St. Lawrence Canal system, widening and deepening the canal according to the demands presented by the Minister the other day, we must spend $6,000,000. But as I am taking this from the 1st of July, 1895, I estimate that $5,000,000 will have to be spent after that time. These canals must be finished independent of any consideration of the party in power, as this work is a part of the policy of both parties. This makes a total of these liabilities of $9,844,316. These are liabilities that are current or probable. Now, Sir, that makes outside of what has been and will be provided for in the yearly appropriations, $9,844,316, which will accrue within a period of years not very far distant—within three, four or five years at the farthest. Taking it at four years, that gives an expenditure of $2,461,000 per year on capital account, or very little more than the amount we lay up out of consolidated revenue to make a sinking fund as against the public debt. There is also a subsidy by special Act to the Kingston, Smith's Falls and Ottawa Railway of $250,680, and a transport subsidy to the Hudson Bay Railroad $1,600,000. These fall in the list of contingent liabilities, which, when they accrue will be charged to railway subsidy account. Besides these there is the statutory provision for the Fast Atlantic Service, which, however, when the liability accrues, must be satisfied from consolidated revenue fund, assisted, if necessary, by economies in other services, and which, therefore, will not necessitate a call upon capital, occupying as it will a similar position to the China and Japan and the Australian services. And what I desire to do, what I think it good policy to do, what I am going to strive as earnestly as I can to do, is this: to make the revenue cover current expenses and to bring the capital expenditure, over and above the consolidated revenue surplus, if there be any, to be equal to or not greater than the yearly sinking fund, which, while it will allow a capital expenditure of not less than $2,500,000 from this on, would not increase the debt a single dollar. If that policy can be carried out—and I believe it can be, and that with a generous appropriation as well to the public services—we shall occupy a position which, instead of causing fear, instead of being used to frighten the people of the country into panicky political action, is solid and stable, and one into which any financial man looking dispassionately would say was sound, and clean, and healthy from the point of view of the financial investigator. Now, Sir, we come to another point, the revenue and expenditure for 1895-96. The revenue for 1894-95, as actually accrued and estimated to accrue, will be say $33,800,000. The estimated betterment of revenue for 1895-96—and this is proof of my faith in better times, and I do not think it can be called other than a fair, conservative estimate—is $1,200,000. That is, on the taxation as it exists to-day. That would make a revenue for 1895-96 of $35,000,000. Now, Sir, when—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You had better divide that last amount, as is customary. State what amount is expected from Customs, and what amount from Excise.

Mr. FOSTER. I have simply lumped the amount, and have not with me the figures of the three items of which this is the total. The Estimates for 1895-96 have been laid before the House. It was the desire of the Government, a desire, I think, which they shared cordially and unitedly that so far as possible under the present condition of things, and until an equilibrium could be established between revenue and expenditure, the expenditures for the coming year should be cut down to as low a point as possible under the present condition of things, consistent with the efficiency of the public service. Now, Sir, an investigation of those estimates will show that there are certain estimates which are statutory, and which we do not vote, and consequently which we cannot change. There are others which we control, such as the revenue collecting branch, but which is only controllable to a certain limited extent, because, if you collect customs, collect excise, collect post office fees, collect fares on your railways and canals, you have to maintain those services in a state of efficiency equal to the advancing needs of the times; so that though you may prune somewhat on those services, they are a set of services which are not under very lively control by the Minister of Finance, or by the Government to any great degree of curtailment. Now, that class of services taken out, and the fixed charges taken out, there is left at the present time not a very large amount for the pruning-knife, and even there you have to be very careful as to how you exercise your economies in order not to destroy or cripple services which are necessary for the country. How is it to-day? For interest on debt, for charges of management, for sinking fund and for Dominion subsidies, which are beyond our control, there is an estimate for the year 1895-96 of $17,131,855. For the collection of the revenue there is an estimate of $9,378,313, and that is a decided cut upon the expenditure of last year, making $26,510,168 for those two sets of charges. That leaves you about 10 or 11 millions of leeway, on expenditures which you may say are controllable. Now, with reference to those, a glance at the Estimates will show that there have been increases in not a single one of them, with the exception of Trade and Commerce, which is an infant department, and even with the slight increase that it has had this year, that department has not grown to undue proportions so far as its clerical work is concerned. Well, Sir, outside of that, Penitentiaries have been cut down $36,000—I am reading round figures—Civil Government, taking into account even the large increase of statutory allowances, has been cut down $30,000; Legislation, $200,000; Arts and Agriculture, $3,400; Quarantine, $33,000; Immigration, $70,000; Pensions, $814; Militia, $263,398; Railways and Canals, $183,058; Public Works, $875,325. In the item of public works we have for a number of years been expending on an average about $2,000,000 per year. When the revenue was buoyant and the treasury was full, we were generous in our appropriations for the public works of the country; and the history of this Government during the time it has been in power since 1878, will show, I think, on the whole, a broad-minded and generous sustenance of the public works of the country, and a disposition to aid them so far as it could possibly be done. My hon. friends smile when there is a little talk about public works, but if I have a memory which is at all to be relied upon, I think, when my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, accompanied by my hon. and stalwart friend from Nova Scotia, and my hon. and only a little less stalwart friend from Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) and one or two others, made a pilgrimage through the North-west and British Columbia, there was no stopping place at which they did not regale the ears of those who were eager to hear them, with the question: Is there any place around here in need of public work? and if the reply was in the affirmative, then the people were told, I think you ought to have it, and if the Liberal party gets in, you may look to be fairly treated. On Mail Subsidies there has been a reduction of $32,000; Ocean and River Service, $57,000; Lighthouse and Coast, $67,000; Fisheries, $20,000; Geological Survey, $15,000; Indians, $85,000; Mounted Police, $155,000.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How is that saving effected?

Mr. FOSTER. It is effected by a reduction of the force, a reduction that will not affect the efficiency of the force so far as the legitimate needs of the country are concerned. The reduction has been rendered possible in two ways: in the first place, the cost of living is constantly decreasing. Years ago when the beef supplies and the like of that had to be taken long distances, the cost was large. Now all this is raised in the country itself, and the cost therefore has diminished. The force is well managed, and the number of men which, up to this time, has been in the neighbourhood of 900, it is proposed to reduce by a number sufficient to bring down the yearly expenditure to the sum which is mentioned in the Estimates. There will still be left a force, I think,—I speak under correction—of about 700 men, and armed as they never were before, with improved rifles and Maxim guns, which makes a smaller force much more effective than even a larger force was without those arms.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did not observe an explanation of the reduction on militia.

Mr. FOSTER. That would probably come better on the Estimates when the Minister himself is here. I read the amount, $263,000. In Customs collection there is a reduction of $50,000; Excise, $21,000; Culling Timber, $25,000; Railways and Canals, $21,000; Post Office, $18,000; Dominion lands, $20,000; making a reduction in the Estimates this year, compared with the Estimates as voted last year, of $2,387,648. Now, on the statutes arising from causes that I have mentioned, increased interest on the public debt and management of the debt being the chief one, and the subsidies to provinces, there is an increase of $697,722.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is the land board at Winnipeg abolished?

Mr. FOSTER. We do not abolish the land board at Winnipeg, but we introduce economy into it, and lessen the expenses of the board of management. We have, therefore, a net decrease of $1,600,000, on a total estimate of expenditures, statutory, fixed and controllable, which is as far as the Government felt it possible to go and keep the services on a footing of efficiency. In some of these there can, I think, be very little if any more reduction. It is possible that in some of them a still further reduction might take place. In the item of Civil Government, I have no hesitation in saying that the expenditure is pretty large. We have reduced that this year by a considerable amount, and I am sure I am not speaking beyond the book, when I say that it is the intention of the Government thoroughly to look into the matter, and to make economies where it is possible to make them as regards civil government.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I want to remind the hon. gentleman, before he goes to another subject, that he promised to state what Supplementary Estimates would be required for the service of the present year. He promised, in fact, to bring them down.

Mr. FOSTER. I did.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It would be better, before he goes off the Estimates, to let us know what they are.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot tell my hon. friend what they are, but I have made my estimate for the expenditure of this year on the basis of the Estimates that we shall provide.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You promised it.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I promised it, but I cannot do everything in a few days.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Promise is one thing and performance is another.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Then, I understand, there will be Supplementary Estimates in connection with next year?

Mr. FOSTER. I have already stated that there would not be any. Coming back to the revenue and expenditure for 1895-96, I have stated that the revenue expected was $35,000,000; the estimate of expenditure is placed at $36,834,458. It is not the rule that the actual expenditure comes up to the full limit of the Estimates voted, and I have given myself a little leeway in the estimate of expenditure for the next year, which I have placed at $36,700,000. With a revenue of $35,000,000 and an expenditure of $36,700,000, there will be a deficit on the operation of $1,700,000. Now, while it is true that during the past year, whilst the brunt and stress of the depression was sustained by the country, whilst business had everything it could do to struggle manfully, as it did, and fairly successfully with its disadvantages, whilst the people themselves were economizing, it was not thought wise to do anything to add to the burden of the times by imposing increased taxation. And so, as regards the deficit of the past year, and the deficit of the present year, a larger one, it was not proposed, and is not proposed, to replace it by exacting additional taxes from the people. But it becomes a different matter when, having had two deficits and starting out upon the year in advance, with the turn in the tide and the betterment which is visible, I think, on all sides, it becomes a different matter, I say, and a subject for very close and careful consideration whether it is advisable, in point of good financial management, in point of keeping intact the credit of the country, which above all things we must maintain, and keep it up to the present high standard—it becomes a grave question for consideration whether we should go out into another year facing a large or even a considerable deficit. The Government has considered that question, and it has come to the conclusion that it is not the wisest thing to do; that what we have to do as a Government, that what we must do as a House, and in that course we must presume that the country will sustain us, is to establish an equilibrium between expenditure and income, to establish an equilibrium between expenditure and income in the easiest way we can possibly accomplish it, and do it for the sake of benefiting the finances of the country in the future, as the maintenance of our credit is of far-reaching consequence. When the revenues were buoyant and we had large surpluses, this Government dealt with the services of the country generously, and many say lavishly, but that we dealt with the services of the country generously nobody can deny. The Government had surpluses of revenue, and they said, We will carry on the services of the country, but at the same time out of those buoyant revenues we will relieve the people from a portion of the taxation. And they did it. In 1890 and 1891 the tax on raw sugar, as we in the House well know, was taken off, and that benefit was conferred on the people of the country, a benefit which will fully appear when I read the figures of the imports since that time, and make a calculation of what would have accrued at that rate of duty. In 1891, under the new tariff, there were imported fourteen million odd pounds of sugar, the duty on which, taking an average of the old rate, would have been $227,474; in 1892 the quantity was 327,000,000 pounds, the duty on which would have been $5,200,000; in 1893 the quantity was 252,500,000 pounds, the duty on which would have been $4,000,000; in 1894 the quantity was 303,000,000 pounds, the duty on which would have been $4,821,000; in 1895 the actual import and the estimated receipts on the same basis would have shown, imports, 310,000,000 pounds, the duty on which at the old rate would have been $4,919,700. That relates to the article of sugar alone, the tax on which was paid certainly out of the consumers' pockets, it being a tax not on an article grown in the country, but on a raw product brought in, the tax on which must be paid by the consumer of the article. If hon. members will add these items together, they will find that the remission of sugar taxation in those years, including the current year, aggregates $19,175,333. Some one may fairly say, that if the duty had remained at the old rate, there would not have been so large an importation. Cutting off whatever proportion you please, you will still have an amount of from $15,000,000 to $19,000,000 removed from the people's shoulders. This has been operative during the time when we had surplus, and also during the time when the people, especially during the past two years, having been passing through a period of depression, and what have been called hard times in Canada. Now, Mr. Speaker, the country, I think, will not quarrel with the Government if, when the time has come when we think it best for the credit of the country and its general good, to secure an equilibrium between expenditure and revenue, when we show our bona fides by cutting down the controllable expenditure of the country to the extent of $2,400,000, and we have just done our duty in that regard—I think the country will not complain, and this House will not complain, if we ask the people in the year that is to come not to pay back to us an equivalent of the old rate of duty on sugar, but to give us one-third of the amount of duty placed on it before 1891, thus securing to the people a remission of two-thirds of the taxation on sugar for the future, and asking them simply for a return equivalent to one-third of the old impost. So it is proposed to place one-half cent per pound on raw sugar, and to increase the protection upon refined sugar and the articles into which sugar largely enters proportionately, and only proportionately, to the increased tax of half a cent on raw sugar. That on the imports which will probably come into the country this year will give $1,200,000 or $1,250,000. That is not quite all we want. We must be careful if we are going to place taxes on the people for the avowed purpose of filling up the gap between revenue and expenditure, not to make the mistake which my hon. friend opposite made, when he put on a large taxation, but yet did not fill the gap. We must add enough to restore the equilibrium, we must be sure that it will be enough, and we must take a little more than we estimate at the present time to be enough in order to be certain that what we propose to do shall be fully and thoroughly done. So that a little more is necessary, and I propose to impose a slight additional tax upon distilled spirits. The excise duty on distilled spirits is now $1.50 per gallon, and I propose to add 20 per cent per gallon, thus making the excise duty $1.70. The Customs duty on spirits is now $2.12½ per gallon, and I propose to make that $2.25, an increase of 12½ cents. That, I think, will bring into the revenue about $500,000 or $600,000, which will give us $1,700,000 or $1,800,000 increased revenue. This will, under the estimate I have prepared and submitted to the House, fill up the gap, restore the equilibrium, and bring us out at the end of next year with a clean sheet, and if times improve fairly well, may bring us out a little to the good, which certainly will not be deplored by the country. To show the bona fides of the Government in doing their share, and of this House in submitting to its share of the betterment, not only have two and a half millions of dollars been taken from the controllable estimates of the country for the year, but we propose as well to intermit for the succeeding year what we have been in the habit of giving with a generous hand namely, the aid by way of mileage subsidies to railways to be constructed. From 1884, when the policy was first adopted, until the present time we have expended over $12,000,000 in payments for these railway subsidies; that is an average of about $1,200,000 per year. There are these running and current which I have spoken of, which we will gradually wipe off the slate; but for the coming year it is felt that it would be imprudent to add to the list of our liabilities by bringing down any railway subsidy Bill granting mileage subsidies for the construction of railways in the country. These then, briefly, sum up the position which the Government assumes, and the action which it recommends to this House, an action which it believes is dictated by prudence and by a desire not to overburden the country, but at the same time to keep its public services well supplied, public services which in a time like this, with our first-rate equipment and first-rate facilities, we may fairly dispense with increasing for a year or two, while times are as they are. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to thank you and the House very heartily for the forbearance with which you have listened to my rather long exposition. I have here the resolutions, they have just been put into my hands, and I would rather revise them before I definitely lay them upon the Table.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Very well; you can lay them on the Table at eight o'clock. We will call it six o'clock now.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, all that I shall have to do at the present time is simply to mention the resolutions which I propose to place before the committee. As I intimated in the remarks I made this afternoon, there is to be imposed and levied on distilled spirits an additional excise duty of 20 cents per gallon, and the first resolution makes provision for that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Have you got the resolutions printed?

Mr. FOSTER. They are in type-writing, not printed. The second resolution simply repeals the sections of the present Tariff Act which are to be rearranged. Then follow the resolutions with reference to the addition of $12\frac{1}{2}$ cents per gallon on imported spirituous liquors. Then, there are a certain number of articles into which sugar enters more or less largely. As the duty is increased upon sugar, it becomes necessary to make a corresponding adjustment with reference to these; and, as nearly as possible, I have made just the proportional increase. Condensed milk, which was 3 cents a pound, will be $3\frac{1}{4}$ cents. Condensed coffee, and such like goods, will be 35 per cent instead of 30 per cent. Sweetened biscuits, which were 25 per cent, will be $27\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Fruits, which were 2 cents a pound, will be $2\frac{1}{4}$ cents. Fruits, preserved in brandy or in spirits, which were \$1.90, will be \$2.00. Paints and colours, ground in spirits, and spirit varnish and lacquers, which were \$1, will be $\$1.12\frac{1}{2}$. Jellies, jams, and preserves, which were 3 cents, will be $3\frac{1}{4}$ cents. All sugar, above sixteen Dutch standard in colour, and all refined sugars, will be 14-100 cent a pound. Sugar not above sixteen Dutch standard, will be $\frac{1}{2}$ cent a pound. Glucose, or grape sugar, which is 1 cent a pound, becomes $1\frac{1}{4}$ cent. Sugar candy, and sweet things, which were 35 per cent, become $\frac{1}{2}$ cent a pound, and 35 per cent. Syrups and molasses of all kinds, which were $\frac{1}{2}$ cent a pound, become $\frac{3}{4}$ cent. Molasses, which was $1\frac{1}{2}$ cent a gallon at the standard test, becomes $1\frac{3}{4}$ cent. Then follows a resolution with reference to beet root sugar. For several years before the abolition of the sugar duties we had operations carried on in beet root sugar making; and when the duty was removed from raw sugar, a bounty, equivalent to nearly 2 cents a pound, about the equivalent of the duty on raw sugar, which was taken off, was granted to beet root sugar, and that has been continued from time to time. It is proposed to continue that for two years; but, instead of giving 2 cents a pound bounty, it is proposed now to give 1 cent a pound by way of bounty, and $\frac{1}{2}$ cent by way of duty, making the total aid to the beet root industry, $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents a pound. The following are the resolutions:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend Section 130 of Chapter 34 of the Act 49 Victoria (the Inland Revenue Act), as amended by Section 4 of Chapter 46 of the Act 54-55 Victoria, by repealing such section and substituting in lieu thereof, as follows:—

130. There shall be imposed, levied and collected on all spirits distilled, the following duties of excise, which shall be paid to the collector of Inland Revenue, as herein provided, that is to say:—

(a.) When the material used in the manufacture thereof consists of not less than ninety per cent by weight, of raw or unmalted grain—on every gallon of the strength of proof by Sykes's hydrometer, and so in proportion for any greater or less strength than the strength of proof, and for any less quantity than a gallon, one dollar and seventy cents;

(b.) When manufactured exclusively from malted barley, taken to the distillery in bond, and on which no duty of customs or excise has been paid, or when manufactured from raw or unmalted grain, used in combination, in such proportions as the Department of Inland Revenue prescribes, with malted barley taken to the distillery in bond and on which no duty of customs or of excise has been paid—on every gallon of the strength of proof by Sykes's hydrometer, and so in proportion for any greater or less strength, and for any less quantity than a gallon, one dollar and seventy-two cents;

(c.) When manufactured exclusively from molasses, syrup, sugar, or other saccharine matter, taken to the distillery in bond and on which no duty of customs has been paid—on every gallon of the strength of proof by Sykes's hydrometer, and so in proportion for any greater or less strength, and for any less quantity than a gallon, one dollar and seventy-three cents.

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Act 57-58 Victoria, Chapter 33, "An Act to consolidate and amend the Act respecting the Duties of Customs" by repealing the following mentioned items of the Schedule "A" to the said Act, viz.: Nos. 7, 31, 32, 55, 80, 81, 82, 152, 392, 393, 394, 396 and 397, and No. 708 of the Schedule "B" to the said Act, and substituting the following in lieu thereof:—

7. Spirituous or alcoholic liquors, distilled from any material, or containing or compounded from or with distilled spirits of any kind, and any mixture thereof with water, for every gallon thereof of the strength of proof, and when at a greater strength than that of proof, at the same rate on the increased quantity that there would be if the liquors were reduced to the strength of proof. When the liquors are of a less strength than that of proof, the duty shall be at a rate herein provided, but computed on a reduced quantity of the liquors in proportion to the lesser degree of strength; provided, however, that no reduction in quantity shall be computed or made on any liquors below the strength of fifteen per cent under proof, but all such liquors shall be computed as of the strength of fifteen per cent under proof, as follows:—

(a.) Ethyl alcohol, or the substance commonly known as alcohol, hydrated oxide of ethyl or spirits of wine; gin of all kinds, n.e.s.; rum, whisky and all spirituous or alcoholic liquors, u.o.p.; amyl alcohol or fusel oil, or any substance known as potato spirit or potato oil; methyl alcohol, wood alcohol, wood naphtha, pyroxylic spirit or any substance known as wood spirit or methylated spirits, absinthe, arrack or palm spirit, brandy, including artificial brandy and imitations of brandy; cordials and liqueurs of all kinds, n.e.s.; mescal, pulque, rum shrub, schiedam and other schnapps; tafia, angostura and similar alcoholic bitters or beverages, two dollars and twenty-five cents per gallon.

(b.) Spirits and strong waters of any kind, mixed with any ingredient or ingredients as being or known or designated as anodynes, elixirs, essences, extracts, lotions, tinctures or medicines, n.e.s., two dollars and twenty-five cents per gallon and thirty per cent ad valorem.

(c.) Alcoholic perfumes and perfumed spirits, bay rum, cologne and lavender waters, hair, tooth and skin washes, and other toilet preparations containing spirits of any kind, when in bottles or flasks containing not more than four ounces each, fifty per cent ad valorem; when in bottles, flasks, or other packages, containing more than four ounces each, two dollars and twenty-five cents per gallon and forty per cent ad valorem.

(d.) Nitrous ether, sweet spirits of nitre and aromatic spirits of ammonia, two dollars and twenty-five cents per gallon and thirty per cent ad valorem.

(e.) Vermouth containing not more than thirty per cent, and ginger wine containing not more than twenty-six per cent of proof spirits, eighty cents per gallon; if containing more than these percentages, respectively, of proof spirits, two dollars and twenty-five cents per gallon.

31. Condensed milk, three and one-quarter cents per pound.

32. Condensed coffee, condensed coffee with milk, milk foods and all similar preparations, thirty-five per cent ad valorem.

55. Biscuits of all kinds not sweetened, twenty-five per cent ad valorem; biscuits of all kinds sweetened, twenty-seven and one-half per cent ad valorem.

79. Fruits in air-tight cans or other packages, two and one-quarter cents per pound, the weight on which duty shall be payable to include the weight of the cans or other packages.

80. Fruits preserved in brandy, or preserved in other spirits, two dollars per gallon.

82. Jellies, jams and preserves, n.e.s., three and one-quarter cents per pound.

152. Paints and colours, ground in spirits, and all spirit varnishes and lacquers, one dollar and twelve and a half cents per gallon.

392. All sugar above number sixteen Dutch standard in colour, and all refined sugars of whatever kinds, grades or standards, one cent and fourteen hundredths of one cent per pound; sugar, n.e.s., not above number sixteen Dutch standard in colour, sugar drainings or pumpings drained in transit, melado or concentrated melado, tank bottoms and sugar concrete, one-half cent per pound; the usual packages in which imported to be free.

393. Glucose or grape sugar, glucose syrup and corn syrup, or any syrups containing any admixture thereof, one and one-quarter cents per pound.

394. Sugar candy, brown or white, and confectionery, including sweetened gums, candied peel, and pop-corn, one-half cent per pound and thirty-five per cent ad valorem.

396. Syrups and molasses of all kinds, n.o.p., the product of the sugar cane or beet root, n.e.s., and all imitations thereof or substitutes therefor, three-quarters of a cent per pound.

397. Molasses produced in the process of the manufacture of cane sugar from the juice of the cane, when imported in the original packages, from the district where produced, in the country where the cane was grown, and which has not been subjected to any process of treating or mixture after leaving the country from which originally shipped, the packages in which imported, when of wood, to be free—

(a.) Testing by polariscope, forty degrees or over, one and three-quarter cents per gallon.

(b.) When testing by polariscope less than forty degrees and not less than thirty-five degrees, one and three-quarter cents per gallon, and in addition thereto, one cent per gallon for each degree or fraction of a degree less than forty degrees.

Resolved, That it is expedient so to amend the Act 54-55 Victoria, Chapter 31, as amended by the Act 55-56 Victoria, Chapter 8, so as to provide that under such regulations and restrictions as may be made by the Governor in Council there may be paid to the producers of any beet root sugar produced in Canada wholly from beets grown therein between the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-five, and the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven, a bounty equal to seventy-five cents per one hundred pounds, and in addition thereto one cent per one hundred pounds for each degree or fraction of a degree of test by polariscope over seventy degrees, such bounty in no case, however, to exceed in the aggregate one dollar per one hundred pounds.

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the foregoing resolutions and the alterations thereby made in the Duties of Customs and of Excise on articles therein mentioned, shall take effect on and after the third day of May instant.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think every hon. gentleman who has had a seat in this House for a period of three years and upwards must have been very much struck by an extraordinary and unprecedented omission in the speech of the hon. gentleman. For the first time, certainly for the first time since he has been in the House and occupied his present position—I may say for the first time for the last sixteen years—a speech has been made on the Budget, and it has contained no laudation of the National Policy whatever. The poor, old fetish has been laid on the shelf, and none so low as to pay it reverence now. And I do not wonder at it. Like some other things with which the hon. gentleman is acquainted, it has served its turn, it has been the ladder by which the hon. gentleman and certain other parties have climbed to preferment, and now, I suppose it is going to be ignominiously kicked down. There is another very curious thing in the hon. gentleman's speech. Heretofore, ever since Sir Leonard Tilley came to the rescue of Sir John Macdonald, their doctrine has been that they made the people rich by imposing taxes. But now, there is a new departure. A change has come over the spirit of the hon. gentleman's dream, and he takes great credit for making people rich by taking taxes off. And there is a vast deal more to be said for his latter than for his former doctrine. Then there is another very curious admission—curious to me, but not so curious to those who have not been as long in the House as I have—it is the involuntary admission wrung from the hon. gentleman by the necessity of making a case. According to the hon. gentleman, the present crisis is a mere trifle compared with that which prevailed from 1873 to 1878. He is not altogether wrong about that. But it is passing strange that the distinguished gentleman who preceded him and surrounded him did not discover it before. It is true that the position, not of Canada, by any manner of means, but the position of the commercial world, notably the United States, was infinitely worse from 1873 to 1878, than it is to-day. So far, I agree with the hon. gentleman. We had an infinitely worse storm to weather, and we did weather it without creating anything like the deficit which the hon. gentleman has created.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, oh.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman had better wait until he hears what I have to say. Probably he does not know much of the financial history of Canada for the last twenty-five years, but before I have done he will have gained some information. Sir, during those three years of financial crisis which the hon. gentleman now tells us was worse than the one we are now passing through, our total deficit amounted to $4,500,000, whereas, this afternoon, the hon. gentleman has informed the House that he expects to have that identical sum as his deficit for the one year. There is another circumstance which it may be worth while to recall to the hon. gentleman. The whole of that deficit of $4,500,000, we extracted out of the pockets of our neighbours on the other side of the line; and let me further tell the hon. gentleman that there is every reason to believe that had he and his colleagues conducted the negotiations which were so ably conducted by Sir Albert Smith, with the aid of my hon. friend beside me, the chances are that Canada would not have received any of that four and a half million dollars, but, as happened in another transaction, would have had the pleasure of paying her own costs. Of these matters, I may have a little to say hereafter, as also concerning one statement which it would be unparliamentary to call impudent, but which is undoubtedly a most absurd and misleading statement, and that is the statement that these men, whose very creed and doctrine was that the way to make the people rich was by piling taxes on them, had materially lessened the burdens of taxation. Before this debate is through I intend to prove—and if I were not to undertake it, there are fifty good men and true on this side of the House able and willing to do so—that the actual taxation taken out of the pockets of the people is $60,000,000 a year, as against $20,000,000 per year, which was all we ever exacted. The hon. gentleman boasts that he lessened the sugar duties. Well, if he did, it was not because of any goodwill of his or his colleagues to the people of Canada, but at the dictation of Mr. McKinley, and because the American Government had abolished them altogether. And, Sir, I noticed one curious fact. The hon. gentleman stated that he had made a saving of $4,900,000 a year on the sugar duties from 1890.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not make any statement of that kind.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then I will have to wait until we get "Hansard," but I think every man here understood him to claim that saving.

Mr. FOSTER. What I did do was to give the savings each year from 1890 to 1895.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And you made that $4,900,000.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not remember what the average was.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is what the hon. gentleman will find he said when he reads the report of his speech, unless he has occasion to revise it. I find in the Trade and Navigation Returns of 1890, that all the duty we got was $2,800,000. If that be the case, there is a marked difference between the computation of the hon. gentleman and the actual results. I am not going into minute calculations until I get the details of his new taxes before me, but I observe that the hon. gentleman is constant, in this respect, at any rate, to his old love, that in the matter of sugar he proposes to take $3,000,000 a year out of the pockets of the people, and only allow $1,200,000 to go into the treasury. The hon. gentleman boasted that in these five years the savings of the people had increased $41,000,000. It is not always a good sign, let me tell him, to find that the savings of the people have accumulated in banks. It is sometimes an evidence that the people find themselves so deprived of legitimate opportunities for investment that they are glad to take three to three and a half per cent rather than put their money into legitimate enterprises. The hon. gentleman took good care to say nothing of the reduction of $200,000,000, and upwards, which has taken place in the last few years in the value of farm property in Ontario alone. If he had been actively concerned in these matters from 1873 to 1878, he would have remembered that whatever might be the distress that prevailed in those years, whenever there was a farm in the market for sale, in the greater part of the province of Ontario, at any rate, there were a half a dozen buyers. To-day, the reverse holds, there are too often half a dozen farms for sale and not one buyer, and although there may be millions lying idle in the savings banks and other banks, the owners cannot be persuaded to invest their money in the purchase of farm property. However, I am not here for the purpose of bandying charges with the hon. gentleman. I desire to discuss, and to discuss at length, a much more serious question, the present position of this country. I do not care to recall the jeers of hon. gentlemen opposite at deficits in times past. I do not think we will hear so much of these either on the hustings or in the House for some time to come. But I have this to say to the hon. gentleman, that there are now two distinct and separate subjects for discussion. I propose to deal with those apart. One of those concerns the existing financial situation, and the methods of dealing with it. The other is the fiscal policy of the Government, and its results. Now, I have never contended, and the hon. gentleman was perfectly right in that, that it was in the power of any Government, by adopting a particular fiscal policy, to avert disaster. Disaster may come whether you have a free trade policy or a protective policy; but I always contended that while a Government could not, by its legislative action, avert disaster, a Government might, and very often does, to an enormous extent, intensify it. Sir, the fiscal and administrative policy of the Government, I will admit, are not necessarily connected together. The one may be good and the other may be bad. And the reverse may occur. But, generally, you find that the two go together. A wise fiscal policy usually means a prudent administration; an unwise fiscal policy usually means directly the reverse. Nobody who has watched the affairs of Canada for some time back will suppose that there is any marked difference between the fiscal policy and the administrative policy of Canada. At present they are unlovely in their lives, and I trust they will not be divided in their approaching death. No policy could well be more flagrantly unjust than that of which the hon. gentleman has often been the exponent, nor could any administration of public affairs be more deliberately or purposely corrupt than we know, too well, has been the administration of the Government of which the hon. gentleman is a member. And now, Sir, first of all, I desire to ascertain what is our real position? What is the deficit? The hon. gentleman admitted under stress of circumstances that the deficit amounted, he thought, to about four millions and a half. That is to say, Sir, if things go well, if the hon. gentleman gets as much in the next two months as he did in the same months of 1894, if he does not spend as much in the next two months as he himself estimated he would be likely to spend, and particularly if he gets a little money out of his new taxation, why then possibly the deficit may not exceed $4,500,000. Well, Sir, that is a possibility. I do not know whether he will succeed in anticipated a little revenue; I do not know whether he will succeed in pushing off a few payments until next year; but what I do know is that the hon. gentleman's estimates, even without the additional estimates which he has not yet given us, are $922,000 more than the sum actually expended in 1893-94. We all know that we wound up the year 1893-94 with a deficit of $1,210,000; and we know that the failure in revenue down to the 1st of May, which the hon. gentleman did not give, amounts to $2,838,788, while our expenditure up to 1st May exceeded our expenditure for the last year by $705,413. Now, Sir, these figures—and this is at least as good as the hon. gentleman's hypothesis—show that there is to-day an actual ascertained deficit of $1,754,520. However, Sir, I am not very greatly concerned about that, whether the deficit be four millions and a half, as he says it will be, or whether it be four millions and three-quarters, as the public returns would seem to indicate it is. Whether it may be one or two, or three hundred thousand dollars, more or less, by the 1st of July, is not a matter of very great moment. It is sufficient for us, to know that by the hon. gentleman's own admission—and he certainly did not exaggerate the chances—the deficit amounts to four and one half millions. Now, Sir, I want to call attention to what has become of the last loan. I am not going, at this moment, to discuss the loan itself. I think the hon. gentleman made a good loan, but I think he made a grave error of judgment in not borrowing at the time—in view of our liabilities—a considerably large sum. I think he might and ought to have borrowed, certainly three, and perhaps, four millions back. As I shall show presently, he has exposed himself to the necessity of going to negotiate another loan in a short time, and perhaps, under less favourable conditions. That loan netted the hon. gentleman say, $10,700,000. He knows, and admitted here to-day, that our capital expenditure is $3,273,000 to date. He had a deficit of $1,210,000 that he had to pay; there were temporary loans of $2,433,000; we have a deficit of $4,500,000 or $4,754,000—which you will—and we have further expenditures up to 1st July, according to the hon. gentleman's own statement of $1,500,000. So that apparently all the loan has been spent, every penny of it; that is, more than every penny of it is pledged. The hon. gentleman has a certain amount of money in hand, I know; but all that money will be required to make both ends meet before the end of the year, without making any provision for the extra charges which accrue and become due on capital account. And then, Sir, I come to another point on which the hon. gentleman laid some stress, and on which I desire—and the House desires, I think—a good deal more information than he was pleased to give us. Now, Sir, here again the hon. gentleman may correct me if I am in error. I took down the statement of liabilities which he gave. It did not appear to me to conform with the statements made across the floor of the House by his colleague, the hon. Minister of Railways, or with the statements that appear in our public accounts. According to his statement the total expenditure on capital account for the next four or five years would be rather under $10,000,000—nine millions odd, I think, were the figures.

Mr. FOSTER. Fifteen millions and over, according to the figures I gave.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the hon. gentleman—I will accept the correction, of course. But certainly that amount does not consort exactly with the statement he made in another part of his speech, that the amount that would go to sinking fund would be amply sufficient to meet all the expenditures on capital account for the next four or five years.

Mr. FOSTER. I may put the statement in such a way that the hon. gentleman will see. I divided the liabilities into two. About $6,000,000—if I recollect aright—were liabilities in the shape of subsidies current which the estimates would provide for each year, as they have done in past years. That is, they would be met out of consolidated revenue. Then there were the subsidies and expenditures that have not been so provided for, railway subsidies and others; making nine millions odd to be met from capital. There are six million dollars in round numbers, that run over appropriations that are made in the Estimates each year, and have been running for the past three or four years, and they mature between this and 1908. Then for capital expenditure, there are nine million dollars.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And we have not been paying out of our ordinary revenue any such sum during the last two years. We have not been paying any of these sums which ordinarily go to capital account out of our ordinary expenditure.

Mr. FOSTER. Steamship subsidies do not go to capital account.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What steamship companies?

Mr. FOSTER. The Australian steamship subsidy, the China and Japan steamship subsidy.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Oh, those are the things which make up the six millions?

Mr. FOSTER. Those and some others.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then I will just give the hon. gentleman's statement as I make it, and he can correct it. The Minister of Railways, in reply to me the other day gave the total railway subsidies which we had to provide for at $8,729,000. That, I presume, is correct. The hon. Minister gave the estimated cost of St. Lawrence Canals; those are clearly a capital charge.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it may be a question whether railway subsidies ought to go to capital account. The St. Lawrence canals are to consume, at least, $6,000,000. The hon. gentleman will see that has nothing to do with mail subsidies or anything like that. Now, I assume, judging from the past—and that is the only way we can judge—that the capital expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway account is likely, in the next year or two, to run up to about a million dollars. I shall be very glad if they do not, but looking to the past, I am afraid we have little ground for hoping to escape with less than $1,000,000. Then the hon. gentleman has entirely omitted an important factor, he has omitted the fact that there is a certain Trent Valley Canal now again put under contract. It was asserted a year or so ago that this was likely to cost $5,000,000. Are we to understand that is eliminated from his programme? I do not so understand the Minister of Railways, who, the other evening told us that one contract for $500,000 had been let on account; and if those figures of mine are correct, then, apart from the $6,000,000 which the hon. gentleman spoke about—there is about $20,729,000 to be provided for—unless, of course, as I say, the Trent Valley Canal is entirely abandoned. If it be, let us understand it so. But that was not the statement made by the Minister of Railways, that was not the statement made to us last year, that was not the belief entertained by the inhabitants of several constituencies through which the canal passes. Nor did the hon. gentleman, so far as I understand him, say anything to us at all about such enterprises as the Chignecto road. Am I to understand that is abandoned, or does that remain a liability pending?

Mr. FOSTER. I presume that is no liability.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then does the hon. gentleman intend it shall become a liability at any future time?

Mr. FOSTER. Don't ask too much, now.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think now we have a right to know. Now is the time when we ought to know, when we ought to be informed as to all these contingent liabilities. What about the Chignecto road? What is it to cost? $80,000 a year, or $100,000 a year, or $120,000 a year?

Mr. BOWERS. $170,500.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is that a contingent liability or not? The hon. gentleman says it is not a liability now, but we have a right to know whether he intends to exorcise the ghost and get rid of it altogether, or is it to rise up again in judgment against us, either before or after the next general election?

Mr. FOSTER. Don't invoke it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understand there are parties here now anxiously inquiring about the Chignecto road, and we ought to know. Nor did the hon. gentleman, who came here having promised to make a full and ample statement, so far as I notice, say one word about a certain statutory liability of $750,000 a year for the Atlantic Fast Service. What of that? Is that a liability, present or contingent? What has the hon. gentleman got to say about that?

Mr. FOSTER. It is not a present liability, certainly.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, the hon. gentleman had better take it off the statute-book, or it may become one, and he had better do it quickly. The hon. gentleman had, no doubt, a difficult task this evening, and, therefore, I am not surprised that these little trifles of Trent Valley Canals, Chignecto Roads and Atlantic Fast Services, which, after all said and done, do not mean more than one and a half millions added to our annual expenditure at the outside—I am not surprised that they have not attracted his attention as much as they have ours. But there are other things that we have a right to know about. What has the hon. gentleman to tell us about the contribution to the Hudson Bay Railway? Is that a contingent liability? Is that a liability which is to accrue? Are we to pay that or are we not? Surely the hon. gentleman will see the propriety, when we are estimating our liabilities, of letting us know. What has the hon. gentleman to say about that Hudson Bay Road? Is it a liability contingent? Is it a present liability, or a future liability, or a deferred liability?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman's speech. Let him go on.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, it is pertinent to the proposition. The hon. gentleman told us he would make a full, free and frank statement—those were his words—within a very few days. Now I ask for a full, free and frank statement, and particularly on so important a question as a grant which may ultimately come to involve ten times the amount, as he knows. What has he to say about the Hudson Bay Railway?

Mr. FOSTER. That will be for Parliament to determine.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And the leader of the House cannot tell. Does not the hon. gentleman know that Parliament can vote no money grants, except at the instance of the Crown, on a statement conveyed to us here by a minister of the Crown? Now, I think, in all conscience, after the pledge which the hon. gentleman gave us, he can hope to gain nothing by invoking—I won't say invoking—but he can hope to gain nothing by concealing their intentions. Surely we have a right to know, when we are here in debate on the financial state of the country, what our liabilities are. It is very evident that if the statement be correct, if the Chignecto Road be not entirely removed, if the Atlantic service be still a statutory obligation, and if we have got the Hudson Bay road to provide for—I say it is very evident indeed that the hon.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

gentleman has enormously understated the existing present liabilities of the country. Well, Sir, I will give the hon. gentleman time. I hope that with reflection—

Mr. FOSTER. All will come out in time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—the proper time to acquaint the Parliament of Canada with all the liabilities which Canada owes, is when the Minister of Finance makes his financial statement.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman puts it in that way, so far as that railway is concerned, the hon. gentleman and the House have been informed of all the liabilities, and he knows perfectly well what liabilities have been incurred. If any other measures are to be brought down by the Government in the course of the session, the hon. gentleman will then become acquainted with them; but the hon. gentleman has no right to stand up in his place to-night and, because he is discussing the Budget, want to know before hand all the measures that the Government are going to bring down.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am in my right, the House is in its right, the Opposition is in its right, in demanding that the Government should not conceal things from us, in demanding that the Government should tell us what the obligations are. The hon. gentleman, Sir, made a formal pledge here three or four days ago that he would make a full and honest statement of all the obligations of the country at this time.

Mr. FOSTER. You have got it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Now, on a question which involves two millions and a half directly, and which may involve $25,000,000 for ought we know, the hon. gentleman has not a word to say. Well, Sir, the country will judge who has kept his promise to the country and to the House. Now, what is the general result? The general result is that we have a deficit ranging from $4,500,000 to $5,000,000; that our cash in hand is barely adequate to meet our current needs, and hardly that, remembering, as I pointed out the other night, that over and above bills payable, we have in addition some $40,000,000 borrowed at call, from the people of Canada, for which we ought to keep a respectable reserve. It is very clear that instead of having $9,000,000 of ascertained liabilities, and a number of items scattered here and there which are to be paid within the next half dozen years, our ascertained liabilities are something like $20,000,000, not including those statutory charges to which I have alluded, and which would amount to very nearly a million dollars a year more added to our fixed charges for many years. Now, Sir, the Minister proposes two things, he proposes to make certain additions to the taxation, with which I will deal at a later period. He proposes certain retrenchments, a few of which, perhaps, may be good as far as they go, but which I am afraid we must characterize rather as sham retrenchments than real ones. One thing at any rate is certain, and it is worth noting, one of those points which, as the hon. gentleman said, it is well the House should bear in mind. There are some increases and there are some reductions, but the increases have most unquestionably come to stay, while as to the reductions, I fear they are essentially of a temporary character. Why, Sir, I look at the Public Works, and I look at Militia, and I find that of his $1,600,000 of reduction, $1,325,000 occur in these two branches alone. Well, we have had some experience in the past as to the value of the hon. gentleman's promises of retrenchment and economy, and as to the extent to which his colleagues allow him to carry out his promises. But who is there to tell us that next year we won't see huge supplementary estimates brought down, and that we won't see all these things very much as they were before? Sir, the hon. gentleman, in talking of these Estimates, took occasion to say that there was not much fear, he thought, of their being equalled. Now, Sir, that may be true, possibly, in a certain sense. It may be true enough that the total volume of the Estimates after the Supplementary Estimates have been added, are not exceeded during the current year. But I have here the original Estimates for 1893-94, and it is worth while calling the attention of the House to them. They amounted to $36,560,000. That was the original estimate, which he says is rarely spent. I think the Public Accounts will show that while the estimate was $36,500,000, he spent something like $37,500,000. I think the expenditure of last year, unless my memory is wholly at fault, was not less than that sum.

Mr. FOSTER. It was less than the estimate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No. I do not mean to say, however, that it was not less than the ultimate estimate. We are not dealing with that question. The present question is, can the hon. gentleman's original and main Estimate be depended on? Here is one sample: Estimates amounting to $36,500,000, and an actual expenditure of one million more than the hon. gentleman's main estimate.

Mr. FOSTER. But it was a great deal less than the total Estimates.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It may be less than the aggregate Estimates, because the hon. gentleman had the very bad practice, which he has promised he is not going to repeat, but which I am afraid will require some strong collateral guarantee to be produced here to ensure that he will keep his promise in the long run, of having his main Estimates largely below his ultimate Estimates for a given year. Then another grave question on which we may have a great deal more to say before the session closes, is as to what is the condition of the Intercolonial Railway. We know perfectly well that it is possible always in conducting a railway so to manage it as to appear to make both ends meet, but at the expense of materially injuring the permanent character of the work. We have had a rather bitter experience on the Intercolonial Railway as to its capacity for sinking more capital from time to time, and while I shall make no positive statement, not having the knowledge myself, I am bound to tell the House, and I have it on authority which I do not think it entirely safe to disregard, that there is very great danger that a large amount of capital may be required from us before we are many years older to place the Intercolonial Railway in as good a condition as it was a few years ago. What I point out is this: To all appearances the funds are out, to all appearances the hon. gentleman must borrow again, to all appearances the hon. gentleman's loan must be repeated, either in the shape of a temporary loan, which I suppose he could make, of a few millions in England, or in the shape of a permanent loan, and that before he is twelve months older. Sir, the hon. gentleman did me the honour to contrast the deficits of 1876, 1877 and 1878, with the deficits which now exist. But he took extremely good care not to tell the House the reasons why those deficits existed at all. I will tell the House. Those deficits of 1876-77 and 1878 existed because, in opposition to our strenuous protests, in opposition to the most vigorous denunciations we could make, the Government of the late Sir John Macdonald in 1873, under very peculiar circumstances, which I will not wring the feelings of hon. gentlemen opposite further by alluding to, increased the public expenditure by $4,000,000, not providing one cent of taxation to meet it; and because at the same time (and it was admitted by Sir Leonard Tilley in his Budget speech, which I have under my hand), they further added $60,000,000 to the public liabilities, for the greater part of which we had to provide and for which they made no provision whatever. The hon. gentleman talks of the fact that the net debt increased under our Administration. When you inherit liabilities of $60,000,000 which your predecessors inflicted on the country and for which they made no provision, how is a succeeding Administration, I should like to know, to avoid adding six or eight millions annually for some years to come to the existing debt? Now, Mr. Speaker, as to one expectation on which the hon. gentleman laid great stress, and that is as to the expectation of better times. Well, Sir, I hope, and every member in this House will hope, for private reasons if not for public ones, that this expectation may be realized. But allow me to tell the hon. Finance Minister that there are no very solid grounds on which he can base his financial calculations in this regard. The immediate prospects, I am afraid, are very uncertain indeed. They will depend on causes wholly beyond the hon. gentleman's control. They will depend, in the first place, and he knows it well, on the trade conditions in the United States; and it is worth while observing how ready those hon. gentlemen are now to admit that the prosperity of Canada is most intimately connected with the prosperity of the United States, that it is very hard indeed for Canada to prosper when the United States are depressed, that if a wave of depression sweeps over the United States it almost invariably within a short space of time sweeps over Canada too, and which, perhaps, the hon. gentleman has not seen quite as clearly as he should have done, and that, although such a wave may not overtake us quite as soon as the United States, it is very apt to remain a little longer with us. That is one cause over which the hon. gentleman can exercise no control. Another cause is this. The prosperity of Canada, which is chiefly an agricultural country, depends, as everybody knows, largely on the prices of food products, meats and cereals. Those will be regulated by competition, over which we have no control. We have had to face the competition of India, and the competition of the Argentine Republic; we are now threatened with the competition of Australasia, and by a refinement of generosity the Government of Canada are contemplating making considerable grants for the purpose of enabling Australian farmers to compete more favourably at our expense in the great markets of the world and with Canadian products. I desire to be on friendly terms, heaven knows, not merely with all our brother and sister colonies, but for the matter of that, in trade matters with the whole world, if I could; but it is not part of the policy of the Liberal party to tax the people of Canada for the purpose of benefiting people whose products enter into direct competition with ours. Now, Sir, one thing is very certain, although the hon. gentleman does not appear to understand it, but I think that some of his financial advisers should, and I think they ought to have made him aware of the fact. We have heard a great deal of the surpluses the hon. gentleman has possessed in times past—on that point I shall have a word or two to say presently—but it is clear that for many years back the people of Canada have been, to a very great extent, living on capital, and the hon. gentleman—and this ran all through his speech—has mistaken, as many others have done, the results of spending huge sums of borrowed money for increase in our legitimate income. Sir, the two things are very widely distinct. The hon. gentleman boasts, boasts very loudly of all the former surpluses that he has had. He seems to think that the existence of a surplus half a dozen years ago is ample warrant for having a deficit to-day. Well, the hon. gentleman, no doubt, being a professor of literature, is a student of Shakespeare. Let me remind him of a certain passage there:

Oh, who is there can hold a fire in his hand
By thinking on the frosty Caucasus,
Or wallow naked in December's snow
By dreaming of fantastic summer's heat,
Or cloy the hungry edge of appetite
By bare imagination of a feast?

Or to bring it down nearer to the level of the Minister of Finance. Who is there—

Can to a surplus turn a deficit
By saying: Some poor clerk had thus it writ.

as the Minister of Finance did in the "Official Gazette" a little while ago. Now, Sir, how are these surpluses obtained. That is a question to ask the House, and that is a question my friends had better ask the electors, too. They were obtained in two ways. They were obtained partly, at least the surplus revenues were obtained by the outrageous taxation imposed by the Government; taxation which always took two dollars for one, which often took ten dollars for one, out of the pockets of the people; and they were obtained also partly by a system of perpetual loans. That is a very important factor in our position. The hon. gentleman has talked largely and loudly of the increased deposits, but not a word out of the hon. gentleman's mouth, not a whisper from the hon. gentleman's lips about the vastly increased indebtedness of Canada as compared with the period between 1873 and 1879. The hon. gentleman has now and heretofore wholly ignored that most important fact. What is the present indebtedness; and, mind you, by the indebtedness of Canada, I do not mean barely and solely the indebtedness owed by Canada in her Federal capacity; I mean our Federal debt, I mean our provincial debt, I mean our municipal debt, I mean our private debt due abroad, and I mean also the sum due by us for railway bonds and obligations. Now, I have been at some pains to find out as correctly as I could—the statistics do not allow of my doing it altogether—what that amounts to, and I venture to say to the House that if you take into account railway bonds and stocks as well, that the total present indebtedness of Canada, the collective indebtedness to parties abroad, must be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $800,000,000 to $1,000,000,000, and the annual amount of interest $25,000,000 or $30,000,000 a year. That is a very important fact, indeed: it is a fact which the Finance Minister has wholly ignored, but it is a fact which I am afraid in the future we will not find it quite so easy to ignore. Then the hon. gentleman, in another part of his speech, tells us that we are so very much better off than other people. Well, if it be true that we are very much better off than other people, it is a very poor consolation for us to find ourselves in the position we are now in. However, I have grave doubts that the hon. gentleman's statement is correct. I know quite well that there are many parts of Canada, possessing great natural resources, where the people possess very considerable amounts of accumulated wealth, and I know perfectly well that in those parts the pressure of hard times and the consequences of the depression has not been felt as much as it has elsewhere. But, Sir, taking it as a whole, I know two things. I know that the great mass of the people of Canada, and notably the agriculturists, were vastly better off between the years 1873 and 1878 than between the years 1890 and 1895; and I have the strongest grounds for believing that were a fair and honest account struck, were you to place on one side all the evidences that the hon. gentleman has given of accumulated wealth, and on the other the increase of our debt, to which I have alluded, and the shrinkage in the value of our farms and town properties, it is clear that Canada would come out hundreds of millions of dollars the worse, on an honest calculation as a result of the last twelve years. Sir, one thing is true. Canada does possess and always has possessed a considerably better banking system than our neighbours, and that enables Canada to bear or break the force of the blow at first. But, Sir, the real difference is this: The one case is chronic and the other is acute, and we have been slowly bleeding away for years and years. In the case of the United States, when a crisis comes it is very sharp, I grant you, but it lasts for a comparatively short time. Now, Sir, to my mind, the case really lies in a nutshell. Two processes have been going on for these many years. One of these processes has been a huge expenditure of borrowed money during the past 12 or 15 years. Take it altogether, and bearing it in mind that I am speaking of the collective expenditure, I am speaking of the expenditure on railways and by municipalities, I am speaking of the money which has been borrowed and brought into the country by loan companies, and I am speaking of the moneys borrowed by private persons and corporations, and I say, taking it altogether, there is very strong ground for believing that it was on an average about $30,000,000 a year. Now, that no doubt did cause large importations of dutiable goods. As every one knows, when money is borrowed it is not sent over to Canada in hard coin, but it is sent over in money's worth in the shape of goods, and usually dutiable goods, and no doubt for years and years that brought a large revenue. To-day we are called upon to pay the interest, and the 10 or 12 million dollars a year, which we have to pay through the medium of the Government, is only a small part, only a part, at any rate, of the total sum of interest which Canada has to pay. Sir, had we got value for our money, had that money been invested in works which were really useful and which really added to the productive powers of Canada, the case would not have been so bad. If it would have been possible for us to have borrowed $800,000,000 or $1,000,000,000, if you will, and we should have been able to pay the interest largely out of the profits arising from those works. But it is only too well known to any one who knows anything of Canada, that an enormous amount of money which was borrowed has been wasted, aye and worse than wasted, for a very considerable part of it has gone to debauch and corrupt the people of Canada. Now, I was pleased to hear the hon. gentleman—it is a matter in which I am entirely in accord with him—I was pleased to hear the hon. gentleman, in the course of his speech, express himself in high approbation of that very reliable and conservative newspaper, the London "Economist." I want to call his attention to a very late issue of that reliable and highly Conservative newspaper, under date 23rd March, 1895, and here is one item which he would do well to note as one among the many proofs of the great general prosperity which Canada is now experiencing and has experienced from 1890 to 1895. Curiously enough, Sir, this article, which relates to the depreciation of North and South American securities, starts from 1890 and comes down to the present day; and this is what it says: That a careful examination, comparing the market values of to-day with those of five years ago, shows that the loss to English investors in Canadian railway securities amounts to £16,750,000 sterling. Rather more than $80,000,000 loss, according to the London "Economist," that reliable and conservative newspaper, accrued to the holders of Canadian railway securities within five years—the five years which the hon. gentleman chose to select as having shown how well Canada had prospered; and here, Sir, is a little sentence to which he and his friends would do well to pay attention:

Moreover, and this is not pleasant to say, the Canadians have not been overscrupulous in their dealings with the mother country. A number of "wildcat" railway schemes have been exploited at our expense, while in some cases investors have suffered from the fact that the undertakings in which they have placed their capital were regarded as aliens, entitled neither to consideration nor fair management.

Surely, Sir, the London "Economist" cannot have been listening to the statements of the Opposition as to the Carquet railway and a great many other roads of a similar character, here and there, which have contributed to make our railway securities stand far less well in the London market than we desire to see them. Then, Sir, there is another cause which has contributed very considerably, and that is the great waste which has undoubtedly occurred under the operation of the National Policy. At the direct instigation, if not of the hon. gentleman, at all events of his predecessors, a number of unfortunate men in this country were induced to put their all into enterprises which it was believed would enrich themselves as well as the public. We know too well that there is scarcely a town in Ontario which cannot to-day point to two or three monumental ruins where some $100,000, $200,000, or $300,000 of capital are entombed, never, I fear to be resurrected. That was one process which was going on, and notably during the time when the hon. gentleman thought we were doing exceedingly well. Then, there was another process to which I thought he would have alluded to-day, as it would have afforded him a fair reason for some of the things he had to justify or excuse. Simultaneously with the borrowing of these enormous sums of money on which we have to pay interest, there was a great fall in the income of our agriculturists. Scarcely a single farm product, except perhaps cheese, brings anything like as good a price to-day as it did in 1878. Many of them bear scarcely half the value in the market that they did then. My computation is that the loss in the income of our agriculturists to-day is fully $20,000,000 a year as compared with their income of a few years ago. I will not go back even so far as 1878. Why, Sir, every man knows that wheat of the very best quality, not to speak of barley and other grains, has to be sold in our markets for scarcely half the price which was freely obtained fifteen or sixteen years ago; and, while that may not be entirely the fault of hon. gentlemen opposite, still it must be borne in mind that, while on all occasions they are ready to take credit to themselves for every cheapness, no matter how obtained, in manufactured articles, they wholly and entirely decline to be responsible for any reduction in the price of grain. Let them be just, Sir; and if they claim to be the authors of this increased cheapness of other commodities, let them stand before agricultural audiences and admit, as they are in honour bound to do, that they are equally responsible for the enormous fall in the prices of agricultural products. And here, Sir, I may pause to say a word or two with respect to this matter of surpluses. In the first place, I have never admitted, and I do not now admit, that the hon. gentlemen's book-keeping has been such as to entitle them to claim credit for anything like the amount of the surpluses which they have put down. But it is a very remarkable fact that all the time that these surpluses were piling up, our debt was likewise increasing very fast. I will go back a little further than the hon. gentleman did, and take the period of 1880. I find that our net debt increased in that year $9,500,000; in 1881, $3,000,000; in 1883, $4,800,000; in 1884, $23,700,000; in 1885, $14,000,000; in 1886, $26,700,000; in 1887, $4,000,000; in 1888, $7,000,000, and then it came down to a mild $3,000,000 in 1889. It is almost juggling with words, Mr. Speaker, to say that the hon. gentlemen opposite are entitled to any great credit for the increasing surpluses, while all the time—surpluses to the contrary notwithstanding, and making all allowances for the sum that went into the sinking fund—our net debt went on increasing at such a rate that in ten years it was $90,000,000 more than it was when I left office. Now, I am not disposed at present to raise the question of the amount of additional taxation which has been taken from the people over and above what goes into the treasury. That may be more fittingly disposed of later on. But a point which I have to make—and I think it is well worthy of our consideration—is that when the hon. gentleman talks so glibly of the certainty of better times, he forgets to inform the House of three important facts—first, that he has a large amount of undischarged liabilities; next, that the country collectively has a great deal more to pay than it had a few years ago; and, unfortunately, that the collective income of the country is very much less than it was. The hon. gentleman looks for a quick rally. Well, I would be very glad to believe that he is right. It is very much to our interest that there should be a quick rally; but I would like to know if he expects an immediate rally in the prices of food and grain, and if so, why? If he does, I could understand the reason on which he bases his expectation of better times. I did not hear him assign one solitary reason for expecting that there would be any great improvement in the prices of our agricultural products. If the hon. gentleman does expect any such improvement, I would like to hear him say—and I will give him the floor with pleasure for that purpose—why he does expect it. Does the hon. gentleman expect to see new sources of wealth develop, and, if so, where? It is possible, in a country so large and so imperfectly explored as ours, that new sources of wealth may be discovered, from which we may receive considerable additions to our national income; but, if the hon. gentleman has discovered such new sources, he has given us no more information about them than he has given about his intention with regard to the Hudson Bay Railway. My counsel to the hon. gentleman is this, that he had better not prophesy unless he knows; he had better accept the situation as it is; he had better not count too fast or too surely on any great amount of betterment. He had better take things as they are revealed in the Public Accounts to-day. I can hardly think the hon. gentleman justified in predicting an immediate recovery as probable, and I would just call the hon. gentleman's attention to this. The hon. gentleman alluded, and it was natural that he should, to the period of deficits which existed under our Administration. Now it is worth while to observe that within the last thirty years there have been several periods of deficits in Canada. I took occasion the other evening to mention the fact in reply to my hon. friend beside me, that although he was literally correct in saying that the Finance Minister had achieved the biggest absolute deficit, he had by no means achieved the biggest comparative deficit that has been known in old Canada. I have here a statement of the deficits which prevailed in old Canada from 1858 to 1865. In 1858—and I suppose the hon. gentleman knows who was Premier in 1858?

An hon. MEMBER. Who supported him?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I had not the honour of being in Parliament in 1858, and I have no objection to tell my hon. friend opposite that I had the honour of being elected to Parliament, as an independent member, in 1863, nor had I given any adhesion whatever to Sir John Macdonald. On the contrary, all I said in his favour was this, that he was too clever a man to be absolutely proscribed. However, we will come to 1863 presently. In 1858, there was a deficit of $3,375,000 on a total income of $5,270,000, being a deficit of just 65 per cent in said income, so that I was pretty well justified in stating that the Finance Minister might take comfort from illustrious example. In 1859, the same distinguished gentleman had a deficit of $1,500,000, which was equivalent to exactly 22 per cent. In 1860, there was a deficit of $1,973,000, being equivalent of 26 per cent. He kept up the 26 per cent to 1861, and raised it to 28 per cent in 1862. It fell to 10 per cent in 1863, under the Hon. John Sandfield Macdonald, and thereafter gradually diminished. The point I wish specially to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to is this, that he had better not conclude too hastily that all these deficits will disappear at once. That has not been our past experience. On the contrary, deficits have usually lasted for a considerable period of time, and I would not advise him to depend on any betterment or to be content with the somewhat inadequate provision which he seems to think sufficient for present purposes. Therefore, I think that the hon. gentleman is doubly bound—bound by his own promise, bound by the condition in which the country is to-day,—to give this House a most full and complete statement of the liabilities for which he expects to have to provide. That, Sir, I must again formally demand. I say, and I leave the matter for his calm reflection, that before this debate closes, we should in all conscience know what is the total amount of our liabilities, what are his intentions with regard to such projects as the Chignecto Ship Railway, the Fast Atlantic Steam Service, and the Hudson Bay Railway. As I understand, he is pledged not to bring down any railway subsidies this year. He does not propose to engage in any Government works other than those of which we have had notice. If he does, all I can say is that he is trifling with the House, and I think with his own character and reputation. If, after the statement he has made, he allows this Budget debate to close without giving us full information on those points, he is now deliberately misleading the House. As I said before, the Opposition in this matter are in their clear right; and I am bound to say that if the Opposition deserves censure, they deserve it for having in past times allowed the Government to bring down, at the very fag end of the session, Estimates involving large appropriations of money which had not been referred to in the financial statement, and for having allowed those subsidies to go through the House without proper discussion. Such practice was wholly in defiance of all sound principle, English precedent, and constitutional rule. Now, I have never declared, and my hon. friends have never declared, that we were disposed to oppose all grants because the Government propose them. But I do say that the hon. gentleman is bound, in every possible form and shape, to tell us before this debate closes, absolutely and exactly what are the financial liabilities of the country and for what sums the Government intend to ask the concurrence of Parliament. Now, as I am aware that the hon. gentleman must get his motion through, and at any rate as we have not had yet an opportunity of inspecting his proposals—I have not even seen them but only heard them read—I do not feel disposed to discuss the proposals at present. And therefore, particularly as the House has listened with extreme indulgence to me and has had a very long and interesting discourse from the hon. gentleman, lasting two hours and a half, I would prefer to move the adjournment of the debate rather than proceed with the somewhat voluminous remarks which I fear I will have to inflict on him with respect to the enlarged duties.

Mr. FOSTER. It has been the usual custom to continue the Budget debate from day to day, and I would like my hon. friend to consider whether that would not be the better rule to observe. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken has adjourned the debate, and when it takes place again it would be more convenient to carry it on from day to day.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We will consider that on Tuesday.

Mr. FOSTER. We might think that over.

Mr. LAURIER. We could not agree to this at present. I doubt very much whether we could approve of the suggestion because it would interfere with private members legislation, notices of motion, etc. The hon. gentleman is aware that by following the practice of former years, almost the whole of private legislation was thrown over to the following session, and I have heard a great many complaints on that score. The debate had better be adjourned to the usual Government day, Tuesday next, and in the meantime we will think over the matter.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 9.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 6th May, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Hon. Arthur Rupert Dickey, member for the electoral district of the county of Cumberland, N.S., introduced by Mr. Foster and Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.

REPORT.

Annual Report of the Department of Militia and Defence.—(Mr. Dickey.)

INSURANCE ACT.

On the Order for Introduction of Bill to amend the Insurance Act (Mr. Foster), Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I observe on the paper a Bill to amend the Insurance Act. Are any material changes or only slight changes proposed?

Mr. FOSTER. No material change is proposed; the Bill is to alter the time allowed to certain companies for making their returns.

MANITOBA SCHOOL LAW.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I understand the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) asked the leader of the House the other day a question in regard to a return of papers in relation to the Manitoba School law, and pointed out that the judgment in the case of Barrett had not been brought down. If the hon. gentleman referred to the reasons for the decision, I would call his attention to page 2 of the blue-book, which covers all the papers asked for last session. The hon. gentleman will see there that the decision is given in the case of Logan, and the judges say at the end that the same reason applied in the case of Barrett. If the hon. gentleman wants the formal judgment, we can have a copy prepared and laid on the Table of the House.

Mr. LAURIER.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have no desire to obtain the formal judgment, but I wish to see the reasons given. If the reasons are in the blue-book which the hon. gentleman holds in his hand, they do not appear in my copy.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This is last year's blue-book.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I went to Mr. Botterell's office to see if I could get a copy containing the reasons, and was informed that the copy I had was the only one.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No doubt, unless the text was read very carefully, the hon. gentleman would not detect the place where the judgment comes in, as it is continued in the same type as a memorandum which preceded it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I also asked whether the replies of the Supreme Court of Canada or to the questions put to them by the Privy Council could not be laid on the Table.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Those are covered by the address already passed by the House this session.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will they be brought down?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. They will be included.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I take the opportunity of inquiring whether the Minister of Finance proposes to bring down the Supplementary Estimates for the present year, to-night?

Mr. FOSTER. Not to-night.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They were promised for Friday.

Mr. FOSTER. We do not work on Sunday.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They should be forthcoming, unless they are voluminous and extensive.

Mr. DICKEY. Yes; that is the present intention of the Government.

FISHERY OVERSEER, JOSEPH P. KINNEY.

Mr. BOWERS asked, 1. Does Joseph R. Kinney still occupy the position of overseer of fisheries for the western part of Nova Scotia? 2. If not, has he been discharged, or did he resign? 3. Mr. WALLACE. 1. Since 14th March, 1894. 2. Probably. 3. No person has been promised the position.

SIZE OF LOBSTERS.

Mr. BOWERS asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make any change in the law regarding the size of lobsters that may be caught in the waters of the Bay of Fundy this season, in accordance with the prayers of the numerous petitions to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in 1894, and which the petitioners set forth were for the preservation of this fishery?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is not the intention to make any change in the regulation regarding the size limit of lobsters.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS—THREE RIVERS.

Mr. GUAY asked, 1. What is the yearly salary paid to Mr. Benjamin Vanasse as collector of customs at Three Rivers? 2. Is part of the Custom-house building at Three Rivers let as a private residence? If so, to what persons, and what is the amount of the rent? 3. In that case, also, who is responsible for the payment of charges for fuel, light and water rates?

Mr. WALLACE. 1. $1,100. 2. Two rooms in the Custom-house at Three Rivers are occupied by the collector of customs, no rent being paid. 3. No subdivision is made of total payment made by department for fuel, light and water rates of the various departments.

PONTIAC JUNCTION RAILWAY.

Mr. DEVLIN asked, Did the Government receive, in the month of January last, reports or letters complaining of the condition of the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway? If so, what action was taken by the Government?

Mr. HAGGART. The Government did receive a letter from Mr. Pangborn complaining of the condition of the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway. An engineer was despatched over the road to make a further inspection which he did, and reported that though some renewals of ties and timbers in culverts would be required this season, that the road was in a safe condition for traffic.

CONVEYANCE OF MAILS BETWEEN LAKE ETCHEMIN AND STE. ROSE DE WATFORD.

Mr. VAILLANCOURT (Translation) asked, 1. Whether the contract made between the Postmaster General and Joseph Lamontagne for carrying the mail between Lake Etchemin and Ste. Rose de Watford, and commencing on 1st July, 1894, has been cancelled? 2. If so, why has the said contract been cancelled? 3. If the contract has been cancelled, has it been awarded to another person, and were tenders called for? 4. What is the price stated in the new contract?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) 1. The contract made by the department with Joseph Lamontagne for carrying the mails between Lake Etchemin and Ste. Rose de Watford was signed on July 1st, 1894. Later on it was cancelled, after due notice of three months; on December 1st, 1894. 2. This cancellation was for the purpose of allowing the department to accept the offer of a bi-weekly service on the same route, for $75 a year, the contract with Mr. Lamontagne only providing for a weekly service at a cost of $47.50 a year. 3. The contract was awarded to another person without tenders being called for. 4. The price stated in the contract referred to is $75 a year.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY EMPLOYEES AT CHAUDIERE CURVE.

Mr. GUAY asked, How many employees of the Intercolonial Railway at Chaudière Curve, in the county of Lévis, have been discharged since 1st April, 1895? What are their names, and what positions did they hold, and for what reasons were they discharged? Is it the intention of the Railway Department to take them again into its service?

Mr. HAGGART. The services of three employees of the Intercolonial Railway at Chaudière Curve have been dispensed with, since the 1st of April, 1895. Their names are Louis Lemieux, George Demers and Louis Lambert, and they were all employed as car repairers. As there was not sufficient work to warrant employing them, their services were dispensed with. They will be re-employed as soon as there is work for them to do.

THE PRINCESS PIER AT LEVIS.

Mr. GUAY asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to repair, during the summer, the pier called "The Princess Pier" at Lévis? Have tenders been invited for this work? Has the Railway Department already made inquiries of certain parties as to their prices for the timber required for repairing the pier? If so, who are the parties, and what are the prices asked?

Mr. HAGGART.

Mr. HAGGART. It is the intention of the Government to repair, during the summer, the pier called "The Princess Pier" at Lévis. Tenders were invited for the white pine and rock elm; also, for the pine deals required for these repairs. The white pine was awarded to Charles Veilleux, South Quebec, at $22 for twelve pieces, thirty feet long, sixteen inches by sixteen inches; $22 for fourteen pieces, twenty-five feet long, sixteen inches by sixteen inches; $22 for fourteen pieces, twenty feet long, sixteen inches by sixteen inches. The rock elm was awarded to Etienne Dussault, Lévis, at $40 for twenty-five pieces, eighteen feet long, six inches by twelve inches; $40 for twenty-five pieces, twenty feet long, six inches by twelve inches; $40 for forty pieces, six inches by twelve inches, twenty feet and upwards. The pine deals were awarded to John Culligan, Jacquet River, N.B., at $7.50 per thousand feet, board measure. The lowest tender was accepted in each case.

THE ELECTORAL LISTS.

Mr. FRASER asked, Will the Dominion electoral lists be revised during the present year, as required by law?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The lists have been very recently revised, and, for the present, the revision is completed. It is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill during the present session, legalizing the new revision of the lists.

STATISTICS OF IMPORTS.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) asked, The total amounts of dutiable goods imported and entered for consumption up to first days of April, in 1894 and 1895? The amount of duties collected thereon in each year?

Mr. WALLACE. The total value of imports for the nine months ending 31st March, 1894, was $94,341,482; entered for consumption, $86,370,739; amount of duty collected, $15,302,862. The total value of imports for the nine months ending 31st March, 1895, was $80,987,079; entered for consumption, $78,126,603; duty collected, $13,278,856.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Would the House allow me to call the attention of the Controller of Customs to the fact that the question put by my hon. friend has not been answered? What was asked for was the amount of dutiable goods imported.

What the hon. gentleman has given is the amount of goods entered for consumption, which is quite a different thing.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not think the department has a record of that up to date, but if it has, I will bring it down to-morrow.

MCGREGOR'S CREEK, CHATHAM.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron) (for Mr. Campbell) asked, Has the attention of the Government been called to the fact that the sheet piling constructed by the Government on the south side of McGregor's Creek, in the city of Chatham, county of Kent, Ontario, is giving away, and thus endangering the buildings adjoining it? Is it the intention of the Government to have the same repaired at an early date?

Mr. OUIMET. The intention of the department was called to the fact mentioned in the hon. gentleman's question, and the matter is being attended to by the department.

EMPLOYMENT OF CULLERS.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron) (for Mr. Campbell) asked, 1. How many cullers are employed at Montreal and Quebec? 2. Are they paid by fees or salary? 3. What remuneration do they get? 3. Is it the intention of the Government to close up the offices in Montreal and Quebec? If so, what provision will be made for the retiring cullers?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). There are eight square timber cullers and one stave culler at Quebec. There is one general culler at Montreal. The square timber and stave cullers are paid by salary, the general culler by fees. The square timber and stave cullers receive $700 per annum. The general culler's salary, in 1893-94 reached $457.48. To the fourth question, the answer is, yes, in its present form. $200, or less, as length of service and other circumstances may justify.

SUPERANNUATION—PAYMENTS BY CHARLES THIBAUT.

Mr. GUAY (for Mr. Legris) asked, What was the amount paid by Charles Thibault as contribution to the Civil Service superannuation fund, during the years when he contributed thereto?

Mr. FOSTER. The amount paid by Mr. Thibault was $286.79.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

Mr. McCARTHY asked, 1. Whether the Minister of Public Works caused to be published the following despatch in "La Presse" newspaper:—

Ottawa, April 5.—You are authorized to deny, as being absolutely false, the rumour published in the "Herald" that Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper demanded from his colleagues that remedial legislation should be postponed until after the general elections, if such legislation was rendered necessary by the refusal of Manitoba. In the latter case it will be presented with the shortest possible delay in order to secure the passage of it.—J. A. OUIMET.

2. Whether the Minister of Public Works is correctly reported to have said at the nomination at Verchères that:

The Conservative Ministers are unanimous in giving a sequel to the Order in Council to pass a remedial law, not because they are Catholics or Orangemen, but because it is required by the law of the land. That is how we are, we Conservatives. Some have left our ranks, more will leave, but it will not prevent the Government from carrying out its purpose. That is what I had to tell you in the name of my colleagues. You have but one course dictated by duty. If you cannot rise above local or party considerations, you must bear the reproach. If ever there has been a solemn occasion it is the present one, and I repeat my appeal, not for my sake, but for the sake of our country, our race, our language and our institutions. I ask you to forget party ties and to think of your God.

3. Whether, in these statements of the Minister of Public Works, the policy of the Government is correctly announced and defined?

Mr. OUIMET. My answer to the first question is, yes. To the second question I beg to give the following answer:—I did make a speech on nomination day at Verchères, upon the Manitoba school question. I gave a correct history of the whole case, and stated then that the policy of the Government was to be guided by the law and the constitution of the country, and I did ask all to support us in that determination. The policy of the Government was correctly defined in that announcement. If the hon. member for North Simcoe desires further information upon that matter he will get it by a perusal of the divers Orders in Council upon the same subject, and I would specially advise him to read the Minute of Council of the 19th March last, the remedial order of the 21st of the same month, and the speech made in the Senate by the hon. premier on the 22nd April last.

Mr. LAURIER. What about the speech at Verchères?

Mr. McCARTHY asked, Whether, if the remedial order which the Governor General in Council has passed with reference to the Manitoba question is not executed by the legislature of that province, this Parliament will be invested with authority or jurisdiction to pass or enact a law or laws to carry out the decision of the Governor General in Council embodied in the said remedial order?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. As I read that question, it appears to me capable of two constructions—first, as a question of fact, and, second, as a question of law. If it is meant to be a question of fact, it is irregular, and should not be answered, as being a hypothetical question, asking what will happen if something else happens. If it is, as it possibly is, to ascertain the opinion of the Government as to the legal aspect of the matter under certain circumstances, waiving the objection which, perhaps, might apply to hypothetical questions, I would adopt the language used by eminent counsel representing Manitoba in the argument of the Manitoba school case before His Excellency in Council, where he said :

Up to the time of the complaint being made to the Governor in Council, the power is absolute and unlimited, section 1 being eliminated, in the legislature of the province. From the time that the jurisdiction of the Governor in Council is invoked and the time the remedial order is passed, the province still has the power, and still remains with the power from the time that order is disobeyed. If that event should happen—

And here I cannot go the whole length of the learned counsel :

--and we have reason to know from what was said at the opening of the other day, that that event is likely to happen, then there would be concurrent legislative powers until the Parliament of Canada exercised its legislative power.

I think Sir John Thompson spoke of it in his speech as parallel legislative power. I do not know whether my expression or his is the happier, but I think you understand what I mean : in other words, the legislature of Manitoba might, this session, refuse to pass remedial legislation, and then there would be authority, in the Parliament of Canada to pass it, and until the Parliament of Canada passes it, there would still be power in the legislature to pass it. They might repent and pass it the next session, if they please, or even the same session. They might not deal with the matter until this Parliament dealt with it. So that this power and authority, which, I understand, you may, under certain circumstances, exercise, is a power and authority which, under the events which have happened, may arise, and if it does arise, it is a legislative authority to be exercised like any of the other legislative authorities conferred by section 91 of the British North America Act.

CULLERS' OFFICE, QUEBEC.

Mr. LANGEЛИER asked, 1. Is it the intention of the Government to abolish the Cullers' Office at Quebec? 2. If so, is it their intention to grant pensions to the cullers still in the service, and what will be the amount of such pensions? 3. If it is the intention to grant such pensions to the cullers now in the service, do the Government purpose to cause like pensions to be granted to those cullers who were discharged some years ago, when the staff was reduced?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). It is, excepting the supervisor, who will be chief inspector. The Act 52 Victoria, chap. 18, sec. 3, authorizes the reduction of the cullers, and the granting of annuities not exceeding $200. Those struck off previously have been granted annuities as there provided. It is proposed to extend this section to the remainder of the staff, thirteen in number, unless they become inspectors under the Inspection Act.

PAPINEAUVILLE AND CHENEVILLE MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. DEVLIN asked, Who has the contract for the carrying of the mail between Papineauville and Chêneville, in the county of Ottawa? Does the contractor sub-let the contract? What other offices does said contractor hold under the Government? When was the contract for this mail service last given? Were tenders invited? Who tendered, and what was the amount of each tender? Was the lowest tender accepted? If not, why not? When does the present contract expire? Is the present contractor the postmaster of St. André d'Avellin? If so, what salary does he draw as such, and what amount is paid to him as contractor? Is he also the revising barrister of Labelle? If so, how much has been paid to him as such, up to date?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In answer to the first question, Hyacinthe Noé Raby. 2. Contract is not sub-let; service is performed by Mr. Boyer; the contractor has right to employ any suitable person as courier. 3. The Post Office Department has no information on the subject. 4. Contract was last given on 1st July, 1891. 5. Tenders were not invited, as former contract was renewed. 6. 7. 8 and 9. Answered by reply to question No. 5. 10. 30th June, 1895. 11. The contractor is at present postmaster at Ste. André d'Avellin. 12. Salary, including forward allowance, is $256 per annum. 13. Contract rate is $230 per annum. 14 and 15. Post Office Department has no information on these questions. Present contract has been renewed with the existing contractor from 1st July, 1895.

DARNLEY BASIN BUOYS.

Mr. YEO asked, Whether buoys were placed in the channel leading to Darnley Basin, Malpeque, Prince Edward Island, and whether range lights were placed to assist the navigation of said channel during the summer of 1894, as promised? If not, why not? Is it the intention to put buoys and range lights there early in the present season?

Mr. COSTIGAN. In regard to Darnley Basin buoys and lights, the agent of the department at Charlottetown was instructed on the 10th September last to arrange to place a range light to work with the main light on Fish Island, and if it prove satisfactory, four spar buoys are to be placed in the channel. No report has been received from the agent as to whether the range light has proved satisfactory.

SCHEDULING OF CANADIAN CATTLE.

Mr. SMITH (Ontario) moved :

That in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that the Government should engage the services of one or more competent British veterinary surgeons to examine into and report upon the health of Canadian cattle herds, with a view to obtaining such evidence as will convince the British Government that no danger of infection will be incurred by the admission of Canadian cattle into Great Britain without slaughter at the port of debarkation.

He said: Since November, 1892, a great deal of interest has been taken in the scheduling of Canadian cattle in the English market. The embargo not only attracted a great deal of attention in Parliament, but has also aroused a great deal of interest among the dealers and shippers in our own country. As the order was issued late in the season, November, 1892, it was hoped that the representations of our Government, especially of the Agriculture Department of Canada, coupled with the protests made by a number of leading Scotch farmers, would have had the effect of causing the embargo to be removed before the opening of the shipping season. But, from that day to this, notwithstanding all these efforts, it is still maintained, and the representations of our Government and the Scotch farmers made have been received, if not with contempt, certainly with suspicion. Now that the reports of 1894 and 1895 are in the hands of members, I do not intend to delay the House but a very few minutes, but I would like to draw attention to the investigation which took place in 1894 before the Board of Agriculture in England. This board was assisted in their investigations by the Right Hon. Sir Henry James, Q.C., M.P., and Dr. J. Burdon Sanderson, F.R.S., as assessors. They called as witnesses a number of the most eminent veterinary surgeons to be found in that country, and they took evidence upon these six heads of inquiry :

1. The appearances ordinarily present in undoubted cases of pleuro-pneumonia (a) as described in the standard text-books of recognized authority, and (b) as met with in the experience of the witnesses.

2. The appearances present in the "Toronto" and "Mongolian" lungs.

3. The degree of resemblance or of variation as between the appearances of the "Toronto" and "Mongolian" lungs, and the appearances stated to be present in undoubted cases of pleuro-pneumonia.

4. The possibility of error in the differentiation of pleuro-pneumonia from other known lung diseases of cattle.

5. The duration of the disease in the "Toronto" and "Mongolian" cases, and the possibility of its being occasioned by exposure and hardship in transit.

6. The general conclusions of the witnesses as to the nature of the disease in the "Toronto" and "Mongolian" cases.

After taking this evidence, which was somewhat voluminous, they arrived at the following conclusion :—

(1) That there is a close resemblance, amounting to practical identity, between the post-mortem appearances of the "Toronto" and "Mongolian" specimens and those presented in cases of pleuro-pneumonia ; (2) that the approximation of the appearances in those specimens to those presented in the case of pleuro-pneumonia is very much greater than in the case of any of the known diseases affecting the lungs of cattle ; and (3) that none of the appearances recorded in the Canadian cases can be regarded as foreign to pleuro-pneumonia, or as indicative or suggestive of some other disease hitherto unobserved.

If this evidence be looked into, it will be found that some of the most eminent witnesses, notably Professor Macqueen and Dr. Woodhead, gave evidence very contradictory to this conclusion. They believed that the disease was not contagious pleuro-pneumonia. I may say that Sir Charles Tupper, our High Commissioner, asked permission to attend this examination, but he was told by Sir Robert Meade, the permanent Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, that this was not practicable. That, taken in connection with the very strong evidence given by some veterinary surgeons, under examination, point to the fact that the conclusions were arrived at before the evidence was taken. I might further point out that the whole matter was then placed before some of our veterinarians and they arrived at a good deal the same conclusions. I might point out, summarizing this matter, that the Agriculture Department in Canada, taking the evidence as they find it, report as follows :—

(1.) That a disease which appears from lesions in the lungs, to have a particular type alleged by the Board of Agriculture to be pleuro-pneumonia, has been found in the case of about a dozen animals out of 193,860 slaughtered at the port of landing since the fall of 1892 and it may be added out of a total of 1,393,589 neat cattle shipped from Canada since 1880.

(2.) That the persistent and reiterated demand by the Board of Agriculture of the Canadian Government to furnish further information of such disease, based on expert examination of lungs after slaughter of animals, cannot be complied with, for the reason that such disease cannot be found in Canada, notwithstanding diligent and repeated veterinary search, this fact leading to the confident belief that it does not exist in Canada, and to the conclusion that it is absolutely impossible to furnish the Board with any further information in relation to it by the discovery of cases in Canada.

I would like to go on to lay before the House three other clauses of this report :

(9.) That in all the many thousands of Canadian animals slaughtered in the United Kingdom not a single case of old or encysted pleuro-pneumonia has been found, a condition which is believed would be impossible, if the disease, as alleged, prevailed in Canada.

(11.) The conclusion of the Board of Agriculture in their Minute, that such disease exists in Canada and that it is contagious pleuro-pneumonia of a special type, but not different in its "contagious and fatal effects" from the commonly accepted type known in Europe and elsewhere, is altogether irreconcilable with the fact that it cannot be at all found in Canada, and that it has never, in any part of the Dominion, ever been known; that no trace of it even has been nor can be discovered. This declaration is made after very earnest special search by veterinarians employed for that purpose by the Canadian Government.

(12.) That the continuing of the restrictive order requiring the slaughter of Canadian cattle at the port of arrival, for the reason of alleged presence of the disease of pleuro-pneumonia in Canada is not supported, and it is believed cannot be, by any proof of its existence.

I take it that there can be no doubt that the Canadian authorities and the Canadian people generally are satisfied that we have not contagious pleuro-pneumonia in Canada. But, from the course pursued by the Board of Agriculture in England, something more, it appears to me, is requisite. Now, it is true that our Department of Agriculture, in 1892, made an offer to the Imperial authorities asking them, if they considered it advisable,

To send out one or more veterinarians for any further elucidation of the facts, on the authority of persons employed by themselves, the undersigned would advise that the offer made in 1892 be repeated, and that he be authorized to pay their expenses from his department appropriation, applicable to such service.

That was renewed in 1894; but it has not been accepted by the Imperial authorities. So it appears to me that the Department of Agriculture here has used a great deal of diligence in the matter; that they have carefully guarded and looked after our interests so far as our cattle trade is concerned. But it does appear to me that one more step could be taken; that instead of asking the English Government to send out these veterinary surgeons, the department here should choose the most eminent among them, bring them to Canada, and have them go from place to place examining our cattle at the shipping ports and inland shipping points, to go to the farms—to go from one end of this country to the other making a complete examination, slaughtering cattle if necessary, and wherever found necessary. This, it appears to me, would be a rather more aggressive step than any yet taken, and it appears to me that it is about the last step the authorities here can take in order to gain the removal of the embargo placed upon our cattle in 1892. With this object, I move, seconded by Mr. Sproule, the resolution I have placed in your hands.

Mr. SPROULE. I second this motion, not because I imagine that any additional information can be obtained upon this question that has not already been given to the British Board of Agriculture. Nor do I mean, by seconding the resolution, to imply that either the intelligence or integrity of our own veterinary surgeons is defective or that the information they could get would not be as good as might be got by any British veterinary surgeon. I second the motion because I think the step proposed might be taken without any disrespect to our own veterinarians; and it might be taken with the advice and consent of the British Board of Agriculture—because I apprehend that without that it would avail but little—and it might result in convincing them that pleuro-pneumonia does not exist in Canada. I am quite aware of the fact that an offer was made some time ago by our High Commissioner, and the answer was given that it could not be regarded as suitable. I have here the letters that passed, and I find in one of them Mr. Gardner, after discussing the elaborate inquiry by the board when he was asked to allow English and Scotch veterinary surgeons to be associated in the examination there, proceeded:

There would have been no objection to the presence of Sir Charles Tupper or representatives of the cattle trade during the examination, if any desire to that effect had been expressed.

To that the High Commissioner replied:

Mr. Gardner states that I might have been present at the inquiry if any desire to that effect had been expressed. I may remark that I did express a wish to be allowed to take part in the inquiry, but was informed by Sir Robert Meade, the permanent Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, that this was not practicable. Mr. Gardner, in his letter, confirms Sir Robert Meade's statement, and it will be readily understood in these circumstances I must in any case have declined to be present.

In other words, the British Board of Agriculture said it would be out of place for them to allow any outsider to share the responsibility which rested upon them in the discharge of their duty. It was referred to again by the hon. Minister of Agriculture, when he said:

If the Board of Agriculture should consider it advisable to send one or more veterinarians for any further elucidation of the facts, on the authority of persons employed by themselves, the undersigned would advise that the offer made in 1892—

—that was when the first offer was made to the British Board of Agriculture to send out its own veterinary surgeons to make an examination——be repeated, and that he be authorized to pay their expenses from his departmental appropriation applicable to such service.

Now, I have noticed only recently in the newspapers a despatch from England stating that the subject had been under consideration again, and the question was asked in the House of Commons whether Mr. Gardner, the president of the Board of Agriculture had considered the advisability of removing the embargo. His answer was that all efforts heretofore had not been sufficient to convince him that there was no evidence of pleuro-pneumonia in Canada, and, therefore, he saw no reason why they should remove the embargo. It appears to me quite plain from the evidence given then, taken in connection with what has been said on this subject from time to time by the same gentleman, that there is no intention on the part of the Government of removing the embargo, and there is no likelihood of the British Board of Agriculture making that recommendation. I assume it is kept there for the benefit of the English and Scotch farmers, who feel, perhaps, very seriously the keen competition in their lines of trade that was made by the Canadian people before this embargo was placed. I take it to be only another evidence that the British people today are rather in favour of some species of protection, though they may not desire to call it protection for the English farmer, that will prevent the competition which has heretofore existed. Now, I do not wish to imply, by seconding this resolution, any want of confidence in either the ability or the integrity of our own veterinary surgeons, because I believe we have men here of great ability and of as high integrity as any men that can be found in the British Isles. We have men here who have applied themselves to the task as assiduously and as attentively as any men who can be found in any part of the world; therefore, I do not wish to imply any reflection upon them by seconding this resolution. But, as I said before, if the British Government could be induced, with the concurrence and consent of the British Board of Agriculture, or the president of that board, Mr. Gardner, to send out veterinary surgeons of their own selection, who would ascertain the actual facts in relation to this question, and induce them to remove that embargo, I think it would be worth our while to make the attempt.

Mr. MONTAGUE. With regard to the resolution which has just been moved by the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Smith), and so ably seconded by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), I have to say that the Government, as well as the House, are indebted to those hon. gentlemen for the information which they have so carefully prepared, and for the thoroughness with which they have looked into the whole question of cattle embargo. So far as this motion is concerned, the Government, however, have to take this position: We are perfectly satisfied of the healthfulness of Canadian herds; we are absolutely sure that pleuro-pneumonia does not exist among Canadian herds; we are perfectly certain of our position in that regard, and we have demonstrated our willingness and our anxiety, at all times, to have every possible inquiry made by the British Board of Agriculture with regard to the existence of the disease. Ever since 1882, the Government have been anxious that the British Board of Agriculture should select, from the most eminent of their veterinary surgeons, parties to come here and thoroughly examine, with all the skill and scientific knowledge they possess, into the condition of Canadian herds. That offer was not accepted by the British people until 1892; and in the latest memorandum which the Minister of Agriculture prepared for Council, which memorandum was passed by Council, the offer is renewed in these words:

That if the Board of Agriculture of Great Britain should consider it advisable to send one or more veterinarians for any further elucidation of the facts on the authority of persons employed by themselves, the undersigned would advise that the offer made in 1892 be repeated, and that he be authorized to pay their expenses from his departmental appropriation applicable to such services.

It will be seen from that memorandum that the Department of Agriculture in this country have invited the British Board of Agriculture to send their best experts here to examine into the case, that we have not only offered them every facility, but we have offered to pay the whole expenses in connection with their visit. Now, it appears to the Government, and I think that view will be regarded as very reasonable by this House, that an opinion obtained by an examination of our herds by parties appointed by the British Government themselves, would have a great deal more weight than an opinion obtained from even the most skilled surgeons in England, supposing they were selected by the Canadian Government, and their movements were directly under our control. The position of the department is, I say, that we have afforded every facility for the examination of our herds; we claim that these herds are healthful; that it has never been demonstrated that they are not healthy; that it has never been demonstrated that pleuro-pneumonia exists in this country; but that if the British Board of Agriculture pretend to persist in their idea that it does exist, we are anxious to afford their experts, appointed and selected by themselves, every opportunity for the examination of our herds. We are not only still anxious that they should examine our herds, but we are willing to pay the expenses ourselves of such examination. I think, Sir, that the Canadian Government and the Canadian Department of Agriculture cannot be asked to go further. While I appreciate the very good motives which prompted the motion of my hon. friend from South Ontario, seconded by my hon. friend from East Grey, I fancy the House will agree with me that the Government have made the kindest and fairest offer to the British Government in that regard. I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

DISFRANCHISEMENT OF PROVINCIAL OFFICIALS.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis) moved :

That it is expedient to amend the Electoral Franchise Act so that it shall not be lawful for any person to vote at any election for a member or members to represent the people in the Parliament of Canada who, at any time within two years before the day of such election, was an employee or an appointee receiving pay or emolument, a holder of a commission for the expenditure of money, or any one in the receipt of wages, emoluments or payments of any kind, other than for contracts let by tender or public auction, of or from any of the provincial governments of Canada or any department thereof or any authority under them which have enacted or may hereafter enact a disfranchisement, as to the election of members to their legislative assemblies respectively, of employees, appointees receiving pay or emolument of or from the Federal Government.

He said : In making this motion, Mr. Speaker, I am following on the line of the motion submitted during the last session of Parliament. I prefaced my remarks at that time with the assertion that I did not believe in this kind of legislation, this disfranchisement of a British subject in any portion of the Dominion of Canada. I lay that down as a general rule so far as my belief is concerned. But there are circumstances that arise when general rules are not to be regarded, and in order to prove that general rules are right, we must at times have exceptions. I think an exception to that general rule has now arisen from the course of circumstances pursued in the different provincial legislatures throughout Canada. This resolution has not, as some of our newspapers have asserted, necessarily a particular bearing on Nova Scotia alone, but it has a bearing not only on that province, but on Prince Edward Island, Ontario, Quebec and Manitoba, on those provinces that have enacted similar disfranchising legislation. The reasons that have been put forward for enacting such legislation in the different provinces somewhat vary. The legislation in Ontario, I presume—I have heard nothing to the contrary—is that they wanted to protect the civil servant, and to relieve him from any embarrassment pertaining to his office. Perhaps some hon. members from Ontario may know reasons somewhat contrary to that ; but so far as I can learn, that is the reason which prevailed at the time of the passing of the Act for its adoption. While the Act was passed for those generous, those laudable reasons, it worked well for the Government in power, and it came to be used for other purposes. In Nova Scotia the reasons given for its adoption were entirely foreign to all reasons that it was for the protection of the subject. I will quote some of the reasons adduced. In 1871, an Act was passed disfranchising all Dominion officials from voting for members for the Nova Scotia Legislature. The Attorney General of Nova Scotia of that day gave this as a reason for passing the Bill, namely :

Honourable Attorney General said the simple reason for passing the present Bill was that the servant was always under the authority of his master. The man who paid another wages had a right to control his actions as a general rule, and this applied more particularly to persons in subordinate situations, such as the officers in the Custom-house and railway departments and in the other departments mentioned in the Bill. It was for the protection of these men that the Act was passed.

The Attorney General was somewhat canny. He gave that as the reason ; but it was not the real reason, because the Provincial Secretary afterwards gave the true reason that day. The Attorney General continued :

It was assumed that these men were Nova Scotians, and would not wish to be driven to the hustings to vote for Canadian interests against the interests of their own country.

The Bill was intended to protect them from the tyranny of their masters. It was the interest of the country that the House should be swept clean of all Canadian influence. Before the session closed such laws should be passed that every person who had the smell of Canada upon him would be excluded from this House. * * The members of this House would be taught that they could not serve two masters. The Bill would simply prevent any person in the employ of the Canadian Government, which was foreign to this country, from being walked up to the polls and voting whether he liked it or not.

The Provincial Secretary urged, among other reasons, the following :

The Government took it for granted that Dr. Tupper (now Sir Charles) would protect himself for the Dominion election, and in all probability the officers of the local government would be included in the measure passed in the Canadian House. The anti-confederate party were overlooked altogether. If Dr. Tupper could have the power, he would deprive every anti-confederate of a vote.

Mr. LAURIER. Who was Provincial Secretary ?

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). Mr. Vall.

Mr. LAURIER. And who was Attorney General.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). The Attorney General at that time was Mr. Smith, afterwards Judge Smith. That law disfranchising Dominion officials was passed in 1871, and it had a very sweeping effect. It did not affect only a few scattered individuals, but in the different counties in eastern Nova Scotia men were disfranchised by blocks. Where there were Government railways, in the counties of Northumberland, Colchester, Pictou and Halifax particularly, also in Antigonish and Hants, honest electors were disfranchised in blocks ranging from 200 to as high as 600 in the different counties, they being Dominion officials. Had it not been for the enactment of this disfranchising Act, Attorney General Longley, when he ran in the county of Annapolis in 1886, would not have been elected, as he only received a majority of 13 votes, and there were between 30 and 40 Dominion officials disfranchised in that county, while in the county of Halifax the number was as high as 600. Last session I gave a statement showing the railway employees in Pictou and their addresses, who were disfranchised by this Act. In Prince Edward Island, where a similar Act is in force, the disfranchising clauses have a very similar effect, for there is a Government railway in that province employing a very large number of officials, and they are disfranchised in blocks in the different counties, showing that it is not altogether for the benefit of those free and independent electors that those Governments disfranchised Dominion officials, but it is for the purpose of keeping themselves in power in the different provinces. The same condition, to some extent applies in the province of Quebec, and also in Ontario and Manitoba. In Nova Scotia attempts were made to repeal the Act in 1872 and 1882, and long discussions took place with respect to it. The Government of the day stated that it was the wish of the Dominion officials that they should be disfranchised, that they did not wish to vote, that they were in favour of the Government of Nova Scotia, and if they went to the polls they would have to vote as their masters dictated. In order to contradict that view, petitions were prepared and signed by the railway employees, asking the legislature to repeal the Act and give Dominion officials a right to vote as free and independent men, as British subjects; but it was not granted. In 1882, when the Conservatives were in power, it was sought to repeal the Act, and its repeal was carried in the Lower House by a majority of 28 to 7. But when it got to the Upper House, which was by a large majority Liberal, it was thrown out and consequently the Act remained as it is to-day. In 1883, Mr. Townshend, now Judge Townshend, then in opposition, moved to repeal the Act, but Mr. Fielding, the present Premier of Nova Scotia, thought that the proposed amendment would place the officials at the mercy of the Government, and that in many cases they would be compelled to vote against their consciences. Mr. Fielding did not go so far as the Attorney General, who in 1871 said: That everything that had a smell of Canadian about it should be excluded from that House, and Attorney General White at that time said:

The Act preventing officials from voting was passed for the purpose of preventing any undue influences by the Dominion Government.

And it remained, as it was, and it remains so to this day. Then in 1894—that was last session of the legislature of Nova Scotia—this Act was sought to be repealed, and the Liberal Government of the day sought to defend it, and I will quote the reasons given by Attorney General Longley to show why it should be retained on the statute-book. I quote from the debates of the House of Assembly, 1894:

Dr. McKay, leader of the Opposition, moved the second reading of the Bill to amend chapter 4, R. S., of the election of members to the House of Assembly. He explained that the Bill had for its object the removal of the disqualification of Dominion officials in election of members to the House of Assembly. The injustice done to that intelligent and important class of the community was so manifest that it was unnecessary to make any lengthy observations. These citizens contributed largely to the maintenance of public institutions, and were in every way worthy of enfranchisement. There were about 1,500 Dominion officials disqualified from voting under the present provincial law.

I think Dr. McKay is in error there. There are more than 1,500 disqualified; there are over 2,000 disqualified by reason of that law in Nova Scotia. He continued:

Such a disqualification of such a large number of intelligent citizens was almost as bad as disqualifying a whole county.

Then Mr. Longley regretted, and so on, that the motion came up, and he said:

The law in question had been placed on the statute-book as long ago as the year 1870, and had been attended with good results.

No wonder he should think so, because the Attorney General was probably thinking about his election in 1886 when he spoke of the good results that attended the passing of this disfranchisement law. He continued:

This legislature had passed that law after similar steps had been taken by the legislatures of other provinces. The main object in passing the law was to obtain absolute independence between the provincial and federal legislatures.

They quoted the province of Ontario in order to excuse them for passing this Disfranchisement Act.

It was, therefore, proper that the legislature of Nova Scotia should ensure the free and independent action of the electorate.

That is a pet phrase with the hon. the Attorney General of Nova Scotia, "the free and independent action of the electorate," but he is one of the most narrow-minded

Liberals that you will find in the Dominion of Canada. He continued :

The law had worked soundly and well, and none but offensive partisan officials would ask for its repeal.

The matter was very fully discussed then and there were a great many arguments brought up by the members of the Opposition during last session in order to repeal this Act. Mr. Fielding did not go quite so far as the Attorney General in giving his reasons why this Act should be retained on the statute-book.

Hon. Mr. Fielding said that the interference of the Dominion Government in provincial elections was not in itself complained of—

He had some little conscience.

—but it was the method of interference which was justly complained of. When members of the local government took part in federal elections, they discussed Dominion issues, and it was the perfectly legitimate thing for Dominion Ministers to ask the people of any constituency to defeat provincial governments on their provincial policy. But that was not the way the federal Ministers interfered. They stood on the public platform and begged the people to defeat the local government, not upon its policy, but simply because its defeat was, in their opinion, necessary in the interests of the Dominion Government.

I think I will show before I am done, Mr. Speaker, that it was perfectly right and proper for a Dominion Cabinet Minister even to ask the people to defeat the local government, because in defeating the Liberal governments it kept a horde away from the treasury of the Dominion. Mr. Fielding goes on to say :

One of the Dominion Ministers, speaking at Pictou in the provincial campaign last year, said that these provincial elections were of vast importance, because they were the first skirmish to be fought in connection with the federal campaign. * * *

Dominion officials were made to feel that if they voted for the Liberal party, they were placed at a disadvantage, and in all probability an increase of salary would not be given them.

How solicitous he was for the poor Dominion official, as far as his salary was concerned. These, Mr. Speaker, are the reasons given by the Liberals of Nova Scotia for the passing of that Act, and the reasons given by the Liberals of Nova Scotia for the retention of that Act as the law of the province. In 1893 they sought in Prince Edward Island to follow the example of Nova Scotia. In 1892 the resolution was first brought up in the Prince Edward Island House, and it finally culminated in a Bill in 1893. Mr. Peters then was the leader of the Opposition, and he introduced a resolution :

To consider the advisability of passing an Act to amend the Act respecting the elections of members to the legislature, by providing that persons in the employment of the Government of

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis).

Canada shall not be entitled to vote at the election of members of either branch of the legislature of this province.

In the course of a long speech he gave the following reasons for his Bill :—

We are, and we ought to be, complete masters of the situation. We should brook no interference from the authorities at Ottawa. If the Dominion Parliament choose to come down and say we want to reciprocate and take away from the local officials their voice in Dominion politics, let them come down and pass the Act, and I, for one, will say, All right.

He was determined to have no interference from Ottawa whatever, and he cut off all voters who received any pay from the Dominion Government. The Government of Prince Edward Island saw the Government of Nova Scotia and went them one better, so far as the disfranchisement of Dominion employees was concerned. They disfranchised every Dominion official in Prince Edward Island, whereas the Government of Nova Scotia did make some few exceptions, but very few. It is a significant fact to which I would call the attention of the House, that immediately after this sweeping disfranchisement of Dominion officials in Prince Edward Island, the Government of Prince Edward Island imposed a taxation upon the island of over $100,000. They imposed this taxation after disfranchising a large number of these officials. Some hon. members may say : But you are arguing against your own resolution. Well, to a large extent I am. I do not believe in the law ; I believe it is an iniquitous law ; but in order to bring some people to a proper realization of their iniquity, it has to be brought home to them, and in no way can any such iniquity as that be brought home to those people other than by retaliation, and it is an entirely retaliatory measure to which I seek to call the attention of this House to-day. If the reasons given by the Liberals of Nova Scotia in 1871 for the passing of that Act, and the reasons given by the Liberals of Prince Edward Island for the passing of their Act, and the reasons given by the Liberals of Nova Scotia at different times for the retention of their Act were good, then I say the reasons I put forward for the passing of this Act to disfranchise all local government officials are better than good.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Inasmuch as the hon. gentleman argues that those reasons were bad, these are also bad, therefore—

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). Not at all. I will give the hon. gentleman better reasons. I wonder if the members of this House remember the call that was given to Quebec in 1887 by the leader of the Quebec Government of that day. It was a call for a conference at Quebec ; and who attended that conference ? The leaders of the different Liberal Governments throughout the Dominion. Premier Fielding and Attorney Longley were there from Nova Scotia. Sir Oliver Mowat was there. A representation from Prince Edward Island was there.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I beg pardon. Mr. Hodgins was there.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Unfortunately, the Liberals were not in power in the province then, and there is no such man in the island at all as Mr. Hodgins.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). Hudson, then. Is there not a man in the island of the name of Hodgins or Hudson?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. No representation went from the island to the conference at Quebec.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). Perhaps I am wrong; but at all events, that Quebec conference had its effect on Prince Edward Island, as I will show you before I finish. All who were present signed the resolutions of the conference, and they were sent broadcast throughout the country. And what were those resolutions? Instead of giving them in their entirety to the House, I will only quote one portion of them, in order to show the point I desire to make. The reason that conference was called was beyond a doubt because the various Liberal provincial governments wanted to make a great raid upon the Federal treasury. The different Liberal governments had been extravagant. They had spent money and they had borrowed money, and they wanted to cast the responsibility of incurring direct taxation upon other shoulders than their own. They wanted to cast that responsibility upon the Federal authorities, and they entered into a solemn compact—an organized conspiracy, as it were—to assist the Opposition to the Federal Government to obtain the reins of power, when they expected that they would receive certain concessions from Mr. Laurier's Government. They took up the question of the federal subsidies and allowances to the different provinces. The province of Ontario was receiving $1,196,872; by the Quebec conference it was proposed that she should receive $1,778,662. The province of Quebec was receiving $959,252; by the Quebec conference it was proposed that she should receive $1,307,221. Nova Scotia was receiving $380,000; by the Quebec conference it was proposed that she should receive $542,457. New Brunswick was receiving $207,000, and by the Quebec conference it was proposed that she should receive $436,986. The province of Prince Edward Island was receiving $159,762, and by the Quebec conference it was proposed that she should receive $187,112. It was proposed by the Quebec conference that Manitoba and British Columbia should receive $270,000 and $148,000 respectively. Now, they had a solemn conclave with reference to this matter—so solemn that it was largely secret. The speech of Mr. Mercier and the speeches of the other members of the different Liberal governments who were present were not fully reported. Reporters were excluded purposely. It was only certain portions of the speeches that were delivered to the public; but this much has been delivered to the public, that the different provinces should receive large increases in the way of subsidies and allowance from the Federal Government. Although Mr. Peters was not in power at that time, and although there was no representation from Prince Edward Island, yet that province saw the point and took advantage of it at once; for in 1893 what did Mr. Peters do? After he passed the Disfranchisement Act, by which he placed himself in a position to give all the assistance possible towards getting his great Liberal chief, Mr. Laurier, into power, in bringing down his taxation resolutions, he made a speech in which he said:

Note that great convention held at Ottawa last summer, when 2,500 persons from all over Canada met to form a Liberal policy which will carry the party into victory. (Cheers.) What do you think a victory of the Liberal party in Canada would mean to us? It means that this province, which for years has been denied fair-play, would receive it. Not many years ago all the great leaders of the Liberal party met together at the Quebec conference.

Although there was no Liberal delegation at that conference, Mr. Peters took particular care to know what was going there, and to take advantage of the resolution passed by the conference. He went on:

You all remember how they agreed on a scheme which, if carried out, would give to this province a largely increased subsidy. You are aware that we send from this island one of the foremost Liberal politicians of Canada. (Great cheering.) And, when the great change comes, instead of Prince Edward Island being a little unrepresented province, it will have as its champion a man who will fill a place second only to that of the Premier of Canada. (Applause.) We will then receive justice. Questions such as our winter communication and claims of different natures which have been shelved time and again, will be pressed by the man who is always ready to thrust and thrust home.

I trust that time may soon come when all questions of taxation will be looked upon as a thing of the past.

He was then, you will understand, proposing to a large extent direct taxation:

Or, if you are taxed again, it will be for something which has not yet entered into our minds. Gentlemen, I ask, are the people of this island ready to fight once more the great battle of Liberalism, when the Liberal party shall be triumphant and the question of taxation which I have brought before you to-night, shall have become a thing of the past?

You will see, Mr. Speaker, that there was in his mind at the time the desire of the return of the Opposition to power in the Federal Parliament, in which case there would be no need to tax the province of Prince Edward Island, because she would then be the recipient of a largely increased subsidy from the Federal Government; so that notwithstanding how deeply the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) may deplore that these shreds and patches of the maritime provinces have cost a mint of money to the Federal Government, still, when his leader comes into office, he will have to submit to this policy, he will have to support the raid on the Dominion Treasury on behalf of little Prince Edward Island, and come down handsomely with an increased subsidy. Mr. Peters, although he was not at the Quebec conference and although he did not send a Liberal delegate to that conference, was not slow to see the advantages that were held out by it to Liberalism in Prince Edward Island, and took care to thrust and thrust home himself, under cover of this promise of Mr. Mercier and the other delegates at the conference. What occurred immediately afterwards? In the year 1891, we had an election. Although a great many Liberals attended the Quebec conference, all the Liberals in Canada were not there; and some of the Liberal leaders in the maritime provinces were not prepared to risk everything on that election in order to get their party into power in the Dominion, and insisted on obtaining an explicit promise that the resolutions of the Quebec conference would be adhered to. What was the result? We have heard of a telegram to this effect having been sent by Mr. Mercier to Mr. Laurier: "My support depends on your answers to this." and of Mr. Mercier receiving this reply: Mr. Laurier has accepted the resolution of the Interprovincial conference and has promised to give effect to them when he comes into power. The Attorney General and the Premier of Nova Scotia got their reply. Mr. Peters got his reply. And like the Assyrians, we heard them:

Coming down like a wolf on the fold,
And their cohorts were gleaming with purple and gold.

And although that may not be strictly applicable to the Liberals who came down in the election of 1890, we know that they came down in 1891 with their paper and gold and did their best to return to power Mr. Laurier and the present Opposition. The whole cry was that the depleted treasury of the different Liberal Governments should be reimbursed and again made solid by the carrying out of the resolutions of the Quebec conference. Mr. Peters put himself in the direct way of gaining all the advantage he possibly could by reason of the Quebec conference. Now, if there is wanting any good reason for passing a law to curtail the power in federal politics of the different Liberal governments, I think I have given it here. They have pledged themselves to make a direct onslaught on the federal chest as soon as they get into power. Outside altogether the retaliatory portion of my resolution, I contend that there are direct good and valid reasons why we should protect our country from the onslaughts of these people.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You cannot get anything out of the chest now.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I do not wish to make any extended remarks upon this matter. I have shown the object of my resolution and believe that I have shown its title to the favourable consideration of this House; and if it be favourably considered, I expect to introduce a Bill founded upon it during the session.

Mr. McISAAC. It is rather strange that the first hon. gentleman to place himself on record in direct opposition to the advice given by the hon. Finance Minister in his Budget speech is the hon. member for Annapolis, who has just spoken. The Finance Minister deprecated the idea of our making any attacks upon gentlemen outside of this House. The hon. member for Annapolis is the first one to offend against this counsel by making an attack on the Provincial Secretary and the Attorney General of Nova Scotia. For the last thirteen years the hon. member and his associates in Nova Scotia have been making daily attacks upon these two gentlemen; and the net result of their efforts has been that at every election during that period these two gentlemen have obtained increased majorities in almost every constituency in the province. The hon. gentleman has told us that if the measure he now proposes had been law, the Attorney General would not, in 1886, have been returned in Annapolis, which means that Dominion officials must vote Tory. But he forgot to tell us that two elections have since been held and that the Attorney General of Nova Scotia was returned for Annapolis in each of these elections by a largely increased majority. He also forgot to tell us that there have been three elections in Nova Scotia since 1882, and that on every occasion Mr. Fielding and Mr. Longley and the Liberal Government of that province obtained the increased confidence of the electorate, including the county represented by the hon. gentleman himself. He has stated that the result of this Bill is the disfranchisement of hundreds of people in some counties of Nova Scotia. But he has forgotten to tell us that the result of the proposal that he lays before this House will be not merely to disfranchise hundreds but to disfranchise, probably, twenty-five per cent of the voters in the province of Nova Scotia. The Act disfranchising Government officials in the province of Nova Scotia was passed in 1871, as the hon. gentleman has stated. He would have this House believe that the object of passing that Bill in Nova Scotia at that time and continuing it ever since was hostility to the Conservative Government in power at Ottawa. But he forgot to tell you that, for five years there was a Liberal Administration under the late Alexander Mackenzie in this Dominion, during which time there was also a Liberal Administration in the province of Nova Scotia; yet during that time the legislature of Nova Scotia never raised its hand to repeal the Act; thus clearly showing that the object and intention of the Nova Scotia Liberals was to keep the Act on the statute-book, regardless of whether a Liberal or a Conservative Government might rule at Ottawa. The hon. gentleman has also stated the fact that during the time when the Conservatives were in power in Nova Scotia from 1878 to 1882—and be it remembered that only during these four years has a Conservative Government been in power in Nova Scotia at any time since confederation—a Bill was passed by the Assembly to repeal this Act of the Nova Scotia Legislature, but it was thrown out in the Legislative Council. That is quite true. But the hon. gentleman has forgotten to tell this House that that Bill was introduced by a private member, and that it was passed by the Assembly in the last year of the administration of a Conservative Government as stated by the hon. member. If this Act was regarded as such an iniquitous measure, is it not strange that an Administration led by Mr. Holmes and the late Sir John Thompson would allow four years to pass and never introduce a Bill to repeal it, and that it should be left to the last year of the Administration for a private member to introduce such a Bill, only to have it thrown in the Council? Why did not the Government, during these four years, introduce it as a Government measure? It is well known to everybody that a Bill introduced by the Government would win far more consideration than one introduced by a private member. Is it not strange also that though, during these four years of Conservative rule, only the one attempt was made to repeal this Act, and that during the last session of the Administration, almost every session since then, the Liberals being in power, the Opposition have tried to repeal the Act? Does not this show that they did not really want to repeal it. The hon. gentleman has also forgotten to say that that Act disfranchises provincial as well as Dominion officials. Let me read the clauses of the Bill:

It shall not be lawful for any person to vote at an election for a member or members to represent the people, in the General Assembly of this province, who at any time within fifteen days before the day of election was in the receipt of wages or emolument of any kind as an employee in the Post Office, the Custom-house, the Inland Revenue Department, the Lighthouse service, on the Government Railways, in the Crown Lands or the Local Public Works and Mines.

Nothing in this Act shall be construed to extend to any elector who may have contracted to furnish materials of any kind for the Government railroads or to perform any other specific contract in respect of the same, or to any person who may have been employed by the day temporarily to repair the railroads, or to any way office keeper or mail courier under the Post Office.

But what is the nature of the hon. gentleman's resolution?

That it is expedient to amend the Electoral Franchise Act so that it shall not be lawful for any person to vote at any election for a member or members to represent the people in the Parliament of Canada who at any time within two years before the day of such election was an employee or appointee receiving pay or emolument, a holder of a commission for the expenditure of money, or any one in the receipt of wages, emoluments or payments of any kind, other than for contracts let by tender or public auction, of or from any of the provincial governments of Canada or any department thereof or any authority under them which have enacted or may hereafter enact a disfranchisement, as to the election of members to their legislative assemblies respectively, of employees, appointees receiving pay or emolument of or from the Federal Government.

You will see the distinction between these two. The hon. member for Annapolis says that the Bill which he proposes is a retaliatory measure. And so it is. The hon. gentleman from his standpoint asks this House to accept the infamous proposition that two wrongs make a right. He has attacked in every mood and tense the Nova Scotia law which disfranchises certain officials of this and of the provincial governments, or others who are in government employ fifteen days before the election, and he asks us to agree in the disfranchisement of every man who is employed by the local government in any capacity whatever at any time within two years before the election. If a man has a five or ten dollar road commission in any part of Nova Scotia, or earns one dollar within two years of the election according to this proposal, he is to be disfranchised, and this the hon. gentleman proposes to do, forsooth, for the purpose of retaliation. I certainly shall be surprised to learn that there may be found in this House one hon. gentleman who will go to the extent of endorsing the proposition the hon. gentleman has laid before us. Sir, there is another point. The officials of the province of Nova Scotia are not partisan appointees, as are the officials of this Government.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McISAAC. Hon. members may laugh. I will give them time to laugh and then I will explain. And more, I will give names. The chief officials of the Nova Scotia Government, as of the Government at Ottawa, are the officials in the several departments. I can name the principal officials in the province building at Halifax, and I believe that I can show that notwithstanding that a Liberal Government has been in power ever since confederation, with the exception of one period of four years, and that it has held power uninterruptedly for the last thirteen years, a majority of the deputy heads of the departments are today Conservatives, and if the hon. gentleman challenges me, I will give names now. In the Department of the Commissioner of Works and Mines, Halifax, Mr. Gilpin, the Deputy Commissioner, is a Conservative. In the Department of the Attorney General, who has been attacked by the hon. member for Annapolis, the Deputy Crown Lands Commissioner, the highest official in the department, is Mr. Austin, a Conservative. The Queen's Printer, Mr. R. T. Murray, is a Conservative. The first assistant clerk in the Provincial Secretary's office is a Conservative. The Provincial Engineer of the province of Nova Scotia is a Conservative—at least he is claimed by them as much as by the Liberals. The Secretary of Agriculture, Dr. Lawson, is a Conservative. The deputy in the Education Department, in the province of Nova Scotia, is a Conservative, and the last appointment, and one of the most important in the gift of the province, that of Superintendent of Education, went to a Conservative.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). They could not find a Liberal fit to fill the place.

Mr. McISAAC. They could find scores of good men, but the Government honestly believed that the present incumbent was the best man available. The new superintendent comes from a county represented by the Minister of Justice, and those acquainted with Nova Scotia politics, know what a Pictou County Tory is. This is one of the most important positions in the gift of the Government. It is filled, and, I may say, well filled by the present superintendent, who is a Conservative. If the Nova Scotia Government were of the character the hon. member for Annapolis would have us believe, they would certainly have filled this and other important positions from the ranks of their own party and would not retain Conservatives in positions. Should the hon. gentleman's resolution pass and be followed by the Bill which he proposes to base upon it, for my part, I shall fear it very little. Of the officials whom it would disfranchise, there are about as many Conservatives as Liberals. But it is the avowed principle of the thing, and because of the principle, retaliation, I oppose it.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). How about the principles of the local Bill?

Mr. McISAAC.

Mr. McISAAC. That Bill was enacted in 1871, it has remained upon the statute-book up to this time, and the friends of the hon. gentleman in Nova Scotia, when they were in power, and when they were out of power, were not able to wipe that law off the statute-book, because it was considered by the great majority of the people of Nova Scotia, as well as by the officials themselves, to be a law in their interest. Sir, there may be one good result from this resolution, if it passes, it may relieve the Government of some embarrassment. Sometimes they get into conflicts with the provincial governments when they happen to be Liberal. This proposed amendment is a retaliatory measure; the hon. member for Annapolis asks this Parliament to pass a retaliatory Act to compel the Nova Scotia Legislature to repeal their Act. Did it ever occur to him that this is a game that two can play at? That if this Parliament does pass such an Act, the legislature of Nova Scotia, the legislature of Prince Edward Island, and the legislatures of all the other provinces can retaliate? And when they do retaliate to the extent that he proposes in this Bill, and disfranchises every Dominion official and employees who, within two years of an election, get a dollar from the Dominion Government for any service, how, then, will the friends of the hon. gentleman in Nova Scotia and elsewhere, find themselves placed? I ask him, therefore, to look at the question in this light, and see how it strikes him. But it may be a precedent which the Government may find very convenient when they get into a conflict with a provincial government. It would be a good lever for compelling the provincial governments to get down on their knees and do the bidding of this Government, although it might conflict in some respect with what is termed provincial rights. It may be that the Dominion Government would like a pretext for withholding subsidies from the province of Manitoba, or from some other province, until this Act were repealed by the legislatures of those provinces, or, perhaps, until Manitoba, for instance, would pass remedial legislation. That would be a grand idea on the part of the Dominion Government, and I think that is the only merit, if it be one, that is possessed by the proposition of the hon. member for Annapolis. I say again, that this Bill of which the hon. member for Annapolis complains, has not created any trouble in Nova Scotia in the past, and it is useless for him to come into this House and attack the Attorney General and the Provincial Secretary of Nova Scotia. Similar attacks upon them in the province itself have been, heretofore, futile, and I assure him that any attack which he or his friends may make upon those gentlemen, either in this House or out of Nova Scotia, will be just as harmless and just as futile as similar attacks have been when addressed to the electors of Nova Scotia in the province itself.

Mr. TISDALE. I am somewhat surprised by some of the remarks made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, in accusing the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) for attacking hon. gentlemen who are not members of this House. Surely the hon. gentleman, as an old parliamentarian, at all events, ought to know that the hon. gentleman for Annapolis has followed the fair spirit of public discussions in this House, in reading quotations from the speeches of the hon. gentlemen to whom he alluded, giving their reasons for passing the law he was attacking. Now, if that is unfair, if that is improper, it shows how hard pressed the hon. gentleman must have been in attempting to answer the remarks of the hon. member for Annapolis in introducing this Bill. I leave it to the good-sense and good judgment of both sides of the House now—because I wish to be fair in regard to this part of the subject—because it is rather a serious thing to charge a member on either side of the House with being unfair or attacking anybody outside of the House, and particularly members of another legislature. Now, I say that the hon. member for Annapolis was not only in order, not only was he extremely courteous, but he quoted fairly, and confined himself entirely, so far as those gentlemen were concerned, to the statements upon which he based his motion. It is true that he went further than that, and named them, but I think he was moderate in his deductions as to the objects which underlie the legislation which they had been instrumental in passing. That is quite a different thing from an attack upon the hon. gentlemen themselves. He was neither personal, nor was he unfair, even in a political sense. So much for that. Now, as I understand the hon. gentleman, one of the strong parts of his attempted defence—because I must confess that I was disappointed at a gentleman coming from Nova Scotia who had not a better defence, if the law is defensible at all—one of the strongest points he attempted to raise, was the prevention of interference by politicians or supporters of either the local or federal Government, in elections; that is, he contended that the legislation was defensible for the reason that it prevented employees of the general Government from interfering in local elections. Now, if the legislation was of a nature fairly to ensure that, it would satisfy the minds of reasonable men that that was the intention of the legislature, and there would be a good deal in that point. But I have to tell him—and I have to admit that I know little of the provinces down by the sea—that up in Ontario the effect of any legislation passed by the local House has not been of that character; and I have some evidence in my hands that proves the contrary. I suppose that all the members here from the province of Ontario know a gentleman named Preston, who used to be a capital political organizer for the Liberal party in Ontario, a very able one, they claim, but, on our side, we claim not a very scrupulous one. Lately, they have had to call another gentleman to take his place, because he has been given the position of Librarian in the Ontario Government buildings. I know the position he holds, because a letter I am about to read is written on a sheet of paper, headed, Legislative Library, Ontario. The letter is as follows:—

Toronto, Feb. 13, 1895.

My dear ———,—It is strange that a letter came from you this morning on the very subject that I intended writing you about to-day, that is, South Renfrew in the Commons. I am writing in the strictest confidence, of course. How would Peter Ryan run in that riding? You know what kind of a speaker Peter is. He addressed a meeting there, I think, in the MacIntyre contest. He would create great enthusiasm, as he is a most enthusiastic fellow in every sense. Think this over, and drop me a line, or, if you find a feeling at all in favour of such a candidate, write him direct, but do not mention my name in connection with the suggestion. You know that if a prominent Irish Catholic is elected in Ontario at the approaching elections, if Laurier should carry the country, and the prospects are excellent, he would be in the new Cabinet. Drop me a line.

Yours in haste,

W. T. R. PRESTON.

That shows, at all events, the practical effect which can be claimed for such legislation as this so far as it affects Ontario. I am not going to enlarge upon this matter, because very little evidence speaks more convincingly than a great deal of talk. The hon. gentleman claims that the majority of the Attorney General of Nova Scotia had been increasing ever since he got into power. If he has conducted himself on the lines of the legislation that got him into power, no wonder need be felt if he has increased his power; but the hon. gentleman who addressed the House did not attempt to answer the argument of my hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Mills), that it was through this Act to which objection has been taken that the Attorney General secured power. My hon. friend's statement could not be contradicted; the hon. gentleman did not attempt to contradict it, for it is well known that, while the Attorney General had a majority of only 13 or 14 votes, the provincial government had disfranchised 30 or 40 Dominion employees in the district which elected him.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What was his majority at the last election?

Mr. TISDALE. What has that got to do with it ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Between 200 and 300.

Mr. TISDALE. That has no bearing on the issue, and is simply evading the point. In fact, it is difficult to keep hon. gentlemen opposite on the point under discussion. I propose to keep them to the point.

Mr. FRASER. Does that mean, then, that every Dominion official will vote Tory ?

Mr. TISDALE. It does not always follow. The government of the province would not, however, disfranchise them unless they thought Dominion officials would vote Tory. That, of course, is human nature. However, I say that is no argument in reply to what the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) has put forward. The hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac) suggested—and I suppose it was true, because no doubt the hon. member knows what he is talking about—that the local Government was all the time appointing Conservatives to positions. Well, I do not know what kind of Conservatives they may be, but I admit there are weak-kneed Conservatives as well as weak-kneed Reformers, and one way of getting such people over is to appoint them to positions, and thus increase the strength of the Government. I am not saying that all Conservatives are like that, for I know to the contrary ; but the hon. gentleman's statement, that all the time the local Government has been increasing their power, without giving an explanation of the fact, made it appear as if the politicians were somewhat different by the sea than they are in Ontario.

Mr. FRASER. Hear, hear.

Mr. TISDALE. If the hon. gentleman's statements are correct, it must be so, because never in my experience in Ontario have I heard of the Liberal Government appointing any one to office except a member of its own party, and that is accepted as fair politics. So boasting as he did that the Liberal Government of Nova Scotia were appointing Conservatives all the time, it was difficult to understand how they could increase their majority, if, as it is alleged, the majority has been increased. The hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac) also boasted that when Mr. Mackenzie came in power he did not change the law. If there had been nothing else but the fact that this extraordinary action had been taken within a year by his own Liberal friends, that would have been sufficient to prevent action on his part. I desire now to draw the attention of the House to some points which the hon. member forgot to state. He forgot to tell the House his own opinion of the law, or to give it any arguments justifying such a law. On the last occasion when my hon. friend from

Mr. TISDALE.

Annapolis brought up this resolution. I told him I was not prepared to support it, and when he happened to speak to me to-day on the subject I said I had not made up my mind about it, because I said that at all events he should give people a 'locus penitentiae' before passing a law on a principle hard to justify, that is, to pass a law compelling people by force, if you cannot do it by other means, to do what you believe to be right. I hold that only exceptional circumstances will justify such a course, but I must confess that after what I have heard to-day, which is the first occasion on which the whole circumstances have been laid before the House, when it was stated that hundreds and even thousands of people were disfranchised, people who were not officials in the ordinary sense of the term, but who happened to obtain employment from the Government in two great provinces controlled by the Liberals, I have entirely changed my mind. I think, under these circumstances, we would not be doing our duty to British freemen if we did not say that this Nova Scotia law should be repealed—I will not say so much about the Ontario law, because that legislation is not so sweeping in its character, although I object to it, as only Dominion officials are disfranchised. In the lower provinces, however, any one who is employed, and has to earn his bread and butter and support his family through the Dominion Government, is disfranchised, and thereby one of the rights and privileges of a freeman is taken from him. Hon. members talk about provincial rights ; but what sort of provincial rights are they when citizens of a province are not allowed to exercise their constitutional liberties of voting on provincial matters because they have accepted employment under the federal Government ? I appeal to every fair-minded Liberal to repeal this Act and come, if necessary, to their relief by passing even what I consider very objectionable legislation, and such as only extreme circumstances would lead me to favour. Let the provincial Act of Nova Scotia be toned down so as to go only to the limit of the Ontario Act, and I will not support the proposed Bill ; but to say that whole townships or little villages of employees in the service of the Dominion Government shall be disfranchised, is doing an act of violence to the constitution. This course should be taken by whatever government is in power ; although the Conservative Government is in power to-day, I admit the Liberals are acting the part of critics as well and as honestly as politics can be administered, and if hon. gentlemen opposite get into power, we promise them that we will take care that the Liberal Government shall carry out this policy, and if they fail, we will endeavour to make them do so. It is a reflection on our institutions to say that we cannot protect the rights of Dominion voters, and that we cannot prevent them being coerced under our ballot system. Coercion cannot be applied under our ballot to any great extent. So I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite to join with hon. members on this side of the House in seriously considering whether this blot should be allowed any longer to remain on the legislation in connection with two or three provinces of the Dominion, and whether this Parliament should not exercise all its constitutional powers to come to the relief of the people so affected. It was not fair for the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac)—and this was the only point made in his speech—to call this a measure of retaliation, because we have never shown any spirit of that sort in our federal legislation. The provinces commenced it. We in this Parliament have greater powers than the provinces, but the less the power of a self-governing body the more tenacious they should be of their rights. I am glad that the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) has taken considerable trouble to expose to the House this state of things, because I had no idea until to-day that the franchise was so restricted and warped in some of those provinces. I had not an idea that this—I hardly know what word to apply to it, but I will call it confiscation—I had no idea that this confiscation of the rights of men who ought to vote prevailed to such an extent. I ask the Liberal party in this House in all kindness and sincerity to use their influence with their friends to prevent this state of things and to save the federal Parliament the necessity of taking such action, as I believe will be rendered necessary in time to come. I hope that we shall not be obliged to pass such legislation in this House, but at all events we should go the full length the constitution allows us, to compel this blot to be removed from the franchise legislation of the provinces.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The name of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tisdale) has been frequently mentioned of late as an aspirant for a position which I think he may legitimately aspire to, namely, a seat in the Cabinet. I do not know what the hon. gentleman made this preliminary canter for, or whether he hoped it would justify his promotion in the eyes of the leader of the House, but certainly I am compelled to say that he has somewhat sunk in the esteem of many who had a very good opinion of him before. What is the highest idea of statesmanship announced by the hon. gentleman? What does he recommend this House to do? He asks us to copy certain legislation enacted by certain legislatures of the provinces, and which legislation in the very same sentence he declares to be vicious and immoral. Why, I was astonished at the hon. gentleman. He rose in his place first and he said: that although he had been privately canvassed by the hon. member (Mr. Mills) to vote for this resolution, yet such was his abhorrence of its anti-British character that he felt himself impelled to say that he could not bring himself down to a standard sufficiently low to vote for it. Then the hon. gentleman says: When I come to consider the matter over, I think I will adopt the lex talionis and vote for it; and he says further: Because they have done a wrong down there to some people of the same political stripe as I am I will be prepared to advise Parliament to do a greater wrong to a larger number of people of the opposite stripe. Sir, that is the hon. gentleman's view of statesmanship. I do not think that any honourable man in this House treats this resolution seriously. The hon. member who moved it intimated as much himself when he said that he hardly expected that it would be passed.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I did not say any such thing.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understood the hon. gentleman—

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I beg your pardon. I am strictly in earnest with reference to it, and I want that to be distinctly understood.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have no doubt, from what I know of the hon. gentleman, that if he could not only disfranchise every Liberal office holder, but every Liberal in the province, he is prepared to do it. Why, Sir, that hon. gentleman does not think that a Liberal has a right to vote—

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). That is a personal attack which I repudiate entirely.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Well, I accept the hon. gentleman's repudiation. He would, I presume, like to let a few Liberals vote just for the name of the thing; but he would like to disfranchise sufficient of them to enable him to be returned always by Act of Parliament, and not by the vote of the people.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). That is not so. Some of my best friends are Liberals.

Mr. LANDERKIN. But they won't stay so now.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). Yes, they will.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will not consider whether these provincial Acts are justifiable or not. One has to know the local circumstances under which they were passed in each province before one can pass an opinion on them. I do not think it is necessary for this Parliament to take into review the legislation of the several provincial parliaments upon subjects strictly within their proper purview, or to determine whether they were wise or not in passing them. I may remark, however, en passant, that one of the reasons advanced in Prince Edward Island for the passing of the Act, whether a good reason or a bad one, was that they had not the Ballot Act in that province. There was open voting there, and with the Dominion Government possessing the control of a trunk line of railway 210 miles in length, and employing a great many hundreds of men, it was said that these men having to vote openly were not their own masters, and that they were marched up in platoons, and compelled to vote for the Conservative candidate whether they wished it or not. That was the argument advanced in Prince Edward Island, and a large number of the men themselves desired to be relieved of the invidious position into which they were forced on account of the fact that there was open voting and that they could not exercise the franchise freely. To my knowledge no expression of opinion by way of petition or otherwise—if I am wrong I should be glad to be corrected—has ever come from any portion of these men complaining of any wrong done to them.

Mr. CURRAN. Why did they not pass a Ballot Act, then?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I wish they would. When I had the honour of leading in that province I did pass a Ballot Act, but when the Conservative party came into power they repealed it. That is the answer I give to the Solicitor General.

Mr. CURRAN. That is retaliation.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That may be the hon. gentleman's idea. I want to show him that the Liberal party in Prince Edward Island carried a Ballot Act, and for years that Act was in force and the people voted under it. They had the same liberty to vote and to maintain the secrecy of their vote as they have in the Dominion elections, but the Conservative party came in, and for reasons of its own made the voting open, and the consequence was that an inordinate proportion of the voters were compelled to vote openly at the risk of losing their places, and, rightly or wrongly, the Liberals passed this Act to remedy what they thought was a grievance. My hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Mills) took quite a length of time reading to the House the proceedings of the Quebec conference, and certain comments made upon it by my friend Mr. Peters, of Prince Edward Island, and by, I think, Mr. Fielding. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) hardly, I think, exercised that wisdom and prudence which generally characterizes him when he undertook to administer a castigation to a gentleman who was an opponent of his, and between whom and he there is now a thousand of miles of distance. I have a suspicion, Mr. Speaker, that when the Attorney General of Nova Scotia is present my hon. friend (Mr. Mills) is not so free in the use of his expletives as he was to-day when he referred to Mr. Longley. The Attorney General of Nova Scotia is prepared to take care of himself and to justify his conduct in the legislature, and I think he does so in a way satisfactory to himself and to his constituents. The hon. member from Annapolis (Mr. Mills) read in the House language used by the Premier of Nova Scotia away back in 1871, and remarks made by the Attorney General of Nova Scotia, twenty-four years ago; a gentleman who is long since dead and gone to his last resting place, and the hon. member (Mr. Mills) asked us to form some conclusion because these remarks were uttered antagonistic to the confederation of the provinces. Why, Sir, we all know that at that time there was a very bitter feeling existing in Nova Scotia with reference to the way it was legislated into the union, and I am not surprised at all at the language then used by the Attorney General of the day. But we have nothing to do with that here now. I thank the hon. gentleman from Annapolis (Mr. Mills) for one thing. He has a correct appreciation of the speech which was delivered by the leader of the Government in Prince Edward Island. Mr. Peters pointed out that which a great many believe, namely, that when the Liberals do come into power, if they ever do, Prince Edward Island will then be treated properly and get that which has long been denied it; which is justice. Mr. Peters has expressed that in eloquent and strong language, and so far as the extract which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) read from the speech of Mr. Peters is concerned, proving that when the Liberals get into power, not only Prince Edward Island, but all the provinces would get justice, I am in accord with him. It was the best part of the speech of the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills). I hope he will give it a very wide circulation, and that the sentiment which he has quoted will find a resting place in the bosoms of very many electors. If that should occur, we will get justice then and we will be prepared to administer the same lex talionis to them in return.

Mr. CURRAN. With regard to the speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies, P.E.I.), who has just addressed the House, and also the speech of the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac) as was well observed by the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale): both these gentlemen avoided expressing any opinion upon the spirit of the legislation passed by the provinces, or as to whether it was proper legislation or not. These hon. gentlemen have very carefully avoided stating their own views, and I think they were very wise in taking that course, because it is not difficult to find the opinions of the very best Liberals in this country upon that subject. These opinions are upon record in this Parliament, and no less a distinguished man than the late Sir A. A. Dornon, when a member of this House and Minister of Justice said, speaking in 1874:

With the ballot I do not see why public officials should not vote; with the ballot every one should vote.

And when this question was brought up in the local legislature of Quebec, when the Liberal government, under Mr. Mercier, or what was supposed to be the Liberal government, brought in a Bill for the purpose of disfranchising a large number of persons, the best Liberals in the House rose to oppose that legislation, amongst others, Mr. Lareau, the author of a history of constitutional law in Canada, a gentleman who is well known and highly respected by both Liberals and Conservatives in the older provinces: Mr. Lareau made a speech, in which he challenged the wisdom and the fairness of such legislation, and emphasized, as follows, the doctrines of the Liberal party:—

They were face to face with an electoral reform. They had to decide yes or no whether a large number of honourable men should be deprived of the right to vote. It was said it would be better for the employee, while others pretended it had been tried in other assemblies and created trouble. Again, had the promoters of this Bill been requested by these employees to deprive them of voting? He did not know, but did not think so. He concluded by quoting a number of authorities opposed to restricting the right of voting to any class of citizens.

I rose, Mr. Speaker, just to point out that the doctrine of the Liberal party preached by those held in the highest esteem by the Liberals of this country, has always been opposed to the spirit of the legislation which the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac) has sought to defend to-day, without giving his own views on the subject.

Mr. CASEY. What are your views?

Mr. CURRAN. My views are that every man should vote under the ballot.

Mr. CASEY. I am glad to see the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) so emphatically sat upon by the Solicitor General. If the hon. member for Annapolis has really meant his motion, or anything else, except a little "hifalutin" for the approaching elections, he must now feel himself entirely extinguished by the truly Liberal dictum, derived from the Liberal party, which has been laid down by his friend, the Solicitor General. The hon. member for Annapolis has already given his whole case away, for he not only argued against the principle of the Bill throughout, but he told us at the end of his speech, that he had made those remarks for the purpose of letting the House understand what the object of this motion was, and I think we clearly understood its object before he got through. The object of the motion was to attack the Liberal Government of Nova Scotia, and, in particular, the Attorney General, Mr. Langley. The hon. member compelled us to believe that he was seriously afraid that Mr. Longley might desert the local legislature, and take the field against himself in the county of Annapolis.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I am willing to meet him at any time.

Mr. CASEY. My hon. friend from Annapolis says that some of his best friends there are Liberals. That may have been the case before this discussion took place; but, after the speech of the hon. member and after the rebuke administered to him by his own leader, I think they cannot be his friends any longer, consistently, with any sense of self-respect. The arguments, as I have said, have all been against the course which the supporters of the hon. member for Annapolis have urged us to take. But too many may run away with the impression that this Bill refers only to Nova Scotia. I would call the attention of the House to the fact that if this matter were seriously before us, it would apply to the province of Ontario as well as to Nova Scotia, although in Ontario for local purposes. The only officials disfranchised are judges, Customs officers, postmasters in cities and towns, and excisemen. That would be sufficient to bring Ontario within the list of provinces which would be affected by the hon. gentleman's proposition, if it became law. His proposition would have a further effect that has not yet been pointed out by any one whom I have heard; it would disfranchise not only civil servants of the different provinces, but all members of the provincial legislatures: for his proposal is to disfranchise any one in the receipt of emoluments or payments of any kind, other than for contracts let by tender or public auction. Would the hon. member like to see his friends in the local legislatures disfranchised? Perhaps he would; but I am sure his friends would not. My hon. friend from South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) gave us some startling information in regard to the state of things in Nova Scotia, which we had not before. He said there were whole townships and villages of Dominion employees in that province who were disfranchised by this local Act. I really did not think things had got to such a pass as that in Nova Scotia. We have heard something about Pictou Tories, and about the lavish use of patronage down there; but I never imagined before that there were whole townships of officials. Perhaps the hon. gentleman had been slightly misinformed. But, to close my reference to this serio-comic effusion of the hon. member for Annapolis, we will allow him what the hon. member for South Norfolk pled for in the case of Dominion employees, a locus penitentiae. Let him take time to reflect upon what he has done. The hon. Minister of Justice has given us an example of how this opportunity should be afforded to everybody, even to the erring employees of the Dominion Government. He is willing that an erring employee of his department should have not only a locus penitentiae, but a place in the penitentiary in British Columbia. I do not propose that that sort of treatment should be administered to the hon. member for Annapolis; but I think we should leave him place for repentance, and we will hope that after he has had a good dinner, he will come to realize that he has got off a very good joke for the House, and a very good pamphlet of abuse of the local Ministers for his own possible advantage.

Mr. NORTHROP. I would not trespass on the indulgence of the House in respect to this matter were it not for one expression which has dropped from a couple of previous speakers, that is, that this particular motion is being supported by them as a retaliatory measure. As one who is prepared to vote for this motion, I distinctly repudiate that position; and I ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments to present the matter as it occurs to my mind. I presume that we are here for the purpose of obtaining justice, as far as possible, for all the people of Canada, and I presume that the members of this House recognize here what seems to be too often forgotten outside of this House, that this Dominion is made up of various provinces, the whole being equal to the sum of its parts; and this fact is not to be set aside by drawing distinctions between Dominion and provincial jurisdictions. I think that when we come to look at the matter honestly and calmly as legislators, ready to do our duty to those who send us here, we shall find that there are very few matters that come before this House in which Dominion and provincial rights are not really intertwined. To my mind, the greatest reason why this House is justified in taking action with regard to this matter is a reason that has been forced upon us, year after year, by members of the party represented by hon. gentlemen opposite. Ever since 1885, when the Franchise Act was passed, we have had appeal after appeal in every Reform newspaper and from every Reform platform throughout the land, to wipe the abominable Dominion Franchise Act out of existence and adopt the local lists in its place. When we find that this is one of the planks of the Reform party, and when we find the provincial laws in this condition, we must all feel that the people of the Dominion and the provinces are directly interested in the legislation which is objected to so strongly by the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) and which has not found one defender even among hon. gentlemen opposite. Had I any doubts whatever as to the injustice of this provincial legislation, they would have been dispelled by the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac) who, although he himself once occupied a seat in the local government, which was the subject of attack this afternoon, and although he was addressing this House on an occasion when naturally he would wish to create a favourable impression as regards the honesty and sincerity of his motives, yet seemed powerless, during the half hour of his address to say one word, despite his well-known ability and experience, which could enable us to form a conclusion as to the opinion he holds on this very questionable legislation. When I find also that other gentlemen of high standing in the councils of the Reform party, such as the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) decline to commit themselves to any opinion, it must be apparent that hon. gentlemen opposite are not proud of the position in which as members of the Reform party, they find themselves in view of the facts brought to our attention this afternoon. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen opposite to repudiate the idea that this House can have any interest in provincial politics, but it was not always thus. But a short time ago these gentlemen met here in conference in Ottawa to discuss matters touching the interests of the Reform party. At that conference, with no critical opponents present, where they could speak freely among themselves, their leaders, one after the other, referred to the fact that they had won back the outlying fortresses one by one. First Nova Scotia, then Manitoba, and then Prince Edward Island, until only British Columbia remained, and then each speaker went on to point out how they were prepared to advance in one solid phalanx to attack the Dominion. So that these hon. gentlemen will find it difficult, in the face of their own record, to persuade us that they themselves believe there is such a vast distinction and wide separation between Dominion and provincial legislation. In Ontario, it is true, the grievance is not so great as in some of the other provinces, but the principle is equally objectionable; and if the principle is wrong, it is the duty of this House to see that justice is done, if possible, to every Canadian, no matter what province he may belong and no matter how humble he may be. When it is remembered that in Ontario, where the Act is perhaps the least objectionable of any of the provincial Acts, postmasters in cities, officials connected with the collection of excise, custom-house officers and officials of that kind are prevented from exercising their franchise in provincial matters, every hon. member must feel that the greatest injustice is done these people. Not only is an injustice done to these men, but an injustice is done to every candidate in every constituency, because he finds himself confronted with an imperfect list, not only for provincial but also for Dominion elections, and further, an injustice is done the whole country, especially, when we find, as has happened in Nova Scotia, an Attorney General elected by a majority much less than the number of disfranchised people in the constituency. Therefore when the Reform party insist on the franchises of the provinces being adopted for Dominion purposes, and when we are compelled to take these imperfect provincial lists as a basis for our Dominion lists, we are justified, as a means of obtaining justice for our fellow countrymen and of securing proper provincial lists, in supporting this motion. If we had the power to amend the provincial laws, if we had the power to strike out the objectionable clauses in the provincial electoral laws, I am sure that every member of this House would be only too glad to support a measure to that effect. We certainly have not heard one word so far from hon. gentlemen opposite to lead us to think they would be opposed to any such reform. But as we have not that power, the question arises, in what way can we obtain justice for those who are deprived in the provinces of the right to vote? We may pass an Act on the lines of the present resolution, and in this way arouse the attention of the country to the injustice perpetrated by the various provinces. And I believe the good sense of the country would soon compel the provinces to do what was right, and restore the right to vote to those now unjustly deprived of it. We should be the less reluctant to make the authors of this injustice feel the effects of similar treatment, because of the fact that at any moment it is in their power to remove the disability from the effects of which they may suffer by removing the same disability to which they have subjected others. If the provincial legislation be right, it is perfectly certain that the legislation now proposed must be right; and if the provincial legislation be wrong, hon. gentlemen opposite and their friends will, if this resolution should go into effect, be furnished with an additional incentive to correct it. No one can be accused of improper motives, or of being based only by partisanship, because he supports this resolution. Hon. gentlemen opposite who, in this matter, find themselves between the devil and the deep sea, may be at a loss what stand to take or what argument to use. But it seems to me that it is the duty of every hon. member to find out, in the first place, whether there is any injustice existing in the province. If he decides that there is not, then he should support this resolution, because it is in exactly the same line as the provincial legislation. If he decides that there is, he should equally support it, because it will have the effect of rousing the people to a proper sense of the injustice done and thus be the means of causing it to disappear. We hear a great deal of provincial rights from hon. gentlemen opposite, and there is no one in this House who desires to deprive any province of its rights; but I would ask these hon. gentlemen to remember that the Dominion also has rights. So long, however, as the people have their attention solely diverted to petty parish politics, so long as a spirit of provincialism is fostered to the exclusion of the national spirit, this country can never attain the position it ought to occupy. If we endeavour to do our duty to the constituents who sent us here, from a Dominion standpoint, hon. gentlemen may rest assured that just to the extent to which we succeed in doing our duty from a Dominion standpoint, to precisely that extent shall we do our duty from a provincial standpoint. Sir, I will support the resolution moved by my hon. friend, although, as the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) said, a year ago I was not prepared to support this measure. It certainly is an unusual piece of legislation, caused, I think, to the credit of the British name, be it said, by an unusual state of facts, and by the fact that, though a year ago full notice was given to the various provinces that the attention of this House had been and would be called to the injustice that existed, a year has rolled by, nothing has been done to remove this injustice, and do away with these evils. Therefore, I think this House should remove them. While I will vote for the measure of the hon. member for Annapolis, I would reserve the right to object to the details of some of the clauses. This is a matter, I presume, that would come up in committee, after his Bill is presented in this House, and hon. members can fully and properly support the resolution, though they may differ from the hon. member as to some of the details of his proposal.

Mr. FRASER. It might be well for us to consider what business we have with the provincial franchise. I would ask serious attention to that point. This House has a right to make its own franchise, as the local House has the right to make its franchise. But what would be thought should the local legislature enact laws telling this Parliament how it should regulate its franchise? While I am not in favour of any man being deprived from voting, except upon good grounds, which grounds I will speak of later on, I have a strong opinion that until our Civil Service is put on the same footing as that of England, it is perfectly right that civil servants should not be allowed to vote. I make that statement broadly, and I call to my support the facts of English history. Until the passing of the Civil Service Act of 1866, whereby appointments to the Civil Service were restricted to those who succeeded in competitive examination, the civil servants were not allowed to vote. And the reason for that was that they were appointed by the Government, and were the friends of the Government. Now, while I do not say I would do it, I say there is a perfectly good argument there for this Parliament, as well as the local parliaments to say that civil servants shall not vote. Everybody knows how the appointments are made. But the fact must not be forgotten that the local legislature, in passing this Act made it apply to their own civil servants as well as to those of the Dominion.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). The proportion is about four to one thousand.

Mr. FRASER. Nobody is in a position to give the facts in this case. The hon. gentleman does not know the figures.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I do know. I have laid the facts before the House.

Mr. FRASER. The hon. gentleman cannot tell me how many are employed in the various departments, whose employees are disfranchised by this Act.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). The proportion is about one thousand to four in the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. FRASER. All I have to say is, and the hon. gentleman may controvert the statement if he can, that not over 2,000 are employed in the various departments of the Dominion Government throughout the province, who would be affected by this Act. In many counties, not more than ten or twelve are affected by this Act of the local government; and I venture to say that there are not fifteen affected by it in the gentleman's own county, the county of Annapolis.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). You know nothing about it.

Mr. FRASER. I make that statement, and I think I could support it with very good authority. The hon. gentleman is not aware what would be the effect of the legislation he proposes. Under this resolution, if it were carried into law, every man loses his vote who, at any time within two years before the election, has been employed by the local government in any capacity whatever. Look at the local Act. It disfranchises those who have been employed in any of the departments named, "within fifteen days before the election." Keeping the same ratio that he has just given, or very near it, the hon. gentleman makes "fifteen days" read "two years." If a man receive even the smallest emolument from the local legislature, then, until two years after that he is deprived of the right to vote. And the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Northrup) feels that he must vote for that.

Mr. AMYOT. That is a matter of detail.

Mr. FRASER. I have to deal with the resolution as we have it here. Whether you call it a matter of detail or not, it is in the resolution, and the hon. mover asks us to vote for it. And the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) who is loud in his interruptions will vote for it. But, seeing the incongruous position in which he is placed, he seeks a way out of his difficulty by calling this a matter of detail. I am dealing with the resolution as it appears. This resolution was conceived, not in a spirit of one seeking to rectify a wrong, but of one seeking to gain an end in a spirit of hostility—not that I believe the hon. member for Hastings has that in view. Look at the contrast between the Act of the legislature, and this proposal. Every postmaster in Nova Scotia is allowed to vote.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman—but it is now nearly six o'clock. This is a private members' day, and it is for the House to determine whether we are to come back to-night. The atmosphere here is warm and close, and I am willing to move the adjournment, if that is the wish of the House.

Mr. FRASER. I am perfectly willing. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to; and debate adjourned.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 6 p.m.

THE RAILWAY ACT.

Mr. CASEY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 65) to amend the Railway Act, to provide greater security for passengers and employees, and in other respects. He said: This Bill, as its name signifies, is intended to provide greater security for passengers and employees in the first place. The principal provision for the security of passengers requires the use of an automatic attachment to the air-brakes commonly used on trains, which shall prevent tampering with those brakes by any ill-disposed persons, or their accidental disarrangement in such a manner that they cannot be applied by the engineer. We have in mind many occasions on which such arrangements have occurred, causing great loss of life and property. There was a case of the kind in St. Thomas some years ago, when such a disarrangement of air-brakes resulted in a very serious accident. I am informed that there is more than one kind of device intended to overcome this difficulty, and the Bill leaves to the companies the liberty to adopt any one which will be effective. For the security of the employees of the railway it is made obligatory to provide outside ladders at the ends of cars in the position prescribed by the Act, which is that most convenient for the purpose of getting on and off the roofs of the cars; also to have an automatic extension running-board connecting the running-boards on the roofs of the cars, and a rail along one side of each running-board to assist brakemen running from car to car, especially at night and in bad weather. Everybody knows what an extremely risky job it is to do the duty of a brakeman at night and in foul weather, especially when the roofs of the cars are wet or icy. Another provision is that when cars provided with automatic couplers are made up in a train along with cars not so provided, the cars having automatic couplers shall be put together, and the cars with the old-style couplers put together. I am informed that the coupling between cars having automatic couplers and those having old-style couplers is more risky than the coupling of two old-style couplers themselves, and this is an attempt to provide for cases of mixed trains until such time as the Act of my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) providing for automatic couplers on all cars comes into effect, which will be some years yet. The Act also provides that where cars provided with air-brakes are made up with other cars, those having air-brakes shall be put next to the locomotive, and the air-brakes used. The Bill also provides for compensation for overtime for different classes of employees when they are kept out on trips through accident, or from other causes not arising from their neglect of duty. It also provides for fixed compensation for the injury or death of an employee in the discharge of his duty, which fixed compensation shall be binding on the railway company notwithstanding any contract that may have been made between the company and the employee, and this compensation shall not be to the prejudice of any further compensation from the railway company which the employee may be declared entitled to receive by a court of law. There are various other minor enactments, but these are sufficient to indicate the scope of the Bill. I hope to have an opportunity of explaining more fully on the second reading.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE PENITENTIARY ACT.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 66) further to amend the Penitentiary Act. He said: The object of this Bill is to enable the Government to transfer insane convicts from the penitentiaries to provincial asylums, to make arrangements for that purpose with the provincial authorities, and to take back the patients should they be restored to sanity. The other provision of the Bill is that after the present accountant of penitentiaries shall have ceased to hold his office, the inspector of penitentiaries shall have the duties and powers of accountant in addition to those appertaining to his present office, and the office of accountant shall be abolished.

Mr. EDGAR. Does the Bill apply to penitentiaries in British Columbia?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. To all the penitentiaries.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE FISHERIES ACT.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 67) further to amend the Fisheries Act.

Mr. LISTER. Explain.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The Bill is intended to be of a temporary character only. It is to extend the exemptions made under the powers given by the Act to the Governor in Council. Last session the Act was amended so that the power of exempting by the Governor in Council was taken away, and the exemptions previously made were to cease on the first day of the present month. The present Bill would, besides extending the former exemptions, enable the Governor in Council to make further exemptions during the operation of the present amendment. The proposed Bill will also give time to endeavour to secure joint action by United States authorities regarding international rivers. The most important one is the River St. John, and I may state here that that river forms an international boundary for about eighty miles. Practically, so far as the operation of this Bill is concerned, the boundary leaves the River St. John at a point three miles above Grand Falls, yet eighty miles lower down that river the boundary line is only distant twelve miles. So that tributaries flowing through that section of Maine, and on all of which mills or factories are in operation, empty into the St. John, so that, practically, so far as the question of boundary is concerned, the River St. John and tributaries have to be considered as more than one hundred miles.

Mr. LISTER. In what way does the hon. gentleman use the word exemption? Is he going to abolish the exemptions fishermen are entitled to?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the Bill apply simply to saw-dust, or does it apply also to the time in which people are allowed to catch fish?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It applies only to saw-dust, and other objectionable material, injurious to fish.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I wish to inquire of the hon. Minister of Finance if the Supplementary Estimates for this year are ready, or when we may expect them?

Mr. FOSTER. So far as I am concerned, my work of collecting them from the different departments has been done some time, and they were sent down to the printers. I expected to have them yesterday, but have not been able to get them for Council to-day, so that it will be impossible to have them brought down to-day. I am sorry that the delay took place. Before the hon. gentleman proceeds, I would like to ask the leader of the Opposition if he has come to the conclusion that it will be better to have this debate go on from day to day till it is through?

Mr. COSTIGAN.

Mr. LAURIER. We have not made much progress with the Order paper. Perhaps after Friday you may be able to go on with the debate from day to day.

INDEMNITY TO CANADIAN SEALERS.

Mr. PRIOR. I wish to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries whether the Government has received any answer from the Imperial Government to the request forwarded on behalf of the British Columbia sealers, asking the Imperial authorities to advance them the sum of $425,000 as the American Government had not paid the amount? The hon. gentleman, I believe, in answer to a question put by me, said that that request had been forwarded about the 6th of March. This is a matter of great importance to the sealers, and I would like to know whether that communication reached the Imperial Government, and whether the Imperial Government have taken any notice of it.

Mr. COSTIGAN. No answer has yet been received to the request forwarded by cable message on behalf of the British Columbia sealers, nor to their petition forwarded at a later date through the usual channel.

THE BUDGET.

On the Orders of the Day being called,

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to make a short explanation, and a further statement with reference to two or three matters in connection with the address which I delivered on Friday last. There was one question the hon. gentleman asked me, which I promised to answer a little later in the address, but which escaped my memory. That was with reference to the charges for loan management, which were mentioned in a portion of the address. The explanation is, that in 1892 we placed a loan upon the British market to a lesser amount than the issuing power in the prospectus, and, after that, as money was wanted, we sold the stock to our agents in London at the current market prices. The amount of stock sold last year was £1,256,000 odd, and the charges of management with regard to which the hon. gentleman asked me, are the usual charges—discount, brokerage, and stamp duty upon that amount.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Did they amount to $332,000, on that £1,200,000?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, about that. I have in my hand the notes which I had when making my statement with reference to the obligations of Canada, and until the hon. gentleman, who replied on Friday evening, came to the various points, I supposed that I had included in my spoken statement all the obligations included in my notes. I find, however, that three of them escaped being mentioned here, although I had them in my notes, and had calculated them as part of the statement. One was with reference to the Kingston and Smith's Falls Railway, to which there is a subsidy voted of $250,680. That is not under contract, and falls into the list of contingent liabilities for railway subsidies.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is that to be added to the $8,790,000, spoken of by the Minister of Railways?

Mr. FOSTER. I divided those into three sections. I took first the liabilities which were already running; then I took the capital liabilities, being those for railway subsidies, and the completion of the canals. The other category, into which this falls, was for railway or steamship subsidies which had not commenced to run—that is, on which no payments had been made. That one will be charged to railway subsidies, although it is a special act. Then the other was the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway. What I refer to now is the old subvention made some years ago, and with respect to which a contract was entered into four years ago under the subsidy of $80,000 per year for twenty years. That, in gross, would be $1,600,000. That I supposed I had mentioned, and what I thought the hon. gentleman criticised me for not mentioning was the added help to the Hudson Bay Railway, with regard to which there has been some talk, and with regard to which some papers have been brought down. Recollect, this includes simply the old subsidy, with respect to which a contract was entered into. That will fall, if it becomes due, under the head of Railway Subsidies. The other was the Fast Atlantic Service, well known to the House. I thought I had mentioned $750,000 a year for it. Some arrangements with reference to the floating of the scheme have been made, but the scheme has not yet, I am sorry to say, been successful. This is a liability which if it matures will fall upon the consolidated revenue fund, and must be provided for out of the yearly revenue. It will be partly or wholly met by economies. One large economy which will take place, if the line becomes established, is the $125,000 which we now pay to the Allan line, and which, of course, will then cease. These are all the points I omitted at the time I made my statement, and which I desire to supply to-day. The purpose I had in view was to give our obligations as they stood, either certain and running, or contingent upon legislation.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman spoke of the subsidy to the Hudson Bay Railway, and he added the words, "as to which a contract was entered into some time ago." What was the date of that contract?

Mr. FOSTER. In 1891.

Mr. LAURIER. With whom?

Mr. FOSTER. With the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway Company.

Mr. LAURIER. The present company?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. LAURIER. Has any money been paid under it?

Mr. HAGGART. A certain portion of the road—forty miles—was completed and on that, I suppose, they would earn a certain amount of subsidy and land grant. I think there was no cash payment.

Mr. DALY. And no land grant.

Mr. LAURIER. No money was paid, then?

Mr. HAGGART. No. I think it was understood that they had not earned a subsidy, and so no money was paid, and I believe that no part of the land grant was given.

Mr. EDGAR. Does that still subsist?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. EDGAR. And the Order in Council, too?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What is the meaning of the new order, then?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. While I understand the Finance Minister to speak with reference to the old contract, he has not as yet answered the other question—what the Government intend to do about the new Order in Council giving the company two and a half millions in cash.

Mr. FOSTER. That I will have to ask my hon. friend to remove a little into the future, not very far.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Under other circumstances, I would probably feel it my duty to apologize for the length of time which I have already occupied, or may possibly have to occupy, in dealing with the hon. gentleman's speech on Friday last. As it happens the hon. gentleman on that occasion introduced a great deal of irrelevant matter—in point of fact the hon. gentleman seems to have mistaken the occasion of the Budget statement for an opportunity to make a campaign speech—and he has, therefore, only himself to thank if, on the present occasion, the debate goes over rather wider limits and occupies a longer time than might otherwise be requisite. Now, I do not at all dispute the fact that it was very natural for a Finance Minister situated as the hon. gentleman is situated, to attempt a diversion. It has been the unhappy fate of the hon. gentleman, in connection with his late attempt at revision of the tariff, and also in connection with his present large deficit, to have been obliged to consume an enormous amount of crow; and consequently it is not unnatural that the hon. gentleman should think that it might be as well to take every opportunity that presented itself to divert attention from those matters that ought more particularly to engage our attention to-day. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman came before us on Friday—to do what? It was his duty, in the first place, to explain to us the cause of the biggest deficit that has ever existed in our financial history since confederation, with the solitary exception of the deficit caused by the North-west rebellion. It was likewise his duty to inform us fully and fairly of our present position and to make a full statement of all the liabilities of Canada, present and contingent, a thing which the House and the country has a right to expect at his hands at this time. That is what I conceive the hon. gentleman ought to have done. What the hon. gentleman in point of fact did was this—deducting the padding, of which I do not complain, because it is always customary for the Finance Minister to review a number of facts which are already before the House through the medium of the Public Accounts and the Trade and Navigation Returns—but, deducting the padding, three-quarters of the hon. gentleman's speech were devoted to a series of garbled and misleading assertions—I cannot call them statements—touching deficits which occurred nearly twenty years ago. Sir, the object was plain. As I said, under the circumstances it was quite an object for the hon. gentleman to divert attention from his own deficit and liabilities. I am obliged to pay a little more attention to those statements for the simple reason that I am aware that all over the country statements made by the Finance Minister in his Budget speech are accepted by those among his followers who have not the opportunity of hearing the reply as a good deal more authentic than ordinary statements made by Ministers here or elsewhere. Rightly or wrongly, Sir, the Budget speech has come to be looked to as a sort of state paper, and, therefore, I regret that the hon. gentleman on this occasion should have imported into it a number of statements of, to say the least, a very dubious and doubtful character. Sir, I have noticed, and I think that many members of this House have noticed, that while the hon. gentleman has a good memory and is fairly accurate in his statements as regards those events that have occurred in his own recollection, his knowledge of the past financial history of this country, and the past commercial history of this country, is of the most perfunctory character. What is contained within the four corners of the hon. gentleman's brief he is quite competent to deal with; but he has shown on this, as on other occasions, that he possesses an extremely superficial knowledge of things that occurred prior to his appearance in this House, as was extremely well shown on the occasion of his last Budget speech, by my hon. friend from King's, N.S. (Mr. Borden), who sits behind me. Now, as not unfrequently happens, the hon. gentleman on this occasion overreached himself. He has proved what I suspect he did not at all intend to prove; what I fancy his friends will not thank him particularly for proving. But, first I would like to ask a few questions of the hon. gentleman, and if he is disposed to answer them, I will give him every opportunity. I would like to know (after listening to his Budget speech of Friday last), whether he is prepared to allege that the Mackenzie Administration in general, or I myself in particular, was responsible for the distress existing in the United States from 1873 to 1878. I would like to know, Sir, whether the hon. gentleman thinks that the Mackenzie Administration, or I myself, was responsible for the distress which notoriously existed in the case of our other greatest customer, Great Britain, about the same time. I would like to know, in the light of his speech of Friday last, whether the hon. gentleman holds that we were responsible for the shrinkage in values and for the diminished imports from 1875 to 1879. I would like to know whether the hon. gentleman, like some of his predecessors, holds that the Grit Administration were responsible for the three successive bad harvests of 1876, 1877 and 1878. I would like to know whether the hon. gentleman thinks that we were responsible for the fact that Sir John Macdonald and his colleagues—or ought I say, his co-conspirators?—deliberately added $4,000,000 to our annual expenditure, without providing for a penny of it, and likewise handed over to us liabilities—also unprovided for—to the tune of $60,000,000, which would have required a further fixed charge added to our annual expenditure of $3,000,000 more. And, lastly, I would like to ask whether the hon. gentleman or any of his friends behind him will to-day rise in the House and say that a policy of low taxation is likely to be responsible for diminished imports, or that it was probable, had we had a beneficent tariff like his own, ranging from 30 to 100 per cent, from 1876 to 1878, that the imports would have been less diminished than under a 17½ per cent tariff. If the hon. gentleman has no objection, I would like, if he desires to answer these questions, that he answer them now.

Mr. FOSTER. I would not like to break in on your speech.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Why, Sir, the House will recollect that the hon. gentleman made a great point of the diminished imports which occurred from 1876 to 1878. Sir, until now I have always thought, and I think the House has thought, that it was the special glory and object of the National Policy to diminish the imports of manufactured goods, and thereby to afford a larger market to our own manufacturers; but, waiving that point, the hon. gentleman has proved—and there, for once, I think the hon. gentleman has done some service—the hon. gentleman has proved conclusively in more than one passage in his speech, to which I refer the House, that the crisis which occurred between 1875 and 1879 was vastly more severe than the present crisis; and by inference and by consequence, that the fiscal policy and the administrative policy which prevailed from 1875-76 to 1878-79, were vastly superior to the present policy. Let me ask the House, and let me again ask the Minister, where he would have been had he been called upon to face conditions such as existed from 1874-75 to 1878-79? Sir, let us judge the hon. gentleman, as I always like to judge hon. gentlemen, from his own mouth and his own statements. He attributes his present deficit to three causes. I quote from his own speech:

First of all, I had to contend with a shrinkage of 7½ per cent, I had to contend with reduced imports of 10 per cent, I had to contend with a depression in the United States lasting well nigh eighteen months.

All true. Sir, fancy the position of the hon. gentleman if he had had to contend not only with a shrinkage of 25 per cent, which was about the figure that took place between 1875 and 1876, as ascertained by a careful report made by my late esteemed colleague, Mr. Isaac Burpee, who, at my instance, made a special investigation of that question—what would the position of the hon. gentleman have been had he had to contend with a reduced importation of 30 per cent, as occurred in those years; what would his position have been had he had to contend with a depression in the United States of far greater severity than the present, extending over a period of more than five years, and these things aggravated by having to provide for seven millions a year, added without provision by his predecessors, and with three bad harvests to boot? Where, I ask, would the hon. gentleman have emerged? Would it have been with deficits of 2 millions, and 1½ millions, and 1 million? Sir, the hon. gentleman, like his late chieftain, would have had deficits of 20, 30, and it may well be 60 per cent on his revenue, as actually occurred under the regime of Sir John A. Macdonald. It is a plain rule of three, reduced importations of 10 per cent, said the hon. gentleman, justify and excuse my deficit of four and a half millions, so that if there be a reduced importation of 30 per cent, his deficit would have been not 5, but 15 millions of dollars, in round figures—or put it at 4½ millions, and 13½ millions, if that would suit the hon. gentleman better. So, with the hon. gentleman's other excuses, I cannot call them arguments. Now, I would like to ask him, I would like to ask any business man in this House or in this country, are they going to escape the payment of one cent of interest on our present net debt of $250,000,000 because of the long—what shall I call it? exposition in which he indulges, to show that if we had not done this, that, and t'other thing, and incurred this liability and that liability, our total debt would only have been $139,000,000? Does it better our position one iota that at the present moment, according to the hon. gentleman, our total fixed charges are nearly $27,000,000 out of an estimated expenditure of $37,000,000? No, Sir, those fixed charges are largely due to the policy of himself and his predecessors; and while our fixed charges, ranging up to this enormous amount, may and do add greatly to the difficulties of the situation, may and do add greatly to the difficulty of dealing with it, and while they are an extremely strong argument against adding to these fixed charges, against incurring any other fixed obligation, they do not justify in the slightest degree the fact that at this moment our fixed charges, over which he has little control, are close on $27,000,000 out of $37,000,000, which is, in my judgment, a disgraceful and a dangerous state of things, and a grave impeachment of the policy which the hon. gentleman has been expounding to us of late. Sir, a'1 this, to my mind, is little better than elaborate trifling. What the country wants to know is, not what the position of the country was 20 years ago, but what the position of the country is to-day. Now, the hon. gentleman did one thing for which I commend him—it was perhaps the one piece of good sense that relieved his discourse—the hon. gentleman did frankly acknowledge a huge deficit. But he was not equally candid as to our total liability, he was not candid as to other matters to which he alluded, and which I shall treat incidentally as I proceed. Sir, I do not at all ignore the gravity of the financial situation; I ignore it the less because I cannot but feel that in the estimates which he has submitted, the Minister of Finance has given us mere guesses and not careful calculations. The Minister guesses that if he and his colleagues can keep down the expenditure to its estimated figure, he may save a million; and he guesses that if times get better, he will get a million and a quarter more. He takes no account of possible liabilities for the Atlantic fast service and other matters of this kind, he puts his trust in the chapter of accidents. Well, Sir, if things go well, his calculations may come out well. But let there be any such shrinkage, any such protracted depression as I had to contend with; or let there be, unhappily, a succession of bad harvests, and again I call the attention of the House to the position in which the hon. gentleman may find himself. But, Sir, he ignored two very important factors; he ignored—and to this I call the attention of my hon. friends, especially—he ignored completely the enormous increased taxation under which we laboured in 1894-95, as against the taxation which existed in 1878. Sir, by an extremely shallow artifice, the hon. gentleman, whose policy and the policy of whose predecessors, has added $40,000,000 a year to the taxes of the people, if you count not only the sum paid into the treasury, but the sum actually taken out of their pockets, takes great credit to himself because, out of $40,000,000, he was compelled to restore $4,000,000, not of his own accord, but in deference to the action of the United States Government, the most of which he has taken back since. He takes excellent care to say nothing of all the taxation that he and his colleagues have added, but he parades from one end of Canada to the other the paltry fraction they took off. Sir, he did one thing more, he acknowledged, and thereby again he was obliged by force of circumstances to state the truth, that the taxes he had raised were taken out of the pockets of the people, because he claimed great credit for having enriched them by taking the same taxes off. Nor did the hon. Minister of Finance say anything on another important point, and that is the vastly increased collective indebtedness of the people of Canada. Canada to-day owes several hundreds of millions more collectively than Canada did in 1878; by that I mean our large municipal debt, our largely increased private debt, our increased railway debt, our increased federal debt, and our increased provincial debt. I am not going to waste further time over that matter. If the hon. gentleman disputes the figures, I can produce them. I have them in detail, and I shall be happy to give them to him or to his friends. There is one point to which I want to call the attention of the House; not only has our taxation been enormously increased and our total indebtedness increased, but the collective income of large sections of the people has been greatly diminished. Sir, I do not believe for my part that Canada collectively, making allowance for shrinkage in values in certain quarters, allowing for the diminished value of property and allowing also for the increased indebtedness—I do not believe that Canada, at all events the five old provinces, are as rich collectively, to-day as they were sixteen years ago. I know that very large classes of the community are much poorer, although it is true that certain favoured localities, and certain favoured individuals have amassed considerable wealth, while a multitude of the people have become greatly poorer. There has been a huge displacement of wealth. (There has been, at all events, no increase of wealth. Wealth is far less evenly distributed to-day than it was sixteen years ago, even if, on a close calculation being made, the result showed that there had been an increase. But, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman's financial policy is, comparatively speaking, a trifle. It is not his financial policy, it is his fiscal policy, it is the whole fiscal policy of the Government which is on its trial to-day. On its trial to-day? It has been sentenced and found guilty and is now standing waiting to receive its doom. By its fruits we shall know it. Now, let us see what the Government did undertake to do seventeen years ago. The hon. Minister of Finance was not here then, nor were a great many of his colleagues, and perhaps they do not know, and they do not remember, what the Canadian Government as constituted in 1878 undertook to do, and now is the time to remind the House and the country what those men promised, and to show them what those men performed. Sir, they promised mainly these two things. They promised they would enrich old Canada by the expedients of heaping double and treble taxation on her. They promised, in the second place, they would create a second Canada for us in the North-west, to share our burdens and lighten our responsibilities, and for that purpose they induced us to incur a huge debt. How have those gentlemen succeeded? Let their own census returns speak for them, from the first page of every volume they have yet published to the last; let their own Public Accounts speak for them; let their tariff speak for them; let their deficits speak for them; let the rise of the Third Party speak for them, a party which is a practical revolt of the large part of the agricultural population against intolerable misgovernment. I sum up the position briefly for these hon. gentlemen. In these sixteen years they have spent, as I shall presently show, about one thousand millions of dollars in taxes alone, wrung out of the people. They have lost to us, including therein the immigrants that they themselves have stated came into Canada, at least two millions of people in these sixteen or seventeen years. They have in the North-west thrown away lands and diverted from the control of Government and the country an area equal in acreage to half a dozen respectable European kingdoms, and out of the disposition of those lands they have not received enough hard cash to pay the expenses of surveys. Sir, it is a fact that to-day, after parting with the control of a territory one thousand miles in length by two hundred miles in breadth, our Public Accounts show that we have not taken in as receipts from them sufficient to pay the cost of surveying that territory. Well, Sir, as to their other promises. They have been quoted before, and I shall only briefly enumerate them. We were to pay the whole expense of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway out of those same land sales. How often have we heard that declaration announced from the Treasury benches. We were to become the granary of the world, and to export 640 million bushels of wheat—no less than that. We were to force the Yankees into begging reciprocity at our hands—it has been a tedious process. The Government were to enrich the whole community, to stop the exodus, and above and beyond all, to inaugurate an era of economy. Sir, the present Finance Minister had two great opportunities given to him. Last year he had an opportunity of revising the tariff. The present year he had an opportunity of readjusting the system of taxation. I propose to examine in some detail how the hon. gentleman has used those opportunities. It is true of the hon. gentleman, as of some other parties, that a little knowledge is a dangerous thing. Drink deep or taste not—but it may be that the hon. gentleman has conscientious objections to drinking deep in any shape; some of his predecessors in that place did not share them. I want to call the particular attention of the House to the net result of the hon. gentleman's tariff experiments. They are interesting, they are highly interesting. And here again I find myself compelled to apologize to the hon. gentleman. I did make a misstatement some months ago, as to the exact extent of his reductions. I am going to rectify it now, and I think for the last time. In the six months of 1894 we imported, of dutiable goods, $32,845,000 worth; we paid of duty, $10,198,000. In the six months of 1895 we imported of dutiable goods, $28,046,000 worth, on which we paid duty to the amount of $8,701,000. The percentage of duties in the six months terminating on the 1st of January, 1894, amounted to 31 per cent and five hundredths. In the six months terminating on the 1st of January, 1895, it amounted to 31 per cent and 2¼ hundredths, being a reduction of exactly one-fortieth part of 1 per cent, from which it follows, they by pursuing this prudent and highly conservative course for forty years the hon. gentleman may hope to reduce the tariff 1 per cent, and if he follows the advice of the gentleman behind him (Mr. Montague) in the 400 years, which I think that gentleman said he wanted, he would get back to the average tariff of 1878. Four hundred years, therefore, Mr. Speaker, exactly represents the difference between the two parties. Now, I have had my doubts and my difficulties in times past as to where we ought to place these economical Rip Van Winkles. I did not know exactly where to locate them. They do not know enough to be placed with the economists of Sir Robert Walpole's time, nor of Cromwell's time. It was impossible to find them in that period of great souls which distinguished Queen Elizabeth's era, but at long last the Secretary of State has come to the rescue. He has given us a pointer, and now I know where to place them; and it is in the early part of the reign of Edward IV., A.D. 1463. Sir, this is very interesting. I have always myself had a profound respect for the wisdom of our ancestors, though I have not got credit for it always. Now, I want to call the attention of the House to this for it is most curious and most interesting. In the volume in my hand, Mr. Speaker, I possess the Statutes At Large from the first year of Edward IV. to the forty-third year of Queen Elizabeth. Our forefathers had one excellent plan; they meant what they said and they were in the habit of giving their reasons before they introduced an Act of Parliament, and their reasons so far as I can see were mostly true, or, at any rate, expressed their real intention. Sir, were that excellent course pursued down to this day what revelations the preambles of the various Acts of Parliament, particularly about the Hudson Bay Railway, might bring forth. Now, allowing for the dialect, you will find presently that the very words used by our respected ancestors in 1463 are almost the same as those I have often heard used from the Treasury benches in the period from 1878 to 1894. The ideas are identical. The only difference is this: Our ancestors were more straightforward than we were: they knew what they meant and they said so. There was no dodging about the issue with them. What they wanted to prohibit they did prohibit, and they had not recourse to any juggling with specific and ad valorem duties but they did it at once. Here is a little work for the hon. the Secretary of State. I am told his department is not as fully employed as it might be, and so instead of issuing proclamations to the Indians of the Cayuga reserve, the hon. gentleman might apply himself to reviving the Statutes of King Edward IV. Sir, there is a splendid list of such statutes. It might be drawn out by the Secretary of State for the Manufacturers Association and sent to be registered by their man of all work, the Minister of Finance. First of all, to go a little further afield, there is a Grand Statutory Chapter 21. Anno 19, King Henry VII., which prohibits the importation of silk goods, and if any feminine free traders are caught wearing silk goods of foreign manufacture describes how they are to be dealt with. Then there is Chapter 9, of the first year of Richard III., which ought to be specially dear to the member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor). This declares under what circumstances Italian merchants may sell goods, and it also mentions the restraints that ought to be imposed on aliens. Why, Sir, just read "Yankees" for "Italians," and the Act of King Richard III. would fit the hon. gentleman from South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) at once. But, it is when we come to King Edward IV., it is when we come to the year of grace, A.D. 1463, that we find where the member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) and his colleagues really drew their inspiration. Here I have got to apologize. I have been talking to these hon. gentlemen opposite, and I have been treating them as if they were mere plagiarists of Yankee notions. Not at all, Sir. They went back to the pure source of English law undefiled which I will read to you. Everything King Edward IV. did seems to have been directed, and directed admirably, to the carrying out of true protection doctrine. Why, Sir, here is a Statute of Edward IV., a restraint for bringing corn into the realm to the damage of farmers; here is a declaration that farmers shall not sell wool out of the realm to the prejudice of the manufacturers, and here is a declaration that no one can bring wrought silk into the realm to be sold, or he shall answer for it to his peril. But the jewel of the whole, the gem of the whole, the real Magna Charta of English protection, is Chapter 4, Anno Tertio, Edward IV. I shall not apologize for reading it, because I know the hon. gentlemen opposite, and particularly my hon. friend from Bruce (Mr. McNeill), will delight to see that he is only treading in the footsteps of his ancestors. It is entitled :

Certain merchandise not lawful to be brought ready-wrought into this realm.

And it reads :

Item, whereas in the said Parliament, by the artifices of manual occupation, men and women inhabiting and resident in the city of London and other cities, towns, boroughs and villages within the same realm of England and Wales, it hath been piteously showed and complained, how that all they in general, and every of them, be greatly impoverished, and much hindered and prejudiced of their worldly increase, and daily living, by the great multitude of divers commodities and wares pertaining to their mysteries and occupations, being fully wrought, and ready made to sale, as well by the hands of strangers, being the King's enemies, as other in this realm and Wales fetched and brought from beyond the sea, as well by merchants strangers, as denizens and other persons, whereof the greatest part in substance is deceitful, and nothing worth in regard of any man's occupation or profit.

You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that these worthy men understood the dangers of shoddy goods at that early date. You will observe likewise that they were clearly awake to the necessity of preventing England from being made a slaughter market :

If due remedy be not in this behalf provided : our redoubted Sovereign Lord, the King, considering the promises and willing in this case to provide remedy, by the advice, assent, and authority aforesaid, hath ordained, enacted and established, that no merchant, born a subject of our said Lord the King, denizen or stranger, nor other person, after the feast of St. Michael the Arch Angel next coming, shall bring, send, nor convey nor cause to be brought, sent, nor convey into this realm of England and seigniory of Wales, any of the chassers, wares or things underwritten, that is to say.

I am not quite sure whether the law-makers of this early day plagiarized in some mysterious way the tariff of the Minister of Finance, or whether the hon. gentleman plagiarized King Edward IV. However, these goods were then prohibited in England :

Any woollen caps, woollen cloths, laces, courses, ribbands, fringes of silk and of thread, laces of thread, silk twine, silk in any white embroider, laces of gold, tires of silk or gold, saddles, stirrups or any harnesses pertaining to saddles, spurs, bosses of bridles, andirons, gridirons, any manner of locks, hammers, pinsons, firetongs, dripping pans, dice, tennis balls, points, purses, gloves, girdles, harness for girdles of iron, latten steel, tin, or of alkemine, anything wrought of any tawed leather, any tawed furs, buscans, shoes, galoshes, or corks, knives, daggers, wood knives, bodkins, sheers for tailors, scissors, razors, sheathes, playing cards, pins, pattens, pack needles, any painted ware, forciers, caskets, rings of copper, or of latten gilt, chaffing dishes, hanging candlesticks, chaffing bells, facing bells, rings for curtains, ladles, scummers, counterfeit basons, ewers, hats, brushes, cards for wool, blanch iron thread, commonly called and named white wire, or any of those wares or chaffers to be uttered and sold within the same realm of England or Wales by way of merchandise, upon pain to forfeit the same merchandises at every time, and as often as they may be found in the hands of any person or persons to be sold ; the one part of the same forfeiture to be paid to the use of our Lord the King, and the other half to him that will first seize the same for the King ; the same half by him so seized for our Lord the King to be delivered by the said seizor thereof to the Escheator of the county or place where the said seizing shall be by indenture between them made duly to answer thereof in his account.

And then, Sir, there is a qualifying post-script, which goes to show not only how zealous they were to provide a home market, but how desirous they were to see that vested interests should not suffer. The protectionists were to have their own way on land, but it was provided further :

Provided always, that if any of the said wares or chaffers made out of this land be taken upon the sea without fraud or collusion, or come in this realm, by way of wreck, that those be in no wise taken within this Act or statute, but that they may be sold within this realm, this ordinance notwithstanding.

An honest protectionist on land was to be protected in his rights, but an honest pirate at sea was not to be overlooked either.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Are there any more acts like that ?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Oh, there are lots more ; but that, I think, is the true Magna Charta. Now, there have been several curious coincidences noted, but it is a very curious coincidence, indeed, that, four hundred years ago King Edward IV. had a certain councillor of the name of Montague. He was a privy councillor, and, according to court gossip, a mighty loose fish, too. Who knows, Sir, but there may be a connection? although I am bound to say, so far as my recollection recalls the portraits that have come down to us from that time, that there is not a great deal of physical resemblance between the hon. member for Haldimand and the stately proportions of the king-maker and his brother. Now, having analysed the tariff reductions, it becomes our duty to look at the tariff exactions; and I would, with all my heart, that the exactions were as moderate as the reductions have been. In this connection I am going to make one or two statements which, to some of my hon. friends may appear rather startling. But I make these statements after examination, and with knowledge, and I think I may venture to say that hon. gentlemen will find that I am amply able to maintain what I do say, though I will not engage to maintain all that our opponents are pleased to allege that I do say. With respect to that tariff, I make these three statements. First of all, I say that the amount of the total taxation from excise and customs exacted from the people of Canada since 1879, fully averages $60,000,000 a year; that is to say, that in that time it amounts to a total of about $1,000,000,000. Looking at the whole situation, I will not dispute the statement of the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), who, I believe, estimated the taxation at a much higher figure. It is quite possible I know that he may make good his case, knowing as I do the enormous inconvenience and injury which result from interference with trade. But I am prepared, for my part, to show that $60,000,000 a year is a minimum, and highly conservative estimate of the total taxation inflicted on the people of Canada by the present tariff. Then, Sir, I have to make this second statement, that the total amount of taxes exacted from the people of Canada during that time, would not merely have defrayed all our expenses, but, could the people have been induced to bear it, the balance would have enabled us, if invested at 4 per cent. to defray all our expenses at the present rate for evermore. And, as regards the incidence of this taxation on the people, I make this statement, that, apart from the excise and customs duties on liquors and tobacco, which are classed by hon. gentlemen opposite as voluntary taxes, and which, in a certain sense are so, an ordinary Canadian artisan or wage-earner receiving ordinary wages, is compelled, under this tariff, to pay at least twenty-fold as much as his English brother artisan, earning like wages.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hon. gentlemen will do well, when I make a statement, to wait until I conclude my remarks, and then, if they can, they are abundantly welcome to answer them, though they will not find it so easy to do so. These are strong statements, but I am prepared to justify them, and to stand by them. I make them here with full knowledge of the weight of this taxation. And now, as proof of my statement that $60,000,000 are at present exacted from the people of Canada, everybody knows that we tax ourselves at present to the extent of about $30,000,000 a year which is paid into the treasury, and, therefore, the total amount of taxation so paid in those sixteen years amounted to about $450,000,000. It is an incident of all indirect taxation, that whenever you undertake to raise a large sum of money from the people by indirect taxation, even when it is imposed in the most honest possible manner for revenue purposes only, there will be a large loss. The extent of that loss depends on the number of middlemen through whose hands it passes before it reaches its final destination; but it is always large. Probably it is not at all an unfair average to say that in the great majority of cases it fully equals one-half of the original tax. That is a point which hon. gentlemen will find very fully discussed elsewhere, and I will not waste time upon it now. But, Mr. Speaker, everybody knows, too, that all financiers, good, bad and indifferent, find it convenient to raise money by indirect taxation, knowing, notwithstanding its expensiveness, that otherwise there would be great difficulty in getting the people to pay. No doubt that accounts for the large figure which indirect taxation has played in all financial schemes. But, in the present instance, we are not dealing with a tariff imposed for revenue only. We are dealing with a tariff which is openly avowed to be a protective tariff, a tariff which, in many instances, is prohibitive, a tariff which ranges from 30 to 100 per cent. So far as a tariff is protective, the measure of the taxation is the total consumption of imported goods, plus the goods manufactured under that tariff in the country. Where those goods are double the amount imported, the tax will take at least $3 out of the pockets of the people for every $1 which it puts into the treasury. Where the goods manufactured in the country under the tariff are four, or five times the amount of the goods imported, then you may fairly conclude that it will take four or five times more out of the pockets of the people than it puts into the treasury. Now, we will take a case which my hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) worked out very well last session—the case of cottons. Our total import of cottons of all kinds is about $4,000,000.

Our total manufacture of all kinds amounts to about $10,000,000. Our total consumption of cottons is, therefore, about $14,000,000. By the time they reach the consumer, these goods are subject to a tax of about 40 per cent—about 30 per cent directly under the tariff, and about 10 per cent or probably more, indirect, in consequence of their passing through the hands of certain middlemen. The practical result is that, in the case of cottons alone, the people pay a tax of about $5,600,000, of which the revenue receives $1,140,000. And as with cottons, so with all other manner of articles, with this single qualification, that this tariff is largely prohibitive, and where it is prohibitive, a huge tax is inflicted on the people, of which nothing goes into the treasury. We had an admirable illustration of that very lately in the case of sugar. Until the other day, our consumption of 300,000,000 pounds of sugar was taxed two-thirds of one cent. The people were taxed $2,000,000 a year, and not one cent went into the treasury. That is going to be modified now. The people will be taxed to the tune of $3,000,000, and $1,200,000 is to go into the treasury. Then there is absolutely no detailed evidence of the indirect mischief and loss which arises under these tariffs from the well-known fact that when you tax one class of manufacturers, you hurt another. When you protect one man, you injure another. That is constantly the case, and in nothing more is it the case than in the matter to which I shall allude further on—the enormous mischief which these men have done by their tax on iron, for instance. I have only computed the loss at a little over double the amount of the taxes. That is to say, we take a little more than two dollars out of the pockets of the people for one dollar we put into the treasury. That, I may add, is a vastly smaller figure than those American economists, who have had occasion to look closely into the matter, have estimated the tax at. I repeat that, on a minute examination, it will be found that mine is really a conservative estimate. There is an extremely strong probability that the real cost to the people is greater than the $60,000,000 a year at which I have put it. Of this amount $30,000,000 goes to the treasury, and the remaining $30,000,000 is the lowest estimate of the loss that is caused. Another cause that has enormously aggravated the burden of this huge sum of one thousand millions, is the frightful injustice with which it is levied. In most countries, statesmen try to make the taxes as low as they can on the poorer, and as high as they can on the wealthier portion of the community. But what did hon. gentlemen opposite do? Mind, I am now speaking of the taxation that existed up to 1894. The principle remains, but our exertions on this side resulted in some of the grosser abuses being modified last year. I have here a statement in pretty full detail showing the operation of these duties. I call the attention of the House to a few of the more glaring cases of gross injustice. I find that what is called heavy beaver overcoating of the coarser sort, which costs in England 29 cents, was taxed by us to the tune of 72 per cent under the old tariff. It is a coarse beaver overcoating which is brought into this country and sold for the benefit of some of the poorer portion of the community. The more expensive beaver, which costs 7s. 9d., was admitted, under our tariff, at 28 per cent. I am, of course, giving now the extreme range, although there are overcoatings which cost even more. Serge cloth which cost in England 41 cents paid 58 per cent, and that which cost $1.26 paid 33 per cent. What is called nap overcoating, which cost in England 28 cents, paid, under our old tariff, 75 per cent, and that which cost $1.34 only paid 33 per cent. I give those simply as illustrations of the gross injustice with which, in the past, that tariff was levied. As I have said, the remonstrances of myself and my friends here did compel the Government to somewhat modify those outrageous duties, and although the principle remains and the injustice is not obliterated, it has been to some extent reduced. I now want to call attention to the other fact to which I have alluded, and that is the way in which taxes are distributed in Canada and in England, and I propose to give exact and literal proof of the statement I have made, that the taxation to which the artizan, for instance, is compelled to submit in Canada is twenty-fold worse than what he is compelled to submit to in England. Let me here take occasion to characterize, as they deserve, certain impudent assertions which are being made in various parts of the country, to the effect that if the Liberal party get in they propose to levy heavy and obnoxious taxes on the whole community. I have seen statements that if the Liberal party came into office they would tax every gun and every dog, and impose a poll tax on every man, woman and child. If there be any simple souls who believe those statements, let me assure them, on behalf of myself and friends, that neither dog nor gun will be taxed under our regime, and much less will any poll tax be imposed. The English taxes are levied in this way. One-third is extracted from the people by means of taxes which do not touch the poor man at all, such as stamp dues, income tax and death duties. Those do not touch the poorer classes at all. Another third is extracted by heavy duties on liquor and tobacco, which undoubtedly touch the poor and heavily, too, but which hon. gentlemen opposite have all along contended are purely voluntary taxes, and therefore, do not count. Then there remain the customs taxes. What are they? Remember they are the only tax which the English wage-earner is compelled to pay, according to this argument. They aggregate about £20,000,000 sterling. Of those, fully £15,000,000 are taxes on wines, spirits and tobacco, which come under the same category as excise. There is no tax levied on the poor man in England, except some utterly trifling and insignificant taxes on certain kinds of fruit bringing in a very small revenue, and the tax on tea. And that tax on tea, subdivided among the people in England, would show that the total tax which the English artizan is compelled to pay would barely equal one-twentieth part of that which the Canadian artizan or wage-earner must pay on every single article he requires to use for the benefit of his family, with the solitary exceptions of anthracite coal and tea. Everything else is taxed. His shoes, his books, his tools, the clothes he wears, the nails and iron he uses in his daily avocations—all are heavily taxed under this tariff. I have computed the average taxation of every family in the Dominion at about $60. Deducting $10 for the excise, there remains $50 per family, and on that I base my statement that the taxation amounts to nearly $10 per head. On that, also, I base my statement that the absolute taxation which the Canadian wage-earner has to pay is twenty-fold greater than the taxation which his brother artizan in England is compelled to pay under the English system of taxation and customs duty. Now, my third statement is self-evident. It is clear as daylight that if I am correct in saying that $1,000,000,000 have been exacted from the people of Canada within the last sixteen or seventeen years, $400,000,000 or thereabouts would have been ample for all the requirements of government; and I merely mention this to show the huge sacrifices which have been inflicted on our people in the attempt to carry out this experiment of the National Policy. Could our people have been induced to submit, under a revenue tariff, to a like taxation, they might have paid off every atom of the federal and provincial debt, and municipal debt, and a huge cantle of their private debt besides. Or the money might have been invested for them, and the interest at 4 per cent would have amply discharged all that ought to be spent for the government of this country. I now come to a graver subject yet, and that is the question of the loss of population, for which the National Policy is so largely responsible. Now, Sir, I desire to call your attention to the extent to which that loss has gone—because I am aware that a number of hon. gentlemen, either by deliberately shutting their eyes, or by refusing to examine into the question, or listen to the discussion of it, are gravely in error as to the extent of that loss. Sir, I find, in the first place, that in the older provinces of Canada, in Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Ontario, and Quebec, according to the census returns, the total growth in the last ten years amounted to barely 325,000 souls—a growth, Sir, of about 7½ per cent. I find that of that growth, poor and meagre at it was, one hundred thousand or more were due to immigration, as shown clearly in certain of the census returns which deal with that question. Now, the result of all that is this: That during the last ten years the absolute growth of the native population in these five provinces amounted to barely 225,000 souls, on a population, in 1881, of 4,150,000. That is to say, Mr. Speaker, in these old provinces, amply capable of supporting a population treble that they now contain, the total growth in ten years had sunk to 5½ per cent, exclusive of immigration. Now, Sir, if the House wants to know, further, what that means, I will tell them. At a very moderate computation, our annual increase of population always before amounted to—and still would if our younger people had stayed here—to about 2 1-5 per cent per annum. The truth of the matter is this, that our annual growth was just one-fourth part of what it ought to have been. How grave a matter this is may be learned from two facts. As everybody knows, during these ten years, there was considerable immigration into Canada, though infinitely less than the Government stated; and, as everybody knows, or everybody ought to know, there was, during these years, a large emigration from the parent country. I have looked up the growth of population of England and Wales for these ten years, and I find that while the five old provinces of Canada, apart from immigrants, increased 5½ per cent in ten years, the increase of population of England and Wales, after supplying a large number of emigrants to other countries, was 11·65 per cent. So we have come to this in Canada—our natural growth, apart from the immigration, in our older provinces, is less than one-half that of England and Wales, after supplying emigrants to half the known world. And if a further indication is wanted, I will call the attention of the House to this further fact—that in the United States, during a period when their population corresponded with ours, from 1790 to 1800, and from 1800 to 1810, and downwards, their average natural growth of population appears to have been rather more than 3¼ per cent. Their growth was 3¼ per cent per annum from 1791 to 1820, without any assistance from immigration. Our growth appears to be about one-half of one per cent, or thereabouts. Now, Sir, if there is any sane man in this House who thinks that these facts can be ignored, I should like to hear from him. If there is any sane man in Canada who will tell the people that all this indicates prosperity, I should like him to state the reason why. Sir, I regard the true wealth of a nation as mainly concentrated in the number of healthy, vigorous, intelligent men and women that nation possesses. These I regard as an item of wealth infinitely more valuable than savings bank deposits, infinitely more valuable than anything indicated by circulation or mileage returns. Sir, the true test of prosperity, in my judgment, is that the people that come to Canada should be glad to come, and glad to stay, and that the people who are in Canada should be glad to remain, and not look for opportunities to go away. Now, Sir, I have accepted, up to this point, these same census returns as being truthful. But we have the strongest grounds for accepting as correct the statements made by my hon. friend from King's, N.S. (Mr. Borden), that, in certain of the maritime provinces, at any rate, very gross frauds have been committed for the purpose of swelling the apparent population. And, if I have misstated the case, if I have imputed wrong to the department which did not exist, the conduct of the department itself is the answer. When the charge was made on the floor of this House, and the proof was given by my hon. friend in a manner which no man could gainsay, and no man could contradict, what did we find the department doing? Putting every obstacle in my hon. friend's way, and in the way of other hon. members who wished to investigate the matter—deliberately refusing to give the names of people who had been returned in certain districts, refusing on the flimsiest and most ridiculous of pretexts. The indications are that, if the proportions shown by my hon. friend in the figures he gave, hold for other districts, instead of an increase of 225,000 for these provinces, I fear we should have a bare 200,000. It is to be hoped that my hon. friend, and other hon. gentlemen will prosecute the inquiry into this matter, and ascertain, if possible, to what extent these frauds have gone. Now, Sir, with reference to the returns of population, the conduct of the department, and the conduct of those charged with making the census returns is open to the gravest suspicion. In other respects, it is open to no suspicion at all. Sir, I have here a volume called "Census of Canada for the years 1890-91, vol. 3," to which I wish to attract the attention of this House. I do not object to men defending their cause by any honest arguments, but I do object, and I think the country will object, and I hope the whole House will sustain me in objecting, to seeing our census returns made the means of disgraceful fraud. As to the returns of population, I have indicated what I think. But now we come to the proofs which these census returns offer us of the huge increase in industrial establishments, and of people employed therein under the National Policy. These census returns declare that 25,000—only think, 25,000—new industrial establishments blossomed into existence between 1881 and 1889 and that 112,000 people were employed in these establishments, who, presumably, would not have been employed at all but for them. I have taken the trouble to analyse these statements. I am not going to deal with the matter fully, my friends must help me to bring before the country the results to be learned from the analysis of the returns with regard to these figures, 25,000 new industries. First, I come to what appears to be a wholly new industry, because I find no reference to it in the similar volume of the census of 1881, which, also, I have in my hand. This is the industry of knitting factories. You will find them narrated on page 195. The House will be delighted to hear that there are now, or were, in 1891, 223 industrial establishments in the shape of knitting factories in Canada. Where is the Minister of Militia? Is he here just now? or is there no Nova Scotia Minister representing that province?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, I am very sorry, because I was about to congratulate him. Nova Scotia is specially privileged. Of the 223 knitting factories, 99 were developed in Nova Scotia. And more than that, of the 99 developed in Nova Scotia, 93 were developed in the county of Shelburne. I find on further examination that the 93 industrial establishments in the shape of knitting factories in the county of Shelburne, employed collectively 126 hands. I find further, on the same page of the census, that they earned in that year, $1,833, being at the rate of $14.55 per year for each hand, or 28 cents a week, and 4½ cents a day. I find that in Quebec, in the county of L'Assomption, there were 12 industrial establishments known as knitting factories, employing collectively 12 hands, earning an average of $63 a year, being at the rate of $1.20 per week, wherewith, I suppose, to discharge the wages of superintendents, the cost of finding power, and dividends to the company. Portneuf is equally favoured, it has 12 establishments, which average $90 per year in wages, or $1.60 per week. Now, I find here that the value of machinery and tools employed in each factory are given; and it may interest the hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. White) to know that the 93 knitting factories in Shelburne actually employed for machinery and tools to the value of $623, being at the rate of $7 per factory for machinery. Now, I want to call the attention of the House to this fact. We are told there were 25,000 new establishments; I have shown you what some of those consist of. I have analysed these further, and I find that out of the 223 knitting factories, there may possibly be 30 that deserve the name by a stretch of courtesy. Those 30 pay

\$288,000 in wages out of a total of \$322,000. The remaining 193 pay an average of \$200 a year for all purposes. But, Sir, great as the knitting factory is, fine as the work which the National Policy has got in there, finer still is the work which the Census Commissioners got in there, it pales before the industry of carpet-making. The House will be glad to know, I was glad to know, that there are now 537 industrial establishments for making carpets in the Dominion of Canada. I find by a reference to the census returns of 1881, that there were only 11 then in existence; we have therefore an increase of 546, which is something like—how many thousands per cent? Is it 5,000, or 50,000 per cent? Some of those hon. gentlemen who are good at it, may occupy their leisure time in making the calculation. Well, Sir, of these 537, 51 are in New Brunswick under the fostering care of the Minister; and they employ 51 hands, mostly old women. Their collective wages are \$1,792; so that each of them earns \$36 per year, or 70 cents per week. Nova Scotia possesses 106 factories for carpet making, employing 117 hands, who earn \$62 a year, or \$1.10 per week, according to the census. Prince Edward Island, I am happy to inform my hon. friend, averages \$100 per year. Assiniboia has one factory for carpet making, paying \$15 per year in wages. Now, I may remark that of the 213 knitting factories in all the provinces except Ontario, not one appears to average \$100 a year in wages, or to employ 2 men. The total wages paid in these 213 factories amount to \$14,827, which is not quite \$70 per year each. Of hosiery factories, I find there are 58. Of these, 18 paid \$124,000 in wages; and 40 paid \$7,000, being an average of \$170 a year apiece. Now, Sir, what I want to point out is the absolute worthlessness of the industrial statistics which have cost Canada \$550,000, according to our public accounts, and which are being paraded in every newspaper these gentlemen control, which are paraded in our Year-Book, which are quoted by gentlemen who desire to discourse on statistical matters, as evidence that after all the National Policy did a great deal, that it established 25,000 new industrial establishments, which employ 112,000 hands—but how many of them at wages of $4\frac{1}{2}$ cents per day? Sir, I take the case of the boot and shoe industry, a valuable industry, an industry which has many large manufacturing factories. Let me take the case of Quebec, which is reported to have had 1,905 industrial establishments for making boots and shoes. Now, 320 of these paid \$2,400,000 in wages out of \$2,900,000. They employ nearly all women and children, and 5,200 men out of a total of 7,445. The remaining 1,600 industrial establishments employ 2,245 men among them, being an average of one man and one-third of an apprentice to each industrial establishment. Sir, take the case of blacksmiths. They supply 9,432 industrial establishments, which employ 11,761 men. Well, the result is that 7,000 of these establishments are operated by one industrious artisan, and 2,400 employ one man and one boy. I will take another case. I will take the case of one or two of our cities, and although I have given this before, it will bear repeating. We will take the case of the good town of Port Hope. During the last ten years unhappily Port Hope lost 539 in population, besides the natural increase; but while the people decreased, the industrial establishments multiplied. There are now 147 industrial establishments in Port Hope; 63 of these employ one man, or one woman, one boy, or one girl; 20 of them employ two men, or two women, two boys, or two girls; 33 of them employ three men, women, boys or girls; 116 establishments employ 219 people, or equal to one man or woman to each industrial establishment, and three-quarters of a boy or girl. Sir, does the House want to know anything more about the value of these census returns? Here is the volume, it is a mine, and I present it to my hon. friends. For every case I have given 50 more can be presented, whenever the hon. Minister of Finance desires them. And here I may make a remark or two on the new taxes that have been imposed. As the hon. gentleman knows, I had no opportunity of inspecting these proposed changes on Friday night, but since then, of course, they have been placed in my hands. As regards the taxes on spirits, none of us will raise any objection to the increase, the Finance Minister is welcome to get all he can out of spirits and liquors. The only question is whether he has raised the taxes to a point which may possibly provoke further smuggling or illicit distillation. A good deal of smuggling has taken place in the past, and I am inclined to believe that the hon. gentleman has got perilously near the point at which that smuggling will be largely increased. As regards sugar and the collateral industries affected, I do not know that I am going to say more at the present time than this: They afford a most admirable object lesson of the general truth I stated, that for every dollar the hon. gentleman pays into the public chest he is safe to exact at least two dollars from the people. We are going to pay one dollar and fourteen hundredths on all sugar from this time out, as nearly as the refiners can get to it; we shall get about \$1,200,000, and the people will be taxed to the tune of about \$2,000,000, provided our consumption equals the amount expected by the Finance Minister, namely, 250,000,000 pounds. As to how the other industries may be affected or interfered with, it is impossible to say. I observe the hon. gentleman has raised the tax in some cases on other articles to something like 50 per cent on the original value, as in the case of jams and jellies, and I find he gives enormous protection in the case of certain syrups and molasses. I do not know exactly how many pounds go to make a gallon of ordinary cane syrup; but if I followed the hon. gentleman rightly, the tax now imposed is likely to give 70 or 80 per cent protection to any party who embarks in the manufacture of cane syrup, a protection hugely out of proportion to any benefit that will accrue to the treasury. Although it may be that some parties have to suffer from this excessive protection, it is an ill wind that blows nobody good, and the House will be glad to know there are worthy parties, some not altogether unknown to us, who are supposed to benefit largely by the imposition of this tax. A very strange statement has been made and publicly circulated, which I mention, not that I am going to pledge myself to its literal truth, but which I deem to be a matter that will bear some investigation and inquiry. In a despatch from Halifax it is stated that the levying of a duty of one-half cent a pound on raw sugar will prove a bonanza to the Acadia Sugar Refining Company; that they have a stock in hand of raw sugar admitted free which in view of the imposition of the new duty will represent a profit of \$335,000, not to speak of the general increase in the price of sugar. If that be the case, those worthy gentlemen must have accumulated about 34,000 tons of sugar within a very recent period.

Mr. HAGGART. Sixty thousand tons.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, 34,000 tons, 67,000,000 pounds of sugar, I beg to inform the hon. gentleman, will yield at one-half cent per pound an amount of duty equal to $335,000, and 67,000,000 pounds represents 34,000 tons. The hon. gentleman can revise this calculation at his leisure. I should like to know, and I dare say many other people would like to know, who are the proprietors of the Acadia Sugar Refining Company. Why should the proprietors of the Acadia Sugar Refining Company, if these statements be correct, receive a gift of $335,000 at the public expense, which is practically what is being done? I remember long ago an occasion when the case was reversed. When the duty was taken off tea, if my memory serves me, Sir Francis Hincks compensated the holders of tea. It is a poor rule that does not work both ways, and the Acadia Sugar Refining Company might hand $335,000 over to Canada, and they might do this not unjustly. The hon. Finance Minister may not assent to this, but the cases are practically identical. These corporations have been very highly favoured in the past, and a very fair ground for argument might be made out for assuming the position that while no injury should be done to them, one of such corporations should not be allowed to pocket $335,000 at the present moment for their own personal benefit. I do not know, but I rather suspect that other refiners may not have been all equally provident. If they have been, there is going to be a very heavy discount on our new taxes. However, I have put certain questions on the Order paper, to which I hope to receive full and fair replies, which will enable us to ascertain in some detail how and in what fashion those benefits have accrued to those lucky individuals, the proprietors of the Acadia Sugar Refining Company. Sir, in this connection I may refer to certain specific cases of injustice committed by the tariff. I have often pointed out that while this tariff discriminated very heavily, in our judgment, against the whole producing classes, it was almost equally unjust to certain classes of manufactures, and that is in the nature of a protective tariff. What is one man's finished product is another man's raw material, and the consequence is that when you impose taxation in that fashion, you are very apt to hurt one manufacturer proportionately as you assist another. Now, Sir, that has been very notably the case of late years with respect to certain very important classes of manufacturers; all those who work in iron. I do not hesitate to say that they have been very unjustly treated, indeed, under this present tariff. I can see no just reason whatever why the iron worker should be compelled to pay 30 or 40 or 50 or 60 per cent perhaps, on his raw material, while the cotton manufacturer or the woollen manufacturer gets his raw material free. Let us have some fair-play, let us have some justice, let us have some reason in these matters, and if you are going to allow your cotton manufacturers and your woollen manufacturers and other manufacturers free materials, why in heaven's name discriminate against the iron manufacturers. They employ full-grown men with families dependent upon them, and it is well known that in the textile industries a large number of employees are only women and children. Sir, the manufacturers of Canada will do well to understand that, while the Reform party do not profess to favour them specially, neither do they wish, nor if they can will they permit, injustice to be done to one class of manufacturers for the benefit of another. As to our agriculturists, everybody knows that they are at present exposed to intense competition from the whole world. Every one knows that the prices of their products are not fixed by Government, but are fixed by the prices for which the productions of India, Argentina, Australia and other countries can be sold in the home market. The Government are hopeless and helpless to aid, but they are very potent to injure, and we find that things which are in the strictest sense the raw materials and the tools of the agriculturists, are constantly and repeatedly subject to very unjust taxation for no earthly reason except the benefit and advantage of a very small number of protected manufacturers. I notice one thing more. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) descanted largely on his free list, and I have a word or two to say as to that free list. The hon. gentleman is right in saying that a very great number of articles have been put on the free list. They range in our tariff from No. 482 to No. 778. There are 296 items on the free list, and of the 296, by actual count, I make it that there are three items which may fairly be considered as likely to benefit the public at large. The remaining 293 items are almost all for the benefit of certain special classes, either manufacturers or parties entitled to some privilege. On that free list of which we have heard so much there are, as I have said, three articles of general benefit, namely, anthracite coal, tea, and certain fruits. Almost all the rest of the articles are subject to duty and the articles that are admitted free are admitted, as I have said, simply and solely for the benefit of special individuals or special classes. But, Sir, it may interest our farmers particularly to know what they are allowed to import free. Should a farmer desire to adorn the walls of his mansion with pictures of the old masters, at a value of, perhaps, $20,000 each, he can import them free; but if he wants wall paper he has to pay from 40 to 100 per cent duty. If it pleases the farmer he can import ice free, but if he wants coal oil, he must pay 6 cents a gallon. By a wonderful dispensation, leeches are allowed to be imported free. I suppose the Finance Minister regards the leech as a totem of the National Policy, and entitled to special consideration. All Indian tribes respect their totem, and I do not see why protectionists should not respect theirs. But, if the farmer gets his leeches free, they take it out of him in tools, which are taxed 35 per cent. If the farmer greatly desires it, he is allowed to import ambergris free; but if he wants Indian corn for his cattle, he has to pay a duty of 7½ cents per bushel. If he likes a cabinet of antiquities, the farmer can get them as free as he pleases; but if he wants binding-twine, he has to pay 12½ per cent ad valorem. He can get sand free, but saddlery is 30 per cent and barbed wire $15 per ton; and that I think about comprises the list of articles which the farmer of Canada might import free. I do not want at the present moment, I have hardly time in fact, to dwell at length on the immense corruption which is always consequent upon a tariff of this kind. Whenever you make it the interest of a number of people having a command of money to dictate to the Ministry of the day what shall be taxed or what shall not be taxed, you have provision for ever made while your tariff lasts, for a permanent corruption fund. But I want to call attention to the extent to which our manufacturing friends, according to their own report, do dictate and did influence, not later than last year, the operations of the Finance Minister. I shall quote from the report of the secretary of the Manufacturers' Association. Quoth that gentleman:

It is but an act of justice to the committee to direct attention to the large number of changes made in the tariff along the lines of their recommendations, and in many instances the language used in both is substantially identical.

No doubt it is.

This is particularly noticeable as regards the iron industry, the duties on textiles, the duties on drugs, chemicals, alcoholic preparations, &c., as well as upon a large and extended list of miscellaneous articles, and most important additions to the list of non-dutiable articles. In many instances, where we suggested no changes, no changes were made.

Sir, I don't doubt it. I do not doubt that the Minister of Finance, then as heretofore, has proved himself in all respects the faithful servant and mouthpiece of the Manufacturers' Association. Now, what is the excuse that these men make; what is the excuse the Ministers make for their heavy taxes? They are willing to tax us to death to keep out pauper-made goods, and then they are willing to take millions of these taxes to pay paupers to come here and deprive our people of their livelihood. I have spoken of the enormous waste of capital that went on under the National Policy, and I emphasize it again for this reason: That in that waste of capital lies the chief apology for the creation of those numerous combines which now conspire together to raise the price of many articles of common trade and commerce, and which have been very ineffectually dealt with by certain measures, promoted by the Government or by some members of it. Now, Sir, as to one silly taunt which I notice the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) lately threw out with respect to the Opposition. The hon. gentleman was good enough to taunt the Opposition that we opposed the outlay for the construction of railways and other purposes intended to promote trade. Sir, the Opposition opposed no outlay for the good of Canada; but of what purpose is it to spend huge sums of money for facilitating trade, while your whole policy neutralizes the introduction of trade? Why should you cheapen transport and tax the things transported until they cannot be brought in? Why should you turn the people of Canada away and pay immigrants to take their place? Sir, I have given again and again the reasons why protection as a rule must fail; but in Canada these reasons have special weight. I doubt if there ever was a country so wholly and utterly unsuited to protection as a country like Canada, lying as it does within the same parallels of latitude, having all through very nearly the same productions, having very little indeed to exchange with each other, where the several provinces are on the whole competitors rather than customers one of the other. Now, Sir, we have had very curious testimony lately given us as to the opinion the late chieftain of the Conservative party entertained with respect to that matter. We have the evidence of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), than whom no man is better qualified to speak, as to the way in which the protective campaign of 1878 was inaugurated. We have the evidence of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) as to the difficulty with which the said chieftain was kicked on in the line of protection by himself and others, and how hard it was to keep him straight. We have the testimony of a gentleman of very high standing in Canada, Mr. Goldwin Smith, whose words I give as I read them the other day :

Till the election of 1878 was over, Sir John Macdonald disclaimed protection, and described his commercial policy as readjustment of the tariff. I had a personal interview with him a few days before the election, and I learned from his own lips that he foresaw the evil consequences of an application of protection to a country like Canada, as nearly as I think myself.

I dare say that my hon. friends in the maritime provinces will likewise recollect a certain telegram addressed to a certain Senator Boyd, in which the late chieftain of the Conservative party, a few days before the election, utterly repudiated the protectionist theory, and declared that all he wanted was a readjustment. And now, Sir, one word or two as to another argument of the hon. gentleman. He pointed to the enormous expansion of our trade and commerce in the last sixteen years. It had risen, he said, from $172,000,000 in 1878 to $240,000,000 in 1894, and, I suppose, to about $230,000,000 in 1895. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to this fact, that the total advance in those seventeen years scarcely equals 2 per cent per annum. But I want to call the attention of the Finance Minister to a still more curious fact. The advance in the ten years from 1868 to 1878, under a purely revenue tariff, and taking almost the worst of our years, was greater in proportion than it was in the seventeen years the hon. gentleman quotes. Making all allowance for the admission of British Columbia and Prince Edward Island, our increase amounted to about $34,000,000 in those ten years on an importation of $130,000,000. That means that our importation from 1868 to 1878 increased considerably more in proportion than it did from 1878 to 1894, and a very great deal more than it did from 1878 to 1895—and I may ask how much of the importation of the latter period was due to borrowing? Now, I have not time to go over certain of the silly fallacies or frauds which hon. gentlemen opposite have been insisting upon; but I will just enumerate some of them. I think we are getting about to the end of the home market fraud, the desire for economy fraud, the sham loyalty fraud, whether it takes the shape of proclamations to the Indians of Haldimand or others, the desire for reciprocity fraud, the general prosperity fraud, and the reduction of prices by reason of high taxes fraud; and if any hon. gentlemen on the other side are still unconverted, I advise them to look at the "Farmers' Sun," where they will find a number of very excellent articles, which they can read with considerable profit. Very likely, hon. gentlemen opposite do not like my way of putting these things. Very likely, they think I have been too rough in these matters. It has been my misfortune, Sir, to know too much about them and their predecessors. It has been my misfortune to know what have been the objects of some of the manufacturers who have urged an increase of taxation. It has been my misfortune to have learned, what has been confirmed of late, what would be the result of protection in Canada, as it has been in the United States and other countries. I knew that protection might help a few while it would hurt the mass of the people; I knew that it meant intolerable corruption; and I stand to every word of my speech as Finance Minister in 1876 and my speech in 1879, criticising the proposals which my successor brought down. I admit one thing: I admit that I did not allow enough for the power of clap-trap or the inordinate greed of certain parties; nor did I, perhaps, allow enough for the great effect which the example of the United States has always had upon our people, or for the rather natural desire which many of them had to retaliate upon the United States in return for the extent to which that country had interfered with our trade and commerce. As you probably pretty well know, Mr. Speaker, for a long time I have been accused of being a most pessimistic individual; but, Sir, the wheel has turned wonderfully. Why, Sir, I recollect when I was accused of the exact reverse in 1876, 1877 and 1878. Let hon. gentlemen read "Hansard" for those years; let hon. gentlemen look at their own campaign literature for those years: they will find that I was then charged with being reckless, overconfident, extravagant and utterly indifferent to the position of the country. Now, Sir, that was just exactly what I have not been, either then or now. I had very good reason in 1878 for the confidence I then expressed that we were about to weather the storm and weather it successfully. I knew in 1878 that the great interests of the country were all sound. I knew that there was only one, the great lumber interest, which was suffering under a temporary depression by reason of the depression existing at the time in the United States. It was perfectly true that the importers and tradesmen did suffer considerably in 1878, as it is impossible that they will not suffer at any time when there is a great and sudden shrinkage in the value of the goods they purchase. Men buying in a sinking market are very apt to suffer. But it was proved then, and subsequent events proved, that in 1878 and the years preceding, the manufacturers of Canada, as a whole, had done exceedingly well. Now, Sir, I knew that the revival was close at hand. I knew that the taxation we had, as subsequent events showed, was abundantly adequate in any ordinary year, when we had not a bad harvest, to produce all the revenue we required. And I knew another thing of great importance to this country: I knew that from 1872 to 1878 the farm population of Canada, notably that of the province of Ontario, was growing in a very respectable ratio—many times greater than the rate at which it has grown since. It is true, Sir, that in that period our cities, towns and villages all grew moderately; but the country grew in due proportion. During these late years we have seen, and seen with regret—I think all men have seen it with regret—that the population of the country districts all over old Canada has been absolutely stationary, while a few towns and cities have increased out of all due proportion. To-day the conditions have changed. Then we saw clearly what would have resulted had our policy been permitted to prevail; to-day we see clearly what has resulted from the reversal of our policy. My statements made in 1878 and in 1879 have been amply justified. I could heartily wish that they were not. I could heartily wish that I had been an untrue prophet; but I will give, this afternoon, just one instance of the way things have gone with a great many of our towns and villages formerly prosperous and thriving throughout Ontario, and I think the same rule applies to the hon. gentleman's own province. Some time ago, for the question is one of more than passing interest, I had occasion to investigate the condition of a town of about 4,000 people. I found that in 1878 this country town traded with about 5,000 families. To-day it trades over the same area, but the population has diminished absolutely, as well as relatively, and there are scarcely more than 4,000 families now in that same area. But I find this very important fact, that, whereas, in 1878, and the years immediately adjacent, on an average, every farmer spent in purchases for his farm and family, close on $600 a year in that town, to-day it is doubtful if those same farmers spend more than $200 or $300 a year. The result is that a trade of close on $3,000,000 in that town had shrunk to a trade of about $1,000,000 per annum. All the natural increase had gone, and there was a large reduction of the population both in town and country. That is a simple statement of the facts, and although I will not say that it will be reproduced in all its details in every town and village in Ontario, or the other provinces, I say that, substantially, it represents the condition of a very large number of formerly prosperous and thriving towns and villages throughout the country. Sir, this decrease in trade seems to be spreading upward to the cities. Even the hon. members for Toronto, I think, if they will own the truth, must be aware that the growth of that great city has not, of late years, by any means kept pace with their expectations and desires. They have found that the cities of a country cannot prosper unless the people at large prosper; and in the condition of Toronto, and other cities, we may see the certain result of an evil policy, when it has had time enough to work its natural results. The truth is that the farmers of Canada, as a rule, were very well off, indeed, in 1878, in spite of the bad harvests. Many of them had then a considerable deal of spare capital. And since that time they have been living on that and their borrowings. Their mortgages are infinitely greater to-day than in 1878, even though the rate of interest—no thanks to the hon. gentlemen opposite—has largely decreased all the world over. Now we have come to a period of standstill and enforced economy. Sir, if the Minister of Finance be really desirous to ascertain the condition of the farmers, particularly of Ontario, I would advise him to invest in a copy of a journal which does not always talk too kindly of himself or me, and that is the "Farmers' Sun," and he will find some nonsense and some unfairness, but a lot of useful information about the condition of the farmers. Here I will say one word as to the possible remedies for this state of things. I do not hesitate to say here that as regards any advantage or immediate relief to the farmers of Canada, I know of but one remedy, and that is the obtaining of access on fair and reasonable terms to the markets of the United States. That is the one thing which might bring immediate relief. But we may have lost our chance. The golden opportunity may have gone through the dishonesty and treachery and hypocrisy of hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not believe myself that it has entirely gone, but I admit that all that men could do to render it impossible has been done by hon. gentlemen opposite. The next remedy that I would prescribe, if I could, is simply to strike off our trade restrictions. Let us have tariff for revenue only. Let what the people pay go into the people's treasury, and be expended for the people's benefit. Let us have an end of all these wild-cat projects. Let us cease to offer up perpetual sacrifices to the great god, Jingo. Let us put our house in order, and make the most of what we do possess, and there is great need that we should. Before concluding, I will apply one rough test. Mind, I do not mean to say that it is a perfectly accurate test, but, at the same time, it is one that is worth applying. Everybody knows that our chief industry is agriculture, that we have very heavy debts to pay, taking into account all the debts which the people of Canada collectively owe. Nominally, we pay these debts in money, but really we have to pay them in wheat, barley, cheese, lumber, fish, minerals, and natural products of every description. Practically, our manufactures are nowhere. Now, let us measure the cost of our debt and the cost of our Government, not in ounces of gold, but in bushels of wheat, and see where we stand. In 1878 the interest on the total indebtedness of Canada, even allowing for the larger rate of interest, would not have exceeded fifteen millions of dollars. To discharge the interest on our collective debt at that time would have cost us, at the prices then prevailing, about fifteen million bushels of wheat, which might be the produce of one million acres of land. In 1895, I believe, if a true account were struck, the interest on our collective indebtedness was not less than $30,000,000. It would cost us 60,000,000 bushels of wheat to pay that interest at the present prices, and it would take 4,000,000 acres of our best land to produce that wheat. The total taxation, in 1878, amounted to $20,000,000, allowing for the deficit, and that would have cost 20,000,000 bushels of wheat. In 1894 our real taxes amounted to $60,000,000—$30,000,000 for the treasury, and $30,000,000 to private parties; and to pay that taxation, it would take 120,000,000 bushels of wheat at present prices, instead of 20,000,000. Were I to measure it by barley, the case would be worse, and by meats, not very much better. But I am happy to say that there is good reason to believe that our farmers and producers are at last awakening. In 1878 they drove away the sheep dog and gave the management of their flocks to the wolf, and now they appreciate the result. A good deal has been said at various times about the remarkable uprising known as the Patrons of Industry. I will give the hon. gentlemen opposite some figures from a source they cannot dispute, which may tend to show that their appreciation of the position is altogether astray. I find that the Conservative leader of the Ontario Opposition, Mr. Marter, the other day, speaking at London on the subject, gave the following interesting calculation to show that Mr. Mowat was in a minority. There were in Ontario, he said, at the last election, 107,000 votes cast by Conservatives, 98,000 by Patrons, and 153,000 by Liberals; thus showing Sir Oliver Mowat to be in a decisive minority. Therefore, on the computation of the Conservative leader in Ontario, the genuine Conservative vote has been reduced to about 30 per cent of the total voting population. Our farmers have learned that taxation never reduces prices. New inventions will reduce prices, cheaper transport will reduce prices, the development of new countries will reduce prices, but all that reduction is in spite of taxation, and not because of it. Now, if hon. gentlemen opposite will insist, I will make them an offer. They claim the right, and the sole right to arrogate to themselves, in virtue of the National Policy, all the reduction that has taken place in the price of manufactured goods. Let them shoulder, also, the responsibility for all the reductions that have taken place in the price of farm products since 1878. There are other one-sided arguments in which the hon. gentleman indulged. Like many others, he is willing to take, at any time, a few scattered facts which go to favour the National Policy, and to ignore all the rest. What man is there in charge of a large business who could not make himself out possessed of a huge surplus if he were to put on the one side all his credit, and to omit, on the other, all his debts? I do not refuse to admit that per se the increases in bank deposits, circulation and mileage are good, if they be accompanied by an increase in population. I admit, though that is more doubtful, that increase in insurance is good. These things are good as far as they go. But they cannot and do not neutralize the other and far more important facts of loss of population, depreciation of property, and huge taxation, to which I have called attention from time to time. Sir, I cannot pause now to discuss the injustice of this system of taxation further than to say that it is one of those systems of taxation under which it happens that the very poorest in the community, in proportion to their means are often the most heavily taxed, while the rich very often escape with an infinitely smaller proportion than the poorest are obliged to pay. Now, when the taxation is light, that may be overlooked; but when the taxation reaches the present enormous proportions it becomes a question which we must all, and the Government in particular, take carefully into consideration. Nor, Sir—for I have taken longer than I intended—can I find time to allude to no more than the barest and briefest way to the intolerable folly and wastefulness with which the money of the people has been dissipated. I can only name our Tay Canal, our Curran Bridge, our railway subsidies, our North-west expenditures, our immigration expenditures, our seventeen paid Ministers, our duplicate Speakers, our St. Charles extensions, our Caraqueet railways, our Fredericton bridges, our Behring Sea arbitrations and our Prohibition Commissions;—our Franchise Act, our Civil Government costs us a million and a half; another million and a half we pay for Militia, and get no Militia after all. Sir, these and all the other favourite ways of wasting the money of the people have been pretty fully laid before this House in times past. Take our Intercolonial Railway;—fifty millions of the people's money invested, and not one copper of revenue from it. We call ourselves lucky—most fortunate—if we can make both ends meet, and, notwithstanding our sinking fifty millions, we are not obliged to add more than a few hundred thousand of capital account from year to year. And what shall I say of the new projects in the North-west? Sir, I have here a document made up on very high authority which shows that there are to-day in the country extending from Sudbury to the western limit of the province of Alberta, a population of 261,161 souls. This, of course, includes the greater part of Algoma. In the same territory they have of constructed railway, 4,348 miles, being at the rate of one mile of constructed railway for every 60 souls or every 12 families in these territories. And we are asked for aid for projected lines which would run the total up, according to my calculation, to something close upon one mile of completed road for every ten people now in the territories—including the subsidy likely to be brought down for the Hudson Bay railway. I repeat that I do not, for my part, despair of the position of the country. But, I realize the facts. I realize that very great chances have been thrown away. I realize the long succession of blunders which have characterized the conduct of Government during the past twenty-five years. I can remember that Canada entered into confederation in this position—our debt was one-third per head that of the United States, our taxation was one-third per head of the United States. How stands the account to-day? Our debt per head, or I am greatly mistaken, is at least treble that of the United States. The debt of the United States per head of the people is $14. Our debt, according to the computation of the hon. gentleman, not taking into account the liabilities which he excludes, would amount to close upon $300,000,000, which would be about $60 per head. How has our population increased? Since confederation we have barely added a million and a quarter of people in nearly thirty years. Look at the increase in the United States, in their early days, without heavy expenditures upon immigration to help them. In 1790 their population was 4,000,000; in 1800 it was 5,300,000; in 1810 it was 7,315,000; and there was an estimated population of 9,000,000 in 1818. When I look back to what might have been done, when I realize that with reasonably wise government it would have been no great feat for Canada to have gained a population of 8,000,000 souls—perhaps 10,000,000—I cannot but feel that the greatest opportunities have been most ruthlessly thrown away. Well, Sir, as I said before, what, under these circumstances, can we advise? Our advice is simple and brief:—Make adequate provision for your deficit; do your duty to the country and let the people know and fully understand what the public liabilities are—liabilities which, according to the figures I have submitted, are not much short of $300,000,000. Sir, I advise that we learn prudence and economy; that we be content, as the Scriptures have it, with such things as we have; do not stretch our hands for further territory which we cannot properly administer or provide for without doing injustice to our own people. I would advise the hon. gentleman to dispense, for the time being, with his Pacific cables and East Atlantic services, I advise him to make friends, if it can be honourably done, with the people of the United States. And above all and before all, I advise him to strike off, as far as possible, existing trade restrictions. These things done, Sir, I will grant there is a reasonable chance that the country may right itself, that out of all this evil, there may spring some good. Sir, I do not pretend to say, and I do not believe that this country is going to escape entirely scathless from the results of sixteen years of folly, fraud and falsehood. We must suffer for what we have done; we must retrace our steps and must be prepared to submit to some sacrifice in doing it. What these gentlemen have done is to put back the progress of Canada for a whole generation. We cannot, and we do not pretend that we can give back to Canada her lost children, her "lost legions." Nor is it in our power, except in so far as our example can redeem the past, to blot out the marks of shame upon the shield of Canada which these men's conduct have caused. Sir, the hon. gentleman's proposals may stop the deficit. That is well. That ought to be done; that must be done. But we must do more than that. We must lighten the burdens of the people as well as stop the deficit. I do not pretend to say that that will be an easy task. I say that it is a task utterly and hopelessly impossible under the present system. Nevertheless that is the goal that the Reform party must keep in view, that is the goal for which they must strive; that is the goal which I hope and trust they will soon attain. As to the manufacturers, I desire to say most emphatically that we have no ill-will on our side of the House to the manufacturers as a class. We know that manufacturers prospered more up to 1878, and in a far more substantial and permanent way, than they have since, if the truth were known. Sir, we recognize fully the value of manufacturers to a country situated as Canada is. But our motto is: Justice to all classes. We neither propose to do injustice to farmers to please manufacturers, nor to do injustice to manufacturers for the purpose of pleasing farmers. Sir, I admit, I am not going for one moment to conceal from the House the fact, that a considerable customs tariff must be enacted for some time to come, but it must be a just tariff, it must be no tangled mass of dishonest absurdities like the one under my hand ; it must be something which is fairly and honestly framed for the purpose of bringing revenue into the treasury, and not at the dictation of protected manufacturers' associations for the purpose of enabling them to divide with the Government the plunder unjustly obtained from the people. Therefore, Sir, I propose this amendment to the motion that you leave the Chair :

That all the words after " That " be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof :— " the Estimates for the fiscal year 1894-95 amount to the sum of $38,517,152 independently of any further Supplementary Estimates which may be brought down.

That the said sum of $38,517,152 is in excess of the amount expended in 1893-94 by the sum of $922,127.

That the deficit for the year 1893-94 amounted to $1,210,322.

That the deficit for the present year is estimated by the Minister of Finance at $4,500,000.

That from statements made by Ministers of the Crown, in this House, it appears that our existing obligations for railway subsidies and for public works now in progress will involve a further outlay of $20,000,000, computed as follows :—

For railway subsidies now voted..	$8,729,000
For the St. Lawrence Canals.....	6,000,000
For the Trent Valley Canal.....	5,000,000
For the Intercolonial Railway and minor works	1,000,000

$20,729,000

The interest on which sum, together with the subsidy provided by Statute to be paid on account of a fast Atlantic service, will entail an addition to our already very heavy annual fixed charges of $1,400,000.

That, inasmuch as enormous sums of money are now exacted from the people of Canada which are not paid into the treasury, and inasmuch as the burthens of the people are thereby greatly and unnecessarily increased, and it is of the utmost importance to the well-being of the community that not only should the present extravagant expenditure be diminished, but that the said burthens should be reduced as largely and speedily as possible,—it is expedient that in making provision to restore 'the equilibrium between revenue and expenditure,' as recommended in the Speech from the Throne, the existing tariff be so modified that it may be made a tariff for revenue only."

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. HAGGART. Mr. Speaker, before criticising the policy of the gallant knight from Oxford as laid down in the amendment which he moved, and before dealing with the statement of policy indicated by that hon. gentleman, I wish to correct a few of the criticisms in which he indulged in his reply to the magnificent statement made by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. I think the gallant knight was not very good-natured in the criticism he offered. He said that without desiring to be discourteous the Finance Minister had performed a perfunctory operation, following a brief prepared by his department. Any hon. member who heard the candid and clear statement of the Minister of Finance must consider the remark of the gallant knight entirely uncalled for. The Minister of Finance has not had the educational opportunities enjoyed by the gallant knight from Oxford—he has not had the advantage of a legal education. I now refer to a biography published in a book called "Both Sides of the Question," in which it is stated that the gallant knight from Oxford received in early life his education as a lawyer. Afterwards he turned his face to a calling more natural to him, and became a financier. This work further stated that he became an adept in finance. The gallant knight undertook the management years ago of the Commercial Bank, and no doubt there are many widows in different parts of the country who will remember that institution with regret. Subsequently the hon. gentleman devoted his entire attention to the financial condition of the country, and became, as that work stated, an adept in finance. Hon. members will also find in that work a description of the qualities and capabilities of the hon. gentleman. There may be some hon. members who are titular leaders of the Opposition, but the real leader, according to the hon. gentleman's own opinion, is the gallant knight from Oxford. We have at last a policy propounded. The hon. gentleman criticised the Finance Minister on the score that there was in his speech an absence of reference to the National Policy. I will state for the information of the House that the policy of the Government is the policy which was enunciated in 1878, and which has been followed down to the present time ; that the Government is at present a Government in favour of protection, and it intends to follow that policy and to appeal to the people on that line. The gallant knight twitted the Finance Minister with having made no reference whatever to that policy. Did hon. members hear the gallant knight make any reference to dear departed ones, to commercial union, unrestricted reciprocity, continental free trade ? Now, however, we have a new policy, a tariff for revenue purposes only. We have at length obtained from hon. gentlemen opposite a statement of policy, and this policy of a tariff for revenue purposes only was explained by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), who said in a speech delivered in the lower provinces that there were three kinds of tariff, a free trade tariff, a tariff for revenue purposes, and a revenue tariff. That hon. gentleman did not trouble to mention anything about a free trade tariff, because no country in the world has such a tariff. He spoke of what a revenue tariff was, compared it with a protective tariff, and he instanced as a revenue tariff a tariff such as that in force in England, and it is such a tariff and such a policy that we are dealing with to-night. I venture to tell hon. gentlemen opposite that when the country comes to understand what a revenue tariff is, as explained by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), and as it will be explained to the country from one end of it to the other before the general elections arrive, a tariff for revenue only will occupy the graveyard with the dear departed ones, unrestricted reciprocity and commercial union. But before dealing with that question, as I intend to deal with it fully in the latter part of my speech, and instituting a comparison between the policy of the Government and the policy of the Opposition, let me deal with some of the statements of the gallant knight in his criticism of the Finance Minister's speech. One of the statements was that he looked with alarm on the state of depression that existed from one end of the country to the other, that the country was in a more depressed condition than it was in 1878. The gallant knight does not seem to have listened to any of the opinions expressed outside; he does not seem to be aware that people all over the world, and especially on the other side of the line, have declared that Canada has weathered the storm of depression which has swept over the world better than any other country that can be mentioned. I will give the gallant knight some of the statements made to show him how this country has improved, and although it may, perhaps, be a little tiresome to deal with figures on this point, it is necessary I should do so in order to present to the country a comparison of the condition of the Dominion now as compared with 1878. I shall also show the hon. gentleman evidences of the prosperity of the country. It will be remembered that the gallant knight stated that deposits in savings banks did not afford evidence of prosperity. Let me quote from the hon. gentleman's speeches on that point. Perhaps he has obtained better light now than some years ago, when he declared that one of the tests of prosperity was the amount of deposits in savings banks. Let the hon. gentleman refer to any political economist, and he will find that strongest evidence of prosperity is to be found in the increased savings of the people as evidenced by savings bank deposits. If the hon. gentleman has no faith in himself or in political economists, let him read the speech delivered by Sir William Harcourt, Chancellor of the Exchequer, delivered the other night in the English House of Commons, when, in referring to the depression which has spread over England, and mentioning the decrease which had occurred in exports, he declared that the country was sound, and that one of the best evidences was the increased deposits in the different savings banks. Undoubtedly that is one of the evidences of prosperity in a country, and in the Government savings banks of the Dominion we have striking evidence afforded by the savings of the people now amounting in deposits to the enormous sum of $297,000,000. Another test of wealth and prosperity is the amount of raw material imported into a country for the purpose of being manufactured. Let me make a comparison between 1881 and 1891 as regards the amount of raw material coming into Canada. Of wool alone in 1881, the import was 6,930,000 pounds; in 1891 it was 10,503,000 pounds; of cottons, 8,011,759 pounds; in 1891, 40,263,333 pounds; of raw sugar in 1881, 19,876,872 pounds; in 1891, 252,644,000 pounds. The same remark applies to hides, rubber, jute, veneers, hemp, raw silk, broom corn, there being an enormous increase in each of these articles. Now let me answer some of the criticisms in regard to the census which the hon. gentleman has so profusely indulged in this afternoon. The number of industrial establishments in the country in 1881 was 49,923, and in 1891 they had increased to 75,768. The capital invested in 1881 was $165,302,625, and that has increased in 1891 to an invested capital of $353,836,817. The number of employees in 1881 was 254,935, whereas the number of employees in 1891 was 367,865. The wages paid in 1881 amounted to $59,429,002, and the wages paid in 1891 amounted to $99,762,441. The cost of raw material—this is a true test, Sir, of the growth of the manufactures of this country, it is as true a test as possibly can be applied to the increase in a country's wealth—the cost of raw materials increased from $179,918,593 in 1881 to $255,983,219 in 1891. The value of products in 1881 was $309,676,068, and that had increased in 1891 to $475,455,705. Here is a table which give correctly all these figures :

	1881.		1891.
	No.	$	No.	$
Number of establishments.....	49,923		75,768
Capital invest'd.....		165,302,623		353,836,817
Number of employees.....	254,935		367,865
Wages paid.....		59,429,002		99,762,441
Cost of raw material.....		179,918,593		255,983,219
Value of products.....		309,676,068		475,455,705

That ought be a sufficient answer to the argument of the hon. gentleman. But the hon. gentleman went further and he criticised the mode in which the census was taken. Well, the census of Canada is taken precisely in the same manner as it is taken in most Anglo-Saxon countries in the world. If you go to the United States census you will find included there hundreds and hundreds of industries which have only one person employed in each, and I may say, that is the case in a great majority of them. The hon. gentleman could easily have found the increase of manufactures—even in his interpretation of the word “manufacturers” from our census, if he had taken the trouble to do so. Let us also judge by the total trade of the country how it has increased from 1878 to 1894. Notwithstanding the decreases in value of the present time, compared with the year 1878, our total trade has grown from $153,000,000 in the latter year to $230,500,000 in the year which has closed. Look at the interprovincial trade of Canada. Look at the immense trade which has sprung up in the different provinces of the country, a trade which has increased, as estimated, from $2,000,000 in 1867, to $125,000,000 in 1894. What an enormous increase is that. But the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) was not content with criticising the census, and although he did not refer as much as usual to it in his speech yet he adopted his old tactics of depreciating and decrying the country in which he lives. Worse still, he was not correct in his statements. He said that the farming property in the province of Ontario had decreased in value to the extent of $200,000,000; but, Mr. Speaker, what do you say to a statement of that kind when I tell you that there has been no decline whatever in that respect. On the contrary, Sir, there has been a gain of $95,000,000 in ten years. Land has decreased but there has been an increase in buildings, implements, and live stock. Let me refer the hon. gentleman to an authority which he will not deny; the authority of Mr. Blue, an officer of the Ontario Government and Sir Oliver Mowat’s statistician.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He is much like your own statistician.

Mr. HAGGART. Oh, then, we are to take the statement of the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) with regard to everything that is going on in this country. According to him our statistician is at fault and so is the statistician of the Government of Ontario who has taken every means to find out the real facts and who has a staff at his command for the purpose of inquiring into them. Should we not better depend on such statistics than on those furnished by the hon. gentleman? Where are we to go for our statistics if not to duly accredited officials? What means has the hon. gentleman at his command for finding out what the real statistical condition of the country is? Are we to take his “ipse dixit” as to what the condition of the country is, and are we to reject the statement of the statistician? I am taking evidence such as is furnished in this country, evidence that cannot be controverted and it shows that instead of a decline in the farming operations and agricultural wealth of the country, it has increased from $882,000,000 in 1882 to $979,000,000 in 1892. If any other evidence is wanted of the progress of the country, of the commercial development of the country, and of the increased wealth of the country, the railway statistics show it. Let me make a comparison between the years 1878 and 1894 in this respect. There were 6,143 miles of railway in operation in the country in 1878, and there are 15,627 miles at the present day. The train mileage run in 1878 was 19,609,447, and in 1894 it amounted to 43,670,029. The number of passengers carried in 1878 was 6,443,924, and in 1894 the number carried amounted to 14,462,498. The tons of freight carried in 1878 was 7,883,472, and in 1894 they amounted to 20,721,116. The earnings of the roads in 1878 amounted to $20,520,078, and the earnings of the roads in 1894 were $49,552,528. The working expenses in 1878 were $16,100,102, and in 1894 they were $35,218,433. The following table shows the facts:

YEARS.	Miles in operation.	Train mileage.	No. of passengers.	Tons of freight.	Earnings.	Working expenses.	Proportion of expenses to receipts.
1875.....	4,826½	17,680,168	5,190,416	5,670,836	$19,470,539	$15,775,532	81
1878.....	6,143½	19,669,447	6,443,924	7,883,472	20,520,078	16,100,102	78
1894.....	15,627	43,670,029	14,462,498	20,721,116	49,552,528	35,218,433	71

The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) paid a well deserved compliment to the Finance Minister as to the credit of the country, but he could not help that. The credit of Canada stands first and foremost of all countries in the world, except perhaps the mother land. Financial men who are the best judges of our resources and of the financial condition of the country, put our securities as high and higher than most of the other countries in the world. We are higher than all the sister colonies and we stand higher than those friends of the hon. gentleman in the republic to the south of us. Only to the mother country herself does Canada rank second. Our 3 per cent securities are selling, if I am informed rightly, at between 99 and 100 in the London market. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) criticised the borrowing of the Finance Minister in the old country, and he told the Finance Minister that when he did commence borrowing he should have borrowed sufficient when he was at it. It was a mistake, said the hon. member for South Oxford, that the Finance Minister only borrowed $10,700,000. Well, I remember a time in this House when the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) did not take that course or make that criticism. I remember when he blamed the Government for borrowing too much money, and, when not having means to apply it, of keeping it in hands. But now the hon. gentleman finds fault with the Finance Minister for a different thing altogether and he blames him for not borrowing enough. The hon. member (Sir Richard Cartwright) must know that the borrowing powers of the Finance Minister are limited. If he had looked at the Supply Bill, 57-58 Vic., he would find that the borrowing powers for general purposes amounted to $13,588,280.74. Now the loan made by the Finance Minister was for £2,250,000 or $10,950,000, leaving a balance of $2,638,280.74, which the Finance Minister retained for the purpose of guarding against possible contingencies, and which he retained in order to provide for what the hon. gentleman warned him that he did not provide for, namely, for the redemption of some of the loans which we have had from the savings banks throughout the country. It is one of the favourite maxims of the hon. gentleman for South Oxford, to revile and run down the credit of the country. He stated that there was no provision for redeeming any portion of the $40,000,000 which we have borrowed from the people of this country. That sum is for the purpose of providing for the payment of debt. Besides that, there is the sum of $4,938,352 in specie and guaranteed sterling debentures, over and above what the law requires for the redemption of our currency. This amount is retained by the Government for the purpose of providing for a possible run on our savings banks, besides $2,000,000 odd, which has been unissued. So that there is ample provision for the redemption of any amount that is likely to fall due; and the unexampled credit of the country would enable us, even if we had not this provision, to borrow at any time a sufficient sum for the purpose of redeeming any amount that we would likely be called on to pay. The hon. gentleman also criticised the statement of my hon. friend in reference to the liabilities of the country. He alleged that the statement I made in the House the other day, with reference to our liabilities on account of railway subsidies, did not correspond with the statement of the Finance Minister. My statement was that those liabilities amounted to nearly $9,000,000, while the statement of my hon. friend was that we were liable for railway subsidies under contract to the extent of $2,257,000, and that the probability was that there would be contracts involving a further sum of $2,587,000, and he added that if these two sums were added together and deducted from the $9,000,000 nearly, the remainder would probably not be called for by any of the railways entitled to subsidies. That was a statement prepared by my department. I told the officers to go carefully into the matter, and the statement of my hon. friend was strictly correct. The hon. member for South Oxford also stated that there was one liability which my hon. friend the Finance Minister made no mention of; that is, probable expenditure on capital account on the Intercolonial Railway. He stated that he had it on authority which it was not safe to disregard, that a large amount of capital might be required before many years to place the Intercolonial Railway in as good a position as it was in a few years ago. I can assure the hon. gentleman that my instructions to the general manager are that he shall at all hazards maintain the road and its equipment in the highest possible state of efficiency. That was the first duty imposed upon him. I told him that his first duty after that was to make the expenditure and the receipts as nearly as possible balance. He was not to enter into any unnecessary improvements; he was to look after the proper conduct of the officials; he was to see that the utmost economy was practised in every branch of the railway; and I have the authority of the general manager for stating that the road and its equipment are to-day in at least as good a condition as they have ever been. I do not claim a great deal of credit for this state of things, beyond the credit of insisting on the officials of the road carrying out their instructions to the very letter. I have also his authority for stating that the road has as excellent equipment as any road on the continent of America; and I can state for the information of the hon. member for South Oxford that he need have no fear that any degradation of the road and its equipment will necessitate any expenditure on capital account for a number of years to come. I have been enabled during the past year to save the sum of $65,000, principally in oil, fuel and repairs to cars, by the strictest economy; and I can gratify the hon. gentleman by stating, notwithstanding the severity of the year and the consequent extra expenditure required for running the road, that this year, like last year, the Intercolonial will come out with a slight surplus. Do not misunderstand me when I say that; I do not expect to need anything on capital account. There are some expenditures which will be absolutely necessary. Some expenditures may be required to enable us to meet the increased business of the road; but these will be principally terminal expenditures. I regret to say that during last summer we suffered great losses from fires on the Intercolonial. At Halifax the elevator and a great part of the station were burned, and at Rivière du Loup the station was burned. These two items alone involve losses amounting to nearly $325,000. So the hon. gentleman, in his criticism of my hon. friend's Budget speech, might have omitted altogether his reference to the probability of large sums being required to restore the Intercolonial to the state of efficiency that existed under his regime. The hon. gentleman stated that my hon. friend had not mentioned the claim of the Chignecto Railway as a liability of the Dominion. The statutory time for the payment of the subsidy to that railway has expired; the contract has not been performed. If any arrangement should be made by the Government in the future for the purpose of continuing the work, the House of Commons and the people of Canada will be fully informed of it; and the hon. gentleman, instead of classing it as a probable liability, should wait till the time arrives when he can properly so consider it. I may say the same with reference to the Hudson Bay Railway. That question will be dealt with on its merits, and the members of this House will have a full opportunity of considering any expenditure which the Government think advisable to make for the purpose of building that road. I would like to hear the hon. leader of the Opposition state what his policy is in reference to that road. He was at Winnipeg, and in various other parts of the Northwest country, and I have no doubt he was asked what he intended to do in reference to that matter. If I remember correctly one of his speeches there on the subject, he did not exactly promise the construction of the road, but he said that he considered it of the gravest importance to the people of that portion of the country, and that if he obtained power he would order a commission to inquire into the necessity of the undertaking.

Mr. HAGGART.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What are you going to do? Appoint a commission?

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman, in speaking of the extraordinary expenditures which his Government were obliged to assume from 1873 to 1878 as liabilities imposed upon them by the Government of Sir John Macdonald, asserted that they had to provide for $60,000,000 of liabilities, involving, at 5 per cent. an expenditure of $3,000,000 a year. The policy of the Government of Sir John Macdonald might have been reversed; but the hon. gentleman approved of that policy. It is true contracts were let on some of the works, but the moment the hon. gentleman and his friends came into power they cancelled every contract. Afterwards, they changed their policy and re-let the contracts, and I would like to have the pleasure of showing to the hon. gentleman in what manner they re-let them. Did they let them to the lowest tenderer? No; they picked out their particular friends, and to them they awarded the contracts. The hon. gentleman disdains paying any attention to the statistical authorities in the country. Of Mulhall he thinks nothing; Johnson, he ridicules; the statistician of the Ontario Government he treats with contempt; and, on his own authority alone, he ventures to make a most extraordinary statement with reference to what our people owe to foreign investors. That a gentleman who left his legal practice to devote himself for the rest of his days to the investigation of financial affairs should make the statement that we are paying interest to the extent of $30,000,000 per year to foreign investors, is something one finds it difficult to realize. I have not the statistics to prove the contrary, but I need only mention the amount that its absurdity may be patent to any one at all conversant with the subject. Let the hon. gentleman go to the bankers and the loan societies, and the other capitalists whose business it is to keep themselves cognizant of all these matters, and repeat to them this extraordinary statement, and he will find that whatever reputation he may be credited with as one having some knowledge of the financial condition of the country will vanish in their estimation. The hon. gentleman states that the depreciation in securities in this country exceed £16,000,000 sterling, and he referred with approval to the opinion of the London "Economist." But every hon. member knows that the London "Economist" is gifted with a peculiarly biased correspondent from this section, and we all remember the graphic production which appeared in that paper a couple of years ago from the pen of the right hon. gentleman, in which he described, in the most gloomy periods, the system of taxation in this country, and how oppressively it bore on our agriculturists. After further reference to the "Economist," the hon. gentleman called our attention to the organ of the Patrons, the "Farmers' Sun." Well, that organ has been particularly severe in its criticisms on the right hon. gentleman himself. I, myself, am of opinion that these criticisms were untrue, and I should advise the right hon. gentleman to look upon that newspaper's opinion as to the state of the country with the same suspicion as we are both disposed to give its comments on the hon. gentleman himself. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has adopted the principles of the Patrons, or whether the Patrons have adopted the policy of the hon. gentleman, or whether the Protestant Protective Association have taken up both or either of them, or they have adopted the Protestant Protective Association's. But whether they have agreed to disagree, or the reverse, the hon. gentleman was sufficiently enamoured of their society to become a candidate for membership of the Patrons of Industry.

Mr. HAGGART.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. gentleman give his authority?

Mr. HAGGART. Does the hon. gentleman deny it?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Certainly.

Mr. HAGGART. I will be prepared later to give my authority.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman has made the statement. Let him now produce his authority, or withdraw it.

Mr. HAGGART. I will accept the hon. gentleman's denial at present that he never was an applicant, but he was proposed in a Patron lodge, and refused admission. Fancy the right hon. gentleman from South Oxford sitting in a Patron lodge and striving to reconcile their policy with his, or square his policy with theirs. He then went on to speak of the depreciation in values in this country. But let us compare the losses in this country with the losses on the other side. It is true that there has been a depreciation of securities of all kinds in this country, but it is slight in comparison with the depreciation in the neighbouring country, and other countries of the world. It may be true, as the "Economist" says, that the depreciation in this country in railway investments amounts to £16,000,000, but let me direct attention to the railway losses in the United States. Seventy-six railways, or one-third of the total railway mileage of the United States were placed in the hands of the receiver last year. These aggregated a capital of $1,758,000,000. Twenty-three railways were sold under foreclosure, representing a capital of $79,924,000. I could refer the hon. gentleman to the sister colonies, to England, itself, to Belgium, to France, to Spain, Italy, and a host of other countries to show that the depreciation in Canada has been much less severely felt; and that I maintain is due to the fiscal policy of this Government. The hon. gentleman is very fond of making comparisons. He said that the expenditure in 1878, under the Mackenzie Government amounted to $24,455,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No; I did not. I said it was $23,516,000.

Mr. HAGGART. The total expenditure in 1878-79 was $24,455,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It was not. If the hon. gentleman will look at the Public Accounts he will see that the total expenditure in 1878 was $23,500,000.

Mr. HAGGART. I am speaking of 1878-79.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is what I am speaking of. Look at the Public Accounts, you ought to have them under your hand.

Mr. HAGGART. The expenditure of the hon. gentleman in 1878 was in the neighbourhood of $24,000,000. The estimated expenditure for 1895-96 is $36,834,000, or a difference of a little more than $12,000,000. That is the difference in the expenditure between 1878 and 1895. I wish to find out from the hon. gentleman, after I have explained each item of this expenditure, how he is going to economize. The debt charges, interest and sinking fund, amount to $4,000,000, every dollar of which the Opposition are just as much responsible for as the Government. The items which constitute public debt are the expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway, $44,000,000 or $45,000,000, the amount of indebtedness of the different provinces assumed, the expenditure upon the canals, and the expenditure upon the Canadian Pacific Railway. Did not the hon. gentleman build most of the canals himself? Did not his party, when in power, consent to the building of the Intercolonial? As to the indebtedness of the different provinces, was it not a compact with them, and was not that agreed to, universally, in this House? The total amount of that debt hon. gentlemen are responsible for.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not; I voted against it.

Mr. HAGGART. Will the hon. gentleman, or any of his friends, rise and criticise the figures of my hon. friend, the Finance Minister.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I rather think they will.

Mr. HAGGART. Will they criticise the expenditure of $45,000,000 on the Intercolonial?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. HAGGART. Was not the hon. gentleman, and was not his party bound to that expenditure? Were not the Hon. George Brown and the other leaders, parties to the compact with the provinces under which that road was to be built? Was not the assumption of the debt of the provinces one of the terms of confederation? Was not the expenditure upon the canals—a large portion of it made between 1875 and 1878—agreed to by hon. gentlemen opposite? And does the hon. gentleman object to the expenditure we made for the purpose of obtaining the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Very decidedly, I do.

Mr. HAGGART. Then the hon. gentleman, I will venture to say, is the only man of that way of thinking on either side of this House. His party are as proud of that work as we are on this side of the House; and they know that it could not have been made for a less expenditure of money, or of land. The friends of the hon. gentleman tried to get contractors to build it for even more, and could find nobody to accept their terms. Therefore, I say that the debt of the country, which is represented by these four items, these gentlemen are as much responsible for as any member of the Government.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not in the slightest degree.

Mr. HAGGART. The additions to the debt since 1878-79 increased the expenditure on account of interest and sinking fund by $4,600,000. If the hon. gentleman and his party come into power, must they not pay that amount? Then there are increases in the subsidies to provinces—$800,000, and $30,000 added the other day increased subsidy to Manitoba. These two items, on account of debt and provincial subsidies, hon. gentlemen opposite will certainly have to pay if they get into power. Then there are the increases in the earning departments of Government—Railways, Canals and Post Office. These increases amount to about $4,000,000. The hon. gentleman knows that this is a matter of book-keeping. Take, for instance, the Intercolonial. The total earnings are turned into the treasury of the country, and the total expenditures are covered by the Estimates passed by this House. With this item of $4,000,000, added to the others, we have a total of $9,400,000. The expenditure in 1878 was $24,455,000. Add the increases I have given, and you have the smallest sum which gentlemen opposite, if they were in power, could expend in the administration of public affairs. Let me give the details of these increases in the earnings department. The Post Office expenditure in 1878 was $1,720,000; the receipts were $1,200,000; leaving a deficit of $520,000. The Post Office expenditure in 1894 was $3,517,000; and the receipts, $2,800,000; leaving a deficit of $690,000—not nearly as much, in proportion to the receipts, as in 1878. The expenditure on the Intercolonial in 1878 was $1,816,000; and the receipts were $1,300,000; a deficit of $516,000. In 1894, the expenditure was $2,981,000; earnings, $2,987,000; a surplus of $6,000. Take the details of the further additional expenditure, steamship subsidies, increased from 1878 to 1894 by $147,000; quarantine, increased $18,000; agriculture, increased $165,000. Do hon. gentlemen opposite, if they get into power, intend to do away with our experimental farms? There was nothing of that kind in 1878. Is that one of the items in which they intend to decrease the expenditure? The administration of justice has increased $205,000. Does not the hon. gentleman know that most of the expenditure for judges is fixed by the different provincial governments? They appoint the courts, and they state the number of judges they require; and does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that they can make any reduction in the administration of justice? Then there is an expenditure of $258,000 for the government of the North-west Territories, for which the Mackenzie Administration had not to provide in 1878. The adulteration of food is $19,000; steamboat inspection, $12,000; fishery bounty and protection, $280,000. Perhaps the hon. gentleman from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), when he takes the position of Minister of Marine and Fisheries in a new Government, if he does not take the position of Minister of Justice, will be able to wipe out that expenditure altogether. He may do away with the cruiser protection service, he may wipe out the bounties to fishermen in different parts of the maritime provinces and thereby save an expenditure of $280,000. All these items amount altogether to $10,504,000, leaving $1,896,000 to be provided for according to our Estimates of the present year. Now how is this made up? On Indians there is an expenditure of $450,000 more than there was in 1878. Do you intend to reduce the expenditure upon Indians? Do you intend to shut up their schools? Do you intend to make any reduction in the expenditure in that section of the country? I venture to say that the hon. gentlemen, if they ever get into power, will be unable to make any reduction in the expenditure now made for the purpose of civilizing the Indians, making more moral the aboriginal inhabitants of the country whose land and territory we possess. It is a duty we owe to them, and every portion of the Dominion are willing to make a fair expenditure for this purpose. On penitentiaries we estimate $138,000. Perhaps the hon. gentlemen will be able to strike that off. I am speaking on the supposition that they attain to power, but the probability of their doing so is very small. I remember the hon. member for South Oxford addressing a meeting up west when he assured his audience that if the Liberal party got into power he would be the Minister of Finance. I remember the contemptuous manner in which he spoke of his associates, stating that he would be a necessity in a Liberal Government for the purpose of conducting financial affairs, as he was now a necessity in Parliament for the purpose of criticising the lies which the Tory party were hurling from this side of the House. He talked as if he were the only gentleman capable of doing it, and that if he were not elected to the House, there would be no other member of the party capable of criticising the Budget. We have heard the letter read by the hon. member for Middlesex yesterday, in which we are promised another. We are going to open South Renfrew, they say, and we are going to have Mr. Peter Ryan to run in that constituency. We have the assurance of the organizer of the party, or at least of some of the electors in South Renfrew, that Peter Ryan is to be in the next Government. It appears that Ontario is only going to have three representatives in the Cabinet, the Minister of Finance, Mr. Peter Ryan, and, perhaps, the third one will be the hon. gentleman who looks particularly after superannuations. There is $156,000 in that item, Militia and Defence, $480,000; Mounted Police, $166,000, which is the increase above the amount expended in 1878. That is one of the items, I believe, they intend to strike off altogether, do away with the mounted police up in the North-west, and then they will be able to reduce the expenditure by $100,000. Then we have a total of $1,390,000; add that to the amount above mentioned, and it still leaves a balance of $586,000. That amount is the increase from 1878 to 1894, and the Geological Survey, Immigration, Dominion lands, Dominion Police and Legislation, will take that up. Now, the hon. gentleman says that if they get into power they will make a great reduction in the burdens of the people. The hon. member for South Oxford, I know, does not think so; I know he does not think that he can reduce the expenditure of this country beyond a small amount. The leader of the Opposition says it can be done, but I do not think he will be able to carry out his promises, if he ever gets a chance. Let me consider for a moment some of the promises of the hon. gentlemen, and the way they are going to reduce the expenditure. I challenge any hon. gentleman opposite who may address the House after myself, to give a statement of the particular items in which they intend to decrease the expenditure of this country, and show how they are going to levy the amount of money that will be needed. We remember that there was an interprovincial conference at Quebec some time ago, and I will just analyse some of the demands of that conference. The leader of the Opposition is bound in a sense by that conference, because one of my hon. friends the other day read a letter from Mr. Mercier, then the leader of the Quebec Government, in which he stated, if I am not mistaken—at least the statement has never been denied in this House—that if the leader of the Opposition got into power he would carry out the pledge made by Mr. Mercier during the election, and give increased subsidies to the provinces. The result of fulfilling that promise will be to increase the subsidies to the different provinces to the extent of $1,721,476. If these hon. gentlemen get into power that will be an additional annual charge upon the expenditure of this country. Carrying out that pledge, how is it possible for them to reduce the expenditure? If they do not intend to carry it out, let them stand up and say so. The people of the country demand that the Opposition should say whether they intend to carry out the resolutions passed by the Quebec conference, and approved by the leader of the Opposition, in case they get into power. Let us see what is stated by Mr. Peters, the friend of the hon. gentleman from Queen's (Mr. Davies). He states openly in a speech down there that the hon. member for Queen's is Mr. Laurier's right-hand man, and if the Liberal party get into power, the hon. member for Queen's will have an influence with the Government such as no other man will have. He says there will be no direct taxation required from the people of the island, if Mr. Laurier gets into power; in other words, he expects that the demands made by the Quebec conference will be acceded to if the Opposition get into power.

Mr. HAGGART.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman's colleague in the Senate proved last year that there was a matter of $2,000,000 due from the Dominion to the island, and the hon. gentleman took him into the Government after he advanced that argument and satisfied him it was right.

Mr. HAGGART. How appropriate it is to the argument to state that a colleague of mine in the other House had proved that $2,000,000 were due by the Dominion to Prince Edward Island. What has that to do with the statement I made that his friend and supporter in the island, Mr. Peters, relies upon the success of his party to get better terms for Prince Edward Island, on the plea that the island has been neglected, that they are entitled to more, and that if the hon. member for Queen's gets into power they will have more public works, the resolutions of the Quebec conference will receive an endorsement from the Government, and Prince Edward Island will receive $70,000 more than it does at present.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) About one-fourth of what you lost on the Montreal bridge.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman will not say that if he and his friends get into power he would not give $70,000 annually to Prince Edward Island. I will tell the hon. gentleman this, that his friends in Ontario could not support a policy of that kind; they dare not support any Government in power which would milk the Dominion to the extent of $1,770,000 more, and if the Liberals had a majority of two-thirds of the Ontario members, the Government dare not support such a policy.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then you do not intend to give us that?

Mr. HAGGART. So, for the purpose of my argument, there is this amount to be added to the expenditure of 1878, and also different sums to carry out the promises made by the leader of the Opposition in regard to public works. Hon. gentlemen opposite criticise the Government for our lavish expenditure, not lavish expenditure, in their opinion, but corrupt and criminal expenditure. But hon. gentlemen opposite have stated publicly that in regard to the North-west, Manitoba and British Columbia, the present expenditure is not sufficient, and it would be increased if they got into power. At Medicine Hat, Mr. Laurier said :

I am not a puritan or a saint, but simply a man, and I do not hesitate to say to you that in the west you need public works.

Mr. Gibson at Medicine Hat, said :

In the North-west the requirements are many. Your constituency has not got all it should have. You need a bridge.

Mr. GIBSON. I wish to correct the hon. gentleman. What I said on that particular occasion was that money enough had been spent on the Tay Canal, and money enough had been stolen in connection with the Curran Bridge to give them the rails required.

Mr. HAGGART. I am quoting from the hon. gentleman's speech at Medicine Hat. That was his statement at Revelstoke.

Mr. GIBSON. I never made a speech at Medicine Hat.

Mr. HAGGART. At Vancouver, on September, 13th, 1894, that hon. gentleman said :

He would say that the Liberal party was just as much in favour of legitimate public works as the Conservatives were. Any one sailing from Vancouver to Victoria could see where public money might be spent in improving the approach to the Terminal City's magnificent harbour.

Perhaps he did not say that.

Mr. GIBSON. My reason for saying so was that on the passage from Vancouver to Victoria we found that through the negligence of the Dominion Government in not erecting proper lighthouses on the route, a large steamer of 1,200 tons was lying on the rocks.

Mr. HAGGART. Mr. Laurier, in his speech at Vancouver, said :

I agree with my friend Mr. Gibson, that perhaps there is something to do for this city yet. Perhaps it would be well to encourage and assist the energy of the people, and that the harbour of Vancouver might be improved with some public money. I can only reiterate what has been said by Mr. Gibson : That when we have a Liberal Administration at Ottawa, it will be the duty, it will be the pleasure of that Administration to favour any public work that is for the credit and benefit of the Canadian people, and it would certainly be for the benefit of Vancouver, and for the whole of Canada, that the harbour of this fair city should be made as accessible as it is possible to make it.

Mr. HAGGART

Mr. Laurier at New Westminster said :

Great works are required up on the Fraser River.

Mr. Laurier, at Winnipeg, on September 6th, 1894, ("Globe" report) said :

Mr. Laurier, in reply to a question from Mr. James, a prominent Patron of Industry, stated that because of the insufficiency of information in his possession, he had formed no opinion as to the feasibility of the Hudson Bay route, but he would favour the voting of considerable money in favour of a thorough investigation.

Hon. gentlemen opposite, as appears from their public utterances in the North-west, Manitoba and British Columbia, have promised considerable additions to the expenditure for public works, and also an expenditure for Prince Edward Island of $1,771,000; and yet, notwithstanding the statement I have made, and the comparison I have instituted, showing the uncontrollable expenditure, hon. members opposite declare they would reduce the expenditure to the extent of $5,000,000 per annum, the hon. member for Oxford puts the amount at $2,000,000, and other members at $1,000,000. I should like to hear an explanation from some hon. gentleman opposite, and I suppose it will be made by the hon. gentleman who will follow me, how, when the expenditure of 1878 there is added $1,771,000, even omitting altogether the promises of additional public works made by the leader of the Opposition in different sections of the country, to show how hon. gentlemen opposite could submit a less expenditure than that asked by the Minister of Finance. I defy such a reduction to be made, and I do not believe a statement could be submitted to show it, one that would stand the test of investigation by financial men, as it would be criticised from one end of the country to the other. The expenditure of the country, as the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) stated, is but slightly controllable—it is almost beyond the control of the Finance Minister.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is quite beyond his control, I think.

Mr. HAGGART. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite, in addressing the people continually state that the present enormous expenditure is due to the Conservative Government. I affirm that as regards the public debt, every man is responsible for it, and if hon. gentlemen opposite were in power to-morrow, they could not bring down an estimate of a less amount than the one submitted a few days ago. Let me now discuss for a few moments the policy of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) as enunciated in his amendment. It is proposed to establish a system of taxation on the principle of a tariff for revenue only. I accept the definition given by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), who declared that there were three systems of taxation, one is free trade, another tariff for revenue only, and another a protective system. I am quoting from memory from the statement that the hon. member made, and if I am not right I shall be glad to be corrected. Free trade, he stated, was unattainable at present. There was, he said, no country in the world which had a system of pure free trade. The system which they had in England, he added, was a tariff for revenue purposes. But the goal of the hon. gentleman was to adopt a system similar to what they have now in England and to impose the incidents of taxation upon the people of this country. I tell hon. gentlemen opposite that they dare not state from one section of the country to the other that they intended to raise taxes in Canada the same as they do in England.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not know that the hon. gentleman tends to impute to me that I said: I intended to raise the taxes as they do in England.

Mr. HAGGART. Not at all.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I made no such statement.

Mr. HAGGART. I am taking the natural sequence of the amendment of the hon. gentleman in which he states that they intend to raise the taxes for revenue only, and the logical sequence of the statement of the hon. gentleman is, that that would be done by a system of taxation similar to that of England. I am not imputing any statement to the hon. gentleman, but I am drawing the deductions myself. Now let us see what is meant by "taxation the same as they have in England. Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw your attention to the system of taxation they have in England. The customs taxation in England is raised on nine articles only, namely, tobacco, £9,948,809; tea, £3,418,162; rum, £2,335,147; brandy, £1,423,826; spirits, £668,921; wine, £1,921,052; currants, £113,994; coffee, £177,206; and raisins, £175,957; the whole customs taxes of England is levied on these articles. Do hon. gentlemen opposite propose that the customs taxation in this country will be raised on similar articles? No, Sir; the people of this country would not submit to anything of that kind. It is but to be mentioned and understood in Canada that such is the policy, and the people will have none of it. In England the incidents of taxation do not fall on the rich as ought be the case and bear lightly upon the poor. Does not the poor man in this country use as much tobacco as the rich man? Does not the poor man in this country use as much tea as the rich man, although it may be of an inferior quality? Does not he use as much rum as the rich man? Perhaps he does not use as much brandy, perhaps more spirits, less wine, perhaps as much coffee and probably less raisins. The incidents of taxation upon the people of the country as it is known to be in England is a specific tax, or a tax per capita upon the people. In England the poor man pays the same as the rich man does under their system of levying the customs taxes. Do hon. gentlemen opposite intend to levy the custom taxes in Canada in a manner similar to what they are levied in England? I tell them that they dare not do any such thing. It may be asked why they levy the taxes in this manner in England, it must be remembered but then they correct it in another way. They correct it by the following taxes which are levied entirely upon the rich; the Probate Duty, the Legacy Duty, the Estate Duty, the Succession tax, the Deeds, the Receipts, the Bills of Exchange, the Patent Medicines (which perhaps do not fall so much on the rich) the licenses, the Companies Capital Duty, the Marine Insurance, other stamps. And then as other taxation, the Land tax, the House tax, the Income tax, which the poor man does not pay at all, and the Post Office tax which he, perhaps, pays less of than the rich man. They correct the levying of the taxation in England by a special impost upon the rich men of the country, but the customs tax is largely paid by the poor. In England there is a specific tax, or a per capita tax, and the people of Canada have only to understand the system and no Government in this country dare put on a tax such as that, nor dare they supplement it by a direct tax, such as the hon. gentlemen opposite propose to-day. Therefore, I state that if the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite means a system of taxation such as they have in this country, the people of Canada will not submit to it. The policy of the Canadian people has been declared again and again in favour of incidental protection to the manufactures of the country. It is the policy of the American continent. Last session, or the session before, when the Democratic party got into power in the United States hon. gentlemen opposite were constantly vaunting "Oh, protection is gone for ever, we are going to have continental free trade for ever, and if we get into power in Canada we shall have a system of free trade, levy the taxes directly, and have reciprocal arrangements with the different countries of America. A more absurd statement was never made to an intelligent audience. If we were to have free trade in Canada, and allow the products of other countries of the world to enter free, what compensation would the people of the United States, or of any other country have for allowing our products to go into their country free. Such a proposition has only to be stated and understood to be laughed at by every intelligent people. Every one knows the great success of the Republican party of the United States at the last election, when the Democrats were swept out of office by a cyclone such as never struck any political party in the world. The people of the United States have declared in favour of a protective system, and a protective system must be the policy of this country for a number of years to come.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Four hundred years.

Mr. HAGGART. For a number of years to come. Hon. gentlemen opposite have not now a word of grief over their departed ones, unrestricted reciprocity, commercial union and continental free trade. The dear one which they have now taken to their bosom is a system similar to what it is in England, but I venture to say that the Liberal party themselves will see how ridiculous is their position in this respect, and that when they go before the country they will be hedging on the meaning of the word in the resolution. They will, no doubt, be telling to the manufacturers of this country that a tariff for revenue purposes means, perhaps, incidental protection to manufacturers, but they will not tell the true meaning of the word, and before long they will leave their policy of free trade, or the policy such as they have in England, in the cemetery with unrestricted reciprocity and commercial union. The hon. member for Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) chaffed the Minister of Finance that he had not said a word about the National Policy. Well, the policy of this party has been defined by the resolutions of 1878, and is still stuck to, and approved of by the people of this country. That policy is to protect many manufactures which may be peculiar to the country, which may be produced in this country by a system of protection as cheaply as they can be imported from any other country, although in the meantime in order to obtain that, the impost upon the people may be in excess of what they could get it for from other countries. There is the promise to the people of this country that we will protect our manufactures, and the promise of the manufactures is: we will give, after a time, the protected manufactures to the people at as cheap a price as they can be imported from any other country. Now, how have they carried out their promise? The four or five principal articles manufactured in Canada are woollen goods, cotton goods, leather goods, manufactures of agricultural implements, and the different industries of which iron is the component part.

Mr. LISTER. Seventeen of them were ruined under your policy.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister) will have an opportunity of replying afterwards. What I state is, and I state it boldly, that for the same quality of woollen goods, the people of Canada receive for their money as fair value as they do in any other part of the world. Am I correct in that?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. HAGGART. Do they not get it cheaper than the people of the United States?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. HAGGART. I have heard the same statement made with reference to woollen and cotton goods. The test of the cheapness of cotton goods in the country is the ability to export them and put them into successful competition in a foreign market with similar goods from free trade countries. Is not that the test that they are being manufactured in the country as cheaply as they could be imported into the country?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What do you want of the tax, then?

Mr. HAGGART. I will explain afterwards what we want of the tax. Let me get through with my argument, and I will tell you. I will admit openly that perhaps you may have to pay a little more for cotton goods. In regard to leather goods, I have the authority of the hon. gentleman himself, in a speech which he delivered in Quebec, for stating that Canadian manufacturers make boots and shoes as cheaply as they are made in any other country in the world. Are we not exporting those goods and selling them in free trade England? Are we not manufacturing the leather in this country and selling it in the old country? Do we not send agricultural implements to Australia, New Zealand, and all other countries in the world, and sell them more cheaply than any other country? Do we not buy sugar in this country as cheaply as it can be bought in any other country? and it is all manufactured in the country. There is one industry, the product of which I will admit at present costs more here than in other countries, that is, the iron industry. At present there is a bounty on iron, and we also impose a duty on iron coming into the country; but we say to the people of Canada: You are at present paying a little more for your iron goods; but the time will come, and come shortly, when we shall be able to furnish you with iron goods manufactured in this country as cheaply as they are imported into the country. Let me, by way of example, show how the protective duty on iron has operated in the United States. In that country there is a customs duty of from $5 to $20 per ton on different kinds of iron and steel goods imported into the country. The hon. gentleman's argument is that that duty is added to the price at which the consumer could obtain the goods from outside countries, because the manufacturers in the country just keep the price up to the point at which the goods could be brought in plus the duty. But what has been the case in the United States? Notwithstanding the high duty imposed upon pig iron coming into the country, the people of the United States have pig iron furnished to them from Alabama and Georgia cheaper than it can be bought in any other country in the world. It is sold in Alabama and Georgia for a little more than $6 a ton, while the customs duty is about $5 a ton. Some of the manufacturers in the city of Toronto are able, notwithstanding our duty, to purchase pig iron in the Southern States and pay the duty and bring it to Toronto, in competition with English iron and iron from other countries. Not only that, but the Americans are sending pig iron from Alabama and Georgia to enter into competition with the product of the cheapest iron manufactories in the world. They are sending it to Antwerp and London, where it is being sold in competition with German, Belgian and English pig iron. What does the "Iron Age," a paper published in London, state in reference to this matter? Owing to the competition of Germany and Belgium in the manufacture of pig iron, the iron manufacturers of free trade England have formed a combine, under which a certain percentage of the price obtained for every rail that is sold in England or in any other part of the world is paid to the German and Belgian manufacturers; and now the "Iron Age" states that they will be obliged to take another nation into the combine, because the people of the United States are sending their pig iron over to England to enter into competition with the English product. What the advocates of the National Policy in this country say to the people of Canada is this: Protect our industries for a short time; it is true you will perhaps pay a little more for the article manufactured in the country; but the result will be that after a while you will get your iron here as cheap as you can any where else, because we have the coal or the natural gas with which to manufacture iron in the country; we have abundance of iron ore, and we have the authority of two of the most illustrious of our friends in the Liberal party in favour of protecting the iron industry of Canada; we have the leader of the Liberals in the province of Ontario bonusing an institution for the manufacture of iron in the city of Hamilton; we promise, as in the case of woollen, leather and cotton goods, agricultural implements, and other great industries of the country, that a judicious system of protection will, in a few years, result in the establishment of iron manufactories, by which the skilled labour and the capital will be retained in the country, and the product will be sold to the consumer at as a low a price as he can import it at from any other country. What is the reason, then, the hon. gentleman asks, why you put imposts upon cotton and woollen goods brought into the country? The reason is this. In a small country like this the duty does not prevent foreign goods coming in. A diversity of industries of innumerable kinds is required to enable manufacturers to manufacture goods as cheaply as they could be imported from the country which has the largest market and the largest manufactories, and it is not necessary that foreign goods should be entirely prevented from coming in. The policy of this Government is that the protection granted should be placed at such a point as not to prevent all articles of the kind protected from coming into the country—why? For this simple reason, that the protection is a stimulus to cheap production. It improves the design; it increases the skill of the worker; it results in better machinery being used; and there is a certain amount of competition with foreign goods. Moreover, we are enabled by the import duties to levy a certain amount of money for the purpose of carrying on the Government of the country. What would be the result, then, if the hon. gentlemen got into power? If, as they say, they will never rest content until they sweep away every vestige of protection in this country, such a catastrophe will happen to this country as might never happen to any country in the world. The whole manufacturing class would be swept away at one blow. We would be left a purely agricultural country, and the history shows beyond cavil that a country without diversified industries is necessarily a poor one. They dare not do it, even should they get into power. If they should do it, their own following would receive such a correction from the electorate, from one end of the country to the other, that they would not remain in office a week. Is it possible that they would be so insane, if they should get into power, as to attempt to carry out the pledge they have made by a solemn resolution? We have heard the promises they have made with reference to commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity, and we know how quickly they changed front on these and other questions, so that we are justified in concluding that they will again be equal to the occasion. But God help this country if such a catastrophe should ever happen us as the sweeping away of every vestige of protection. With the same blow all the capital invested in manufacturing would be swept out of existence. Perhaps I have dwelt too long upon this question and wearied the House. The question is after all one which will be decided at the polls. There the fiscal question will be the main issue. There may be endeavours in one section of the country and another to raise the religious cry, but the people are too intelligent to be thus deceived. The only live issue before them is the fiscal question, and I venture to say when that is put fairly before the people, they will support the policy which has been enunciated by the Finance Minister of this Government.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant.) I shall not attempt to follow the example of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, and delay the House with a personal history of that gentleman. He was kind enough to give us part of the life history of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), as a lawyer and a banker, and a Finance Minister, and financial critic, but I do not intend to follow the hon. gentleman in that line, and for one very good reason. I do not know his early history, nor do I suppose that it is of very great consequence to us in this debate. I, therefore, cannot dwell upon personal matters, but shall pass on to notice just a few of the points on which the hon. gentleman touched. I was glad to hear him affirm again that the policy of the Government was the same old policy that it adopted some sixteen years ago—that they are standing by it yet. I do not think that the hon. Minister of Finance went to that length. His faith in the policy was somewhat shaken last year and the year before, and he sought to deviate from it; but not being able to find any resting place, he has settled back on the old platform. Our policy, as embodied in the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford, placed in your hands, Mr. Speaker, a short time ago, has been described as a new policy—the policy of tariff for revenue. Now, I may tell the hon. gentleman who has thus described it, that his memory is surely a very short and unreliable one. Sixteen years should not have entirely obliterated from his mind the policy that was in vogue in this country prior to that when ye had a tariff for revenue. That policy was in vogue when confederation was formed, it was continued for six years under a Conservative Government, and for another five years under a Reform Administration. Surely, the hon. gentleman cannot have forgotten that, and surely he must remember that that is the policy which he and his friends are so fond of contrasting in its effects with their own policy. Sir, it was held by the Reform party at that time, as it is to-day, that to depart from the principles which then guided us in fiscal matters, and to adopt a protective policy, would be a mistake. That opinion the Liberal party has never changed; and from that time down to the present, the issue has been clear and distinct between the party in power advocating a protective tariff and the Reform party advocating a tariff for revenue only. I think the people understand this. The hon. member for South Oxford has indicated clearly that the policy of the Liberal party is to enact a tariff, not on protective principles, but for the purpose of securing the revenue necessary; and to do this it is not necessary, as he has said, to levy the same duties upon the same articles and in the same way as is done in England. Then the hon. gentleman gave us an illustration of the development of the country under the National Policy, especially with reference to manufactures, and he took his figures from the census returns. Sir, it was bold of him—and I can only account for his doing it by the fact that he had the statement prepared and did not like to waste material—to venture any statement in that direction as proof of the satisfactory working of this policy, after the exhibition that was made of those figures by the hon. member for South Oxford this afternoon. However, he ventured to do so, and claimed that we should accept his statements as reliable. I need not enlarge upon this. We may safely leave the analysis that was made of these figures by the hon. member for South Oxford this afternoon, go to the country in connection with the utterances of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, and allow the people to decide between them. The hon. gentleman is very anxious that we should point out what economy we would be disposed to effect if we should come into power. I do not know that we are called upon to do that at present. Let that hon. gentleman possess his soul in patience. Notwithstanding the cowardice of the Ministry, as shown in their determination to go to the country, and then wavering in their resolution—and then determining and then wavering again—it will be out of their power to delay an appeal to the electorate longer than another year, and then, when the Liberal party are elected to office, he will have practical evidence of the economies which they will be able to put in practice. Meanwhile, if it will do the hon. gentleman any good, I shall mention one or two possible ways in which economy would not be out of place. For instance, there could, as we have often pointed out, be effected a saving of several thousand dollars a year by wiping out the Franchise Act, which is worse than useless. Then, it might not be impossible to maintain an equilibrium between the revenue and expenditure on the Tay Canal. And while it is not possible to build bridges for nothing, still it might be possible, in the construction of a $200,000 bridge, not to spend $400,000. And so with reference to the Fredericton bridge and other outlays in all parts of the country, it might be possible, consistent with efficiently carrying on the public works of the country to save a considerable sum. He reverted several times to a personal attack upon my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and alluded to a statement which he said that hon. gentleman had made, that when we came back to power he would be necessary as the financial critic, as he would understand that department best, and then he would be necessary as Finance Minister.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And I did not say so.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant.) I think the hon. gentleman did not make these statements.

If he was speculating as to the future at all, I think he would speculate, not upon coming back in the position of financial critic, but, judging by the signs of the times, he might fairly indulge in the expectation he would ere long be administering the affairs of the country and administering them in such a way that a strong financial critic would be required to find fault. Then, the hon. gentleman thought he had made a point in mentioning that when my leader, accompanied by some of his supporters in the House, were on a trip in the North-west Territories and British Columbia, speaking in different constituencies where they had found public improvements needed, they stated that where these improvements were necessary in the public interest, they were ready, at all times, to support the expenditure for the improvements. Why, Sir, no one takes exception to that. No different policy would be pursued by the Liberal party if they were in power. Does any one suppose that needed public works would be neglected by them? It is not against public works, necessary in the public interest, that the criticisms of the Opposition have been directed; their criticisms have been that the public moneys have been squandered upon experiments, and upon objects not demanded in the public interest. But, Sir, I need not dwell longer upon the points made by the hon. gentleman save as I may allude to them as I enter for a few moments upon a criticism of the Finance Minister's speech, delivered to this House in what he termed "the exposition of the Budget." Sir, I am free to say that the statement of the Finance Minister was, in some respects, very ingeniously prepared. The hon. gentleman quoted many figures. But, instead of giving to the country a correct estimate of the position in which we stand, the effect of those figures would be, if they were accepted, to mislead the country as to the progress we have made, and as to the position we are now in. Before dealing with that, I would say that I am sorry that the Finance Minister himself was not able on the day he made that statement to tell us what the full amount of the liabilities of this country would be, but that to-day he had to rise in his place and give a supplementary list of those liabilities. And here I would say, as a member of a popular branch of the legislature, as a member of the people's House, I feel that under the arrangement of the present Government, and as that arrangement has worked out, the people's House is not treated with the respect, and is not allowed the position of dignity that the members of this House have a right to demand. Sir, I am not taking exception to the Prime Minister being in the Upper House. I recognize that within that House are many gentlemen of note and many gentlemen of great power. But, Sir, I say that it is not right, because the Prime Minister has found his seat in that House, that, important as that House may be, information that is asked for by the people's representatives on the floor of the people's House must be gathered from reading extracts from the speech of the Prime Minister delivered in another chamber—information refused to the people's representatives from the mouth of the gentleman, who is supposed to lead this House. Let the other Chamber enjoy the dignity conferred upon it by the presence of the First Minister. But, in this House we have a leader appointed by the First Minister. Let that leader be sufficiently taken into the confidence of the Prime Minister as to be able to give us information of primary importance on those subjects upon which we have a right to be informed. One or two things has been made apparent by the answers given in this House. Either the leader here has not been taken into the confidence of the Prime Minister, or the gentleman entrusted with leadership in this House has not been frank and straightforward in the statements he has made to this House. Neither of these do I wish to attribute to the Government of the day. But we are forced to one conclusion or the other by more than one scene we have witnessed in this House. Take the case of the Hudson Bay Railway. The leader of the Opposition in this House asked for information with reference to that. The leader of the House did not know the terms of the Order in Council—so I think he informed us—but promised us the information would be laid upon the Table before he made his financial statement. The papers relating to the matter were laid upon the Table just as the hon. gentleman rose to make his Budget speech. But we learn upon reading the utterances of the First Minister that the members of the other Chamber have the privilege of being told by the Prime Minister what has been done in reference to this matter. Sir, if the importance of that House was recognized, as it should be, if that House was given the dignity it ought to have, then, certainly, the vacancies that exist, as evidenced by the answers given by the hon. Minister the other day, should have been filled long ere this. The House in which the First Minister sits, in which the information was given, that is withheld by the leader in this House from the people's representative, ten vacancies allowed to exist there, one of them for four and a half years, another for four years, another for three years, and so on. Sir, what will the people understand of the nature of the duties of the members of that House? Will they not argue, if that House can for years go on with ten of its seats vacant, may it not go on for the years that are to come in the same way? Then, Sir, what do we find? The Minister making his statement in that Chamber, the Minister here hesitating to say anything, the Minister who has just taken his seat saying that we would in time find out something about the Hudson Bay Railway. That is the information given. And what is the promoter of that railway doing at the present time? Why, Sir, when interviewed by newspaper correspondents, he speaks of the Order in Council as giving him the authority of the Government for building that road, in aid of which he is to have $2,500,000. He seems to take it for granted that the Order in Council will be ratified by what he seems to consider a servile majority in this House, treats it as a matter beyond doubt that the Ministerial majority in this House must ratify that Order in Council, judging them, I suppose, by the course in the past. Sir, that matter will yet have to be considered by them, and the country will wait to see what may be the action, and whether his opinion of them thus expressed, is a correct one or not. Meanwhile, I would say to the leader in this House in reference to this matter, not posted, afraid to make a statement, withholding it, from what cause I know not—I would suggest to him, that as the matter stands, it would be well for him to have a clerk make a statement in writing in reference to the matter and read that to the House, and if it did not turn out right, then he could say it was prepared for him by the clerk. Now, Sir, I come to consider the position that was taken by the Minister of Finance with reference to the present condition of the country as illustrated by a series of comparisons he instituted. He was pleased to take a table of 1874-79, and compare it with a table of 1889-94, in order to show what vast increase there had been in the volume of trade between these periods as an outcome of the beneficial results flowing in the adoption of the National Policy. Sir, he chose that period from 1874 to 1879, when, as he admits himself, there was a period of unusual distress prevailing all over the world, a period, as he himself declares, such as no other period since has approached; and he compares that period with the last five years. Sir, it struck me, so often were his comparisons made with the years 1889 to 1894, that it was possible the Minister of Finance was seeking to glorify himself during the period in which he himself had the honour of holding the portfolio, glorifying himself by the reduction of taxation. I have only to point out to him that whatever glory is due to him on that score, he effectually dispelled when, this year, in the presence of deficits such as were never known under a former administration, he was forced to restore the taxation, and again impose the burdens upon the people. But in dealing with the volume of trade as between these periods, let me take it on another basis. Let us look at the volume of trade in 1894, and again in 1874, and let us see what progress we have made during that time, five years of which were under a Reform Administration, and fifteen under the National

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

Policy as operated by hon. gentlemen opposite. It seems to me that much as we rejoice in any development, much as we rejoice in any progress, the development and the progress in that direction are not such as we can congratulate ourselves very heartily upon. I would that it were greater, and I hail with joy any manifestation of increased prosperity. But when we compare it with what it ought to be, we will find that instead of the prosperity that we might fairly expect, instead of trade blooming under their National Policy, it has been instead blighted. Why, Sir, take the total imports and exports. In his two statements he spoke about the imports falling from 1874 to 1879, the exports rising in 1889-94, and the imports rising in the same period. Let us take them together. In 1894 the total volume of trade was $240,999,889. In 1874, 20 years before that, it was $217,565,510. In 20 years, 15 under the National Policy, the total volume of our trade has only increased $23,434,379; it has increased only 11 per cent, whilst our population in the same time has increased 31 per cent. Our foreign trade per head in 1874 was $56.88, while under their National Policy in 1894 it had fallen to $48 per head. There is $8.88 per head less trade in the Dominion of Canada in 1894, than there was 20 years ago in 1874. What does that mean? It means a decrease in our trade in proportion to the population of $44,590,706; or in other words, our trade should have increased, if it had kept pace with the increase in our population, as it should have done, by $68,025,085, while the actual increase was only $23,434,270. But, Sir, the Minister may reply to me: You have taken the year 1894, and this was a year in which there was a restriction in trade, in which there was a depression. Well, we will take the year 1893, the year of the largest volume of trade that this country has had under the National Policy, when it was seven millions more than it was in 1894; and we have only an increase of thirty millions in our trade in 1893, over what it was in 1874; while we should have had, in proportion to the population as given to us in the Year-Book, an increase of $68,000,000. But I go further and I ask the Minister of Finance: Who is responsible that there is not a larger population in this country, if it be not the Government of the day? Sir, they promised they would keep the population in this country by their National Policy; they said by their statistics that they had brought in, in addition to the natural increase of the country, 800,000 immigrants in 10 years to swell our numbers. Now, who is responsible that we have not a greater population, a relatively greater number, if it be not the Government that sit opposite administering our affairs? If we take just the natural increase and make no account of the immigrants that have been brought into this country, according to their showing we should have had in Canada today 5,355,427 souls; and, Sir, if we had them then we should have had a larger trade in 1894 than we actually had, by over sixty-three million dollars, or if you take the year 1893, their largest year, we should have had a larger trade by fifty-six millions. Sir, I think that the boast of the Finance Minister regarding the increased volume of our trade is not one that can very forcibly strike us, but is one which we as Canadians, while rejoicing that there has been any development at all, must admit is a development which has been very much restricted, hampered and lessened under the policy which has been pursued. But the hon. gentleman was pleased to compliment himself in more directions than one. He came down to specific points, and he declared that as regards our export trade we had reason to be proud of the result. He instanced that our exports to Great Britain had increased, and to France an increase of 100 per cent. The hon. gentleman continued :

There is an increase in trade with Germany from three-quarters of a million to two millions ; there was also an increase of trade with Spain, Italy, Belgium, Newfoundland, the West Indies, South America, China and Japan, Australasia and other countries ; and the only decrease in our exports last year was to the United States, a large decrease, and to Portugal, and a very slight decrease with our trade with Holland. I say that hon. members may look over the history of our trade returns and they cannot find in any previous year a state of things showing such a universal and widely extended increase in our exports to the different countries with which we trade as is found in the statement I made of our trade last year.

That was a comparison made one year with another, comparing 1894 with 1893. Let us go back in the history of this country 20 years, and compare the state of trade then. Our trade increased, the hon. gentleman said, $4,500,000 in our exports to Great Britain between 1894 and 1893, and that is true. To France the increase was 100 per cent ; but the hon. gentleman did not tell the leader of the Opposition, when asked the question, what the volume of the trade was, but he said it was not much. But taking our imports and exports our trade with France was less during last year than it was 20 years ago. I may mention another fact, that in 1878, the last year of the Mackenzie Administration, when everything, according to hon. gentlemen opposite, was in a ruinous condition, we exported to France 50 per cent more than in 1893. Our exports to Spain, another country mentioned, were 11 per cent more in 1877 than in 1894 ; to Italy, another country to which the hon. gentleman referred, the exports were 40 per cent more in 1878 than in 1894 ; to Newfoundland we exported in 1873 within $18,000 of the amount exported in 1894, while our trade was nearly $1,000,000 more in that year than in 1894 ; to the West Indies, which was also mentioned, we exported in 1877 10 per cent more than in 1894 ; to Australasia, which hon. gentlemen opposite have been cultivating and of which they have been boasting so much, we exported in the last year of the Mackenzie Administration, that year which is pictured by hon. gentlemen as a year of desolation and ruin, 15 per cent more in 1878 than in 1894 ; while to the United States our exports show a decrease to the amount of $8,000,000. So the hon. gentleman's boast of the extent of our export trade and his comparison of the years of the Mackenzie Administration with years of Administration by the present Government shows that our trade with those very countries in which he had gloried and regarding of the trade he had boasted was actually less than at the previous periods to which I have referred. Then the hon. gentleman spoke of our debt. Who is responsible for it ? That question has been discussed, it has been threshed out, it has been dealt with so ably by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) that I shall not occupy the time of the House at this hour of the evening in dwelling on it. The hon. gentleman recognized the fact that it is $100,000,000 more now than it was when the Reform Administration left office. He knows whether the promises made with respect to the redemption or reduction of the debt through means they were to employ has been brought about or not. The debt is there, and interest has to be paid on it. But the hon. gentleman has attempted to minimize the burden by pointing to the fact that the rate of interest on which he was able to secure a loan on the English market was lower than on certain previous occasions. I rejoice with him, and I wish not to withhold an iota of the meed of praise due to him for what he has been able to accomplish in that direction, for no one can say anything regarding the credit of Canada standing high without pleasing me, and all credit due him I will give him in this matter ; but when the hon. gentleman speaks about the burdens of the people being lessened, notwithstanding the increase of the debt, because the rate of interest has decreased under the loan effected, it requires a little examination to ascertain just where we stand and to find whether the burdens of the people have actually been lowered as a matter of fact or not. What did the hon. gentleman tell us himself ? He said that in 1878 the rate of interest was $1.58, in 1894, $1.79. That is the amount of net interest per head of the population. We find, then, according to the hon. gentleman's own statement, that 21 cents more of net interest is paid now than was paid previously ; that increase of 21 cents per head, taking the Minister's own figures means an increase of one million dollars per annum to the burdens of the people. What more ? While the rate of interest has increased under this Government 13 per cent, the interest on loans and mortgages effected by private individuals has fallen 25 per cent.

And why? It was because money seeking investment was plentiful and the rate of interest was reduced here as well as in England. While money was down the hon. gentleman was able to affect a loan on favourable terms, and he now ignores the fact—while I do not wish to minimize the amount of credit due to him—that it was not wholly the high standing of Canada in the money market that had to do with the reduced rate of interest, but also the fact that money was at that time cheaper in the markets of the world. But what about the burdens which have been imposed upon the people? The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) pointed out the way in which that question would have to be determined. He said that it was not settled with bullion. He pointed out how this interest money is paid and in what it is paid. And taking the question in that way, what do we find? This burden has to be paid out of the wheat and other products, while wheat is one-half the price that prevailed in 1878. It takes two bushels now to pay that which one bushel would have paid before. The Minister of Finance has overlooked the fact that it would have taken three times as many bushels of wheat in 1894 to pay off the net debt as would have been required to pay off the net debt in 1878, and the debt of the country and the burdens on the people have to be measured by that standard, and not by the standard the Minister of Finance set up. Then, Sir, again we find the hon. gentleman taking credit to himself for reducing the rate of taxation on the people, and he congratulated himself on the fact that if he had not reduced taxation somewhat he would not have had a deficit, and he went on to make certain calculations, and dwelt largely in "ifs." I might suggest to the hon. gentleman that when he was dealing in "ifs" he might have said that if he had imposed twice the duty on sugar he could have taken off half of it, and he would then have had no deficit. But, Sir, we have to deal with facts as they are. Let us see what has been done in the direction of reducing the debt and the rate of taxation on the people. I will take, as a comparison, the period from 1874 to 1878 and 1890 to 1894, five years of the present Administration, and five years of Reform Administration. Well, Sir, if any one will take the trouble to look at the total of the per capita customs duty paid as found in the Trade Returns, he will see that during the five years of the Mackenzie Administration the average duty paid per head, from 1874 to 1878, was \$3.44, and if he looks at the other period, from 1890 to 1894, under the Government of the hon. gentlemen opposite, he will find that it was \$4.44 per capita. That is, that there was an increase of duty from 1889-90 over 1874-75 of \$1 per head. And if you estimate the population at 4,000,000 only, that was \$4,000,000 more per year that he took during the years that his taxation was reduced than was taken under the Reform Administration. When he speaks of that, I should like to point him to the fact that if \$5 per head had been taken by Sir Richard Cartwright when he was Finance Minister—as the hon. gentleman himself says was the rate of taxation by his party in 1888 and 1889—then Sir Richard Cartwright, instead of having a deficit, would have had a surplus of millions upon millions of dollars. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) claims that under the reduction of taxation that they made, if they had maintained the same rate of taxation, they would have had during these years \$125,000,000 of revenue, while as it was they had \$107,900,000, the result being that they left in the pockets of the people \$17,100,000. But if the rate of \$5 per head had been levied during the five years of the Reform Administration, estimating the population at only 4,000,000, there would have been \$31,000,000 more revenue, or \$14,000,000 would have been left in the pockets of the people than the present Finance Minister claims to have left them by his reduction of taxation. But, Sir, while that is true in that degree only with reference to his reduction during the year it was off, what was the effect of the taxation that was upon the people of Canada during the other years of the National Policy from 1879 to 1889. The average per capita during that period was \$4.40, or 96 cents per head per annum more than was taken by the Reform Administration, which, estimating the population of not more than 4,000,000, means that during these 11 years \$3,840,000 extra in excess of taxation was taken from the people of the country; or if you estimate the population at 4½ millions, then \$4,320,000 per year excessive taxation was taken from them during these eleven years, or a total of \$47,520,000. So that when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) boasts of the reduction of taxation, and talks about throwing off his \$4,000,000 on sugar duties and relieving the people of the country, what has that to do with the determination of the burden of taxation that is upon the people? Sir, taking his whole tariff together, with the reductions that he is claiming, and giving him all the benefit for that, we find that the taxation that he has wrung from the people of the country, even under his reduced taxation, was millions more than it was under the Reform Administration; and we find that during the eleven years that no reduction in sugar was made at all, he took nearly \$50,000,000 of extra taxation from the people over and above what was requisite to carry on his affairs in such a manner as to conduct them in the best interests of the country. But now with a deficit of about one and a quarter millions for last year, and a deficit of four and a half millions admitted by himself for this year, he has had, in order to guard against another deficit, to add to the already too heavy burdens of the people one and a half millions dollars more taxation. Sir, I am willing that the hon. gentleman should take to himself all the glory of the years that he has presided over the Finance Department which he is fairly entitled to; but to a gentleman who criticised so severely and so often the condition of things under the regime of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who during a time of financial distress such as he said Canada had not seen up to that time nor since—to a gentleman, I say who criticises us so severely and jubilated over the position he occupied in comparison with us, there must be almost a feeling of pity and commiseration for him. Sir Richard Cartwright during his term as Finance Minister carried the ship of state through five years of such depression as admittedly has been unheard of in this country before, with only a deficit of $4\frac{1}{2}$ millions, and now the present Finance Minister, in the face of that, is to be pitied when he has to stand up in his place and acknowledge a deficit of one and a quarter millions for last year, and of four and a half millions for this year, and another deficit staring him in the face for next year, which he can avert only by adding to the already heavily burdened people of the country one and a half million dollars of more taxation. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) professes again to preserve our industries, oblivious of the fact that the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has pointed out that the great bulk of them suffer under his system, and are not as well off as they would be under a revenue tariff. I ask the attention of the Finance Minister and of hon. members to this fact. When the Finance Minister made these reductions of the tariff, which he claims to have made, every reduction he made on each separate item was an official declaration on his part that for the previous eleven or thirteen years each year that these duties were on there was an excessive taxation during all the years they were on. And, Sir, when he put 80 cents per 100 pounds on refined sugar, and some years afterwards reduced it to 64 cents per 100 pounds, thus reducing the burden of taxation upon the people 16 cents per 100 pounds, he declared by that act that for the years during which he maintained the rate at 80 cents per 100 pounds on that sugar, that he had taken out of the people excessive taxation according to what even protectionist principles required of him to give, or he could not have reduced it to the 64 cents as he did. I say that when the Minister of Finance reduced that duty from 80 cents per 100 pounds to 64 cents per 100 pounds, he in the same breath told us he was leaving protection enough to protect the industries of the country, and nobody doubted him in that respect, at least on this side of the House. But, Sir, if 64 cents was enough protection for the sugar refiner last year, and this year in proportion, then, Sir, it was enough for him during the years that it was 80 cents per 100, as levied by him, and if during these years he had left the duty at 72 cents instead of 80 cents, and put 8 cents per 100 pounds on the raw sugar, the people certainly would have got their sugar as cheap, the refiner would have had the same protection that the Finance Minister claimed was enough when he reduced the tariff, and there would have been put into the public treasury \$240,000 per annum, instead of the paltry sum on that item of \$10,000 which went there under the tariff as he arranged it at that time. So it is with reference to every item in which the Finance Minister made a decrease. When he made those decreases he declared it as his fixed principle that he would leave enough protection on. It was not a rate of revenue, but according to his principles of protection, which he declared was not to be gauged by a revenue at all, but according to the circumstances and needs of the industry and the state and condition of that trade at that time. That is a protective tariff. And, Sir, when he made reductions he made them on that principle, and I say that every reduction he made on any single item was naturally a declaration on his part that for all the years before upon which an excess had been, that it was, even from a protectionist point of view, taxation wrung from the people, and which should have been left in the pockets of the people. I am sometimes amused at listening to hon. gentlemen opposite speak as if the Government were the country, and that any progress that is made in the country is all due to them. They speak as if it was a matter for the greatest congratulation on our part that in a country like Canada, with all the resources of Canada, a country that is seeking population, a country that can afford homes for millions and tens of millions of people whom we are asking to come here, with the riches of the sea belonging to us, the riches in the mines, agricultural lands unsurpassed with a race of men and women inhabiting it than whom there can be found no superiors in any country on the globe—that, because in the past two decades we have advanced somewhat, we have held our own, it is a matter upon which we are to congratulate ourselves, and for which we are to shout praises to the Government that they have not run us into the ditch altogether. Sir, it is not in their power, great as their power has been used tending in that direction, to wholly withhold progress from Canada. The test by which they are to be judged is this: Has Canada made the progress that Canada ought to have made under a proper fiscal system? That is the test ; and, apply that test as I have done to the small increase in the volume of our trade, and the small increase in our export trade, and to all the facts that the hon. gentlemen themselves enumerate as proofs of our advance, and I ask them if they are at all adequate. Sir, to prove the success of their policy they claim the credit for things with which their policy has nothing whatever to do. The Finance Minister points to our banking institutions, speaks of their solvency, commends their strength. I rejoice with him that our banks are on a stable footing ; but what has the National Policy to do with our banks ? What credit have the Government to take because our banking institutions are conducted on safe and sound principles ? Sir, if our banking institutions were managed as the Government have managed the affairs of this country, I think their shareholders would think of their managers much as this side of the House, and as the thinking people of this country regard the Government of the day. Sir, I rejoice in the standing, the solvency, the stability of our banks ; but I give the credit to the managers of those institutions, and not to the Government. If the managers of the banks were to make an investment of \$70,000,000, and were to assure their shareholders that at the end of ten years that sum would be all repaid with interest, and if at the end of that term they were forced to confess that they had not received one dollar either in principal or interest, the shareholders might possibly think a change in the management desirable. Nor, if these managers were to put in a plea that they were not to blame, because one of their clerks told them so, do I think that even that would save them ? We were told that an investment of that amount would be recouped to us out of the sales of our land in the North-west by 1890 ; but years after we find that the sales have not paid for the surveys and the cost of management ; and the Finance Minister pleads as an excuse that the Government are not to blame, because one of their clerks not only said that it would be all right, but actually figured it out on paper, and what more could a reasonable man require ? If the hon. gentleman wishes to compare the management of our banking institutions with the management of the Government, I am willing that the comparison should be made. If the cost of our banking institutions were to be increased largely on the assurance to their shareholders that they would add largely to the list of customers, and if, at the end of the term it should be found that only one-third of the promised list of customers had been added, I am inclined to think that the shareholders would think it was time to have a change of management. And when these hon. gentlemen told us that under their management we might safely incur increased expenditures, because they would bring people into the North-west, and when we found that, when the time came around not one-third of the promised number were there, we say it is time for the people of Canada to change the managers of their affairs. Sir, the Finance Minister made one statement on a public platform in the part of the country from which I come, with which I was rather pleased, because it indicated a desire, on his part, to extract what comfort he could out of the present condition of affairs ; but when he contemplated the small increase to our population which had occurred in the last decade it must have been very disappointing to him that he could not show an increase under the National Policy of 12 per cent when there ought to have been a natural increase of 20 per cent, in addition to the 800,000 immigrants that the Government claimed were brought in. Yet the hon. gentleman took comfort in the thought that if we had increased in population only half a million that was 100,000 families ; and estimating five to each family and a consumption of \$200 worth of farm products by each family, it would mean an additional market for the farmers of the country to the extent of \$20,000,000. That is true ; but if the addition to our population by natural increase and by the immigration which the Government claim to have brought in as the result of the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars had been realized, there would have been an increase of over 1,500,000 to our population, or 300,000 families of five each, and if they consumed \$200 worth of farm products per family, there would have been an increased home market for the farmers to the extent of \$60,000,000. We are glad that he was able to claim an increase of 100,000 families ; but under this case we should have had a home market for three times that number. Hon. gentlemen may say that I am extravagant ; but they will not charge me with extravagance when I say that after their promises, the country might reasonably have expected that there would be in the last decade an equal increase to that which occurred in the preceding decade under a revenue tariff. But there was not. Had there been, there would have been a home market for one-half more than the increased amounts which the hon. gentleman claims under the National Policy. It is by this question of population that the weakness of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite is shown. The Minister may take the public records and produce this set and that set of figures ; he may cull and choose them as he likes ; but the fact of the matter is, that in this Canada of ours we are not progressing in population or developing the country to the extent which we are entitled to expect ; and I say it is lamentable to find, by the very census figures which hon. gentlemen themselves rely upon, that in a revenue tariff decade our population increased 19 per cent, while in their National Policy decade it did not increase 12 per cent. I say that fact is discouraging, and it wipes out anything that may be urged by hon. gentlemen opposite as an argument at all worthy of consideration in favour of their management of public affairs; for, whereas, in the decade from 1881 to 1891 they only added 11.74 per cent to our population; in the same period they increased the debt 36.93 per cent. Not only have they not brought people into the country or kept our own people in the country, but the people in the country are being burdened and weighted down by the taxation imposed upon them, while a large part of it is being squandered in works for which the value has not been received, and in entering into which the Ministers would seem to have for their prime object the strengthening of themselves in some part of Canada. Sir, I shall not delay the House by going minutely into the census returns. My hon. friend from South Oxford has so thoroughly showed the fallacy of this boasted increase in the number of industrial establishments, taken from the census, that I shall not dwell further on that point. I cannot remember the exact figures my hon. friend gave, but he certainly showed such contradiction between promise and performance—such a discord between the magnificent promises held out to the workmen, if they would only submit to the imposition of this immense taxation, how their wages would increase, and they would have constant employment, and the results as shown by the figures of the census—that one marvels at the hardihood of the hon. gentleman in attempting to controvert his statement. Let me give one instance of which I have personal knowledge. In a riding with which I am acquainted, there is set down in the census, under the head of pulp and windmill factories, two new industrial establishments to swell the increase. What is the number of hands employed? One hand employed in the two mills, and his yearly wages are a hundred dollars. One hundred dollars for one man to run two pulp factories for the whole year, or 33⅓ cents per day for each working day. The hon. Minister laughs, but it is no laughing matter. Let me ask him, in view of the promises made with reference to the National Policy, does he honestly think that the National Policy made that man rich? Does he honestly believe that those operatives, of whom my hon. friend from South Oxford gave the list, who are working, some of them, at as low as 4½ cents a day, have been made rich by the National Policy? If not, I ask the hon. gentleman to explain the reason why. He claims that it has made some people rich. I ask him by what sense of justice he dares to place on the statute-book a law to make some men rich and to give to others from 5 to 33 cents a day? That is a question for him to answer. Sir, these people who are earning this small pittance are Canadian subjects and entitled to the same consideration at the hands of the Government as other Canadian subjects; and if it be true that the Government have made certain people rich by their policy and reduced others to the position in which the census figures show them to be, the iniquity of their policy is manifest on its face, and, instead of lauding that policy, hon. gentlemen ought to make some amends for the injustice they have perpetrated by wiping it from the statute-book. Hon. gentlemen opposite ask us how we would have them economize, and they read extracts from speeches of my leader, which I heartily endorse, to the effect that in a proper expenditure on all public works necessary for the public interest the Government would receive his support. But do hon. gentlemen opposite build public works on that principle? Have they not, on the contrary, used grants to public works as means to endeavour to corrupt the constituencies, and have we not to acknowledge to our shame that they have succeeded in a measure in debauching, demoralizing and lowering the standard of some of the people? When you find a convention of one of the great political parties carrying a resolution, as was done by the Conservative convention at Prince Edward Island, in which they say:

We deplore the repeated mistakes made by the electorate of our province in placing Prince Edward Island in hostility to the other provinces, and we trust that after the next election the island will be represented by men who will act in harmony with the Government in urging the just rights of the province to public works and winter communication—when you find a convention deliberately adopting a resolution such as that, worded in the crafty manner in which it is, it is easily seen that an impression has been made by the Government on the people which should never have been made on free men enjoying the rights of free men. The money of the country does not belong to the Government. A constituency that has not been lowered in its moral tone will not bend its knee to ask from the Government as a favour that which belongs to it by right. A constituency that would do this has lost the spirit of manhood which ought to characterize Canadians, and which would characterize them under a proper administration of public affairs.

We trust that the island will be represented by men who will act in harmony with the Government.

If the Government are willing to give to the provinces their just rights, what representative in this House would seek to prevent the Government doing this, or refuse to work in harmony with the Government in such a matter. If the Government were actuated by a desire to do justice, the representatives of the people would act in harmony with them. Then the resolution goes on to advise the election of representatives who will act in harmony with the Government. So that according to that Conservative convention, then only will it be possible to obtain justice, then only will it be possible to obtain a fair share of the public money for the needed public works. And the press of this country—not all the press, for there is a noble portion that stands out for what is right, and fair, and pure—some of the press have been found to publish articles when elections are going on, declaring in plain terms that if the people desire the expenditure of any money on public works, the only way to secure this is to send men to this House which will bow down before the gentlemen on the treasury benches. Read the speech of the Minister of Public Works, who is supposed, more than any one else, to control the expenditure of this money. He said :

We cannot do everything at once, but, as regards the principles upon which these appropriations are made, I will answer that the Government follow the same rule that determines the action of individuals. If any of you had a legacy left to divide among the people, you would most naturally begin with your friends.

What are the constituencies to deduce from that? And to this Canada has been reduced. Sir, I hold that the financial policy of the Government is bad, and attempts such as those I have just alluded to are doing more serious injury to the country than even the burden of taxation imposed upon it. It would not have been thought possible in this Canada of ours in years ago, that any Minister of the Crown would dare to utter such sentiments in the presence of a Canadian assembly without being driven from the hustings for having insulted the people. But, Sir, this is the reliance of hon. gentlemen for getting into power. They say they will fight this issue on their National Policy. The hon. Minister who has just sat down has told us that, side issues would not be introduced. Well, let them come on, and fight it out on their policy. If they do so now, this will be the first time they have ever attempted to fight the battle out upon that policy alone. They faced the country in 1878 with their promises, and they were taken at their word. But they did not venture to fight it out upon the same line in 1882. They gerrymandered the constituencies of this country in a manner that was shameful, in a manner that no British statesman would have demeaned himself to attempt. In 1887 they introduced their Franchise Bill. I do not yet know what means will be adopted for the next contest. But we know the means they are willing to employ—promises made for support, grants to constituencies which, if just, ought to be granted, no matter whether the representative stands on the right or the left of the Speaker, and which if not founded upon justice ought not to be granted in order to secure a vote in this Chamber. Sir, the present condition of this country is, that while we rejoice that we have not actually retrograded, the Minister himself has to admit that such progress has not been made as we had a right to expect. The Ministry stand now, on the eve of going to the people, with every boast they have made, falsified. In bygone elections they attempted to entrench themselves, as I have shown. They went before the electors boasting of surpluses. They have now to face the electors confessing, notwithstanding their crushing taxation, a deficit last year, the largest in our history and this year, with a million and a half of additional taxation we do not know that they will be able to avoid another deficit. Loss of population, increased expenditure, excessive taxation, lack of progress—that is the position of Canada, this country, which ought to have gone forward by leaps and bounds ; that is the position in which the country finds itself in this year of grace 1895, after fifteen years rule of hon. gentlemen opposite and their National Policy. Sir, as I said, the result is not far in the distance. I venture no prophecy. But the hesitation of the Ministers themselves, their inability to make up their minds whether to face the people or not, their evident fear of the result, makes it seem not rash for one to venture the suggestion, that possibly before another year has rolled around men will occupy the treasury benches who will conduct the affairs of the country in a sound, economical, upright and judicious manner, giving to all parts of the country and to all classes full justice, and endeavouring to restore and elevate the moral tone so greatly lowered by hon. gentlemen opposite through their actions in the past

PRAYERS.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES—TRANSLATION.

Mr. LaRIVIERE presented Second Report of the Select Committee appointed to super-wise the Official Report of the Debates of the House during the present Session, as follows:—

The attention of the Committee having been directed by occasional complaints made by members of the House in reference to the delay in the publication of the French edition of the Debates, deemed it advisable, under the circumstances, to inquire into the matter with a view of remedying, if possible, the cause which has in the past tended to retard its publication.

The Committee have, after careful consideration, come to the conclusion that it would materially expedite the publication thereof if the following proposition, which they beg to submit as a recommendation, be adopted by the House, viz.:—

That beginning with the next session of Parliament the present mode of paying each translator a fixed salary of $1,000 per session be discontinued, and the translation of the Debates be paid for by the piece at the rate of $1.00 per column, but that the chief translator and an assistant be paid by salary at the present rate, and that the said chief translator be held responsible to the Committee for the quality of the translation and the due despatch of its execution, and be allowed full liberty in choosing and dismissing the translators, subject, however, to the approval of the Committee.

SEIZURE OF TOBACCO.

Mr. GUAY (for Mr. Choquette) asked, 1. Whether, in the autumn of 1892, a seizure of tobacco was made, by the Inland Revenue, on the premises of Charles Bertrand, of Isle Verte, in the county of Temiscouata? 2. What quantity of tobacco was seized? 3. Did the department dispose of the said tobacco, or did they return it to Mr. Bertrand? What penalty did Mr. Bertrand pay, in view of the said seizure?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). A seizure of tobacco was made by the Inland Revenue Department on October 19, 1892, from Chas. Bertrand, of Isle Verte, P.Q. Forty-three pounds of illicit cut and 2½ pounds of plug tobacco were seized. The department disposed of the tobacco by sale to a tobacco manufacturer in Quebec. Mr. Bertrand paid no penalty.

POSTMASTER AT KEMPTVILLE.

Mr. LISTER asked, 1. Who is the postmaster at Kemptville? 2. Does he follow any occupation other than that of postmaster? 3. Were complaints made during the year 1894 of letters being opened in that office? 4. Were such complaints investigated? 5. If so, by whom? 6. Was a report made on the complaints, and does the report justify the complaint? 7. If so, has any, and what order been made concerning it?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. 1. H. G. Ferguson. 2. The department is not aware that he has any other occupation than that of postmaster. 3. Yes. 4. Yes. 5. By the post office inspector at Ottawa. 6. A report was made, but the inspector did not seem satisfied that the letters had been opened before being delivered to the complainant. 7. No order was made in the matter.

EXCISE DUTY ON SPIRITS.

Mr. EDGAR asked. Under the proposed amendment of the Inland Revenue Act, section 130, subsection (a.) fixing an excise duty on distilled spirits of $1.70 per gallon of the strength of proof, what would be the excise duty upon each gallon of spirits of the following strengths:—1. Sixty-five per cent over proof? 2. Fifty per cent over proof? 3. Twenty per cent under proof? 4. Twenty-five per cent under proof?

Mr. WOOD. Sixty-five over proof, $2.80½; 50 over proof, $2.55; 20 under proof, $1.30; 25 under proof, $1.27½.

C.P.R.—CHINAMEN QUARANTINED.

Mr. PRIOR asked, 1. Has the Government received any money from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company on account of the expense of feeding and guarding Chinamen who were quarantined in British Columbia in 1893 or 1894? 2. If so, how much has been received and when was it paid? 3. If none has been received, what amount does the Government consider the Canadian Pacific Railway is indebted to them on that account?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The amount charged against the Canadian Pacific Railway for the expenses in question was $3,191.85. The company objected to these charges, and the Department of Agriculture set against them balances due the company for transportation, amounting to $1,900.82, leaving a balance of claim against the company for the charges in question of $1,291.03.

CUSTOMS DUTIES ON SPIRITS.

Mr. EDGAR asked, Under the proposed amendment of the Act respecting the duties of Customs, 57-58 Victoria, chapter 33, section 7, subsection (a.) of schedule A, fixing the customs duty on alcohol and spirituous liquors at $2.25 per gallon of the strength of proof, what would be the customs duty upon each gallon of spirits of the following strengths:—1. Sixty-five per cent over proof? 2. Fifty per cent over proof? 3. Twenty per cent under proof? 4. Twenty-five per cent under proof?

Mr. WALLACE. The duty on 65 over proof, is $3.71¼ per gallon; 50 over proof, $3.37½ per gallon; 20 under proof, $1.91¼; 25 under proof, $1.91¼.

FISHERY OVERSEER, KENT DISTRICT.

Mr. ALLAN asked, Whether Henry Smith, of Chatham, Ont., is now in the employment of the Government, or has he been employed by them during the past year? If so, in what capacity, and at what salary? Who is the fishery overseer for the Kent district, fronting on Lake Erie?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I can only answer the latter part of the inquiry. Henry Linley, of Cedar Springs, is the fishery overseer for the Kent district, fronting on Lake Erie. Mr. Smith is not employed by our department.

RUSTICO BREAKWATER. P.E.I.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) asked, What are the respective names of the tenderers for the repairs of the Rustico breakwater, Prince Edward Island, and the amounts of their respective tenders? To whom was the contract awarded? Was the lowest tender accepted? If not, why not?

Mr. FOSTER. Two sets of tenders were received for this work. In the first set, Alexander Compton was the lowest tenderer at $2,200; J. Burns, $4,700; Heney & Smith, $4,976; L. G. & P. Gallant, $4,900. When Mr. Compton was communicated with, he being the lowest tenderer, he declined to sign the contract, owing to an error he claimed to have made, unless an addition of $1,480 was made to the price at which he tendered. This the department could not do, and tenders were called for the second time. The tenderers were: Heney & Smith, $4,276; J. Burns, $4,460; Gallant & Briott, $4,875. The lowest tenderer received the contract.

MAIL SERVICE--P.E.I.

Mr. PERRY asked, Who has the contract for carrying the mails between St. Louis Station, Prince County, P. E. I., and Palmer Road and Waterford? When was the contract for the service let again? Were tenders asked for? Who tendered? What was the amount of each tender, and was the lowest tender accepted?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Angus Shea is contractor for the Kildare Station and Palmer Road mail service, which serves Waterford en route. This contract was let on 1st October, 1894. Tenders were asked for. Angus Shea tendered at $30, and Wm. Kinch at $54. The lowest tender was accepted.

FISHWAY--MADUXNEKEAG.

Mr. COLTER asked, Is it the intention of the Government to have a fish-way placed in the dam at the mouth of the Maduxnekeag stream in the town of Woodstock, and when?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is the intention of the Government to require a passage for fish to be provided in the dam at the mouth of the Maduxnekeag River at once, and instructions have been already issued to such effect.

DREDGE "PRINCE EDWARD."

Mr. PERRY asked, Whether the dredge "Prince Edward" is working? If not, when will she commence operations? Is it the intention to dredge the loose rocks blasted in Cascumpeque Harbour, P.E.I., during this season? Is the Government aware that these rocks are impeding navigation considerably in said harbour? Is it the intention to dredge in Malpeque Harbour, P.E.I., during this season, or any other harbour in Prince Edward Island?

Mr. FOSTER. The dredge "Prince Edward" is not yet at work, but will commence operations on or about 15th May. It is not the intention to dredge in Cascumpeque harbour this season, owing to the large amount of money required to obtain a channel fifteen feet in depth at low water in the entrance, the estimated cost being, for work on the inner bar which is composed of rock, $21,000, and for deepening the channel through the outer bar which is composed of sand, $12,000. The loose rocks in the channel are not impeding navigation, inasmuch as the inner bar carries as much water as the other bar, namely, 10 feet 6 inches at low water spring tides which rise 3 feet. The work so far done on the inner bar has been of some benefit, as all projecting points have been removed. In any case there are no valid reasons to send the dredge to Cascumpeque, unless a vote is obtained for blasting the rock, as the blasting and dredging must go on concurrently. The programme of the work for the dredge "Prince Edward" is as follows:—1. Cardigan, 2. Souris, 3. Grand River, 4. Murray Harbour, 5. Wood Islands, 6. Crapaud, 7. Malpeque, 8. New London.

BUOYS IN SHELBURNE HARBOUR.

Mr. FORBES asked, 1. For how many years have the iron can buoys been placed in Shelburne Harbour, Nova Scotia? 2. How much per year has been paid by the Government for the storage of said buoys, and to whom paid?

Mr. COSTIGAN. 1. The records of the department show that the iron can buoys were in position previous to 1879, but the exact information as to the number of years the buoys have been in position can only be obtained from the records at Halifax. 2. The storage was included in the accounts furnished by the harbour master, Mr. John A. McGowan for painting, placing, lifting and storing. The amounts paid from the year 1881 to 1894 will be found in the annexed schedule. Since 1879 tenders have twice been called for, but none accepted, all being too high.

ENFRANCHISEMENT OF WOMEN.

Mr. DAVIN moved :

That in the opinion of this House, the privilege of voting for candidates for membership thereof should be extended to women possessing the qualifications which now entitle men to the electoral franchise.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried, carried.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear my hon. friends behind me say, "carried."

Mr. SOMERVILLE. "Married."

Mr. DAVIN. "Married," my hon. friend says. That probably is one way of extending the franchise to the ladies, but it is one that has not yet had my practical support. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the House to approach this question in a temper befitting so important a subject. Sir, those who oppose the extension of the franchise to women who pay taxes and exercise the duties of citizenship take so grave a view of the ultimate consequences of giving the franchise to women, that I shall ask the attention of the House while I lay before them what it is that I propose, while I show how the question stands to-day, and what is the opinion of the leading minds of the world upon it, and also state the positive arguments in its favour, and endeavour, so far as I can, to reply to the arguments used against it. I wish, at the outset, to anticipate the kind of reply that has been made to proposals of this kind in the English House of Commons, and, I think, even in this House of Commons. When, in the English House of Commons, a proposal of this kind has been made, people have got up and replied to a wholly different proposition. For instance, they have argued that great dissensions might be introduced into households if the man took one view of public affairs and his wife another. But, Sir, this motion does not propose to enfranchise married women, but simply to enfranchise women paying taxes and discharging the duties of citizenship.

Mr. LAURIER. Some married women do that.

Mr. DAVIN. That is quite true. And in those cases where married women are sui juris, I would give them a vote, undoubtedly. This is often regarded as part of a movement which has sometimes been described as "the revolt of woman," sometimes as the emancipation of women; and there have been questions mixed up with this in the United States and elsewhere with which I have no sympathy whatever. I have no sympathy with any social or political theories that would interfere with the home-keeping and home-duty-discharging capacities and duties of the woman.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Are they to be candidates?

Mr. DAVIN. This proposal does not touch that. That is another of the arguments used. But the Bill I should found on this resolution if it were carried, would not enable women to be candidates. That is a question we can afterwards discuss. Mr. Speaker, this issue, also, was raised in the English House of Commons, as I shall show. It was asked: Where are you to stop? But, Sir, the same argument was used when it was proposed to educate women. You know that last century—and even, in fact, up to within the memory of men only past middle age—the educational condition of women was simply deplorable. And a movement took place in England and in France almost simultaneously in favour of an emancipation of women, far greater and far more important than giving them the franchise—their emancipation from a ukase that had gone forth from society decreeing that, with very few exceptions, ignorance should be their lot—ignorance of literature, ignorance of history, ignorance of science, in fact, almost complete ignorance of everything except what would fit them to be useful in the house. But, Sir, about a hundred years ago a very able literary woman wrote a book which called attention of the English people to the undesirable position that women were in at that time, and pleaded for their emancipation from ignorance and for placing them in a position that, within the last thirty years, they have achieved in nearly every civilized country in the world. And the only thing that remains to complete the circle of the amelioration of their condition that was aimed at at that time is to give them the electoral franchise. Now, Sir, in France, at a very early period, the position of woman struck men like Condorcet as thoroughly indefensible, and he advocated giving to them the electoral franchise. But, to come down to a period nearer our own day, the event that gave the greatest stimulus to the movement in favour of giving the franchise to women was the meeting that took place in Freemason's Hall, in London, in 1840, to urge upon the opinion of Christendom the emancipation of the negro. Now, Sir, to that meeting, friends of the slave all the world over were invited, and some six ladies were sent as delegates from societies in the United States. But when they presented their credentials, they were not allowed to take part in the meeting. Daniel O'Connell thought they ought to be allowed to take part. Wendell Phillips, who was described by Mr. Bright as the most eloquent of English-speaking men, contended for their admission in his eloquent and forceful way, but he failed. And William Lloyd Garrison was so disgusted with the illiberality of the convention that he would not take part in the proceedings, but took his seat in the gallery. Now that nobody would think of refusing to allow six women delegates to take part in a convention of that sort—a mere public meeting—now that in any part of Christendom such a refusal would be regarded as a thing not to be tolerated for a minute, it can easily be understood how men and women came to inaugurate the movement in favour of extending the franchise to women who fulfil the duties of citizenship. Sir, as I have indicated, this was part of a movement in favour of raising the status, intellectually, morally and socially, of women the world over; and so far as that movement contemplated giving them as good an education as could be given them in their circumstances of life, so far as that movement meant to raise them morally, intellectually and socially, I have entire sympathy with it. And, Sir, what occurred? In Norway we find that movement going on, and in 1880 the women were allowed to be educated at the universities. In Sweden, in 1870, the women were allowed to enter universities; and in Denmark and Iceland they were also allowed to have a higher education. In Wyoming, something like a quarter of a century ago, they were given the electoral franchise; they are given it in South Australia, in the Isle of Man, in New Zealand, and in Austria, and in some other places. The great names in politics, in literature, in science, in the leading countries of the world, are in favour of my proposition. I will mention Mr. Disraeli, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Leonard Courtney; and if we go to France, we have Jules Janin, Chateaubriand, Alexandre Dumas, Emile de Girardin, Eugène Pelletan; and in science, you have Mr. Huxley, who, I am sorry to say, is near the close of his career. Now, why is it that women are excluded? It must be either because they are unfit, or because their admission to the franchise would be a danger to the state. Nearly every claim for a right denied, or a privilege that it was thought we should have, and came ultimately to get, has been opposed upon the ground of unfitness. When first the proposition was made to extend the franchise to the middle class in England, we were told they were unfit; and when, in 1865, '66 and '67, it was contended that the franchise should be extended to others than the £10 householder, the cry again was raised that those beneath that line were unfit. Now, I consider that the burden of proof as to the unfitness of women to exercise the franchise really lies on those who make these statements. Because, what do we see? Let us look around Canada, look around the United States, look over England, and you will see women of business power managing estates, managing hotels, the responsible heads of families, and after their husbands were dead, bringing up their children well; effective as school mistresses, and in higher capacities, presiding over large educational establishments. And let us look at their activity in the world of art.

Mr. DAVIN.

Why, to-day, and for many a day, they have been among the foremost novelists, they are among the foremost in belles lettres, they are the foremost in the histrionic world; in singing, painting and sculpture they stand in the front rank. Take the profession of journalism—I doubt if there are better journalists in the world than some of the ladies have proved themselves in the past, and are proving themselves to-day. Miss Shaw, whom the "Times" sent to Australia and Canada, and whose letters from India created, and properly created, so deep an impression, has won the very highest position as a journalist. There is Miss Harriet Martineau. I remember of hearing of a lady who proposed to become a journalist, and who said to Justin McCarthy: "Why should not I be of the same profession as Harriet Martineau?" And Justin McCarthy, who was then editing one of the leading papers of London, said: "All men and women, I suppose, would like to be able to write as well as Harriet Martineau." One of the absurd things said against giving the franchise to women is that they cannot go to war, that their inability to become warriors unfits them for the franchise. Sir, even this argument shows complete ignorance of history. If you read the history of the Arabians, or read Gibbon, you will find that women have distinguished themselves as warriors; and if you go back to more ancient times you will also find that there have been women distinguished as warriors. I may read, by and by, part of a speech of the leader of the Opposition, that will probably show by implication that they have considerable force any way. Well, talking of their fitness, look at what women have done in politics. We need not go beyond our own gracious Queen; we know from what has been published of her inner life, and from the interest she takes in political matters, that she is a capable politician, and as such exercises great influence. On the same throne sat one of the greatest of women, Queen Elizabeth. On a neighbouring throne sat another illustrious queen, unfortunate in her career, but also a woman of great genius as well as of great beauty, Mary, Queen of Scots. The mother of Charles VIII. of France, and the sister of St. Louis, were great women, and ruled France in their day. Margaret of Austria was one of the ablest politicians of her age; and of the Duchess d'Angoulême, Napoleon the Great said that she was the only man the Bourbons had produced. Of the Princess Mathilde, Mr. Van Dam, who is writing the Personal History of the Third Empire, states that she played a great part in bringing Louis Napoleon to the throne of France, and up to the last she was his most trusted adviser. Catherine of Russia was a great woman, a great politician, a great ruler. Maria Thérèse was a great politician, and a great ruler. If you go to early history you will find women of leading talents. You have Socrates consulting, as a philosopher, a lady other than Xantippe; you find Aspasia the counselor of the greatest statesman of his age, and who was said to have assisted him even in preparing those great speeches which swayed the fierce democracy of the city of the Vilot Crown and fulminated over Greece. Yet it was in this part of Greece where at one time, and that the period of its greatest splendour, woman did not play an important part. Yes, it was Athens. But that was only after the youth of Athens had been accustomed to go to Sardis, as at one time the youth of England were accustomed to go to Paris; and they brought back eastern customs, and the Athenian women were shut up as women are shut up in a Turkish harem to-day. But in Sparta the women played a great part, and nobody can be familiar with the dramatic literature of Greece without seeing what a free open, large life the Grecian women lived, socially as well as politically. The same, Sir, is true of Rome, but Roman history is so familiar to you that I need not give you instances. The same is true of every country in Europe, in the earlier years of our present era, during the Renaissance, and up to our own time. Now, my argument is this: If they can discharge the highest political functions, how can they be unfit to discharge one of the smallest duties they can be asked to discharge in the political sphere, namely, to say for whom they will vote to be member of Parliament? Remember we are not to judge them by an ideal standard. We must compare them with the men who vote at the present time; and, Sir, from what I have seen of the women who hold property and pay taxes, it would be a very extraordinary thing if they were not as fit as the average voter to declare who shall or shall not be a member of this House. Would there be any danger to the state, would their action be revolutionary? We know that woman is more conservative than man—her instincts are more conservative. But it is said they would be reactionary. The moment I placed this motion on the paper, one friend from Ontario said to me that the granting of the privilege of voting to women would enormously increase the power of the clergy, that the women of the Presbyterian and Methodist Churches and of the Church of England would be influenced by their clergy; and then I was informed by a gentleman from Quebec that it would dangerously increase the power of the priests in that province. What that argument amounts to is this, that woman would not vote on her own individual judgment. But do the men?

An hon. MEMBER. Yes.

Mr. DAVIN. When this question came up in the English House of Commons as to whether women would vote on their individual judgment, Mr. Leonard Courtney in reply quoted some lines from Pope that one of our Princesses of our reigning house had written on the collar of her lapdog. They ran thus:

I am Her Highness' dog at Kew.
Pray tell me, sir, whose dog are you?

He said that a collar might be placed on the neck of the average voter to that effect.

Mr. GIBSON. Whose collar do you wear?

Mr. DAVIN. I have watched the hon. gentleman when he has occasionally orated in this House, but I must say he does not give us anything that is not very chestnutty.

Mr. GIBSON. You make such a fool of yourself.

Mr. DAVIN. I will not go that length in the sincerest form of flattery to the hon. gentleman. What do we see on this continent? What do we see in the United States and to some extent in Canada? The very minute a man is enfranchised in this country he is impatient until he has thrown off his individuality, until he has got himself a master of some kind to tell him how he shall vote. I saw in the "Citizen" this morning that a labour organization here had declared that its members should not be allowed to remain within the organization unless they voted in a certain way; and a member of the Patrons organization in one part of the country told me that if he did not vote in a given way he would be threatened with expulsion, notwithstanding that there is nothing, so far as I am informed, limiting in this respect the independent action of the members. I have been told what the principles are, and I am assured there is nothing whatever in the principles of the Patrons, so far as their platform is concerned, all the practical planks of it seem to me to be very unobjectionable indeed, if not such as one might welcome. But in those places where the Patrons have taken that position we find that men become members of the organization and when a candidate is brought out of whom they utterly disapprove, still the members are bound to vote for him. I might mention other organizations, both in the Liberal and Conservative camps, membership of which would seem to give the men a master of some kind whom they have to obey instead of trusting to their own judgment. If the proposition is put that women would not be independent, then we would have to answer: Are the men independent? I am afraid they are not. I may say that in the early times in England women voted in counties and in some boroughs. What are the objections raised? But before going into these objections, I should like to lay before the House the position of the question at the present time in England. It was introduced into the English House of Commons in 1867 by Mr. John Stuart Mill, and with his views on every subject I did not agree.

An hon. MEMBER. That was unfortunate for him.

Mr. DAVIN. It was probably unfortunate for him, because he was a cultured man, a man of great genius—and it was an unfortunate thing perhaps that he did not know a man of practical views more thoroughly. As early as 1866 Mr. Disraeli gave his opinion on this subject in these words :

In a country governed by a woman—where you allow woman to form part of the estate of the realm—peeresses in their own right, for example—where you allow a woman not only to hold land, but to be a lady of the manor and hold legal courts—where a woman by law may be a church warden, an overseer of the poor—I do not see, where she has so much to do with the state and church, on what reasons, if you come to right, she has not a right to vote.

In the following year Mr. Mill brought forward the question in the House of Commons, having presented petitions from a large number of ladies, as did also Mr. Russell Gurney. His motion was supported by Mr. Henry Fawcett and by Mr. John Bright. I desire to call attention to the division, even at the risk of being somewhat prosy. The Yeas stood 196, Nays 73. Among the Nays were a number of men who afterwards became Cabinet Ministers. It was supported by Mr. Henry Fawcett, Lord John Hay and Mr. John Francis McGuire, member for Cork, and a strong and devoted member of the Roman Catholic Church. Sir E. W. Watkins also voted with the "Noes," and amongst others Henry Labouchere, Mr. Leatham, Mr. Bass and Sir Mortin Peto.

Mr. SCRIVER. What was the form of the motion ?

Mr. DAVIN. It was a motion for allowing women to vote. They voted on the amendment, but in England they put the substantive motion. I am sorry to say that we do not vote as they do in the English House of Commons. It would be very much better if we did, because then when we had a couple of amendments we would get a photograph of the opinion of the House. If they have an amendment, or an amendment to the amendment, they put the original motion first. The motion on which they voted was :

That the word "man" stand part of the clause ;

whereas Mr. Mill's motion was :

That "man" be omitted, and "person" be placed instead.

After that the question was again and again brought before the House of Commons by Mr. Jacob Bright, and supported by Sir Charles Dilke and other prominent men. A great advance was made when the Franchise Bill was passed enabling women to vote in municipalities, and then in 1869-70 Mr. Bright brought in his Woman's Disabilities Bill, the first clause of which read as follows :—

First, that in all Acts relating to the qualification and registration of voters or persons entitled or claiming to be registered and to vote in the election of members of Parliament, wherever words occur which import the masculine gender, the same shall be held to include females for all purposes connected with and having reference to the right to be registered as voters and to vote in such election, any law or usage to the contrary notwithstanding.

Now, Sir, that Bill was supported in debate by Sir Charles Dilke, who was then the rising hope of the Liberal party, but Mr. Fowler, who opposed it, said :

I believe women have immense political influence ; I saw a good deal of it in the contested election of 1868.

Now, if women have a great deal of political influence, and if they exercise it, is it not proper that they should exercise it under the law rather than in evasion of the law ? If they exercise political influence, and if you give them the right to vote, you simply give them a responsibility which at present does not attach to their action. Mr. Fowler said :

They have to educate their children.

Well, has not a widower to educate his children, and does that prevent his being able to vote ? One would think that voting took people the whole time away from their duty. Sir Charles Dilke in a very able speech supported Mr. Jacob Bright, and another celebrated man, Dr. Lyon Playfair, now Lord Playfair, one of the ablest men that has ever been in the House of Commons, also supported him, but on the motion for the previous question they were again defeated. Again, in 1871, this question was brought before the House of Commons in England, and on that occasion Mr. Gladstone spoke as follows :—

The ancient law recognized the rights of women in the parish ; I apprehend they could both vote and act in the parish. The modern rule has extended the right to the municipalities, so far as the right of voting is concerned. With respect to the school boards, I own, I believe we have done wisely, on the whole, in giving both the franchise and the right of sitting on the school board to women. Then comes the question with regard to Parliament, and we have to ask ourselves whether we shall or shall not go further. I admit, at any rate, that, as far as I am able to judge, there is more presumptive ground for changing the law than some of the opponents of the measures are disposed to own. I cannot help thinking that, for some reason or other, there are various important particulars in which women obtain much less than justice under social arrangements. I may be told that there is no direct connection between this and the parliamentary franchise, and I admit it, but at the same time I am by no means sure that these inequalities may not have an indirect connection with the state of law in which the balance is generally cast too much against women and too much in favour of men. There is one instance which has been quoted, and I am not sure there is not something in it—I mean the case of farms. I believe to some extent in the competition for that particular employment. Women suffer in a very definite manner in consequence of their want of qualifications to vote. I go somewhat further than this, and say that, so far as I am able to form an opinion of the general tone and colour of our law in these matters where the peculiar relation of men and women is concerned, that law does less than justice to women, and great mischief, misery and scandal result from that state of thing in many of the occurrences and events of life. If it should be found possible to arrange a safe and well adjusted alteration of the law as to political power, the man who shall attain that object, and who shall see his purpose carried onward to its consequences in a more just arrangement of the provisions of other laws bearing upon the condition and welfare of women, will, in my opinion, be a real benefactor to his country.

In 1872 again Mr. Jacob Bright brought the question before the House of Commons, and again in 1873, Mr. Henley, the Nestor of the House, one of the most influential men that ever sat in the English Parliament, and one of the most conservative of men, a man whose judgment was looked up to by men on both sides of the House, and especially by men on the front benches, ministerial and opposition, declared most emphatically in favour of the measure in the following language:—

He said he had once felt considerable doubt and dislike of the measure, but, after careful watching of the way in which women gave the local votes, he had come to the conclusion that an extension of the principle would be useful.

The votes in favour of the Bill increased on this occasion to 155, with tellers and pairs, 172, a larger number than had ever been before obtained, while the opposition remained stationary. Again, in 1875, the question was brought forward, and in 1877 Mr. Leonard Courtney spoke well and ably on the question. In 1878 the question was also before the House, Mr. Courtney speaking strongly in favour of it, and saying among other things:

The political reasons for granting the prayer of the Bill appear to me to be undeniable, but I confess they are not the reasons why I most strongly support it. I believe it will develop a fuller, freer and nobler character in women by admitting them into the sphere of the political thought and duty. Some may say, "But what is to be the end?" I do not know that we are always bound to see the goal towards which we are moving. If we are moving on right principles; if we are actuated by a feeling of justice; if the hand that moves above us and leads us on is a hand in which we can place implicit confidence,—then I say, trust to that light, follow that hand, without fear of the future.

In 1879 it was again before the House, and again Mr. Courtney spoke in its favour, having charge of the Bill. His motion was pretty much the same as mine. The debate on that occasion was very animated, and the result of the division was much the same as the previous year—113, or, including tellers and pairs, 144 in its favour, and 217, or, including tellers and pairs, 248 against it. This closed the history of that subject in the Ninth Parliament of Victoria.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In 1884 the subject was up again.

Mr. DAVIN. Lord Denman brought it up again and again. I have the references here, but the reason I stop at that year—I will be perfectly frank with the House—is that I do not think the subject has made any progress in England since that time; it about touched high water mark then. Coming to Canada, in 1885, Sir John Macdonald had a Bill before the House of Commons in which there was a clause for giving the franchise to women. Mr. Townsend moved an amendment with a view of striking out that clause. On that occasion, Sir John Macdonald said:

Well, Mr. Chairman, with respect to female suffrage, I can only say that, personally, I am strongly convinced, and every year for many years I have become more strongly convinced of the justice of giving women otherwise qualified the suffrage. I am strongly of that opinion, and have been for a good many years, and I had hoped that Canada would have the honour of first placing woman in the position that she is certain eventually, after centuries of oppression, to obtain. It is merely a question of time all over the civilized world. In England the question has made marvellous progress, as we all know who have paid any attention to that subject. By slow degrees women have become owners of their own property; they are protected as much as if they were unmarried—protected in all their rights, not only against the world, but against their own husbands. They have obtained a quasi-political position on school boards, in vestries and in municipal elections, I believe, to a certain extent; and in every position in which they have made an advance towards equality with men, they have proved themselves so efficient that there has not been the slightest attempt to retroactive legislation to deprive them of any privileges or advantages that, after centuries of denial, they have at last obtained. I had hoped that we in Canada would have had the great honour of leading in the cause of securing the complete emancipation of women, of completely establishing her quality as a human being and a member of society with man. I say it is a mere matter of time. It is known—at least, it is believed, though I cannot speak positively on that point—but it is generally understood that the present Premier of England is in favour of female franchise. He did not allow female franchise to be imported into his late Franchise or Representation Bill, for fear it might harm the Bill as a whole.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He canvassed the House against his own proposition.

Mr. DAVIN. I know nothing about that; I was not in the House at the time; but it seems to me an incredible statement. Sir John said further:

The argument was pressed so far in this House the other night that it was said: If you grant the privilege of electing, you must grant the privilege and right of being elected. That does not at all follow. We have at this moment various qualifications of electors here who could not themselves be elected.

And again he said:

A lady of large wealth and property said to me when I was in England a short time ago: I have no vote. My butler has a vote, my steward has a vote, my coachman has a vote, and at least fifty of my servants have votes, but I have no vote. She thought it was rather an injustice to her that she had not a vote, when so many who derived their means of living from her had votes, and were her superiors in that regard.

Mr. Coursol, who was then a member of the House, opposed woman suffrage; but the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) whom I see here now, seemed to consider that women who paid taxes and discharged the duties of citizens—in fact, the women referred to in my motion—should have a vote. He said:

I say, then, that the proposition of the hon. gentleman is one that ought not to be so cavalierly dealt with as is proposed by several of his friends. I say it is entitled to the serious, the earnest consideration of this House. It is true that there are many important questions involved in the proposition which the hon. gentleman has submitted to us—what will be the effect on the relations between the men and women of this country, how far it will draw the men up in a purer atmosphere, or draw the women down from that exalted position which they occupy, and weaken the important aesthetic and moral influences they now exercise, must be considered.

Again:

I have no doubt that every one of them are highly competent; they are quite as well qualified, as far as their knowledge of public affairs go, as men are, to exercise the electoral franchise.

I think my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) also supported the view that women paying taxes and discharging the duties of citizens should be allowed to vote, and several other prominent members of the Liberal party took the same position. Now, Sir, to ascertain the views of leading politicians on this subject, I have made it a point to read carefully the speeches of the hon. leader of the Opposition—in fact, I always read them,—but I have read them with much greater attention than usual during the last three or four months. This is what the hon. leader of the Opposition said at Brantford on August 21st, 1894, as reported in the "Globe":

Take, for instance, Ontario. You have to-day universal manhood suffrage, as I understand it, and I understand also that the day is not far off when you will give the franchise to the ladies. I don't object to that; but in my province we never thought of giving the franchise to the women, and for many years we will never think of it. I will give you the reason. You may, perhaps, believe that we are backward in Quebec. Since you in Ontario are ready to give the women the franchise, you will say that we are not so far advanced as you are. We never thought of giving the franchise to the women in my province, because in my province, though the women do not vote, they have been in the habit of ruling and governing for I don't know how long. (Laughter.)

If they have been ruling and governing, for I do not know how long, are you going to refuse them the power of merely casting a vote? That is utterly inconsistent.

There is not a husband in Quebec, said the leader of the Opposition at Brantford, who is not the subject of his wife. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) So that among us there is no question of giving the franchise to women, but if the people of Ontario think the time has come for granting woman's suffrage, not only have I no objection at all, but I shall welcome the event, because I know that when the women of Ontario have the right of suffrage, their first act will be to bring to an end the reign of corruption which has lasted too long at Ottawa.

When women petitioned Parliament they have declared that they would raise the tone of political life. They have both in the United States and in England said they would help to purify public life; but when the leader of the Opposition says—if I may be allowed to make an Irish bull—that the ladies will vote to a man for the Opposition, I am inclined to think that he is labouring under a false impression. I am bound to be honest, and must say that I do not share his views that the ladies would vote for the Opposition. On the contrary, I believe they would support the Conservative party.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. If you think you are right, give me your vote. I share the view that they exercise considerable influence. I have fought now some four elections, and one of the first things I always try to get is the support of the ladies, and when I know they are with me I am perfectly satisfied, and confident. Now, what are the objections? First, we are told that they do not want to vote. Well, a large number of them have petitioned this House for it; and those who do not want to use it may stay at home, and what harm will then be done? Then it is said to be contrary to received views. But it was contrary to received views only a few months ago for ladies to use the bicycle, and yet they use it extensively, especially in the West. I am told that even a royal princess in London, uses it, and I believe in a very short time you will find all the prejudice against its use by ladies will pass away. The same argument was used with regard to the professions, and against allowing women to enter the universities. And, at one time, it was used against allowing them to become printers, or to work in factories. I may say that I have managed a printing establishment for some years, and the most correct and cleanest printers we have had have been women. Then it is said that politics will distract them from their proper duties and cause them to neglect their home work. I do not see anything in voting incompatible with domestic duties. The duty of a father to his family is probably not quite so absorbing, but it is nearly as absorbing as that of the mother, and his duty to the children is pretty nearly as engrossing as her duty towards them. If it does not prevent him exercising the franchise, why should it prevent her? In this connection let me say that a great deal of nonsense is talked by those who quote the Bible as bearing on this question. I do not think that the Bible has much to do with the franchise or with politics. The Bible does not anywhere profess to be a guide to political opinions, and if we are to consult the Bible on this question, why, we find that St. Paul advised women not to marry at all. But clearly his advice had relation to the condition of the time when he spoke. I see that some of the advanced women, with whose views I have no sympathy, are trying to disfigure Genesis in their favour; and I read, the other day, that one lady, a very clever woman, made an argument in favour of her sex by saying that Eve ate the apple and was able to digest it, but that Adam tried to eat it, and it stuck in his throat. In Genesis, we are told that woman was made a helpmeet for man. Is she only to be a helpmeet in a small portion of his life, and is she not to be a helpmeet for him in all the more serious occupations of life, politics, and business included? It used to be said that the turmoil of an election was something a woman should not enter into. But, under our system of voting by ballot, all she would have to do is to deposit her ticket. Mr. Gladstone, who used to object to women voting, said the only objection he could see was that they would have to hustle people at the poll, but we know that now, when we have voting by ballot, voting in a polling booth is almost as dull as a debate on the tariff in this House. Then it is said they are represented by their male relatives. Is politics to be the exclusive business of one sex? What is political freedom but the control of those who make a business of politics by those who do not? That is all men do who vote, and happily men are not engaged in politics the whole time. One of the advantages of the British constitution, as compared with that of the United States, is that we need not be the whole time engrossed in politics, and the casting of her vote once every four or five years would not take a woman away from her duties. Besides, why should she seek to be represented by her male relatives if she have different opinions and special interests of her own? It is said that women have already power enough. I have already dealt with that argument. My hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition hinted at that; but the millionaire has power enough without voting, and a man who is worth ten or twenty millions has immense power without voting. Are you going to deprive him of his vote because he has power enough?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Why not?

Mr. DAVIN. I would not disfranchise a millionaire. Here is an argument that I find in the speech of the hon. member for Bothwell. He says that woman is an aesthetic product, and that we would interfere with her aesthetic character if we gave her the right to vote. I do not admit that. If we look into history, we find that those gifted women who have been great politicians and great rulers did not lose their fascination by taking an active part in politics. The larger interests apparently enhanced the quickness of their wit and their charm. I need not give names—they will occur to every educated man. Now, will politics degrade woman? If politics would in any way degrade woman, I should be very sorry to have anything to do with this proposition. I agree with Mr. Courtney that nothing of the kind would happen. I hold, on the contrary, that this reform would give woman such a position in the world that man would regard her as something more than one of the supreme objects of beauty to be admired and desired. Some cynic has asked what business any woman has in this world after she is forty years of age? Mary Woolestoncraft quotes this remark in her writings. The ideal we have always encouraged is that of woman as the supreme object of beauty and admiration is one reason why men have lost sight of the solid, heroic, sterling qualities of women, and has led us to regard her, as I say, merely as an aesthetic object. Now, Sir, I will make a reference which I specially commend to my hon. friend behind me, whose support I hope to have, and this I think should secure it indubitably. I will make a reference to the description we get of the ideal woman in the Sacred Volume. In the last chapter of Proverbs, we get a description of the highest type of woman. Is it the beauty of form, the beauty of colour that is there dwelt upon? These she possesses, but we are told mainly how she manages her household, her great executive power is given as her greatest charm. Suppose that they had had representative government in Judea, what would you think of giving the franchise to the ordinary vine dresser in that woman's employ or in the employ of her husband, and refusing it to this woman who is endowed with all the qualities of a statesman? Now, Sir, what would be the advantages of doing what I ask? In the first place, from the most intelligent half of the human race you would remove a sense of injustice, you would remove a stigma. Blackstone has classed women with lunatics, idiots and infants, as being those who are denied the franchise. On this continent in the great Republic, the man who was a slave on the plantation not many years ago has a vote, while highly intelligent women in Philadelphia or New York are—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Was it a good thing to give the slave a vote ?

Mr. DAVIN. I am not making an argument in favour of that proposition ; I am only dwelling upon the fact that while the emancipated slave gets a vote, you refuse a vote to these highly clever and instructed persons. The enfranchisement of women would elevate the tone of politics. A very eminent man on the other side of the line told me, speaking of politics as he found them : If you had a candidate for Congress who had swept the honours at Harvard or Yale, if you wanted to get that candidate elected, it would be better for you to conceal from the electorate that he was a distinguished college graduate. This, that should be a strong argument in favour of a man as a representative of the people, must not be brought forward at all, because the democratic jealousy is so great that the people would be apt to resent it. Women are quicker in their perceptions than men. In that I am upheld by the greatest men of to-day and the greatest men of the past. Plato held that opinion ; the greatest mind that Greece produced held it and all down the ages you will find the same opinion held by the brightest and most thoughtful minds. There is hardly an eminent man in Christendom who does not hold that women intellectually are equal—"in difference" to translate literally the phrase of a great French writer by which he expressed the opinion that women are not inferior in intellectual power from men. It is with mankind just as with the lower animals. Any man accustomed to horses or other domestic animals knows that in regard to the functions we get them to discharge, and which we have to teach them, the female is far more susceptible to education than the male. And a woman is undoubtedly quicker in intellect than a man. I do not say that women are superior ; but while there is a clear difference intellectually, just as there is a difference physically, there is an absolute equality, in my opinion. I think it exceedingly likely that what my friend complained of in the United States, this tendency to a minimum of excellence in the representative—that seems to be the democratic law—would not be enhanced by the admission of women to politics. On the contrary, I think it probable that to include them among the electorate would quicken the intelligence and perceptiveness of the constituency, and might tend to counteract the law which my friend said was palpably at work in the United States,—this tendency to a minimum of excellence in the representative. I believe that the result would be, to raise the woman, as Mr. Courtney said. If we look back to the last thirty years we see that in the position of the wife as holder of property, in the position of woman socially, educationally, and politically so far as municipal institutions and school boards are concerned, great progress has been made, and with advantage to the whole community. And if the House shall sanction this proposition, and so justify me in bringing in the Bill that shall translate it into law, I believe that this Parliament will take a wise step. And it will take that step with the sanction of such great names as those of Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Disraeli—Lord Beaconsfield—the greatest and most conservative statesman we have had since Pitt, and of the greatest name in literature, science and art in Christendom to-day.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. LAURIER. I think it would be only courteous to the House, and I think the House would have the right to exact it as a duty, to be informed why the Government upon this question moves the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I can only speak for myself personally. The hon. gentleman from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) in his very excellent address discussed the question from every standpoint, and gave a very great deal of material to the House which will be of great assistance to any member who desires to discuss the question thoroughly as such a question ought to be discussed in this House. I waited for some other gentleman to rise who had devoted himself specially to the subject and was prepared to discuss the question off-hand. No other gentleman having risen and desiring to speak, but not without the fullest information or without the investigation which I feel was due to the splendid effort of my hon. friend from West Assiniboia, I moved the adjournment for the purpose. I acted in courtesy to my hon. friend and with the desire that I might have an adjournment rather than go on and discuss the question without proper preparation.

Mr. CHARLTON. Surely the hon. Secretary of State can scarcely take the position that this debate should be adjourned because the House is in such total ignorance of the merits of the case that time has to be taken to investigate it. I imagine there is scarcely a public question upon which members are more likely to have formed an opinion, and to be able to give a reason for their opinion, than upon this question under discussion. I can hardly look upon the proposal to adjourn this debate as anything else than an attempt on the part of the Government to shunt the discussion of a question that may possibly be rather unpleasant, or rather embarrassing to them. Whatever may be our views as to the merits of this question, I think it would be but fair to meet it now. It is well known to my hon. friend that the adjournment of this debate probably means the shunting of the question for the remainder of the session.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I may say that I only made the motion because of the circumstances which I have explained to the House. but if the House desires to debate the question now, and if my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), for instance, desires to speak upon it, I have great pleasure in withdrawing the motion, with the consent of the House.

Motion to adjourn debate withdrawn.

Mr. LAURIER. I submit to the House that the Government, in this matter, as in many others, are not properly discharging the duties that belong to them. It is their duty to instruct the House upon all matters of policy which come before the House. The Government are derelict in that, whenever a matter of this kind comes up, they have no voice or no opinion to offer. It is their duty in all questions of policy to have a voice and to instruct the House. Now, this is not a new question; it is a question that has been debated more than once, and is one, it seems to me, as to which every man in this House should be ready to express an opinion, and especially the hon. gentlemen who sit upon the Treasury benches. For my part, speaking personally, I may say at once that I agree in a large measure with everything that has been said by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). The days have long since passed by when it was supposed that woman was an inferior being. There was a time, indeed, when the question was discussed as to whether woman had a soul; but these times are so far remote that it is hardly worth while recalling that fact. But it is not so many years ago, not to go beyond the commencement of the present century, when it was currently supposed that woman was unfit to discharge the duties of political life. I believe that the present sovereign of Great Britain has shown that woman is just as fit as man to discharge all the higher duties of statesmanship. There is one thing, however, to be said on the other hand. Though I acknowledge that the intellectual equality of women, and in many instances, the intellectual superiority of woman, can be easily granted, I am not sure for my part that the granting of the franchise to women would be altogether an unmixed evil. I am not sure that it would tend to the harmony or to the improvement of domestic life, which after all is the proper centre of woman's influence. There is an objection on that ground; but to my mind there is another consideration which should prevail in a discussion of this question. Whether the suffrage is applied to women, or whether it is applied to any other class of Her Majesty's subjects, it is largely a question of education, largely a question of habit, and largely a question of social disposition. On this side of the House we have maintained, and the motion of my hon. friend is further evidence of the right position we have taken on this question, that the regulation of the franchise is a matter which more especially concerns the provinces. Let the provinces decide the question. That is the only solution which can be given to the motion of my hon. friend. There may be provinces at the present time which are ready to grant the suffrage to women; there may be provinces, perhaps, where from the education of the people, from their social habits, it might be conducive to the general good of the country that women should be admitted to the franchise. As to the province from which I come, I must say that it is not prepared for woman suffrage. I am of French descent, and as such I claim to have just as high a regard, and, perhaps, a higher regard, for women than our fellow-citizens of British origin; but even in the Government of Quebec, as I have stated elsewhere—and my hon. friend was good enough to quote my words—if the proposition were made in the local legislature to confer the suffrage on women, I am quite sure it would be voted down at once. There is no feeling in favour of it, there is no necessity felt for it, and we are satisfied to leave things as they are. It may be that a different feeling may prevail in the province of Ontario, and in some other provinces of the confederation. But how is this to be determined? Let the local legislature in each province determine that question for itself. For my part, I have no hesitation in saying that if the province of Ontario, or the local legislature of that province, is ready to-morrow to extend the suffrage to women—and as I read public opinion, the day is not far distant when this will take place—I shall be quite willing, for my part, that woman suffrage in Ontario should be the basis of all elections, not only for the province of Ontario, but for the Dominion House as well. But let every province speak for itself. I am speaking on behalf of my own province, in which there is no such demand for this new departure in our political life. I think the way to dispose of this matter is to relegate it where it belongs, that is to say, let it be determined by the provinces. I notice one argument which was used just now by my hon. friend; he stated that by conferring this privilege upon women we would remove a sense of injustice which is now felt by a large section of the community. Well, that may be true in some of the provinces, it is not true of all the provinces; and speaking for the province of Quebec, I am certainly right in saying that women do not feel it an injustice that they have no right to vote on any political question. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move in amendment that all the words after "That" be struck out, and the following be substituted therefor:—

The question of woman suffrage is one which, like other questions concerning the suffrage, more properly belongs to provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the principle involved in that amendment is rather an amusing one, coming from the source it does, because ever since 1885, when a clause was first put into the Franchise Act giving women the right to vote, up to the present time, the leader of the Opposition and his friends in this House have invariably advocated the principle that we should accept the provincial franchise. If we accepted the principle for which hon. gentlemen opposite have been invariably contending, we would accept the provincial franchises as they are at present, and in Ontario women have, to a limited extent, the right to vote in some elections, and, therefore, would have a right to vote for members of this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. SPROULE. If you adopt provincial franchises, you must of necessity give the same franchise and allow the same voters to vote in elections for members of this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. SPROULE. I am referring to the province of Ontario, where it is the case.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. SPROULE. Only as regards municipal elections, and I say this power is exercised to a limited extent.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. SPROULE. Is the power not exercised to a limited extent when the women to-day have a right to vote for school trustees and for municipal offices? If we accept the present franchise, and the hon. gentleman and his friends invariably contend that the provincial franchises should be adopted as regards the election of members to this House, then women must be given the right to vote. For my part I see no objection to the present motion of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), but I object to the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition. If to-day we vote for members of the Dominion Parliament on the basis of property qualification, and women own property as men do and have the same interest in preserving their right and control, why should we deny to them the right to share in the management of public affairs? We find women to-day engaged in every occupation of life, and to the credit of the sex be it said that they are interesting themselves in the general affairs of life; they are engaged in science and art, and are graduates of our best universities, and they are displaying equal, and in many instances, superior ability to men in law, medicine and other lines of study. We have them on the platform and in the pulpit; and we have the noble representative of the sex, our Queen, who stands at the head of all Governments and against whose fair name no word has ever been uttered up to the present moment. Women represent the great teaching class, and, perhaps, more than any other class are responsible for giving that information to the young which will enable them in future years to carry on the affairs of life successfully and discharge their duty, both to the state and to themselves. The exercise of the franchise is based upon property qualifications so far as regards the election of members of this House, and if that is the case, and no one can deny it, why should we deny women the right to vote for members of this House? They vote for members of the Ontario Legislature.

Mr. LAURIER.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. SPROULE. If hon. gentlemen will look at the history of other countries they will find, as has been advanced by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), that some of the most able men of the day have presented strong arguments in favour of this contention. If we take the practical experience in those countries and in the States which have adopted the franchise for women, no successful argument can be advanced against their rights to vote. They possess this right in Australia, and they exercise it with great credit to themselves, and certainly without detriment to the state. In every country where they exercise this right they use it discreetly and well. It has been said that the possession of such a right might cause trouble in domestic life and result in want of domestic harmony. Such has not been the case in those countries where this power has been exercised to the limited extent to which it is used to-day. A few years ago the same arguments now presented were offered to prevent women exercising the rights to vote in elections for municipal officers and school trustees. There is no reason against extending this power to women—I have always been in favour of it—the trend of public opinion is in that direction, and the time will come when our most intelligent legislators will admit that women have the same right to exercise the franchise as is possessed by men.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has been speaking against what he fancies are the opinions of some hon. members of this House. There have been no opinions expressed on the subject, except those expressed by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) and the hon. member himself. If I remember rightly when the question was up in 1885 on the Franchise Bill, the hon. gentleman himself voted against extending the franchise to women.

Mr. SPROULE. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the hon. gentleman will find his name recorded amongst the majority who eliminated the clause proposing to give women votes at elections for members of this House. The hon. gentleman has stated that women now vote in elections for members of the Ontario Legislature. If the amendment is adopted, the hon. gentleman's present view will be given effect to so far as Ontario is concerned.

Mr. FOSTER. Not for the Dominion elections?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes; if the hon. gentleman's statement is correct as regards Ontario. The Finance Minister, I suppose, has not changed his mind since last year. The Prime Minister introduced a measure by which he proposed to supercede the present law and adopt the franchises of the various provinces and their qualifications of electors for members of this House. That was the Bill of last year. That Bill received the sanction of all the colleagues of the hon. gentleman, and it received the sanction of those hon. gentlemen who now support the Administration in this House. I assume that the measure which was introduced by the Government last year, to the principle to which the Government was committed last year, embodies a principle which the Government are prepared to accept now, and from which they are not disposed to recede. If that be so, the motion of the hon. gentleman will meet the views expressed by my hon. friend who has just spoken, because if the local legislature chose to adopt woman's suffrage, the qualification of voters for the election of members of the House of Assembly in each province would be the qualification for the members for election to this House. That being the case, if the hon. gentleman is correct in his view of the provincial law, which I am inclined to think he is not—

Mr. SPROULE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman is mistaken in what I said about provincial law. I said that women had a right to vote for school trustees and municipal officers. That was only in regard to municipal elections.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is quite beside the general statement which the hon. gentleman made. The hon. gentleman's statement was, that women would be entitled to vote for members of this House if the local law of Ontario were adopted.

Mr. SPROULE. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That would only be the case if the law as regards the qualification of voters at elections for members of the Assembly became the qualification as regards the elections of members for this House. That being in the motion of my hon. friend it should be perfectly acceptable to both sides of the House. The Government Bill of last year proposed to add certain officials who cannot vote under the provincial law. I believe they are on the voters' lists in nearly all the provinces, and where they are disqualified they are disqualified by the oath which the provincial law requires; but that was a matter about which the adoption of the local franchise by this House was to be in that respect modified. So far as the motion of my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) is concerned, this motion perfectly meets it, and meets it in accord with the views expressed by hon. gentlemen last year on that side of the House, and by hon. gentlemen always on this side of the House, and, that being so, I think that the amendment of my hon. friend ought to be acceptable to hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. McMULLEN. I must say I am rather surprised at the course the Government have taken on this question, so far. I have not seen, during the present session of Parliament, a greater exhibition of weakness and indecision from the Government than I have noticed in connection with this motion. Here is a proposition of the hon. member (Mr. Davin) which would virtually double the number of the electorate of this Dominion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes; nearly so. He proposes that women who are entitled by the possession of property, should be placed on the voters' lists. We know perfectly well that if the law were so changed, a very large percentage of married, and a large number of unmarried women would become possessed of property, and have the right to exercise the franchise. While that is the purport of the hon. gentleman's motion, the Government sit still. The question was called, and for a moment there was not a word from the Government, and they were not prepared to express an opinion. The fact of the matter is that the Secretary of State appeared to be taken so much by surprise that he was not able to deal with the arguments of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), and he proposed to adjourn the debate so that he might post himself upon the question, in order that, at some future day he would be able to deal with the arguments of the hon. member. We know that, upon a former occasion, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) told us that he discharged the duties of a funnel to a great many members of the Cabinet. It appears that he has discharged that particular duty on this occasion to the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of State virtually confesses it by proposing to adjourn the debate on the ground that he is not now capable of dealing with this very important question. I admire the submissive conduct of the Secretary of State. After having proposed to adjourn the debate, he appears for a moment to have forgotten that there is some person ahead of him and that he is not yet leader of the House, and the thought struck him that he had better consult his leader, who sits in front of him, and immediately he withdraws his motion for adjournment. It is to be hoped that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) will try and realize in future the position that he occupies. I do not wish to lecture the hon. gentleman upon that point, but he must see that his course has been rather inconsistent. I have sat in this House for some twelve sessions, and I never before saw a question of this importance come before the House when the Government were not prepared, in some way, to deal with it, and to advise a course of action to their followers. The Government, apparently, now have no opinions to express, and no views on the question, and they are prepared to sit still and let every man do as he pleases. The leader of the Opposition has urged the members of the Cabinet to express their views, but they have not yet done so. Will they do so now?

Mr. CRAIG. I am surprised that members on the opposite side of the House should avail themselves of an occasion like this to attack the Government. A few years ago, when I had the honour and pleasure to sit in the Ontario Assembly, this question was introduced there, as it was every year, and on that occasion, I remember quite well, the hon. the Premier of Ontario was in favour of granting the suffrage to women, but the Hon. Mr. Hardy, and the Hon. Mr. Fraser, two of his colleagues, made very strong speeches against it. I believe that the members of the Opposition here are very inconsistent to expect that a Government should agree on a question of this kind on which you can hardly find a unanimous agreement among any body of men. For my own part, while I admire the ingenuity of the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), I am a little surprised to find him advocating a measure of this kind. I would not be at all surprised to find in the mover of such a motion, a member who had shown his great appreciation of the fair sex by proposing to one of them and linking his fortunes with her. But to find a confirmed bachelor propose such a motion is, I confess, a surprise. I have a sort of an idea that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) fancies, it might, perhaps, place some men who are married in rather an awkward position. They might find that while they entertain certain views on political questions, their better halves entertain views diametrically opposite, which might not lead to amity in the household, but rather the reverse, and which might make a little difficulty in training up the children in the way they should go, especially upon political questions. But let us put aside all joking on this question—and I notice that when a question of this kind is introduced, there is always a considerable amount of jocularities, unless it is used as an occasion for attacking the Government, when it at once becomes a serious question. I notice that is the only line taken by members of the Opposition to-day. They have not dealt with this question on its merits. They think the Government should be prepared at once to state their views upon it, and debate it, and they think it a very strange thing that the hon. Secretary of State should move the adjournment of the debate. Now, I do not think it at all strange, and I thought his arguments for doing that were very reasonable. While I have not at present given this question much consideration, I have previously thought a little about it, and I will state some of the reasons why I cannot support the resolution of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). I may say in advance that it is not because I have not as high an appreciation of the fair sex as my hon. friend. I think it is rather because I appreciate them still more highly. I think, Sir, that it would take away from the real charm and womanliness of women if they were given the franchise and allowed to mix in politics. It was said by the hon. member in moving his resolution that nowadays there was no hustling about, and voting was conducted very quietly. That is true: no doubt voting as it is conducted to-day under the ballot is a very quiet and tame affair; but we all know that the voting is not the most important part of an election. We know that the principal work, such as canvassing, is nearly all done before; and for my part I would have some objection to politicians coming around my house and making themselves very agreeable in order to secure my wife's vote. I can imagine that I might go home some evening, and find, instead of my being expected, with tea on the table, nothing was done, because the absorbing question of the hour was politics. I might find a very nice-looking politician sitting in the parlour soliciting a vote. I do not know that I would appreciate such a situation very much. Suppose we had not only the candidate but all his canvassers going around in that way one after another, I am afraid a good many married men would get tired of the situation. But, seriously—and this is the reason I oppose this resolution—I believe that it would take away a great deal of the charm of woman. I believe that woman's proper sphere is the home. I believe that there she has enough room to exercise all her powers and faculties, and there she has an influence, that cannot be overestimated, over her husband and her children. This influence, I believe, would be lessened if women mixed up in political contests. The hon. member for West Assiniboia referred to the picture of the model woman in the Book of Proverbs; but I defy him to point out a line in that chapter which shows that that woman engaged in politics. All through the chapter, I find that the great characteristic of that woman was that she was looking well after the affairs of her house—after the girls in the house and after her husband's welfare, and seeing that everything was made comfortable for him; and I think that is a very good thing for woman to do. But there is not a line in that chapter to show that the model woman was engaged in politics or had the privilege of casting a vote. If the franchise were given to woman, the question would not stop there. The next thing would be that women would wish to be candidates for Parliament, and some of us would be left out in the cold. I am hardly prepared to vote for that. But there is one argument against a resolution of this kind which I think is a very strong one; that is, that women themselves do not ask for this privilege. It may be said that they do. While it is true that it is demanded by a few women who by nature are active and busy in the world, perhaps because they have nothing else to do, yet we find that the majority of women do not ask for the privilege, and I am satisfied that if it were granted to them the great majority would not exercise it. There is only one argument that I can imagine strongly in favour of this resolution: that is, that the granting of the suffrage to women would purify politics. That argument has been used very often, and it is a very plausible argument. I could understand, if all women voted, and the best women exercised their influence in politics, that it might tend in that direction; but I believe that if the suffrage were given to women we would find a few of them voting, while the great majority would not. I believe we would find that those women whom we look upon as the best women, the women who stay at home and train up their families in the way they should go, would not vote at all; so that the idea that politics would be purified would not be realized. Sir, what is the danger in our politics to-day? It is this—and we see it especially in the United States—that the best men do not control politics. We find in many cases that they stay at home, that they stand quite aside and criticise, instead of actually controlling politics as they might do. I believe that a similar state of things would exist with regard to women if they had the franchise; the best of them would not engage in political contests; they would be too disgusted with politics to do so; they would stay at home. I would be very glad to support this motion of my hon. friend if I could do so, because I have a very high appreciation of women and of what they have done. It is impossible to estimate all that women have done, and are doing to-day, to elevate society; but I do not believe the time has come, nor do I believe it will ever come, when it will be wise to give them the suffrage.

Mr. LACHAPPELLE. (Translation.) The reason given by the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Montague) for the adjournment of this debate are, I think, quite acceptable, and I cannot see why they have not been acquiesced in. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) made lengthy remarks in connection with his motion now before us. No doubt, Mr. Speaker, it is an important and interesting question that which has reference to the woman suffrage. However, there is a most serious principle underlying it, one worthy of the most serious consideration, and which seems not to have been considered proportionately to its importance. It is a mistake. In my opinion, it would be proper to thoroughly consider this question before deciding on the motion before the House. But since the question is before the House, since it has been brought up here, I think it my duty to state my views. The hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Montague) could, in my opinion, well have stood by his motion for an adjournment of the debate, but since he was pleased to withdraw it, I will avail myself of the opportunity given me to briefly state my views in connection with the subject-matter of this debate, although I could only hear but very few of the remarks of my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). The hon. gentleman stated that this question of the woman suffrage was an important one. Indeed, it is, and for the sake of a principle which I also considered as important, I will oppose the motion of the hon. member for Assiniboia. I listened to the first part of the speech of the hon. gentleman, that in the course of which he made the history of womankind. There was a time when a woman was a slave. Such was her condition in the ancient order of things which prevailed prior to modern civilization. After raising her up from such an abject condition, some would now put her on an equal footing with man. They want to make a man of her with respect to the rights and privileges she ought to exercise. The history of womankind which was given to us is true, but it bears with it an instructive lesson. It shows that in relation to a question such as this, one is exposed to fall into exaggeration, and after keeping for a long time womankind in a wretched servitude, some are now exposed to fall into an opposite exaggeration by raising her up too high after keeping her too low. This is the important point to which I may be allowed to call the attention of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). I may also be allowed to ask whether his motion is not an indication that we are exposed to fall into an exaggerated feeling, a feeling of which I cannot approve, neither can it be approved of by the great majority in this House. To put women on a footing of perfect equality with men seems to me an inadmissible principle, for we cannot expect that they could exercise such rights the same as men could do, whatever the hon. member for Assiniboia may say to the contrary. We cannot expect that from a political point of view, women could be as useful as men in the community. They are too liable to the incapacities inherent to their sex, they are too much enslaved to their anatomical and physiological constitution so to say, for them to be possibly put on an equal footing with men. It is in such a light that one ought to consider the part played by womankind. Otherwise we are exposed to draw false inferences which might induce us to make an improper legislation. I say women ought to be judged, as to the part they play in the community, after the attributes inherent to their sex, as men themselves ought to be. I shall not go now into details, the time would not be proper. I think, to give a scientific course of lectures on this subject, but it will be sufficient for the people and for this House to know, for the present at all events, that the position of women is not at all the same as that of men in this respect. I, therefore, cannot agree with the hon. gentleman and vote for his motion to give women a right to vote. On this question, I am induced to differ in opinion with him by a matter of principle. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, to allow women to vote is, without any necessity, to impose on them a new obligation, a new duty, in addition to those which they have already as daughters, wives and mothers, in addition, as I stated, to the numerous obligations they have as women. And why are they liable to such obligations? On account of their sex they are essentially born and organized to play a part altogether different from that of men, and though you might give them a right to vote, it would not change the character of their obligations. It would, therefore, be imposing on them a new duty, as I have just stated, and I have too much regard for women—and this is my way to show them my respect—I say I have too much regard for them to impose on them a new function, to overburden their weak shoulders, which could not bear such a heavy burden. I am not willing to impose on them obligations which could be for them a very heavy burden. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the exercise of the suffrage is not merely a mechanical or physical affair; it is an obligation causing to them new duties. A woman, in order to properly vote, will have to support her vote by serious motives and, for that purpose, she will have to devote part of her time to the study of questions which she will be called upon to decide by the exercise of her voting power. She will have to study in order to know how to decide. The hon. member for Assiniboia made a very great praise of women in order to induce us to grant them the right of suffrage. He represented them as being superior to men. If really women are superior to men, then you should examine the question most earnestly, for their vote will have more import than that of men. Therefore, such a vote will require from women protracted and important preliminary studies which would enable them to reason such an important act. Now, all this is a new duty to women, and, for that very reason, I would not like to overburden them by forcing on them a right that would require from them an increase of work. Mr. Speaker, I will go no further in my intended demonstration, as I have not heard the whole speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin). Having been compelled to leave the House, as it often happens to many amongst us, I could not listen to all the observations made by the hon. gentleman. I was anxious, however, to state some of the reasons that induce me to vote against this motion. Although I have not referred to the question as exhaustively as I could have wished, I hope I have said enough, and that with enough clearness, for the House to realize that if we wish to act fairly towards women, we should not impose on them new duties. Therefore, for these reasons, I am opposed to the very principle of the motion of the hon. member for Assiniboia. This measure of the hon. gentleman would necessarily lead us to a broader legislation in the same direction, which would result in gradually increasing the suffrage for the women, for I have no doubt that before long they would come and ask for another step towards their full emancipation. Now, it seems to me that this House should forthwith deal with the question from the proper point of view, and that, instead of allowing the motion, such as it is, to pass, it should state that, in its opinion, the privilege to vote at elections ought not to be granted to women. This, in my opinion, should be moved as an amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the Opposition, who would like the question to be absolutely left to the provinces. It is not going far enough to leave this question to the provinces, and no member should fear to state here what his views are with respect to this important question. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I beg to state that the greatest regard one can have for women is to leave them where they now are, to the part they play as women and mothers. I hope that such an opinion as stated by me will not be misconstrued by the sex which none of us would like to offend. I even regret that such a protestation should come from a member of the province of Quebec, that is to say, from a French speaker. Perhaps I am putting myself in opposition to history, which says the French people are essentially a most courteous people, as suggested, I think, by the leader of the Opposition. I regret, I say, having to record such an opinion, but I think it is the conclusion to which the House should come.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). While I fully admit that the emancipation of woman is one of the great signs of the times, I am still disposed to think that politics is one of the last fields into which women should enter in the process of emancipation. There are many other careers open to her in which she can hope to achieve signal success. Let her devote herself to literature, where success awaits her, although I must say that the position taken in literature by the new woman is not creditable, and some of her work a disgrace to literature. No doubt, in intellectual power, woman is the equal of man, but owing to the physical limitations of her sex and to the emotional side of her nature being stronger than her reasoning power, she is not fitted for public life. If women had their say in politics to-day, the leaders of this country would, in all probability, be of the stamp of those men who advocate prohibition; and men like Mr. Spence of Toronto would probably be Ministers of Finance, and the country be ruled by emotion rather than by reason. I would like to quote the opinion of one of our ablest public men, although one with whom on this side we do not always agree. I refer to Professor Goldwin Smith, who has an article in the "North American Review," in which he says, discussing the situation in the United States:

In America, as in England, and in the other colonies of England, the restlessness of the age has extended to the domain of sex. Some women are longing to break through the established limitations of womanhood, while they show an inclination to disparage what have hitherto been considered at once the natural duties and glories of woman. They are now seeking to grasp political power, which in their hands would be divorced from responsibility, since the burden and duty of upholding and safeguarding the state must ever remain where nature has put them—in the man. As yet, only two far western states have adopted woman suffrage in its full political form. It has suffered some defeats in other quarters, and was rejected by the Constitutional Convention of New York. On that occasion the opposition to it included a large and distinguished body of women, who thought that they foresaw the ultimate consequences to their sex of an attempt to remove the landmarks of nature. When the full tide of female emotion shall be added to the political vortex, when women shall have become political, when the female demagogue with her platform shall have become fully developed, the final trial of popular government will be near.

I heartily agree with that opinion. I believe the trial of popular government will come when woman takes part in politics. Politics are not suited to the physical limitations which surround her sex; and, although there have been women who were powerful in literature and politics, yet we find that these same women have also been obstructionists in politics and literature. Queen Elizabeth has been cited as a great queen. True, she was a great queen, but she was also a tyrant, and she insisted in forcing her own views on the statesmen by whom she was surrounded; and history proves that, although England became great during her reign, England also suffered damage from many of her acts. Her Majesty Queen Victoria is held up to us as a great queen and one of the leading politicians of Europe, but there are many who think that even her position would have been better filled by a man and her duties better performed.

Mr. DAVIN. A man like George IV.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Not necessarily. With regard to the question raised by the leader of the Opposition, namely, that we should refer this question of woman's suffrage to the provinces, I do not agree with them. We have taken the position that the federal power ought to make its own franchise. We have upheld that principle session after session. If the leader of the Opposition charges this side of the House with trying to evade this responsibility, we must also charge him with trying to evade it in some way. We must make our own franchise and shoulder the responsibility; and once we decide to give the vote to women, they will have the right to be candidates and to sit in this House and take part in our deliberative assembly. I do not think we ought to countenance any such idea. I do not believe that the women are in favour of this. On the contrary, I believe the great majority of them are decidedly opposed to it.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I must congratulate the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) upon the retrieving work which he began to-day. During a rather long and brilliant career, he always made a show of the utmost disregard for women by not even condescending to associate one of them with his life, and now he thinks that, before leaving the arena, he can atone for all his wrongs by kneeling before them and saying to them: You are worthy to lead us. I fear it is too late, and that, notwithstanding his admiration, women will not forgive him for the long suffering he inflicted upon them by his persistent single life. This question of the enfranchisement of women is an extremely important one, for it relates to one of the fundamental principles of the social question. For my part, I must say immediately that I am opposed to the amendment of the hon. leader of the Opposition as well as to the main motion. And here are the reasons why. I am opposed to the provinces having a right to decide who shall come here and make laws for the whole Dominion of Canada. I do not wish to see my own province in particular, led by a class of men, women and children selected by the other provinces. I want the laws that shall govern the province of Quebec to be acceptable to the majority in that province, and I wish that we should keep the guarantee that this majority will be the outcome of elections based on the present franchise. Although the question was well threshed out, we made some mistakes here when dealing with the electoral franchise. I intend saying what these mistakes were, and how they could still be aggravated if we should leave to the provinces the right to control the Dominion franchise. The first mistake we made was this: We invaded the province of the family head when we allowed the sons of farmers to come and vote, often against the opinion of their fathers. Instead of giving to the family head a vote for each child he had, qualified to vote by the property he held: instead of increasing the prestige and influence of the family head, according to the number of children he had, we decreased that influence by saying: The more children you have, the less your vote is worth. On the other hand, we said to the young man: If your father should give you orders which you dislike, you will take revenge upon him by decreasing his influence through your franchise. By the franchise conferred to the young men under the authority of their parents, we did away with the autonomy of the family and the authority of the family head. I am well aware that they pleaded for liberty, but it is a false principle. Providence has established the family as the basis of the community, and whoever invades the province of the family by increasing the rights of the son to the detriment of those of the father does away with the family, this great basis of social security. What do they now propose to us? They propose that we should confer, not only to the young men under the authority of their parents, but even to the daughters and wives the right to come and vote along with their brothers. They wish to go further still into the family and they say to the daughter, to the sister as they said to the brother: You have all a right to thwart the wishes of your parents. The main motion goes still further, for it says to the wife of the family head: You too, can nullify the vote of your husband. They thus run the risk of sowing dissension, discord and rebellion into the family. Mr. Speaker, it is no question of disregarding the women when declining to enfranchise them. We all admit that they are the most beautiful part of humanity. They are, so to say, the point of connection between earth and Heaven. They assume something
