of the angel. They soothe and alleviate social evils. We all admit that, and none of us would speak against his mother, sister or daughter; but why not leave things at their proper place? What is the part played by women in this world? Were they made to bear a burden, to do hard work, to make war? I know that in some cases, Providence made use of a Joan of Arc, for instance, who was an extraordinary woman, a sublime woman. But, as a rule, the part they have to play is a more simple, more ideal, more spiritual a one, so to say; it is the part of kindness which springs from the heart. There is the true, the beautiful part of a woman, for she is made for the house, for the home of which she is an angel. There would be much imprudence to make a voter of her, to entangle her in the shovings and acts of violence which accompany our political contests, frequently at the very doors of the polling booth. Women were not made for that. Let us leave them their moral purity, their bashfulness, their sweetness, which give them in our minds so much charm, and the community will lose nothing thereby. The power of women will not grow less. That power woman exercises it with respect to every one of us when we go back home to see again our wives and our children; it is exercised through a concourse of fondness and kindness in every serious circumstance throughout life, whether joyful or painful, and always that charm is due to a magnanimous devotion, to a spirit of self-denial, to a spirit of sacrifice which increase its value. Providence intended that it should be so. A woman renders thereby a greater service to the social body than she could do by becoming a voter. It ill-becomes the community to change her sex and to degrade her by the exercise of the franchise. Not that I say that in some circumstances it would not be proper perhaps to give her such a right. For instance, I am aware that, in the province of Quebec, a woman may be enfranchised by law in municipal and school matters. And why is that, Mr. Speaker? Because in such cases the women are directly concerned, because they themselves manage an estate that is going to be taxed, because they will send their children to the school that is about to be established. And then in what cases is a woman a voter? That franchise is never granted to daughters under the authority of their parents. No. That right is granted only to a woman who manages a sufficient estate to qualify her as a voter were she a man. Therefore that provincial legislation does not go as far as the Dominion Franchise Act which enables a child to vote against his father. However, I will not discuss that point now. I stand by the resolution moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). He asks us to state that "in the opinion of this House, the privilege of voting for candidates for membership thereof should be extended to women possessing the qualifications which now entitle men to the electoral franchise." It follows from this, Mr. Speaker, that a woman living in separate maintenance with her husband and being the owner of a property, worth, say $20,000, will be entitled to vote and with her as many daughters as would be qualified by that amount. If she has five daughters, each of these will likewise be a voter. I value the admiration suddenly professed for women by my hon. friend the member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), and of which he so expressively acquainted us—although, by the way, he could have supported in a different way his appreciation of the great qualities of women and the admiration he has for them—but I cannot agree to put women on the same footing as men, not to change the part assigned by Providence to each of the sexes in the community. Mr. Speaker, the Government is reproached with having no policy in relation to this question. I cannot see why the Government should be bound to set forth at this moment a policy with respect to this matter. The Government moved the adjournment of the debate in order to enable the House to form an opinion on the principle at stake and its consequences. That was a fair request, and in making it the Government has voiced the feeling of the members of this House. As an evidence, Mr. Speaker, of the importance there is for the House to have time to consider this question and realize the consequences that would follow the adoption of this motion. I may say that when I explain this motion, its promoter nods to me that I put a wrong construction on it. When I say that by this resolution the wife will be a voter in the life time of her husband, and when I say to my hon. friend that the granting of his motion would confer a vote to the daughters of such a woman and generally to daughters living under the authority of their parents, he nods to me that I am not in it. That proves how necessary is an adjournment of this debate; for my part, I would like to understand the scope of the resolution now before us and to get new explanations from my hon. friend, or, at the very least, I would like to read his speech in full. I also wish that he should have time to answer the objections which we are likely to raise. It is not one of those questions as to which a Government is bound to give an opinion at five minutes' notice, and I think it would be well to adjourn the debate. I cannot argue with the hon. leader of the Opposition when he says that this matter should be left to the provinces. There is much talk now about the rights of the provinces. I think we are falling into an exaggeration in this respect. Some people have said that the provinces could and ought to select those who are to elect their representatives in this Parliament. They have not said that such a proposition bided a snare, that in some provinces thousands of citizens are disfranchised by local laws, that in some provinces they disfranchised, for party purposes and for no other reasons, thousands of voters. They would, however, enable the provinces to dictate beforehand who the people will be who will come and sit here. They offered as an excuse that such invidious laws have been in force for many years. Why have they not repealed them? It is because they succeeded in keeping into power owing to this selection, to this sorting of the people. Owing to this selection, they were able to keep a majority which they would have lost without that. Now, they would like, Mr. Speaker, to confer to the provinces, not only the right to fix the provincial qualification of the voters, but also the moral qualifications of those who shall exercise the electoral franchise; in short, to say that such a woman or such a man will or will not be a voter, I cannot agree to that. I would not like that the Dominion of Canada could practically be governed by a majority due to the Indian women of the North-west. It is the unquestionable privilege of any representative body to provide who will elect the members thereof. It would be unwise to delegate it for ever. To sum up, Mr. Speaker, I am against the amendment because it deprives this Parliament of a privilege it ought to preserve. I am against the resolution of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) because it is too general, because it would be dangerous for women to enfranchise them, because by making men of them you deprive them of their moral purity, of their sweetness, of their bashfulness which so much add to their charms. You make men of women and you depoeitize them.

Mr. McINERNEY. I do not rise just now for the purpose of giving my opinion upon the principle involved in the motion of my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). If ever the time arrives that it shall be necessary for me to give my opinion on this question, I hope I shall have the privilege of doing so. I rise now rather for the purpose of pointing out what seems to me a distinction and a difference between the remarks made and the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the Opposition. The hon. leader of the Opposition stated, if I properly understood him, that this Parliament should not pronounce upon this question until the provinces have pronounced upon it. That is a position with which I entirely agree. I hold with the hon. leader of the Opposition that this Parliament should not pronounce upon this question or force this change upon any province until the province shall have first pronounced in favour of it. But it is a long cry from that position to the amendment moved by the hon. gentleman. The amendment moved by the hon. leader of the Opposition gives provinces, or proposes to give them, sole control over the franchise. And that is a proposition that I must dissent from. I believe, Sir, that this Parliament has a right to control the franchise, which is the basis of its representation. I do not believe that this Parliament should be elected upon a franchise which is made by the provinces alone, and therefore I am opposed to the amendment of the hon. leader of the Opposition as entirely and absolutely different from the remarks he made in opposition to the motion of the hon. member for West Assiniboia. I would have only too much pleasure in voting for the hon. gentleman's amendment if he should change it in this particular, and change it so that it shall declare that the woman suffrage shall not be forced upon any province until that province is in favour of it. If he will so change it, I will vote for it; but I must dissent from it as it is, because it seeks to give the provinces the power of legislating upon the franchise with regard to representation in the Dominion Parliament. I think the amendment of the hon. leader of the Opposition is rather a catch amendment, if I may be permitted to use that expression; it is an amendment rather to force upon this House a declaration of principle which a large number of members of this House are opposed to, and upon that ground I am opposed to the amendment. The hon. member for West Assiniboia, in endeavouring to strengthen his position on the motion he has placed upon the paper, sought to quote Scripture. Well, Sir, if my memory serves me, there is a passage to this effect:

The devil can cite Scripture for his purpose.
An evil soul, producing holy witness,
Is like a villain with a smiling cheek,
A goodly apple rotten at the heart.

They tell me that the poetry is good. I may say that I do not believe that it is entirely applicable to the hon. member for West Assiniboia. I shall oppose the amendment of the hon. leader of the Opposition, because, I think, it seeks to establish a principle with which I cannot agree.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words on this subject before the vote is taken, and, as it is now nearly six o'clock, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to; and debate adjourned.

LIEUT.-GOVERNOR OF MANITOBA.

Mr. McCARTHY. I rise for the purpose of saying that when we assemble again at eight o'clock, I propose to call the attention of the House to a very extraordinary document, published the day before yesterday, I think, by way of advice given to the Government of Manitoba by the Lieutenant-Governor of that province. It is a matter of such consequence, to my way of thinking, that I will move the adjournment of the House, in order that we may consider the propriety of a Lieutenant-Governor, an officer of this Dominion, taking a position I shall explain when we come to deal with it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I trust the hon. member will not bring that matter up this evening. I should like to be present when it is discussed, and it will be impossible for me to attend this evening. Would the hon. gentleman bring it up some other time?

Mr. McCARTHY. What other time would suit the hon. gentleman? It is an important matter, and should not be delayed. But I should like to meet the views of my hon. friend.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). To-morrow afternoon.

Mr. McCARTHY. Very well.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

SABBATH OBSERVANCE.

Mr. CHARLTON moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 2) to secure the better observance of the Lord's day, commonly called Sunday.

Motion agreed to.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). The hon. gentleman for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), when he introduced this Bill, told the House that he had undertaken a thankless task, that he was swimming against the stream, and beating the air. I thoroughly agree with him, and I think, also, that he was undertaking an unnecessary task. It is unnecessary for more reasons than one. I was especially surprised when that hon. member got up in this House and took the ground that he was in favour of restriction. Both he and the party with which he is identified have been telling the people of this country from time to time that they are not restrictionists; and especially are they against restriction in trade, and restriction in commerce, restriction in things than can be measured by dollars and cents. But he, a Liberal, comes forward in this House, and is in favour of an altogether different kind of restriction, he is in favour of restriction in matters of conscience, he is in favour of restriction in regard to personal immunity; and he is engaged in this House in trying to forge a yoke to put upon the necks of his fellow-citizens. I am also surprised at that hon. member, who has been identified with the Reform party, coming forward and arguing that we ought to have a federal law to regulate Sunday. If I mistake not, he and his party are champions of provincial rights in this country; and I am here to argue that the provinces are quite competent to make all the laws necessary for the due observance of Sunday. As a matter of fact, we have a first-class Sabbath law in Ontario. It is well administered, and it is administered in this very matter of Sunday newspapers. Now, I happen to be connected with a newspaper, and last January, when there was a great fire in Toronto, we did run out a Sunday edition of that paper. I was promptly brought up in the police court and fined $1 and costs therefor, and the provincial law was all that was necessary to secure the due observance of the Sabbath. The boys who sold papers on that day were also brought up in the police court; and there is plenty of law in the province of Ontario for dealing with newsboys who are charged with such a crime. They are brought into court privately, and are lectured by the magistrate; and they were lectured in this particular case. The hon.

gentleman is going altogether too far in trying to pass a federal law when we have a first-class provincial law on the statute-book which covers both the cases cited by him. Another thing that struck me was that he got up in this House and told us that this was a Christian country. I thoroughly agree with him, and I hope it will always continue to be a Christian country. But it does not follow that because this is a Christian country we must put the whole Mosaic decalogue on the Canadian statute-book, and evidently that is what he intends to do, if he is allowed to do it in this House. If he wants Christian law in regard to the Sabbath, and I have no objection to have it put on the statute-book, then I would refer him to Paul's Epistle to the Colossians, chapter 2, verses 16 and 17:

Let no man, therefore, judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holyday, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath days.

Which are a shadow of things to come.

Now, there is Christian doctrine, and we have had it laid down time after time, and we do not want the hon. member for North Norfolk, or any one else to come here and interfere with liberty of conscience and personal liberty in regard to the Sabbath. If the hon. gentleman will only adopt that Christian idea, which he will find in the Scriptures and which was taught by our blessed Master himself, he will not interfere with us, but he will leave the question of the observance of the Sabbath to each man's own conscience. Another point is this. When the hon. gentleman professed to speak from the provincial point of view he failed to remember that the people of Quebec do not hold the same views in regard to the Sabbath observance as do the people of Ontario, and the people of Quebec should have the right to observe the Sabbath to suit themselves and their consciences, and it should not be the part of this House to endeavour to pass a general law, which will be unsatisfactory to that province and several of the other provinces. The hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has expressed his desire to have workmen protected in their Sunday. So am I. If the hon. gentleman will bring down the draft of the Bill declaring that a man shall work not more than six days out of seven to make a living, I will support it. That is a law such as we want in this country. If he will not introduce such a measure, I may take it on myself at a subsequent period to submit such a Bill to the House. That is what we want, not a Bill saying that the people must do so and so on Sunday, but a measure setting forth that every man shall be able, by six days' labour, to make a living and not be compelled to work on the seventh day. I, therefore, consider this Bill an unnecessary one; it is an interfering measure, it is an illiberal measure, it is a reactionary measure, and above all it is a measure which a member calling himself a Liberal and professing to be against all restrictions and in favour of provincial rights should not introduce into this Federal Legislature. I therefore move that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. CURRAN. With respect to the Bill now before the House, I do not think the Bill as drafted is as good a measure as the law that now exists for the preservation of order and the good observance of the Lord's day. Last year we had a very long discussion over this Bill, or a similar one, and several amendments were adopted. I do not know why the hon. gentleman did not adopt the phraseology of the first section as amended, and which proved satisfactory to the House at large. If we take the law of Ontario, which is the law of nearly all of the English-speaking provinces of the Dominion, we find it provided in the Revised Statutes, 1887, Chap. 203, that :

It is not lawful for any merchant, tradesman, artificer, mechanic, workman, labourer or other person whatsoever on the Lord's day to sell publicly show forth or expose or offer for sale or to purchase any goods, chattels or any other personal property or real estate whatsoever, or to do or exercise any worldly labour, business or work of his ordinary calling, except as regards selling drugs or medicine, and works of necessity and works of charity.

That is so far as regards the province of Ontario, and that law covers every conceivable point that can be put in the English language so far as the prohibition of any servile work, or sale of newspapers, or any other articles whatsoever on the Lord's day is concerned. We find in the province of Quebec there is also a provision in the Revised Statutes of the province which says that :

No shopkeeper, pedlar, hawker or other person shall sell or retail any goods, wares or merchandise during Sunday, under a penalty of not more than $20 for the first offence, and not more than $40 for each subsequent offence.

In Nova Scotia servile labour of all kinds is prohibited under Cap. 159, Revised Statutes, 1894. In New Brunswick servile labour is also prohibited, and in fact such is the case in all the English provinces, in which we find laws in force founded upon the English statute of Charles II. In each province sales are prohibited in almost identical language. The only province in which there is any difference as regards the law is in the province of Manitoba, where these matters are relegated to the municipalities, which have a right within their own limits to make such regulations as they think proper for the due observance of the Lord's day. Having these provincial statutes in force, which absolutely cover everything that is aimed at by this Bill, I do not see why the hon. gentleman, if he wants to make one uniform law, did not adopt the phraseology accepted by this House last session. Instead of doing so, he has gone back to all that was objectionable in the draft Bill. Take the first clause. It says :

Who shall on the Lord's day engage in the publication and issuing.

What kind of language is that—what does it cover? Will such language not give rise to any amount of litigation in the courts? Why not say 'whoever shall print and publish or issue'? When is the publication to begin? Supposing a newspaper is printed on Friday or Saturday and it is sold only on Sunday, is it merely the boy who sells the newspaper you are going to strike at? We have other expressions in the same section which are equally objectionable. The Bill requires more than the provincial law to constitute an offence. Publishing a newspaper under the local law is an offence now, but this Bill requires the publication and issuing. The clause goes on to say :

Whoever shall engage in the sale of any newspaper on that day shall be deemed guilty of an indictable offence; but nothing in this section shall be held to prevent the gratuitous distribution of religious publications on the Lord's day.

Where is the line to be drawn? There are religious publications containing a considerable amount of secular news, while the body of the paper may be a matter of a religious character. There are Sunday newspapers issued in some places, not many of them in Canada, in which there is a considerable quantity of religious news. Probably there is a sermon by some eminent divine, which will cover a whole side of the paper. How are the magistrates or judges to decide whether such a publication is a religious publication or not? Yet every magistrate in the country will have to decide what is a religious publication. It will be almost impossible to get a decision as to what is a religious publication in the sense indicated by the Bill, and yet magistrates and judges will be called upon to decide whether persons have been guilty of an indictable offence or not. The Bill as amended last year provided that :

Whoever shall on the Lord's day engage in the sale of any newspaper shall be guilty of an indictable offence.

That does not, to my mind, cover the ground any more than does the present Bill, and the law as it exists in the provinces is preferable. The section of the Bill as amended last session closed with these words :

But nothing in this section shall affect the distribution by any publisher in the ordinary way, or shall prevent the distribution of religious publications in churches, Sunday schools or religious meetings.

After a long discussion last year, after the subject had been considered by both sides of the House, after every hon. member interested in it had applied his mind to amending the Bill so as to make it workable, and that the judges and magistrates would know exactly what the law was, it was decided that these religious publications could be distributed gratuitously in churches, Sunday schools and in religious meetings. These publications were not to be gratuitously distributed on the streets. The Bill did not define what style of paper was to be considered a religious publication. The place or places where they were to be distributed was to give them the stamp—in churches, Sunday schools and in religious meetings. After much trouble and care this decision was arrived at by the House. Now, the hon. gentleman, for reasons best known to himself, undertakes to subvert the whole action of the House at that time, and submits the draft of a Bill which would be utterly unworkable if it became law to-morrow, and would give rise to conflicting decisions throughout the length and breadth of the land. Under these circumstances I think that this House cannot be called upon to pass this Bill with section No. 1 in its present condition.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. Solicitor General in his strictures upon the Bill as now presented inquires: Why not adopt the phraseology of the old Bill? You are aware, Mr. Chairman, that when this Bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole last session there was no possibility of a close consideration of it, and whatever could be obtained must be obtained then or the Bill would lie over for another session. The peculiar state of business in the House rendered it impossible to reach the Bill until the very last day that it could be acted upon, and in the hurry and confusion, various proposals were made and the Bill left this House necessarily in an imperfect condition, and it was refused the courtesy of even a reference to a committee in the Senate and was thrown out, partly because it was said to be imperfect in its character. The point was raised last year that section one would prevent the distribution of newspapers and letters in post offices in Quebec province upon the Lord's day. It was sought to obviate that difficulty. The objection was then made that the section would prevent the distribution of religious publications in Sunday schools and churches and other religious assemblies. Well, Sir, the section as it now stands in the present Bill is, in my opinion, an improvement upon the section of the Bill last year because it states more definitely what was intended, and it covers the ground intended to be covered by the alleged imperfect section in the Bill as it was sent to the Senate from this House last year. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Curran) tells us that the provincial laws are all that is necessary in reference to this matter. He quotes the provisions of the provincial law of Ontario and of Quebec and of other provinces, and he tells us that in all these provinces the hawking and the sale of merchandise is an illegal act upon the Lord's day.

Mr. CURRAN. Of any goods.

Mr. CHARLTON. Any goods. And the Solicitor General tells us that for that reason these laws provide perfectly for all that is intended to be provided for in this section. Well, Sir, none of those laws provide for the regulation of the distribution through the mails of a newspaper published on the Lord's day. That is not a sale of the paper, nor a hawking around of the paper, nor a transaction that is covered in any sense by a provincial law.

Mr. CURRAN. Oh, yes, that is provided for in the statutes of Ontario.

Mr. CHARLTON. Does my hon. friend profess to say that the law of Ontario would prevent the passage of a paper through the mails or of their distribution on the Lord's day?

Mr. CURRAN. Oh, no, I thought you said there was no exception for the mails, and there is.

Mr. CHARLTON. I said that the law with reference to the sale or hawking about of wares would not reach far enough to act efficiently in preventing the distribution or circulation or sale of Sunday newspapers. Now, Mr. Chairman, this may be, as my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) says, a restrictive measure. It may be a measure that interferes somewhat with his rights of conscience, and it may be a measure, in his opinion, that interferes with his liberty as a subject. But the object of laws is to conserve the public welfare and to secure the greatest possible benefit to the greatest number of people, and it is necessary in making laws for the good of the community to abridge the liberty of the subject to some extent, to prevent the subject from having the liberty to do an act that is wrong or that will be injurious to his neighbour. We must in some cases restrict the absolute liberty of the subject. Laws are made for the purpose of obliging those who are subject to these laws to pursue a particular line of conduct, and the object of law is to secure the greatest good to the greatest number. Now, Sir, that is the object of this law. In advocating this Bill I profess to say that the Sunday newspaper is a great evil. I point to the experience of a country where the Sunday newspaper has existed only for a few years, where a thousand Sunday newspapers are published, and I have the authority of Catholic prelates, and of Protestant prelates, and of public men, and that authority concurs in saying that the Sunday newspaper of the United States has debauched public sentiment and has destroyed, or nearly destroyed, the sanctity, of the Sabbath, and has dragged that nation down from the position it occupied twenty years ago, as a nation where the Sabbath was tolerably well observed, to be a semi-infidel country to-day. I look at the influence produced by the Sunday newspapers and I say that that condition of things is one to be deplored and to be avoided by us. I say that if we apply, not a remedy for the evil existing, but a preventive now, we would be doing for the people who live in this country, and for our successors who come after us, a great service. Believing as I do, believing as Cardinal Gibbons does, believing as Archbishop Ireland does, that the Sunday newspaper is an absolute and unmitigated curse, calculated to lower the moral as well as the religious tone of any country, I think it behooves us to take measures to exclude it from Canada. I am sincerely desirous of seeing Canada start on a good foundation. We have a good population here, we have got good laws, we have good institutions, and we want to avoid the errors which our neighbours fell into when we see these errors displayed before us. If we avoid the Sunday newspapers, we certainly avoid an error that the Americans have fallen into, and if we follow their error it will produce lamentable consequences in this country. This first section provides :

1. Whoever shall upon the Lord's day, in the capacity of a proprietor, publisher or manager, engage in the publication and issuing of any newspaper, journal or periodical, for the purpose of sale, or distribution either by carrier or through the mails upon that day, and whoever shall engage in the sale of any newspaper on that day, shall be deemed guilty of an indictable offence; but nothing in this section shall be held to prevent the gratuitous distribution of religious publications upon the Lord's day.

Now, my hon. friend the Solicitor General says that the Bill of last year provided that it should be lawful to distribute religious publications in churches, Sunday schools and religious meetings on the Lord's day. The Bill before the House now is more liberal in its provisions. It does not prevent a colporteur from distributing religious publications gratuitously on the street. It does not prevent the Salvation Army from distributing their publications, not only in the church but on the street, and it is intended to be more liberal in its provisions in this respect.

Mr. CURRAN. Last year's Bill was framed for the very purpose of meeting the Salvation Army case.

Mr. CHARLTON. The amendments of last year's Bill were drawn hastily, and the phraseology restricted the gratuitous distribution of religious publications to churches, Sunday schools and religious meetings. If a colporteur wishes to place tracts in the hands of an individual on the street, why prevent him? If it is proper to make gratuitous distribution of religious publications in Sunday schools, why prevent it? And so this Bill is distinctly more liberal in its provisions than the Bill of last year. It does not pretend to curtail the right of any individual to make a gratuitous distribution of religious publications on the Lord's day anywhere. I do not think the objection which my hon. friend raises against that feature of the Bill is one that will stand criticism. This Bill is designed in that respect to be more liberal than the Bill of last year. One point made by Senator Almon against the Bill of last year was that it would be an outrageous thing to fine a newsboy $50. The Bill provided that a fine might be imposed to the extent of $50. This year there is a slight change in the penal provisions. It is provided as follows:—

Any person guilty of any offence declared in section one of this Act to be an indictable offence, shall, on summary conviction, be liable to a fine not exceeding fifty dollars, for the first offence, and not exceeding one hundred dollars for each subsequent offence, together with the costs,—and in default of immediate payment of such fine and costs, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one month: Provided that in the case of newsboys hawking or crying newspapers for sale on the Lord's day, the punishment for the first offence shall be imprisonment for a period of not less than one day nor more than five days, and for each subsequent offence the penalty shall be imprisonment for a period of not more than ten days.

Newsboys probably not being in a good position to pay a fine. Now, the question rests upon this point: is the Sunday newspaper a thing that is likely to be beneficial to this country, or to strengthen its institutions?

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). It depends on the character of the paper, not the time of publication.

Mr. CHARLTON. Exactly. When the first Sunday newspaper was published in the United States, it made obeisance to public sentiment; it assumed that the reader would demand a little religious reading, and it gave a column or two of religious homily and matter of a semi-religious character. That lasted for a short time, but it gradually disappeared, and to-day you will find no Sunday newspaper in the United States that gives its readers religious reading.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). The fault of the people.

Mr. CHARLTON. You will find it the worst paper of the whole week, crammed full of scandal, gossip and all kinds of matter of the most pernicious character. It drives from the household the Bible and other religious literature, and creates a taste for frivolity and superficiality in the minds of the people. But aside from religious considerations, the Sunday newspaper is a curse. Violate any of God's laws, and you will go, not on the upward plane, but on the downward plane, and that has been the course of the Sunday newspaper wherever it has been introduced ; its inevitable tendency has always been to grow worse. In its nature it cannot be otherwise, because it is a violation of God's law, and it will never undertake to defend that which is an imputation upon its own existence. In the United States you will find that whenever any question regarding the observance or maintenance of the Sabbath arises, as in the case of the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday, every Sunday newspaper is arrayed on the side of the devil, and fights on that side. And so it will be here if we allow the Sunday newspaper to be introduced ; we can easily see what the character of the paper will be. Now, we do not want it here. It is one of the institutions of the United States which those acquainted with that country condemn as an evil influence. In this matter we should be animated by high considerations of duty to our fellow-men ; we should lift ourselves above mere prejudice and the tendency to accuse of cant all men who desire to do something that God's law commends—that old immutable law which is for the good of all men, and never is violated without serious consequences. If we intend to be animated by those high considerations of duty, we ought to keep this curse from coming into Canada. We do not want to get up here and haggle about this or that little point, or split hairs. We want to exclude the Sunday newspaper, and I propose to do it by the first section of this Bill.

Mr. AMYOT. I look upon this Bill as one affecting morals, or civil or municipal rights. I suppose that this Parliament will be subject to the periodical fits of sanctity of some men, and that, although we have decided this question before, we shall every session have to oppose this Bill. My reasons for opposing it have not changed. If the hon. member wants to make it a religious Bill, as he said a moment ago, to prevent the violation of God's law, I think he goes beyond his power under our constitution. We have not been established here as a teaching school or a church. The constitution has imposed upon us no such duty. Religion in Canada is free ; every one has the liberty to practice the religion he chooses, to worship his God in the way he has been taught, and in the way he prefers after study ; and I deny to the hon. gentleman the right of imposing his views upon his neighbour. A great many people in this country do not believe that any church in this world had the right to change the Sabbath day to the first day of the week. They do not believe that God rested before doing his work, on the first day ; they believe that he rested after having done his work, that is, on the seventh day, the Sabbath day. What the hon. gentleman calls the Lord's day has been chosen by a church, the Catholic Church. The hon. gentleman submits to that church so far as the choice of that day is concerned, but those who do not believe in submitting to the Catholic Church in that regard should not be bound by his views. I contend that the Jews and others who believe in celebrating the seventh day have quite as much right to their views under the constitution as he has to his ; and by seeking to impose his views upon these people he is infringing the liberty which has been guaranteed to them under the constitution. We have no power to do that. Moreover, we have no authority to dictate to any one what his religious views should be. Now, if this is a moral law, I ask what is immoral in the act of selling a paper, a book or pamphlet ? If the paper, or pamphlet, or book is moral in itself, what is immoral in the act of selling it on any day of the week ? My hon. friend thinks it is immoral to sell on Sunday. Well, let him not sell. He thinks it is immoral to buy on Sunday. Well, let him not buy. But the man who thinks that the Sabbath is the first day of the week should have full liberty to hold that view. We are not allowed by the compact of confederation to impose different views upon such a man. If the book is immoral we have our penal laws which prevent the printing, binding, or selling of immoral productions, so that we do not require a special law for that purpose. But if the thing is not immoral in itself, we ought not to abuse our power as a Federal Parliament by declaring it a crime. We might as well declare immoral the act of buying an apple or taking a drive at any particular hour or on any particular day. It is in our power to give ourselves jurisdiction by declaring the thing criminal, but should we do that ? If the fact of selling a paper or printing it is not immoral in itself, we ought not to abuse the power given us by the constitution by declaring it a crime. I say that this is a municipal matter, with which we have no right to deal. I am surprised that an hon. gentleman belonging to a party which boasts—and I am glad to know that it does—of its respect for provincial rights, should desire to infringe on those rights. According to section 92 of the British North America Act, the legislature of each province may exclusively make laws in relation to municipal institutions. Why, then, should we take that jurisdiction from the provinces under cover of a criminal Bill ? Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the province of Ontario cannot deal with municipal matters ? Does he mean to say that we in Quebec are unable, without the inspiration of his divine light to know how we should conduct ourselves on Sundays in order not to break the commandment of God ? Since when has the hon. gentleman been declared the inspired agent of the Almighty in this world ? I maintain that in the province of Quebec we have the right to settle our own municipal matters, of which this is one. Should the city of Quebec, where I live, be overrun by these productions, we will pass a by-law and send to jail the small boys who obstruct our streets by selling them. Municipal institutions belong to the provinces; let us leave the provinces to deal with them. The hon. gentleman says that in the States this Sunday literature has been the cause of untold corruption. Does he mean to say that if, on Sunday, a Bible, or a newspaper giving Bible texts or good sermons, or news concerning missions or concerning wars in which the Christian faith is interested, the American people must necessarily suffer in their morals? If, in the United States, these Sunday publications have brought evil, it must be because these publications are, in themselves, essentially bad. Let them publish less scandal, let the American nation give its children a better education, either by means of separate or other schools, well supervised by the parents, and you will see less scandal, less corruption and crime of all kinds, and then the ugly literature of which the hon. gentleman speaks will not be sold. If they had in the States, as we have in Canada, good newspapers and literature, the people would not be spoiled by the Sunday literature. Take any man leaving his home on Sunday morning, and what does he do? He does what his training has taught him to do. If he has been brought up with the idea that on Sunday he must go to church, he will go to church. If he has been taught to go to hotels or places where he should not go, he will go there. It is not the literature he buys on Sunday which directs his movements or his conduct, but it is his early education. It is not fair to say that the selling of literature on Sunday is the cause of those evils, and there is nothing to justify our making it a criminal matter. If it is a religious, or moral, or civil, or criminal matter, it is beyond our jurisdiction. The right to work either at home or elsewhere belongs to each individual, and is regulated by the Provincial Parliament, as provided by subsection 13 of section 92 of the British North America Act. If it is intended to make this a criminal Bill, then we will not be justified in passing it, because the Act itself is not criminal, and we thereby deprive our citizens of the right to decide for themselves in religious matters.

Mr. CURRAN. My hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) has brought forward the question of provincial rights. I think you must all admit that the late Minister of Justice had very carefully studied this question, and was a pretty good authority as to what our powers are in that respect, and he allowed this Bill to go through. But the argument of my hon. friend has brought to my mind a point which I neglected to lay before the House a moment ago. It is this: If the House of Commons wishes to declare that any of the acts mentioned in this Bill are indictable and criminal offences, then this Bill has not been submitted in proper shape. We have a criminal code, and the Bill should have been brought in as a Bill to amend that code. Having brought all our criminal laws together, if we are to establish new offences, we should bring forward measures in such a way as to make them part and parcel of the Criminal Code, so that they may be easily found, and not have criminal laws scattered through the statutes, and thus difficult to find. Under those circumstances, I think there is still a stronger objection than ever to the Bill in its present shape. I am sorry to say my hon. friend did not answer the objections I raised to the wording of the Bill itself.

Mr. MASSON. On first reading this Bill, I did not see any great difficulty in the interpretation. But when I find two such great authorities on the subject of interpretation as the Solicitor General and the mover of this Bill differing so greatly in regard to interpretation of this section, I confess it does seem that there must be some difficulty. However, as to the objection taken by the Solicitor General, that there is a grave question as to what is meant by the expression "engaged in the publication." I would call his attention to the fact that that is not a complete clause. The whole expression is "engage in the publication and issuing of any newspaper," etc. Now, engaging in the "publication" alone and not engaging in the "issuing," would certainly bring the offence within the words of this section.

Mr. CURRAN. I object to the words "engage in," so far as issuing is concerned, as well as in regard to publication.

Mr. MASSON. Well, there can only be a very limited extent in which the proprietor can engage in the "publication" and in the "issuing." The same is true of the publisher and the manager. The duties of these three are well known to the trade, and any act done by them that would forward the "publication and issuing of any newspaper, journal or periodical, for the purpose of sale or distribution" on the Lord's day, would come within the scope of the Act. Any act that would forward the publication, any act that would forward the issuing for the purpose of sale, would certainly be an offence which this clause, as framed, would cover. Now, it is a matter for consideration whether it is the desire of this committee to pass this clause in this form. The clause, as passed last session, was confined entirely to those who were engaged in the sale. Now, as has been justly stated, under the Bill as it passed this House last session, it was only the newsboys or the news-dealers that would come within its provisions in this respect; and the persons who published for the very purpose of selling on that day were allowed to go scott free. Now, if it is the desire of this committee to put a stop to newspapers published for the purpose of selling on Sunday, I think the framer of the Bill has done the right thing in framing it so as to strike at the chief offending persons, the proprietor, the publisher and the manager. These are clearly the persons who should be declared culpable, not the man who has a news office in a large hotel, not the small boy who sells newspapers on the street or in the hotels. The man to be reached is the man who, as proprietor, employs another as publisher, the publisher thus employed, or the man who, as manager, conducts the whole affair. I would, therefore, declare myself in favour of the Bill going the whole length, if it is desirable to pass it. I have my doubts as to its utility; I have my doubts as to its necessity and as to the advisability of making this a criminal offence at all. But, if it is desirable that the publishing and selling of newspapers on Sunday should be made a criminal offence, let us get at the head, at the chief offending person, the man who, while considered a respectable member of the community, leads the newsboys to commit a crime, encouraging them and providing them with the means and sending them forth to commit that crime. I think that there is no unnecessary complication or difficulty in putting an interpretation upon that part of the section. The hon. gentleman who introduces this Bill says that his object in going beyond the Ontario Act is to cover the distribution through the mails. I might call his attention to the fact that this clause does not do so. It says, "distribution either by carrier or through the mails upon that day." It is true that this appears in the section, but in what connection and in what way? The clause says:

1. Whoever shall upon the Lord's day, in the capacity of a proprietor, publisher, or manager, engage in the publication and issuing of any newspaper, journal or periodical, for the purpose of sale or distribution, either by carrier or through the mails upon that day.

It is the publication that is the offence. The offence is equally committed whether that newspaper is put in the post office for the purpose of being distributed on the Lord's day, or whether it is put into the hands of carriers. They are not forbidding or preventing the distribution of it through the mails; there is no stoppage of that. It makes it an offence for the publisher to publish with the intention of distributing in either of these ways. The remaining part of the clause is not wholly similar to that passed last session. I think the word "gratuitous" in the proviso of this clause is a mistake. The Bill says:

Whoever shall engage in the sale of any newspaper on that day, shall be deemed guilty of an indictable offence; but nothing in this section shall be held to prevent the gratuitous distribution of religious publications on the Lord's day.

Now, why should we have it simply "gratuitous." I think we arrived at a better conclusion last session, when we defined when and where and under what circumstances they should be distributed—whether "gratuitous" or not did not matter. If they are religious publications, and are distributed in churches, in Sunday schools or at public meetings, then there is no reason why they should be affected by this Bill. I would call the attention of the mover of this Bill to the fact that a great many of the periodicals that are distributed in churches, Sunday schools and other religious meetings, are not entirely gratuitous. Many of them are subscribed for by the year and are distributed to the subscribers in this way. I do not think it is the hon. gentleman's intention that such religious periodicals should be stopped or that the distribution in that way should be at all interfered with. It is done for the purpose of saving expense, of saving the postage, and for other reasons. But I think it is quite a sufficient safeguard if we exempt those which are distributed in churches, at Sunday school, or at religious meetings, and I would suggest to the mover of the Bill that he strike out the word "gratuitous," and add, at the end of this clause, the words "distributed in churches, Sunday schools, or at religious meetings." It is said that this will not necessarily cover Salvation Army tracts, which, I believe, are to a large extent, distributed on the street. Well, one of the evils of Sunday work, and of Sunday doings of various kinds is not avoided when papers or periodicals, even if they are religious, are allowed to be distributed on the streets, and in crowded thoroughfares on that day. Now, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) says that if a person don't think it is right to buy a newspaper, he does not need to buy; if he does not think it right to sell, he does not need to sell. But I believe that is not the sole object of Sunday observance laws, as we have them in existence in the various provinces, and as we had them in the old province. I think it is admitted that this is a Christian country, and, being so, that Christians, as such, who believe in this day, should be protected in their enjoyment of it as they think fit. Now, there is nothing sinful, nothing criminal in tradesmen following their usual occupation. There is no more sin in selling a newspaper than there would be in selling dry goods, or hardware, or groceries, but the one is forbidden, while the other may not be. Now, it is not the intrinsic evil of the act itself which we have to consider, but it is the fact that dealing in these things interferes with the rights of others in the enjoyment of the Lord's day. If we allow the Salvation Army people, or any other class to distribute tracts of various kinds on the Lord's day; the question then may come up, wherein are we to place the limit in the interpretation of the word "religious." It has been already pointed out that it is a very precarious definition. A few columns of the heading of the paper, an editorial of a religious character, a sermon from some noted divine may be put in the very worst class of literature. The hon. gentleman said that they had been dropped from many, I think he said all, the American issues. Perhaps so, and I must say that I agree with him when he says that the Sunday newspaper seems to cater for the very lowest grades of society. I do not know that the few samples we have in this country of newspapers that are published very late on Saturday night, whether they are called Sunday papers, or whether they are called Saturday night issues, seem to cater to the lower grades of society. They seem to think that gossip, scandal, and that sort of thing, is very proper for Sunday reading, and whether they are published Saturday night, or distributed Saturday night for Sunday reading, or whether they are distributed on Sunday morning, it matters not. It seems that the newspaper men have sounded the public taste in that respect, and they cater to it. It may be that those who go to church, that those who attend religious services, do not care about buying or about reading this class of papers, and it is for another class entirely that they are catering. But, be that as it may, I am one who believes that every effort should be put forth to make Sabbath observance in this country as complete as possible. I do not go to the extent of saying that there is anything wrong in amusements of certain kinds. It is where they infringe upon the rights of others, interfering with the sanctity of the day, or with the enjoyment of others' religious rights and privileges, that these things become wrong. If they are in a community where the people do not care for these things, then there can be no clashing on that subject. But we have only to go to some of our cities to see how quiet and how circumspect everything is on Sunday, and go to other places and find how very different they are. Now, it is contended that those who enjoy that day in an entirely different way are prevented from the full and complete exercise of their rights by the doings of others, and I, for one, will go to the extent of saying that so far as Sunday newspapers are concerned, they are no good to the community, and I believe they are a great injury. I will not go to the extent of the mover of the Bill in saying that they are the cause in the United States of all the infidelity, of all the lack of Sabbath observance, of all the lack of religious sentiment, that exist in that country. I agree rather with the hon. member for Bellechasse when he says that it is the result of their education. I think all these things will ultimately force the people to revert back to the early education. While I believe that Sunday newspapers should be stopped as they tend to increase evil, I am firmly of the belief that all these evils of infidelity, irreligion, and lack of Sunday observance, spring from a faulty early education.

Mr. LISTER. So far as the Bill itself is concerned, it may not have been drawn as artistically as it might have been, but I understand it is the duty of this committee to make a Bill, once the principle is adopted, as perfect as possible. It seems to me that the first question upon which we have to pass judgment is, whether there ought to be any law at all for the observance of the Sabbath day. If such a law should be on the statute-book, one asks himself why should newspapers be published on Sunday when the law prevents a man making a pair of boots, or a tailor making a suit of clothes, or any other man following his ordinary avocation on Sunday. The law does provide in this country that men shall not follow their ordinary avocations on Sunday. If that be the case, why should my hon. friend of the "World," or of the "Globe," or of the "Mail," or of any other paper in this country, carry on their ordinary avocation by the publication and distribution of newspapers?

Mr. HAZEN. We cannot do it now.

Mr. LISTER. Well, it is a question whether we can do it now or not. At all events, the Bill of my hon. friend proposes to make the law more clear than it has been in the past, so that a newspaper shall not be published and shall not be sold upon a Sunday. It makes the law perfectly clear so far as that is concerned. I do not go the length of the hon. gentleman in saying that the publication of a Sunday newspaper involves all the degradation that he would lead us to suppose; but I do say that newspaper men should not be exempted from any obligation that rests upon the community in general; and if a newspaper is published on a Sunday, it should be stopped, unless the same right is given to every other class in the community, the effect of which would be lamentable indeed. My hon. friend the Solicitor General took what is, to my mind, rather a technical objection to the wording of this Bill. He said that so far as section 1 is concerned, in order to convict it would be necessary to prove that the party charged not only engaged in the publication, but in the issuing of the newspaper, because the word "and" connected "publication" and "issuing." So far as that is concerned, it is easy to make two offences, making publication an offence, as well as the issuing of the paper, and this can be done by eliminating the word "and" and inserting the word "or," when it would be an offence to publish, as well as to issue, and in that way the person responsible, the person who, in my judgment, should be punished, if any one is punished, the man who causes the paper to be published, would be reached. So far as the criminal code is concerned, I do not agree with the statement made by the Solicitor General. It is not necessary in order to give this House jurisdiction, that this Bill should in any way amend the criminal code.

Mr. CURRAN. I did not say so. I said it was a desirable way to put it.

Mr. LISTER. My hon. friend knows that every few years it is necessary to consolidate the criminal code and to bring within it offences created by statute which had been made such subsequent to the consolidation. That has always been done in the past, and it will be necessary in the future, because, no matter how able a man may be, and how thoroughly he may be satisfied that he has anticipated every objection, experience alone can tell where a criminal Act or any other Act is weak. In this House amendments to the criminal code have been passed during the first or second session after the passage of an Act. So it is not a substantial objection to this Bill that it is not an amendment to the criminal code. This Parliament undoubtedly has jurisdiction. It is very well for the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) to talk in a sentimental way as to this Bill interfering with the religious belief of any particular portion of the community or with the liberty of the people; but I apprehend I voice the sentiment of the whole people of Canada when I say that they will unanimously support the view that, at all events, one day in the week shall be free from work and held sacred. I agree with the mover of the Bill when he says that the reading of this kind of literature has a somewhat demoralizing effect. Surely the people can get along one day without the telegrams, which they will find in Monday's newspaper, and there is no particular loss entailed by making it illegal to publish a newspaper on the Lord's day. I repeat that the Parliament of this Dominion has undoubtedly jurisdiction in this case. It is unnecessary to argue that question. It is not part of the municipal institutions of the country; it is not pretended, and never has been pretended, that it is a portion of our municipal institutions, and comes under that category of law. It may be that the legislature of Ontario has—I have no doubt it has—power to declare it an offence, and by doing so have power to legislate so far as that province is concerned; but, as this Dominion combines many provinces, I think the mover is wise in making this Bill apply to every province, and in order to make the law uniform it is necessary that, if legislation should take place at all, it should take place in this House. Without going into a critical analysis of the section, I say unhesitatingly that the principle of the Bill is good, and it will be the duty of this Committee, if they affirm that principle, to make the phraseology of the Bill such as to give effect to the object sought to be obtained. So far as section 1 is concerned, I conceive it to be my duty in the public interest to support the measure.

Mr. HAZEN. There is a matter in connection with section 1 which I should like to bring to the attention of the introducer of the Bill and also to the attention of the Committee. It will be remembered that last year, when this Bill was before the Committee, it was criticised from this standpoint: that under the Bill there was a provision to punish the boy or person who sold the papers and distributed them, but there was no provision to punish the party who published or was interested in the publication of the paper. As I understand the explanation of the hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill, he said he intended to avoid that difficulty this year. I desire to point out to him that the Bill is still open this year to the same objection. The greater part of the work on papers that are sold on the Sabbath day, as I am informed, is done on the Saturday preceding the day of publication, and I submit that under this Bill it would be perfectly possible to publish a newspaper, to have that newspaper printed and run off the press on Saturday, and, if that work was all done before one o'clock on the Sabbath morning, even if the paper was sold on Sunday, the man who printed and published it could not be prosecuted, while the boy who sold it on the streets could be punished. I will point out what I mean. The paragraph says: "Whoever shall on the Lord's day." So it will be seen that this act has to be committed on the Lord's day. It continues:

In the capacity of a proprietor, publisher or manager, engaged in the publication and issuing of any newspaper, journal or periodical for the purpose of sale or distribution, either by carrier or through the mails, on that day.

That is all there is with respect to the publication of the paper, and it will be seen that in order to make any one liable under that section for publishing a paper, the actual work of publication has to be done after midnight on Saturday. It will be very easy for any publisher who wishes to put a paper on the streets on Sunday to perform all the work before twelve o'clock on Saturday night, and then he can go entirely clear and he cannot be punished for his part in it.

Mr. LISTER. Eliminate the word "and" and thereby bring the publisher within the Bill.

Mr. HAZEN. I think even then this provision can be evaded. The words "shall upon the Lord's day," in my opinion, should be omitted, and let the paragraph read in this way :

Whoever in the capacity of a proprietor, publisher or manager engages in the publication and issuing of any newspaper, journal or periodical for the purpose of sale or distribution, either by carrier or through the mails, upon the Lord's day.

It seems to me this would cover the object which the hon. mover of the Bill has in view. That will cover the man who sells it, and as I expect the amendment will cover the case of the newspaper publisher. As it is at present I do not think my hon. friend has met the objection that was raised to the Bill of last session. But apart from that, Mr. Chairman, I fully agree in every respect in the idea that there should be a proper observance of the Sabbath, and while I think that the publication of newspapers upon the Lord's day as a pernicious custom, and one which I trust I will never see securing a foothold in this country, at the same time I fail to see the necessity for the passage of this legislation. However, if the Bill is going to be passed, I would like to assist my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) in making it as perfect as possible. As has been pointed out, on the statute-books of every province in the Dominion of Canada we have laws to enforce the proper observance of the Lord's day. We have heard the statement made to-night that in the province of Ontario, the editor or publisher of the "Toronto World" was fined for issuing a special edition of that paper on Sunday, giving particulars of a large fire, which occurred the previous Saturday night in that city. If that be the case, where is the necessity for passing such an Act as this, so far as the province of Ontario is concerned ?

Mr. CHARLTON. He was fined $1 which was totally inadequate.

Mr. HAZEN. That may have been inadequate, but that was a matter within the discretion of the magistrate who fined him. I presume the statute places a maximum and a minimum penalty, and the magistrate evidently took a lenient view of the case and fined him the minimum of $1. I imagine, however, that if there was a repetition of that offence, no magistrate would go on fining the publisher of a Sunday newspaper $1, and should the offence be persisted in, a higher penalty would be imposed. A day or two ago I was looking over a copy of the first Journal of the House of Assembly of the province of New Brunswick, and I found that one of the very first Acts of the members of that House of Assembly in January, 1786, was to pass a law entitled : "An Act against the profanation of the Lord's day, commonly called Sunday ; and the suppression of immorality." Other similar laws have been passed in our province since that time, and in the Consolidated Statutes of New Brunswick there is a law to this effect :

Mr. HAZEN.

Whoever shall openly desecrate the Lord's day, commonly called Sunday, by shooting, gaming, sporting, playing, hunting, drinking, or frequenting tippling houses, or by servile labour, (works of mercy or necessity excepted) shall for every offence pay a fine not exceeding forty shillings, or be committed to jail for a term not exceeding four days.

I think that in that province the public are satisfied—I have heard no outcry to the contrary—with the laws that at present exist with reference to the observance of the Lord's day. The people of New Brunswick are a church-going people, the day is properly and duly observed there, and I do not think there is a demand for legislation such as this from that province. I will not say at the present moment that the law of that province would be sufficient to prevent the publication of a Sunday newspaper, for I have not looked at the subsequent Acts ; and neither am I prepared to say that the phrase "servile labour" would cover work done on a Sunday newspaper, but my impression is that it would. Be that as it may ; if any one commenced to publish a Sunday newspaper in that province, legislation would be demanded at the next session of the House of Assembly that would make it impossible for him to do so. Now there is to my mind one difficulty about passing a general Act for the observance of the Sabbath, and that is : that our people are constituted differently in the different provinces. For instance a large majority of the province of Quebec belong to a different race and creed from a large majority of the people of the other provinces. They have their own views and their own ideas concerning the observance of the Sabbath day, and considering the fact that there is no great outcry for any general law of this sort, and considering the fact that every province has its own laws—which so far as I know are satisfactory to cause the day to be properly observed—and considering also the fact that the provinces are differently made up so far as the race and creed of the population are concerned ; it seems to me that there is no necessity for the passage of this law at the present time. I believe that it would be a piece of legislation passed merely for the sake of legislating and not for the purpose of attaining any good effect. I do not wish in any way to reflect upon the motives of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) in introducing the Bill, nor to reflect upon the principle of the Bill, because I believe in the proper observance of the Sabbath, and would hate to see anything in this country approaching the continental Sabbath which is a disgrace to some countries in Europe ; but I say that there is no general necessity for the Canadian House of Commons passing this Bill at the present time.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman. I rise with a good deal of diffidence to take part in this discussion which has assumed very largely a legal phase. I shall not touch that part of the subject very much, but at the same time, I would like to say just a word or two with reference to the sense of the clause. I think, with a great many others who have spoken, that what is aimed at by the mover of the Bill in this clause is probably pretty well covered by provincial legislation; and from a good many standpoints it might be much better to allow the provinces to deal with this, each province for itself. I am not indisposed, however, to see one advantage, that hon. gentlemen of a different view, or may be holding the same view, might urge, and that is, the benefit that would accrue from having the highest legislature, and the central Parliament of Canada, deal with the matter, even if it went no further than the reiteration of the laws which already exist on the statute-books of most of the provinces. In that respect the attention of the public would be called to it, and it would be an additional affirmation, and may be in some respects a stronger affirmation of the principle than would be a law upon each provincial statute-book. So much with reference to that. So far as the Sunday newspaper is concerned, while I do not think it is the root of all evil, for my own part I see enough of newspapers on six days of the week to heartily wish to be rid of them on the Sabbath day. Everything of course depends upon the quality of the paper. I do not know that it could not be contended that the large Saturday editions of our daily and weekly papers are to all intents and purposes Sunday papers. They are larger than the daily edition, they have a greater extension and scope of matter, a good deal of the literary and pictorial and the like of that, and I imagine that the reason why a large edition is published on the Saturday is that it gets to people on a day when they have more leisure, and that it really becomes for a great many of the homes into which it goes, a paper to be read on the Sabbath day. The quality of the paper, of course, will be the measure of the good or the evil, and a Sunday newspaper might be just as moral and good in its tone as a paper issued on a week day. The history of the United States has proved to us,—and that is the country that is nearest to us and where we have most benefit of the experiences of a Sunday newspaper,—that there is no doubt that the tendency has been for the Sunday newspaper to assume a character which is anything but salutary, and the effect,—although I do not think it goes so far as my hon. friend has stated—can easily be traced to be otherwise than salutary or beneficial. I do hope that never in Canada shall we be afflicted with the scourge of such Sunday newspapers as nine out of ten that are published in the States have proved themselves to be. I do not think that the experience of any of us will go to prove that they are getting better, but rather that their course is towards greater sensationalism and that they are on that account less beneficial. Comparing the discussion of last year with the present discussion, I must say that the first section, apart from certain criticisms that might be fairly well made upon it as it has been brought in, does not appear to me to contain very much to be quarrelled with, if we are going to accept the principle of that section. To my reading, it is less inclusive than the first section of the Bill as it passed the House last year, and being less inclusive I think it is an improvement, because it goes to the fountain head and deals with the publisher or issuer of the newspaper. If the newspaper be stopped there, of course all the subsidiary streams through which it is issued and sold on the Sabbath day are to that extent closed. I do not think, so far as my reading of it goes, that it prevents the work of preparing the Monday newspaper; but I think it would be made clearer in that respect if the suggestion offered by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) were adopted, and the phrase "the Lord's day" were placed later in the Bill, so as to make sure that that day shall be meant, and that the Bill in that respect shall not be liable to any misconstruction. With reference to the clause referring to the gratuitous distribution of religious publications on the Lord's day, that is less restrictive than the similar clause in last year's Bill as it passed the House; but I think there is some force in the criticism that that clause as it stands might—perhaps not—be taken to cut out some literature which is not gratuitous which is distributed in the Sunday schools. In very many Sabbath schools literature and periodicals are distributed which are not at all gratuitous, but which are actually paid for by the contributions either of the scholars or the officers of the schools, gathered in whatever way they are gathered. Consequently, those publications are as much paid for as if they were regularly subscribed for. That point is worth looking into, to see whether the clause really cuts out that kind of literature or not. I do not consider that it would be a good thing if it did. On the whole, so far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the passing of the first clause, with some such amendments as I have spoken of, if they approve themselves to the sense of the House.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have to express my very great gratification at the fairness of the leader of the House with respect to this section. My desire, as the promoter of the Bill, is to make it a workable one, and to avoid all difficulties and weaknesses that may be pointed out, or that may suggest themselves to the combined wisdom of the House. I was very favourably impressed with the suggestion made by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Hazen). I think at the moment that the Bill would be improved by the adoption of the phraseology he recommends, making it read thus :

Whoever in the capacity of a proprietor, publisher or manager, shall engage in the publication and issuing of any newspaper, journal or periodical for the purpose of sale or distribution upon the Lord's day.

I am perfectly willing also to accept the suggestion made by the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson), to strike out the word "gratuitous," and add the words "Sunday schools, churches and religious meetings." These two changes would perhaps improve the Bill, and it would then meet the views of my hon. friend the leader of the House.

Mr. LISTER. There is just this difficulty under the section, that the prosecution would have to show not only publication, but issue. Is it the intention of the hon. gentleman who promotes the Bill that it shall be unlawful to publish? If so, to make it perfectly clear, would it not be better to erase the word "and" and insert the word "or," making the offence either the publication or the issuing of a newspaper?

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes.

Mr. DICKEY. I hope the hon. gentleman has considered sufficiently carefully the effect of striking out the words in the first section, "whoever on the Lord's day shall publish," because then the offence made by the Bill would be the publishing of a newspaper with the intention of selling it on the Lord's day; so that if you published a newspaper on Wednesday with the intention of selling it on the following Sunday you would be committing an offence in the meaning of the Bill. Surely, if you are going to pass the Bill at all, you must have the two elements in it; you must have the work done on the Lord's day, either the issuing or publishing, but surely you are not going to make an offence of publishing a newspaper on a week-day with the purpose of selling it on Sunday. I think the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) will agree with me that that would be the result of striking out those words.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have no doubt about that.

Mr. DICKEY. I may say that I have not in the slightest degree altered my opinion with respect to this legislation. I have spoken in the same sense before. I think it is a great pity that legislation of this character should be introduced in this House. It is, if anything can be, a matter of local concern, affecting as it does particularly the consciences of the people of the different sections of the country. The very discussion that has taken place shows how clear that is. What is the offence that is in reality aimed at here? Is it the newsboys running around the streets or the printing-press working, or is it the reading that is objected to? The arguments that have been heard have all been directed against the bad effects of reading Sunday newspapers. Now, is this Parliament going to undertake to supervise the morals of the people, and say that they shall not read literature of a particular class on Sunday—anything, I suppose, except the Bible or the prayer-book. This Parliament, surely, is not the proper place to deal with that subject. I think it is a great deal better that the subject, if dealt with at all, should be dealt with by the local legislatures, by men who are much nearer the issues raised by this Bill than we are. I have no doubt of our power to pass the Bill, but I think it is a mistake for us to deal with the matter at all.

Mr. JEANNOTTE (Translation). Mr. Chairman, all the speakers who have so far taken part in the discussion of this Bill have referred to their particular provinces. Some have stated that in the province of New Brunswick as well as in Nova Scotia, there is a severe law in force against any Sunday labour. Others have referred to a similar law in force in the province of Ontario. They even quoted the case of the publisher of the Toronto "Globe," who was fined one dollar for having published his newspaper on a Sunday following a big fire. If a man who published part of a newspaper on Sunday announcing that a great calamity had happened could be fined one dollar, although he caused no scandal and no wrong, I ask how it is that one can meet so many drunken men, stumbling and jostling each other, who nevertheless will not be fined at all? In the province of Quebec we have an extremely severe law in connection with the Sunday observance; it is chapter 23 of the Consolidated Statutes of Lower Canada. I know something of it, having been an alderman in Montreal during ten years and chairman of the Police Committee, and having had as such an opportunity to enforce it. Under this law, a poor woman cannot sell sweetmeats on the street without being liable to go to jail or be fined. Not only one cannot work on Sundays, but a poor woman has no right to sell a glass of spruce beer without being liable to be fined. Yet, we are generous in Montreal, we have compassion for the poor and we delight in helping them. Now, about eight years ago, a municipal by-law was proposed to allow poor widows and women in want, living on charities, to sell sweetmeats, smoking pipes and spruce beer on Sundays. Their whole stock, as a rule, did not exceed two dollars. When this by-law was brought up before the city council, Sir John Abbott, who was then mayor of Montreal, pointed out to us that such a by-law was ultra vires, because we had in our statutes a law forbidding any traffic on Sundays. That law was chapter 23 of the Consolidated Statutes which I have just mentioned. It reads as follows:—

Mr. CHARLTON.

No shop-keeper, pedlar, hawker, tavern-keeper, or other person keeping a public house of any description, in any part of Lower Canada, shall sell or retail any goods, wares or merchandise, wines, spirits or any other strong liquors during the Lord's day, commonly called Sunday; and every person of the description abovesaid who sells or retails such goods, wares or merchandise, wine, spirits or other strong liquors on the Lord's day, shall incur, for the first offence, a penalty which shall not exceed twenty dollars, and for the second and every subsequent offence shall incur a penalty not less than twenty dollars nor more than forty dollars.

As the hon. mover of this Bill thinks that a fine of one dollar is not sufficient for the publishing of a newspaper on Sunday, he ought to be satisfied that in the province of Quebec we have a law bearing a sufficiently severe sanction since it exceeds even that of his own Bill. I, therefore, think that, so far as the province of Quebec is concerned at all events, we have no need of this Bill, and we are such advocates of provincial autonomy that we do not want the central power to come and force police laws upon us. We can afford to do our own police duties ourselves and we do them well. I would like to ask the hon. mover of this Bill—I know he understands French and can give me an answer—whether there were petitions from the province of Quebec asking for such a Bill as this? I am not concerned with the province of Ontario; but I think that no person in the province of Quebec ever signed a petition asking for such legislation as this. In the first section, it is provided that no newspapers shall be delivered at the post offices on Sundays, for I read the words “by carrier or through the mails upon that day.” In our country places, our farmers generally go to the village on Sundays. And this is especially the case at the time of agricultural works such as this, when sowing is proceeded with, at the time of the reaping and at the time of the making of fallows. Our farmers take Sundays to go to the village, where they never fail to go to the post office and get their newspapers. How will they do if post offices are not allowed to be opened to the public upon that day and to deliver the newspapers addressed to our farmers? Our farmers make it a duty to attend religious services on Sunday, and they avail themselves of the opportunity to get from the post office what is addressed to them. Should this Bill become law, the farmer will be compelled to lose his time to do that which it is so easy for him to do now on Sundays. To lose his time is a consideration worth thinking about, for we are undergoing hard times, and the land does not produce much. Should this Bill become law, he will be compelled, on Mondays, to lose, perhaps, half a day to get his copy of “La Patrie,” “Le Monde,” “La Minerve,” and even the “Witness,” for I must not forget to mention that sanctimonious newspaper. The postmaster who will deliver a copy of the newspapers on Sundays will be liable to be fined; it is what is stated in the Bill, at least in the French version, for I do not quite understand English. Here is what the Bill provides: “Whoever shall upon the Lord's day, in the capacity of a proprietor, publisher or manager, engage in the printing, publication and issuing of any newspaper, journal or periodical, for the purpose of sale or distribution, either by carrier or through the mails upon that day, and whoever shall engage in the sales of any newspaper on that day, shall be deemed guilty of an indictable offence.” Then, how will our good countrymen of the rural districts, several of whom reside at even such a distance as nine miles from the village, how will they do to get their newspaper on Sundays after mass? They could not get it at the post office, the postmaster having no right to give it to them, would not run the risk by committing such a great crime.

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) The printing of a newspaper is not allowed on that day.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Oh! as concerns the printing of a newspaper, there is none printed on Sundays. Never was the “Witness,” for instance, printed on Sundays. Morning papers are printed during the night, and I believe the work is all done before midnight on Saturdays. I have no hesitation in stating there is no newspaper printed on Sundays, at least in the province of Quebec. I will go further, and to show that there is no reason to fear for a non-observance of the Sunday's rest in our province, I will say that printers, as well as other persons working in the printing offices of the newspapers would not work on Sundays. Not only would they not work on Sundays, but they would not even work during week days more than eight hours a day. In the face of such a state of affairs, how could you suppose that the proprietor of a newspaper could find men willing to break Sunday's rest? In the province of Quebec our workmen would not work more than eight hours a day and you would not find one willing to work on Sundays. It goes without saying that I am only referring to my own province. But my most serious objection against this Bill is, that I do not wish the central power to assume the exercise of a right which the provincial authorities are apt to exercise themselves and which, in fact, they have exercised as I have just shown. With respect to other portions at least as important as that of Sunday observance—in the present state of affairs, at all events, as regards the way our people observe that day—our friends from Ontario seem to be scandalized by the fact that there is an intention to interfere with local affairs. But I will point out that a law relating to Sunday observance would bind the Catholics as well as any other class of citizens in this country. If it is a good thing to interfere with local affairs with respect to this portion, why should they be so much scandalized when our schools are in question? Yet I cannot see what difference there is. Our friends from Ontario are unwilling to touch the schools; then, why should we interfere with provincial police laws? The publication of our newspapers in the province of Quebec is done by companies which did not seek incorporation here; they were incorporated under local Acts and not under federal Acts. These newspapers teach our people to practice good morals, for one would not allow the publication of any newspaper in the province of Quebec which would not teach the practice of good morals. If ever a newspaper dares to follow a different course, its publication is not only condemned, but if the proprietor should persevere in such a course, he is arrested and sent to jail. Therefore, we need have no fear in this respect. I make these statements so as to tranquilize the members from the other provinces. In point of politics, our newspapers may publish what they like, but when it comes to a question of morals, our police laws are stringent enough to repress any abuse. Now, I say that, proceeding from that principle, while we contend that our newspapers are teaching no immorality, we might read them on Sundays as well as on any other day. I will not say that such reading is worth that of the Bible in any case, but it may be worth more in some cases, for I may try and read the Bible and put a bad construction on it; whereas, to read a newspaper editorial, in connection with political matters especially, it only requires that I should know how to read a little to understand it, or at all events, if I cannot understand it, I will not go astray. Therefore, I claim for the people of the province of Quebec the exclusive right to make police by-laws under the laws by which we are governed. The province of Quebec is opposed to the federal parliament forcing upon her unnecessary laws. We think that this Parliament should not interfere with local affairs, such as Sunday observance, for, in more serious matters, those for instance where the liberty of the citizens would be at stake, the federal Government could again interfere. We have not too much liberties in the provinces and we wish to persevere in the enjoyment of such as we have. Therefore, I say that this Bill should not be put in our statutes, because it will hardly have any practical effect. Indeed, section 4, which prohibits Sunday excursions, either by steamboats or by railways, under the penalty of a fine, contains a proviso which reads as follows:

Provided that nothing in this section shall be deemed to prohibit the ordinary carriage of passengers authorized by provincial statutes.

Then, I ask, what will be the use of this

Mr. JEANNOTTE.

Bill, since the local legislature has a right to allow steamboats or railway companies to organize Sunday excursions in the provinces? This section 4 becomes, therefore, a dead letter. I do not quite understand why this section was put in the Bill. It seems to me this is the first time it is provided that one shall be derelict to Sunday's observance for not observing it in the same way as those who think differently than we do. It is the first time one hears that we, who are honest people and who believe we are properly filling our religious duties, are acting contrary to religion when doing what we are allowed to do on Sunday by our laws and our conscience. But then any person who entertains different views from ours, might come and say to us: If you should do such a thing on Sundays, you will sin and be punished therefor, for you will be guilty of an indictable offence. Well, if there is any liberty of conscience in the Dominion of Canada, there is no ground whatever for such a Bill as this. The Jews have a different mind than we have; Protestants have a different mind than we, Catholics, have. Have we ever seen for all that the Catholics of this Dominion of Canada set themselves up as censors of the Protestants with respect to their way of observing Sundays? A Jew does not sin by not observing Sundays, since he observes Saturdays. Are we going to force upon him a law which has nothing to do with his conscience? Are we to compel him in his conscience to observe such a particular day as the Lord's day?

Mr. LAURIER. (Translation.) It is done now.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Yes; it is done with respect to his store, but at home he may do as he likes. What that Bill sanctions is neither more nor less than an illegal entrance into a man's house. Therefore, it is going a good deal too far. I will now conclude my remarks by saying that this Bill, which is well known, should not, I think, concern the province of Quebec, since we have a most clear and positive law relating to Sunday observance. Moreover, in our cities and municipalities, generally, when the law is found insufficient, we pass by-laws. I know something of this, for I had charge to see to the enforcement of by-laws of this kind passed in order to secure a better observance of the Lord's day. I always thought that Sunday was well observed. I always thought likewise that after the religious services on that day, there was no wrong whatever in reading a newspaper, of whatever political shade it might be, in smoking a cigar and taking a glass of beer honestly and peacefully. What is more, I thought that this was better than to do what some do, to go, for instance, in the hotels, meeting rooms and clubs and to spend their time there playing cards, smoking and doing other things generally objectionable, because by such a course they ruin their health, because such things are disagreeable to their wives and children, and, thirdly, because by abstaining from such enjoyments, one may save money, which may help those who are dear to us. Moreover, I contend that I am doing no wrong whatever if, when walking on the street, I stop and buy a cigar, two cigars or even four, if I light one and smoke it while going to church. I even think it is a good way not to be concerned about my neighbour. That is the way, we, Catholics, observe Sundays. We smoke after the religious services are over, we believe we can enjoy ourselves and sing songs which are not quite religious songs; still, during that time, we are not talking about our neighbour. To sum up, I think this Bill is useless. I even think it never should have come before this House, as it is not likely to commend us abroad. I am not referring to the United States, for there people are not over-scrupulous. I refer to other nations. It is causing us to be known to a disadvantage by foreign people. Indeed, those who would read this Bill would think that we are neglecting our religious duties, and as I have much care for the good name of our country, I think such a Bill as this is likely to injure us abroad. So far, Canada has enjoyed the reputation of being the most religious country in the world; Catholics and Protestants alike have shared in the giving of such a good name to her. It is paying us a fine compliment. While we enjoy such a good repute, are we going through this Bill to say to those people who have such a good opinion of Canada: You are badly mistaken, what you have thought so far is erroneous. We, Catholics, as well as Protestants in the Dominion of Canada, are not filling well our religious duties. We have so imperfect a Sunday observance that a Protestant member who, of course, in religious matters, does not think as we, Catholics, do, was compelled to bring before the House, and try to have passed a Bill to compel people to better observe Sunday, and that under penalty of being sent to jail or being fined. Well, I say it is paying Catholics as well as Protestants, a very bad compliment.

Mr. TISDALE. Before the motion is put, I must certainly object to one portion of this clause. I have always been strongly opposed to any interference by this House with the provinces, or any coercion by this House of the provinces, and, on this matter, each province has a right to legislate for itself. I object to making the selling of newspapers by newsboys an indictable offence, and subjecting those boys to imprisonment. The intellectual and moral training of the people will certainly cause them to look with great disfavour on any legislation requiring that a bare-footed newsboy offering a paper for sale should be punished as a criminal. If the opinion of the House be that the selling of newspapers should be prohibited on Sundays, I am prepared to accede to that opinion, but I shall certainly not commit myself to any clause making the act of sale by a poor newsboy an indictable offence.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman is evidently not very friendly to the Bill, and he goes a long way to find an excuse for voting against the first section. He goes down to section 5, and seeks an excuse in the fact that this section provides for the imposition of a fine on the bare-footed newsboy. Well, section 1 has no connection with section 5. When we come to the latter section, no doubt there are hon. gentlemen here who have quite as much sympathy for the bare-footed newsboy as the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, and who will take care that no injustice is done to him. The section we are on deals with the sale of a newspaper on Sundays, or its publication on Sunday. Does he approve of such sale or publication? If he does not, he ought to have no difficulty in supporting this section.

Mr. TISDALE. I decline to commit myself to the proposition that it should be declared an indictable offence for a newsboy to sell newspapers on Sunday. If, at a later stage of the Bill, we can discuss the question of exempting the newsboy from any punishment, I would allow this section to pass; but if I am to be precluded from doing that by allowing this to pass, then I shall vote in favour of the motion.

Motion agreed to; and committee rose.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 9th May, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OBSERVANCE OF THE LORD'S DAY.

Mr. CHARLTON moved:

That this House will, on Monday next, resolve itself again into Committee of the Whole to further consider Bill (No. 2), intituled an Act to secure the better observance of the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday.

He said: The action of the Committee of the Whole last night was one which could scarcely be interpreted as a deliberate condemnation of the Bill, and even if it should be, it would not be proper to accept the decision of a minority of the members—only about sixty being present—as an expression of the opinion of the full House. I think that if the principle of the Bill is to be condemned, we ought to have it condemned by a vote of the full House on an open division. The action of the committee, composed only of a small portion of the House, should not be accepted as a finality in connection with this matter. If the House is not prepared to condemn the principle of the Bill, and an early division will settle that point, then it is eminently proper the details should receive consideration. Last night only one section was considered. No action was taken on that section, and there was no manifestation on the part of the promoter that modifications or amendments would not be accepted. The motion for the committee to rise was made before the section had received consideration at all, and it was made by the first gentleman who rose in opposition to the Bill. And that motion, placed before the House without any reason that may have been given in the subsequent discussion of the Bill, was the motion which carried. There are three sections in the Bill. These were not considered last night at all. One of them was accepted last year with a modification, and the clause under consideration last night was accepted last year with a modification. One of the two remaining sections is of great importance, relating to railway transportation and traffic on the Lord's day, the importance of which entitles it, at least, to the consideration of this House. Under these circumstances, I do not desire to enter into a discussion as to the principle of the Bill at this time, but I claim that it is entitled to our consideration, and that its promoters are entitled to a formal expression as to whether the principle of the Bill is condemned or not. If hon. members are not prepared to appear on the division list, and show by their votes that they have condemned the principle of the Bill, the Bill ought to be replaced on the Order paper and receive the consideration of the House. I ask only for fair consideration to the measure. I do not stand hard and fast by its provisions. I am ready to make any reasonable concession, but I desire that the Bill should receive the courteous consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

COMMITTEES.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON moved:

That Mr. Geoffrion and Mr. Tisdale be added to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that Mr. Geoffrion and Mr.

Mr. CHARLTON.

McIsaac be added to the Select Standing Committees on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines and Banking and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT.

Twenty-seventh Annual Report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, for the year ended the 30th June, 1894.—(Mr. Costigan.)

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDED.

Mr. MONTAGUE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 68) to amend the Dominion Elections Act. He said: As hon. gentlemen know, under the General Elections Act and amendments thereto, elections in all the constituencies are held on the same day, except in a few constituencies which are made special exceptions under the Act. These exceptions are: Algoma and Nipissing, in the province of Ontario; Gaspé and Chicoutimi and Saguenay, in the province of Quebec; Cariboo, in the province of British Columbia. But, under the Redistributions Act passed in 1892, the district of Cariboo is united with the electoral district of Yale, the new constituency to be known as the district of Yale and Cariboo. It would not do to have the election in one half the constituency one day, and in the other half another day. Therefore, the object of this Bill is to provide that the election shall take place in the whole constituency on the same day.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ELECTORAL LISTS.

Mr. MONTAGUE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 69) relating to the electoral lists. He said: I may say, for the information of the House, that this simply postpones the revision of the voters' lists until 1896.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether the Franchise Act of last session, postponed from last session, is to be revived?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will answer the hon. gentleman later on as to that.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUGAR IMPORTS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, 1. What were the total amounts of raw and refined sugar imported during the months of March and of April, respectively, in the years 1894 and 1895? 2. What were the amounts of above imported during the same periods into the several ports of Quebec, Montreal, Halifax, St. John and Toronto?

Mr. WALLACE. In answer to the first question, I may say that the detailed statement of importations furnished the Department of Customs by its officers from the various ports, for the compilation of the trade returns, is only made quarterly and shows the totals of each line of goods for the quarter; the details are not separated for each month. Therefore, imports of sugar asked for, cannot be furnished for the months of March and April separately, except by writing to each port for the information. That has now been done. The quarterly statement would show the detailed information for the quarter ended 31st March, but not for the respective months.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then that part had better stand.

Mr. WALLACE. As to the second part of the question, did the hon. gentleman want the information for each month separately or the total for the two months?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I want the same information as in the other case. But, of course, you cannot answer the second part, unless you can answer the first.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, I can; I telegraphed to each of the ports named by the hon. gentleman, Quebec, Montreal, Halifax, St. John and Toronto and received answers. The following will give the information asked for by the hon. gentleman:—

REPRINTING THE ELECTORAL LISTS.

Mr. LAVERGNE asked, 1. Whether the Government did not, 1894, cause to be reprinted the electoral lists for the districts of Megantic and for Drummond and Arthabaska, as revised in 1891? 2. If so, by whom were the said lists so reprinted? 3. To whom did the Government entrust the printing of the preliminary lists, that is to say, the lists of names to be added and the lists of names to be struck off, for the districts of Megantic and Drummond and Arthabaska, in 1894? 4. How much did the Government pay for the printing of the said lists; when was payment made, and to whose order was the cheque (or cheques) made payable?

Mr. MONTAGUE. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I would say that the Government did not cause the lists for those ridings which were revised in 1891, to be reprinted in 1894. The lists were printed in 1894 for the districts of Megantic, Drummond and Arthabaska. The Government paid for Megantic, $147; for Drummond, $111.14; for Arthabaska, $114.62. The three cheques were made payable to one newspaper, and the rate paid was three cents per name, which is the rate which has prevailed since 1889.

ELECTORAL LISTS OF LOTBINIERE.

Mr. RINFRET asked, Whether the electoral lists for the county of Lotbinière have been printed? If so, where and by whom were they printed?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The lists for Lotbinière are not yet printed. The finally revised proofs were not received from the revising barrister until April 26th. At that time the special staff which were employed at the Bureau for printing the lists, had been done away with, and since that time the work of the sessional printing has pressed the employees of the Bureau, so that the work has not been proceeded with for the other lists. However, I may say to my hon. friend that the lists will be printed next week.

POSTAL SERVICE IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. PERRY asked, Whether a postmaster has been appointed at St. Louis, Prince County, P.E.I., in place of Avit Poirier, deceased? If so, who is he? When was the appointment made, and what is the salary?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. There is no post office in Prince Edward Island known by the name of St. Louis. It is presumed the question refers to the office known as Kildare Station. (1.) Yes. (2.) Miss Marguerite Poirier. (3.) 15th February, 1895. (4.) $36 per annum.

Mr. PERRY asked, Who is mail carrier from De Blois Station, Prince Edward Island, to the post office at De Blois? Was the contract let by tender? If so, was the lowest tender accepted? If not, why not? When will the present contract expire, and what is the amount paid yearly for the same?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (1.) Celestine Perry. (2.) Yes. (3.) Yes. (4.) 30th June, 1895. (5.) $20.

Mr. LAVERGNE.

VALUE OF FARM LANDS—EXPLANATION.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I want to correct a misstatement which crept into a report of what took place on Tuesday night; but as I may also say a word or two more, I will, if desired, conclude with a motion. The statement is as follows: During the speech of the hon. Minister of Railways there was, as the House perhaps recollects, some little confusion, gentlemen on one side applauding and gentlemen on the other side vigorously dissenting. The hon. gentleman made a statement in respect to one of mine with reference to the value of farm lands, which I understood to be to the following effect: I had stated that there had been a depreciation of the selling value of farm lands in Ontario to the extent of about $10 per acre, which, of course, would amount to about $200,000,000. The hon. gentleman, as I understood him, though there was considerable confusion, made the statement that instead of that being the case, the value of farm lands had risen by $95,000,000, and in confirmation thereof he appealed to the Ontario statistician. I did not hear him use the word "Mr. Blue"; if I had heard clearly, probably no difficulty would have occurred, because I was not aware that he was reported as having used Mr. Blue's name. I was aware that Mr. Blue had for many years ceased to be the statistician of Ontario, and I should be loath to appear as reflecting on a gentleman like Mr. Blue, whom I esteem very much. Of course, I merely spoke from my seat, and, as I say, there was considerable confusion. What I said was that if the statistician in Ontario or anywhere else had declared that there was an increase of $95,000,000 in the selling value of farm lands, he might take rank with our own statistician. That is what I said; but by no manner of means what I am reported to have said. As this particular matter is one of some importance, I want to make a statement about what I did actually say. I had said that since 1878 the selling value of farm lands in Ontario had declined $10 per acre; that is a minimum estimate; I made that statement after careful inquiry, extending over a period of several years, during which I myself visited two-thirds, at least, of the constituencies in Ontario, and took exceeding pains to acquaint myself with the facts, using every possible way of getting information. I repeat here that that was the information given to me by a vast number of persons who ought to be authorities on the subject. If I am mistaken I shall be glad to be put right, but I am very much afraid the fact is that I have under-estimated and not over-estimated the depreciation in the selling value, which, bear in mind, is quite a different thing from the assessed or estimated value. If I entertained any doubt as to the correctness of my information it would have been removed by statements which have been made to me by gentlemen both in this House and out of it, who are entitled to be regarded as authorities; as for example, my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. McMillan), who is probably as well acquainted with the selling value of land in western Ontario as any man in Canada well can be. Of course, if hon. gentlemen want to investigate the thing, they can very easily do so, there can be no trouble about that. Now, if you wish, I will conclude with a motion; if not, I will take my seat.

Mr. HAGGART. In my remarks the other evening, the statement I made was this: I understood the hon. gentleman to have said that there was a decline of $200,000,000 in the value of farm property in Ontario. I stated that there was no decline, that on the contrary, there had been a gain of $95,000,000 in 10 years. I stated that there was also an increase in the value of buildings, implements and live stock; and I gave the hon. gentleman the figures, showing that the total wealth of the agricultural classes in 1882 amounted to $882,000,000, and in 1892 to $979,000,000.

INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION.

Mr. EDGAR. On 22nd May last year a resolution looking to the settlement of international disputes between Great Britain and the United States was proposed by myself and seconded by the present Minister of Militia, supported by the late Sir John Thompson and the leader of the Opposition, and carried unanimously. I should like to know whether the Government has communicated that resolution in any way to the British Government and through them to the United States.

Mr. FOSTER. I imagine the resolution passed here has been transmitted. I will make inquiries and give the hon. gentleman exact facts and the date of the transmission.

INQUIRIES RESPECTING RETURNS.

Mr. MULOCK. I should like to inquire of the Government when we may expect the returns which were ordered, as follows:—On 26th April, return for correspondence respecting the embargo on Canadian cattle; on 29th April, return in regard to the entry of cattle from Montana into the North-west Territories; on 26th April, return of correspondence connected with the application of unsettled accounts with Mr. Charlebois for the Langevin block. I also called the attention of the Secretary of State at the commencement of the session for a return ordered by the House in 1892 respecting certain manufactures in the county of York. I handed the hon. gentleman, at that time, the Votes and Proceedings of the House for the session in question, and no less than three years have elapsed since the order was granted. I should like to have that order complied with.

Mr. MONTAGUE. As regards the last subject to which the hon. gentleman has called attention, namely, return respecting manufactures in the county of York, I called the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to it on the same day on which the hon. gentleman spoke to me respecting the matter, and the Minister promised it would be attended to. As to the return respecting the cattle embargo, moved for on the 26th, and the return moved for on the 29th, they are being prepared, and I hope will be before the House in a few days.

Mr. OUMET. I will call attention to the matter of the return connected with the unsettled accounts of Mr. Charlebois in connection with the Langevin block.

Mr. FRASER. I desire to call attention to a return ordered of the industries of the county of Guysboro', and a statement of the amounts expended by counties in Nova Scotia for the ten years previous. These were ordered the winter before last; if they had been ordered during the present winter I would not have pressed for them, as I desire to give the Government time.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the hon. gentleman will hand me a memorandum I will make the necessary inquiries.

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to inquire what progress is being made with the return relating to superannuation?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know exactly when it will be brought down—it will not be long, I think.

LIEUT.-GOVERNOR SCHULTZ AND MANITOBA SCHOOLS.

Mr. McCARTHY. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to draw the attention of the House to a matter to which I referred yesterday, namely, the correspondence, or rather the letter from Dr. Bourinot to His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Manitoba, which was published on the 7th inst. I have to put myself in order by moving the adjournment of the House, and I shall conclude by doing so. I may say that this is the only way by which a member has the opportunity of drawing attention to a matter which appears to him to be of sufficient importance to engage some time of this House, and engage it at the earliest possible moment. It is the practice in England, as we all know, when matters of emergency arise, and when the Order paper is in such a condition that delay must necessarily take place before the question can be discussed, to call the attention of Parliament to it by taking the course I am now doing, and that is by moving the adjournment of the House. Now, Sir, as we all know, there is at present under consideration by the legislature of Manitoba, which reassembles to-day, the question as to the remedial order. The legislature of Manitoba is now considering the order which was transmitted by His Excellency the Governor General to the legislature, and the legislature will, under the constitution, have to pass on it, it will have to say whether it will act in obedience to it, or how it will deal with it. Pending this, it appears the Lieutenant-Governor of that province visited the capital, and was here some time at the opening of the House. For what purpose he was here, whether he was summoned by the Government, or whether he came here on a visit, unbidden by them, of course we do not know. But there were sinister rumours abroad that he came here for the purpose of securing a second term, and that he was prepared to say that in order to get a second term, he would turn out the present Ministry, known as the Greenway Government. I say that rumour was current—I do not say anything more about it. I am bound to say, it is only fair to say that on His Honour being questioned, he denied the rumour.

Mr. IVES. Where was it current?

Mr. McCARTHY. It was current in the press. If the hon. gentleman does not read the papers, I cannot help it; I think he is the only member of this House who has not heard of it. That being the condition of affairs, it is quite certain that this matter which is now engaging the attention of the legislature of that province is one of deep concern. It is a matter, I venture to say, which has to be dealt with under considerations of the greatest responsibility. No man here, I think I may say, can pretend to see the end of the question, or, at all events, to see what may be the result of any course which the legislature of Manitoba may take in respect to this important matter. This is not a matter of administration, it is not a matter in which the executive of that province, the government of Mr. Greenway, has really anything to do. It is a matter solely concerning the legislature, or rather it is a matter with which the legislature itself has to deal. I am not at all desirous of taking too narrow a view of the duties and responsibilities of the Governor of a province; but it is well to bear in mind that while in all matters he is bound to act upon the advice of his Ministers, that is on all matters in regard to administration, that in matters of legislation he has really no direct say, one way or the other. This is not even a matter of legislation. The legislature of that province probably can, no doubt, and probably will, determine its course by resolution. It will be transmitted from that House to His Excellency the Governor General in Council. The answer will come in that way, unless, of course, the province thinks fit to give effect to the remedial order and to pass a Bill, in which case the Lieutenant-Governor will have the ordinary authority and the ordinary jurisdiction of the executive, to assent or dissent to the Bill. But, Sir, however that may be, there is nothing better settled in our constitutional history, in our constitutional proceedings, than that while the Government or the Ministers are bound to be loyal to the executive, whether he be His Excellency the Governor General or the Lieutenant-Governor of a province; the Lieutenant-Governor of a province is equally bound to be loyal and true to his council. He is bound to give them his cordial support, he is bound to give them his advice, if need be, his warnings, if need be; but he is required, according to our system, to be in cordial relationship with them, and so long as in point of fact they are his advisers he is bound, according to our system, to treat them in the most loyal way. Now, Sir, what do we find here? We find that when this matter is pending, His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor has thought fit to obtain the advice of a gentleman who, unfortunately for this discussion (perhaps it adds a little to our embarrassment, and to the indelicacy, I was going to say, of the whole situation), is the Clerk of the House. I am bound to say, although I have not had any communication with Dr. Bourinot, that I understand that Dr. Bourinot says that he understood his communication was a private one, and that it was not given to be used for political purposes. I am bound to say that, and I, Sir, most certainly believe that statement, for I can hardly imagine that the Clerk of this House would have so forgotten himself as, in a matter of very high political importance, a matter which even at that day had been agitated in no less than three or four constituencies; I cannot believe that he would have intervened and given a decision in favour of either one view or the other. I therefore do most freely accept, what I have understood and seen in the press to be the statement made by Dr. Bourinot in that regard. But, Sir, I say it probably may not be, it would not be improper for the Lieutenant-Governor to have armed himself and to have obtained the opinion of any expert in constitutional lore that he thought fit to apply to. I am not quarrelling with that. It is an intermeddling on his part in matters on which he had no concern, but he certainly had a perfect right as a citizen, as an individual, nay, perhaps as a Lieutenant-Governor to obtain the opinion of any expert he thought fit with regard to the position, a very new and very extraordinary one, which had arisen with reference to the remedial order. I am not quarrelling with that. But, Sir, let us see what followed. The Lieutenant-Governor knowing that these rumours were afloat—because they were brought to his notice and he denied them—returns to Winnipeg, and on the very day to which I now propose to direct the attention of the House, on the very day it was said that the Government of that province had this matter under consideration with a view of determining what course they would take and what policy they would propose to the legislature of which they are the leaders: on that very day, here in Ottawa, this document, the opinion of Dr. Bourinot is handed out to the press for distribution all through the country. Now, Mr. Schultz, the Lieutenant-Governor, was not in Ottawa at that time. His Honour, it is said, had authorized the publication of the document. The statements made in the papers in which I have seen it, one in the "Mail and Empire," and the other in another principal organ of the Government, namely, the Montreal "Gazette," are as follows:—

The "Mail and Empire" says:

Ottawa, May 6th.—From private advices received here it is learned that the Manitoba Government had under consideration to-day the school question, and that there is a very strong probability that a decision will be reached to-morrow. In view of this, it is ascertained that Governor Schultz has determined to give to the press the following important deliverance from Dr. Bourinot.—

I want to inquire, and I hope the leader of the House will tell us, who ascertained that Governor Schultz "intended to give to the press" the following important deliverance from Dr. Bourinot:—

—on the constitutional bearings of the case, which that authority submitted to His Honour while he was in Ottawa recently.

The heading in the other organ of the Government is substantially the same, not quite so full, but yet substantially the same. It says:

Ottawa, May 6.—From information received here, it is understood that the Manitoba Government had the school case under consideration to-day and will probably make its decision known to-morrow. In view of this, the following opinion from Dr. Bourinot on the constitutional bearing of the case, which was given at the request of Lieutenant-Governor Schultz, and was taken back by him for the information of his government, will, no doubt, prove very interesting.

Now, Sir, I desire to be perfectly frank, and I desire to state here, so that if it is not true it may be contradicted, that these documents were in type, that they were given to the press, and given to the press by no less an individual than the Prime Minister of this country. I should be glad to hear that contradicted, and I give the statement so that an opportunity may be afforded to make the contradiction. Well, Sir, what does that disclose? It discloses the Lieutenant-Governor here, and the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba being in Ottawa applies to Dr. Bourinot for this opinion on the constitutional question; not giving Dr. Bourinot the slightest idea that he intended to make any public use of it, but that it was for his private information. It discloses, also, that the Government here, when the very matter is under consideration, publishes this document throughout the length and breadth of Canada. Am I going too far, Sir, when I say: that these facts, if these be the facts, prove a case little short of a conspiracy against the rights of the legislature of the province of Manitoba. We know, Sir, that it is equally conspiracy to do what is lawful by unlawful means as it is to do unlawful acts. I think I can satisfy every member of the House—in fact I do not think any members of the House required to be satisfied—that the publication of this opinion, pointing out the course that the legislature were bound to take in the opinion of Dr. Bourinot, and published, by the Lieutenant-Governor without the authority or consent of the Government of the province of Manitoba, was an outrage such as there is no parallel to be found for, since the days of George III. at all events. What is it, Sir? The Governor whose duty it was to advise with his Government on this as other matters, whose duty it was to warn this Government, and to be frank with his Government; that Governor publishes a line of policy commanding the Government of Manitoba as it were, or forcing their hand to adopt a certain particular course. Now, Sir, that that is unconstitutional, that it calls for a prompt—if it is possible for the parties to do so who are equally guilty, namely, the Government here—that it calls on their part for prompt interference with the Lieutenant-Governor of that province, is, I think, very, very plain. Let me, Sir, fortify my statement by reference to some well-known authorities which were summarized by Sir John Macdonald in 1873, when the question of the conduct of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier was up for discussion. He then brought to our notice what the relationship should be between the representative of the Crown and his Ministry; and these citations prove, what we have come to treat as accepted doctrine, that in matters of this kind the Government have a right to rely upon the cordial and frank acceptance of that relationship by the representative of the Crown, whoever he may be. Lord Dufferin, speaking of this matter in a general sense in 1873, said:

My only guiding star in the conduct and maintenance of my official relations with your public men is the Parliament of Canada. I believe in Parliament, no matter which way it votes; and to those men alone whom the deliberate will of the confederate Parliament of Canada may assign me as my responsible advisers, can I give my confidence. Whether they are heads of this party or of that party must be a matter of indifference to the Governor General. So long as they are maintained, he is bound to give them his unre-served confidence, to defer to their advice, and to loyally assist them with his counsels. As a reasonable being, he cannot help having convictions on the merits of different policies, but these considerations are abstract and speculative, and devoid of practical effect in his official relations. As the head of a constitutional state, as engaged in the administration of parliamentary government, he (the Governor General) has no political friends; still less can he have political enemies. The possession, or the being suspected of such possession, would destroy his usefulness.

Let me refer to a resolution which was passed by the House of Commons in England in the days of George III., when it was whispered, by the authority of the King, that he disagreed with the policy of his Ministers; and I do not know that anything more applicable to the present case could be cited.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What year was that?

Mr. McCARTHY. 1783. The resolution which was adopted by a large majority of the House, was as follows:—

That it is now necessary to declare that to report any opinion or pretended opinion of his Majesty upon a bill or other proceeding with a view to influence the vote of the members, is a high crime and misdemeanour, dangerous to the honour of the Crown, a breach of fundamental principles of Parliament, and subversive of the constitution.

I will just close my references by a citation, which has often been made in this House, from a constitutional writer, Mr. Bagehot, for whom, as we all remember, Sir John Macdonald had the very highest opinion. Upon the relationship between the Crown and the Government, this writer says:

To state the latter shortly, the Sovereign has, under a constitutional monarchy such as ours, three rights, the right to be consulted, the right to encourage, the right to warn, and a king of great sense and sagacity would want no others. He would find that his having no others would enable him to use these with singular effect. He would say to his Ministers: The responsibility of these measures is upon you. Whatever you think best shall have my full and effectual support, but you will observe that, for this reason and that reason, what you propose to do is bad; for this reason and that reason, what you do not propose is better. I do not oppose, it is my duty not to oppose, but observe that I warn.

And again:

The popular theory of the English constitution involves two errors as to the Sovereign; first, in its oldest form, at least, it considers him as an estate of the realm, a separate co-ordinate authority with the House of Lords and the House of Commons. This, and much else, the Sovereign once was, but this he is no longer. That authority could only be exercised by a monarch with a legislative veto. He should be able to reject Bills, if not as the House of Commons rejects them, at least as the House of Peers rejects them. But the Queen has no such veto. She must sign her own death warrant, if the two Houses unanimously sent it up to her. It is a fiction of the past to ascribe to her legislative power. She has long ceased to have any.

Here, as I have already pointed out, there is no question of legislative jurisdiction or legislative power. Now, Sir, what is this document, and how was it heralded through the country? I quote from the Montreal "Gazette," the more experienced organ of the two:

Duty of Manitoba—Doctor Bourinot clearly sets it forth—constitutional aspect—it demands that Manitoba obey the remedial order—not a political issue, but merely a question of remedying a wrong that the highest court has declared to be in existence.

These are the headlines to this letter or opinion of Dr. Bourinot, sent forward in the manner I have stated. Is it possible, Sir, to doubt the object of it? Is this the first step in the bargain that Mr. Schultz is said to have made here? Is this to be followed by some other step which will bring about the dismissal of the Manitoba Government, or for what purpose has the Lieutenant-Governor thought fit to travel so far afield in order to obtain advice and opinions? His Ministers are his constitutional advisers, and to them alone has he any right to go. While as an individual he may fortify himself in any way with a knowledge of affairs, it is not proper for him to attempt to force the hands of his Ministers, or to interfere with their course by outside interference. If the House of Commons, in 1783, declared that it was a high crime and misdemeanour to mention that the king was opposed to a Bill introduced by his Ministers, what would be said nowadays, a century later, if the Queen herself, or His Excellency the Governor General, should circulate documents and opinions about matters which were at the very moment under consideration? Fancy, Sir, His Excellency the Governor General obtaining the opinion of the law officers of the Crown in England about this very matter at a time when it was under the consideration of his Government, and handing that out to the press. Could you imagine anything more contrary to our system of government? So I draw attention to this matter; I cannot do more at the moment. I attribute this occurrence very much to the unfortunate habit which has crept into our affairs—and perhaps this House is somewhat to blame for tolerating it—of permitting Lieutenant-Governors to retain their position after their term of office has expired. During their term they hold their office in fee, and are not to be displaced except for cause; but when their term comes to an end, they are tenants at will, living from hand to mouth at the will of the Government here. This habit begets ambitions for a second term, although, I suppose, we shall have stout denials that one of the objects of Mr. Schultz's visit here was his continuance in office. Now, as to this opinion, I am not going at this time to enter into any lengthened criticism; but I would have it understood that it is dealing with matters as to which there is the very greatest diversity of opinion in this country. I need not say more. In a very authoritative way, it lays down the law upon the matter as if it were perfectly plain and simple—lays it down from the constitutional student's standpoint: not from the standpoint of the lawyer or the politician, but from the calm and deliberate study of the student, as if the matter were absolutely determined and settled and clear. Sir, I beg most respectfully to dissent from this opinion in every particular. It states that the judgment of the Privy Council determined that this Government must pass the remedial order. On that point, I need not repeat my argument of the other day; but I say that to my judgment nothing is more certain than that the Governor General in Council here had absolute power to refuse the relief that was sought, and equal power to do what he did, that was to pass the remedial order. But that he was bound, in any sense of the word, by the judgment of the Privy Council, cannot, I venture to maintain, be upheld, with any consistency or reason, regard being had to the question submitted to the Supreme Court and which afterwards went in appeal to the Privy Council. Then it is stated, and here is where the mischief is:

That the legislature of Manitoba are bound to obey it, and will be acting in defiance of the constitution if they do not.

Well, it passes my humble comprehension that it should be intended that separate schools are to be re-established by this roundabout way, according to law. The simple way would be to say that they should never have been repealed. But as the right to repeal the separate school question is admitted in the case of Barrett, and the right to appeal against that is admitted by the last judgment of the Privy Council, surely it could never be intended that all this roundabout proceeding should be taken just to have this separate school system re-established. The opinion goes on to say:

The legislature of Manitoba is now constitutionally bound to decide whether it will allow the subject-matter of education, so far as the circumstances of this case require, to pass out of its direct control, or will, in accordance with the letter and spirit of the constitutional law as judicially determined, adopt such remedial measures as will remove the admitted grievances.

It is simply a difference of opinion, you may say. Certainly it is not a matter to be treated as such, and at this very moment, when the Government of Manitoba, with all the responsibility on their shoulders are proceeding to advise the legislature of Manitoba on a matter fraught with the most serious consequences to the peace and welfare of the province, and possibly of the Dominion, to have it published throughout the length and breadth of Canada that the matter has at length been determined by an impartial expert, one occupying the position which Mr. Bourinot does in this House, is a matter of very great misfortune to say the least. Again, the opinion goes on:

That by such course the legislature of Manitoba will remove a difficult question from the arena of political and sectarian animosities, exhibit their desire to do full justice to every class irrespective of sectional or religious opinions, and at the same time give conclusive evidence of their readiness to submit to the deliberative judgment of the courts in every case as a principle of action best calculated to promote in the end the security and strength of a federal union whose foundation rests on a written law which must be interpreted by judicial authority.

The law must be interpreted by the judicial authority undoubtedly, and the judicial authority did interpret to this extent, that there was the right of appeal—the right to go to the Governor in Council. That being so, the Governor in Council was invested with the authority to pass a remedial order or to reject the petition, but there is nothing in the judicial decision, nor could there be, to warrant the conclusion that a free legislature—whether it be of a province, and much less of this Dominion—shall take any particular course or adopt any particular view. And again:

That by failing to follow the course marked out for them by the law of the constitution, they would assume a most serious responsibility, since it would involve necessarily the administration of the subject of education from the jurisdiction where it must and should rest under ordinary circumstances, and the handing of it over in this special case to the authority of the Dominion Parliament, which is to be supreme to meet an emergency provided for by the constitution.

Undoubtedly that is a responsibility the legislature must assume, but the question for that legislature is whether they would prefer to cast the responsibility here rather than to re-impose or re-establish a system of education which, according to the opinion of that legislature, had proved utterly illusory and had been of great injury to a large portion of the people of Manitoba. I will not go on, though I have marked three or four passages equally objectionable, in my view. And now what has been the result? I can give it better in the words sent here from Ottawa as reported in the press. A despatch was sent from Ottawa in these words:

An Ottawa despatch published here says that Lieutenant-Governor Schultz's action is the first part of the policy that the Lieutenant-Governor intends to pursue against Mr. Greenway.

Here the despatch gives the exact words:

Dr. Bourinot said to-day that he gave an opinion for the personal guidance of Governor Schultz and not to be used as a political document. There is great jubilation in Ottawa Government circles here over the matter, and there is no longer any doubt in the minds of the followers of the Government but that Mr. Greenway will be brought to time.

There can be no doubt now of what was intended. Mr. Greenway is to be brought to time, and this is the way taken to bring him to time. A conspiracy was apparently entered into between some member of the Administration—and from what I have heard I believe it to be the Prime Minister—and the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, for the purpose of bringing Mr. Greenway to time and forcing his hand in a matter in which his province is as deeply interested as in any question that ever came before it. Under the circumstances, I think the House will agree with me that I only did my duty in bringing this matter to the attention of the House at the earliest possible moment, and I conclude by moving the adjournment of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has, of course, performed what he conceived to be a duty incumbent upon him in bringing to the attention of the House at the earliest possible time a matter which he thinks of very great importance. As to its importance there may be different opinions. There may be a difference of opinion between my hon. friend and myself, for instance, or other members of the House, as to the magnitude this particular act has assumed. There may also be a very wide difference of opinion as to the relevancy and the aptness of the methods and manner by which the hon. gentleman has enforced his remarks. After all, the main part of the hon. gentleman's information is of a very unsubstantial and illusory character. It is taken from the headlines of newspapers and from press despatches and correspondence, and from those he proceeds to deduce the policy of the Government, the motives of the First Minister, and the motive, in fact, of what he considers this wrong action. He commenced his address by endeavouring to prejudice the House against the executive head of the province of Manitoba. The Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba had a perfect right to come to Ottawa. He has a perfect right to go from one part of this Dominion to the other. Why, then, should an hon. gentleman in this House come to the conclusion that whenever a Lieutenant-Governor—Lieutenant-Governor Schultz in this case—goes from the seat of his provincial government to Ottawa, it is for some unworthy purpose or with some sinister motive? I think it was unworthy of the hon. gentleman to attempt to prejudice the House against Lieutenant-Governor Schultz, in the first place, by insinuations as to motives of which the hon. gentleman knows nothing and with respect to which he confesses that he knows nothing. In the first place, he said that he got his information simply from rumour, and then, feeling that he had gone a little too far, he said that even he himself was not disposed to believe that such was the case. He makes the insinuation to prejudice the case against the person whom he attacks, and then tries to shelter himself by saying that he himself disclaims any very definite or firm belief in the insinuations he made.

Mr. McCARTHY. I did not disclaim any belief.

Mr. FOSTER. He accused the Lieutenant-Governor of having come to Ottawa, bidden or unbidden. What business was it of his? If unbidden, he was doing nothing more than he had the right to do. If bidden, he was doing nothing more than he should do under our constitution. If the First Minister of this Dominion, or the Governor General of this Dominion wishes to consult with a Lieutenant-Governor and ask him to come here—I am just taking a hypothetical case—the hon. gentleman has no right to found on that a charge against the Lieutenant-Governor. But, Sir, he went further than that. Not content with the insinuation, which, as he himself admitted, had no foundation, in fact, he goes on to make it still worse by imputing the most corrupt and unworthy motives to Governor Schultz. He says the Governor would like to remain another term in Winnipeg. How does he know? Who told him that had authority to tell him? He argued from what would be his own course, probably—because a man is led to a certain deduction from knowing what his own feeling would be under given circumstances, and what would be his own probable action in a certain case. Arguing from that, or from some other foundation, he comes to the conclusion, and gives it out in an indefinite sort of way—so as not to commit himself too far—that Governor Schultz was here to do an unworthy act, from an unworthy corrupt motive,—that of endeavouring to buy for himself the place of Governor of Manitoba for an extension of his term, or for a second term. Now, Sir, I am bound to say that that is an insinuation, amounting almost in terms to a definite charge, which the hon. gentleman ought to feel the responsibility of making before he attempts to bring it before this House. He went on in that peculiar method of his, first to make an insinuation amounting almost to an assertion, and then in order to get behind a bulwark, to shield himself from counter attack, he said that the Governor denied it; and he did not state that he was quite prepared to take the word of the Governor as a gentleman and an official of this country. Well, Sir, the gravamen of the charge, when brought down to a simple conclusion, is this —he admits the Governor had a perfect right to inform his mind and his conscience with reference to any public matter which is at present agitating the mind of the country, which is now a subject or likely to become one in which he himself may have to advise and consult with his Ministry. The Governor has a perfect right, by applying to every source within his reach, to inform his mind and conscience with reference to a public question that is sure, or likely to come before himself and his advisers. My hon. friend did not deny that. Very well. The Governor did inform himself. He had recourse to an authority upon constitutional law. He had recourse to the Clerk of this House, who is well known as a writer of repute and an authority upon constitutional points. And the hon. gentleman himself did not deny the right of the Government to consult so eminent authority and get his opinion. Well, we are on common ground that far. Now the hon. gentleman parts from that common ground and takes this:—That Governor Schultz, while having the right to inform himself upon the matter, had no right to give that opinion to any person outside of his own Ministry. The greatest and best constitutional authority we have in the Dominion of Canada, at the suggestion and request of the Governor, wrote an opinion, entirely aside from partisan or party motives or leanings and gave it to Governor Schultz. And the gravamen of the charge is this:—That Governor Schultz did not button it up so securely in his pocket that the newspapers could not get hold of it. Now, Sir, suppose that that opinion is, as I have stated, a non-partisan opinion, a non-political opinion, a strictly constitutional opinion, given by request, what, in the settlement of a great question in which the whole of this country is vitally interested—not. I am bound to say, because of the importance of the subject itself as it appears in this special form at present with us, but because of its pervasive distribution through all classes of the country, and therefore arousing an interest everywhere—what is prejudiced by the people of Canada having access to the same constitutional opinion, the same non-partisan opinion, the same non-political dissertation upon the law and constitution in regard to it, as Governor Schultz himself? What or who is to be injured by the revelation of that authority? I cannot see that the proper solution of the question, if we all wish it shall be solved properly and constitutionally, is prejudiced by an action of that kind? Therefore, leaving aside these finely-drawn legal arguments and distinctions and taking it upon the ground of broad common sense, what great injury has been done to the constitution, or to the settlement of the question at large by the divulgence of the opinion that was written by the Clerk of the House of Commons, so that the people of the country have access to it? The hon. gentleman states that it was meddlesome for Governor Schultz to get the advice. The only answer to that, that it is necessary to give, is that the hon. gentleman, in another part of his address, said that the Governor had a perfect right to seek advice. If so it could not have been meddlesome for him to go to a constitutional authority and get the best advice he could on the matter. The hon. gentleman then comes to the point of the "conspiracy" as he calls it, and there again he has nothing but newspaper reports to rely upon. He takes certain reports in the newspapers and from these draws the conclusion that there was collusion between the Premier of the Dominion and Governor Schultz to get this opinion written by the Clerk and put into the Governor's hands, and give it out to the public of Canada. Well, Sir, the facts of the case are these,—that this opinion given by the Clerk of the House was also made known to the Premier of this Dominion. Is there anything improper in that?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Most improper.

Mr. FOSTER. If it is necessary, if it is advisable that the Governor should inform himself in reference to the point of constitutional law for his own information, is there any very great impropriety in his communicating that to the head of the Government of Canada? It was so communicated. And when it was published in Winnipeg it was published also in the papers of this part of the Dominion. If it were once published in a newspaper in Winnipeg, it would have gone over the whole Dominion. There is, therefore, no blame, no extraordinary guilt of crime that can be imputed in the publication simultaneously or a few hours after.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon. gentleman say who gave it to the press?

Mr. FOSTER. The press have their way of getting these things. In this particular instance the press got this from the Premier of the Dominion himself. Now, Sir, out of that simple relation of facts the hon. gentleman adduces something for which he has no authority, namely, that there was a conspiracy between the Premier of the Dominion and Governor Schultz to force the hand of the Ministry of Winnipeg. In what way can it force their hand? Was there an individual opinion of Governor Schultz published to the country? Was there a single line or a single word to show what his attitude was or would be towards any legislation which the Ministry under him had proposed or would propose. Not a word. If Governor Schultz had published an opinion in which he had animadverted upon what was going to be the proposal of his ministry, what was to be the future legislation of his legislature, then my hon. friend would have good ground for his criticism. But you have not to-day, the hon. gentleman cannot bring to the attention of the House, one single line to give an inkling of what Governor Schultz's opinion is as regards this matter of remedial legislation. So I say a charge which would be a serious one if it embodied an expressed opinion of the executive head, comes to be a harmless one when it is simply the giving out to the press, to the public, of an opinion of a writer, and an authority. Suppose that the writer had written it, and it had been printed and published, and Governor Schultz had made it his own, had put it in his library with his other constitutional works, and suppose that he, after study of those, when reporters came to question him, had given them access to the pamphlet itself which contained the opinion. The pamphlet may not have been ten days old, it may have been published after this controversy arose, it may have been written and published within ten days; it would have been given, in this case, by supposition, with constitutional authorities as a constitutional authority: what would have been the grounds of objection against it then? It is not a crime, not a wrong. Is it a crime and a wrong, then, to give an opinion of a constitutional character, written by an authority, when it could not be a crime to give it if it had been printed by the authority, and was in course of publication, and had become current literature? Now, this distinction, I think, may be borne in mind when we come to consider what is really the common sense of the charge that the hon. gentleman has brought against the Government. He says that this was published without the consent of the Government of Manitoba. He has not given us any authority for that assertion, simply his own words. He may be in the counsels of that government, I am not disposed to think that he is. He has made the assertion, he has not given any proof of that assertion. After having made this charge, he ends up as he began. He insinuates again, he does not declare in just so many definite words that he believes it so, but he puts it in the form of a question; thus again, with ingenuity peculiar to his whole address, sheltering himself from a direct charge; and he says: Is this the first step in a bargain? Is the next step to dismiss the Manitoba Ministry? Is the third step to drop down in the gubernatorial seat for another term? All hypotheses, all put with a note of interrogation after them, not to commit the hon. gentleman, but showing his animus, and making, in a way which is not the most openly and manly, a charge by insinuation, which he does not care to make directly. Now, Sir, I do not see that at present the hon. gentleman's remarks call for any more criticism at my hands. Not being a lawyer, I have tried to give what I consider to be a common-sense view of this matter, I submit it to the House and to the country, and I am inclined to think that neither the country nor the House will believe that any great crime has been committed, and they will think, after calmly considering it, that, after all, this has been a tempest in a teapot.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The question that is before us by the motion for the adjournment of the debate, is wholly distinct from the merits of the question out of which this controversy has arisen. I have no intention whatever of entering into a discussion of the propriety or impropriety of the course which the legislature and Government of Manitoba have taken. That is a matter which may come before the House at a later period of the session. That subject is not before the House in the motion that is before the Chair. We have nothing whatever to do with the soundness or unsoundness of the opinion given to the Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Manitoba by the Clerk of this House. He may be all right in point of law, or the hon. gentleman opposite may be partly in the right and partly in the wrong. I am not going to criticise what the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has said in regard to the merits of the opinion itself; but I purpose to say something with regard to the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor in seeking, in his official character, advice and counsel from parties other than those who are his constitutional advisers. Now, Sir, the Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Manitoba is the executive head of that province, a province which enjoys constitutional government; and I confess, Sir, my inability to understand how constitutional government is to be maintained if a Lieutenant-Governor feels himself at liberty to seek the advice of various parties who have no responsibility to the province for the advice which they give, and who publishes that advice abroad, while the question to which it relates is still under deliberation, on the part of both the legislature and the government. What would be thought, Sir, if this question had been before a court of law, if the court had heard argument, if the question was still under deliberation, before the court had pronounced judgment, if a party were to appear in public with a criticism dealing with the matter? Now, Sir, this case stands in very much the same position. The leader of the House accuses the hon. member for North Simcoe of making a number of mean insinuations, of putting in the form of an interrogation what he cannot, or dare not, affirm. Well, I do not know what the hon. gentleman may or dare affirm; but the hon. gentleman has put a number of questions that seem to me extremely pertinent, under the circumstances, that seem to me to emanate from the condition of things that exists at this moment. Here is a communication taking place between the First Minister of the Crown in this country, and the Lieutenant-Governor of a province, with regard to a matter about which he should seek constitutional advice from his constitutional advisers, and not from his master, or from the parties who may, at any moment, remove him from office if he does not seek to carry out the views of the Administration. Whatever those views may be. Now, Sir, look at the condition of things. I have brought the matter before this House on more than one occasion, I have pointed out that the Lieutenant-Governor holds office during pleasure, and for five years he cannot be removed except for cause, and the cause for which he is removed must be reported to this House. You allow the five years to expire, you do not renew his commission; he does not stand before the country, nor does he hold his office in the same way that he did before. He is not independent; you have him in your power. His five years have expired, and you can remove him at this moment if he does not carry out your wishes—does not betray his advisers—does not appoint political janissaries to apply the bowstring to the men who are his constitutional advisers under the law. That is the position which things present at this moment. I do not know what more appropriate name could be given to them than the name of conspiracy; for whatever hon. gentlemen may think, it does seem to me that a conspiracy is formed against the advisers of the Lieutenant-Governor when you adopt such a course as this towards them. Renew his commission if you wish to retain him in office, supersede him by another if you do not wish to retain him in office; but make your Lieutenant Governor independent of the Ministers of the Crown here, to the extent the law intends and then there may not be so much objection to his holding communication with the First Minister. But even then, I think the course which the hon. gentleman has taken would be a most improper one. The member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has expressed opinions in respect to the merits of this case and to its constitutional features. I may not agree with him, I am not going to say one word with respect to that matter; but whatever views or opinions may be formed, it is a matter which must be disposed of and dealt with in the first instance by the legislative authority in the province of Manitoba, and if we are dissatisfied with the conclusion then if it comes legally before us, the matter may be considered here. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman thinks, and other hon. gentlemen think that this legislation requires amendment; others are of a different opinion. But I believe this, that when all the facts become known it will be found that the Lieutenant-Governor himself has been conspiring against his advisers and is himself the man who is responsible for the legislation which has given rise to all the bitterness that exists at this moment on this question. I believe that if the matter is inquired into it can be shown, that there was scarcely an Order in Council, for a long period of time, submitted to the Lieutenant-Governor for his sanction or signature that got that sanction or signature until he telegraphed or wrote to Ottawa, and received instructions from the Government here as to the course he should take. I say a more unconstitutional, or more improper course taken by the Lieutenant-Governor in discharge of his duties was never undertaken than that pursued by the gentleman who holds office at this moment by the sufferance of hon. gentlemen who now sit on the Treasury benches. This is not true as regards the province of Manitoba alone. This Government has been a Government of conspirators against the local governments in every case where the conduct of a local government could be attacked with any degree of success. We know when the conduct of the Quebec Government was improperly brought up in this House when complaints of misconduct in office were made against Ministers here. What was done? The conduct of the Government of Quebec in discharging their duties was dragged here, in the first place before the Senate and afterwards before this House. The Lieutenant-Governor in discharging his obligations as Lieutenant-Governor appointed a commission—to try whom? To try his subordinates in office? No. To try those who were his advisers, and who under our constitutional system should have been tried by the legislature of the province. Why did not the Lieutenant-Governor call the legislature together if he had charges to make against his Ministers? Why did he not give them an opportunity to make their defence to the inquiry into such charges? He dismissed his Ministers. Did he stop at that? No; he dissolved the legislature. Did he send his Ministers back for re-election? Not he. He formed a new government, and from December on for four months, the government was carried on without any Parliament being in existence, and without any Ministers returning for election. I turn to the writ for the holding of the new election, and what do I find? The very proclamation under which Parliament was dissolved is the same instrument by which a new Parliament is called. According to Magna Charta, that must be called within forty days. I do not know what special provision there is in the province of Quebec, but I venture to say that there is no provision which authorizes four months delay before an election is held. In England at the present time 35 days only can elapse between the issue of the writ and a new election. Why was not a new Parliament called? It was not called because they did not believe they could defeat the old Ministers, because the old Ministers could carry the country, and time must be had sufficient to debauch the electors.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes, and there was no election held for four months. The law also provides that the legislature shall meet within twelve months; it is a mandatory provision, it is what the law provides; and yet just before the twelve months expired the Lieutenant-Governor, instead of convening that legislature, dissolved Parliament. Was there no connection, was there no communication between him and the Government here, for as soon as he succeeded in carrying out the policy which the Government had marked out for him, he was made a member of the Cabinet?

Mr. LISTER. And now he is going to be a Supreme Court judge.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Let me return for a moment to this question which is now before us. Let me call the attention of the House to what took place under somewhat different circumstances, and which are more favourable to the Administration than the circumstances which we are now discussing. When Lord Grey had submitted to Parliament his Reform Bill, a number of societies were formed by which that measure was being promoted, and it was said that some of those societies were ready to resort to violent methods in supporting the Bill. The Duke of Wellington, a privy councillor, a peer of the realm, who in either capacity was free, under the ancient law, to advise the Crown, addressed the King directly upon the subject; and that letter the King answered without having communicated the matter to his Ministers. And the King supported his Administration. He said he had confidence in them, that they were fully alive to the condition of affairs existing, and that they would take that course which, in their opinion, was best in the public interest. Now, Lord Grey objected to what the King did. In the first place he objected altogether under the new system of parliamentary government with responsible Ministers of the Crown, acting unitedly, to the Duke of Wellington in his capacity either as a peer or a privy councillor undertaking to advise the Sovereign. And he pointed out that very serious inconvenience would arise in case the advice became known. The King at first was disposed to defend his conduct, but afterwards he gave to his Prime Minister the assurance that in future cases, if he received advice from persons who, under the constitution were entitled to give that advice, he would give no other answer than simply an acknowledgement, without first having submitted the matter to his Ministers and leaving the subject to be dealt with by them through the proper official channels. Lord Grey informed the King that he was entirely satisfied with that course, that he had no doubt whatever it was the proper course to take, and that what he had previously done was more than questionable as regards its propriety. Then shortly afterwards, when the government resigned an attempt was made to form a new government, and the House of Commons passed a resolution and communicated it to the Sovereign advising him to take back his Ministers and to take their advice. There was no answer given to this, and when Lord Grey was recalled and the government was reinvested with office the address of the House of Commons was answered, and the King in that despatch informed the House of Commons that the reason for not answering sooner was because he had no Minister to advise him on this subject. Now, those cases go to show, that while it is important that the representative of the Crown should be well informed with regard to public matters, yet when the Crown requires special information, the Crown must receive that information from the parties constitutionally entitled to give advice and from no other parties whatever. Why, Sir, there are cases alluded to by Dr. Todd, and by other writers on parliamentary government, pointing out the great service that the Crown was sometime able to render the Ministers with regard to public matters, and Mr. Gladstone himself mentions, that the longer the Sovereign is in possession of the Throne the better qualified is the Sovereign to aid Ministers in this regard, because the Sovereign holds office continuously. Many things transpire with regard to public matters and foreign affairs, with which, while the Crown is informed, the present Ministers may not be informed, and the Crown is capable of giving information thereon to Ministers with regard to public matters which generally aids and assists them in dealing with the questions they are called upon to consider. But, Sir, that is wholly a different matter from this. Where does the Lieutenant-Governor seek advice? He seeks advice outside the province altogether. He seeks advice from a person who can have no responsibility to the people of that province and with whom they cannot deal if they disapprove of the advice given. Suppose for a moment that the Lieutenant-Governor should exercise his constitutional powers and say: I agree with the opinion of Dr. Bourinot and I do not agree with the opinion of my Attorney General, and I will dismiss my Government. How are you going to make Dr. Bourinot responsible for the advice he has given and which has led to this action of the Lieutenant-Governor? You cannot make Dr. Bourinot responsible in any sense, and that fact is sufficient to show you how improper the conduct of the Lietenant-Governor was in seeking the advice of an outside person in regard to a matter which was pending before his government, and with which the legislature would in a very short time be called upon to deal. I am not going to say more upon this subject at the present moment. One thing is perfectly clear : under our constitutional system there are certain persons designated as having the right to give advice. The Royal will is not formed by the Lieutenant-Governor, but by them. The House of Lords, the individual members of that House, as peers of the realm ; the Privy Council collectively, and the Privy Council individually ; the House of Commons in its collective capacity, and in no other, may, in conformity to law or to convention, give advice. Turn to any writer, the most elementary upon this subject, and he will tell us that the individual members of the House of Commons cannot approach the Sovereign and undertake to advise the Sovereign with regard to a particular matter. How then can it be said that an outside party would have that right ? This House is a great Council of State and as a great Council of State we speak collectively, and we may give the Sovereign such advice as we think best ; but we cannot speak individually out of this House, and much less can a party do so who has no seat in any Council of State, and who is not either individually, or as a part of a great Council, the adviser of the Sovereign or of the Sovereign's representative. Sir, it is very clear from what the hon. leader of the House has told us, that he feels it is quite proper what the Prime Minister of this country to whom the Lieutenant-Governor is subordinate, by whose advice he may be removed at any moment : it is clear, I say, that he feels that it is perfectly proper for the Lieutenant-Governor to take advice and to make this a subject of communication with a party who is his master. I utterly repudiate that doctrine. Both in permitting him to continue without a commission, and in undertaking to advise or control him when he has constitutional advisers in his province, is a most improper and most unconstitutional proceeding.

Mr. DICKEY. Mr. Speaker, I have not very much to say in reply to the remarks of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). He seems to be chiefly concerned with what took place in the province of Quebec some years ago during the Mercier regime, and he went back, as is very customary with him, to the very foundations of precedents. He took us back to Magna Charta for his case, and it appears that not only during that late unfortunate Mercier regime in Quebec, which hon. gentlemen opposite, no doubt, do not care to hear about—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. DICKEY. It appears, I say, that during that unfortunate regime, not only were all the laws of morality and public honesty violated, but Magna Charta was also violated. Upon that occasion, it would seem according to the hon. gentleman, there was a serious fracture made in Magna Charta. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) seemed to be very much agitated over the course of the province of Quebec at that time, and I was wondering whether it was really the course that the Lieutenant-Governor took that he objected to, or the results which that course produced.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. DICKEY. I was wondering whether he objected so much to the particular course the Lieutenant-Governor took to discover the conspiracy, or the fact that the conspiracy was discovered and exposed to the country, much to the damage of his own party. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) said that the Governor upon that occasion disregarded the advice of his constitutional advisers. I do not propose to discuss that question at length, for, as the hon. gentleman himself admitted, it is perhaps somewhat irrelevant to the question at issue. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) stated, as I understood him, that the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec appointed a commission behind the back of his advisers to inquire into their own conduct. Well, now, the hon. gentleman will see that he is doing the late Governor of Quebec a very great injustice, because that commission was appointed at the request of the Hon. Mr. Mercier himself.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Other hon. MEMBERS. Yes, yes.

Mr. DICKEY. Yes, under an order in council passed by the Mercier Government, and in that respect, therefore, he is doing the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec an injustice. I do not propose to discuss further the question of the Mercier Government, because I presume the hon. gentleman himself will admit that whatever were the methods by which the discovery was made, it was in the general interests of Canada that that inquiry should take place, and the exposures be made, and that the result which followed in the elections should follow.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That the end justifies the means.

Mr. DICKEY. I presume the hon. gentleman will admit that. Now, coming to the question at hand, with respect to the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, I must say that I cannot see that any very serious fracture of the constitution has been caused. I understand the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) to say that the Lieutenant-Governor has no right to seek advice anywhere outside of his constitutional advisers, and that in that respect the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba violated his duties. Now, consider the position in which the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba was. There was a question upon which, as the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) says, the opinion of the country was divided. It was a question to which there was absolutely no direct constitutional precedent; it was a question of extreme difficulty; and, worse than all, it was a question that appealed to those very feelings of race and religion which, if ever the future of this country is in danger, will be the cause of that danger. So that the Lieutenant-Governor was called upon to deal with an entirely new and extremely dangerous question; and I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if, under these circumstances, it would not have been extremely unfortunate if, under the constitution of this country, the Lieutenant-Governor could not have gone to a man of the calibre of the Clerk of this House—a man who is an authority for our daily proceedings here, and frequently quoted as such by hon. gentlemen opposite, a man to whose work you, Mr. Speaker, refer in ruling this House. It would have been a misfortune, I say, if the Lieutenant-Governor could not have gone to an officer of that character to obtain an independent opinion on this question.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Governor General could come to us here on the same ground.

Mr. DICKEY. I am not aware of any constitutional rule whatever to prevent the Lieutenant-Governor or the Governor General of this Dominion from informing himself in a legitimate way, upon all questions of public interest. He may consult standard authorities; he may, as the leader of the House says, consult newspaper articles. Would it be improper for him to discuss this question with the Clerk of this House or with any other man who is learned in such questions?

Mr. LAURIER. As a governor, most decidedly.

Mr. DICKEY. As an individual, would he have a right to discuss it?

Mr. LAURIER. Most certainly not, if he makes it public.

Mr. DICKEY. I do not understand the hon. leader of the Opposition to adhere to the position taken by the hon. member for Bothwell. I understood the hon. member for Bothwell to maintain that it is wrong for him to seek advice anywhere. The Clerk of this House, it is true, is an officer here; but he has another character as well, namely, that of a high constitutional authority, as our former librarian had the character of a high constitutional authority; and it was in that capacity that the Lieutenant-Governor turned to him for advice. There being in that course no constitutional principle invaded, there is not the slightest evidence that the Lieutenant-Governor gave this opinion to the press, or made it public. Even if he did make it public, as the leader of the House pointed out, that would not be, in the slightest degree, committing himself to the arguments or the conclusions contained in it. The constitutional rule is that a constitutional sovereign shall not express an opinion contrary to the advice of his advisers. With regard to the precedent cited by the hon. member for Bothwell, the case of Lord Grey, it seems to me that nothing could have been wider of the case in hand, except, perhaps, Magna Charta, which he also cited. The case of Lord Grey occurred at a time when the constitution of England was in a transition state, when the old privy councillors who were not of the Cabinet claimed the right still to advise the sovereign on public questions. That was particularly the case with the Duke of Wellington, who was the father of his country at that time, and who was looked up to by all parties. The Duke of Wellington undertook to advise the king in pursuance of old practice, and he was called to account and stopped. He could not do that now—why? Because, though a privy councillor, he was a member of the party in opposition. But if he were a humble individual, an expert independent altogether of politics, to whom, simply as an expert, the sovereign could turn for advice, there would not be the slightest objection to his doing so, and informing himself as to the state of the law on any question. Now, this question has to be settled by the legislature of Manitoba as a whole. It is not to be settled by the Government of Manitoba. The Government of Manitoba, for all I know, may have no policy whatever upon the question; they may leave it entirely to the legislature to settle. The hon. member for North Simcoe said a good deal with respect to the motives of Lieutenant-Governor Schultz is coming here. I thought that was extremely unfortunate on his part. The hon. gentleman's own actions in this matter might be made the subject of very severe comment, and I should be very sorry if anybody took the opportunity when he was absent, and had not the right to make a reply, to make any statements of that sort. It is quite possible that Lieutenant-Governor Schultz was acting in what he considered to be the very best interests of this country. It is quite possible that he thought that he was able to do something towards settling a question which, irrespective of party—for party had nothing whatever to do with it—threatened to rend this country on lines of race and creed. It is possible that Lieutenant-Governor Schultz thought that he would be able, by advice, by consultation, by remonstrance, by the exercise of all those constitutional rights which a Lieutenant-Governor or a Governor General has in dealing with his government to assist in settling this question.

Mr. MILLS. I would ask the hon. gentleman whether he is of the opinion that the personal will of the sovereign or the sovereign's representative may find expression officially in that way?

Mr. DICKEY. I ask, how could the Lieutenant-Governor do that unless he went to his Council prepared with knowledge—unless he had informed himself beforehand so as to be able to discuss with the able men in his Cabinet the questions at issue? If he went there without informing himself, he would go as a child, and his influence for the benefit of the future of this Dominion would be nil. Therefore, it seems to me, that this can best be described as the late Sir John Macdonald described another agitation, a great cry about a very little piece of pork.

Mr. MARTIN. I understand that the hon. gentleman, the leader of the House, takes the position that all the facts stated—some of them by way of suggestion—with regard to this matter by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) are true, and that the Government justifies the action of the Lieutenant-Governor. The hon. gentleman admits that the opinion of the Clerk of this House was handed out for publication by the Premier. The Premier handed out that opinion for the purpose of influencing public sentiment in the country, and, if possible, public sentiment in Manitoba. The Finance Minister urges that that was the proper course to adopt, because the gentleman who gave this opinion is a great constitutional authority, and his opinion is entitled to great weight. Now, Mr. Speaker, it has already been stated by the hon. member for Simcoe that action of this kind by the Clerk of the House, if intended by him for publication, would be most improper. I desire to express my approval of that view taken by the hon. gentleman. The hon. member for Simcoe accepts the statement published in the newspapers of the intention of the Clerk of the House in giving that opinion, namely, that he gave it because it was asked from him privately for the private use of the Governor. The Finance Minister, however, following in the lead of the First Minister, proposes to make all the use he possibly can of that opinion. It is evident, therefore, that the opinion of an official of this House is being used for the purpose of giving weight to a contention which is resisted in the strongest manner by those who do not agree with it. Surely, there can be no more improper conduct than that. If the Clerk had put forward that opinion for that very purpose, he would be subject to grave censure from this House. If he gave that opinion for the private use of the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, and if the Lieutenant-Governor nor and the First Minister, violating the confidence of the Clerk, gave that out for publication, they acted most improperly. And when we find the Finance Minister coming forward and telling us, here is the Clerk's opinion, which transcends every other and settles to a large extent this question, we are at a loss to know whether we are really dealing with a responsible Government. It is quite impossible for any man, in a matter of this kind, in which principles are not admitted, and concerning which there is so much diversity of view, to give an opinion without taking a partisan course, and partisan action on the part of the Clerk of this House is something which should be resented by this House. And the attempt of the Government to make use of the opinion of the Clerk, obtained in the way this was obtained, for a party and partisan purpose cannot be too severely censured. The Finance Minister attempted—and I noticed that his remarks in this respect received very vigorous applause from hon. gentlemen opposite—to attach some blame to the hon. member for Simcoe for having attacked a gentleman who was not here to defend himself. The hon. Minister of Militia took the same ground. I wish to protest against any such pretension. If the Lieutenant-Governor of a province exceeds his duty and does something he should not do, are we to be precluded from criticising his conduct because he is not here? The Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba is an official of this country. He is one of the paid servants of the Dominion. We here represent the Dominion. It is our duty, it is our right, to criticise and condemn any officer of the Dominion. And it is no answer to make, that the official whom we criticise has not a seat in this House. It has been charged in the press that the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba has undertaken to intervene in this question, now before his advisers and the legislature of which he is a part, in order to advance the ends of hon. gentlemen opposite, and that his object in so doing is to obtain in return his reappointment for a second term as Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba. That has been suggested, and that is perhaps the natural inference from the facts admitted here to-day. I wish, with the view of emphasizing that inference, an inference which I have every reason to believe well founded, to bring a matter before this House which I had intended to bring at an early day. In fact, I had intended to bring it before the House last session, and certainly would have brought it before this House, apart altogether from the question now under discussion, before long this session. I refer to the very question of the position of this gentleman even at present in Manitoba. I consider that the way in which the Government has dealt with this matter has, for some time, been a public scandal. Mr. Schultz was appointed Governor of Manitoba on the 1st July, 1888. His term expired the 1st July, 1893. He has been in that office ever since, a tenant at will—most subservient to the will of the Government of the day. He has been there since the 1st July, 1893, threatened all the time, according to newspaper reports, with removal, and most desirous to remain. It has been suggested on the other side, that we have no evidence of that. Why, Mr. Speaker, as has been said, the gentleman had ten thousand reasons for desiring to remain in that office, and every one of those reasons strikes a most responsive chord in his heart. Hon. gentlemen on the other side have repelled with great indignation any suggestion that the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba would be influenced by any motives except those of the very highest nature. Now, the matters to which I referred a moment ago, which I had intended to bring before this House, and which I now desire to lay before it, show that that gentleman, in fulfilling the duties of this office, has been actuated by other than the highest motives. I charge that he has used the position of Lieutenant-Governor, since he has occupied that high and honourable office, not for the purpose of carrying out his duties as laid down in the constitution, but for the purpose of advancing his private ends.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. State your point of order.

Mr. MARTIN. I say that, and I intend to prove it. Now, His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba is largely interested in property in that province. He may, perhaps, be unfortunate in that respect. However that may be, he is the owner of large quantities of vacant farm lands throughout the province, and he is also the owner of a very considerable amount of property in the city of Winnipeg. Long prior to his elevation to the high post he now occupies, and ever since his incumbency in that office, he has been engaged in a most rancorous and persistent fight with every municipality in which his land is situated, with a view of escaping payment of taxes. Now, that may possibly be considered a private matter, but I will show in what way it becomes a public matter.

Mr. WELDON. I rise to a point of order. I wish to know whether the reflections cast by the hon. gentleman upon the Lieutenant-Governor of a province are in order?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman has a perfect right, if he chooses, to make a charge against any official in our employ, and, if he wishes to do so, before the people's representatives in Parliament is the place to make it.

Mr. SPEAKER. If called on to rule, I would say that questions of privilege apply only to members of Parliament themselves. Therefore, while there may be a question of taste in regard to these attacks that are made upon public officials, I cannot say that the hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. MARTIN. As to the question of taste, Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to take the responsibility. I had intended making these charges last session, but it was announced in such a definite way through the Government newspapers that the vacancy had been filled and the position would soon be occupied by another gentleman, that I thought that perhaps, as Mr. Schultz was going out of office, the best way was to leave him alone. But, Sir, I cannot do that any longer. The same man remains there; remains there in violation of the constitutional practice, as has been pointed out to-day; remains there discharging most delicate duties, duties in which hon. gentlemen opposite are most vitally interested; and he remains there at the will of the Government, either to be reappointed, or to be continued in office from day to day, as he is now. Under these circumstances any question of taste must yield precedence, in my judgment, to a question of duty. Sir, I was proceeding to say that the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba was very largely interested in property, both city and farm property, throughout the province of Manitoba, and that he had for a long time exhibited great distaste to paying his taxes on these properties. The legislature of Manitoba, of which I was then a member, passed an Act for the purpose of enabling the city of Winnipeg to sell lands for taxes. This Act was passed to overcome a mere technical difficulty which had arisen and which prevented the city from selling even those lands the taxes upon which were long in arrear. As I have said before, the Lieutenant-Governor was a large owner in the city, and his property was part of that upon which the taxes had not been paid. Under these circumstances what did the Lieutenant-Governor do? He refused to assent to the Bill, and gave no reason whatever for his conduct, leaving it to be inferred, and I do infer and do charge, that he used his high official position as Lieutenant-Governor of the province to frustrate the efforts of the legislature of Manitoba to enable the city of Winnipeg to sell his lands for the long arrears of taxes which he had neglected or refused to pay. Now, Mr. Speaker, if a man will do that, if a man will use his position in that open way, is not the suggestion that is made in the public press to-day one likely to be true? If a man will do that, if a man will degrade his position as he degraded his in this case, for a few dollars, what will he do when a question of $50,000 is at issue? I may say that there was a good deal of trouble one way and another, but I am not going to refer to any matter except matters of this kind, where he used his office for his own purposes and for those alone. In the city of Winnipeg there was a good deal of trouble about surveys. Surveys had been made there in a hap-hazard kind of way in the early days. But when the city grew to be a great city, comparatively speaking, it was found that many of these surveys were inaccurate. We have in the province of Manitoba a registration system known as the Torrens system, by which the government of the province guarantees absolutely the title of all lands that are bought under that system. In the working of the Torrens office, it was found practically impossible to keep the government straight without having a new survey of the city of Winnipeg. An Act was passed providing for a special survey, and a special survey was made. It was provided that this survey was to take effect only after an Order in Council had been passed. The Order in Council was passed. And because the Lieutenant-Governor was interested in many of these properties where the survey had been irregular, was interested in many claims which must be affected, he deliberately stopped the operation of the Order in Council, and refused to sign it until public opinion became so strong that he was forced to yield. Strong editorials were written in the newspapers, and the town was in a ferment. I may say that in the case of large blocks of property, the titles had been held up, sales had been held back, there had been a great deal of confusion throughout the city on account of this survey. The House will understand what confusion a step of that kind would cause. I wish to say that, if the Lieutenant-Governor had any real grievance, every opportunity was provided in the Act by which he might, like any other citizen, appear before the court provided by the Act—I think it was the Attorney General for the time being—and press his claims and ask that they be adjudicated upon. He had the same right as any other citizen of the country—and in this respect he was no greater than any other—but instead of allowing the steps to be taken which were laid down in the Act which he himself had assented to, he took the unprecedented course of refusing to assent to an Order in Council. But public opinion was aroused, and it was finally announced that a mass meeting would be held to condemn the action of the Lieutenant-Governor. Then he yielded. Now, reference has been made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) to the fact that Orders in Council were not signed by this gentleman. He has gone so far as to say that possibly this legislation originated from that fact. Well, I cannot support him in that, because I think that would be rather a poor reason. As I am to a certain extent responsible for that legislation, I do not rest it upon any such grounds as that; but I do say that it had come to be such a grievance, such a difficulty, with the government, that when the Department of Education Act, which is one of the two Acts of 1890, as to which a remedial order has been promulgated,—when that Act came to be passed, we found it necessary to depart from the usual course, and instead of having it provided that matters to be carried out by the Department of Education, which of course like other departments was a department of the government, being done by Order in Council, we found it necessary to abolish Orders in Council so far as that department was concerned. If hon. gentlemen will look the matter up they will find that in that Act it is not necessary to get the Governor's signature to put into force any order of the executive government, but the orders are made by the Department of Education and go into force at once. I say that to substantiate the statements made by the hon. member for Bothwell, and to show what an outrage it is upon the province of Manitoba. It is bad enough to have to stand this man for five years. In view of what was done in Quebec, and which has been alluded to here, you can understand that it is a very difficult matter to quarrel with a Lieutenant-Governor. A local government are not likely, if they can avoid it, to pick a quarrel with a man who has their political life in his hands; therefore we had to grin and bear these matters and say nothing about them. We were in hopes that when the end of his term came in 1893, he would be promptly replaced, but we have been disappointed in that. It has been suggested that perhaps His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor does not desire to obtain a second term in that office. Well, I have made some suggestions with regard to that, and I may add another. I can say without fear of contradiction that since the 1st day of July, 1893, His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor has been engaged most persistently and most ably too—because, whatever his faults may be, he is a most astute gentleman, a man of great ability,—he has been engaged in one object alone—and I fancy hon. gentlemen opposite could substantiate me if they were quite frank—and that object was to get another term. I may say that right from the first, his appointment was an outrage upon the people of Manitoba. You cannot find in Manitoba more than five or six men out of a population of, perhaps, 190,000 we now claim to have, who have a good word to say for that man. But it was necessary for him to make material to justify the Government in reappointing him to the position, and about a year ago he took advantage of his birthday for that purpose, and sent a young man around the city to get signatures to an address congratulating him upon his birthday. That address was hawked around the city, and although a great many refused to sign, a lot of people found it easier to write their names than to say no. This address was paraded in the newspapers with the object I mention, and that has been the key to His Honour's actions since the 1st July, 1893. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite have had this matter under consideration since that time. There have been two prominent candidates whose names have been freely mentioned as successors to His Honour.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would like to point out to the House the rule of debate in relation to the question before it at the present moment. Any member, I take it, has a right to bring a matter of urgency before the House upon a motion to adjourn the House; but it is the ordinary course in England, and has been the course here, that when a question of that kind has been brought before the House, the debate should be confined to the subject brought under discussion by the member who chooses to take so unusual a course as that of moving the adjournment of the House. I would ask the hon. member, therefore, to endeavour to confine his remarks as closely as he can to the question that has been brought before the House by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy).

Mr. MARTIN. I have no intention of infringing upon the rules of debate. I was under the impression that upon a motion to adjourn we could talk upon almost anything.

Mr. SPEAKER. No, I do not think that is the case. Let me point this out. Upon a motion to adjourn, if the motion is in amendment to a motion before the House, then the discussion must be confined to the question before the House. The course adopted by the hon. member for Simcoe is one which is adopted only upon very urgent occasions. I can remember only two instances since I have been Speaker of this House, in which an adjournment of the House has been moved by an hon. member for the purpose of bringing up a matter of urgency. The custom in England has been that when a matter of that kind is brought before the House, the discussion is confined to the question which is submitted by the hon. member who takes the responsibility of adopting that very unusual course. In the parliamentary debates in England I notice that the Speaker made this observation:

I must point out to the right hon. and gallant gentleman that he is going far beyond the motion of an urgent character which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Chapman) proposed to bring forward.

I may say this further, that whilst the hon. member for Winnipeg was speaking, a considerable portion of his statements with regard to His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor appeared to me to bear upon the question which was under discussion; but I think the hon. member is perhaps now going a little out of the way.

Mr. MARTIN.

Mr. LAURIER. If you will pardon me, Mr. Speaker, I do not at all call into dispute the ruling which you have just laid down; but you will allow me to remind you that the hon. member for Simcoe, when addressing the House a moment ago set forth the impropriety and the danger of the Government allowing a Lieutenant-Governor to remain in office beyond the expiry of his term of office; and the argument which my hon. friend from Winnipeg is now addressing to the House is likewise to show the danger of such a course.

Mr. FOSTER. The subject which the hon. member for Simcoe yesterday gave notice to the House that he would discuss, was the constitutional point involved. It was only by way of a side remark in reference to the Lieutenant-Governor which he gave utterance to in the course of his address; but surely my hon. friend does not intend that because he, by way of a side remark, made allusion to a thing of this kind, the hon. gentleman for Winnipeg may take up a subject entirely foreign, and discuss the character of the Lieutenant-Governor himself, and say what he has been doing for a long time past.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. member for Winnipeg is quite in order. What the hon. member for Simcoe did was simply a matter of courtesy.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman has not stated to the House, and the House has not sufficient information, whether the acts of the Lieutenant-Governor of which the hon. gentleman complains, occurred prior to the expiry of his five years of office, or since that date. The hon. member for Simcoe referred to the fact that the Lieutenant-Governor was retaining his office after the expiration of his five years, but upon that fact he did not base any argument in connection with it.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Simcoe made this argument, so far as I understood him, that His Honour Lieutenant-Governor Schultz, being continued in office without a reappointment, held his position at the will of the Government, and the hon. member for Simcoe argued therefrom that he might be induced to do things that, under other circumstances, he might not do, and to some extent the argument of the hon. member for Winnipeg related to that phase of the case. But I think that in his more recent remarks he has gone beyond that subject.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not intend to go beyond the subject at all. The hon. member for Simcoe brought this matter before the House for the purpose of discussing a question suggested in the public press, as to whether there have been communications between the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba and the Federal Government with regard to his action in a matter that is now before the legislature of Manitoba. It has been suggested in the public press that His Honour Lieutenant-Governor Schultz was ready to use his high office for the purpose of coercion, that he was prepared to go to the extent, if necessary, of dismissing his Ministers and to pursue a line of conduct that would be acceptable to hon. gentlemen sitting on the treasury benches. My remarks have been directed to the history of His Honour's administration in Manitoba, to show that a suggestion of that kind is justified by what he has already done there. I desire now to go further, and to show that a suggestion of that kind, so far as the Dominion Government of the day is concerned, is also justified so far as their action has been connected with this question of filling the vacancy in the Lieutenant-Governorship of Manitoba. I was about to say that, since 1st July, 1893, when this gentleman became a mere servant, removable at the will of hon. gentlemen opposite, the question of filling this vacancy has been most prominent before the people: that all this time Lieutenant-Governor Schultz had been an active candidate for reappointment to the position, that his claims have been interfered with, or, at all events, opposed by other gentlemen who are well known to hon. gentlemen opposite, and who consider, and whose friends consider, they have great claims to the position. The Government have failed to deal with the question, they have left it open. It is, perhaps, from their standpoint, if these suggestions are correct, a fortunate circumstance that they have left the appointment open, and they have a man in office in Manitoba whose history shows him quite capable of doing anything of this kind, whose conduct shows that he is prepared to prostitute his high office for his own personal and selfish ends, and therefore is most likely to be influenced by these considerations that have been suggested, considerations connected with using his office in a certain way to suit hon. gentlemen opposite, so that in return for services rendered they may be induced to reappoint him and give him another term of five years. When we think of the province having suffered seven years, and of the prospect of another term of five years, it really seems justifiable for me to lay some stress on this matter, and endeavour to show how it appears to me and how it appears to the people of Manitoba, as I understand their sentiments and feelings. Mr. Scarth, one of my predecessors in the representation of Winnipeg, has been a prominent applicant—I will not say an applicant, but he is a gentleman whose name has been brought most prominently before the public in this connection. Since 1st July, 1893, it has been announced by the Government press that he has actually been appointed, and that an Order in Council had been passed appointing him to that position. For some reason or other, the appointment was not carried out. Another name brought most prominently before the public in connection with this office is that of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Ross). That hon. member has also been in the fortunate position of having it announced that he had become Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, and I may say that that hon. gentleman went to the extent of making very complete and extensive arrangements for entering into the vice-regal residence, or whatever it may be called, in the city of Winnipeg. For some reason, he was not appointed. I was told not long ago by a very prominent supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite that he interviewed the Minister of the Interior when he came to Winnipeg, and asked him why it was the Government were making such a muddle of this matter, why they did not fill the position, why they did not terminate the present position of affairs, under which there was a Lieutenant-Governor in office who was working for reappointment and hoping for reappointment, while there were two gentlemen who had been prominently mentioned as candidates for the position; and that the answer given by the Minister of the Interior was that the Government did not think it advisable to make an appointment in view of the Winnipeg election, as they desired to have the assistance of both Mr. Ross and Mr. Scarth on that occasion.

Mr. DALY. It is almost unnecessary to give an unqualified denial to that assertion. I never made any such statement to any one.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not care whether it is true or not.

Mr. DALY. It is on a par with your usual statements.

Mr. MARTIN. That may be. So far as I am concerned, it is true. This gentleman, a prominent supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite, told me so. Whether he was telling the truth, and whether the hon. Minister of the Interior did or did not make the statement, I do not care; I put it forward as showing the state of public opinion there, and in order to show this House that I am justified in saying this matter has become a public scandal. When hon. gentlemen use high positions like that of Lieutenant-Governor for the purpose of controlling a few votes in Winnipeg at an election, when hon. gentlemen at the time had a majority in this House of 63, surely I am justified in saying that they are dallying with the question. They resolved to make an appointment, they allowed their press to announce from time to time that this gentleman or that gentleman had been appointed, that Mr. Scarth, for example, had been appointed, and some months later that the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Ross) had been appointed. It has been suggested that that gentle-lost his chance on account of having been the first person to welcome Hon. Mr. Laurier to Manitoba last fall. Now we have a new announcement. I may say I was disappointed that the leader of the House, when he made his explanations as to the changes in the Ministry, and announced that the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Patterson) had left the Government, did not tell the House whether it was true or not that that gentleman was going to fill the vacancy in the Lieutenant-Governorship of Manitoba. But we have had it put forward that the late Minister of Militia, who has gone to California, will, on his return, be appointed to fill the vacant position. At all events, we are now here considering a matter of grave importance, taking into account all these matters which I have stated, and which are true from my own personal knowledge. When these matters occurred I was a member of the Government of Manitoba, and I know of what I am speaking. Taking all these matters into consideration, the province of Manitoba has been most apprehensive for the last two or three weeks as to what would be done in regard to the local government, and I may say the local government have been most apprehensive, so far as I have been able to learn, as to what may occur in a conspiracy which is alleged to have been carried on, to the extent I have indicated, between the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba and the Government of the day. The conspiracy which the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) illustrates has, at any rate, got that far that the Lieutenant-Governor has gone to the Clerk of this House, who is suggested as a constitutional authority. Well, I do not know whether he is a constitutional authority or not. For my part, I will take the opinion on a constitutional question of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) ten times, yes, a hundred times over, before I would take the opinion of the Clerk of this House. But the hon. gentlemen opposite suggest that he is a great constitutional authority. He is an official of this House. It is attempted now to use that opinion of his which was given to this Lieutenant-Governor, possessed of those fine instincts of honour which I have endeavoured to show you, and which opinion of the Clerk of this House was, it is said, given him in a private and confidential way, and given to him for the purpose of informing himself for which purpose I suppose he had a right to get it. I suppose he had a right to have some information for his own guidance, but, at any rate, he got this great constitutional opinion in the belief that it was to be kept private. This opinion was then put forward, not by the Clerk of the House, but by the Government of the day, by the Premier of the Dominion, and it was put forward for what purpose? Was it for some non-partisan purpose, as stated by the hon. the Finance Minister? I would like to ask the Finance Minister if the Manitoba school question is not a party question? I would like to ask the hon. the Finance Minister if there is a question in the country to-day upon which there is more feeling, more diversified ideas, and one in which the country is more interested than the Manitoba school question?

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) one question, which will be an answer to his question. If it is a party question, on which side of it is his party?

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MARTIN. I notice, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. the leader of the House who asked me a question just as 6 o'clock was announced, is not in his place. However, I may say, in answer to the hon. gentleman's question, that he seems to think that the Opposition in this House should govern the country.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Oh, everybody thinks that now.

Mr. MARTIN. I am quite convinced that the country thinks that also, and is only waiting an opportunity to so declare. I would say to the Finance Minister that when that time comes, the policy of the Government of the country will be announced by the present leader of the Opposition, but, until that time comes, however reluctant the Ministry may be to announce their policy in connection with these matters, the Opposition will find it their privilege and their duty to wait until the Government has announced its policy before declaring theirs. When the Government have something to announce to the House and the country, they will find the Opposition prepared to deal with them. I understood the hon. the Finance Minister to admit that the Premier had furnished this letter of Dr. Bourinot to the newspapers, and I understood him to say that the Premier had received this letter from the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba. I also understood that it was admitted, as suggested by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), that the letter had been written for Dr. Schultz's personal and private information, and not for publication. Now, I have in my hand, the report of an interview with His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, in which is set forth a very different state of facts from that announced by the leader of the House. In order to anticipate objections from hon. gentlemen, I may say that I do not take this interview from those ill-informed newspapers which have been subjected to so much criticism from Ministers of the Crown, such as the "Mail and Empire," Toronto, and the "Gazette," of Montreal, and other leading Conservative papers which hon. gentlemen opposite say are very ill-informed as to public matters; but I take this interview from a substantial and reliable authority, and one which will certainly not be disputed on this side of the House, and probably not on the other. I refer to the "Toronto Globe." The "Globe," in its Winnipeg correspondence, has the following:—

Lieutenant-Governor Schultz was seen by a reporter of the "Tribune" in reference to the report that the opinion of Dr. Bourinot was a private one, and not given for publication. His Honour said that the idea that the document was got purely for personal perusal was erroneous.

While in Ottawa, continued His Honour, I occupied some of my time in going over constitutional works in the Library, and in obtaining this opinion from what I consider an impartial source. I did not send this opinion to any Eastern newspapers, and it was given to the papers here simply as it referred to an important matter affecting the public generally. I believe that in this matter the public should have the opinion of the ablest and best qualified men, and should be able to act on the matter with the fullest possible knowledge. When interviewed on my return home as to my own opinions, I refused entirely to give them, but offered to allow any of the newspaper men who wished to do so, full access to such authorities as I possessed, which were various constitutional works in my library, and the opinion given to me, at my solicitation by Dr. Bourinot. The Dominion Government had nothing whatever to do with obtaining Dr. Bourinot's opinion, and did not know—from me, at least—that I had obtained it; nor did they know of my intention to allow the press to have access to the views expressed by Dr. Bourinot, not only in his books, but in the letter as well.

Now, there is a flat contradiction of the statement on behalf of the Premier by the leader of the House. It is perfectly clear that the First Minister obtained that letter either from Lieutenant-Governor Schultz or from Dr. Bourinot. I understand the hon. leader of the House to say that the Premier obtained it from Lieutenant-Governor Schultz. Lieutenant-Governor Schultz in this interview gives that statement a most explicit contradiction. Now the Premier must have obtained the letter either from the one source or the other. If he obtained it from Dr. Bourinot, then the letter must have been written for the purpose of publication, unless it was handed to the Premier by Dr. Bourinot confidentially, and not for publication. If this was the case, then the Premier violated his trust in that respect, and we cannot suppose that that was the case. If Dr. Bourinot did communicate that letter to the Premier for the purpose of having it published, then we must take for granted that it was written for that purpose; and if it was written for that purpose, it was a gross act of impropriety on the part of the Clerk of this House, and one that this House should resent. On the other hand, if the statement made by the hon. leader of the House is correct, that the letter was received by the Premier from the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, then I say that everything that has been said with regard to the probable existence of a conspiracy in connection with this matter, of an attempt by the Government to interfere with Manitoba in its duties and its rights through the Lieutenant-Governor taking advantage of his position, is justified. Now, I have endeavoured to show the probability of the suspicion that this conspiracy exists, by drawing the attention of the House to the manner in which Dr. Schultz has discharged the duties of the office he holds. We can say with pride that it has been demonstrated in Canada on many occasions that it is possible for gentlemen, whether connected with one political party or the other, to be active and strong partisans, and yet, after having accepted the position of Lieutenant-Governor, to discharge the duties of that position in a constitutional manner with a government of the opposite political party in power. If a suggestion of this kind were made with regard to many gentlemen who have filled, or who are to-day filling the office of Lieutenant-Governor in Canada, it would be scouted at once. For instance, it would never be suggested that the hon. gentleman now holding the position of Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, strong and active partisan as he was in this House, would lend himself to any such business as this. But when we find a gentleman having the idea of the duties of the position evidently held by Dr. Schultz, from the way in which he has discharged those duties, then there is every reason to believe, as I do believe, that he has been approached to interfere in this matter, in order to induce the Government of Manitoba to take such a course as would relieve hon. gentlemen opposite from the many difficulties in which they find themselves placed in regard to this question. A gentleman who would prostitute his high office for his own personal ends in order to save a few hundred dollars of taxes here or a few hundred dollars there, would certainly lend himself to any such understanding as that, if it were to result in his retaining his office for another period of five years. I regret very much indeed that it should be possible for any member of this House to stand up, as I have done to-day, and make the statements which I have made—which cannot be contradicted, which I know personally to be true, as to which there is a record, at any rate with regard to his refusal to assent to the Bill I have referred to, while the other is a well known matter of public notoriety in the city from which I come. I say it is a shame and a disgrace. The whole conduct of the Government in connection with this Manitoba question has been quite in accordance with the latest phase of it—the attempt to prostitute the power they possess to fill the office of Lieutenant-Governor, for the purpose which has been described—the attempt to use a willing tool like the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba to help them out of the difficulties in which they find themselves.

Mr. DALY. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the last speaker got away considerably from the question that was raised by the hon. member for North Simcoe when he moved the adjournment of the House this afternoon. I understood that the charge made by that hon. member was that the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba had been guilty of an indiscretion, if not something worse, in giving to the newspapers for publication an opinion which he had got from the Clerk of this House; and I presume that we are to infer from the remarks made by the hon. member for North Simcoe and those made by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), that the Clerk of this House is to be censured for having given that opinion. Now, in the first place, the hon. member for North Simcoe admitted that the Lieutenant-Governor had a perfect right to get this opinion from Dr. Bourinot, or to seek advice on the question from any person he chose. That being admitted, there is no necessity any longer to dwell on the right of the Lieutenant-Governor to obtain that opinion. In the second place, if he had, as admitted, the right to get that opinion, had he the right to get it from the Clerk of the House? and had the Clerk of the House the right to give that opinion? Sir, I do not think that anything has been advanced on the other side of the House or by the hon. member for North Simcoe to show that the Clerk of the House was not perfectly within his right in giving that opinion. On this matter we have precedents. We know that the Clerk of the House to-day is looked upon, and I think justly so, as the leading constitutional authority in Canada. He takes the place to-day of Mr. Todd, our late librarian, who contributed so ably to our literature on parliamentary government in England and in Canada; and it is in the recollection of hon. gentlemen who were in the House at the time, that it was not considered out of the way for Mr. Todd to give opinions, not simply to Lieutenant-Governors of provinces, but to Governors General of Canada. As a matter of fact, he gave opinions to Lord Dufferin during the discussions on the Pacific Scandal and to Lord Lorne during the discussion on the Letellier question. I do not think that any exception was taken by any member of this House to Mr. Todd as an officer of this Parliament in giving those opinions, and I have heard nothing to-day during this debate that would justify any one in coming to the conclusion that Dr. Bourinot was not within his clear right in giving this opinion.

Mr. MARTIN.

Now, it seems to me that, as stated by my hon. colleague, the Minister of Finance, this thing is a tempest in a teapot. I presume that if Mr. Bourinot's opinion had been in accord with that of the hon. member for North Simcoe, we would have heard nothing about it. But that hon. gentleman has made this matter of the Manitoba schools the one subject of his thoughts, the one subject that engrosses his ideas, and he cannot brook any difference of opinion to his own. He must not, however, run away with the idea that he is the only one in Canada that has opinions on this question. He must not imagine that he is the only lawyer in Canada who is competent to give an opinion on it. I have not the slightest doubt that the opinion of Dr. Bourinot was obtained by the Lieutenant-Governor, not for his own guidance particularly, but for the purpose of guiding both himself and his advisers, and in this he was perfectly justified. I wish to emphasize this fact, that it is not on record in this discussion that the Lieutenant-Governor did not first submit that opinion to his advisers before making it public. Before the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) make a charge of this nature, they should provide themselves with indubitable evidence to prove that Mr. Greenway and his colleagues were not made aware of the opinion by the Lieutenant-Governor before its publication. I believe that I am stating what is correct when I say that Mr. Greenway was made aware of that opinion by the Lieutenant-Governor days before it was given to the press. That being the case, had the Lieutenant-Governor not the right to make it public? What harm could its publication have done his government if they knew all about it beforehand? More than that, if the publication was made, as stated by the leader of the House, through the instrumentality of the First Minister, it must be established that the First Minister had not the permission of the Lieutenant-Governor before a charge can be made that there was any conspiracy. Where is there any evidence of conspiracy? What wrong has been done the Manitoba Government? Before any substantial charge can be made against the Lieutenant-Governor, proof must be made that his advisers were not aware of what he was doing in this matter. I am perfectly satisfied that Mr. Greenway was fully aware of that opinion before it was published.

Mr. MULOCK. How would that effect the Government's conduct? You are pleading that as an excuse.

Mr. DALY. Not at all. I do not think that the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, in seeking the advice of Dr. Bourinot, and in giving Dr. Bourinot's opinion to his advisers, was guilty of any wrong. It is admitted that the Lieutenant-Governor has the right to seek advice outside his advisers, and the only people who have a right to complain in this matter are his advisers. Is there anything before the House to show that Mr. Greenway, or Mr. Sifton, or any other member of the Manitoba Cabinet has any complaint to make of the action of the Lieutenant-Governor? Not the slightest. Hon. gentlemen opposite have dealt entirely in generalities. After the Lieutenant-Governor got that opinion, what was his duty? No doubt it was to lay it before his advisers, and I believe he did that. The hon. member for Simcoe went entirely on newspaper comments. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) read an extract, a short time ago, from the "Globe" giving what purported to be an interview between the Lieutenant-Governor and the correspondent of the "Globe" in Winnipeg. Are we to take for gospel all that appears in the papers? Are we to believe that the correspondent of the Montreal "Herald"—that being the paper, I presume, from which the hon. member for North Simcoe quoted this afternoon—had the knowledge on which he could base his statement that the First Minister of this Dominion and the Lieutenant-Governor for Manitoba were conspiring together? No, Sir. One cannot place reliance on newspaper correspondents, particularly on matters of this kind, especially newspapers anxious to make political capital against the Government. We must have the facts before we can arrive at any proper conclusion, and I fail to see that a single fact has been adduced, or an argument based upon facts advanced, that would substantiate the charges made by the hon. member for North Simcoe this afternoon. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman was not so thin-skinned a few weeks ago with reference to the duties of public officers in matters of this kind. He charges the Lieutenant-Governor to-day with a grave indiscretion. Was the hon. gentleman himself so careful of constitutional rights and privileges, and so particular with regard to the conduct of constitutional advisers, a few weeks ago? It is in the recollection of the House that the hon. member for North Simcoe was quite willing—aye, was even the means of taking over into Haldimand the Attorney General of Manitoba, and one of the constitutional advisers of the Lieutenant-Governor, and under what particular circumstances? In addressing the House the other day, the hon. member for North Simcoe gave the House to understand that the legislature of Manitoba was not adjourned for the purpose of considering the situation.

Mr. McCARTHY. Order. The hon. gentleman has no business to refer to a previous debate.

Mr. DALY. The impression has gone abroad—I have read it in the newspapers—that the hon. member for North Simcoe said that the reason the Manitoba Legislature adjourned was because the majority of the members were farmers and it was advisable that they should have the opportunity of putting in their seed and doing other farm work. That statement appeared in the newspapers as having been made by the hon. gentleman, but we have on record the reasons given by Mr. Greenway for adjourning the legislature, and this is what he said:

The receipt of a message from the Lieutenant-Governor with a copy of the remedial order made by the Governor in Council, has raised constitutional questions exceeding in gravity and importance any constitutional question that has heretofore arisen in any legislature of Canada since confederation. These questions affect, not only Manitoba but every province in the Dominion. In view of these facts, the Government have decided to ask the House to-morrow to adjourn until the 9th May, for six weeks, in order that ample time may be given for full consideration of the matter.

The House was adjourned, not for the purpose of giving the members an opportunity to go to their farms and plant their seed, but in order that the Government might have time to fully consider the remedial order.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman is completely out of order. The rule is not to refer to a previous debate.

Mr. DALY. I was not referring to a previous debate.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman is merely quoting from the newspapers, but the effect is the same.

Mr. SPEAKER. The rule is that a member cannot indirectly make reference to what it would be out of order to refer to directly.

Mr. DALY. I have just stated to the House the reasons which Mr. Greenway gave for the adjournment of the legislature, and those are the true reasons. Attorney General Sifton came down to Ontario for the purpose of consulting eminent counsel in order that he might advise the Lieutenant-Governor and his colleagues. What did he do? He arrived at Toronto, ostensibly for the purpose of seeking legal advice. Then, whether at the solicitation of the hon. member for North Simcoe or not I do not know, he went to Haldimand, took an active part in the election, took a strong stand on this question, addressed public meetings throughout the length and breadth of the riding, and although as an adviser of the Lieutenant-Governor he was sworn to keep inviolable the secrets of that Cabinet, we find him telling the people of Haldimand that the Manitoba Legislature would refuse to act upon the remedial order.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is what the Manitoba Legislature would do a secret of the Council?

Mr. DALY. He spoke of what the Manitoba Government, no doubt, would advise the legislature to do. Well, the Attorney General of Manitoba, Mr. Sifton, went from one end of the riding of Haldimand to the other declaring not only what the Manitoba Legislature would or would not do, but what his opinion was on the question. And he gave it as his opinion of what should be done, and of what action the Manitoba Government would take, that they would not recede from the position they had taken. That conduct of Mr. Attorney General Sifton is much more entitled to condemnation at the hands of the Canadian people than the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor. The member for Winnipeg was not content to address himself to the question before the House, but went far afield in his discussion. That hon. gentleman, Sir, sought to make a most cowardly and contemptuous attack upon the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba. The hon. gentleman stated facts in this House that he had no right to state, because, as he himself said, he could speak with authority upon the matters he discussed, because, at that time, he was a member of the Government of Manitoba. I presume that when the hon. gentleman took office he took an oath of office, and that in that oath of office he swore to keep secret all things that took place between himself and his colleagues as advisers of the Lieutenant-Governor; and he must have violated that oath this afternoon, because he could not otherwise have disclosed the facts he did. He does not seem to realize the position he occupied as adviser of the Lieutenant-Governor for the few short years he was there. I think it would be well to give the hon. gentleman an idea of how the constitutional authorities look upon a matter of that kind. I quote from Todd :

The obligation of keeping the King's counsel inviolably secret is one that rests upon all Cabinet Ministers and other responsible advisers of the Crown, by virtue of the oath which they take when they are made members of the Privy Council.

As has been already observed, this secrecy is not a mere personal privilege or protection, either to the Sovereign or to the Minister, that may be waived by mutual consent; but is based upon constitutional principle and state policy, it being of the first importance that there should be entire freedom and immunity in the confidential intercourse between the Crown and its immediate advisers, and that nothing which has passed in Council should be afterwards disclosed, so long as public injury might ensue from differences of opinion being known.

Moreover, nothing that has passed between the Sovereign and his Ministers, in their confidential relations with each other, may be disclosed to any other person, or to either House of Parliament, without the express permission of the Sovereign.

And this permission would only be accorded for purposes of state, as to enable a Minister to explain and justify to Parliament his political conduct. It would not be granted for the purpose of enabling Parliament to scrutinize the motives of a political act which was not itself impeachable on public grounds.

Neither would it be given with a view to subject the secret counsels of the Crown to the review of an ordinary legal tribunal.

The necessity for obtaining leave from the Crown to divulge past proceedings or communications between the Sovereign and his confidential servants, applies with equal force to actual Ministers and to those who have ceased to take part in the royal councils.

That shows that the obligations of secrecy does not apply only to the men who are immediately advisers of the Crown, but to men who have ceased to be advisers of the Crown. And the charges the hon. gentleman has made against the Lieutenant-Governor are made in relation to matters that he is seized of as an adviser of Her Majesty, represented by the Lieutenant-Governor, and he has violated his oath of office—

Mr. MARTIN. Will the hon. gentleman point out what Cabinet secret I disclosed?

Mr. DALY. The fact that the Lieutenant-Governor withheld his name from an Order in Council. No person would know that if the hon. gentleman had kept his oath inviolate. No person would be aware of that fact if the hon. gentleman and his colleagues had not violated their oaths of office. I was astonished, and I think the House was astonished that any hon. member should descend to such low tactics as those that were used by the hon. member from Winnipeg in making the attack he did upon the Lieutenant-Governor. Why, Sir, if he had the feelings he expresses towards the Lieutenant-Governor, and was in a position to prove his charges, why did he not, while a member of the Cabinet, and one of Dr. Schultz's advisers, make these charges to the Governor General, as he had a right to do. It seems extraordinary that for four long years after the hon. gentleman has ceased to be a member of the Cabinet, for five long years after the acts he speaks of took place, he never makes a charge. He admitted that he would have made the charges last session had not he thought that Dr. Schultz would soon cease to be Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba. That discloses the fact that the hon. gentleman has kept these charges within his own bosom, ready to make an attack upon Dr. Schultz at the first opportunity that should arise. And he makes that attack under shelter of his position in this House. Why did he not make this attack while he was one of the advisers of the Lieutenant-Governor, and a member of the legislature of Manitoba? I do not think that the oldest member of this House ever witnessed such an incident as that presented in this House this afternoon. This attack is upon a par with the tactics pursued in other matters by hon.

gentlemen opposite. We had the hon. gentleman's colleague from L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) last year attacking the judges; and to-day we have the hon. member for Winnipeg attacking the Lieutenant-Governors. If these hon. gentlemen remain much longer in the cold shades of Opposition—as I am afraid they are doomed to do, as I believe that every such action of theirs as this of to-day drives a nail in their coffin—we shall probably find them making an attack on the Governor General himself on the line pursued by the hon. member for L'Islet last year, and by the hon. member for Winnipeg this year. Why, Sir, it is a most extraordinary thing that of all the men in Manitoba an attack upon the political position of the Lieutenant-Governor should come from the hon. member for Winnipeg. If there is any person who has a political record in the province of Manitoba it is that gentleman. He states that the Lieutenant-Governor declined to assent to certain legislation. Did he withhold his assent from the Act relating to the Union Square of Portage la Prairie?

Mr. MARTIN. No. I am not aware that there was any legislation in regard to Union Square.

Mr. DALY. We will produce the Act to show that there was. Will the hon. gentleman say that anything done by Dr. Schultz, in his capacity of Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba was in violation of the position he held? Will he say that any action that he attacked, any action that he disclosed, was not clearly within the constitutional authority of the Lieutenant-Governor? One would be led to understand from the arguments by the hon. member from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and by the sentiments expressed by gentlemen opposite, that the Governor General in Council has nothing to do with the Lieutenant-Governor. But it is laid down as a principle that the connection between the Lieutenant-Governor and the Governor General and his advisers here should be of the nearest possible kind, that their relationship should be such that if the Lieutenant-Governor of a province wishes to get advice from the Governor General in Council as to matters coming before him he should be free to do so.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman say that the Lieutenant-Governor has a right to seek this advice upon matters within the exclusive jurisdiction of the province?

Mr. DALY. I was coming to that point. This is a matter of mixed jurisdiction that we are now discussing, and I think it comes clearly within the principle I shall attempt to lay down, namely, if the Lieutenant-Governor sought advice of the Governor General in this case—I am not stating that in this case he did so and I do not think he did, but I say if he desired to do so—he was perfectly within constitutional lines.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I understood him not to speak with respect to this particular question in his argument, but with regard to the relation which generally exists between Lieutenant-Governors and the Government here.

Mr. DALY. The trouble is the hon. gentleman did not give me time to finish, or I would have reached that. Now, it is laid down in Todd on Parliamentary Government in the British Colonies, at page 598:

Let us now inquire into the extent to which these Lieutenant-Governors are more immediately responsible to the Governor General in Council, and into the duty which properly devolves upon the central government in any group of confederated colonies to exercise towards the subordinate provinces the degree of constitutional oversight and control which the Imperial executive maintains over the whole empire.

Such supervision in Canada would, as we have seen, sometimes necessitate a direct interference with the proceedings of the provincial authorities, and the disallowing of Acts wherein they had transgressed the assigned limits of their powers, or had sought to give effect to principles which were inimical to the interests of sister provinces or of the confederation generally.

But in addition to the control which, under these circumstances, would be appropriately fulfilled by the central government, there is a further duty which the existing relation between a central and a subordinate government obviously entails upon the former. Having been constitutionally empowered to represent towards subordinate provinces, associated together in confederation, the supreme authority of the Crown, and to act towards them in that behalf, the central government should be prepared to afford to the several subordinate governments the benefit of its interposition and advice on all matters, whether of administration or of legislation, wherein the same could be advantageously rendered.

The extent to which such interference would be justifiable must, however, altogether depend upon the degree of self-government accorded by the sovereign power to the particular provinces. There could be no interference beyond these limits without an undue encroachment upon the confederation compact. But, even where direct and authoritative interposition would be objectionable or undesirable, the paternal position occupied by the central executive towards the provincial governments would naturally suggest the propriety of intervening by advice or remonstrance, whenever it might appear that the mature, experienced and impartial counsels of the supreme government would be helpful.

Now, I think that quotation maintains the position I took, namely, that in a matter, for instance, such as that under discussion now, if the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba sought—I do not say that he did so, I do not know that he did so—but if he sought the advice of the Government here, he was clearly within constitutional lines. The gravamen of the offence charged against the Lieutenant-Governor is that he sought extraneous advice. Now, his advisers, no doubt, could have got legal advice upon this question, and no doubt would lay that before the Lieutenant-Governor; and if he, in a matter of such moment, saw fit to get other advice, surely he had a perfect right to do so, and having got the advice which he did from Dr. Bourinot, and having laid it before his advisers in Winnipeg, Mr. Greenway and his colleagues, I say after he had done that, he had a perfect right to do what he liked with the advice that he got from Dr. Bourinot. Now, do I understand the hon. gentleman to lay down the principle that the Clerk of this House has no right to give constitutional advice upon constitutional questions to the Lieutenant-Governors, or to any one else? I do not think so. I think it is to be admitted, in the first place, that the Lieutenant-Governor has a right to seek advice; and in the second place, that he has a right to get that advice from the Clerk of the House, or from any person else whom he chooses; and those facts being admitted, what is the charge that is now made against the Lieutenant-Governor? Simply that he published the advice that was given to him by Dr. Bourinot. Had he not the right to do so? If he had not the right to do so, will hon. gentlemen state why he had not that right? Will hon. gentlemen state wherein he did anything wrong, that was unconstitutional, in giving the opinion of Dr. Bourinot for publication? Will they say wherein his advisers have been wronged? Will they say wherein the people or the legislature of Manitoba have been wronged in connection with this matter? I have failed to be convinced up to this moment, by any statements or arguments made by hon. gentlemen opposite, that the charges made by the hon. member for North Simcoe have been sustained. Sir, I regret very much, indeed, that the hon. member for Winnipeg should have taken the opportunity to make the outrageous attack that he did upon Dr. Schultz's character. I come back to the remarks that were made by the hon. gentleman, because I am reminded of the fact that in his speech he said, amongst other things, that Dr. Schultz had some person peddling around the city of Winnipeg last year an address congratulating him upon arriving at a certain birthday. Well, Sir, I have seen that address published in the papers. I do not know how that address was secured, but when I tell the House that upon that address were the names of Archbishop Taché, of the Archbishop of Rupert's Land, of the Chief Justice of Manitoba, of all the leading men in the city of Winnipeg of all denominations—

Mr. MARTIN. Does the hon. gentleman say of all the leading men in the city of Winnipeg?

Mr. DALY. Of course I omitted the hon. gentleman's name.

Mr. MARTIN. And you omitted a great many more.

Mr. DALY.

Mr. DALY. No doubt; I am not stating the omissions, I am stating the names of the men that were upon that address to Lieutenant-Governor Schultz congratulating him upon his 50th or 60th birthday, I forget which. Sir, if Dr. Schultz, the Lieutenant-Governor, was a man of the character the hon. gentleman would lead this House and this country to believe, by the remarks he made this afternoon, how is it that men of the character and standing of those I have mentioned, like the Archbishop of St. Boniface, and the Archbishop of Rupert's Land, and others who have lived there for 25 years, and know all about the Lieutenant-Governor, and know all about his character and his conduct—how is it, I say, that we find the names of such men appended to that address? All I have to say is that I think the hon. member for Winnipeg will live a good many years in the city of Winnipeg before he will get even one of those names upon any address congratulating him. I say his attack this afternoon was of a most cowardly nature. I must say it was an edifying spectacle when the hon. member for North Simcoe, who made the motion to adjourn this House, gave the hon. member for Winnipeg an opportunity to get rid of the Billingsgate he got rid of this afternoon. I am satisfied that where Dr. Schultz is known, and where the hon. gentleman is known in the city of Winnipeg, there will be but one opinion as to the feeling of the majority of the people of Manitoba. If he had been a man, if he had desired to make a manly attack against Dr. Schultz, the opportunity was given to him, as I have said before, while he was a member of his government and a member of the legislature of Manitoba. It is an extraordinary thing that, although that hon. gentleman had the feeling towards Lieutenant-Governor Schultz that he has indicated this afternoon, he still remained a member of that government, he still remained one of his advisers. If he had entertained that feeling towards Dr. Schultz, it was his clear duty to have resigned, and to have got out of the government; and if he did not wish to do that, then it was his clear duty to have made charges to the Governor General in Council against Dr. Schultz in order that they might be investigated. But he waits four or five years, after he ceased to be a member of the government, and seizes an opportunity when, behind his rights as a member of this Parliament, he can get up and make a dastardly attack upon Dr. Schultz.

Mr. CASEY. I must rise to a point of order. This thing is going a little too far. We have heard an hon. member of this House charged with violating his oath, with being cowardly, with being dastardly, and so on. The last word used, I think, was dastardly. There have been insinuations against the character of that hon. gentleman, and I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to rule, as you have always hitherto ruled, that such language is entirely out of order and must be retracted at once.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think it would be well if the hon. Minister of the Interior would withdraw the word used.

Mr. CASEY. I ask your ruling that it shall be withdrawn.

Mr. DALY. Is it the word "dastardly?"

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. LISTER. If the hon. member for Winnipeg had to follow you, you would not use that word.

Mr. DALY. If necessary, I will withdraw the word "dastardly," and I will use the word "contemptible." Is that unparliamentary? All I can say is that I cannot find language strong enough that is parliamentary in which to say what I would like to say of the hon. gentleman's conduct this afternoon. Now, as to the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), I want him to understand that I am not made of the cowardly material he is.

Mr. CASEY. Order.

Mr. DALY. That I am not the bully he is.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman will please keep his temper. These allegations have a tendency to arouse feelings which, I think, had better not be aroused.

Mr. DALY. Of course this thing, I suppose, is one-sided.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Withdraw.

Mr. DALY. Certainly, I have withdrawn. When the hon. gentleman threw insinuations across this House, I attempted to answer them, and if I have used unparliamentary language, I apologize to you, Sir, for having done so. But I say that the statement made by the hon. member for Lambton justified the language I used towards him, and I want to say to that hon. gentleman that it makes no difference whether the hon. member for Winnipeg follows me or not, I am ready to meet that hon. gentleman upon any platform before our own electors, and I hope to meet him again. I do not fear to meet him either on the floor of this House or on any platform, nor do I fear to meet the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister).

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to ask the Minister of the Interior if his departmental duties are likely, within the near future, to allow him time to accept the challenge I offered him last session?

Mr. DALY. Not during the sitting of this House, but no doubt such an opportunity will come in the near future; I fancy it will come all too soon for the hon. gentleman, and probably we shall not see him within the precincts of this House again. However, we are getting away from the subject under discussion. I was justified in everything I said, except the unparliamentary language, which I had withdrawn, with respect to the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), and there were hon. gentlemen opposite who hung their heads from shame when he made the attack on Lieutenant-Governor Schultz. The House of Commons has never, at all events, in my experience, and I am sure in the experience of the older members, listened to anything in the nature of such an attack as was made on Lieutenant-Governor Schultz this afternoon. I hope that Lieutenant-Governor Schultz may be given that health and strength to enable him to meet the hon. gentleman on the platform, or in this House, if he should again become a member, and no doubt, because he does not require any defence on my part, when he measures swords with the hon. member for Winnipeg, he will be able to give him a Roland for his Oliver.

Mr. FRASER. It is most edifying to see how a privy councillor conducts himself. I am sorry there are not some English statesmen here to see how one of Her Majesty's Ministers can answer the statement made by an hon. member, and discuss a question of such momentous importance as this now under consideration. Truly, I had hoped that with advancing years and the companionship of such able co-privy councillors as the hon. gentleman now enjoys, he would have learned something. But he appears to have fallen back to his old position, and does not understand what the proper rules of debate are, and what is expected from him. I regret it because even in the heat of debate a privy councillor, with the dignity that becomes his office, should discuss public questions in a different way. It was a spectacle to see the hon. gentleman, on three successive occasions, called to withdraw expressions unbecoming, not only a privy councillor, but a member of this House. I took it for granted that perhaps the training he has received from members of the Cabinet, for example, the Minister of Railways, who, I am sure, would not offend in that respect, would have enabled him the better and that he would have not so far forgotten himself, because it was evident that the hon. gentleman thought he was addressing an assembly outside the precincts of the House of Parliament. For what, after all, is this discussion? What have we to do with these matters as regards the real question raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg, whether the Governor of Manitoba is the man he should be, and therefore this privy councillor should have remembered that in making the attack he did he was going far afield.

Mr. DALY. Who started it?

Mr. FRASER. Even if this discussion had been started before the hon. gentleman spoke, that does not furnish him with an answer or defence of his unparliamentary conduct. That is the way a privy councillor answers—that because some member made these statements, therefore, a privy councillor was justified in being unparliamentary. This is a strange doctrine to be laid down by a member of the Government. But even in view of all the hon. gentleman said, of all he could say, of all he attempted to say, and which he had to withdraw, in regard to the hon. member for Winnipeg, what has that to do with the question? I know nothing of the character of the hon. member for Winnipeg—I am not here to say a word respecting it, for that hon. gentleman is able to take his own part. There was nothing said, however, about the character of the Lieutenant-Governor, except as regards his official acts, which had become so public that a public meeting had to be called. Surely that was a matter for discussion in this House. Was reference to that matter wrong? There was nothing, I repeat, said about the private character of Lieutenant-Governor Schultz. Has the conduct of Mr. Sifton anything to do with the action of the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. FRASER. Then if a man acts wrongly—and I am now admitting, for the sake of argument that he acted wrongly—that is supposed to be an answer to a charge made against the Lieutenant-Governor?

Mr. DALY. It is a matter of argument; it is a question of parallels.

Mr. FRASER. Ten thousand wrongs do not make a right, and you have to investigate all the circumstances. Since this discussion opened, I have seen that there are more important issues involved than appeared to be the case when it opened. The statements have been so clearly made that it is evident we have now come to a point when no hon. member regrets that the matter has been brought up. Fancy Her Majesty the Queen, who, in my estimation, holds no position higher than the Governor of a province, within his authority, going to Mr. Todd, or Sir Erskine May, and getting an opinion on any matter before consulting the Government of England, and publishing it to the world. Hon. members laugh, as well they may. But is there any difference in the two cases? Or, supposing—and this is a point lost sight of by hon. gentlemen who have taken part in this discussion—that this question might involve a conflict between two Governments, what right had Lieutenant-Governor Schultz to get that opinion? Again, supposing the Governor General was in Winnipeg, and there was a gentleman acting as Clerk of the Manitoba Legislature of equal ability to the Clerk of this House, and he obtained an opinion from the Clerk of the legislature and published it to the world. What would be thought of that action? And yet would he not have just as good a right to do so as had the Governor of Manitoba to obtain an opinion from the Clerk of this House and publish it to the world? I admit that the Governor can go anywhere to get information; but he has no right to get information and make it public. There would be no end to such proceedings. We are going far away not only from the traditions of the mother land, but even from the traditions of this country as regards the actions of a Lieutenant-Governor. Why, I would be astonished had such a case happened in a county council, and the warden obtained an opinion under such circumstances and gave it out for publication. But that is not the worst of the matter. From the statements that have been made, and which I hold to be correct, there have been wrong acts done that have not yet been revealed, because, as the hon. member for Winnipeg put it, either the Lieutenant-Governor for Manitoba must have given that opinion to the press or the Clerk of the House must have done so. The question has resolved itself down to that. If, to-morrow, the Governor of Manitoba denies this, then this statement of the case will not be correct, but, so far as the case stands now, there is only one or other alternative open. Now, I submit that whatever opinions the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba got should have been put in his own pocket. What right has he to parade opinions received by him as to his duties as Lieutenant-Governor?

Mr. MULLOCK. It was done to affect public opinion.

Mr. FRASER. Then, if that be the case, in place of moving the adjournment of this debate, the resolution of this House should have been a demand for his immediate dismissal. What right has he to concern himself with public opinion? Public opinions may be against the actions of the Governor, what is that to him? It may be in his favour, but what is that to him? He has the plain duty to perform of consulting with his advisers and acting on their opinion. While the Governor of Manitoba should be censured by all right-thinking men for his action in this matter, I think there is some little apology to be made for the Premier. I am bound to say that, because the Premier was in a bad position. He needed advice; the dear knows, he needed advice, with a Cabinet such as he has. What was the Premier to do? His Minister of Justice, was indisposed, and I presume the Minister of Justice was 'functus officio,' anyway, because he has decided the case before. The Solicitor General, though an expert and an authority on old ballads, was not considered a lawyer of such standing as to give him an opinion; so what was the Premier to do? Why, he had recourse at once to the Clerk of the House, directly or indirectly as the case may be, but that does not alter the question very much. I am sure that if the Premier had been here this afternoon, and if this discussion had taken place before the letter had been made public, he never would have gone for advice beyond his Minister of the Interior. Evidently, up to this day the Premier has not appreciated that opinion sufficiently. We ought to speak more tenderly of the Premier because his position was critical; he needed information and he went to a source from which he could get that information. But it is rather peculiar that, concurrently almost with the action of the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, the Premier of Canada should hand out his opinion to the press. I am bound to say, Mr. Speaker, that it is not dignified for a Premier of Canada, with his own hand, to tender opinions to the papers. I do not think Lord Roseberry would do it. He might be interviewed, and so might our Premier, but I do not think Lord Roseberry would do anything so undignified as was done in this case. The Premier of Canada, however, may have taken this course for his own preservation, but even then I do not think that that excuse would justify it. One word more, Mr. Speaker, and I am done. This discussion, I trust, will teach not only the members of this House, but the Lieutenant-Governors of the provinces that their position is not that which they thought. It is exceedingly strange that it was found necessary for the Governor of Manitoba to come to Ottawa to get an opinion. If he were in ignorance about his duties a letter might have been addressed to him without his coming here, but as we know he came here and he consorted continuously with the members of this Government. Now, he had a right to do that, but I mention it as a strange coincidence that, taken together with the opinion from the Clerk of the House, he should have been continuously with the members of the Cabinet while in Ottawa. To say the least of it, when a critical question was under discussion, on which the Government of Manitoba was in one position and the Dominion Government in another position, it was not in good taste for the Lieutenant-Governor of a province where his own Executive had to deal with a question that came to them from the central Government—it was not in good taste, I say, that that Lieutenant-Governor should have been here in constant communication with the central Government, when at any moment there might have been a clash between the two authorities, and he would have been called upon to act with his own advisers. I submit that if the Governor of Manitoba had consulted either his own personal dignity or the dignity of the position to which he was raised by the people, he would not have done so. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Daly) trusts that the health of Governor Schultz may be preserved, and that he may come to a seat in this House. Well, I think there may have been many gentlemen on the Ministerial benches who have long hoped, from his appearance, that his health would tend in another direction. I think there has not been on the Government benches for the last couple of years that very earnest desire that his health should be continued.

Mr. IVES. Mr. Speaker, I submit whether this is in order.

Mr. LANDERKIN. He did not mean you at all.

Mr. IVES. Excuse me until I make my point of order. If the language of the hon. gentleman means anything, it means that the Minister of the Interior is desiring the speedy death of the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba.

Mr. FRASER. Oh, I never thought of that. I never had the Minister of the Interior in my view at all. I never thought of such a thing. I think the Minister of the Interior is looking for higher game than that, and hence I never thought of such a thing by any means. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Daly) spoke very flippantly about the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). Winnipeg is a large city, it is a wealthy city, it is an intelligent city, and surely the Minister must have forgotten that at the by-election it returned the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin), whom he spoke so disparagingly about, by over 400 majority. That answer ought to be sufficient, and with the challenge outstanding in that very city to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Daly) to meet the hon. member (Mr. Martin), when the time comes to accept the challenge, which I trust will be shortly, perhaps it will be found that the less the Minister of the Interior says about want of popularity the better for himself. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that in viewing this question we shall view it, not in the light of the particular Governor of Manitoba, but in the light of all the Lieutenant-Governors. While this Parliament shall be supreme within our constitution so far as we have authority, I want to maintain that the local legislatures shall be the same within their constitution so far as their authority is concerned, and I do not wish to see any Lieutenant-Governor saying or doing anything that would lower the dignity of his position. Perhaps, in this age, we are getting too far away from the old traditions, and I submit that the publication of that letter by the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba will do more to make the people of this country have less respect for the high position he occupies than almost anything else that could happen. In this new country, we should have a little of the old respect which is due to those who in the older countries hold high places. But if hon. gentlemen who are raised to those high positions will themselves forget the dignity of their office for the sake of serving political ends, what can we expect? If our Lieutenant-Governors cannot be made to learn the dignity due to their office, then I submit we must get different timber from which to construct Governors, so that the people of this country will understand that these positions are filled by honourable men, who care not for party, but only to fill their office with dignity to themselves and credit to the country. I am glad that the member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has brought up this question, and I hope that we shall not require to have a discussion of this kind again. I trust that Lieutenant-Governors will learn that their receiving opinions, not from where, perhaps, they ought not to receive them under other circumstances, and after receiving them publish them against good faith, will understand that the less they pursue such a course the better for the country and the better for themselves.

Mr. IVES. Mr. Speaker, the foundation principle of British justice, as I understand it, is that a man tried for high crimes and misdemeanours should at least have notice of the charges brought against him, and should be in a position to plead and to defend himself. The Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba is put on his trial here to-day and charges of a most grave and serious character have been brought against him without his having been notified that these charges would be made, and without his having the slightest opportunity to plead to these charges or to defend himself. It is a well-known principle of constitutional law that the Lieutenant-Governor is presumed to do no wrong—that he is presumed to have acted on the advice of his advisers; and I would like to ask the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) what proof they have laid before this House that the Lieutenant-Governor, in asking for the opinion of Dr. Bourinot, and in afterwards in communicating it to the press, was not acting under the advice and with the consent of Mr. Greenway, his responsible adviser. And we can easily understand why Mr. Greenway should have asked the Lieutenant-Governor to come to Dr. Bourinot for an opinion. What man, occupying the position of Mr. Greenway was ever surrounded by circumstances so conflicting and so embarrassing? We must presume that he adjourned his legislature for six weeks in good faith for the purpose of studying this important question and taking legal advice upon it, so as to be able to give his legislature and his party some well considered opinion with regard to the course they should take. Having adjourned his legislature, he despatches the law officer of his Government to the older provinces for the purpose of obtaining advice from leading counsel in regard to this question. What does his responsible law officer do? Like Poor Dog Tray, he fell into bad company. He no sooner arrived in Toronto than he was captured by the hon. member for North Simcoe and taken away into the county of Haldimand and there made to declare for his government and for himself that that government had settled absolutely upon a policy of doing nothing in regard to this question. Disappointed and disgusted with his law officer, who had gone back on him, who had come here to obtain advice and had gone off to give advice, instead, who had, in fact, forgotten what he came here for, what did Mr. Greenway next do? He next sent another member of his government—if I mistake not, the Hon. Robert Watson—to the eastern provinces to obtain advice; and what did Mr. Watson do? He came to Ottawa, where he became at once closeted with the leader of the Opposition, and during the whole time he was here, nobody else was able to see him. He was taking the advice of the leader of the Liberal party here, and the moment he finished consulting him, and without consulting any lawyers at all, but having got the political side of the question, he started back to Winnipeg just as wise as Mr. Sifton. Then, no doubt, Mr. Greenway, despairing of getting any honest service or assistance from his colleagues, took advantage of his Lieutenant-Governor's presence in Ottawa, and wired him, or wrote him: For God's sake, see Dr. Bourinot, and get an honest opinion, free from all political bias, as to the ins and outs of this school question. Mr. Greenway's position was still more complicated by what was going on around him. The leading organ of the Liberal party in Ontario was declaring that this remedial order, so-called, was coercion, and that the province of Manitoba could not be properly called upon to act on that order.

Mr. MARTIN. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he puts that forward as knowing it to be a fact, that Mr. Greenway asked the Lieutenant-Governor to get this opinion?

Mr. IVES. I only say that I think it is very probable. I do not think that it would be made any more probable even if the Montreal "Herald" published an item stating that it was the case. The whole case of the hon. member for North Simcoe and of hon. gentlemen opposite to-day is based on some irresponsible newspaper item.

Mr. MARTIN. My case was based on statements made by the leader of the House.

Mr. IVES. I had not the pleasure of hearing the hon. gentleman, and, therefore, I am not replying to him.

Mr. CASEY. Then, what are you doing ?

Mr. IVES. I am sorry I cannot have the pleasure of following the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), but I may have that pleasure at another time. Mr. Greenway, I say, was still more embarrassed by the opinions he was reading in the various organs of the Liberal party. He heard from the "Globe" that the remedial order was harsh, and trenched on the autonomy of the province of Manitoba. He heard from "L'Electeur," and other Grit papers in the province of Quebec, that there was nothing in the order—that it was merely the transmission of the mandament of the Privy Council, like the transmission of an order from a sheriff to a bailiff, and that he could do what he liked about obeying it. He also saw public men of reputation divided on the question. The hon. member for North Simcoe was making speeches to the effect that Mr. Greenway's Government had no option—that they must either obey the remedial order in its entirety, which, he said, meant the restoration of separate schools as they existed before 1890, or they could do nothing—that there was no compromise, no middle course open to them. He was told by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) that it did not order him to do anything, that he could do precisely what he pleased, and that it amounted to nothing. Even another phase of the question presented itself of a still more embarrassing nature to Mr. Greenway; that was, all of a sudden, as if there had been a stroke of thunder heard all over this Dominion, the whole Liberal party and Liberal press became absolutely dumb on the subject of the Manitoba school question. Even the hon. member for L'Islet, who had been bubbling and gushing perennially, was bottled up so effectually that he has not been heard even to-day on a question that you would hardly suppose he could retain his seat while hearing discussed. The hon. member for Winnipeg was able to make a speech by attacking Dr. Schutz, but without committing himself one way or the other on the school question; and I am sure hon. gentlemen opposite will be sorry to learn from a telegram that has come from Winnipeg to-night that they will have to continue bottled up for five or six weeks longer; because, notwithstanding all the advice his colleagues and the Lieutenant-Governor tried to obtain for him on the subject, Mr. Greenway thinks that the question is not so easy or plain that he can deal with it at once, and, as he requires more time to consider it, he has proposed that his legislature shall adjourn for six weeks longer. So far as the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba is concerned, his position is precisely this: If Mr. Greenway, as Prime Minister, objects to what the Lieutenant-Governor did in asking for that opinion and giving it to the press, he has one constitutional way of signifying his objection. If he does not take that constitutional way he is absolutely presumed to have authorized the action of the Lieutenant-Governor. The one way in which he can constitutionally declare that he disapproves of what the Lieutenant-Governor has done is by sending in his resignation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is that what Earl Grey did ?

Mr. IVES. I am not referring to ancient history, but to the present century—the last thirty or forty years; and the hon. gentleman would not risk his reputation by making any statement to the contrary. He would not dare to put on record in "Hansard" any statement to the contrary. There is only one constitutional way for Mr. Greenway to proceed, and that is to send in his resignation to the Lieutenant-Governor, giving as his reason that the Lieutenant-Governor had, without his consent, taken advice from other persons. Then the matter would come to the notice of the Governor General. If Mr. Greenway desires to disavow the act of the Lieutenant-Governor, his only course is to resign; and if he does not take that course, the presumption is absolute, constitutionally speaking, that the Lieutenant-Governor sought the opinion of Dr. Bourinot with the consent and approval of his constitutional advisers.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Ives) has not afforded us very much food for thought, but he has let the cat out of the bag. It is evidently a part of the conspiracy to make things so uncomfortable for Mr. Greenway that he will be forced to resign and thereby carry out the wishes of the Government here. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Ives) is in such a condition of guileless simplicity as to seriously pretend that it is very probable, indeed, that Mr. Greenway advised the Lieutenant-Governor to get an opinion contrary to his own view of the case and have it published broadcast throughout Canada. If he is still in that simple, credulous, trusting condition. I am afraid there is no use in arguing with him any longer, and I will not try to do it. Neither will I try to argue with the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly). His speech was the speech of a naughty boy who needs to be talked to in a fatherly way; and if the hon. gentleman's good old father were alive to-day and heard him using the expressions we have heard from him, I am satisfied he would have laid the hon. gentleman across the desk and reasoned with him in a fatherly manner. It is the only mode of argument in which a gentleman capable of such effervescence of evil speech can be reasoned with. It must be stern and severe argument alone which can affect his conduct. All the speakers on the other side have complained that we are dealing only with newspaper comments. Nothing could be further from the facts. No doubt the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was moved by newspaper talk to bring this subject up in the House, but he brought it up for the purpose of getting information; and in spite of the evident desire to afford none, we have succeeded in obtaining a good deal. The Minister of the Interior made one statement which bore on the case. He said that the late Mr. Todd the librarian used to advise Lord Dufferin and Lord Lorne, without the knowledge of their constitutional advisers. The hon. gentleman, I fear, has been misinformed by somebody. I have no recollection of hearing that Mr. Todd ever advised the Governor General without the knowledge of the Government. I have known Mr. Todd frequently to have made up a memorandum at the request of the Governor, as to the meaning of some constitutional statute, the Oaths' Bill of 1873 and matters of that kind; but no case has been produced by the Minister where Mr. Todd directly advised the Governor behind the backs of his constitutional advisers. I do not think I need dilate longer on that point, when it is not seriously maintained by any body who knows anything about constitutional usage, that it is a proper thing for a Governor or Lieutenant-Governor to ask advice as to what he ought to do in a particular case, from any body but his Cabinet Ministers. A great deal has been said as to the delicacy of the situation and the necessity Governor Schultz was under of ascertaining what ought to be done. It was none of Governor Schultz's business what ought to be done. It did not concern him in the slightest degree, what the constitutional rights of Manitoba were in the matter. It was absolutely none of his business. It was for his advisers to decide what was right and fair and just. We are told that he consulted constitutional authority, that he consulted our Clerk, who has undoubtedly published some of the very best historical accounts, giving all the existing precedents about almost everything that can come up. But this is not a question that can be settled by precedent. There is no use for a constitutional historian in this matter at all, because there can be no precedent as to what should be done by the legislature of Manitoba, since no such situation ever before existed. It is a matter for the government and legislature of Manitoba to decide, not on the ground of precedents—for there are none—but on the ground of their own good sense, and opinion of what is right and what is wrong in the matter. And as it is for them to decide those matters, and not the Lieutenant-Governor at all, he had no business to consult the Clerk of this House, or the First Minister or any body else as to the constitutional aspect of the case. I will not go so far as the hon. member for Simcoe did who admitted, I think improperly, that there was no objection to the Governor's consulting the Clerk of the House, or any other authorities privately on the subject. In my opinion it was improper for him to consult privately any body or even obtain an opinion that might afterwards bias his mind, and prevent his accepting the advice tendered him by his constitutional advisers. It was not his place to have an opinion, and any course which tended to create an opinion in his mind took away to that extent from his usefulness, and his ability to fully and loyally accept the advice given him by those whose duty it is to give him such advice. The next question we have to consider is what followed the Governor's consultation with the Clerk. The hon. member for Simcoe asked for information on that point, and the leader of the House did his best to avoid giving any information. I must say that the leader of the House, although he is not a legal man, and although numbers of lawyers have spoken on this matter, was much more lawyer-like in his remarks than any of his legal supporters were. I will not say that he was more legal or constitutional, but he was more lawyer-like. His remarks partook of that character which is attributed to a "right smart" lawyer on the other side of the line. He showed much ability in saying as little as possible in a great number of words. I fear that the hon. gentleman's habit of accepting briefs is telling upon his moral and political character. We know that he has been accepting briefs from some of the greatest combinations in the country during the last year. We do not know authoritatively how long before, but he has been accepting briefs and has got into the habit of taking briefs; and he has lost wholly and I fear for ever, the ability to say anything straightforward and plain. Nothing can he tell this House that is not crooked and twisted, so as to make it very hard for us to understand it. Now, Sir, to use the words of a well known character of Shakespeare: "Away with your prattles and your prabbles." Let us have a straight answer to these questions. Has there been a question of retaining Dr. Schultz as Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba? Did Dr. Schultz come down to see the Government here about his retention in office? Did he get any promise that he would be retained in office if he managed things so as to get rid of the Greenway Government, or of their opposition to the Dominion Government's policy? Did Dr. Schultz get that opinion from the Clerk of the House in confidence, or did he get it for publication? Did he give it to the Premier for the purpose of having it published? We know that the Premier gave it to the press. That much was blurted out by the leader of the House in a moment of weakness in answer to a sudden question; the hon. gentleman told us that, before he realized that he was giving us information. We have only to assume, therefore, from all that we know, that Dr. Schultz obtained this opinion in a confidential way, that he gave it to the Premier, that the Premier allowed it to be published. Does the leader of this House, or do the members of this House think that is a straightforward, honest transaction on the part of the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba and the Premier of this country? Now these questions did not receive a straight answer from the leader of the House, but the suggestions contained in them were all thrown out by questions, or by insinuations if you like, on the part of the hon. member for North Simcoe, and none of them were denied. That hon. gentleman stated that it would not be strongly denied that Dr. Schultz was down here asking for a renewal of his appointment. The leader of the House did not deny it either strongly or weakly. The hon. member for North Simcoe said that the opinion had been given to Dr. Schultz, he had good authority for believing, in confidence. The leader of the House did not deny that it was so given. Our general conclusion from the silence of the Minister on these points is that the statements made, whether directly or by inference, by the hon. member for North Simcoe were true, and that there was a conspiracy, as a matter of fact, to obtain an opinion from the Clerk of the House in a confidential way, which was to be used afterwards in a public manner for the benefit of this Government and to the detriment of the advisers of the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba. A great deal has been made of the statement that Dr. Schultz did not tell anybody that the opinion published was in accordance with his own opinion, and that he did not express any opinion of his own as to the proper course to be taken by the legislature of Manitoba. Nobody ever said that he did, nobody cares a brass farthing what Dr. Schultz's opinion on the subject is. Nobody would care a brass farthing, were it not for the outrage upon decency, if he were to trumpet his opinion through all the newspapers of America. But it would appear that he obtained and dishonourably used the opinion of a gentleman whose opinion has some weight in the country, and sought to use it for the purpose of check-mating those whose opinion he ought to take, instead of trying to make public opinion against them. In fact we charge him with manufacturing public opinion by means of the opinion of an officer of this House. We charge the Premier of this country with disloyally seeking to manufacture public opinion against the advisers of the Lieutenant-Governor. A great many suppositions were stated by the hon. leader of the House, in his "right smart" way, in his attempt to dodge the question at issue. For instance, he asks what difference would it make, so far as the effect is concerned, if the clerk had written his opinion as an article in a magazine. No doubt if such an article were written it would have the same effect upon public opinion as though it had been given in answer to a request from Dr. Schultz. But there would have been this difference—Dr. Schultz would not then be in the position of improperly seeking to bolster up the Government of his masters here against his advisers in his own province. But it is hard to imagine such an article written in a magazine. I do not think that our clerk, with his sound ideas of constitutional practice, would go so far out of his course as to write a magazine article on a matter before the legislators of another province, and likely to come before this House in the future. But, if such a thing were possible, Dr. Schultz would have been clear of blame in the matter at all events. As it is now he is not clear of blame. He has used an opinion which he got privately and confidentially, for an improper purpose. Now, the hon. leader of the House wanted to know if there was any impropriety in Dr. Schultz letting the Premier know what the clerk thought about the matter. I say it was improper for the Government of the province to consult with the Premier at all about what was right in the matter, for the same reason I have given—that it was not the Lieutenant-Governor's business to know what was right in the case of his own individual opinion. But a strange vista is opened up to us by the statement read by the hon. member from Winnipeg—the statement made by Dr. Schultz in Winnipeg, that the Dominion Government did not know that he had obtained this opinion from Dr. Bourinot. Now, Sir, we have the statement of the leader of the House that the Dominion Government did know that the Premier got the information, and gave it to the press. Dr. Schultz tells the newspaper reporter that the Dominion Government did not know, and that he did not give them the information. The question arises who has been lying in the premises? Both these statements cannot be correct. Who has been transmuting the truth? It must have been either one or the other. Either the statement of Dr. Schultz is not true or the statement made to us by the hon. leader of the House is not true. It remains to be seen whether Dr. Schultz will stand to the statement alleged to have been made by him. He can put himself in harmony with the Ministers here, if he chooses, by denying the interview. But while it stands undenied, there is a straight issue of veracity between this Government and their tool in the province of Manitoba. It might be more parliamentary, Mr. Speaker, to say their "instrument" or to use some other word. I mean to convey the impression that the Lieutenant-Governor is acting as a partisan in this matter, and in his whole dealing with the government up there. Now, Sir, the Minister of Militia made an unfortunate allusion. He referred to the Mercier regime in Quebec as an unfortunate regime. He meant, of course, to imply severe censure upon that deceased statesman and his colleagues. I am not going into their defence to-night. I am only going to say that Mr. Mercier never had a fair trial, that there was a conspiracy against Mr. Mercier, as there appears to be a conspiracy against Mr. Greenway to-day. The man who was the instrument of that conspiracy (Hon. Mr. Angers), who illegally, and unconstitutionally dismissed those men, who coerced them to submit to a commission of his own nomination, when they should have been tried by Parliament, who broke the constitution in the various ways that have been pointed out by the hon. member for Bothwell this afternoon—that hon. gentleman has received his fee, he is now a member of this Government, and has a permanent seat in the Senate, where he need never be troubled about making his own calling and election sure hereafter. It was unfortunate on the part of the Minister of Militia to call our attention to that transaction. The parallel between the two cases is too strong; the suspicion that something similar is going to be done in this case, is one that must arise in every mind. The Mercier Government, I say, whether a sinning Government or not, never was fairly tried or punished. Sir, that Government was lynched, it was subjected to lynch law, and not to any constitutional form of penalty, and we fear a similar outrage in Manitoba. Now, what I have said sufficiently expresses my opinion on the main points at issue. We are taunted with not saying anything about the Manitoba school question. I say we would be utterly out of order in saying anything about that question. We are not discussing that at this time; we are discussing something totally different, and I have tried to limit myself to the point under discussion. I believe the actions of the Lieutenant-Governor in this case, and of the Premier here, have been utterly improper and unconstitutional, and I am very glad the House has been called on, even in this way, to express an opinion about it. My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior thinks that the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) should have cited the Lieutenant-Governor before the Governor in Council, when he was one of his advisers. He says: Why did he not make these charges when he was one of the advisers of the Lieutenant-Governor? My answer is that he had a far better appreciation of what was decent and constitutional than the Minister of the Interior. Would it not be a nice state of things if we had one of the advisers of a Lieutenant-Governor citing him before the Governor in Council for dereliction of duty, and trying to have him dismissed? Could such a state of things possibly exist, except in the disordered imagination of the Minister of the Interior? I do not think there is another brain in the House capable of originating it. Now, the hon. member for Winnipeg had nothing to do with such a mode of proceeding while he was adviser of the Lieutenant-Governor, and we have nothing to do with the school question at the present time. Our concern is with the matter I have been discussing, and I think the opinion of the House has been pretty well expressed upon it.

Mr. COATSWORTH. This discussion has been described as a tempest in a teapot by one of the speakers, and there may be some reason for that remark. I do not propose to discuss the merits of the case, but there are some facts that I would like to call to the attention of the House. We have heard a good deal of argument to-day in regard to precedents, as to how far we should be governed by precedents in this matter. Now, Sir, there is a precedent I would like to call to your attention, and which I think might be interesting, in view of the fact that the discussion has been brought about by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). As I understand it, he has taken the point that the opinion that has been published, was published with the object of influencing or forcing, so to speak, the judgment of the Government of Manitoba, and that it was an improper thing to use the opinion in that way, before the Government had given their decision. Now, I shall not discuss the question as to whether the opinion was sound, or as to whether it ought to have been used in that way; but I shall call the attention of the House to a precedent which I find in the public press, and which, it appears to me, seriously affects the position of the hon. member for North Simcoe in relation to this question. As we are all aware, that hon. gentleman was the counsel of the province of Manitoba before our privy council in the argument on that question. Mr. Ewart appeared on behalf of the minority, and the member for North Simcoe appeared on behalf of the province of Manitoba. The matter was discussed before the Privy Council for several days, between the 3rd and the 7th of March, and the decision was announced, I think, on the 20th March. Now, in the meantime, the Government were anxiously and carefully considering what judgment they should give, and, during that time a public meeting was held in the city of Toronto, which was addressed by the hon. member for North Simcoe. Sir, I must say, after looking over the report of that meeting, that if ever there was an effort made to intimidate or to coerce those who were trying to form a fair and proper judgment upon a question, it was the effort of the hon. member for Simcoe on the occasion of that meeting in Toronto. I will not impose upon the House by reading the whole of his speech, a few references to it will show clearly what the object was. I think, with all deference to him as a lawyer, that it was a remarkable thing that he should bring forward the accusation he does to-day and at the same time have been guilty of precisely the same offence himself. This meeting, in Toronto, was held on the 11th March, after the argument before the Privy Council had taken place, but before the decision was given, and while the Government were considering the question. It was a mass meeting, called for the purpose of protesting against any interference with the Manitoba schools. The article begins by saying :

The Pavillion was well filled last evening at a mass meeting called to protest against remedial legislation being granted by the Dominion Government in the Manitoba school case.

There was a large number of gentlemen present whose names are given, a large audience, for the purpose of listening to the speeches. The speech of the evening was made by the hon. member for North Simcoe, and in that speech he discusses not only the merits of the case, but he gives his strong opinion as to what he thought the judgment of the Privy Council ought to be. He says :

What consideration should actuate the Governor in Council before passing the law? The gathering he was addressing was not a party one, but one representative of Toronto, and he trusted that the Governor in Council would hearken to the protest which would go from it, and refuse to consent to any Act which would in any way interfere with the laws passed by the majority of a free people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand that language at all if it was not intended, at the time, by the hon. member for North Simcoe to influence and coerce the Privy Council of Canada, who were at the time considering the question, and trying to force them to do what he had failed in his argument before the Privy Council to induce them to do, that is, to come to a conclusion not to grant remedial legislation. He goes on to say :

The legislation which resulted in the repeal of the school laws could not be said to have been hasty, because it was not until 1889 that the laws were repealed.

Further on he says :

Not only had the French Roman Catholics asked for a system of schools in Manitoba, but the Icelanders and the Mennonites had also asked for a system. And their request had as much right to be entertained as that of the Roman Catholics. He wished to know whether Manitoba was to be governed from its own legislature or by the French hierarchy of Quebec. There was no state church in Canada, and he failed to see why the Roman Catholic Church should seek state aid when no other church did. The Church of England, or the Presbyterian Church, had as much right to demand state aid. Furthermore, there was an objection to the schools because they were not efficient.

Passing on, the hon. gentleman said :

He understood that the hierarchy had a good deal to do with elections—(laughter and applause)—and he thought it likely that they were clamouring for a session at Ottawa to have the matter settled, while the Government endeavoured to stave it off. If he was not misinformed, he believed the Government was determined to grant remedial legislation, and was quietly getting the French-Canadian vote solid. He thought they would agree with him that the matter came before the Governor General as a political and not as a judicial question.

I will not read the whole speech, which, no doubt, is very interesting, but appears to be all on the same line. Before resuming my seat, I desire to say that I am not expressing an opinion on the question of the schools or anything except upon the action of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). The hon. gentleman came here this afternoon and said, in effect, that the Government, or whoever did publish that letter, did so for the purpose of forcing a judgment on the Government of Manitoba, and they should not have done that. Without expressing any opinion on that subject, I simply desire to call attention to what appears to be a glaring inconsistency on the part of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), because while he was counsel engaged in arguing the case before the Privy Council, between March 3rd and March 7th, the decision being reserved, the matter being under consideration by the judges who were to decide it, and a decision not having been announced until March 18th or 20th, this hon. gentleman in the meantime attended a public meeting in Toronto, gathered for the express purpose of protesting against the Government giving a decision in any other than a certain way. The hon. gentleman attended there as the speaker of the evening. He asked the citizens of Toronto to protest against the Government arriving at a decision in a certain way, and thereby he did all he could to force a certain decision from the Government of the Dominion. It therefore seems to me that the point may very fairly be taken that the hon. member for Simcoe has placed himself at the disadvantage of being accused of inconsistency when he endeavoured to make out a case against the party who had this letter published, while this charge of inconsistency is clearly made out in the newspaper against himself personally.

Motion (Mr. McCarthy) to adjourn agreed to ; and House adjourned at 10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 10th May, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPORT.

Railway Rates Commission.—(Mr. Haggart.)

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 70) respecting the Temiscouata Railway Company.—(Mr. McAlister.)

Bill (No. 71) to incorporate the Camp Harmony Angling Club.—(Mr. Sutherland.)

Bill (No. 72) to consolidate and amend the Act relating to the Imperial Trusts Company of Canada.—(Mr. Coatsworth.)

DEVELOPMENT OF SEA FISHERIES.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 74) to encourage the development of the sea fisheries, and the building of fishing vessels. He said: The title indicates the main purpose of the Bill. At present, under the Fisheries Act, we appoint officers with powers of justices of the peace, and we wish to give them some additional powers in the administration of that Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MAIL COMMUNICATION WITH KINGSTON.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the Postmaster General to a small matter connected with the service of the House. I find that letters from Kingston and thereabouts are delivered here about six o'clock, but that the only mail that goes out appears to leave about half-past five, as I am informed. Now, I want to know whether this arrangement would admit of sending a night bag to go around by Tweed, so that letters for that region could be answered in the morning. I would be obliged if the Postmaster General would see if that can be arranged for. I do not think it is done at present, for I find there seems to be a whole day's delay, by which letters that are mailed before half-past five cannot be conveniently answered.

Mr. COATSWORTH.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am glad my attention has been called to the matter, and I will see whether the service can be arranged so as to meet the requirements to which the hon. gentleman has called my attention.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH NEWFOUNDLAND.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think on at least two occasions previously I have asked for information from the leader of the House with respect to the progress of negotiations between the Dominion and Newfoundland, with results which, to myself, are very meagre. I think the House will agree with me that the negotiations have now reached that acute stage when it is desirable and necessary that further information should be given to this House. I deprecate myself the position the Government have taken with reference to their relations to this House altogether. The fact is, we have become a kind of donkey engine to the Senate in the transmission of information which this House ought to have had given to it in the first instance, in matters where the financial obligations of the people are concerned. But I see, Mr. Speaker, in to-day's paper—and if I am transgressing, I will put myself in order by a motion—that the Newfoundland Legislature is re-opened, and the Premier, Mr. Whiteway, moved for adjournment for one week. I read:

He said the delegates to Ottawa had not yet reported, and were not then able to report, as the reply to their ultimatum was not received from the Dominion Government, though waited for until the last moment.

Now, it appears from the information I gather from the papers published in Newfoundland, and from telegrams sent from there, that the Government of Newfoundland and this Government are not agreed upon a large number of the terms of union, and that an ultimatum has been sent from the Newfoundland Legislature, the answer to which will determine the acceptance of those terms or not. I see in one of the papers that one hon. gentleman from Newfoundland, a member of the Government, announces that if a favourable report, a favourable answer, to that ultimatum is received, the Government will be prepared to do its duty, from which I gather that the Government will be prepared to submit those terms without going to the people at all. Now, Sir, I have looked over some of the terms of union, notably those of Prince Edward Island, and I found in those terms that an express clause was inserted providing that the terms which were agreed upon respecting the entrance of that province to the Dominion, should be submitted to the people before they became law. The hon. gentleman intimated, though he did not say so in explicit terms, that no such condition was inserted in the Newfoundland terms. If such a condition has been omitted, and that people is legislated into this union without an opportunity of expressing their opinion at the polls, a grievous wrong of an irremediable character, in my opinion, will be committed against them, no matter what the terms are. It would be an injustice, a constitutional mistake of the worst kind, if terms of any kind were agreed upon finally and carried into law without the people being allowed to express their opinion upon them. I wish to know from the Government whether such a telegram has been received from the Government of Newfoundland, asking for a reply to their ultimatum. I think I am also within my rights in asking the hon. leader of the House whether the ultimatum which the Newfoundland Government has submitted to this Government, is one which relates to financial arrangements, or whether it has reference to the French shore question, or whether it has reference to any matter outside of financial arrangements. The Newfoundland papers are discussing this matter with a degree of refreshing frankness that is wonderful. I have just received a copy of the "Evening Herald" of St. John's, Nfld., one of the strongest advocates of confederation in that colony, a paper which, I gather from its editorial, is prepared to advocate the forcing of the people into the union whether the people wish it or not, and in that paper I find some statements which I should be very sorry to believe myself, or to endorse, but for which there must be, I imagine, some foundation. In the issue which I hold in my hand it is said :

It is an open secret that the imports (of Newfoundland) are not half as great as last year, the stocks formerly brought in by all the insolvent firms are not being replaced, and the revenue will not reach $750,000, as against $1,500,000 for 1894.

The paper goes on to say editorially :

The condition of the colony, like that of its people, could not be worse. The generosity of the outside world has been keeping us alive all winter, and a relief commissioner is now doling charity in our midst. Our treasury is empty, our credit is gone. We want a loan of $2,000,000, and cannot raise a cent. Bankruptcy faces us on July 1st, pauperism is inevitable unless we accept confederation; railway and other work must stop, and the flood of emigration be largely augmented.

Well, Sir, I do not quote that in any sense as endorsing it. I do not know whether the statements are true or not; but I quote it as showing statements which are being submitted to the people of Newfoundland to show that they are in such a quandary that they must accept the terms, and accept them on or before the 1st July, or the alternative to be faced is bankruptcy. Now, the leader of the Government does not put such an alternative before the people; as I gather from a despatch sent here, he puts the alternative of retrenchment. That is a mode of escaping their difficulties which he submits to the people, and that, I take it, from what I know of the hon. gentleman, would be the course he would take if the Government of Canada refused to accept their ultimatum. But I think when affairs have reached this acute stage, when the opinion is expressed in the Newfoundland papers that if union takes place at all it must take place before the 1st July, that we have a right to be informed at the earliest possible period what the terms are, and where an ultimatum has been sent of the character I have described, we ought to know in general terms from the hon. gentleman whether that relates to a matter of international importance such as the French shore question, or whether it relates to a matter of detail of pounds, shillings and pence. I think I may safely say that the general feeling, so far as I can gather it from the press, and so far as I can gather it from conversation with members of this House, is rather in favour of union of this kind and of making Newfoundland part of the Dominion. There is no disposition to haggle about a few dollars one way or the other; but there is a very strong disposition, a disposition which will be found so strong as to be irresistible, not, in our present financial condition to assume obligations of the character which, if the reports I have read be correct, we shall assume, if this province comes into confederation. I therefore would like to ask the hon. Finance Minister, if they have received a telegram covering an ultimatum; when that ultimatum was sent to them; have they replied to it; and whether that reply is, in effect, or not, one covering the subject-matter of French shore rights or financial questions, or to what subject it does refer?

Mr. FOSTER. I am sorry I cannot fully satisfy the hon. gentleman's laudable inquisitiveness in respect to this matter. He has displayed great persistency, and all I can do is to maintain a prudent silence on my part in respect to matters that are not considered in the interest of the negotiations such as can, at the present time, be made public. The hon. gentleman's policy seems to be one of pick and choose. He puts a number of hypothetical questions as to leading points, and he hopes to get my answers on possibly one, two or three of them, some in the negative, perhaps, and some in the affirmative, and from these he could come to a pretty fair conclusion as to what is the nature of the negotiations, and what the character of the terms. The hon. gentleman must be met in this case, as he was met before, with a courteous, but, at the same time, a firm refusal to place one single term of the negotiations which are passing, but are not yet concluded, between this Government and Newfoundland, before the House, outside of the agreement of our Government with Newfoundland, and before they are ended. The hon. gentleman's course is somewhat peculiar, and it is more peculiar when taken in connection with another fact which I shall mention for the consideration of the House. The hon. gentleman professes to be very anxious that the union shall be accomplished if it can be effected on favourable terms. But he takes a very peculiar course to bring it about. He read, I suppose, as gloomy an article as could possibly be penned to show the reading public of Canada, and the hon. members of this House, the direful straits, financial and otherwise, to which Newfoundland has come. If there be any inference to be drawn from that, it is that we ought not to go into union with a colony in that state. In the Island the strong argument that is used against confederation with Canada is the argument that Canada occupies a similar position to that which the writer of the extract read here to the House says Newfoundland occupies; and if an excerpt, taken from the "Globe" newspaper of last night, from its correspondence from Newfoundland, was put simply by itself in the hands of any one he would declare it was an extract from the speech of a leading statesman of the Opposition in the House of Commons at Ottawa. It does not seem to me the cause of confederation is to be advanced by the reading of such statements, especially if unaccompanied by any comments to the contrary. I am not here today to discuss any of the points which have been brought up; that discussion will be full and free, and the Government will be able to answer for itself when the papers are laid on the Table. Now, having refused so much, I am going to give the hon. gentleman and the House one little bit of information.

Mr. LAUBIER. Oh, no.

Mr. FOSTER. If the leader of the Opposition objects, it is a different matter.

Mr. LAURIER. It will not be consistent.

Mr. FOSTER. Of course, I do not desire to force information upon the hon. gentleman. However, I will take the responsibility of doing so. A telegram has been received, and numerous telegrams have been received, by the Government of Canada, and Canada's final answer has been sent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In order to place myself in order, I will conclude by moving a motion. The hon. Minister of Finance, it appears to me, and his colleagues are practicing gross deceit, and a deliberate deceit on this House.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a very strong expression.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman told us a few days ago that he would present a full, frank and fair statement of all the liabilities of Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. I call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the statement made by the hon. gentleman, that I and the Government of which I am a member, am practicing a deliberate deceit on the House, a gross deceit on the House. The hon. gentleman has no right to use such language.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is an unparliamentary expression, and I think the hon. gentleman should withdraw it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will withdraw the word "deceit," and substitute this: That the hon. gentleman, having promised, some days ago, to bring down the Supplementary Estimates failed to do so, that he failed to bring down the Supplementary Estimates after making a specific promise to do so. That may, or may not, be deceit in parliamentary usage.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a miserable subterfuge. The hon. gentleman did not rise to refer to that subject at all.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Finance Minister was going to make a full confession of all the liabilities which this country was going to assume, or has incurred. What I want to point out is this, that, in the course of the Budget discussion at this time proceeding, it is specially desirable and important that we should understand what the projects of the Government are likely to add to the liabilities of the Dominion. There is no shadow of doubt that no matter what terms are made with Newfoundland, they will, in all human probability, involve very large additions, indeed, to the fixed charges of this country. Before we close this Budget debate, if the hon. gentleman is going to redeem his promise, in the spirit, if not in the letter, we ought to be fully advised as to the extent of the liabilities we are likely to incur; otherwise, we are discussing these important matters in the dark—quite in the dark. Our present liabilities, according to the statement made by the hon. Finance Minister, computing the statutory provisions, will be on the verge of $300,000,000, but not quite up to that sum. If any further amount is to be added for the purpose of bringing Newfoundland into confederation, or for any other purpose, it is the hon. gentleman's bounden duty to acquaint the House with it, and it was his bounden duty and that of his colleagues not to have called the House together until the Government were prepared to make such a statement. These negotiations should have been in such a state, if he was going to enter into them at all, that hon. members would possess full and complete knowledge of where we are, and what possible liabilities we are going to incur. We cannot tell what these propositions may involve, whether twenty, thirty, or fifty millions additional to the total liabilities of Canada. It is a matter, therefore, of first-rate importance to the proper discussion of this question on which we are now engaged, that we should know what these negotiations are; and I say that the hon. gentleman and the Government to which he belongs have been grossly derelict in their duty in that they did not get these negotiations into such a shape before Parliament met that they could advise us regarding them before it was necessary to bring the Budget statement down, and inform us as to what they would amount to. In order that the matter may be clearly understood, I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It can hardly be said that members of the Administration do not magnify their office. These hon. gentlemen seem to forget altogether what the rights of the House of Commons are under our constitution. If the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to read those portions of the Act of Union, which authorize the addition of Newfoundland or any other province to the union, he will see that there is no provision whatever that it shall be dealt with as an ordinary Government question. It is not a question simply of ministerial policy; it is not provided that the terms of union shall be settled between the Government of Canada, on the one side, and the Government of Newfoundland on the other. The terms and conditions of the union are to be agreed upon between the Parliament of Canada and the legislature of the province seeking admission. These are the terms and conditions, and the hon. gentleman intends or proposes that this House shall be excluded altogether from any part or parcel in the conduct of these negotiations. The hon. gentleman has altogether mistaken his duty in this matter. The hon. gentleman is acting, if he is acting constitutionally at all, in behalf of the Government of Canada. Has not the Parliament of Canada a right to know what are the matters in dispute in these negotiations between Newfoundland and the Government of Canada? Does Newfoundland demand large subsidies, large bounties for her fishermen? Have the Government, in their answer, proposed to concede this demand? Has Newfoundland demanded that the municipal indebtedness of the city of St. John's, which has no municipal institutions, in our sense, at all, shall be assumed by Canada? Has the Government of Newfoundland asked that the Parliament of Canada shall assume the responsibility of constructing 500 miles of railway through a country where there are not 5,000 inhabitants? If such are the propositions that are at issue between the Government of Newfoundland and the Government of Canada, then I say that the people of this country have a right to know what those propositions are. Sir, the people of Canada submitted long enough to allow the Government to perform the part of masters of the people. That is the position that the hon. gentlemen have assumed, and what is the position of Canada after 15 years trial of that system? Why, Sir, the people of Canada are embarrassed with the indebtedness incurred by the Administration, and the Government themselves scarcely know how they are to meet that indebtedness. Now the Government propose that they shall settle with the people, or with the Government of Newfoundland—for I understand that they have no intention on either side of allowing the people of Newfoundland to have any voice in the matter—whether this country shall, or not, in addition to its present serious financial burdens, assume $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 of debt and add two or three million dollars a year to the expenses of the Government of Canada. I tell the Administration: You have taxed the people of this country to such an extent that you have driven thousands of people out of the country, and you have scarcely anybody left upon whom you can impose your burdens, upon whom you dare longer to impose your burdens: and under these circumstances you propose to defeat the public opinion of this country by introducing people who have no public opinion with regard to your conduct or misconduct in office during the past ten years. That is the position that the Government, this is what ministers have in view in the negotiations between themselves and Newfoundland; acting on our behalf, acting without consulting this House, acting without considering whether the people of this country in the present financial condition of the country are prepared to take up this subject of union with Newfoundland or not, and undertaking to tie the hands of the people of this country and then to come to Parliament and say: We have made a bargain, and you must accept it as a whole or reject it as a whole, you cannot alter one jot or tittle of the whole arrangement, you who are entrusted under the constitution with the settlement of the terms of the union are to have no voice in saying what these terms of union may be; you must say yes or no, but you cannot say more or less. You cannot point out that the terms are defective in this respect, or that they are defective in that respect. These hon. gentlemen opposite come here after having impoverished the country and driven out its inhabitants and embarrassed it financially, and propose to add a population of 200,000, two-fifths of whose revenue has every year for the past five years been expended on the relief of the poor in the Island of Newfoundland. That is the condition of things; and this House would be wanting in its duty if it allows this Government to proceed further in these negotiations without knowing what they are. The time has been, Sir, under the constitution of England, when, if a Minister of the Crown had answered a member of the House as the hon. gentleman has answered my friend to-day, he would be impeached at the bar of the House of Lords.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes. What is the position of the Government? The position is that they are masters of the situation, and are using their powers to prolong their life, may I not say by a misuse of authority. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I might say, and say with perfect parliamentary propriety, that the hon. gentlemen may find that it will be their funeral. This House is entitled to know what these negotiations are, and we are entitled to know whether the propositions are of such a character, that under no circumstances this House could, in the interests of the people of this country, for a moment entertain them.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, it appears to me that the hon. gentleman, who poses as a very great constitutional critic and constitutional lawyer, has made himself ridiculous to-day in the eyes of this Parliament, and in the eyes of this country. I do not pretend, Sir, to any constitutional authority beyond that of the humblest member of the House, but I must say that I do not think,—though I say it with bated breath so to speak—that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) means what he has said here this afternoon. We are quite accustomed in this House to see the hon. gentleman growing excited over the very smallest points which could possibly be raised in a Chamber of this kind; but I confess that I never saw my hon. friend grow so cross and grow so excited when he was so decidedly in the wrong, as he has this afternoon. Let me pause to look for a moment at the extraordinarily contradictory position which hon. gentlemen opposite have taken upon this question. We are told in the first place, that the completion of confederation, that the bringing in of the Island into the Canadian Dominion, is to be the funeral of the Conservative party in this country. Heaven knows that is what the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has been praying for for so many years, and consequently he should express no regret if the time for our funeral has approached. In the next place, the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) rises in this House and says that we are about to bring in a number of people who have become beggars in the Island of Newfoundland.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman must not misrepresent me. I did not say they had become beggars. I read from the confederation organ in the province of Newfoundland in which was related the condition of the people. I took good care to say that I did not endorse the statement.

Mr. MONTAGUE. In the usual way my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) quotes from somebody else and lends to that statement the authority of reading it himself in the House; but he refuses to make the statement directly and openly from his own lips. Sir, the inference to be drawn by the members of this House this afternoon was, that my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) endorsed the statement that the people of the Island were impoverished. Then, what will the members of this House think of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) immediately rising and saying: that the Government had an ulterior object in view, namely, that we had imposed taxes to the very fullest extent upon every possible soul in Canada, and then we propose to bring in a new beggared lot—as my hon. friend referred to them—from the Island of Newfoundland for the purpose of raising more funds for the Canadian treasury, and bleeding the people of Newfoundland white, who had had already,—according to the member for Queen's (Mr. Davies)—been bled white, many times before. Now, Sir, referring to the position which I took, that the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) had made himself ridiculous, I again wish to speak for a moment upon that question. What is the only point upon which my hon. friend (Mr. Mills) has attempted to say a word of sense to the House this afternoon? Is it not this: that this House has been dragged into a bargain of which it was to know nothing, and into the settlement of a question which was not to be submitted to it. I want to tell my hon. friend, that he knows that he is talking nonsense upon that point. I want to tell my hon. friend (Mr. Mills) that he knows just as well as the members of the Government do, that that confederation never can be completed until every line of it, until every tittle of that agreement is submitted to the Parliament of Canada, and discussed, and passed upon by the members of this House; and in saying, that some great harm is to be done the Dominion of Canada, my hon. friend (Mr. Mills) is saying the very worst compliment he could to the representatives of the people in this House. It is true that the majority of this House is a majority in which my hon. friend has very little confidence. It matters not, Sir, how sacred might be the cause or how good the object which was to be promoted by the members on this side of the House, we would have objections and criticisms from my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and the members who surround him. But I want to tell my hon. friend that we resent the imputation cast across this Chamber, that the men who support the Government in this House are not as thoroughly patriotic and as honest as the men who sit upon the other side. When the question of Newfoundland entering the confederation is submitted to this House, and passed upon, as it will be passed upon, by the majority of this House. I pay my hon. friends opposite the compliment of saying that they will deal as patriots with it; and I pay my hon. friends on this side of the House only the justice that is due them when I say that we will deal with the question with a due regard for the safety and the future prosperity of this Dominion. I need not declare that the Government have taken the usual position in regard to such matters. Surely it is well within the knowledge of every one who has paid the slightest attention to constitutional practice that questions of union between various sections of an empire are most delicate matters. My hon. friend from Bothwell knows as well as I know that no negotiations could ever be successfully carried on if, before a certain stage was reached, they were to become the subjects of discussion in the public legislatures and the public prints of this country; and if my hon. friend desires, as I presume he does, to see the Dominion of Canada rounded off by the last British colony on this continent being brought within the bounds of the Canadian confederation, he is adopting the very best course to prevent that consummation when he rises to endeavour to extract from the Government before the negotiations are complete, information which if given at this time might defeat the very object my hon. friend has in view. The Government of this country do not desire to hide anything from Parliament, we are in the hands of Parliament, we must abide by the judgment of Parliament, and when the time comes for these negotiations to be placed before the country, hon. gentlemen opposite will find that they have been raising a tempest in a tea-pot. They will find that the Government have conducted the negotiations with a view not only to the extension of our domain, but with a view to the safeguarding of those rights and rules which the Government have observed in years past in dealing with other great questions.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to-day with any intention of answering the harangue of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, for the remarks with which he has adorned it and the question before the House are as wide apart as the poles. The question before the House has not even been touched by the hon. gentleman. The question raised by my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) was this: Has the House any right to be informed of the negotiations which have taken place between the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland? That is the only question. Now, it is admitted as a rule of diplomacy between foreign nations that so long as the negotiations are pending it would not be proper to communicate to Parliament the particular nature of those negotiations. This is admitted with regard to diplomatic relations between foreign nations, but this is not the character of the present negotiations. They are not diplomatic negotiations between two countries; they are not negotiations for a treaty of peace; they are negotiations for a basis of agreement between two governments in regard to the admission of one of them into the union. More than that: we have not been able to extract it from the hon. gentlemen to-day, but we have at present this information, that the negotiations are ended.

Mr. FOSTER. They are not ended.

Mr. LAURIER. The Government of Newfoundland has sent an ultimatum here, and has received an answer to the ultimatum; so the negotiations are complete.

Mr. IVES. No.

Mr. LAURIER. It is not an ultimatum, then.

Mr. IVES. There has been no answer from Newfoundland.

Mr. LAURIER. Then the negotiations will never be complete. Here is the Premier of Newfoundland saying: "We have sent an ultimatum to Canada, and we expect an answer," and the hon. gentleman has condescended to inform the House that the answer which Newfoundland had been expecting has been sent there. Now, I ask in the name of common sense, in the name of parliamentary government, in the name of the freedom of the people, are not the Canadian people as much entitled to the confidence of their Government as the people of Newfoundland to theirs. What is the reason that an answer to their ultimatum has been asked by the Government of Newfoundland? Simply to be communicated to the legislature of Newfoundland, and I presume that as soon as the legislature of Newfoundland shall be in session again, the answer of the Canadian Government will be communicated to it, but to-day the Parliament of Canada is denied information which in a few days will be given to the legislature of Newfoundland. My hon. friend beside me (Mr. Davies) did not use too strong a word when he said that this was an outrage on the Canadian people. According to the statement made by the hon. Minister a few moments ago, we are to receive this information some time. Yes, when it suits the Government's own sweet will, they will be kind enough to inform the Canadian Parliament of the negotiations. We know when that will be—when the whole thing shall be cut and dried, when everything shall have been acted upon. What will be the consequence? It is now beyond doubt that the basis of union has been agreed upon between the two governments; only a few points remain to be settled. Even if those few points are not yet settled, I ask in the name of common sense what reason is there why they should not be at once communicated to the Canadian people to reflect as to how far they could meet the objections raised. We shall have them later, when they are cut and dried, and then we shall have to swallow them as a whole, or reject them as a whole.

Mr. IVES. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? If the line of argument which the hon. gentleman is taking means anything, it means that the House should assist the Government in arranging the terms with Newfoundland, and that the advice and assistance of the Opposition should be availed of in the meantime to help to settle the terms.

Mr. LAURIER. I say that if the basis of the negotiations is good and sound, the Government would receive the assistance of the Opposition; no doubt of that. But at present I want to know what is the reason why the negotiations, together with the points of difference, if there remain any, should not be communicated to Parliament? Suppose that by and by, when the negotiations are all completed, the Canadian Parliament should be disposed not to swallow them as a whole, but to accept them in part, and reject them in part; the whole negotiations would have to be thrown away and new negotiations entered into before we could proceed with the scheme of confederation. Would it not be more logical for us to have at present information as to the points of difference? But it is evidently useless to expect information from the hon. gentlemen now on the treasury benches. They have given their answer to Newfoundland, and I see no good reason why they should not communicate it to the House. What will their position be on the subject to-morrow? How long will they remain in their present frame of mind? Some weeks ago they passed an Order in Council with reference to the Hudson Bay Railway, and they have not yet made up their minds whether or not they will ask Parliament to ratify that Order in Council. They were of one mind a few weeks ago; they were of another mind a few days ago, and at the present time they are wavering. Therefore it may be prudent on their part not to give us this information. The hon. gentleman, the leader of the House, said a moment ago that my hon. friend was gifted with persistence. It is true that is one of the qualities of my hon. friend beside me, but his power of persistence is not equal to the power of inertiae of the Government.

Mr. LAURIER.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot allow some of the remarks that have been made to go without a reply. Now let us, without heat and in all coolness, examine the different positions taken by the hon. gentleman opposite and see how consistent they are. The policy of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition and his party has been to endeavour to persuade the country that information which is vitally necessary, and which they have a perfect right to have at present, is being withheld, and by this means to create a prejudice against the Government. In pursuance of that policy they have taken up the Newfoundland matter, and they make a demand for information which, I venture to say, if it had been made in any constitutional Parliament in the world, would meet with the same persistent refusal that it does here. They endeavour by pressing for something which they know, in their own hearts, they have no right to obtain at present, to create the impression that the Government is withholding information which this Parliament is entitled to have. What is the position of the hon. member for South Oxford? He says that there is a Budget debate going on, and that it is necessary, in order to have that debate as wide and complete as possible, to know what the probable liabilities of the country are. And in this view, he claims that the negotiations which are to-day going on between Canada and Newfoundland, and which are incomplete, and which cannot without prejudice be made public until they are completed, should be made public to-day. No matter what reasons of state may exist against the publication of these negotiations, the information must be brought down, because the Budget debate is going on, and because, forsooth, the hon. gentleman wishes to know what our liabilities may be in 1897 or 1898 or in 1899, after confederation takes place with Newfoundland, if it should take place. Again, he declares that we ought not to have brought the House together until these negotiations were completed. Why, only a few days ago the hon. gentleman spoke to a different tune. When I endeavoured to give as a reason why the House met so late that negotiations were proceeding with Newfoundland and that we desired to have them as far advanced as possible, with the view of having the results placed before the House before it rose, that idea was scouted and ridiculed as being no valid reason at all for delaying the session. The hon. the leader of the Opposition tried to draw a distinction between negotiations going on with a foreign country and negotiations with the colony of Newfoundland with reference to confederation or union between the two. What is the difference? What reason exists, when negotiations are being carried on with a foreign power, for authorizing a refusal on the part of the Government to give information to Parliament, which does not exist here. In all such matters it is essential that the negotiations should be carried on by the responsible executive alone—by the Government, which is but a committee of Parliament—as in this way alone can they be carried on with the best prospects of success; and the disclosure of those negotiations, if made prematurely, would only tend to prevent the final success. That reason admittedly holds in the case of negotiations with a foreign power, and the same reason exists for secrecy in the negotiations between Canada and Newfoundland. There is a direct parallel between the two, so far as the necessity of secrecy is concerned, until the negotiations are completed. This regard for secrecy is based on a common sense principle, and that is that the committee of the House, the responsible executive of the House, is the proper authority to carry on the negotiations can keep its own counsel, and is alone responsible to the House and the country for the results. The hon. member for Bothwell wants this legislature to carry on the negotiations. But who is the hon. member for Bothwell, and to whom is he responsible? He is responsible to the constituency of Bothwell. He would have the constituency of Bothwell conducting the negotiations with Newfoundland. My hon. friend's responsibility is a limited one, whereas the Government is responsible to the whole House and country. When these negotiations have reached such a stage that they can be brought down, the Government, in the exercise of its duties, will lay the whole matter before the House, and take the responsibility for whatever results may arise from these negotiations. But the leader of the Opposition says that if this House had the matter now put before it, as it stands at present, this House might modify the negotiations; but that if obliged to wait until the business is completed, the House will have to swallow the results, whatever they may be. He thus intimated that the Government would, by the force of its majority, compel the House to swallow the measure as a whole, or take any other course advisable. But the Government has the same majority to-day as it will have three months hence; and the Opposition are in no better position to-day than they will be, when this transaction is completed, to meet the views of the Government. The hon. gentleman's argument has therefore no force at all, and it makes no difference, as regards the compulsion of the majority, of which the hon. gentleman seems so greatly in dread, whether these negotiations are submitted piecemeal or altogether. The hon. gentleman went on to say, that the information might well be refused while the negotiations were still pending. Then, I say they are pending, they are not completed. I did not say they were, nor did I use any such word as "ultimatum." The newspapers, from which the hon. gentleman got his information, may have used it. My hon. friend opposite may have used it. But I did not. I distinctly said that we had received many telegrams from Newfoundland to which we had sent replies, and that to-day we had sent a reply to their last telegram. That may be a final telegram or it may not. But even if it should be, we must first have their answer and know their minds before we can divulge anything. My hon. friend says that the Newfoundland Legislature will meet in a few days and that the Newfoundland Government may give the Newfoundland Legislature these particulars, and that we will not have the same information. Well, Mr. Speaker, we shall be in session when the Newfoundland Legislature meets, and that legislature has not had a line of information so far. It will not have any until these negotiations are completed; and when they are completed, this Parliament and the Newfoundland Legislature will be seized of the same information and papers at the same time. I am surprised at this attempt on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to take their stand away from sound constitutional ground and to worry the Government for information, in the hope that they may impress the country with the belief that this Government is arbitrarily and improperly withholding from Parliament information Parliament has a right to obtain. The hon. gentleman's conduct can only be interpreted in one way. They are determined to attack the Government. If they can find a fair case, they will use it; but if they cannot, they will take a case that is not fair. I see it stated in some of the papers that there is a very confident feeling on the part of the Opposition; that it has even spread from the front benches to the middle benches, and on from the middle benches to the back benches, and has submerged these back benches in a wave of enthusiastic hope that their party is soon to come into power, that they have the Government at their mercy. I want to tell my friend, the leader of the Opposition, and every man who sits beside and behind him, that they have hard work to do before they can cross this floor. They have to rid themselves of their record for incapacity in the government of the Dominion; they have to rid themselves of their record for incapacity in the provincial leaders of the party, as shown in the iniquities of Liberal Governments in the various provinces, than which there is no more disgraceful development in the legislative history of any country under the sun than in the late Administration in Quebec. They have to get away from both these records. They have to get away from their record of inconsistencies and twistings and turnings in the matter of a fiscal and tariff policy. The hon. gentleman talks about the Government not knowing its own mind? Does he know his own mind? He made a speech in Winnipeg last year; he got halfway through one sentence as to the nature of his tariff policy, but he broke off and he has not finished that sentence yet. The hon. gentleman hedges on every question with "ifs" and "buts," until he cannot see over them without getting higher than his own limbs will raise him. And these are the gentlemen who talk to us about not knowing our own minds. They have to get a better fiscal policy, something which they can explain before the people; they have to get something which they know themselves. And when the testing time comes—and we are ready for it whenever it comes—we will meet them on the hustings as we have met them before, and there they will have to tell the electors definitely what they propose to do. But, Sir, their record is not a good one. There is just one fact, if there was nothing else, for which this patriotic people opposes them—and will oppose them—the fact that not many years ago they sailed so near to treason that their own old time leader leaped from deck and swam for dear life for the shore.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It has long been in doubt whether the hon. gentleman who leads the House would develop the qualities such as are presumed to be required by a gentleman who fills that position. That doubt, however, will be set aside from this day forth. The dignity, Sir, the prudence of the speech which the hon. gentleman has just made must settle that matter. Here are complicated and delicate arrangements going forward between the Dominion of Canada and the province of Newfoundland, the result of which may lay heavy financial burdens upon this country. The hon. gentleman is asked to give the House such information as, in the public interest, he may properly give with reference to these negotiations. The absolute details were not sought for, but only those facts that, in the public interest, he could and ought to give. And his reply is a bitter stump speech upon the general policy and past record of the Opposition, a speech which the hon. gentleman ought to be ashamed to deliver under such circumstances. The hon. gentleman's conduct upon this occasion is unworthy of one occupying his position. We expected something better from him. We expected that his reply would be marked with a dignity and prudence and candour becoming one essaying to fill the responsible position he occupies here. He should remember, Sir, that he is not simply a party leader talking party clap-trap, but he stands here as the representative of the committee of Government to tell his masters, this House—not alone his party behind him—to what responsibilities he is committing this country. Sir, we must recollect that these questions are put in view of the gravity of a situation which we cannot ignore. The leader of the Newfoundland Government tells us that these negotiations must be completed before 1st July next. The hon. gentleman talks about our being too insistent. What is the date to-day? It is now the 10th of May, and the hon. gentleman refuses to disclose a scintilla of information with reference to the negotiations which this House must decide upon for good or for ill, before the 1st of July. When are we to get the information on which we are to give a decision? This is not a party question and ought not to be a party question, although the hon. gentleman has made a most indelicate attempt to force it into the party arena. It is not for this House, or for the members of this House alone, that we want this information. There is a power outside this House before which even the hon. gentleman must bow, great man as he has lately assumed to be—the power of the people who will have to bear the obligations he is putting upon this country; and it is for their interests and for their information that we ask for these facts, and not for ourselves alone. These negotiations and terms of this union must be received and discussed by us and discussed by those who are to assume these obligations. The hon. gentleman talks about the meeting of this House. If he had any political shame he would be ashamed to mention that epoch in this country's history. The hon. gentleman in this matter, as in all others, vacillated between one course and another. There was no head to the Government in this as there was no head to it in anything else. One party wanted a meeting of the House, while another party was afraid to call that meeting. The Finance Minister was afraid to announce his deficit, while another party wanted to go to the country upon the school question. The Government dilly-dallied and waited. They sent out their parties hither and thither, carrying on a political campaign, but refusing to take the people into their confidence. The month of January came, when we ought to have met, when those who sat behind the hon. gentleman know, we ought to have met, and that month passed by, and then February, and then March, and we were well into the month of April when at last, at long last, and against the public interest, they make up their minds to call a session of the House. It is disgraceful to have two hundred and odd men meeting at this time, considering the personal sacrifices they have to make, and all for party purposes. I tell him that it is because of the imminence of the date at which, as the leader of the Newfoundland Government says, these negotiations must be completed or set on one side, that we press for this information. If this were a matter which was to go over until next year, if there were no imperious pressing necessity upon us, I would say the hon. gentleman was acting within his right in asking us still further to possess our souls in patience. But we have the statement of the Premier of Newfoundland that the terms must be agreed to before the 1st July. He declares that they have sent their ultimatum to the Canadian Government. The hon. gentleman, in answer to a question, stated that this Government had sent its answer. That being so the negotiations were closed, and a telegram from the hon. gentleman to the Premier of Newfoundland would have enabled him, without a breach of courtesy, to lay these terms before the House, and, therefore, before the people who are to assume the obligations and pay the bill. And who is this committee of council that arrogates to themselves the right to determine, before consultation with the people, what these terms shall be? My hon. friend the leader has put it in a nutshell. The leader of the House wants to submit the terms to us at a period when we cannot judge or modify one of them. We will have to take the terms as a whole, and either accept them holus bolus or reject them holus bolus. It won't be in our power, as the Secretary of State says, to reject them, it won't be in our power to suggest a fair and honest modification. If so, Sir, when these terms come down to us, as agreed upon between the Dominion and the province of Newfoundland, our position will be that simply of ratifying what has been agreed upon, or refusing it altogether, and not of going into the terms to consider how far they may be modified or improved. Is that a fair position to put the representatives of the people in, or the tax-payers in? My position is this: That at the earliest possible period, allowing a reasonable and fair time, these proceedings, now having been finally closed, should be laid before us, published in the papers, submitted to the electorate, thoroughly discussed by them, so that when we come to vote, we may come with an intelligent idea of what we are voting for, with knowledge whether or not we have behind us the wishes or the votes of those whom we represent. That is the position we take, it is the true Liberal policy, and I say it is one in defiance of which the hon. gentleman is flying directly.

Mr. IVES. We have just witnessed the spectacle of the hon. member who has just resumed his seat reproving my hon. friend the leader of the House for having made a stump speech when he himself has just concluded a stump speech, for if the deliverance of the hon. member who has just taken his seat was not a stump speech, it lacks the one good quality that I think his friends would be disposed to give it. There is no constitutional law about it, there certainly is no common sense about it, and if it is not a good stump speech, and has not had an elevating effect upon the back benches, there certainly was no excuse for taking up the time of the House to-day in making it. The hon. gentleman, if he knows anything, must know that the Government can take but the one course, unless he is prepared to take the position that the whole House of Commons, as representing the people of Canada, have a right to take part in the negotiations of this treaty, because it is a treaty, with the colony of Newfoundland, and to discuss the terms pro and con, and to settle them before they can be agreed upon with Newfoundland. If that is not his view, then I say there is not the slightest sense in the position which he takes when he says: Let us know what you are doing before you have cut and dried and settled this matter, so that we may help you and advise you. Now, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman, and I would like to ask his leader, when he thinks that Canada and Newfoundland could come to an arrangement which the people of Canada, and the people of Newfoundland would ratify, if the arrangement was being made publicly, subject to newspaper comment, and to newspaper falsehoods, as well as to discussions in this House?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the hon. gentleman is asking me a question, I will tell him. In the case of the negotiations which were carried on between Prince Edward Island and the Dominion, that course was taken, and the terms were submitted to the people, and the people passed upon them, and they were discussed at every hustings in Prince Edward Island after the legislature had passed upon them.

Mr. IVES. After the terms were agreed upon, and not before.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman is mistaken. Before the terms were agreed to by the legislature, they were submitted to the people.

Mr. IVES. That is another question. What you are asking for now is that the House of Commons should be taken into the confidence of the Government, should be asked to go into the Privy Council chamber, should be asked to sit down with the Government and discuss the terms of this treaty. Now, I ask, when, under those circumstances, would this treaty ever be made? You have your party newspapers, for the sake of compromising the Government, pitching into this proposition, pitching into that proposition; and the Newfoundland papers that are opposing confederation, would take advantage of this proposition, and of that proposition, and no possible arrangement could be made, and the hon. gentleman knows it as well as anybody else.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You are afraid to trust the people.

Mr. IVES. We are not prepared to abdicate the functions of government. The hon. gentleman thought he had got very near the treasury benches, he thought he had a fair prospect of coming here, and he is so much in a hurry to come that he wants to take a hand in making this arrangement. The hon. gentleman has to go through the ceremony of a general election, he has to take his chances in the county of Bothwell, and I am sorry for his sake to hear that they are so much complicated. But he has to take those chances in a rough and tumble way. Possibly the hon. gentleman may have this justification, that if he ever has an opportunity to discuss this treaty, it will have to be before the prorogation of the present Parliament. Now, I cannot help but express my wonder that the hon. gentlemen, who mourn every day of the session that the members should be brought here at such an inconvenient time of the year, should consume three-fourths of the time of this House with such clap-trap motions, and general motions to adjourn the House, as we have had yesterday and today.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The motion was carried yesterday.

Mr. IVES. The House naturally adjourned. It is the first motion the hon. gentlemen have carried for seventeen years, and they were enabled to carry that only by talking it out until midnight, and until my hon. friend the leader of the House was obliged to go home, otherwise, we should have adjourned the House ourselves. I say I cannot help but wonder that hon. gentlemen who are constantly remarking upon the inconvenience of bringing the House together at this season of the year, should be consuming two-thirds of the time of the House and making this an expensive session, when it need not be an expensive one, by making and talking upon these clap-trap motions. I think, Sir, you will have seriously to consider the question as to whether a motion to adjourn can be made by any member of the House on any occasion he chooses, and the discussion continued upon any possible question which may be taken up; and I give this notice, that I intend, upon the next occasion, to raise the point whether a motion to adjourn is a proper motion.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not think it would be right to let this opportunity pass without some reply to the Minister of Finance. He has charged the Opposition with incompetency, he says that they are incapable of discharging the duties that devolve upon them as an Opposition, and that it would be a reproach upon the country to permit them to occupy the treasury benches. I can tell the Minister of Finance that the general opinion throughout this country with regard to the ability of those who happen to occupy the treasury benches is not of the highest. There is in this country very grave doubts as to the capacity of the hon. gentlemen opposite. I have read that on a recent occasion—I do not know whether it was the Minister of Finance, or the Minister of Railways, or whether it was the President of the Council, who, I understand, very often goes to Texas to inspect a ranch he has got there—

An hon. MEMBER. The Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not know which of them, or how many of them were together.

Mr. IVES. I understand the hon. gentleman is a money lender, and I would like to borrow something on my Texas grant. I do not want, however, to pay 24 per cent.

Mr. McMULLEN. I should like to make advances so soon as I understand what are the hon. gentleman's collaterals.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What is your rate of interest.

Mr. McMULLEN. I understand that when some hon. gentlemen opposite went on one of their trips to the United States, they entered a hotel where a long, lanky Yankee was sitting.

Mr. IVES. May I ask if he is any relation of the hon. gentleman?

Mr. McMULLEN. I will tell the hon. gentleman that I did not inquire as to whether he was a distant relation to the Minister of Trade and Commerce or not. But I understand he inquired who the visitors were, and some persons present informed him that they were Her Majesty's Privy Council from Canada. After taking a good look at these gentlemen and drawing a long breath, he said: "Well, if these are the Queen's Privy Council from Canada, I say from the bottom of my heart, and for the first time, here and now, 'God save the Queen'." I thought I would give the hon. gentlemen that opinion, as the Finance Minister appeared to challenge the abilities possessed by the Opposition. Now, I have given hon. gentlemen opposite an opinion of a stranger, one residing outside of Canada, and one altogether independent.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. DICKEY. The diplomatic episode having closed, it becomes my duty to say a few words on the motion in amendment to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and I am afraid I shall have to strike a somewhat lower key than did the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), and I think I shall have a good deal of difficulty in making such a subject as the Budget interesting after the very warm addresses to which the House has just listened. However, I desire to offer a few remarks with respect to the arguments addressed to the House by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson). I was disappointed to find the hon. gentleman had fallen, to some extent, into the old rut of the prophet Jeremiah, bewailing the condition of Canada in the good old set terms. I do not propose this afternoon to weary the House with any detailed figures, because, in the very able addresses presented on both sides of the House on this question this year and on previous years, the subject has been discussed at very great length; but there are one or two points in the remarks offered by the hon. member for Brant to which I wish to direct attention. The hon. gentleman, in proof of the bad condition of affairs in Canada, referred to the foreign trade in 1894, as compared with the foreign trade in 1874. It was said, I believe, by Mr. Mills, not our esteemed friend from Bothwell, but a gentleman who has acquired some fame in the American Republic, that figures will not lie, but figures will lie. I should be very sorry, indeed, to class the hon. member for Brant in the category of those figurers; but there is a way of handling figures which certainly does not convey really a correct impression, and I hardly think that hon. gentleman was exactly candid in picking out the year 1874 and comparing it with 1894. What was the hon. gentleman's object in referring to the figures connected with the trade of the country? I suppose it was, to some extent, to indicate the business carried on. If that was his object, why did he not refer to the internal trade of the country, that trade which far exceeds in every country, and in Canada as well, both in volume, in profit and in general good the foreign trade many times over. If the hon. gentleman wished to show the progress which this country had made, why did he not refer to the internal trade? We had no statistics of that trade, but we have railway and shipping returns, the great corporations, of course, keep returns of their traffic, and it is well known that the internal business of the country has enormously developed during the last few years. The tons of freight carried on the railways were four times, in 1894, the number carried in 1875, the coast shipping in 1894 was twice that in 1878. Ships do not sail and trains do not run for amusement, but to do business, and taking these examples, they show that the actual work done by the people has enormously increased since the Conservative party has been governing the country.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Taking the coast-wise shipping: Does the hon. gentleman include inland shipping as well?

Mr. DICKEY. I am not able to tell the hon. gentleman at the moment. I think it is sea-coast shipping entirely.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). In the hon. gentleman's return of railway tonnage carried, was that tonnage carried between inter-provincial points?

Mr. DICKEY. No, it was the total tonnage.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman, I understood, stated that there was four times the tonnage carried as regards interprovincial trade. How does he arrive at that conclusion? Has not the hon. gentleman included tonnage carried from one part of the United States to another, and given that as proof of increased trade?

Mr. DICKEY. I do not give these figures as showing the exact ratio of tonnage carried between one year and another. I gave these facts as affording an indication of the general increase of trade done by the people, and I said that the amount of freight carried on the railways is four times as much to-day as it was some years ago. That, I submit, is a perfectly legitimate argument to use. Does the hon. gentleman say that it does not show that there has been an increase? He will scarcely do so, I think. The hon. gentleman, in taking the foreign trade as the measure of work done, very conveniently excluded all mining carried on in this country. The results of this mining industry do not appear in the Trade Returns, and the returns for Nova Scotia, for example, are not included in any blue-book. I do not propose, however, to go over this question in detail so far as figures are concerned. I simply, at this stage, make that statement, and I take that instance of the volume of trade because the hon. member for Brant used it, and I contend that whatever fair test is applied to the business of this country, except the business of the present year, which I shall deal with later on, it will be found that its trade and its work has been progressing by leaps and bounds. Take the test used by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) as to the prosperity of a country. He said that if we imported largely and paid for the importations, our people are prosperous, that this is a sign of prosperity. We imported, in 1893, 50 per cent more goods than in 1879, and no doubt we paid for them. If that is to be a test of prosperity, we are 50 per cent more prosperous than in 1879. But, as I said before, figures can be manipulated and made to convey an unfair impression to people outside. The hon. gentlemen opposite manipulate figures one way and hon. members on this side of the House do it in the opposite direction.

Hon. gentlemen on that side of the House say that this country is going to destruction, and hon. gentlemen on this side of the House say that everything is rosy. Now, let us take expressions of opinion outside of this House, and in doing that I will choose authorities which should carry some weight with hon. gentlemen opposite. I will take two classes of authorities. In the first place, politicians belonging to their own party of hon. gentlemen opposite, but politicians who are not speaking immediately for political purposes; politicians who are stating fairly and frankly what they believe to be the condition of this country, and I will put their statements alongside the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite, leaving the country to judge which is more likely to be correct. I suppose that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are familiar with the Hon. J. W. Longley, a prominent member of the Liberal Administration of Nova Scotia. In the "Fortnightly Review" in the year 1890, the Hon. Mr. Longley had an article in which he said of Canada:

It has a population of at least five millions and is rapidly growing. It has large cities and rising towns, its trade is expanding and its wealth accumulating. It has two of the greatest railway lines in the world. Canada cannot be charged at home or abroad with lack of natural enterprise. Wealth is being rapidly accumulated by the steady progress of trade and industries. Things are moving up wonderfully well at present, and, to sum up, Canada is prosperous, contented and happy.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What date does the hon. gentleman say that is?

Mr. DICKEY. In 1890, when the hon. member (Mr. Davies) and his friends were preaching blue ruin as blue as they could paint it. In 1887 Sir Oliver Mowat, then the Hon. Mr. Mowat, also made a deliverance upon the condition of the country. He had no party purposes to serve, he did not want to turn out any Government and get into power himself, and he was speaking simply his genuine opinions on this subject. He said of Canada:

A comparison of the statistics of both countries (Canada and the United States) for the past half century would show that the percentage in every department was greater in Canada than it is on the aggregate in the United States, and as Canada had prospered in the past, so she would prosper in the future.

That was the opinion of Sir Oliver Mowat in 1887. In 1891 Sir Oliver Mowat said:

Our farmers as a class, or our mechanics as a class, or our labourers as a class, whatever the reasons may be, are not less comfortable on the whole than the farmers, mechanics and the labourers of the United States appear to be.

Mr. Fielding, Premier of Nova Scotia, speaking in London in 1891, said: that things in Canada were in a satisfactory condition. The hon. the leader of the Opposition himself, having got so far away from the influence of his colleague (Sir Richard Cartwright) as Boston, ventured to open his heart and to say, notwithstanding all that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and his colleagues behind him had been saying in this House: that Canada was growing, developing and progressing. Mr. Harcourt, the Provincial Treasurer of Ontario, said, in September, 1892:

Mr. DICKEY.

Decade after decade witnessed progress and advancement in every direction and in every part of the province of Ontario.

Now, Sir, I think that we have to some extent made a convert of the hon. the leader of the Opposition. When he is in the House I notice that he does not dare to say very much that is optimistic, through fear, I suppose, of his hon. friend beside him. But he was away off in Victoria, B.C., far from the malign influences of that hon. gentleman, and it seemed as if he were answering a statement of his own colleague made in the House some years ago. In the year 1887 the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said, in his Budget speech:

Is confederation such a blessing as to be worth the struggle to preserve?

The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) had got so blue that he was almost willing to throw up our nationality. Probably that saying lingered in the mind of the leader of the Opposition, and as if answering it, he said, in Victoria:

The time has come when the country has realized that Canadian citizenship is worth living for, and worth dying for if need be.

Mr. LAURIER. Hear, hear. You do not object to that.

Mr. DICKEY. Not at all. Sir, I have quoted from the opinions of some of the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite, speaking when they had no aim except to convey their exact opinions as to the real position of matters in Canada. Let us take another class of observers of the condition of the country. Take the financial men. Take the statement of Mr. Hague, General Manager of the Merchants Bank, made last October in London, and published, I think, in the "Daily Chronicle." He says:

As to the progress of the country, take the following facts, which I can vouch for personally. Having lived in England some twenty-five years, I went out to Canada about forty years ago. The whole of the deposits owned by the people in all the banks and savings banks of the country were then less than £3,000,000 sterling. They are now over £50,000,000, and have been steadily increasing. The farmers' deposits—I speak again from personal knowledge—have been steadily increasing during the whole time already referred to. At the same time these very farmers, who, it must be remembered, owned their land, have been developing their land and improving it by new buildings, fences, drains and clearings, year by year steadily up to the present time.

There is a recent opinion from a man who is recognized as a high authority in financial circles. Mr. Speaker, I could multiply that class of opinions, but I shall not do so now. I will give the hon. gentlemen, if they wish, opinions from another class of observers of our country. I will call into the witness box men in the United States who are watching the progress of Canada and taking an interest in it as our experiment in government goes forward. Mr. David A. Wells, who is well known as an economic student and who is certainly not favourable to the fiscal system which Canada has adopted, wrote in the "Forum," I think, in February a year ago. He was speaking of the depression and financial trouble in the United States, and he said :

In the Dominion of Canada, separated territorially from us on the north by an imaginary line, there has been no panic, no unusual demand for money, no stoppage of industries, no restriction of trade, no increased rate of interest, in short, nothing beyond the ordinary course of events, except so far as these events may have been influenced by contiguity to what may be termed a financial cyclone whose pathway of destruction was contiguous but not within its own territory.

There is an opinion from a man who is entirely above any influence with reference to party politics in this country, a man who has made a special study of economic questions, and who is to-day observing closely the progress of economic problems in every country in the world. Mr. Speaker, there is one more class of testimony I want to call attention to, and that is the testimony of a man who spoke on the floor of the United States Congress, and a man who referred to the progress of Canada as evidence of the great benefits of the protective system. I quote from a speech by the Hon. Joseph H. Walker, one of the representatives of Massachusetts, who says :

The product of capital and wages of the factories in existence in 1878 in six years was half as much again ; the product two-thirds more ; the wages half as much again as when the tariff was adopted. In the language of the gentleman from Texas (Mr. Mills), why does not Canada "take down the bars," "remove the obstructions," or else they will "within a few years be roosting on the tops of their chimney stacks?" The wages of the workmen in Canada have advanced about one-third within that period. The case of Canada proves that it was not possible for her to increase her exports or imports until she had adopted a protective tariff to employ her own people. Canada is richer by every dollar of her manufactures than before she adopted protection. That much more opportunity for work was furnished.

So that, without dealing with figures, which may be manipulated, I have taken the independent opinions of men favouring the politics of hon. gentlemen opposite : I have taken the opinions of financial men in this country, of economic students in the United States, and of men in the Congress of the United States ; and they all lead to one conclusion, that in past years Canada has been progressing steadily and with great strides. Sir, in private life a pessimist is a trouble and a grief to his friends ; in public life a pessimist is a nuisance and a danger. The men who settled this country years ago and hewed out homes for themselves in the forest, were no pessimists ; they had none of the pessimistic spirit in them. The men who do the business of this country to-day, run its manufacturing establishments, its lumbering and mining industries, are not pessimists ; if they were, they would accomplish nothing in the world. The people of this country, especially the young men, like to have men in charge of their affairs who take a hopeful and confident view of the country's future. They find such men in the leaders of the Liberal-Conservative party, who, whatever their faults, have always looked forward with confidence to the future of Canada. The Conservative party has committed errors ; it will commit errors again ; but I say to hon. gentlemen opposite, that a persistent and buoyant spirit of confidence in Canada's future, such as has always characterized and at present characterizes the Liberal-Conservative party, is a mantle which will cover more sins than that party will ever commit. I say further to hon. gentlemen opposite—though I suppose they will not thank me very much for any advice that I tender them—that unless they reform, not the tariff, but themselves and their views of the country's future, and imbibe some of the optimistic views of the Liberal-Conservative party, they will never occupy the treasury benches. All progress and all prosperity is relative. There is no country in the world that is supremely happy or where everybody is wealthy. The question at issue between the Liberal-Conservative party and the Liberal party is this : Has Canada from 1879 forward progressed steadily and been prosperous ? Hon. gentlemen opposite represent that these have been years of boom, and that Canada has been simply getting the benefit of general good times throughout the world. Now, let us test that assertion. Let us see what the London "Times" and the London "Economist" have to say with regard to the industrial history of England during the last thirteen or fourteen years. The "Times" of December 10, 1883, says :

Slackness began in 1881, and for the past two years the depression has been increasing. Great industries are admittedly in distress.

Mr. Chamberlin, who may be regarded as a prejudiced witness perhaps, being a politician, speaking in Hull in 1883, said :

We have been suffering from a depression in trade unexampled in its intensity and duration.

The "Times" in the summer of 1884, said :

Trade continues depressed. The prospect is cheerless.

The "Economist" on February 21, 1885, said :

Instead of the improvement to which many were inclined to look for, there has been increased depression, and we have undoubtedly been feeling the pinch of hard times more severely than for many years.

On February 13, 1886, the "Economist" said :

Turning to the exports to foreign countries, we find a serious decline, viz., of foreign trade in 1885, £17,027,000, or over 11 per cent.

On April 3, 1886, the "Economist" said :

The depression of trade, which at first affected mainly the capitalist class, is now pressing heavily upon the working population. There is less work for them to do, and they get less for the work done.

On February 19, 1887, the "Economist" said of the trade of 1886 :

The value of our imports during the past twelve months was 5·7 per cent less than in 1875, and in the value of our exports there was a decrease of 0·3 per cent.

On January 9, 1892, the "Economist" said of the trade of 1891 :

To judge from the business circulars and local summaries relating to the state of trade throughout the country during the past year, it would appear to have been of a very chequered character. The most disappointing branch of business in 1891 has clearly been our foreign trade.

On January 9, 1892, the "Economist," speaking of farming in 1891, said :

Whatever the financial result of the past year may be, as far as the farmers are concerned, they will always remember it as one of the most unseasonable, worrying and expensive of years.

On January 14, 1893, the "Economist," speaking of the trade of 1892, said :

On the whole year the value of our imports shows a falling off of about eleven and three-fourths millions sterling, and of this no less than ten and a quarter millions was in the last two months.

I need not refer to the official inquiries that have been taking place in England into the state of business there. Commissions have been appointed by the Government to inquire into the condition of agriculture and into the condition of trade generally. So that during all these years the mother country, with her enormous wealth, has been suffering from financial depression, while Canada during the same period has been enjoying a fair measure of commercial prosperity. It has always struck me, Sir, since I have had the honour of a seat in this House, in listening to debates upon the Budget, that hon. gentlemen opposite, in dealing with the subject of depression in trade, never cite independent authorities. They state their own convictions, and they manipulate figures to suit themselves ; but they never cite a financial or business authority outside. They have never been in the habit of offering to this House independent opinion except during the present year, when they are able to get it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We cite blue-books.

Mr. DICKEY. I quite admit that they cite blue-books, and you can prove anything out of blue-books, just as you can out of the Bible. The hon. member for Bothwell knows very well that the figures contained in our blue-books may be so manipulated as to make anything appear, and as to lead to endless argument, one side refuting, while the other side affirms. But where are the independent authorities that the hon. gentlemen have ever cited in this House. Except with reference to one railway corporation in this country, I do not believe that the hon. gentleman can find any independent authority stating that during these years past, of which I am speaking, the condition of Canada had been otherwise than very prosperous. We have come down to 1890, and in 1890 the greatest financial disturbance of modern times began. It began apparently in Portugal, which became bankrupt. Then the South African mining boom collapsed, causing enormous loss of capital. Then the Argentine Republic went to smash and struck down Baring Bros. and a lot of other banking and financial firms in London. In 1892 the cloud burst in Australia, land values went down to nothing, and fourteen banks out of twenty-six were wound up. In 1893 came the financial collapse in the United States. I ask any hon. gentleman who has studied the question, whether up to the year 1893 the condition of Canada did not compare favourably with that of any country in the world. We have taken a dip, and it is only because we have taken a dip that we can see the high level at which we were travelling before. The hon. gentleman will have no difficulty now in finding quotations to prove the hard times. The moment hard times come, business men feel it, and hon. gentlemen opposite may now find quotations which they had not during the past year. But there is one feature about these hard times which is not sufficiently considered. If the conditions of this country were so bad as regards its administration and its tariff, surely this would have been one of the first countries to be struck by any wave of financial depression. Yet, there is not, I believe, in this House one hon. gentleman who will be bold enough to say that the depression existing in Canada to-day arose within its bounds and did not come from outside.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The same in 1878.

Mr. DICKEY. I am not as familiar with the financial history of 1878 as the hon. member for Bothwell has sad reason to be. But there is no doubt that in Canada, as

Mr. David A. Wells has said, we are feeling the ground swell of the enormous tornado which has swept over the commercial ocean elsewhere. It is absolutely inevitable that we should. No tariff could absolutely protect any country, no effort that human beings could put forth could protect any community from the effects of the world-wide depression, more or less. With our railways, with our extended trade, it is absolutely inevitable that the trade depression should affect more or less every country in the world. It looks extremely probable, judging from business men, and not from politicians who have ends to serve, that we are coming out of this depression. If we are, the success with which the ship of Canada has weathered this financial storm will be one of the most striking testimonies to the excellence of the system under which it is governed that ever has been offered, better even than the progress Canada made during more prosperous years. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) then referred to the tariff and the industrial figures of the census, and he gave us to understand that these figures were entirely unreliable. I do not blame the hon. member for Brant for doing that. I do not blame the hon. member for South Oxford for discrediting the industrial increase under the tariff. They are like the beaver in the story, they had to do it. As long as those figures stand uncontradicted, they furnish an answer of record to all the statements of blue ruin which the hon. gentlemen opposite have made, and an answer so clear that a child could understand it. Having a bad case, if those figures be true, what was their course? It was to get rid of the figures at all cost. Abuse the men who compiled the figures, abuse the system under which they were compiled. That is the only course left open. The hon. gentlemen have been preaching for years that the country is going to the dogs, but the census has taken a photograph which proves that the hon. gentlemen are absolutely wrong. Does any one suppose that hon. gentlemen opposite are so Christian-like as to admit the corn, and say that they were wrong, and that the country was really progressing? Not at all. But they do as a lawyer does who has a bad case. They abuse the plaintiff, they abuse the men who made the figures, they abuse the system. The leader of the Opposition is fond of discovering conspiracies. I do not know whether he thinks there was a conspiracy among the enumerators from Halifax to Vancouver to cook up census returns. We are asked to suppose that the men who went through the North-west were in a conspiracy with somebody at Ottawa to cook the census returns. But whether the hon. gentleman believes this or not, he will never get the country to believe it, no matter how often he may repeat it. The people know that these figures were taken throughout the Dominion by hundreds of men not connected with each other at all, and men of different creeds, nationalities and politics.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. DICKEY. I can tell the hon. gentleman that there were men of different politics engaged in this work. The leader of the Opposition will never get this country to believe that all these men conspired together to cook up a lot of figures in order to bolster up the policy of the Government. Why did they not begin at the right end? If they were conspirators, why did not they bolster up the population figures? Why not make us believe that we had a larger population in this country than we actually have? The two acts are inconsistent. The enumerators are honest, because they stated the population far lower than the Government would like to have shown it. And when the hon. gentlemen find that in the census, they are bound to take the figures that tell against them; because the one set of figures show that the other set are made by men who were honestly doing their duties as they understood them and under the instructions they received. If the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to look to other sources, he will find corroboration of these figures. Let him look to other books on this subject. Let him take independent figures published in the United States of America. For instance, let him take "Denslow's Economic Philosophy" and books of that kind published in the United States, and he will find that the people over there, through their consuls, through their various commercial agencies here, collect figures that are substantially the same as those given in the census. As to the industrial figures, the country will accept them, not as literally correct, but as substantially correct. Now, Sir, the population is not satisfactory. Nobody disputes that. I do not propose to discuss that subject at length. There was a difference in the method of taking this census as compared with the last. That has been discussed here very many times before. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that the policy of the Government is responsible for the unsatisfactory population. Well, Sir, I suppose that we in Canada will have to make up our minds that the enormous mass of population in the United States will have a certain effect, similar to that of any large body upon a smaller body under the law of gravitation. The units of population around the city of London tend to fly into London. The statistics of population throughout the whole world show that population tends towards large centres, and that a large mass of population will always have an attractive force. We must deal with that, we must accept it and work out the problem under it. Nobody knew it then, because these laws have been developed since. But it is known now that there is a continuous tendency of population from the country to the cities. And the only policy for us now, in the light of experience, if we wished to keep population in this country, was a policy that would build up cities, towns and villages, because we know that, in spite of us, and in spite of economic laws, there is some occult, powerful law dragging people from the country to the city, which law no economic conditions can control. The only plan, then, is to build up prosperous, happy centres of population within the Dominion, to which the people can go for whatever it is they desire when they go to the centres of population. And that has been the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party. Any policy that failed to encourage the manufacturing interests of this country during the last decade, would have been hopelessly fatal to the population of this country. No matter how prosperous the Government made the farmer, you have not have resisted the drain that goes on all over the world from the country to the city; and the only way to deal with it was to provide the people cities to live in and work in. There is no originality about the Government policy now. It is the policy of protection to the farm, to the workshop, and to the mine; it is the policy of developing this country by means of communication favouring the extension of trade—railways, canals and steamships, and by the erection of public works wherever they may be justified by trade conditions. It is a policy that hon. gentlemen opposite do not seem to like. But it is the policy favoured by the country and endorsed by the people, time and again, against the protest of hon. gentlemen opposite. It is a policy which has carried the country three or four times, and the policy that will carry the country again. I was somewhat surprised to hear the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) say there had been no change of policy on the part of his party. Does the hon. gentleman remember the phrase "unrestricted reciprocity"? Does the hon. leader of the Opposition retain in his mind any lingering reminiscence of the policy of unrestricted reciprocity? I should like to refresh his memory with some of the brave words which he spoke of unrestricted reciprocity in years that have gone by. In the year 1889, he said:

I have read the history of unrestricted reciprocity in this way, that every reform has cost the reformers years of labour, and those years of labour I, for one, am prepared to give; and, though the Democrats may be defeated in the States, and though Canadians may grow faint-hearted in Canada, the Liberal party, as long as I have anything to do with it, will remain true to the cause until that cause is successful. I do not expect to win in a day, but I am prepared to remain in the cool shades of opposition until the cause has triumphed, and you shall never hear a complaint from me.

The hon. gentleman has grown faint-hearted. The hon. gentleman is still in the cold shades of opposition, but he is not supporting unrestricted reciprocity to-day. The hon. gentleman went on to say:

I tell you the Liberal party will never cease this agitation until they triumph and obtain continental free trade. We are asked sometimes, gentlemen, what is the programme of the Liberal party. This is the programme of the Liberal party—to obtain continental freedom of trade.

* * * * *
Success will certainly crown our efforts at no distant day: fixing our eyes steadily upon the goal, we shall go on steadily until we reach it—unrestricted continental reciprocity.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a new one.

Mr. DICKEY. Yes, that was a combination. Sir, I need not do more than call the attention of this House to the utterances of the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). He told this country and this House that nothing would save the people of Canada except unrestricted reciprocity. He told the farmers of this country how much unrestricted reciprocity would add to the price of their products. He told them that it would increase the price of their horses $30 per horse, and he figured the farmers into millionaires as soon as unrestricted reciprocity should come. Why does the hon. gentleman desert the cause of the farmer to-day? Was his judgment wrong then, or was he deliberately deceiving the farmer? Which horn of the dilemma will he take? Did he know that what he said was not correct? Did the hon. gentleman himself, or the hon. member for South Oxford, or the leader of the Opposition know then that they were talking nonsense to the farmers? Or were they, as I believe, deceived. Why, Sir, read the speeches of the leader of the Opposition now, and he tells the same story. He writes in free trade instead of unrestricted reciprocity; and to-day he is going to stand just as long beside the policy of free trade as he did before beside the policy of unrestricted reciprocity, and I dare say not a day longer. The hon. gentleman's pledges upon the trade policy are worth nothing at all. He has told the people of this country, under his responsibility as a public man, that his party has deliberately adopted a policy. He has promised them upon public platforms in various constituencies, as solemnly as a public man can promise, that he would run an election upon it, that he would fight for that policy to the last; and yet the hon. gentleman has betrayed those constituencies, he has given up that policy, he has surrendered the policy upon which he ran his election, and to-day he comes to us with a new policy. There is only one hon. gentleman, perhaps, in the House that really has a lingering affection for that dead infant, and that is the hon. gentleman from South Oxford, who disputed the paternity of the infant, I believe, with Mr. Goldwin Smith and Mr. Erastus Wiman. But if the hon. gentleman for South Oxford does cherish these feelings in his heart, he keeps his sentiments and convictions as secretly to himself as the leader of the Opposition keeps his convictions of the Manitoba school question.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Where are yours on that question?

Mr. DICKEY. I will be prepared to discuss the question with the leader of the Opposition when it arises. I have no doubt that there are many men who followed the leader of the Opposition in years past who knew that his policy was wrong. I have no doubt many of those who sat behind him did not agree with the policy he was advocating. They claim to be a Liberal party, they claim to be an independent party, yet we saw throughout this country independent Liberals leaving the ranks of their party because unrestricted reciprocity was their policy. Was there one independent man on the other side of the House who dared to vote against his leader on that question, whatever his private opinions may have been? Was there one of them who had the hardihood to come out and say: This unrestricted reciprocity policy of yours is a farce and a fraud, and I will have none of it? No, Sir, whether they were convinced, or whether they were coerced, not one of them had sufficient independence to help the people of Canada rid themselves of a policy like that. So, Sir, what are we to think of their convictions on the question of free trade? What are we to say of their convictions on the National Policy? Their words are of no avail, their pledges are of no avail, their promises amount to nothing. We have no guarantee whatever that any hon. gentleman opposite believes in free trade. Is there an hon. gentleman opposite who is a free trader?

Mr. GILLMOR. Yes.

Mr. DICKEY. One.

Mr. EDWARDS. Two.

Mr. CHARLTON. Three.

Mr. DICKEY. I suppose if I had asked any of those hon. gentlemen a few years ago if he was an unrestricted reciprocity man, he would have answered, yes. Sir, everybody knows now, it is what the Conservatives were saying on the platform everywhere during the campaign of 1891, that this country was saved from a great danger when the Liberal party was beaten in 1891. Everybody knows we were saved from a great danger, and the Liberals themselves realized it after the crash in the United States, and they changed their policy. The best proof that the country was saved from a danger is the fact that the hon. gentleman and his friends dare not go to the country to-day on the policy which they advocated in 1891. Sir, this is the same policy as unrestricted reciprocity, is it? Why, Sir, it is not only not the same policy, it is a right-about-face policy. It is not a reciprocity policy, but it is a policy that makes reciprocity impossible. How can you gain reciprocity under free trade? How many reciprocity treaties has England? None, except what she has with people who sell her wine, and those things upon which she levies a customs duty. If you have free trade, or if you lower your duties substantially, on what basis are you going to the United States to ask for reciprocity? The hon. leader of the Opposition has told us one thing about his policy. He has told us that he intends to give us free coal and free iron. There is one thing clear, and that is that he is going to put the knife into Nova Scotia. He is going to sacrifice the coal mines and the iron mines of Nova Scotia, there is no doubt about that. He is going to attempt to do that. But I will put it upon another ground. I do not know what his pledges are worth, but he pledged the people of Montreal on a public platform that he would give them free coal. If he keeps his promise, he will give away one of the most valuable levers for reciprocity with United States that we have in Canada, and he will find that he will sacrifice not only the interests of the miners and of the people of Nova Scotia, but he will sacrifice the interests of other men throughout the country who desire reciprocity with the United States. Sir, what is this free trade, or revenue tariff? I suppose that they are related, somewhat as commercial union used to be related to unrestricted reciprocity; you can call it what you like. The present resolution is in favour of a revenue tariff. Now, I would like to invite the attention of the leader of the Opposition to the utterance of a gentleman who led that party years ago. In 1880, the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, speaking of Sir John Macdonald, said:

Whenever any one changes his policy with the chameleon-like frequency characteristic of the hon. member, it is time to give up talking about patriotism or anything of that kind.

I do not know whether that can be applied to the hon. gentleman's trade policy. Let me now quote from his free trade speech at Winnipeg:

We shall give you freer trade, and, although it will be a hard fight, we shall not give in one inch or retrace one step until we shall have reached the goal, and that goal is the same policy of free trade as exists in England to-day.

Exactly the same language that was used two or three years ago about unrestricted reciprocity, and that language was not worth the breath that was spent in uttering the words. And what confidence will the people of Canada have in the hon. gentleman's promises when he says that he will stand by the policy of free trade until he carries it? Once more, in speaking at the Liberal Convention in Ottawa, the hon. gentleman said:

Protection is a fraud and a robbery. * * *
The policy should be a policy of free trade such as they have in England.

Sir Richard Cartwright said:

The National Policy is a system for duping and plundering. * * * A thousand millions of dollars has been taken from the people of this country during the last fifteen years by the National Policy. * * * The National Policy is a crime.

Does the hon. gentleman endorse that?

Mr. GILLMOR. I do.

Mr. DICKEY. The only free trader in the Opposition endorses that statement. The hon. gentleman from South Oxford said that protection was a crime, and a blunder. He said again:

You can have no true liberty under protection.

I do not presume to be able to define protection and free trade; but there is a rough way of getting at it, as we understand it in practical life. Protection is placing a duty upon goods which are produced in the country. Free trade, as in England, is placing a duty upon goods which are not produced in the country, and, therefore, there must be more than the duty added to the cost.

Mr. GILLMOR. Hear, hear.

Mr. DICKEY. I am glad to observe that the only free trader in the House agrees with that statement. The protection accorded to manufacturers is objectionable to hon. gentlemen opposite for this reason: They say that not only do you pay the duty, but the article manufactured in the country is put up in price by the amount of the duty, and, therefore, the consumer who buys such an article pays the duty, the consumer pays an additional price for that equivalent.

Mr. GILLMOR. That is it.

Mr. DICKEY. But hon. gentlemen opposite say that is plunder and fraud.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DICKEY. I ask the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) if such words, when used by him mean anything? Are hon. gentlemen opposite willing to rob to the extent of 17½ per cent? Is it a question of percentage?

Mr. GILLMOR. Yes.

Mr. DICKEY. The hon. gentleman is willing to steal 17½ per cent, but not 25 per cent.

Mr. GILLMOR. That is not my idea of free trade.

Mr. DICKEY.

Mr. DICKEY. Then the hon. gentleman, as a free trader, should oppose any duty whatever being imposed on any manufactured article.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. DICKEY. Yes, because it is said to be robbery. Is there any principle underlying the statement of the hon. gentleman? Does the statement made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) mean anything? Or does the hon. gentleman, in using the terms robbery and fraud, simply use figurative language, mean nothing? If so, we can feel easier in our minds as to what the hon. gentleman said about the tariff. If the hon. gentleman means what he said, that it is a policy of robbery and fraud, the hon. gentleman will be dishonest if he agrees to 1 per cent of protection on any manufactured article.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Not at all.

Mr. DICKEY. This policy enunciated in the amendment, I suppose, means something. It means free trade, as they have it in England. Let us look at it. The first and cardinal principle of free trade, as they have it in England, is—and I think the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) will agree with me—free food.

Mr. GILLMOR. Yes.

Mr. DICKEY. Therefore, the first thing we must do is to wipe out the protection given to our farmers. The hon. gentleman may not be able to carry out his whole scheme, but he will, no doubt, take the step Mr. Cobden took, and remove the duty from meats, wheat, grain, and flour, and those articles which the farmers of this country produce. Will the hon. gentleman take the duty off manufactured articles to meet the protection which he is taking away from the farmers? Is he prepared to give any assurance on that point?

Mr. GILLMOR. I shall make a speech after you get through.

Mr. DICKEY. What is the effect of the duty on farm products? Take the case of pork. In 1890, this Government placed a duty on pork. In that year we imported, roughly speaking, $1,500,000 worth of pork, and exported pork to the value of $640,000. We put a duty on pork. What was the effect? Within three years we imported pork to the value of only $361,000 instead of $1,500,000, and we exported pork to the value of $2,000,000 against $640,000. So that the farmers of this country got a net gain on account of that duty of nearly $2,500,000 in the year 1893.

Mr. MARTIN. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the duty enabled the farmers to export pork?

Mr. DICKEY. Certainly. I am not here to discuss the abstract principles of free trade and protection ; but the hon. gentleman certainly knows that anything which stimulates the production of an article, until a man gets a large quantity on hand, will enable him to send it abroad.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). If the National Policy stimulated industries during the years from 1890 to 1893 so as to be able to enable the farmers to export 62,000,000 pounds of pork, what stimulated the export of 85,750,000 pounds from 1874 to 1878 ?

Mr. DICKEY. I am not at all prepared to answer that question. The hon. gentleman need not put that question to me—I know these questions are not such as can be disposed of off-hand, with yea or nay. If the hon. gentleman asks a fair question, I shall give him an answer. There might be a dozen causes for such a state of things. We will take another fact. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say that these are Conservative figures which were taken from the blue-books. Let hon. members refer to the returns of the Ontario Government, and they will find that in 1889 the farmers of Ontario alone owned 835,000 hogs, while in 1894 they owned 1,150,000 hogs, or an increase of 300,000 hogs in that time. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) has not always been so particular with respect to protection, and as I am replying to the speech made by that hon. gentleman, I thought I would look up his record a little on the question of protection. I do not intend to refer to his old record ; I will not recall to the hon. gentleman the speeches in favour of protection he delivered in 1876. I think we should allow the statute of limitations to apply to them, and not trouble him further. But I will call attention to speeches delivered at a later period by that hon. gentleman, in which he expressed his willingness to be a robber to the extent of 17½ tariff. In 1882, as will be found on page 394 of "Hansard," the hon. gentleman said :

I am willing * * * to give the manufacturers 17½ per cent protection. * * * I am one of those who believe in building up the manufacturing industries of this country, and, with a view of doing this, they must have some advantage, and that they cannot exist without some such advantage.

That was the doctrine of the hon. gentleman in 1882. He said further, in the same speech :

I admitted then (in 1876), as I admit now, that my policy would be a defensive one, and that in raising the revenue of this country, if foreign goods were being slaughtered, * * * that I would use the tariff as a means of securing the revenue, and at the same time affording encouragement to the industries natural to this country.

On page 397 the hon. gentleman is reported to have said :

While I am willing and anxious, and while the party with which I am connected are willing to arrange the tariff so as to give fair protection to manufacturers, they felt, and feel, bound at the same time to deal fairly with them (consuming classes).

So the hon. gentleman, at that time, did not hold the strong views he appears to hold to-day. I have not discussed this question as a matter of abstract theory.

Mr. LAURIER. That is quite evident.

Mr. DICKEY. I believe that political economy is one of the most difficult subjects you can approach. I have considered it simply in the light of plain facts that the ordinary men of the country appreciate. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite know that whenever an industry becomes established in a county or town, any proposal for its removal is a matter of consternation, not only to the inhabitants of the town, but to all the farmers who live in its neighbourhood. Hon. gentlemen are perfectly well aware that a policy which produces factories will give employment and furnish a market for farm produce, that a policy which produces factories develops the country's resources and affords employment, irrespective of any theory or fine-spun talk whatever. The unrestricted reciprocity policy very nearly carried this country. It had some merits. Its advocates told the manufacturers that they would get the benefit of the American markets and be able to build up their establishments, and there was something in it. The policy of unrestricted reciprocity was unknown, and there is great truth in the old adage that the unknown is always magnificent. Free trade is not unknown, a revenue tariff is not unknown. We had a tariff from 1874 to 1878.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Try 1868, you had better.

Mr. DICKEY. Yes, I am willing to discuss that matter, too, with the hon. gentleman, but I do not propose to be interrupted just now. The revenue tariff has a record. That record is that it shuts off all hope of reciprocity with the United States of America. A revenue tariff will certainly produce the direst distress—and I am speaking in all earnestness—in the coal mines of Nova Scotia. It will close down factories. It will repeat in Canada the experience of the United States when they tried adopting the principles of free trade upon a very modified scale a few years ago, an experiment which has swept the Democratic party of the United States out of sight altogether. However, if hon. gentlemen opposite are satisfied with this policy, I am quite sure that the Liberal-Conservative party are satisfied with it, and I tell them here, as my leader told them this afternoon, that we challenge the verdict of the country upon the issue, free trade or protection. And when we go to the country, and when the country understands this question, as members on this side of the House shall take care that they do understand it, the Liberal-Conservative party will have no fear of the verdict.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I regret, that having taken up the time of the House at some length yesterday. I should again so soon, have to address this Assembly, but I have some remarks to make in connection with the subject before the House, and I suppose it matters very little whether I make them, now or a few days later. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Dickey) has dealt more largely with the question of the tariff than with the question of the finances of the country. I shall endeavour during the progress of my remarks to pay some attention to the arguments which he has brought forward, but I shall leave it more in the hands of those who follow me in this debate to discuss this question of tariff policy which he has raised, because it is my intention to devote myself more especially to the question of the condition of the finances of the country as elaborated in the speech of the hon. the Minister of Finance. The Budget speech was, as has been pointed out on this side of the House, devoted entirely to a discussion of our finances, leaving out almost entirely any consideration of the question of the National Policy, which in previous years formed the great burden of the Finance Minister's remarks. I must say that I listened to the exposition of our finances made by the hon. Minister with great pleasure, and I have to say that he certainly presented our financial position in its most favourable aspect from his standpoint. However that may be, his arguments, his statements, and his illustrations were, to my mind, most unfair and misleading, and I shall endeavour to show that his comparisons are inaccurate, and that if they are carried out in the same direction they tell entirely against him instead of for him. I shall also endeavour to show that many of the statements he made were most inaccurate and misleading, for in some instances he actually made misstatements as to fact. How he came to do so I do not know, but I shall try and prove everything that I allege. Starting out with that, Mr. Speaker, I beg to call attention to a matter, perhaps small in amount, but indicative of the method which the hon. gentleman adopted in initiating his speech and which he continued through it from beginning to end, endeavouring to twist and turn the figures found in the blue-books to prove theories of his own. I contend, and I will show, that he twisted them and turned them in a way which was unfair, and, as I say, misleading. The hon. Minister found it his unpleasant duty to announce that there had been a very serious falling off in the revenue of the country for the year 1893-94, the principal falling off being in the customs duties. The hon. gentleman stated that in the excise there had been an increase, very, very small indeed, microscopic indeed, of $13,725; and this is a statement which I claim to be erroneous, taking it with the remarks which the hon. gentleman treated us to later on. The Finance Minister had not only the unpleasant duty to perform of calling the attention of the House, and of the country, to the fact that the receipts of the Government had very largely fallen off for 1893-94 as compared with 1892-93, but he also had to admit that along with the falling off of revenue, there had been a very large increase in expenditure, amounting to three-quarters of a million dollars. And it was in explaining, or attempting to explain, how that increase had arisen that the hon. gentleman called attention to a fact, which if he is allowed to take credit for in explaining away his increase of expenditure, must be used in all fairness on the other side of the ledger. I find fault with the hon. gentleman for dealing unfairly with the House and with the country, and for using the information which he had, to show in his favour in the one instance, and in failing to apply that same information and the same argument on the other side of the ledger when it would tell against him. Now, I say that instead of there being an increase in the excise of $13,725 as stated by the hon. gentleman, if we are to adopt the argument which he put forward in explaining the increase of expenditure, the excise really decreased $72,929 as compared with 1892-93. The hon. gentleman pointed out to us that it had been a system of book-keeping in the Finance Department in connection with several matters, chiefly with regard to methylated spirits, to allow the Inland Revenue Department to disburse moneys which they received, for the purchase of raw material, not entering the gross receipts in the Public Accounts, and then charging the expenditure, but simply entering the balances. That was done in 1892-3 with regard to methylated spirits. If the hon. gentleman will look at the Auditor General's Report he will see there set down the total amount of the receipts from methylated spirits, with the amount expended by the department deducted, so that the net profits on the undertaking are alone entered in the Public Accounts. The hon. Finance Minister called attention to the change in the practice made in 1893-94 by which all the receipts from methylated spirits were credited in the Public Accounts, and all the disbursements were debited, thus, as he pointed out, increasing the amount of the disbursements by $86,654. Now, if the hon. gentleman does that on one side of the ledger, he must also do it on the other side; if he says that his expenditures were not really the amount they appear to be, namely, three-quarters of a million dollars, but that amount less $86,654, on account of the change in book-keeping between the years 1892-93 and 1893-94, he must in all fairness make the same deductions on the other side of the ledger. Then, the receipts from excise in 1893-94 would have taken their place along with the receipts from customs, and would have shown a decrease of $72,929. It may be thought that this is a small matter, but it is simply an indication of the manner in which the Finance Minister has dealt with the public accounts all through his Budget speech; and I will endeavour, in the progress of my remarks, to call attention to other misleading statements of a similar nature. Several times in the course of his remarks, in endeavouring to account for the appearance of that ugly and ill-visaged customer, a deficit, which came to him in 1893-94 to the tune of $1,210,000, and which he admits is about to come to him in 1894-95 to the tune of $4,500,000, the hon. gentleman found it incumbent upon him to give some reasons why the country was to be at last confronted with that final proof of incapacity in a Government, as alleged by him year after year. One of the reasons given by him for the falling off in the revenue was the increase in duties made last year. Twice in his speech the hon. gentleman made that bald statement; but nowhere did he give any proof whatever of a statement so important for the country to know or understand. Is it true or untrue that the tariff, as amended in 1894, after months of discussion, after great agitation in the country, and after many promises, decreased the burdens of the people? Was that one of the reasons for the falling off in the revenue, as alleged by the hon. gentleman, or was it not? I shall have no trouble in proving most conclusively, from his own statements, that the changes then made in the tariff did not decrease taxation, but on the contrary, resulted in a considerable increase in taxation, so far as the first nine months of the present financial year are concerned.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MARTIN. When the House rose at six o'clock, Mr. Speaker I was dealing with the contention of the Finance Minister that one of the causes of the immense reduction in the revenue from customs during the current fiscal year was the fact that the new tariff of last session had made a reduction of taxation. I state that I would show from the returns of the Customs Department published in the Canada Gazette, that that statement was not correct, though it was similar to other statements made by the hon. gentleman in the purpose of putting a rosy hue upon the present condition of affairs. Before dealing directly with that, let me for a moment call the attention of the House to the state of the tariff previous to last session. It will be remembered that in the session of 1893, the Government announced that the time had come for a revision of the National Policy tariff, and that during the recess they intended to thoroughly look into the matter, to visit different parts of Canada in order to find out just how far the tariff needed amendment, and to make such reductions in it as the altered circumstances of the country required. In the recess the Ministers did visit various parts of Canada; in fact, they went all over the country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, in search of information. The session opened with a declaration in the Speech from the Throne, as follows:—

While my Ministers do not propose to change the principles on which the existing enactments on this subject are based, the amendments which will be offered for your consideration are designed to simplify the operation of the tariff, and to lessen, as far as can be done, consistently with those principles and with the requirements of the treasury, the imposts which are now in force.

In carrying out this promise, the hon. gentleman did bring down resolutions which, if put into force, would have lessened somewhat the imposts then upon the country. He was not allowed, however, to carry his policy into force. He found that, strong as the Government were, large as their majority in the House was, there were other forces and other influences which had to be dealt with before it was possible to lessen those imposts, or to make an alteration in the tariff in the direction of reducing taxation. He found that the manufacturing class, who had been bolstered up by this tariff, and whose existence depended upon its continuance, had something to say. Here let me deal with the report of those gentlemen whose interest it was to continue the old tariff, and to increase it rather than reduce it; and in the end I will endeavour to show whether the promises of hon. gentlemen opposite, made in response to a strong feeling which they found existing in Canada from one end of the country to the other were triumphant, or whether those gentlemen at whose instance this tariff was brought into existence, for whose benefit it has been continued all these long years, and at whose instance amendments and changes of various kinds and descriptions were made, dictated the final tariff. There is, as we all know, a Manufacturers' Association, which has its headquarters at Toronto, and whose business it is to look after the interests of the manufacturers, to see that the National Policy is sustained, and keep the Government in line, and this association held its annual meeting, from the report of which I read the following:—

At the time of the last annual meeting of this Association the Finance Minister and the House of Commons were struggling in the revision of the tariff. There had been a fierce and unreasoning demand for such a revision as would, if carried out, have amounted to a revolution; and it required the best generalship on the part of Mr. Foster and his protectionist colleagues and supporters to withstand the onsets of the free trade enemy. On March 27, the House, sitting in Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Foster introduced his tariff Bill, which instantly became operative. Quite a number of amendments were from time to time made to this Bill, and before its final passage on July 26, it became modified to an extent that gives much satisfaction to the country—certainly to the friends of the Government.

In accordance with the usage of this Association, previous to your last meeting, the Tariff Committee of the Association, in the discharge of their duty, entered upon a close and careful examination of all matters brought before it by members of the Association relating to the tariff. The situation at that time was critical. An excitement, amounting to a furore, had been worked up by the enemies of protection, and some who had previously declared themselves staunch adherents of the National Policy, weakened. It was evident, however, that some changes in the tariff were imperative, and that if they were not inaugurated by the friends of protection, the Government could not survive, and that the enemies of protection would accede to power. It was under these circumstances that the Tariff Committee entered upon their labours, having the counsel and assistance of many of the most experienced members of the Association, the result of which was the embodiment of their views in a communication to the Finance Minister (a copy of which is here before you), which elicited from him a kindly letter, in which he alluded to it as a well prepared brief in which all the matters therein discussed had been done full justice. Perhaps it might be going too far to even surmise the effect these recommendations of your Tariff Committee to the Minister may have had in the final arrangement of the tariff; but it is but an act of justice to the committee to direct attention to the large number of changes that were made in the tariff along the lines suggested in the recommendations, and that in many instances the language used in both are substantially identical. This is particularly noticeable as regards the iron schedule, the duties upon textiles, the duties upon drugs, chemicals, alcoholic preparations, &c., as well as upon an extended list of miscellaneous articles, and large and most important additions to the list of non-dutiable articles.

The hon. gentleman told us, when he made his Budget speech last session, that he calculated that the reduction in revenue from his lessening the burden of taxation, would amount to $1,500,000 or $1,600,000. Now, we are in a position, from the reports which we have before us, to apply the test of actual results to the reductions of the Finance Minister; and we can well see that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association had every reason to congratulate themselves upon the manner in which the Finance Minister had followed the instructions which he found in his brief. It will be seen that instead of reducing the taxation of the country, the hon. gentleman added considerably last session to the burdens of the country. The dutiable goods imported up to the 31st March, 1895, amounted to $42,979,130, and the free goods amounted to $35,467,370, making a total on imports entered for consumption of $78,446,500. Now, Mr. Speaker, there are two ways of making an estimate. We can either take the dutiable goods alone and compare the rate of taxation with the previous year. If that is done, there is a very slight decrease for the year 1895. But hon. gentlemen opposite say that that is not fair, that their reductions were not alone in the rate of taxation, but that they have added a long list of dutiable to the list of non-dutiable goods, thereby making a large reduction in taxation. Accepting that method of testing the matter, I take the total amount of imports, $78,446,500. First, take off coin and bullion, because coin and bullion is an importation which varies without any relation whatever to the trade of the country. Some years it assumes large proportions and goes up into $4,000,000 or $5,000,000, and other years it falls to one-half or one-quarter of a million dollars, so that we can make no fair comparison of one year with another, so far as the rate of taxation is concerned, unless you take out coin and bullion from both periods. It so happens that the amount of coin and bullion imported into Canada in the period of the fiscal year ending 31st March was very large, indeed, compared with the previous year, and large indeed, compared with the average in Canada's history. I take that out and I think the House will agree that it is necessary to do so in order to arrive at the real rate of taxation. The amount of coin and bullion imported to the 31st March was $4,452,835. That leaves the actual imports of free goods and dutiable goods at the figure of $73,993,665. The amount of duty collected upon that was 13,278,853, and the rate of taxation, as shown by these figures, was 17.94 per cent. Now, the rate for 1894, also taking out coin and bullion, was 17.76, so that the rate of taxation for 1895, so far as it has gone, and so far as we have any return, taking the free goods and the dutiable goods together in both cases, and excluding coin and bullion, amounts in the one instance to 104 and in the other to 17.76, or .18 per cent more for the current year 1895 than for the year 1894. Under those circumstances, what becomes of the prediction of the hon. gentleman that the reduction in taxation would amount to $1,500,000 or $1,600,000. I am dealing with the hon. Minister's estimate now, but the figures I have given are the actualities. They show that on the imports up to date, the increased tax on this year amounted to $133,188. If the rate of taxation on the amount of imports—about $74,000,000 up to 31st March—had been the same as prior to the readjustment of the tariff made by the hon. gentleman in 1894, the amount of money taken out of the people of Canada would have been $133,188 less. Under these circumstances, how have hon. gentlemen opposite fulfilled their promises made last session to the House and to the country? How does the hon. gentleman justify the statements that he made more than once in his Budget speech, that among the causes which had contributed to the falling off in revenue during 1895, was the reduction in taxation made by the Government under the tariff of 1894. The hon. gentleman, as I say, smuggled that statement into his remarks. He knew full well that it could not be substantiated by the figures, and he was careful, therefore, to offer no proof whatever, but merely to put it forward as a bald statement. He says: We changed a number of specific into ad valorem duties, we decreased the burdens of the people, we lessened the taxation to the amount of a million and a half of dollars. But when we come to look into the figures showing the actual results up to date—and I believe there is no reason to suppose that there will be any improvement in this respect for the remainder of the year, calculating on the basis of the old tariff, though, of course, the new tariff will increase the taxation and add something to the revenue—we find that, instead of a reduction of taxation there has been an actual increase, as I have shown. Up to the end of 1895, that increase will probably amount to $200,000. I have read to the House the statement of the Manufacturers' Association. It shows that there was a furore in the country, and that if an election had been held and the Government had not promised to give a reduction in taxation, there would have been a change of Administration. The association recognized that public sentiment was against the National Policy. The hon. the Premier of that day came out with a promise to lop off the mouldering branches, and the hon. the Finance Minister proceeded to lop off those mouldering branches. He brought his tariff before the House with long and elaborate explanations showing how he proposed to decrease the revenue in that direction and this direction; how he proposed to abandon largely the pernicious doctrine of specific duties and to adopt the fairer method of ad valorem duties. But the Manufacturers' Association interfered, and interfered in a most practical manner. They sent their deputations here day after day; and, while the members of this House were anxious to proceed with business—Parliament had been called that year, as this year, at a most inopportune time—the hon. Finance Minister was not prepared to proceed with his tariff, because he had to confer with these deputations. And, in the end, the Manufacturers' Association were so successful that their brief, backed by the personal appearance of their delegates, was accepted, and, instead of a reduction of taxation—which they themselves admitted was necessary in order to keep the Government in power—we find that this tariff revision has resulted in an actual increase of taxation. So there is a very great discrepancy indeed, Mr. Speaker, between the hon. gentleman's promise of a reduction of a million and a half in taxation and the actual result of an increase of $133,188 for the current year thus far. I might further point out, Mr. Speaker, that if the hon. gentleman's prophecy had come true, if he had really taken off taxes to the amount of $1,500,000, as he professed to do when he introduced his tariff last year, instead of a deficit amounting to $4,500,000, as he himself admitted the deficit to be, it would have amounted to $6,000,000. As it is, the deficit is surely ugly and ill-visaged enough to suit even the hon. Finance Minister. A deficit of $4,500,000 is almost as much as the total of the three deficits under the Mackenzie Government. The country has heard from the hon. gentleman ever since he became Finance Minister loud denunciations of any Government having a deficit. According to him, the Mackenzie Government were incapable, their policy was a false one and one not calculated to advance the interests of Canada, because it resulted on three separate occasions in a deficit. The hon. gentleman in 1894 produced a deficit which, in his Budget speech of this session, he is pleased to call a small deficit. It amounted almost to a million and a quarter of dollars, almost as large as any deficit of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). And this year he proposes to bring forward a deficit almost large enough to swallow the three deficits which the Mackenzie Government had in 1876, 1877 and 1878. The hon. gentleman, however, has hit upon a new means of accounting for a deficit. He says: I did have a deficit in 1894, but it was only a small one, about a million and a quarter; but I had also a sinking fund. I wiped out the deficit with a sinking fund, for we put more money in the sinking fund than we lost in the deficit. Surely if that argument is an excuse for the hon. gentleman it should be an excuse for their opponents. While the Mackenzie Government had deficits, they also had sinking funds. Their sinking fund would have paid 57 per cent of their deficits, while the hon. gentleman's sinking fund would have paid 63 per cent of the deficits he has had. So he can claim no particular advantage on that ground. The hon. gentleman, however, thinks that he completely disposes of the position in which he finds himself with regard to deficits, decrease of revenue, falling off of imports—a state of affairs which he himself has described time and time again in this House as showing incapacity on the part of the Government—by saying: I took off the sugar duties, and if I had not done so there would have been this large sum of money—and as to the inaccuracy of his calculation of that amount, I shall have something to say. Now that may be a fair way of looking at the matter, but if it is a fair one for one side of the House, surely it must be fair for the other. The hon. gentleman made a great many comparisons in his Budget speech by which he has proved to his own satisfaction that the Government is going in the right direction. He compared the present year and the past year with the year 1889. Now, in the year 1889 the hon. gentleman himself was in power. He has shown by these comparisons how very badly the Government was administered in 1889, and how much better they are conducting affairs in 1894 and 1895. Now, Sir, I think that is a very unfair and misleading comparison to make. If the hon. gentleman wishes to contrast the National Policy with a tariff for revenue, let him contrast the years in which a revenue tariff was in force, with years in which the National Policy was in force. As the hon. gentleman has failed to do that, I have prepared some figures in that direction. I put it this way: Suppose the Mackenzie Government had had during the years they were in power, the same duties which the hon. gentleman congratulates himself on having in 1894. The hon. gentleman showed by his comparison that he is a very much better man, indeed, that his Government have a very much better policy, a very much better tariff, in 1894, than they had in 1889. Now, in order to make a comparison, I do not propose to take the bad year of 1889, but I will take his model year of 1894, the year upon which he bases his comparisons, and I ask you to consider for a moment what would have been the result if Mr. Mackenzie's Government had adopted a rate of taxation during their period of office as high as that upon which the hon. gentleman congratulates himself so much in 1894, which rate as appears in the Trade and Navigation Returns, at page 11, was 17·13 per cent. Now, in 1874, the rate of taxation, as shown on the same page of the Trade and Navigation Returns, was 11·32, or 5·81 per cent less than it was in 1894. Now, Sir, if the hon. member for South Oxford had been taxing the people of Canada in 1874 at the same rate that the Minister of Finance taxes the people of Canada in 1894, the surplus which he had in that year of $888,776 would have been converted into a surplus of $8,290,958. Now, that is not applying the rate of taxation in that year with the rate which the Finance Minister had in 1889, his high water mark, but comparing it with the year 1894, the year in relation to which he takes a large amount of time in the Budget speech in glorifying himself and his Government in having brought down the rate of taxation, which I find here to have been the enormous rate of 21·65, as compared with the moderate rate of 17·13, a reduction, as he rightly claims, of over 4 per cent. But I say, taking his model year, taking the year when the hon. gentleman's well-known economical motions, as he calls them, have been productive of some effect, the year after he had performed that great act of patriotism in removing the sugar duties and in refraining from taking all these millions of money out of the people of Canada—I say, compare the rate of that year with the rate of taxation at 17·13, and give the hon. member for South Oxford that same rate of taxation on the imports which he had in 1874, and see what the result will be. I make a comparison of the year of the hon. member for South Oxford with the Minister of Finance's year of 1894, it is a comparison of the time when the Liberal policy as it is to-day, was in force. Hon. gentlemen opposite have had a great deal to say as to what that policy is. What is the policy of the Liberal policy? The policy of the Liberal party is a policy of taxation for revenue. Now, Sir, let us take the same system of comparison and see how the surplus of the hon. member for South Oxford in 1875 will fare. Very few people in the country know that the hon. member for South Oxford ever had a surplus. To judge from the Budget speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, one would think that the hon. member for South Oxford had a succession of ugly and ill-visaged deficits; but in 1874 he had a surplus, he had another surplus in 1875, and I am going to apply the same method of comparison, which I claim is a straightforward one, not a tricky, misleading, and unfair comparison, such as the hon. gentleman made all through his Budget speech, and which I am here to expose. Let us take the rate of taxation in 1894, the model year after the sugar duties had disappeared, which was 17·13. In 1875 the hon. member for South Oxford imposed upon the people of Canada a rate of taxation of 12·83 only, compared with which 1894 had an addition of 4·30 per cent. Let us take the imports as they actually were that year, and let us apply to those imports the rate of taxation which the hon. gentleman had in 1894, and let us put that rate of taxation into the hands of the hon. member for South Oxford, and his modest surplus of $935,644, by that species of comparison, springs into a surplus of $6,079,246. I say that his surplus of less than a million, by that method of comparison, would have been, at that time, a surplus of $6,079,000. The next year, 1876, one of those ugly and ill-visaged customers came to Canada, and the hon. gentleman had a deficit of $1,900,785. By the same system of comparison, putting into his hands for a moment the rate of taxation which the hon. gentleman glorifies himself upon so much in 1894, and that deficit disappears entirely, and is replaced by a surplus of $1,594,870. Again, in 1877 the hon. gentleman, by keeping down the taxation, by refusing at that unfortunate time, in that period of depression, further to burden the people of Canada with more taxation, had a rate of only 13·44 per cent. That taxation was increased somewhat, but only moderately. Let us again hand him for a moment the taxation which the hon. gentleman plumes himself so much upon in 1894, 17·13 per cent. or a difference of 4·10, and we find that the deficit of 1877, which amounted to $1,460,027, becomes a surplus of $2,488,292. Again, in 1878, when the hon. member for South Oxford, through stress of circumstances over which he had no control, by virtue of the cyclone of depression which had spread over the United States, and which was then being felt in Canada, found it necessary to increase the taxation, he raised the rate to 14·3, or 3·10 less than the hon. gentleman had in 1894. Now, if we apply the same test again to 1878, we find that the deficit of $1,128,146 which existed in that year disappears, and in its place a surplus comes to hand of $1,699,040. Take the whole five years of Mr. Mackenzie's administration, and give the Finance Minister of that day the rate of taxation which we have glorified in the Budget speech now under consideration, and he would have accumulated—I will not say accumulated, but he would have taken out of the people a surplus of $20,152,406, or an average surplus each year during that period of $4,030,481. That is what I call a fair comparison, that is using the records of the country for the purpose of showing the difference between a system of taxation such as that adopted by the hon. member for South Oxford and that adopted by hon. members on this side of the House. I wish to make another comparison, which I claim to be a fair one. The hon. gentleman has claimed great credit for the rate of taxation that existed in 1894. Let us give to him and his predecessors in those years following 1878 up to the present time that rate of taxation instead of the rate they actually imposed on the people, and let us see where we would land, where the surplus would go and what kind of deficits those hon. gentlemen would have had. I am not giving them the rate of taxation which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) imposed in 1878, but I am taking their own model rate of 1894, which is glorified so much, and applying it to each year, commencing with 1879. In that year the actual rate was 16·10, or 1·03 less than in 1894. The deficit for that year was actually $1,937,999. The deficit would have been less by the increased taxation, and would have been $1,110,000. In 1880 the rate of taxation took an enormous spring upwards and became 19·17, or 2·01 more than in 1894. The actual deficit of 1879 was $1,543,227. If the Minister of Finance in 1880 had been as great a man as is the Finance Minister to-day he would have had a deficit instead of $1,543,226, equal to the sum of $3,888,039.

In 1881 the hon. gentleman's predecessor had a surplus. It was a large one—the rate of taxation was large also. The rate was 20·19. The surplus was $4,132,743. If the hon. gentleman's rate of taxation had been applied, it would have fallen to $1,329,428. In 1882 the hon. gentleman again had a surplus, the amount being $6,316,352. With the same figuring that surplus would have fallen to $3,905,665. In 1883 we had a large surplus, the largest surplus we ever had, viz., $7,064,492. At the 1894 rate the surplus would have fallen to $4,983,477. In 1884 there was a moderate surplus, the sum being $754,255; but if this method of comparison was applied, instead of having a surplus of something over half a million there would have been a deficit of $879,272. The rate of taxation was 18·64, or 1·51 more. In 1885 the rate of taxation was 18·61. The actual deficit was $2,240,000, which would have been increased to $3,760,167. In 1886 the rate of taxation was 19·50—it was always going up—or 2·37 more, the actual deficit being $5,834,572. This was much larger than the combined deficits of the hon. member for Oxford for three years. It would have become a deficit under the 1894 rate of $8,194,000. In 1887, there was a surplus of $97,313. That would have been changed into the enormous deficit of $4,244,467. In 1888 the rate of taxation reached 21·57. I am taking these figures from the blue-books and not depending on my own calculations; they will be found on page 11 of the Trade and Navigation Returns, table 7, where the rate of taxation is given for each year up to 1894. In 1888 there was a deficit of $810,032, which would have been increased to $5,376,443. In 1889, the rate was 21·65. That was the year which the hon. gentleman most ingeniously and unfairly took as a year with which to make a comparison, a year when the hon. gentleman and his Government had gone to the full extent in wringing taxation out of the people. They were enabled by that system to produce a moderate surplus of $1,865,035 which I say would have been changed, by the 1894 taxation, into a deficit of $3,092,204. Again, in 1890, when the taxation rate was 21 and 21-100ths, the surplus that year of $3,885,894, or nearly $4,000,000 would actually have been changed into a deficit of $714,941. Again, in 1891, when the rate of taxation was 20·06, the surplus of that year which was $2,235,743 would have become a deficit of $1,085,269. In 1892 the rate of taxation was 17·56, the surplus being $155,978, it would have become a deficit of $347,031. In 1893 the rate of taxation was about the same as 1894, namely, 17·38, and the surplus of that year was $1,354,556, which would have been reduced to a surplus of $1,050,294. In 1894—I take the deficit as it was, because we cannot compare that as we have got to the year—in 1894, it was $1,211,332, and in 1895, I do not add the increase, it was not very large, and I leave it at the actual deficit as it is, of $4,500,000. Mr. Speaker, I have to apologize for inflicting so many figures upon the House. They are, no doubt, very dry, but it is necessary to give them for the purpose of meeting the misleading and unfair comparisons and statements made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) in his Budget speech. Take, then, the total for the seventeen years from 1879 to 1895, inclusive, and we would have a total deficit during these years of $26,627,417, or an average deficit every year of $1,566,318. Let us compare them. Now, we have got the thing on a fair basis. We have got Mackenzie's Administration on the 1894 basis, and we have got the Administration of the hon. gentleman and his predecessors on the same basis. If the Finance Minister chooses one year to have a rate of 21½, and another year to have a rate of 17·13, it is very easy for him to say: Oh, we are saving the people this much. But it is just as fair to put it the other way and say: While you charge them so much in 1894 with your 17·13, you charged them so much more for the other years than you should have charged them. One argument is just as fair as another. But here is a fair comparison. Here we reduce both Administrations to the same terms, and what do we find on this basis? I have to apologize for devoting so much time to a matter which I do not take any stock in at all. I do not take any stock in the assertion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) that a deficit or a surplus, either one way or the other, is any test per se of the prosperity or success of the Administration of the day. It may mean many things. It may mean that the Administration have seen fit to enormously increase the burdens of the people. It may mean that the imports are very largely increased. If the imports are largely increased, and the rate of taxation remains as small as it was before, that means prosperity, that means that this money would come into the treasury without any addition to the taxations of the people. But the hon. gentleman does not put that forward, and he never has put it forward in his Budget speeches. He has put forward the bare, bald statement, that because the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in certain years, namely, 1876, 1877, and 1878, without taking any account at all of the greater taxation, actually had a deficit; that, therefore, the Finance Minister of the Mackenzie Administration was a bad financier, and that the policy of the Government was a bad policy. It is hardly necessary for me to take up the time of the House in order to dispose of the contention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), and to give the comparisons based on the hon. gentleman's suggestion, and show where they lead us. I say that if the hon.

gentleman (Mr. Foster) had had, during all these seventeen years the same rate of taxation which existed in 1894-95, the average deficit of the present Government would have been $1,566,318, and that if the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), during his five years of office, had had the same rate of taxation, his average surplus would have been $4,030,481. You will see that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has a "plus" sign against his name by this method of calculation, and that the hon. Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) has a "minus" sign opposite his name. On that test, which the hon. gentleman himself has put forward in his Budget speech of this session, and in his Budget speeches of every session since he has been Finance Minister, I say that you will find, by adding the two amounts together, that the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and his Administration were $5,596,799 each year better than the hon. gentleman opposite and his Administration. Let us take it in another way. Mr. Speaker, I am almost afraid to lay before the country the astounding results of the following comparison. Is not this a fair suggestion, Sir? I have been giving to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) the rate of taxation for 1894 upon which the Finance Minister glorifies himself so much. Let me turn around and, in all fairness, give to the Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) the rate of taxation which the hon. member for South Oxford had in 1878, and let us see where he would be, then. The rate of taxation in 1878 was 14·3 per cent. Take that for 1879, when the rate was 15·10, and there would have been a deficit of $3,601,070. I hope I have made myself clear. I am giving the amount of money that the Conservative Government would have got in these years, supposing they had not increased the rate of taxation, supposing they had left the taxation where we say it ought to be on a revenue basis; on a basis not for protection, but for revenue, a basis that would extract as small an amount as possible out of the pockets of the people, consistent with the obtaining of a revenue. The rate was then 14·03 per cent, and I am going to apply it to each year. Under that rate, in 1880 the deficit would have been $5,613,285; in 1881, the deficit would have been $1,510,531; in 1882 there would have been a surplus. Hon. gentlemen will remember that there was a large surplus in 1882; but there would have been a moderate one of $413,549. In 1883 there would also have been a surplus—I linger on 1883, because it is the last year in which there would have been a surplus—of $1,166,229. Now, we have a long list following of most ugly and ill-visaged deficits, which the hon. gentleman would have got if he had adhered to the revenue rate of 14·03 per cent ; in 1884 a deficit of $4,232,872 ; in 1885, $6,944,177 ; in 1886, $11,282,839 ; in 1887, $7,519,289 ; in 1888, $8,564,703 ; in 1889, $6,503,048 ; in 1890, $4,210,674 ; in 1891, $1,498,967 ; in 1892, $3,973,378 ; in 1893, $2,722,562 ; in 1894, $4,717,245 ; in 1885, taking the rate as the same as in 1894, though it was really as I have shown slightly higher, and estimating the imports at $100,000,000, which is somewhat more than they will come to, as I think the hon. gentleman will admit, the deficit at the end of the year would be $7,460,000. Now, what about the totals ? Supposing the hon. gentleman had had that rate of taxation during those years, he would have had surpluses in two years amounting together to $1,579,778, and combined deficits amounting in all to $83,354,640, or one-third of the present enormous national debt. Now, I want next to consider the amount of money which the hon. gentleman during these seventeen years has taken out of the people of Canada—because that is really the important question all the time. This dallying with figures, with surpluses and deficits, is a mere trick of the hon. gentleman, to try to show that the Mackenzie Administration was wrong ; but the real question which we must always bear in mind in these financial investigations, is : how much do the people pay ? Now, how are we to arrive at the answer to that question ? In this way. I am going to try to find out how much more money hon. gentlemen opposite have taken out of the people of Canada than the Mackenzie Administration would have taken if their policy of 1878 had been continued. How do we get at that ? We take the total deficits as they would have been, and the total surpluses as they were. Now, I have shown that the total deficits, if the same rate of taxation had been continued, would have been $81,774,862. The net surplus which the hon. gentleman has at his credit at the present time is $9,785,139. Add these two sums together, and you have, I claim, the amount of money that this Government have taken directly out of the people of Canada. I am not saying a word about those millions and millions of dollars that have been taken out of the people of Canada which the revenue never got ; nor am I dealing with any estimate. I am making a calculation which cannot be wrong, which is backed up by the actual imports. These two amounts together give the enormous total of $91,560,001, an amount of money large enough to pay off one-third of the national debt, and leave about eight millions of dollars in the treasury. Now, I have endeavoured to dispose of some comparisons instituted by the hon. gentleman, and I have made the charge that his comparisons were unfair and his figures misleading. I come now to that portion of his speech in which he glorifies himself first and Canada next upon the credit which Canada had in the money markets of the world. I do not know where he got his figures, but certainly they were most incorrect ; misleading is not the word ; they were actually wrong, and I propose to prove that they were. The hon. gentleman said that at the time he made his loan in the old country, which he stated was at the rate of 3¼ per cent, the American Government made a loan at the rate of 3¼ per cent. Now, the real fact, which he omitted to mention, is that the American Government made a loan in a different market—in the American market ; and instead of the rate being, as he claimed, 3¼ per cent, the actual rate at which the American Government floated that loan of $50,000,000 was 2·87 or 2⅞ per cent. I do not understand how the hon. gentleman could come into this House and make the statement he did. I must, I suppose, attribute it to ignorance. It would not be parliamentary to say that he deliberately misled the House, and I must out of charity say that he did not know any better. If the hon. gentleman will look at the "Statist," a financial paper published in London, of the 1st of December, 1894, he will find there in plain English that the new American loan was floated at a price which made the rate of interest to the Government 2·87 or 2⅞ per cent. At the present time there appears to be a disposition on the other side of the House to decry everything English or connected with England, and to look for inspiration, and I suppose also for facts, to the United States. If the hon. gentleman is not satisfied with that financial organ, let him look at the New York "Herald" of 27th November, 1894, and he will find there precisely the same statement. Now, if the hon. gentleman is not satisfied with that, I will give him the particulars of the American loan, and he can calculate the rate for himself. The American loan paid what was, for a nation like the United States, a large rate. It was floated at a rate which was a large rate for them to pay in the present condition of the money market. They ought to get their money at less than two and seven-eighths per cent. If they had had the kind of loan to offer which our Finance Minister was able to offer to the English people, they could have got their money a great deal cheaper, but they were pledged to borrow their money at five per cent, under a statute which provides that it shall be repayable in coin. The financial world knows that there is a great agitation on the other side in favour of free silver, and that the danger always exists, under that statute, of the Americans deciding some day, as they can do legally, to pay borrowed money in silver, which is coin. Let me mention another matter. Our loan runs for forty-four years, whereas the American loan runs only for ten years. It is equally well known in financial circles that a loan running for a large number of years is worth considerably more than a short loan. Under those circumstances—being redeemable in coin and only running ten years—the American loan was allotted to a syndicate at 117 7/8, which produces a rate of interest of 2·87. The American loan was therefore at a great disadvantage. The treasury was being depleted of its gold. It was necessary for the credit of the country to replenish the treasury, and the Government had only statutory authority to issue this kind of bond. This loan was put upon the market and bid for, and the highest bid was made by the syndicate to which it was allotted, on the 27th November, at the figure I have given. On the 29th November—two days later—the syndicate announced that they had sold $5,000,000 out of the $50,000,000 at 119, and that they had raised the price of the balance to 119½, thus clearing out of the transaction a cool million of dollars. This shows how unfair and misleading was the comparison made by the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman took another means of glorifying himself and his party, and I mention it, not because of any intrinsic value it may have, not because of any impression it could make on the country, but to show the unfairness of the hon. gentleman, to show the deliberate manner in which, with malice aforethought, knowing the facts, he sought to mislead the House. He referred to failures in Canada to show how successful his Administration was compared with the imbecile Administration of Mr. Mackenzie. In 1890, he said, the failures for the year, according to Dun, Wiman & Co.'s account, represented liabilities of $18,000,000, and in 1894, they were only $17,000,000. But seeing that he was comparing one bad year with another bad year, or one Conservative year with another, which is the same thing, he says I will give a fair comparison and take the average from 1874 to 1878. In 1874 the liabilities were $7,796,000; in 1878 they were $23,908,000—an increase of 210 per cent. Take the average from 1874 to 1878, and you will find it was $22,299,000, and from 1890 to 1894 it was only $16,690,000. I draw attention to this to show how unfair that hon. gentleman was. He knows that the failures of 1874 were $7,696,000, and that in 1875 they had risen enormously to $28,843,000. Why did not he give the cause? The cause is clear. In the early part of 1875 an insolvent law came into force. The hon. gentlemen opposite have introduced an Insolvent Act. Let them put that Insolvent Act into force this session, and I will make next year a comparison between 1894 and 1895 which will knock into the shade the comparison between 1875 and 1874. Will that be any reflection upon the hon. gentleman? No, it will merely show that when an insolvent act is passed, all the insolvents rush into insolvency in order to get a release from their liabilities. The hon.

gentleman seizes the evidence of the fact that there was that increase and that falling again in 1880, when the Insolvent Act was repealed, down to $7,988,000. He knowingly and wilfully takes the figures for years when there was no insolvent act, and compares them with Mr. Mackenzie's years when there was an insolvent act, and attempts to make us believe that the contrast is an evidence that under his Administration and policy, Canada had prospered as compared with the period when Mr. Mackenzie was in office. Why, the only fair comparison to make would be between 1880 and 1893, in neither of which years was there an insolvent act. In 1880, the failures were only $7,988,000, while in 1893, the hon. gentleman's policy had brought Canada to such a position that the failures had risen to $15,610,404. That is a fair comparison to make—to take one year with another under the same circumstances. If you cannot make comparisons which are reasonable, fair and right, you admit that the propositions you are attempting to establish by the comparisons you make, are untrue. Now, the hon. gentleman has again brought forward the savings' bank matter, and attempted to prove, by reference to the statistics of these banks, that the policy of the Government has been eminently successful. It has been pointed out before, and I shall not delay the House by showing it again, how the accumulations of savings may be a sign at one time of prosperity, and at another of depression. It is true that if a country is prosperous, and those persons who are not in a position to invest their money in any other way put it in the savings bank, that shows an increase of prosperity. But it is also proved that when the policy of the country has brought about commercial disaster, when people lose confidence in ordinary investments, they put their money into institutions which they think are sound, but where the interest is low, in order to prevent the loss of their money in ordinary speculation. Now, let me take some of the specific figures, and show from these very figures of his that the hon. gentleman's policy is mistaken. I do not put this forward as a proof that the hon. gentleman is wrong; but I am prepared to take the same figures that he uses and show that they lead to a wholly different conclusion from that which he reached. I do not say that I have any faith in this comparison, but it is the kind of comparison that the hon. gentleman himself makes. Take, for instance, the deposits in the chartered banks from the year 1867. I get these figures from the Year-Book. If I were going to make a comparison that I wanted to repose faith in, I do not know that I should adopt these figures with great confidence. But for the purpose I have in view, they may be assumed to be correct; at any rate, they are figures referred to by the hon. gentleman himself. The deposits in the chartered banks from 1867 to 1873 amounted to $54,397,236 on the average. In the period from 1874 to 1878 the average deposits in the chartered banks—and this was a period of ruin, desolation, incapacity of government and everything that was bad, according to the hon. gentleman—had risen to $73,926,285, an increase over the previous period of over 36 per cent. Now, we come into the time of hon. gentlemen opposite. In the five years from 1879 to 1883, the average deposits in chartered banks amounted to $94,116,645, an increase of only 27 per cent. Take the next period of five years, and you find that the average of deposits was $111,131,142, an increase of 18 per cent. Always getting a little less, you see, showing, according to the hon. gentleman's own argument, that the country was gradually approaching ruin and chaos. But in the last period, from 1889 to 1895, they are actually getting back to the Mackenzie standard of 36 per cent. During that period the average deposits were $152,008,320. And if the hon. gentleman and his predecessors had been able to keep the country up to the high standard of Mr. Mackenzie, the deposits would have been $187,807,917. So there was a loss there, a discrepancy telling against the hon. gentleman and in favour of the Mackenzie Government of $35,799,597. Now, Mr. Speaker, if we are going to decide the question of prosperity, the question of the success of the hon. gentleman's policy by making comparisons, are not the comparisons I make as fair as those of hon. gentlemen opposite? Now, take the deposits in the savings banks, Government and special. I will take one Conservative period and compare it with another Conservative period. In the first period I shall refer to—that from 1868 to 1873—while the country was under a Conservative Administration, they had the present Liberal policy, a tariff for revenue. In 1868, the deposits in the Government savings banks and special savings banks, like the Montreal District Bank, were $5,057,607. In 1873, under this tariff for revenue, they had risen to $12,933,884, an increase during these five years of 255 per cent. Now, take the figures for the National Policy period, from 1878 down to 1893. In 1878 the deposits were $14,128,185. If they had increased at the rate of 255 per cent every five years, they would have amounted, in 1893, to $234,264,733, as against what they actually were, $54,673,494, a deficiency of $179,591,239 in the sixteen years of the National Policy, under a Conservative Administration, as compared with the five years of the tariff for revenue policy under a Conservative Administration. Now, is not that a fair comparison? Does not that show as much against the hon. gentleman as his figures showed in his favour? The hon. gentleman went on to make some more comparisons. He took the years 1890 to 1894 and compared them with the years 1874 to 1878. The reason he gave for that seemed peculiar. He did not undertake to say it exactly—I cannot find that he made the absolute statement—but he left the inference that the years 1890 to 1894 were years of depression and of hard times like those of 1874 to 1878. He says: Opposition papers say so; Opposition speakers say so. The hon. gentleman spent a long time on this comparison, and he drew the most disastrous conclusions as to the period when the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was Minister of Finance. But if it is not true that the years 1890 to 1894 were years of depression, then this comparison wholly fails of its object. Now, the hon. member for South Oxford, in his Budget speech during years of depression, regularly admitted that he was in a period of hard times, that Canada was suffering from depression which was world-wide, following with us, as it always does and always will, a period of severe depression in the United States. But the hon. Finance Minister has not been doing that. What he did say in these years from 1890 to 1894, which he said are spoken of by the Opposition as years of depression? In 1890, he said this in the Speech from the Throne:

I may fairly congratulate you on the continuance of the progress and prosperity of the country.

Prior to that the National Policy had been at work and we had been told of Canada's great prosperity. This year the Governor General congratulates the country upon the continuance of that prosperity. In 1891, the Speech from the Throne contained the following:

The season in which you are assembled has opened auspiciously for the industries of the people.

It affords me much gratification to meet you at the commencement of a parliamentary session, and to be able to congratulate you upon the general prosperity of the Dominion.

Was there anything of that kind in the Speeches from the Throne in 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877 or 1878? In 1893, another of the years which the hon. gentleman now says are spoken of as years of depression, the Speech from the Throne says:

It affords me pleasure to congratulate you upon the continued progress which the history of the past year unfolds with regard to Canada. The increase in trade, as illustrated by the exports and imports during the period for which the official returns have been prepared, has been most gratifying, and that increase has continued down to the present time, with promise that the volume of trade during the current year will exceed that of any year in the history of the Dominion.

In 1894 again we read:

Canada's progress continues with every mark of stability and permanence.

The hon. gentleman takes those years in which those remarks were made, and he proceeds to glorify himself and demolish his opponents with a comparison with those other years which were admittedly years of panic and depression. I would like to say here that while the hon. gentleman has always been making the contention that these years were good years, it has not been charged on this side of the House that there was a depression such as existed during the Mackenzie régime. What we charge is that during those years, the effect of the National Policy has been to impoverish the people, not that there was a world-wide depression which had reached Canada, not that times were hard for the reason that they were hard between 1874 and 1878, but that they were hard from our own actions, that population was not increasing, that the trade of the country was languishing from causes within our own control. Our criticisms were comparative. The hon. gentleman used those terms, "comparative and absolute," and our criticisms as to the period between 1890 and 1894 were comparative. We compared the country as it would have been, and might have been, under a proper policy of tariff for revenue, with the country as it actually was under the pernicious National Policy, a policy of robbing the people for the benefit of the few. The hon. gentleman is now face to face with circumstances similar to those which confronted the Mackenzie Government in 1874, and during the whole period they were in office. I shall draw attention, before I get through, to the fact that all this depression which has come from causes beyond our control, the panic in the United States occurred in 1893. The hon. gentleman congratulated the country in 1893, and also in 1894, on the fact that we were not touched by that panic in Canada. Economic students were well aware, and it was pointed out from this side of the House, that the depression in Canada which comes from our close affiliation in trade with the United States, has always affected us in Canada later than it did the people of the United States. The hon. gentleman comes here in 1895 and admits that he is in a period of depression, and he gives the proper reason for it, namely, the fact that there was a panic in 1893 in the republic to the south of us. What the hon. gentleman said was: If you had been wise statesmen in 1874 and 1878 you would not have allowed the depression in the United States in 1873 to visit this country as it did visit us; if you had had the National Policy during that period the depression would have been warded off. Since that time there has been no repetition of a depression until now, and it is for us to examine into the public record and see when the National Policy, which I have shown is still in force in this country, has been applied at this time to ward off from Canada the effects of the panic of 1893, and the gentleman said it would have warded off the effects of the panic of 1873 if it had been brought into existence by the Mackenzie Government at that time. But before I do that, I shall deal briefly with the hon. gentleman's comparison, which he made with such pains and at such length, between these two periods. I think I have made it plain that this is an unfair comparison to commence with, that the two periods are not at all alike in their characteristics. But even supposing they were, I propose to show that his figures are misleading, that his comparison is unfair, and that the conclusions which he draws from his own premises cannot be substantiated. In the first place, the hon. gentleman unfairly takes the period from 1874 to 1879. Now, so far as the Mackenzie Government is concerned, I disclaim any responsibility for the year 1879. According to hon. gentlemen opposite, their sins were enough during the period they were in office. They came into office in November, 1873, and they went out of office in October, 1878, so that the hon. gentleman should have taken the period from 1874 to 1878, instead of the period from 1873 to 1879. I intend, in making corrections in the hon. gentleman's figures, to take the real figures for the Mackenzie Administration, and not include in them the year 1879, during a considerable portion of which the National Policy was in force. The hon. gentleman says that during this period the exports fell $18,000,000. The House will find this very elaborate exposition in the form of a table at page 563 of the hon. gentleman's speech, and a great deal of stress is laid upon it; so that I intend to take a few minutes in trying to show how inaccurate his statement is. In the first place, he makes a statement that the exports fell $18,000,000. Now, I take his own figures, as furnished to us this session in the Trade and Navigation Returns, and I find that the exports in 1873 were $89,789,922; the exports in 1878 were $79,323,667, a total falling off of $10,466,000, as against the figures put into the table by the hon. gentleman of $18,000,000. The hon. gentleman said the exports, during the Mackenzie Administration fell off $18,000,000. I think it is most unfair for the hon. gentleman to make a statement of that kind, almost doubling the figures. Now, that was a period immediately following the panic of 1873 in the United States. There was, we must admit, a falling off of $10,466,000, or an average each year of $2,093,000 during that period. It is not a good showing, but the causes for it have been explained time and again in this House, and the valid excuse put forward was that it was something over which Canada had no control. How is it to-day, after the panic of 1893? And how was it in 1894, the year during which, according to the hon. gentleman, it was not felt in Canada, at least during a large part of that year? The exports fell off in that year by $1,039,000, or at the rate of 50 per cent as much as they did during the Mackenzie period. But when we come down to the year 1895, when, for the first time, the Minister of Finance is prepared to admit that we are following our neighbours in this crisis, we find that the exports for six months of that year, fell off $5,005,203. While during the whole period of five years under the Mackenzie Administration the total exports, which the hon. gentleman paraded here with so much rejoicing and glee, only fell off ten million dollars, while in a period of six months, under similar circumstances, the hon. gentleman's exports fell off at a rate which at the end of the year would equal the amount for the whole period of five years under the Mackenzie régime. The returns given up to 31st March, make the showing worse than that, the decline instead of being $7,500,000 was close on $8,000,000. So that at the end of the year there will really be a falling off from this cause equal to the sum I have indicated, for which the hon. gentleman is not responsible and for which I do not blame him, but what I do blame him for is the attempt to make the Mackenzie Government responsible under similar circumstances. If it is a high crime and misdemeanour against good policy for the Mackenzie Government to show a falling off of $2,000,000 a year, how much greater must the crime and misdemeanour for hon. gentlemen opposite to have a falling off in one year from the same cause, under the same circumstances, of five times as much, or ten million dollars. I should like to call the attention of the Finance Minister to his statements about exports as reported in his speech, that exports fell eighteen millions, that the imports were eighteen millions, and in the period from 1893-94 the exports rose twenty-eight millions, and the imports rose twenty-eight millions. I take it for granted that this is an error of the printer. As I do not possess the hon. gentleman's figures I am not able to criticise them, but I doubt not if I had them I would find them equally as inaccurate and unfair. I draw attention to this fact, and if I adopted the same method of criticism which the hon. Minister attempted to apply to me when I rose to speak, I would deal at considerable length the enormous discrepancy between the real facts and those presented. The hon. gentleman, however, is not to blame for those figures, and I point out the inaccuracy to him. However, in 1894, when this depression caused by the panic in the United States began to work, the imports for consumption fell off $8,611,047; in 1895, a half year only, it fell off $6,321,667, or if the falling off continued at the same rate for the year, 1895 will show a total falling off of $12,000,000. Now, where is the efficacy of the National Policy? I admit the cause; I say the cause is the depression in the United States reaching Canada, as it always does, a year or two later. Hon. gentlemen opposite have contended year after year, in season and out of season, that it was the duty of the Government to prevent that depression, and that there was one sovereign remedy, which if applied at the proper time and in the proper way when the depression reached us in 1874 would have warded it off. I ask the hon. gentleman opposite why he has to come here and admit that with this National Policy in full force and vigour, the amendments to it having been dropped at the time and the revision having been passed over, the tariff having been increased slightly last session instead of decreased, the hon. gentleman finds it inoperative to-day? The total falling off will reach the enormous sum of $12,000,000 in one year. I am obliged not to criticise his figures, because, as I have already explained, I do not know what the hon. gentleman stated on that point. The hon. gentleman next said that the duties during the period from 1874 to 1878 fell off to the value of $1,400,000. The exact figures are $1,222,037. It is all very well for the hon. gentleman to say, I am going to deal in round figures; he let himself down easily in that way several times during his speech. Perhaps it is more pleasant to give round figures than the actual amounts, but the Finance Minister when he refers to $1,222,000 as being $1,400,000 in round figures, this presentation of the case, telling against the Opposition, is most unfair and misleading. So the hon. gentleman deliberately gave wrong figures, or he did not know what the correct figures were. If he did not know what the figures were, he should have known and he should have referred to the blue-book. The truth is that the hon. gentleman prepared his tables and delivered his speech largely as a campaign document. It goes forth to the country with the hon. gentleman's frank upon it and with these unfair statements. I correct them here, but my words will not reach the persons whom this speech will reach. We have here one statement after another that is incorrect. We have here, as I have pointed out, an amount of $1,222,037 spoken of by the Finance Minister as $1,400,000. If that is fair criticism and a true exposition of the finances of the country, then I am utterly mistaken. The next statement made by the hon. gentleman is that during the Mackenzie Administration the debt increased $40,000,000. Well, the hon. gentleman knows when he puts forward the statement that almost every dollar of that sum was incurred in carrying our liabilities imposed on the country during that period, reference to which brings a blush of shame to every true Canadian, that period of the Pacific scandal. Is that a true statement for the hon. gentleman to put in a campaign document? He might as well say that the Mackenzie Administration added $40,000,000 to the public debt—indeed that is really what he says; and yet the hon. gentleman knows that it is absolutely untrue. He knows that as administrators of Canada they were bound by every pledge to carry out the promises into which the preceding government had entered, and that in adding $40,000,000 their predecessors really added it. Yet for the mere purpose of bolstering up himself and his party, the Finance Minister put forward that false misleading statement in a speech which was intended for a campaign document and intended to influence the votes of the electors in the elections which will shortly come on. Next, the hon. gentleman makes a statement on his own side, and says that during his period the taxes have decreased $6,000,000. I cannot find that in the figures. It is a very high sounding round figure, $6,000,000, and I have looked for it. I will exclude coin and bullion, which I think the House will agree with me from the explanation I gave before it is fair to exclude, for you cannot take coin and bullion, because one year it is $5,000,000, and another year it falls to half a million dollars without any apparent relation to the trade of the country. Take out coin and bullion and get the 1894 rate of 17·76, so you will see that between 1889, when the rate was 21·80 and 1894, when the rate was 17·76, there was between those two years a decrease of taxation, of 4·04 per cent. Calculate that upon the amount of the imports, $113,093,983, and you find that the saving of taxation instead of being $6,000,000, is $4,568,997. Is it not taking a good deal of latitude to raise, for the purpose I have set forth, an amount of four and a half million dollars to six millions, or in other words adding 33½ per cent. I do not see how the hon. gentleman can justify that. I do not see what right the Finance Minister, holding the responsible position he does, and also the highly honourable position of leader of this House, dares to say, that the taxation was decreased during that period six million dollars, when he knows perfectly well that it was only decreased $4,568,997. I have alluded to the fact that the hon. gentleman had a great deal to say as to the sugar duties. He takes great credit to himself for what he has done with regard to sugar, as a partial apology, I suppose, for the reimposition of the one-half cent per pound, and largely for the purpose of glorifying the Conservative Administration during the time which he has presided over the Finance Department. He says on page 554 of "Hansard," after taking in the glass duties and the anthracite coal duties, and the sugar duties which were taken off, that the saving to the people of Canada was $23,660,902. Now, I will show by the most convincing figures that that statement is enormously wide of the mark. In 1891, the rate was 20·07. The sugar duties were taken off on the 24th June, 1891, so that we commenced the financial year of 1892 when the rate was 20·07. In 1892 the rate, always omitting coin and bullion, was 17·84, or an actual reduction of $2,568,077. In 1893, the actual rate was 18·37, or an actual reduction of $1,957,904. The hon. gentleman says, I took those duties off sugar, anthracite coal, and glass, and I saved that much to the people. Well, one would naturally suppose that that was a clear saving, and I take it on that basis. But I cannot look at it in that way. We have got to look at the actual saving as it was in that year. Whether other duties were increased, or how it was I am not prepared to say, because it cannot be shown from the returns; but you take the actual taxation for each one of those years, as I am doing, and you will wind up with the exact amount which the hon. gentleman saved during the periods 1892, 1893, 1894 and 1895. In 1893, it was 18·37, and the saving was $1,957,904. In 1894, it was 17·76 and the saving was $2,519,538. In 1895, it was 17·94 up to date, and the saving, $1,575,865. Add these all together and you get the actual figures. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has got it down to the odd dollar, and he says at page 554 of "Hansard," that during these periods he saved the people of Canada taxation to the amount of $23,660,902. The actual amount that he did save, calculated as I have done—the only fair way of calculating it, and I defy the hon. gentleman to pick one single hole in this calculation—was $8,621,384. Now, the hon. gentleman again returned to the subject at the end of his speech as a prelude to his announcement that he put on a half cent a pound on sugar, and he makes the calculation again there. I would like to know how the hon. gentleman can tell us to-day what the sugar duties would have been in 1892, 1893, 1894 and 1895, with no other information to guide him, except the total number of pounds imported in each of these years, when we remember the fact that the sugar duty was not a duty of so much a pound. It was a duty varying from $1 to $1.90, according to the polariscopic test of the sugar, and the figures which the hon. gentleman has do not show how much sugar was imported at the $1 rate, or at any amount up to $1.90. I have looked over the returns and I have found that in the different years, 1889-90 and 1891 for example, there was a great variation. Some years a large amount came in at the 75 degrees, and a similar amount at the higher degree, so that from year to year the taxation varied very much indeed, and how could the Finance Minister make the estimate down to the odd two dollars without guessing? But the hon. gentleman did not put it forward as a guess, and he said it was quite the actual thing.

Mr. FOSTER. I have listened to the hon. gentleman making very many very extreme statements and some that were, I think, almost unparliamentary. It is quite useless for me to call him to order, because he seems to make these statements as part of his speech. Now, just in reference to that, it strikes my mind that if he will read "Hansard," if "Hansard" is correct, he will find that when I was giving the sugar duties, I gave them as the average of the duties for 1890-91. If I did that, I am quite sure that is a sufficient explanation to the House of the basis upon which I calculated. Any gentleman may quarrel with the calculation, but he has no right to use hard language with reference to me. But it is all a matter of taste.

Mr. MARTIN. I will read the hon. gentleman's exact words. He may have intended to say that, but he did not say it.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has no right to say that I did not say it. The hon. gentleman holds in his hands the unrevised version, which is just as it is taken by the reporter here, and is liable to error. He might as well say that the reporter made the error as that I made it.

Mr. MARTIN. I could not possibly read the revised edition, because it is not out yet. I will comply with the hon. gentleman's request, and read it as I have it here, and he can correct it afterwards. We know the hon. gentleman's way of alluding to clerical errors. He has always a way of getting out of things. It is curious that I have made so many unparliamentary statements, and that this is the first one he has objected to—see how he grabs at it. This is what he did say :

In 1891, under the new tariff, there were imported fourteen million odd pounds of sugar, the duty on which, taking an average at the old rate—

He does not say the average of 1890-91.

Mr. FOSTER. Let it go at that—the average of the old rate.

Mr. MARTIN :

—the duty on which, taking the average of the old rate, would have been $227,447 ; in 1892 the quantity was 327,000,000 pounds, the duty on which would have been $5,200,000 ; in 1893 the quantity was 252,500,000 pounds, the duty on which would have been $4,000,000 ; in 1894 the quantity was 303,000,000 pounds, the duty on which would have been $4,821,000 ; in 1895 the actual import and the estimated receipts on the same basis would have shown, imports, 310,000,000 pounds, the duty on which, at the old rate, would have been $4,919,700.

Now, there was no old rate. absolutely. There was a rate which varied, for we know how much of this 310,000,000 pounds was 75 degrees, according to the polariscope test, how much was 76, how much 77, and so on ; and we could carry out the calculation and get it down, as the hon. gentleman did, to odd dollars. But the hon. gentleman has not attempted to make such a calculation ; he simply said at the old rate. The duties existed for a long period before 1890-91, and how did he get at the average ? There was a chance to get at round figures ; but, in order to leave the impression that he was making an accurate statement, he took an estimate and got down to the odd dollars. I am very sorry if I have said anything unparliamentary. I have been very anxious not to do so ; but when the hon. gentleman says that the American loan was floated at $3\frac{3}{4}$ per cent, while it was actually floated at $2\frac{3}{8}$ per cent, what am I to say ? I say it is an incorrect statement, and if the hon. gentleman did not know that it was incorrect, he ought to have known, for he came here and spoke of it as something that ought to glorify himself and the Government. Or, what am I to do when he converts \$1,220,000 into \$1,400,000 ?

Mr. FOSTER. Has the hon. gentleman the least glimmering idea that the reporter, in taking down a mass of figures such as are contained in my statement, might make an error in the figures ?

Mr. MARTIN. It is a little curious that the errors are all in the hon. gentleman's favour. I have not found a single one against him. I found one error that was palpable, and I mentioned it ; but I take for granted that the reporters have done in his case, what they do in mine and every one else's—that when he was speaking from tables, carefully prepared, they got those from him and copied them into "Hansard," so that "Hansard" is not likely to be incorrect, except in the case which I pointed out, which was due to the slipping down of one line, and was evidently an error of the printer. Let the hon. gentleman give any excuses he likes, when the country understands the hon. gentleman's statements, they will not have the effect he intended them to have ; because, when he admits the facts which I have mentioned here, his Budget speech falls to the ground, and these grand periods and glowing sentences based on inaccurate statements, will be considerably discredited. Let me take up another point which the hon. gentleman dealt with, which is just as misleading—a mere juggling with figures. He said the net interest is decreasing. I will read exactly what he did say ; and if he is misreported in this instance, as in the others, he can make another Budget speech and correct all his mistakes. He says :

If you will take the actual interest, you will find that whereas in 1868 we paid 4.51 per cent, in 1894 we paid 2.91 per cent.

Now, I am going to deal with that statement, and I am going to show how very bad the hon. gentleman is if this statement is worth anything at all, as I do not consider it is, as I say, I take no stock in these propositions. I merely deal with them to show that they do not amount to anything. I say this is a proof of the hon. gentleman's wickedness if he puts them forward as proof of our wickedness on this side. I will put them forward to show that he is entitled to no credit, but that the credit should be all the other way. I wonder if this is a sign of that great financial management upon which the hon. gentleman plumed himself in one of those glowing periods—a magnificent policy—admirable financial management. If we are going to get down to questions of taste, I have not been taught that it is good taste for a man to come here and blow himself up for admirable financial management—to wit, my management. That is what I call bad taste; I do not know what the hon. gentleman calls it.

Mr. LISTER. It is blowing your own bugle.

Mr. MARTIN. Yes. The hon. gentleman could not find any one on his side of the House to blow his bugle for him, and so he blew it himself, and I must say he is the best blower on that side of the House. He says the net interest is decreasing. If that is so, how does the Deputy Minister, in his report bear him out? By saying that the interest on the gross debt during 1893-94 increased from 3·26 to 3·31, even under the hon. gentleman's own administration. There must be something seriously wrong there. The net interest, also, increased from 2·88 to 2·91, although the hon. gentleman tells us that there never was a time when money could be got at such a low rate. But I am going to take this net interest business and see where it lands the hon. gentleman. In 1886 the net rate of interest was 4·51; in 1878, at the end of that terrible period, it was reduced to 3·68, or a reduction of ·83 per cent. Now, in 1884, the net rate of interest was 2·76. Ten years later, in 1894, it had risen to 2·91, or an increase in ten years of ·15 per cent. I understand perfectly well how that came about, but the hon. gentleman has put it forward as an evidence of able financial management and great prosperity under his administration. He said:

If you take the actual interest, we paid 4·51 per cent in 1868, whereas in 1894 we paid 2·91 per cent, showing a large decrease.

The hon. gentleman would have it understood that his administration had been decreasing the net rate of interest. I have shown that the net rate of interest, commencing in 1868 and ending at the close of the Mackenzie period, was decreased 83 per cent, whereas in the ten years from 1884 to 1894 it was not decreased at all, but was increased 15 per cent. These comparisons of the hon. gentleman are worthless. The only fair comparison you can make is between two things of the same kind—one Grit and the other Tory. Take similar circumstances, take the same rate of taxation and then talk about your surplus; or take the same rate of taxation and talk about your deficit. Take the same circumstances and look at the effect of your policy; but to point to a decrease from 1868 to 1894 as an evidence of very strong financial position while omitting to point out that in 1884 the net rate of interest was $\frac{15}{100}$ of 1 per cent less than in 1894, ten years later, is trifling with the intelligence of the House. What does the net rate of interest amount to? It depends on circumstances, such as the amount of money in the savings banks, such as the amount of money to be obtained from different investments, which all have to be considered in any comparison worth making. But the hon. gentleman saw the figures there, they looked in his favour, and he promptly gave them to the House. Now, the hon. gentleman has made a supplementary statement with regard to railway subsidies. I am quite unable to make the figures given by the hon. gentleman correspond with the figures given in the Public Accounts; but, as the hon. gentleman has insinuated his intention to correct some of these mistakes of the reporter, and perhaps this is a mistake of the reporter, I think it is important that we should know from him before we are done with the Budget debate, the exact financial position of Canada. It is important that we should have the correct figures. He says that the railway subsidies under contract and not paid amount to \$2,257,059. Now, I find in the Public Accounts, at page xcii, that those railway subsidies amount to \$3,485,175. He says also that the railway subsidies not under contract, amount to \$2,587,257. Look at the Public Accounts on page xcv, and you will find that the railway subsidies of that kind not under contract, amount to \$4,791,400. There is just some possibility, perhaps, of the hon. gentleman's saving himself there, because he says those railway subsidies not under contract, which the Department of Railways enumerated here, are likely to be put under contract. If that be the explanation of the second discrepancy, we ought to have, before we are done with this matter, a detailed statement from the hon. gentleman as to which of those subsidies on that page are, according to the Department of Railways, likely to be put under contract, and which are not.

Mr. FOSTER. I have not seen the discrepancy.

Mr. MARTIN. I must, then, have been very obscure in my remarks. I say that, according to the hon. gentleman's statement, the railway subsidies under contract amount to $2,257,059, and that, according to the Public Accounts, they amount to $3,485,175. According to the hon. gentleman, again, the railway subsidies not under contract amount to $2,587,257, and according to the Public Accounts, the same railway subsidies amount to $4,791,400. Now, if I have made no mistakes in arithmetic, the hon. gentleman's total amounts to $4,844,316, while the total given by the Public Accounts amount to $8,276,575, or a discrepancy of $3,432,259, and I may say that the $8,000,000 given in the Public Accounts corresponds quite correctly with the statement given in answer to the hon. member for South Oxford by the Minister of Railways this session.

Mr. FOSTER. Therefore, you find a discrepancy?

Mr. MARTIN. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the date of the Public Accounts?

Mr. MARTIN. They are for 1894.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the date of my statement?

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman's statement is for the present time. Does he mean to say that the others have been paid in the meantime?

Mr. FOSTER. I mean to say that you cannot compare the 30th June, 1895, with a date in May, 1895.

Mr. MARTIN. If that is what the hon. gentleman meant, he did not make that plain at all.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. May I be permitted to say that the statement made by the Minister of Railways had reference to the same date at which he made the statement?

Mr. FOSTER. It is not the Minister of Railway's statement that the hon. gentleman is criticising, it is mine. My statement was to date.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Minister of Railway's statement was to date. The question was asked up to date.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman may have a way out of that, but certainly he has not a way out of the next point I am coming to.

Mr. FOSTER. There was no way into it.

Mr. MARTIN. I have the hon. gentleman's own authority for it in "Hansard." He made this careful statement of the liabilities of Canada with a view to the increased taxation which he proposed to put on in order to meet those liabilities—capital and interest on capital. The hon. gentleman is not in the position which we are on this side. He comes to deliver a Budget speech with a full knowledge of the finances of the country as they are. He comes fully prepared, after having had plenty of time for preparation, and we have the right to suppose that, if the hon. gentleman is the admirable Finance Minister he pretends to be, these statements are correct. What do we find, on his own admissions? We find that he has not said a word about the Trent Valley Canal or the Hudson Bay Railway, the two and a half million dollars for which has become a liability of the country, so far as an Order in Council can make it. But he admits sums that, in making up that statement, he forgot: The fast Atlantic line means an expenditure of $7,500,000; the Hudson Bay Railway, under the statute of 1891, a liability which he admits should have been included, $1,600,000; Kingston and Smith's Falls Railway, $250,680. So that, after all this preparation, after all this careful inquiry, the calculations of the hon. gentleman for the year 1895-96 are not correctly based. He has to admit now that he forgot altogether these liabilities, amounting to $9,350,680. If that is the hon. gentleman's idea of an admirable financier, why it is a very different thing from mine. I think it is one of the most essential points that the man who handles the dollars and cents for a financial concern should know what the liabilities of the concern are, what it has got to pay next year and the nature of the obligations it is assuming. But when a financier, supposedly after careful preparation, makes a Budget speech before this House, and then is obliged to come a few days after and tell us that he has made a clean mistake of ten million dollars in his calculations, it makes a strange commentary on the hon. gentleman's modest testimonial of himself. I shall not take up the time of the House for more than a few moments longer. I wish to advert to the hon. gentleman's plunge into economy. It is one of the planks of the Liberal platform that there should be economy in the public expenditure. The hon. gentleman has adopted that, to a certain extent—at least he says so—and I wish to examine for a few moments his proposals in this respect. I wish to point out again how very far—the "Hansard" reporters, I suppose I must say—are astray in their transcript of the hon. gentleman. I think we had better have the "Hansard" Committee take up the subject, because if they cannot report the Budget speech, a good deal of which is written out in the shape of tables, etc., I am afraid there must be something wrong with the "Hansard" staff. I remember last session listening to a speech of the hon. Minister of Railways, in which, speaking of economy, he took up department after department, and, while admitting that economy was a good thing, asked what could be done. The hon. gentleman has shown the Minister of Railways that something in this direction can be done. Having got the admission from the hon. gentleman, it will perhaps be easier for us to show hereafter that something substantial ought to be done instead of accepting the mere flea-bite which the hon. gentleman has offered in these Estimates. The first thing I have to remark upon is the falling off in the item of immigration. Now, Mr. Speaker, I object to that at once. That is not the kind of economy the Liberal party propose. They do not propose to reduce the expenditure of the country by taking away from the efficiency of the public service, by refusing to make those expenditures from which the people get a benefit, or ought to get a benefit. It is their proposition that millions are squandered in this country uselessly, that the departments are crowded with clerks who have nothing to do, that the Civil Service is manned with those who have been appointed merely for political reasons, and who are incompetent for the position they occupy—or it may be, appointed for charitable reasons, or something of that kind. And we propose to economize by preventing waste and by cutting off useless expenditures. We do not propose to economize by reducing an estimate like that for immigration. I must admit, however, that if the hon. gentleman takes my view of the success of the immigration expenditure, he is quite justified. For I consider this money is practically thrown away. But of course the hon. gentleman does not take that view. He claims that the hon. Minister of the Interior is pursuing that vigorous immigration policy which he started out to develop; and, holding that view, he deliberately cuts off $70,000 from an appropriation of $200,000. I may say that that proposition will not meet the approval of the people of Manitoba and the North-west. What they want is immigrants, and that is not the kind of saving the Liberal party propose. Well, the hon. gentleman touches a branch of the expenditure in which there is every chance for economy—civil government. And what does he do there? He makes a reduction of $30,000. He takes a little nibble at it. In 1878 my hon. friend from South Oxford spent for civil government $823,396. In 1894, the brilliant financier who leads the House at the present moment spent $1,402,279, an increase of nearly $600,000. And he comes here and says: I have become the apostle of economy; I propose to cut this expenditure down to $30,000. There is a chance for him if he really wants to economize, if he really wants to save the people's money and himself the onerous duty of placing more taxation on the people. Let him deal with a strong hand with this enormous increase made within the last sixteen years. Then, in legislation, at page 569, we find one of those errors, clear as daylight, which the hon. gentleman will have to lay on the "Hansard" reporters or upon some clerk. He says he is going to reduce that by $22,000. But, judging by the Estimates, it would seem to be a reduction of $80,000.

Mr. MARTIN.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is not a reduction at all; and if the hon. gentleman knows what his new estimates are, he has again misled the House, has again put forward a statement which cannot be substantiated. There is no reduction, for this reason, that in 1894 there were expended on legislation, $202,000 for voters' lists, and that has been struck out altogether so that, on the whole, there is an increase of $120,000 for legislation. Now, I say that legislation is altogether different from immigration. When we used to discuss the question of finances in Manitoba, when I had occasion to deal with finances in opposition, we used to divide the public expenditure into two classes, one we called for the benefit of the people, and the other for running the machine; and we always claimed that the Government spent too much in running the machine, and too little for the benefit of the people. Now, if you are going to classify these matters, immigration comes into the class for the benefit of the people, and legislation for running the machine. The hon. gentleman cuts off $70,000 for immigration, and he puts $120,000 on to legislation. Then we come to militia. The hon. gentleman makes a cut there of $263,398. Now, I must say that I sympathize with the hon. gentleman in that case. I have long thought there was a chance for economy; but it seems to me one of the strangest things in the world to have a Militia Department, a Minister of Militia, a General, all the paraphernalia of an army, schools, clothing, officers, colonels, majors, brigadiers, adjutants general, drill sheds, guns, a full-fledged department, everything in the militia, except the soldiers. The hon. gentleman proposed in his estimates to cut out the soldiers. He would have every other requisite for the defence of Canada except the one unimportant item of soldiers. But the Dominion Association knew something about militia if the Government did not. Perhaps there is some excuse for the Minister, as he had not been long in his department. The Government did not know anything about militia, and they did not know that it was necessary, for the purpose of having an effective militia, to have some soldiers. The Dominion Association came down here and pointed out to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Militia, and then they said: Well, we think you are right, we think we had better have some soldiers; and, the hon. gentleman proposes to violate the solemn pledge which he made on the floor of this House only a few days ago, that under no possible circumstances would there be supplementary estimates in order to get these soldiers, in order to have that trifling addition to the Militia Department, as well as all these other things I have mentioned. The hon. gentleman makes a cut in railways and canals. Now that was very easy to do, because I find that there are $230,695 of items that were in last year that have disappeared this year. But the decrease is not in salaries by any means. If the hon. gentleman had dismissed a lot of useless men that he has throughout the country on these railways, he would have been doing something good; but he has cut off the expenditure in public works, in canals and railways, which expenditure, if it had been applied properly, would have been for the benefit of the people. Instead of making a change, he actually makes an increase here again of about $50,000, while he claims a decrease of $183,000. The great bulk of the hon. gentleman's savings come from public works, the very last department on which the hon. gentleman ought to economize, on the principle I laid down that economy should be practised in the expenditure for running the machine. The money that goes to the people, that develops the country, that improves navigation, that erects useful public works, that erects public buildings where they are required, is not the kind of expenditure which the Liberals propose to reduce. They propose to expend that money in a great deal better and more proper way than hon. gentlemen opposite, who have proposed to make their reduction in the other direction. The hon. gentleman makes the great bulk of his reduction in this direction, and from the experience we have with the hon. gentleman, I am afraid not much real reduction will be made in this respect. It is very easy for the hon. gentleman to strike these items out of his estimates. It is also very easy to go on and promise to do work and commence it, and then bring in the estimates after the elections. That is what the hon. gentlemen have done before. They have been paying no attention to Parliament. Parliament is the very last authority they have considered in the question of expenditure. They knew that all they had to do was to put an item in and have it go through, whether Parliament was sitting or not. They were always prepared to promise a public work here, a public work there, to enter into enormous obligation on the part of the country, knowing full well that all they had to do would be to come to the House and put it in the estimates. I say that is no test whatever. It would be some test if the hon. gentleman had undertaken to cut down the cost of running the machine, had actually got rid of those barnacles, got rid of those incapables. We could see that, but what they have done is to strike out this expenditure for public work, telling the country that they are economizing instead of adding to the public works. The next matter that I see is Mounted Police. Well, I shall leave the hon. member for West Assinibola (Mr. Davin) to deal with the question of reduction in the number of the Mounted Police. Now, I find that since the Mackenzie regime the increase in the expenditure of the country has been $14,081,867. That is the increase in 1894 as compared with 1878. Now, it must be admitted there should have been some increase. It must be admitted that if the Liberals had been in power there would have been an increase, but if we allow the Government to increase the expenditure in proportion to the population, we make them a very liberal allowance. But that is not necessary, because the population can be increased by a very considerable percentage more than the expenditure is increased. It is just like a wholesale business. Every wholesaler will tell you that when his total volume of business is small, the ratio of expense to profit is large, but as their total volume of trade increases, they do not have to increase their expenses in anything like the same proportion. The same rule applies to government. As the population increases the expenses of government do not increase in the same proportion. Therefore, I say that if we allow an increase of expenditure in the same proportion as the increase of population, we allow a good deal more than should be allowed. I think that allowing 22 per cent for an increase of the population during that period is a very liberal estimate. From 1878 to 1894, 22 per cent is more than the actual increase, so far as we have any statistics to guide us. Now, $5,170,694 in expenditure would have been a normal increase, whereas the actual increase was $14,081,867, making $8,911,173 per annum by which these gentlemen have increased the expenditure with no possible excuse. Now, I say it is a most moderate proposition for the Liberal party to make—I am not saying this, of course, on behalf of the Liberal party because I have no authority to do so—but I put it forward as one principle of our policy, and I say it is a most moderate proposition to make, that no government, actuated by a desire for real economy, upon coming into power, should make a saving of less than one-half that amount, or, putting it in round figures, four million dollars per annum. I shall be very much disappointed, indeed, if the Liberal Government, which is soon to come into power, does not make a saving of $4,000,000 per annum on the expenditure. The Minister of Railways says that practically there are no controllable items. The uncontrollable items are five in number: Interest on the public debt, charges of management, sinking fund, pensions, subsidies to provinces. All the other expenditures of the Government are controllable, the expenditure for public works, for railways and canals and for other departments. It would be better if the expenditures on certain departments, such as civil government and legislation were reduced, because they can be largely reduced without doing any damage to the public service; but they are all controllable, and among them it is very easy for a capable and economical government, which we shall soon have in this country, to make a moderate saving of $4,000,000 out of $8,911,173, which hon. gentlemen have unduly incurred. The reason that hon. gentlemen opposite are not ready to grapple with this question is because they are incapable. The country has come to the conclusion that the Government of the day are incapable to meet the problems forced on them in Canada's interest. The hon. gentleman who preceded me dealt with the question of the National Policy, and I shall leave that to be dealt with by the hon. gentleman who will follow me. I have only a word or two to say with respect to the charge he made, and which has been made by others that the policy of the Liberal party had been changed and had become a policy of free trade. I wish to say no to that statement. I say the policy of the Liberal party, so far as the tariff is concerned, is the policy of Canada as it was in the Conservative period from 1868 to 1873, and as it was in the Liberal period from 1874 to 1878. I have said myself to the people of the North-west Territories that the Liberal party have made a pledge that when they came into power every vestige of protection would disappear from the tariff. I meant by that statement that I understood the Liberal leaders meant that where there is an item of taxation, the effect of which is protective only, or so far as it is protective only, that is to exclude exports—

Mr. FOSTER. Prohibitive.

Mr. MARTIN. That such would be done away.

Mr. FOSTER. Then you need not do away with much.

Mr. MARTIN. Of course we would have to raise our revenue, as in previous years. It is not proposed by the Liberal party to change the fiscal system in Canada—

Mr. FOSTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MARTIN—as it was understood to prevail from 1868 to 1878. They do not intend that. They intend to raise a revenue by a tariff for revenue, and where a tariff for revenue has the effect of giving protection to those industries which are suited to Canada, all right. Reference was made by the Minister of Militia to an old speech delivered by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), in which he stated it was his policy to encourage industries natural to this country. That is still the policy of the Liberal party.

Mr. FOSTER. Robbers.

Mr. MARTIN. No, it is no robbery, and no plunder for the Government to take from the people that money which is necessary to carry on the affairs of the Government; but it is robbery, it is plunder for hon.

Mr. MARTIN.

gentlemen to put an item in the tariff which brings no money into the treasury, but places large sums in the pockets of millionaires, sugar millionaires, cotton millionaires, whom the hon. gentleman's policy has created.

Mr. LISTER. Who are the Government of the country, in fact.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman referred to the visit made by Mr. Laurier to Winnipeg last fall and the meetings held there, and he declared that Mr. Laurier stated that the policy of the Liberal party was free trade as it was in England. The hon. leader of the Opposition made no such statement. What my hon. friend did was to outline the policy as I have attempted to lay it down, and what he did point out was, that while as regards a fiscal policy the Conservative party look for their inspiration to Washington and to the American Republic to the south of us, the Liberal party look for their inspiration to grand old England.

Mr. DAVIN. I will point out to the hon. gentleman that in the Winnipeg "Free Press" of 5th September last, he will find a verbatim report of the speech, in which Mr. Laurier says that his policy is free trade as they have it in England.

Mr. MARTIN. I heard Mr. Laurier speak. I do not know whether the House will call it a matter of taste or not, but I really think if I had been Finance Minister I would not have alluded to Mr. Laurier's visit to Winnipeg. The Finance Minister, accompanied by the Minister of Agriculture, came to Winnipeg—a Minister of the Crown, and one of its leading Ministers came to the city, which had uninterruptedly sent supporters of his Government to this House since 1879. The hon. gentleman came there with everything in his favour, for the purpose of holding a public meeting to glorify himself and his Administration. He had a torch-light procession, and he held a meeting in a large hall, and I am within the mark when I say that never at any time were there present to listen to the words of wisdom and eloquence of that gentleman more than 300 or 400 people. Mr. Laurier, sitting in the cool shades of Opposition, came to Winnipeg and held a meeting there in the large rink, which is capable of holding 3,000 or 4,000 people. At half-past seven, the meeting having been called for eight o'clock, it was not possible to get a seat, and there were more people when the meeting was ready to commence, hanging on the roof to listen to the words of wisdom that fell from that great statesman, than there were to listen to the Finance Minister.

Mr. FOSTER. What has that to do with what he said?

Mr. MARTIN. What he said was merely following out what he has been saying to the people of this House and throughout the country for years. The people came to hear Mr. Laurier because they had heard of him, because they knew he was the leader of the great Liberal party. While I charge hon. gentlemen opposite with being incapable to deal with the questions of the day, I have the greatest pride in sitting here, a member of this House and a member of the Liberal party which has at its head a gentleman who is capable in every sense of the word of filling the great office which is waiting for him so soon as hon. gentlemen opposite give the word. It is impossible, since the Hon. Mr. Laurier became the leader of the Opposition in this House to point to one single mistake that he has made as leader. He has the unqualified support of every single man who sits behind him in this House. He is a man, Sir, who during all these years has been able to lead so successfully his party—

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds and Grenville). To defeat.

Mr. MARTIN. No, never to defeat.

Mr. LISTER. You squander the public funds.

Mr. FOSTER. Down in Quebec.

Mr. MARTIN. No, never defeat, but to real success. The man who is capable of leading in such splendid style, his party in opposition, proves himself possessed of those qualities of head and heart which fit him for the position of Premier of this Canada of ours, a position in which the Liberal party, aided by the votes of the independent electors of the country, propose to place him at an early moment, just so soon as hon. gentlemen opposite give the word.

Mr. TAYLOR moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to; and debate adjourned.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not notice the leader of the Opposition here, but I suppose the arrangement that was practically made, that after Friday the debate upon the Budget, as it is called, is to go on from day to day, holds, and that we may expect to go on with this on Monday?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course no notice having been given, it would be possible, I suppose, for hon. gentlemen to object, but we will try to accommodate you.

Mr. FOSTER. No notice was given, because of the conversation we had across the floor. In accordance with that, Mr. Speaker, I move

That the adjourned debate on the motion to go into Committee of Ways and Means be made the first Order of the Day on Monday next and subsequent days, until concluded, after questions to be put by members.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 13th May, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 75) to revise and amend the Act respecting the Maitland and Cobourg Canal Company.—(Mr. Northrup.)

BALLOT PAPERS.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 76) further to amend the Dominion Elections Act. He said: This Bill is introduced in consequence of the decision of the judge in the Quebec election case. The House will remember that last session a Bill was passed amending the Dominion Elections Act, and providing that a uniform ballot should be introduced and used in all elections. The merit of this uniform ballot consisted in having a white disk on a black ground, in which it was proposed the voter would place his mark, so that there could be no mistake that he would place it opposite the name of the candidate he desired to vote for. It was contended for this new ballot paper that, with ordinary intelligence, it would be impossible for men to go astray at all. The Act provided that the voter should put his mark in that white portion or section opposite that within which the name of the candidate was placed, but some 26 or 27 voters, instead of placing their mark in the disk, placed their mark in the white space or division under the name, and the judge held on the recount that that was a sufficient mark. Hon. gentlemen will see that that decision practically defeats the object of the Bill, which was to prevent the mark being placed in such a way that an outsider would know, on examination of the voters' ticket afterwards, who placed it there. The Bill which I now ask leave to introduce amends the present Act, and provides that the ballot shall have the mark only on the white disk, and not elsewhere, opposite the name of the candidate for whom the voter seeks to vote.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH NEWFOUNDLAND.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would ask whether the Government have official information of Mr. Bond having left Newfoundland to visit Ottawa to confer with the Government on the subject-matter of confederation, and if so, whether the hon. gentleman knows at whose request he is coming?

Mr. FOSTER. I beg leave to say that the Government have no official information of the coming of Mr. Bond.

IN COMMITTEE—READINGS.

Bill (No. 27) respecting the Alberta Railway and Coal Company.—(Sir Donald Smith.)

Bill (No. 30) to incorporate the Deschênes Bridge Company.—(Sir James Grant.)

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 70) respecting the Témiscouata Railway Company.—(Mr. McAlister.)

Bill (No. 71) to incorporate the Camp Harmony Angling Club.—(Mr. Sutherland.)

Bill (No. 72) to consolidate and amend the Acts relating to the Imperial Trusts Company of Canada.—(Mr. Coatsworth.)

Bill (No. 73) to incorporate the Calgary and Lethbridge Railway and Irrigation Company.—(Mr. Davis.)

POWDER MAGAZINE, BEACON HILL, VICTORIA, B. C.

Mr. PRIOR asked, Has the Government handed over the powder magazine on Beacon Hill, Victoria, B.C., to the Imperial authorities, or are they still responsible for the delay in removing it? If still responsible, why have they not removed it before this?

Mr. DICKEY. The Home Government has not handed over the powder magazine on Beacon Hill, Victoria, B.C., to the Imperial authorities, but is still responsible for keeping powder therein. The removal of powder has not taken place in consequence of the powder magazines in the neighbourhood being in the charge of the Imperial authorities, and of the only magazine in which the accommodation is available, namely, that at the artillery barracks, being considered by those authorities to be dangerous for the storage of such powders.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

THE CASE OF MR. T. J. WATTERS.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) asked, 1. What were the facts which constituted the offence or offences for which Mr. T. J. Watters, the late Assistant Commissioner of Customs, was prosecuted? 2. What punishment was awarded Mr. Watters by the magistrate before whom he was tried? 3. Was the punishment awarded with the concurrence or on the advice or at the suggestion of the Minister of Justice?

Mr. CURRAN. 1. The facts as alleged by the Crown were as follows:—In the Wabash Railway case, Watters received from the Wabash Railway Company, as Assistant Commissioner of Customs, six drafts amounting in all to the sum of $543; which, instead of depositing at once in the Bank of Montreal to the credit of the Receiver General to the proper Customs account, he converted to his own use.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman give the date?

Mr. CURRAN. Not in this case. The dates are given in the following:—In the Blackwood case, Watters had a departmental cheque for $750, dated 2nd August, 1893, made to his own order, on pretense that it was all required to pay the expenses of customs officer Blackwood to England on official business. This cheque Watters deposited to his own credit; out of this sum he paid Blackwood $500. On Blackwood's return from England he refunded Watters $153.95 out of the $500. Watters kept the $250 from the 2nd August, 1893, and the $153.95 from the 20th of September of the same year until the 21st September, 1894, when on that day, after an interval of about fourteen months, he deposited the $403.95 to the credit of the Receiver General. In the Durafort case, Watters on the 10th August, 1894, received $214.16, money of the Government, which he converted to his own use, and subsequently on the 22nd of August, 1894, he deposited an equivalent amount to the credit of the Receiver General, which deposit was in part made up of cheques which he had received as a departmental officer from the Wabash Railway and Main Central Railway, and which latter cheques should have been deposited to their proper account. The Maine Central Railway case was similar to the Wabash Railway case. Watters received five cheques of $25 each, which he converted to his own use. In the Grand Trunk Railway case, Watters received $80 from the Grand Trunk Railway Company and converted it to his own use. In the Watson case, an advance of $25 was made by the Customs Department to officer J. A. Watson, to meet certain travelling expenses. This amount was subsequently paid over to Watters, who, instead of depositing it to the credit of the Receiver General, converted the same to his own use. 2. Mr. Watters having made restitution, on a plea of guilty, was sentenced to one year's imprisonment in the county jail, without hard labour. 3. The Minister of Justice, acting on the advice of counsel, intimated, through him, that he considered the ends of justice would be satisfied by the punishment afterwards imposed.

DEPTH OF WATER IN CANALS.

Mr. DENISON (for Mr. Cockburn) asked, In view of the fact that at an expense of $20,000,000 an open channel 160 feet wide at the bottom and at least 18 feet deep is being constructed at Chicago, which when opened will discharge over 10,000 cubic feet of water per second (being about 5 per cent of the amount now flowing through the Niagara River) and which will materially affect the level of our lakes and the depth of water in our canals and harbours; in view, also, of the fact that the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce has just petitioned the Secretary of War to investigate the matter at once, and that cities along the lower lakes are being aroused to a sense of the danger threatening their interests, is it the intention of the Government to take immediate steps to protect the interests of the Dominion?

Mr. HAGGART. I have directed an inquiry to be made as to what probable effect the channel proposed to be constructed at Chicago would have upon the harbours in Canada and on the Welland and St. Lawrence canals, and the navigation of the lakes. I am awaiting a reply before any steps are taken in the matter.

MAILS BY THE DOMINION LINE.

Mr. DENISON (for Mr. Cockburn) asked, Whether the "Labrador," of the Dominion Line, and the "Laurentian," of the Allan Line, both left Liverpool on the same day. The "Labrador" arrived in Quebec on Saturday at 5.40 p.m., while the "Laurentian," which carried the mails, arrived at the same place at 12.30 noon, Monday. The Dominion liner made the trip in 43 hours quicker than the "Laurentian," and to that extent were the mails late in reaching Toronto. Up till recently there was a sub-contract between the Dominion Line Company and the Allan's, by which the "Vancouver" and "Labrador" of the former line took the service both ways, as they were faster than any two other boats of the Allan Line. This sub-contract expired the other day. In view of these facts, and as the original contract was to run out the balance of this season, is it the intention of the Government to insist upon the two faster steamships of the Dominion Line being employed as formerly in carrying the mails, and if such is not their intention, will proper and immediate provision be made of an equally satisfactory character?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The mails were sent by the "Labrador" which sailed from Quebec yesterday. The department is now in correspondence with the Allan Line in reference to this important matter.

IMPORTS OF RAW AND REFINED SUGAR.

Mr. LEGRIS asked, What were the total quantities of raw sugar and refined sugar imported during the years 1893 and 1894 respectively?

Mr. WALLACE. 1. The total quantity of raw sugar imported during the fiscal year 1892-93, was 245,781,700 pounds; refined sugar during the same period, 1,610,147 pounds. 2. Raw sugar imported during the fiscal year 1893-94, 303,796,812 pounds; refined sugar imported during the same period, 3,356,526 pounds.

STEAMSHIP CONTRACT WITH PICKFORD & BLACK.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) asked, Has the subsidy contract with Messrs. Pickford & Black for the running of the steamers "Duart Castle," "Taymouth Castle," "Alpha" and "Beta" between Halifax, St. John and ports in Cuba, Jamaica and the West Indies been renewed and continued or modified, or has any new contract been made with them or with any other persons for the above services or any of them? If so, when was the renewed or modified contract, or the new contract entered into? Has it been signed? What modifications or changes have been made, and what subsidy does the new or modified contract provide for, and for what length of time does it extend? Were tenders called before the new or modified contract was entered into? If not, why not?

Mr. IVES. The subsidy contract with Messrs. Pickford & Black for the running of the steamers "Duart Castle," "Taymouth Castle," "Alpha" and "Beta" between Halifax, St. John and ports in Cuba, Jamaica and the West Indies has been modified. A new contract has been made with them. A new contract has been entered into with them for a modified service, under date of the 5th of March last. The contract has been signed. The modified contract provides for the services between St. John, Halifax and Demerara, via and touching at different West India Islands, being continued monthly as heretofore. It provides for the continuance as heretofore of the services between Halifax and Jamaica. It does not provide for a continuance of the service between Halifax and Cuba as heretofore existing, but it does provide that the Jamaica service, upon notice being given to the contractors, shall be fortnightly instead of monthly, with monthly calls at a port or ports in Cuba; it also provides, upon similar notice being given, for the running of a service between Halifax and a port or ports in Hayti with the option of calling on the homeward voyage at a port or ports in the Island of Cuba, also between Halifax and port or ports in Porto Rico with the option of calling at port or ports in Cuba, or in lieu of this latter service a monthly service between St. John, N.B., via and calling at Halifax to a port or ports in Porto Rico, with the option of calling at a port or ports in Cuba. The subsidy provided for under the new contract is, for the Demarara service, at the rate of $5,000 each for 12 monthly trips during the year, and a further sum of $3,000 for one extra trip each year, if run for the monthly Jamaica service at the rate of $15,000 per annum; if the Jamaica service is run semi-monthly and the other services added, the rate for all such combined services to be $35,000 per annum. The contract is for five years from the 1st July next. Tenders were not called for before the modified contract was entered into, for the reason that contractors who are familiar with the routes and ports to be touched at and who have their business connections established are more likely to make the enterprise a success and of advantage to Canada than new contractors would be. The contract further provides that the payment of subsidy as stipulated is subject to its being provided by vote of Parliament.

GOVERNMENT PENSIONS.

On the question,

Mr. LANDERKIN. Has the attention of the Government been called to the following article in the Peterborough "Examiner"? If so, what action do they propose to take in the matter?

PENSIONERS IN THE NORTH-WEST REBELLION—HEALTHY AND ROBUST MEN PENSIONERS ON THE PUBLIC BOUNTY.

It is a time-honoured policy of the British Government that the defenders of the country and the fighters of the battles of the Empire, who have served long terms, should be rewarded with pensions; so there was no objection to the Canadian Government giving a pension to those who were injured in body or general health in the campaign in the North-west in 1885, so long as they were suffering from the consequences of those services, but it does seem a waste of the public funds that pension allowances should be continued after the subjects have been restored to vigorous health. In the Public Accounts for 1894 there appears a pension grant of $200.75 a year to Mr. Weir, of Keene, and of $91.25 to Chas. Guy, of Peterborough. It is well known that both of these men have completely recovered, one of them being noted locally for his unusual strength and vigour. There are hundreds who in that campaign served longer and endured more hardships, who had no such recognition of their services. The Government can't afford a few thousands to drill the volunteers whose services may be needed at any time, but they can devote large sums to bonusing volunteers who are in perfectly good health and able to earn their own living. It is such waste of public funds, repeated in a thousand different forms, that account for a deficit of nearly five million dollars, and the Government, instead of cutting off the source of waste, are crippling necessary public services to make up the leak and putting on extra taxes. That $200 a year should be paid to Mr. Weir is simply indefensible. The information is given that he is in normal health, and the only trouble that appears to afflict him is that he has grown chronically tired of waiting for the date of his quarterly instalments to come around. It is time that this and other numerous instances of the abuse of the pension and superannuation system should cease. One or two big leaks from the public chest would be promptly noticed, and could be promptly stopped, but the money oozing out in thousands of places, most insidiously, but not the less effectively, drains the public coffers and necessitates periodical trips to England for loans to replenish them. Mr. Foster's last loan of ten millions has already melted away and dropped into the grave of gigantic deficits. The individuals above referred to should in decency notify the Government that they have long ago recovered, and not wait for investigation, which will only result in their further humiliation.

Mr. SPEAKER. I submit to the House that this is a question which, under our rules, cannot properly be put. Rule 29 is as follows:—

Questions may be put to Ministers of the Crown relating to public affairs; and to other members relating to any Bill, motion, or other public matter connected with the business of the House in which such members may be concerned; but in putting any such question, no argument or opinion is to be offered, nor any facts stated, except so far as may be necessary to explain the same.

May lays down, as follows, the rule with regard to questions:—

The purpose of a question is to obtain information, and not to supply it to the House. A question may not contain statements of facts, unless they be necessary to make the question intelligible, and can be authenticated, nor should a question contain arguments, inferences, imputations, epithets, nor ironical expressions.

In the form in which this question appears, on the Notice Paper, it seems to me not in accordance with the rules of Parliament, and, therefore, I think it should not be put.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Well, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the question.

OBSTRUCTION IN YAMASKA RIVER.

Mr. BRUNEAU (for Mr. Migneault) (Translation) asked, Whether the Government have caused to be removed that portion of the dam which was carried away in the spring of 1892, and which obstructed the channel of the Yamaska River, near its mouth? If so, by whom, and how much was paid for the work?

Mr. OUIMET. (Translation.) The obstruction referred to was removed in the course of October last by Mr. Moise Robidoux, who had the assistance of six men. Two of these were paid by the department, at a cost of six dollars to the Government.

PROPOSED MONUMENT AT LOUISBURG.

Mr. BRUNEAU asked, Whether the Government have granted to a certain society in the state of Massachusetts, permission to erect a monument at Louisburg, intended to commemorate the taking of that fortress from the French, in 1745, by Colonel Pepperell?

Mr. DICKEY. No such permission has been given.

SPEECH OF THE MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS.

Mr. McCARTHY asked, 1. Whether the Minister of Public Works is correctly reported in the Montreal "Herald" of the 8th inst., in the speech which he made on the occasion of the visit of the Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Quebec to the Monument Nationale, as having said: "It was here that they (the French Canadians) had once been conquered, but could boast that they had reconquered their country since the Queen was represented in the province by a French Canadian. As to himself, he could say that he had shown lately in the Federal Cabinet that the French Canadians were not only respected but that they could even command"? 2. If so, to what did the Minister of Public Works refer, in saying that "he had lately shown in the Federal Cabinet that the French Canadians were not only respected, but could even command"?

Mr. OUIMET. With due respect to the rules of the House, I question the right of the hon. gentleman to put such a question, which relates to no public business before this House; but, as my refusal to answer it might be given a wrong interpretation, I beg to give a short resumé in my own language of what I said on the occasion referred to: (Translation.) Referring to Canadians of French extraction and language in this country, and to the presence of one of our own nationality as Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Quebec, I must have said that there was good reason to congratulate ourselves upon the fact that after all we were still at home, and that we had reconquered our country; that we had cause to be proud to find that our nationality could command the respect of other nationalities in Quebec as well as in Ottawa.

Mr. LAURIER. There must be a good action for libel against the "Herald."

EMPLOYMENT OF HENRY SMITH, OF CHATHAM.

Mr. ALLAN asked, Whether Henry Smith, of Chatham, Ontario, is now in the employment of the Government, or has he been employed by them during the past year? If so, in what capacity, and at what salary?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Henry Smith is not now in the employment of the Government, nor has he been employed by it during the past year.

POST OFFICE EXPENDITURE.

Mr. MARTIN (for Mr. Lister) asked, What has been the total Post Office expenditure for the nine months ending 31st March, 1895?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The total expenditure of the Post Office Department to the 31st March, 1895, from parliamentary appropriations, amounts to $2,719,775.17. The Post Office expenditure returns for the quarter ending 31st March, 1895, are not yet complete. It may be explained that the salaries of postmasters, not being in the Civil Service establishment, are paid out of the revenue collected at their offices, and are not voted by Parliament.

THE SAN JOSE SCALE PEST.

Mr. BORDEN asked, Whether the Government is aware of the existence, in the state of New York, and elsewhere in the United States, of a dangerous pest known as the San José scale, which infests the apple and other fruit trees, and which may be introduced into this country with the nursery stock now in course of importation? If so, what action does the Government propose to take?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Department of Agriculture are aware of the existence of the San José scale pest in certain of the United States, and they are considering what steps may be necessary, effectually to prevent its coming into Canada; but I may say that the best entomological opinion in the United States, as expressed, is that this pest is likely to be confined to the portion of the continent below the boundary between the United States and Canada. However, the department are alive to the necessity of protecting our fruit trees from it.

PROSECUTION OF EMMANUEL ST. LOUIS.

Mr. McCARTHY asked, 1. Has a prosecution been commenced against Emmanuel St. Louis, in connection with the frauds perpetrated in the construction of the work known as the "Curran Bridge"? 2 (a).

If so, before whom and for what offence? (b). When was the information laid or the prosecution commenced? (c). Has the prosecution been disposed of, and if not, why not? (d). What are the dates on which the charge was heard or investigated?

Mr. CURRAN. In answer to the hon. gentleman I beg to say: 1. A prosecution has been commenced against Emmanuel St. Louis in connection with the frauds perpetrated in the construction of the work known as the Curran Bridge? 2. The prosecution was taken before M. C. Desnoyers, Esq., Judge of the Sessions of the Peace, for the city of Montreal, under the ordinary provisions with respect to preliminary investigations before magistrates, contained in part 44 Seq. of the Criminal Code. The offences charged against Emmanuel St. Louis are those of having obtained divers sums of money amounting in all to $144,874 by false pretenses with intent to defraud, and for having unlawfully destroyed his books, papers and writings, to wit, his time-books, cheques, bank-books, cash-books, journals, ledgers and balance sheets whilst Her Majesty the Queen was his creditor, with intent to defraud Her Majesty the Queen. (b). The information was laid on October 22nd, 1894. (c). The case is still pending before His Honour Mr. Justice Desnoyers, who is to render a decision on Monday, the 13th instant, at 9.30 a.m., as to whether there is sufficient evidence to call upon the accused to make the voluntary statement referred to in article 591 of the Criminal Code. The reason why the prosecution has not yet been disposed of, is owing to the very voluminous nature of the evidence taken, comprising 1,569 pages of type-written matter, and the examination of a very large number of voluminous exhibits. (d). The first witnesses were examined in this case on the 9th November last; when the case was adjourned until the 16th and subsequently to the 19th November. Witnesses were examined on the 19th, 21st, 26th and 28th November; the 3rd, 4th, 5th, 6th, 11th, 12th, 13th, 18th, 19th and 21st of December; the 9th, 10th, 11th, 14th, 16th, 21st, 22nd, 24th, 25th, 28th, 29th, 30th and 31st of January, 1895. On the 1st February an argument took place with respect to the admissibility of certain evidence, the judgement on which was only given on the 8th February, when the case was adjourned to the 15th February to enable the Crown to obtain certain documents which had gone astray. On the 15th February these documents were filed and the case for the Crown declared closed, and the defence applied for an adjournment of ten days, which was granted. On the 26th February the defence applied for a further delay, owing to the absence of Mr. McMaster, Q.C., and Mr. Geoffrion, Q.C., which was also granted. On the 5th March the defence contended that the voluntary statement required by article

Mr. McCARTHY.

591 of the Criminal Code could only be called for if the magistrate decided there was sufficient evidence to commit the accused, and consequently a delay of ten days was granted to allow the preparation of factums. On the 15th March, the Crown produced its factum, but Judge Desnoyers was absent owing to illness, and the case was adjourned until the 19th March. On the 19th March Judge Desnoyers was still absent through illness, but appeared later in the day and the defence got delay until the 21st March to file their factums. On the 21st March the factums were filed, and, on the application of the accused, a delay was granted until the 25th to enable each party to reply to the other's factum. On the 25th March the Crown filed its factum, but the defence again applied for further delay, which was granted. Since that time the judge has been studying the case, and on the 7th May, instant, he recalled two witnesses, J. Villeneuve and J. A. Michaud. All the applications for adjournments since the 15th February have been strenuously opposed by the Crown, and the cause of the delays at the commencement of the trial was that it took considerable time to gather together the different documents necessary to proceed with the case, and more particularly that certain pay-lists which had been forwarded from Ottawa, to Mr. Hall, the Crown Attorney, were, through an error of the Express Company, delivered to Judge Hall at Sherbrooke.

WINNIPEG AND HUDSON BAY RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. McCARTHY asked, 1. Whether the Government regard the Order in Council with respect to the grant to the Hudson Bay Railway Company as creating any contractual relationship between the Government and the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway Company? 2. Is the Government aware that the company is in ostentatious reliance upon the Order in Council, proceeding with the work of construction and entering into contract for the same? 3. If the Government does not deem the Order in Council authority upon which the company have a right to rely in the prosecution of the work of construction, is the Government taking any means to intimate to the company that that is their view? 4. What is meant by the letter of the Minister of Railways to the company, of the 27th April, saying that the Government would not "recognize" the new contractors to whom the company have let or are letting the work? (a). Is it that the Government passed the Order in Council on the understanding that the company will keep faith with the original contractors?—or (b). That the Government has no concern or interest in whom the company may contract with?

Mr. HAGGART. If the hon. gentleman refers to the Order in Council other than the one under which in 1890-91 the Government entered into the contract with the Hudson Bay Railway, as there is no such company but the Winnipeg and Great Northern Railway Company, I have to answer no. As to the second question, no. As to the third question, the Government has had no communication with the company since the Order in Council, other than the letter of the 27th April last. As to the fourth question, the letter explains itself.

CULLERS' OFFICE.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, What revenue has been received from the Cullers Office at Montreal and Quebec, respectively, during the last five years? What has been the cost of maintaining these offices during the same period, including all charges for staff and cullers, &c.? Has the lumber trade asked for the proposed changes in the system of inspection? What are the proposed changes? What will be the duties of the chief inspector under the proposed change, and what salary will he receive? Will it be necessary to maintain an office for the chief inspector, and will he be required to inspect any timber or deals?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). In answer to the first question, the following revenue has been received:—

	Montreal.	Quebec.
1889-90	$ 631 63	$17,497 85
1890-91	300 50	16,432 64
1891-92	149 82	14,160 15
1892-93	175 99	10,661 33
1893-94	116 47	11,756 57
	<hr/>	<hr/>
	$3,374 41	$70,508 54

2. The cost of maintenance has been as follows:—

1889-90	$2,336 57	$27,234 22
1890-91	2,269 34	25,334 27
1891-92	1,335 55	23,293 85
1892-93	1,949 82	24,187 29
1893-94	1,624 79	22,579 61
	$9,516 07	$122,639 24

The printing and stationery expenses, which are not divided, have all been charged to Quebec. 3. Those interested in the square timber trade in Quebec, hearing that it was intended to abolish the Cullers' Office, urged the Government to make some provision whereby the machinery established by the Cullers' Act would not be wholly destroyed. After several discussions, Mr. Commissioner Miall suggested the remodelling of the Act upon the principle of the General Inspection Act, i.e. the Act under which the inspection of staples (wheat, flour, fish, &c.) is carried out. This involves the principles of optional inspection and the payment of the whole expenses of inspection by the particular trade interested therein. Other portions of the trade contend that these objects may be attained by the reduction in the staff, and possibly a small increase in the cullers' fee, without any radical change in the existing law. The Government is now considering the views of either of these parties, but has not yet fully determined which course to adopt. If the latter view prevails the supervisor will continue at the present salary, but his staff both in the office and outside will be reduced, and his expenditure for the maintenance of his office will be materially reduced, so that the whole outlay will not exceed the revenue derived therefrom (except as regards the annuities to retired cullers).

REVISING OFFICERS—LAPRAIRIE.

Mr. GUAY (for Mr. Monet) asked, Why has the Government appointed two revising officers to make the electoral lists for the county of Laprairie? Were the two revising officers for this county appointed on the same date, and if not, on what date were they respectively appointed since the union of the two counties, Laprairie and Napierville?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The counties of Laprairie and Napierville having been united, a new constituency was formed the same as Richmond and Wolfe and Drummond and Arthabaska. They were appointed on the same day.

LAPRAIRIE AND NAPIERVILLE—ELECTORAL LISTS.

Mr. MONET asked, At whose request was Charles Bédard, notary, of St. Rémi, appointed jointly with Mr. Roberge, of Napierville? Were the electoral lists of one part of the county of Laprairie and Napierville (those made by Charles Bédard) printed at the Government Printing Bureau, or at the office of "La Minerve," of Montreal, in 1894? How much has the Government paid to the newspaper "La Minerve," of Montreal, for printing the electoral lists of the county of Napierville from 1886 to this date?

Mr. MONTAGUE. With reference to the first part of the question, as all the papers in regard to the appointment of this gentleman as revising officer are to be moved for by Mr. Monet, it would perhaps be better to have the whole correspondence in that connection before answering. As to the next question, the lists referred to were printed in the Government Printing Bureau, and, I am informed, no sums have been paid to "La Minerve" since the revision of 1886.

CHAMBLY AND VERCHERES—REVISING OFFICER.

Mr. MONET asked, Have two revising officers been appointed for the counties of Chambly and Verchères, and for St. Jean and Iberville since the union of the counties in 1892 ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. No.

NORTH CAPE, P.E.I.—WHISTLING BUOY.

Mr. PERRY asked. Has the fog-whistle at the North Cape, P.E.I., been replaced ? If so, who had the contract ? Were tenders asked for, and what was the cost of replacing it ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. There has never been what is usually termed a fog-whistle at North Cape, P.E.I. An automatic whistling buoy was moored off the main reef at Cape North, about two miles from the lighthouse, in nine fathoms of water, in July last. The buoy broke from its moorings in November last and drifted ashore, where it was secured by a Government officer and placed beyond the reach of sea and ice. Instructions were given to have it replaced by the Dominion steamer "Stanley," when placing the other automatic whistling buoys on the Prince Edward Island coast this spring. No contract was given for replacing the buoy. This work is usually done by Dominion steamers and not by contract. No tenders were invited for replacing, and the cost will be included in the expenditure for maintenance of automatic buoys on the coast of Prince Edward Island.

MIMINEGASH BREAKWATER.

Mr. PERRY asked, Has a petition from the inhabitants of Miminegash, P.E.I., and vicinity been received by the Department of Public Works, asking for a further extension of said breakwater, with the view to improving the navigation in said harbour ?

Mr. OUMET. A petition was received on the 3rd January, 1893, through Mr. Richard Hunt, from the stage-holders of Miminegash asking that the new works being executed at that place be extended about 100 feet further in. Upon this petition, the chief engineer reported that the extension petitioned for would, no doubt improve the harbour of Miminegash ; but the chief engineer did not consider that the work was necessary at the time and stated that it was more important to place the existing works in a good state of repair. For that purpose the sum of $500 was voted by Parliament at its session of 1894, and expended on the most urgent repairs to said works.

TIGNISH BREAKWATER.

Mr. PERRY asked, Has the Department of Marine and Fisheries notified the wharfinger at Tignish breakwater to make a return to the department of the amount of dues collected at said harbour during the year 1894 ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes. The agent of the department at Charlottetown has also been directed to inquire into this matter, and report fully to the department.

MAILS FROM ASHCROFT TO CARIBOO, B. C.

Mr. SOMERVILLE asked, What has been the amount of the mail subsidy paid to the British Columbia Express Company for carrying the mails from Ashcroft to Cariboo for the following periods :—1. From the time of confederation till the Canadian Pacific Railway was opened ? 2. From the time the Canadian Pacific Railway left the mails at Ashcroft to the present time ? 3. The amount of the subsidy they receive at the present time ? 4. The extra amount they are paid for carrying the mails into Lillooet at the present time, also from the time this service was started ? 5. Has a tender for this service ever been asked for from the public generally ? How are the mail contracts for carrying the mails into West and East Kootenay awarded, and what amount is paid for the service ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The figures for the first period are as follows :—1873, $23,784.67 ; 1874-78 (inclusive), $22,000.00 ; 1879, $27,000.00 ; 1880, $13,333.34 ; 1881-83 (inclusive), $20,000.00 ; 1884, $23,666.66 ; 1885, $24,450.00. For the second period, from the time the Canadian Pacific Railway left the mails at Ashcroft to the present time the figures are :—1886, $26,549.00 ; 1879-90 (inclusive), $24,000.00 ; 1891, $23,541.66 ; 1892, $23,500.00 ; 1893, $23,958.34 ; 1894, $24,000.00. The amount of the subsidy received at present is $24,000 per annum. The additional weekly service to Lillooet was started on the 1st July, 1892, at the rate of $250 per annum. The amounts paid have been embodied in the foregoing statement of annual payments. The answer to the fifth part of the question is, no. This information cannot be given unless the points between which mails are carried are specified.

PIG IRON IMPORTS.

Mr. LAURIER asked, At what price was pig-iron coming from the state of Alabama and the United States generally entered at the Custom-house of Toronto during the months of February and March last ?

Mr. WALLACE. No pig-iron was imported from the state of Alabama into the port of Toronto during the months of February and March last. The average invoice price of pig-iron imported from the United States during those months was $10.75 per long ton.

J. A. CHARLEBOIS' CLAIM.

Mr. LAURIER asked, Has the claim of J. A. Charlebois for balance of account for the construction of the Langevin Block been settled? If so, when, and on what conditions?

Mr. OUMET. No.

WRECK OF THE "SAN PEDRO."

Mr. PRIOR asked, Is it the intention of the Government to cause the removal of the wreck of the "San Pedro" from Brochie's Ledge, near Victoria Harbour, without further delay, and to erect a beacon at said point?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The owners of the wreck "San Pedro" are being communicated with, with a view to its removal and the immediate erection of a beacon at Victoria Harbour.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. MASSON. Mr. Speaker, as is usual on all occasions of the Budget debate, the subjects that are dragged into the debate are many and varied. A good portion of the time is taken up in discussing subjects such as the relative bulk of trade in various periods, the balance of trade during these same periods, and rules affecting the fiscal policy. Perhaps never in this House have the issues raised by the speech of the Minister of Finance and the resolutions in amendment moved by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) been more definitely confined to the fiscal policy of the Government. The line never was more clearly drawn between the two parties than it is drawn by the amendment proposed by the hon. gentlemen opposite, the operative part of the amendment being that it is expedient that the existing tariff should be modified so that it may be made a tariff for revenue only, in contra-distinction to the policy of the Government, which, from 1879 up to the present time has been a protective policy, that is, one adjusted and arranged from time to time so as better to protect and promote the various industries of the country. In speaking of that protective policy, I have noticed that several members of this House have referred to it as purely a policy for protecting the manufacturers of the country. Such was not the case in the inception of the policy, such has not been the case during the existence of that policy in this country, such is not the policy as it is now supported by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. That policy extends to all industries actually carried on in this country, and to no industrial class have the advantages of protection been so far extended as to the agricultural class, the class which hon. gentlemen opposite, in their speeches, would lead the public to infer were entirely outside the range of that policy. It is only necessary to refer to the specific duty levied on nearly all the products of the farm to see that that class has received an ample and secure protection. It is only necessary to refer to the class of articles which agriculturists consume, to see that, so far as it can be done, and consistently with protecting other industries, the duties on those articles have been reduced to a minimum. Now, Sir, it is a matter of congratulation to notice that not only is the subject confined to the direct issue between free trade and protection, but that what the hon. gentlemen opposite embody in their present resolution, is common to all the schemes and resolutions they have presented to the House from 1879 down to the present time. There is one element that pervades all their schemes; it is to be found in commercial union, it is to be found in unrestricted reciprocity, it is to be found in the policy of free trade as we have it in England, it is to be found in the policy of absolute free trade, and that is, an absolute, a positive, an ever-present attack upon protection. We find in the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite in various parts of the country, as well as in this House, that, wherever they present a scheme, the chief attack is aimed against the protection that the tariff affords; not to the general rate as being too high, not to the amount of money collected as being too great, but to the fact that, in adjusting the tariff, the Government are able not only to raise their revenue, but also to give a measure of protection to a number of industries. That protection is what they attack most vigorously, that protection is what their resolutions are all aimed at, it is a principle common to them all. This is the principle running through the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), whose remarks I shall more particularly deal with on the present occasion. He says that it is the policy of the Liberal party to remove all items in the tariff that afford protection, or, to use the language of the leader of the Opposition, several years ago, in one of his campaign speeches, "to abolish every vestige of protection." Of course, in connection with that scheme, some other policy must be put forth, and hon. gentlemen are not slow to set forth what it is. They would remove all the obstructions to trade, all the duties on articles of food and clothing and all others considered necessaries of life, in order, to use their own pet phrase, to make this a cheap country to live in. They would remove all these duties, and, in doing so, they would naturally begin by removing the duties on all farm products. Nearly all the products of the farm are necessary for food, are necessaries of life. They would remove the duty from grains, from meats, and other articles on which a duty was put at first, and has lately been increased; they would do this for the purpose of improving the position of the farmers. Now, as we claimed in the outset, and as we claim today, the effect of these duties has been relatively to enhance the prices of farm produce as compared with those prices in other markets of the world. The policy, therefore, which hon. gentlemen opposite are advocating would bear more grievously upon the agricultural classes. It would remove protection from the staple products of farmers, out of which they expect to get their cash: nor would it better their position in any way that I can see, to reduce the duties on manufactured goods. This policy is a policy not only for the manufacturers, but also for the farmers, and it is a policy framed to increase the prosperity of those engaged in all classes of industry. It is bounded by no hard and fast rules of tariff, but, as was stated at the time of its introduction, and as has been stated from time to time as changes have been made in it, it is elastic, and part of the policy is that it shall be adjusted as the exigencies of the country, and the requirements of trade demand. As to the wisdom of readjustment, it is clear that each change, whether it be slight or great, is a fair subject for discussion, and, during last session, we had that subject entered into in detail, to a far greater extent, perhaps, than it is necessary on this occasion to do. We have had, however, by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) a direct attack made upon the Minister of Finance, and upon the changes made last year, and the changes proposed this year, the assumption being that the Minister of Finance misstated his case, when he said that the changes in the tariff involved a reduction in taxation, that it was removing burdens from the people, and lowering the average of taxation. The hon. member for Winnipeg put himself forward as an authority in making the statement that the changes in the tariff, instead of decreasing the burdens on the people, increased those burdens. There are many ways in which this subject has to be looked at before a true and accurate understanding can be arrived at. The hon. gentleman chose to view it from the standpoint of the percentage of taxation on the total importations. He deducted from the total importations the coin and bullion. To that I take no exception. He deducted, I say, the coin and bullion from the total importations of free and dutiable goods, and he compared the twelve months of 1893-94 with nine months of 1894-95. It must have been obvious to hon. gentlemen that it was hardly fair, and by no means convincing, to compare nine months with twelve months, because no one could have gone over the figures without noticing that, during different quarters of the year the imports, both of free and dutiable goods changed very materially, and that three quarters of the year could not afford any fair comparison as to the trade done during twelve months. Had the hon. gentleman wished to deal fairly with the House and the country, he could easily have obtained the returns for the last twelve months, and have compared them quarter by quarter. As the hon. gentleman did not choose to do that, I propose giving to the House the result, quarter by quarter, of the last twelve months, as compared with the previous twelve months. This does not exactly coincide with the financial year, but it will furnish a much more fair comparison than that which the hon. gentleman advanced. If the hon. gentleman had taken the corresponding quarter, that ending 30th June, 1893, and compared it with the quarter ending 30th June, 1894, he would have found that for the former quarter the value of dutiable goods imported was $17,625,059, that of free goods imported, $15,917,618, making a total of $33,540,677, on which duties collected were, $5,263,529. This gives for the dutiable goods a ratio of taxation of 29·86, and on the total, 15·66. For the corresponding quarter of 1894 we find the importations of dutiable goods to be of the value of $14,127,187; of free goods, $12,596,057; making a total of $26,723,244, on which the duty collected was $4,077,034, giving a percentage of taxation on dutiable goods of 28·86, and on the total imports of 15·25. For the following quarter, ending 30th September, 1893, the value of the dutiable goods was $19,089,223; free goods, $15,172,502; giving a total of $34,261,725, on which a total duty was collected of $5,738,545, being a percentage on the dutiable goods of 30·06, and on the total imports of 16·75. For the corresponding quarter of 1894, the value of the dutiable goods was $15,388,701; of the free goods, $15,391,246, making a total of $30,679,947, the total duties collected being $4,608,250, being a percentage on the dutiable goods of 29·94, and on the total imports of 15·02. For the quarter ending 31st December, 1893, the importations of dutiable goods were at the value of $13,765,495; of free goods, $12,875,842, making a total of $26,632,337. The duties collected were $4,460,018, making a percentage upon the dutiable goods of 32·42 per cent, and on the total importation, of 16·74 per cent. For the corresponding quarter of this year the dutiable goods amounted to $12,741,695; the free goods, $10,833,805 and the total to $23,557,500; the duties collected, $4,092,096, making the duty on dutiable goods, 32·12 per cent, and upon the total importations, 17·35 per cent. For the quarter ending 31st March, 1894, the dutiable goods amounted to $12,741,695; the free goods amounted to $9,502,631; total importations, $25,303,641; the duty collected, $5,004,300; making the duty on the dutiable goods, 32·30 per cent, and on the total importations, 20·17 per cent. For the corresponding quarter of this year, we have the dutiable goods amounting to $14,932,425; the free goods, to $8,941,680; total importations, $23,874,105; the duties collected amounted to $4,577,818, making the percentage on dutiable goods, 30·65, and on the total importations, 19·17 per cent.

Now, I give these figures, calculated by the quarters, for the purpose of showing how varied are the importations in the different quarters. In some quarters of the year the free goods exceed the dutiable goods, and in others, the dutiable goods largely exceed the free goods, and so on. It is absolutely unfair to compare the nine months of the year with the twelve months. The hon. gentleman says that by that comparison the duty has been increased, because the ratio in one would be 17·94, as against 17·76, or an increase of ·18 per cent. Well, if the hon. gentleman had taken the nine months of one year, and compared with the nine months of the other, he would have found that the ratio was turned around the other way, and that, instead of having to place 17·94 as against 17·76, we would have had 18·45 as against 17·94, making the difference the other way much more material. I do not wish to occupy much of the time of the House in dealing with figures. I know that figures are tedious, and I have only give them thus far for the purpose of showing the fallacy of the premises set forth by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin). It can never be taken as an authority that the percentage on importation has anything to do with the amount of taxation that is placed upon the people, for it must always be borne in mind that all duties are not taxation. It is quite clear and must be admitted by everybody that where the duty has the effect of protecting an industry, so that that industry flourishes within a country; that in almost every case, wherever the industry may be said to be flourishing, instead of increasing the price of the article to the consumer, it decreases it. It may be taken as acknowledged that it is only where the protection in some respects fails to protect that it increases the price, or it may be even where it is doing good work as a protection, that owing to the weakness of the industry that is being protected that it fails to reduce the price. But, wherever an industry is so protected as to flourish and prosper, competition springs up between the various industries of the same class in the country, and competition immediately starts between the industries within the country, and the imports of the products of other industries from without. Therefore, competition is developed either in the one way or the other, or frequently in both ways, and competition is so developed that it decreases the price of the product. I hold in my hand a letter from the vice-president of one of the Portland cement companies that have been formed within the last few years. It is only a few years since every barrel of our Portland cement was imported from England, Germany, or France. It is only within the last five years that any attempt has been made to manufacture it in Canada. Experiments have been going on for many years, but these experiments only proved successful within a comparatively recent period. One of the earliest companies to start in this business, and one which, perhaps, has sunk more money than any other, in developing this industry and making experiments with regard to perfecting their product, is situated in my riding, and is called "The Owen Sound Portland Cement Company." I hold in my hand a letter from the vice-president of that company, who, I may inform you, Mr. Speaker, is a warm supporter, a life-long supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite, a free trader for many years. I think that what he says as to the effect of protection upon the industry that he is particularly connected with, is worth reading to this House. The letter is not sent here for any purpose it would serve in debate. It is written, asking for concessions as regards duties imposed upon the material that enters in their manufacturing, and, incidentally, the following expression is used:—

I would also mention just here, that the protection that this industry has received in the past has been the means of lowering the price of cement to the purchaser in this country, and were that protection to be removed, there is not the slightest doubt but that our factories would be closed, and the few importers that are in the business would again run up the price.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do I understand the argument of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Masson) to be, that the competition reduces the price right down to as low as it would be as if it were imported from abroad? Does he say that competition has that effect?

Mr. MASSON. Competition, in many cases, has more than that effect.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then why does the hon. gentleman keep the tariff on, after that?

Mr. MASSON. The question of the hon. gentleman is so easy to answer, and has been answered so many times in this House that it is almost unnecessary to repeat the answer, but, to please him, I will answer it again. The letter that I have quoted from answers his question. If protection were removed, these industries would be wiped out by the stronger industries abroad. There would be no trouble in a short time flooding and glutting the market with foreign product to such an extent that these struggling industries would be entirely choked out.

Mr. FORBES. Infants.

Mr. MASSON. Yes, the infant would be choked and strangled.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But they have already choked themselves down to below what they could buy abroad at.

Mr. MASSON. Not at all. Not only in the case where the competition has reduced the price below what it was before, but, in many of these other cases, where the price is not below what it might be before, the removal of the elements of protection would undoubtedly have the effect of closing the doors of these factories, of throwing large numbers of these men out of employment, and of largely reducing the home market for the consumption of our farmers' products. Mr. Speaker, were it necessary to say anything further as to the unfairness of comparing a portion of a year with the whole year, or even one year with another, as showing where the burden of taxation rests, and on whose shoulders it rests; I might go into figures showing the large number of importations that, in the last two years, have varied very materially. However, I have selected only a few where the difference in the importation during the last two years, between the present and the previous years, amounts to 50 per cent for the first nine months of the year 1893-94, we find that $2,033,197 worth of silk was imported, and that for the corresponding months of the present year only $1,757,938 worth was imported. The importation of spirits in the nine months of 1893-94 amounted to $817,243, while in the corresponding months of this year they amounted to $599,983. In this and many other items there has been a great decrease in the importation; however, in others there has been an increase. In clothing, the importation in the former period amounted to $595,346 as against $715,550 in the last nine months. In cloths, such as worsteds, woollens, coatings and such like, the increase has also been large, the amount in the nine months of 1893-94 being $1,435,880, while in the corresponding nine months of this year it has been $2,130,807. I have many other statements of the importations during these years, but I will not weary the House by reciting them. There is another view, showing that an increase or diminution of taxation does not always increase or decrease importations. We find, in comparing year with year, that after an increase of taxation there is frequently a larger importation, while at other times after a decrease we have a smaller importation. So that, in order to find out on whose shoulders the burden of taxation rests, or on what particular article it is collected, it is necessary to go over the items in detail. That certainly would be a laborious task, and the recital of the figures to this House, though perhaps interesting, would be very hard to follow. Such an application of the present tariff to the importations of the previous year would show that, instead of the statement of the hon. member for Winnipeg being correct, that it meant an increase, there has really been a decrease of between half a million and three-quarters of a million dollars. It may be said that this does not correspond entirely with the promise of the Finance Minister when he stated that he anticipated a decrease of a million and a quarter. But it must be borne in mind that he was basing his expectation, not upon the importation of the previous year, but upon the importation of the coming year. But, Sir, it was not in connection with the comparison of the figures that the hon. gentleman made his most serious charge. His charge was that the Minister of Finance had misstated the facts to the House, that he had made mistakes in reference to these; and he broadly insinuated—I think that expression is none too strong—that the Minister of Finance had done so wittingly and wilfully. The first charge which the hon. gentleman makes in that respect he calls a little matter; he says, it is but a small one; but he makes it for the purpose of showing that the Minister of Finance was not perfectly fair. He refers to the statement made by the Minister of Finance in reference to a slight increase in the excise, and he says that if the hon. Minister had stated the matter fairly, he would have shown a decrease instead of an increase. Now, the hon. gentleman had before him in the unrevised "Hansard" a full statement of what the hon. Minister of Finance said. He had before him the table given by the Minister of Finance, showing that the duty collected was less than in the previous year. In columns side by side were various items—spirits, malt, cigars, cigarettes, tobacco and snuff—with statements of the quantities for each year, and the amount of duty collected, showing the increase or decrease in the amount of duty, as the case might be; and the hon. Finance Minister, after giving the table, explained it as follows:—

The duty accrued, as will be seen, has declined somewhat, but sufficient has been received from methylated spirits to counteract this, and to give us, besides, the small increase before-mentioned of $13,725. The diminution of $50,840 on malt was due, of course, to the decrease in the duty on malt. Altogether, the excise shows a slight gain of $13,725, a gain arising from the profits upon the sale of methylated spirits, a branch of industry which is carried on under the supervision of the Excise Department.

Now, it is quite clear that when the hon. member for Winnipeg stated that the hon. Finance Minister had led the House to believe that there was an increase in the revenue derived from excise, he held back something, for he did not tell the House fairly and plainly that while there was a decrease in the duty collected, it was to the transactions in methylated spirits that the profit was due. Could anything have been fuller or franker than the hon. Minister's statement? But having made the allegation that the hon. Minister had concealed something, the hon. member, declaring himself to be absolutely fair, stated later on in his speech that the hon. Minister had referred to one side, and one side only of the ledger. I think that in that respect, the hon. member for Winnipeg must have been following some roughly-culled notes taken at the time, and had not referred to the "Hansard" report of that part of the hon. Minister's speech. It seems to me impossible that the hon. gentleman, reading that plain and detailed statement, showing a decrease in the one part and an increase in the other, could conclude that there was anything held back. After alleging neglect and insinuating something worse on the part of the Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Winnipeg treats us to a series of calculations based on an imaginary state of affairs. He goes on to show that supposing Mr. Mackenzie had imposed a duty of 17·13 per cent instead of a duty of 11·23, he would have had, instead of a deficit, a surplus of six million dollars and over. Does the hon. gentleman wish the House to believe that any one can, by raising the average of duty over the whole importation, increase or diminish at will the amount of the duty? Surely the hon. gentleman has made a greater study of political economy than to suppose any such thing. What would be the effect of taking the duties we charge now and placing them upon the importations during the regime of Mr. Mackenzie? Would the hon. gentleman, according to his system of tariff for revenue only, tax at the one average rate all the varied articles that we imported, or would he allow some of the articles to come in free and tax others higher? In what way would he adjust the increase in the average from 11·32 to 17·13 in order to get this larger revenue? We will take some of the items that came in free, and the free admission of which was not a benefit but a detriment to the country. Take wheat and wheat flour amounting to $8,000,000 imported annually during that regime, and which came in direct competition with the products of our farmers. We filled our mills with these imported products long before our Canadian farmers had their wheat marketed or even threshed. So that the wheat which came in was not for the advantage of the people of Canada, but was a detriment. Would he place his 17·13 per cent upon that; and if he did, would it bring him any revenue? Why, there was only a specific duty equivalent to eight or ten per cent imposed, under the National Policy, on the value at the prices then ruling, and what was the effect? Instead of importing the wheat and wheat flour to the extent of eight or nine million dollars, we imported less than one million dollars worth. So that the hon. gentleman must well know that the placing of duties on certain articles would prevent their importation, and therefore he has no reason to say that on the imports during Mr. Mackenzie's regime he would have an increase of revenue as a matter of mathematical calculation, in proportion to the increased percentage on the total imports. The other products that came in, came in the same way—either free or nearly free. Take the other farm products such as pork, beef, and cattle, all these articles came in free, not for the benefit, but to the detriment of the country. Would the importation of these have continued if the duty of 17 per cent had been imposed? Not at all. Every one knows that the duty hardly amounts to that.

Mr. CHARLTON. Does the hon. gentleman take the ground that the importation of breadstuffs and grain sent through our canals in transit from the western states to the European markets, and furnishing our canals with the business they were constructed to secure—does he suppose that trade was a detriment to the country?

Mr. MASSON. The hon. member for Winnipeg did not refer to the grain that passed through in transit. The grain imported for export passed through in bond. He was more practical, and took the figures of the importations entered for home consumption. I am dealing with that question.

Mr. CHARLTON. My hon. friend is aware that prior to the adoption of the National Policy grain was nominally entered for consumption. It did not pass through in bond, but came in and went through the country or remained in the country, as the case might be, for consumption. But the importations had the effect on the market of an importation for transit.

Mr. MASSON. The hon. gentleman will not say exactly that it was importation for transit. He must know that all our mills in Ontario of any size and with any pretensions to a wholesale trade received nearly all their supplies during the navigation season, from the United States. Our mills and storehouses were all filled with American grains before the Ontario farmers had theirs threshed.

Mr. CHARLTON. Was it a disadvantage for the country to permit our mills to grind American wheat for export? If we had a surplus to export, did not that furnish our coopers and shippers and others with business?

Mr. MASSON. The hon. gentleman had a record at one time as a strong protectionist, and occasionally argues in that line yet. Whenever anything touches his own interests, he is just as strong a protectionist as I am. I am quite willing to be catechised by the hon. gentleman. I do say it is a great advantage to have our mills supplied with wheat, if we had not the wheat in our own country to supply them. I would refer the hon. gentleman to the Trade and Navigation Returns for these years, and he will find that we exported bushel for bushel every year what we imported. So that we were under no necessity to receive American grain and crowd our own out and thus force our farmers to seek an export market while the home market was ready for them here. The result of our imports and exports of wheat showed that we were just producing about enough for our home consumption, and the placing of a tariff upon wheat for the protection of our farmers had the effect of keeping out the American product and causing our own to be consumed in Canada. If the hon. gentleman wishes to follow up that question thoroughly and see whether the farmers were in any way benefited by that or not, I would ask him to refer to the reports of various American markets and English markets in order to see our relative position to these markets before and after the imposition of the duty. He will find that while we had good prices for our wheat and other articles during the years of reciprocity, that we were not getting any thing like the English prices. We were 20 cents below the New York prices. But what took place within three years after the introduction of the National Policy? Instead of being 20 cents below New York, we rose to within 5 cents of New York, and of late years we have frequently been higher than New York. For the last five years our prices have been on a par with those of New York. But, Sir, that subject has been followed out in detail in this House, and, but for the question of the hon. gentleman, I would not have referred to it. I was proceeding to remark that the importation of pork, fresh meat and cattle figured very largely at that time, and these importations were to the detriment and not to the advantage of the Canadian farmer. The absence of protection may have left this a cheaper country to live in. And to those living upon an assured income, and caring not for prosperity outside but only for what they could get with their small income, or large income as the case may be, this may have appeared an advantage. But to the person interested in the prosperity of the country, whether in trade, or in manufactures or in any other way, the improvement of the condition of the farming classes, which is directly promoted by the imposition of duties upon farm products, is most important. It is not by numbers alone that the buying power of the people is to be estimated. It is true that men, women and children must be fed and clothed and that number, therefore, is an element in consuming power. But the consuming power is regulated by the producing power, and, as you increase the prosperity of a class, whether agricultural, manufacturing or any other, you increase the purchasing power of that class, and much more than by increasing its numbers do you increase its utility to the commerce of the country. It is not through the number of customers a man has that his store flourishes so much as from the aggregate amount of their purchases. And if our farming classes are hard up, if their means are scanty, they are not of nearly the value to the commercial body that they would be if smaller in numbers and better provided with capital. I do not intend to follow the hon. gentleman through his various comparisons. I contend that it is impossible to make any comparison which would show what effect one tariff would have, calculating upon the importations under another tariff; for we know that a rearrangement of the tariff may decrease some imports, while it would have no effect in decreasing those in other lines. An article which cannot be produced in the country and which has become a necessary, or a luxury so akin to a necessary that it is used by a large proportion of the inhabitants of the country, is a fair subject for taxation, according to the hon. gentleman opposite. Any duty put upon such an article will respond to the theory advanced by the hon. gentleman from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), of an increase and a proportionate increase of revenue. But in the case of articles that can be produced in this country, that are even to a small degree produced in the country, the imposition of a duty may have the effect of largely reducing or almost prohibiting the importation. Therefore, as I said, it is only by a close comparison of imports item by item that it is possible to say what the effect of a tariff would be in producing revenue. I need not go into details on that matter, for the hon. gentleman himself told us that he took no stock in these things. He said there were many things to be considered in judging the prosperity of the country. As to large imports being an index of prosperity, these things are always governed from year to year, by supply and demand. For an instance, I will refer you to the item of sugar. The hon. gentleman gave the total importations at 310,000,000 of pounds. I find, on reference to the figures, that the amount was actually 307,000,000 pounds; either of these figures shows an immensely increased importation over the previous year, when the importation had been small. Why was it so? Had importers been delaying their importations with a view to the expected revision of the sugar duties? Whatever the reason was, it would require a person well versed in the trade to answer positively. But the fact remains, that the importation of sugar for the last year was abnormally high. Will the same importation continue his year? We would naturally expect it to be less, for an abnormally large importation one year would naturally lead to a reduced importation in the following year, the same conditions existing. But the hon. gentleman, although he says that he takes no stock in these things, although he says there are a great many things to consider, proceeds to apply his own deductions in three different ways. But having adopted three different ways of applying his tests, using figures which he has worked out, apparently with great care, he finds that they lead to three entirely different conclusions. But that does not stagger the hon. gentleman. They show a contradiction, it is true; they show that one test does not correspond with the other. But the hon. gentleman gets over all that difficulty by adding the three sums together and he says: There you have, I claim, the amount of money that this Government has taken directly from the people. Take the first item he gives, when he attempts to show what would have been received by the Mackenzie Government if the tariff enforced by the present Government had been in operation under the Mackenzie Administration. As I have said, he cannot possibly calculate on receiving that money, and if he did, he would have no right to add it to any other sum. Nor can he claim that under the Mackenzie tariff our importations would have been the same as they have been. We have removed the duty on some things, and their importation has increased immensely. For instance, the importations of tea have increased from 13,000,000 pounds to over 19,000,000 pounds free, besides a small quantity that pays duty; but the total importation under the Mackenzie regime, from year to year, was in the neighbourhood of 13,000,000 pounds. The total importation last year was some 23,000,000 pounds, of which nearly 20,000,000 pounds were direct importations and free. This article, along with many others show that he has no right to assume that if the Mackenzie tariff had remained in force the importations would have been identically the same. No person can for a moment contend they would have been so: they would have been entirely different; and, therefore, it is absurd, it is misleading, it is nonsensical, to apply the importations under one tariff as a test of what the importations would have been under an entirely different tariff. But, after applying the Mackenzie tariff to the importations that have taken place since its removal, he runs up a long string of figures representing money that he claims has been taken from the pockets of the people. Then he takes the expenditure under the Mackenzie Administration, and increases that, and by a system of figuring, he swells that up also to an immense sum. In any one of those tests taken singly, we might suppose the hon. gentleman was in earnest, but no person can believe that the hon. gentleman is in earnest when he says, We will add them all together, and the amount will be the sum that the Minister of Finance has extracted from the pockets of the people. But the hon. gentleman made another attack upon the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance made some statements in reference to failures in the country. In speaking as to the prosperity of the country, he had used the test of the number of insolvencies that occurred during 1874 and 1875. The hon. member for Winnipeg waxes warm when he says that that was a most unfair comparison. Why did the hon. gentleman compare 1874 with 1875? Why, he says, in 1874 there was no Insolvency Act. An Insolvency Act was passed in 1875, and immediately hundreds of debtors in difficulty took advantage of it, and the amount of failures swelled from 7 millions to 28 million dollars. But, says the hon. member for Winnipeg, the Minister of Finance was making an unfair comparison, a comparison that he knew to be unfair; he was wilfully trying to mislead the House. The hon. gentleman dropped his attempt at insinuations, and came out with the broad allegation that the Minister of Finance had, in this respect, deliberately attempted to mislead the House. Now, as to the effects of the Insolvency Act, the hon. gentleman was only fanned into this wrath by his ignorance. That is the only excuse I can give him. I do not think the hon. gentleman would have waxed wrathful over that if he had known the fact, but being ignorant of the fact, he may be excused for getting wrathful. In 1864, an Insolvency Act was passed by Old Canada. That Act remained in force, with some few amendments, until 1869, when a material amendment was made. Prior to 1869, assignments were all voluntary; there was no such a thing under that Act as a compulsory liquidation. But, in 1869, compulsory liquidation was added to voluntary liquidation, and from 1869 to 1875, both measures were upon the statute-book. There were various amendments, but none of any importance. In 1874, the Act would have expired but for the passing of another Act, which extended its operations to the 1st January, 1875, and from that time until the close of the ensuing Parliament. In 1875, in the early part of the following Parliament, as the hon. gentleman stated, an Insolvency Act was passed, to come into force on the 1st September, 1875. That can hardly be said to be in the early part of the year. But the hon. gentleman was right in one respect. There was a certain portion of it which came into effect, for the Act wiped out all the old officers that had been appointed by the Conservative Government, and therefore their heads deserved to be cut off. Provision was made to wipe out all the liquidators and assignees that had existed under the Act of 1869. That portion of the Act came into force right away along with art procedure. Now, there was no change between these two years as between an insolvency law and no insolvency law. The Act of 1875 practically made no change in the working of the previous Act, except that it wiped out the voluntary assignment part of it. But with considerable experience in that matter, I can say that I never knew a debtor yet who found any difficulty in getting a friendly creditor to put him into liquidation when he wanted to go. So that, practically, the insolvent law of 1875 made no change in the conditions that existed previously. The hon. gentleman then proceeds to quote from a number of Speeches from the Throne to show that while surpluses existed under the present regime, the country was prosperous. Well, I am glad the hon. gentleman has been convinced that the country was prosperous, and that the country is prosperous still, notwithstanding all the sermons we have heard on blue ruin, the exodus, and other such subjects, year after year. I am glad the hon. gentleman is able to see that until, at least, the last two years, the country has been prosperous. But I would ask the hon. gentleman, before he leaves this subject, before it gets cold, to refer to some Speeches, from the Throne in the province of Quebec, in the province of Ontario, and in the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, for the last two years. It is only as concerns the last two years that there seems to be some doubt in the hon. gentleman's mind as to the prosperity of the country. If he will consult the Speeches from the Throne I have alluded to, I think he will find that of Ontario, for instance, uses language very similar to the language used in the Speech from the Throne at Ottawa, namely, that notwithstanding the depression that has swept over other countries, this country has remained prosperous, that we have had no financial crisis, and that the people, on the whole, are prosperous and happy. He will find in each of these speeches language that will, perhaps, convince him that in the two years concerning which he seems to have some doubt, there has still been an element of prosperity in this country that distinguishes it from other countries near us. The hon. gentleman said the depression struck the country in 1873, that it swept over the United States and then came here, and that the same course is being followed now. The hon. gentleman did not tell the House and the country that when the depression of 1873 struck the United States we felt it instantaneously; that while a crisis remained with them only six months, we had the depression for four or five years.

Mr. CHARLTON. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the depression did not continue in the United States?

Mr. MASSON. It was a crisis there, and, of course, depression followed. The hon. gentleman did not tell the House or the country that the depression which commenced in 1892 in the United States reached its height in 1893, and that it was not until the present year, or within twelve months of the present time, that, notwithstanding the depression of the United States, there has been anything such as could be called a crisis in this country. In fact there has not been what may be called a financial crisis in Canada. Our trade must necessarily suffer from the proximity of a large country like the United States being in a state of depression. It is not, however, in the United States only that the depression reigns, but it prevails in other countries with which we have to deal, and consequently our foreign trade must greatly suffer, and depression in our foreign trade is naturally followed by depression in our interprovincial and home trade. These results it would be unreasonable for us so to suppose we can escape, but we can check. But where are the bank failures and failures of financial institutions in Canada, while such institutions by hundreds have been wrecked in the neighbouring republic? The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) next dwelt on some abstract question as to the right of increasing the expenditure of a country, and the hon. gentleman laid it down as a Liberal doctrine that it was perfectly proper to increase the expenditure in proportion to the increased population. But the hon. gentleman laid it down as a high crime and misdemeanour to increase public expenditure at a greater ratio than the increase in population. Now, how would that rule work if applied to the hon. gentleman's friends in Ontario? Has the population of Ontario increased in anything like the ratio of its increase of expenditure? The hon. gentleman is convicting his own friends of high crime and misdemeanour, because they are entirely ignoring the question of population and revenue, and increasing expenditure year by year notwithstanding a decreasing revenue. How would that rule apply to the province of Nova Scotia? The hon. gentleman must know that the population of that province has not materially increased and that there is no comparison between the ratio of increase in population and that of expenditure. That provincial government has also ignored the question, not only of increased population, but increased income. Their increase of expenditure bears no proportion to increase of population or to increase of revenue. I will not weary the House by referring to other provinces under the control of the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite, but I can safely say that in each and all of them the same results will be found, and that under the rule laid down by the hon. member for Winnipeg they have increased their expenditures far beyond legitimate bounds and have been guilty of high crime and misdemeanour by increasing the expenditure far beyond the proportionate increase of population. I will not mention the province of Quebec and the late Reform Government, because I observe that the mention of the name of the late Reform leader seems to be offensive to some hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. gentleman referred to savings banks. After having told the House that the deposits in savings banks afforded no criterion as regards a country's prosperity, the hon. gentleman went on to show that the country is not prospering as it did during the Mackenzie regime; indeed he said the ratio of deposits had not increased since that time. It is a well-known fact in a small town or village there may be during prosperous years an increase of 1,500, which would be a very large percentage, and although it might remain prosperous for many years, that percentage would not be again reached. So that with small beginnings the percentage may run high, and as population enlarges the ratio of increase must diminish. That is the only answer I have to offer to the hon. gentleman's argument, that although the savings banks have gone on from year to year increasing their deposits, and a large increase has taken place, the ratio is not so great now as in former years, and does not, according to the hon. gentleman, afford the same evidence of prosperity. But the hon. gentleman, after entering into these details and arguments, came back to what, I suppose, is the main point of his speech, as it is the main point of the resolution proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and as it may be expected to form the main point of every speech delivered by hon. gentlemen opposite, that is an attack on the National Policy, in the course of which, in plain words, the hon. gentleman said the effect of the National Policy has been to impoverish the people. What evidence does the hon. gentleman furnish of the people being impoverished? Is it to be found in the increase in railways, in the number of miles travelled in the freight and passengers carried? If those tests are to be applied, they show conclusively that the people have not become impoverished. Do increased deposits in the savings banks from year to year afford a test? Then the result of the test does not correspond with the hon. gentleman's statement, for the deposits show that the country is not impoverished. Does the fact that a large increase has taken place in the value of buildings, stock and implements on the farms show that our farmers are impoverished? A great hue and cry has been raised on account of the depression in real estate in Ontario and the shrinkage in values that have taken place; but grave as the shrinkage has been, it has been due to causes which are well known and must be recognized. The hon. gentleman said there was a time in Ontario when, if a farmer wished to sell his farm, there was abundant competition and many buyers, and the hon. member for South Oxford said that that time was past, that there were no longer any buyers. Why? Because when farmers who have two or three sons wish to establish them on farms, they do no longer purchase expensive farms in Ontario, but in nine out of every ten cases send their sons to the North-west where farms may be purchased at low prices, and where $1,000 will go further, in settling a young man than $5,000 in Ontario. Notwithstanding all the depression in real estate we have, according to the returns for Ontario, which have been accurately prepared by assessors and checked over, evidence that the reduction in value in real estate is more than compensated by the increase of the value of buildings, farm stock and implements. So far as I have been able to see and judge for myself in that respect, I believe that in most, if not in all, the other provinces, the same results would be found if we had the statistics to show it. But, says the hon. gentleman, it is not only in the depression of the value of real estate but in the falling off of trade that the Finance Minister has, by his silence on the question of the National Policy to admit that the National Policy has been a failure, because the foreign trade of this country has decreased. If that is an argument for the failure of a protective policy, what will the hon. gentleman say about the falling off of trade in England. Is that conclusive evidence that "free trade as we have it in England" is a failure? If the falling off of trade in Canada is a proof that the protective policy is bad, then surely the falling off of trade in England would tell equally strongly against their free trade policy. Now, as a matter of fact, the trade in Canada has not fallen off in proportion as the trade in England has decreased. In the mother country, their trade has declined by millions of pounds, whereas, in ours we can reckon it by a few hundreds of thousands of dollars. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) says that he must have a tariff for revenue only, and I suppose he will also support the statement made by some of his leaders that he is in favour of "free trade as they have it in England." In his closing remarks, the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) stated that the Finance Minister was in error in making his calculation upon the sums received as duty from sugar imported into this country last year. Well, as the Finance Minister has the details, the qualities of sugars imported, and all these matters at his disposal, there would be no difficulty for him in making an absolutely correct estimate. But the hon. gentleman objects to any estimate, and he objects to anything that is not figured out in detail. But yet in the comparison that he (Mr. Martin) made, he not only took one particular article, but he took the whole importation, and, without any classification, or without any averages to guide him, he sought to draw his deductions and present them to the House. Mr. Speaker, I have to apologize for taking up more of the time of the House than I expected to, but before resuming my seat, I wish to refer to some of the comparisons that have been made by hon. gentlemen on the other side, and I trust that I may do so with more justice and more fairness than those which were made by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), in speaking of the increase of trade in the country, selected the year 1874, and compared it with the year 1894, and he stated that our total trade in the former year was $217,000,000 odd, and in the latter year, $240,000,000 odd, which, he said, showed a total increase for twenty years of only $23,000,000. Now, I do not at all object to the comparison made, but I wish to call attention to the fact that when the hon. gentleman selected the year 1874, when the Liberals came into power, and compared it with last year, that he took merely an arbitrary period, and arranged for himself an arbitrary comparison. There is no particular reason that I can give why he should have selected the year 1874, unless it is that in that particular year, trade was higher than it was in subsequent years of the Mackenzie Administration. Why did not the hon. gentleman take the year 1878, or the year 1879, whichever year he will admit is the last that the Liberal Government is responsible for? If he takes the year 1879 and compares it with the year 1894, he will find that, instead of the increase being only twenty-three and a half millions in twenty years, it was $87,544,204 in fifteen years. I call attention to this, Mr. Speaker, not for the purpose of finding fault with the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) taking the year 1874, but simply to remind the House that it was a very arbitrary comparison, and that there was no particular reason why that year should be taken. During the years that the Mackenzie Administration was in power the trade gradually decreased, until, in 1878, it had decreased to $172,405,454. In the year ending 30th June, 1879, and for which the tariff that was in force when hon.

gentlemen opposite were in power, is mainly responsible, our total trade had decreased to $153,455,685. If we want to make a comparison between the effect that one tariff policy has upon the trade of the country, as compared with the effect that our present tariff has upon trade, we are perfectly justified in taking the year 1894 when the trade was $240,999,889, and comparing it with the total trade for the year 1879. If we make this comparison, we find that in fifteen years there has been an increase in our total trade of $87,544,204, a very great difference, indeed, compared with the increase put forward by the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright). I am inclined to think that, in comparing the result of the two tariffs, no better test can be given than has been shown in the power of Canada to resist the period of depression which has visited countries abroad. The hon. member from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) referred at length to that question, and he wished to show that depression followed in the one case as in the other; but I ask the House to consider how, under the present tariff, this country withstood the recent financial depression? If there are any other reasons which tended to strengthen the country against this wave of depression, I think it would be well for hon. gentlemen opposite to mention them. I have no doubt that if they can find any reasons which will detract from the efficacy of the National Policy and the protective tariff they will be very glad, indeed, to discover them and let us hear about them. Personally, I consider that an investigation into the matter will prove that it is the tariff policy of this Government that has protected and preserved our industries, the agricultural industry included, and has maintained for us our home markets. By that means, and by that means only, were we enabled to withstand that tornado of financial disaster which has swept over the country to the south of us. But for the protection that our financial policy gave us, our farm products, cheap as they have been, would have been far cheaper, and the slackness of trade in our woollen, and other industries, marked though it has been, would have resulted in bringing those industries almost to a standstill, but for the protection afforded. That protection has been so equitably and wisely adjusted, that in almost every case we can say that while it is high enough to protect it does not increase the price to the consumer, and in nearly every case where the industry has been a few years established it has very much decreased the price to the consumer. By stimulating the industries of the country, it has brought about internal competition, and the second stage in the development of the protective system has already been reached in many of our manufactures; so that instead of competing with the importer, our manufacturers are now competing one with another until they are actually reducing the prices of goods below the prices at which they could be obtained abroad. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I have great pleasure in supporting the resolution, and in opposing the amendment thereto.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a good deal of attention to the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Masson) who has just taken his seat. I was aware when he got up that he was a protectionist; I am more than convinced, after he has sat down, that he is an ultra protectionist. He sought to prove at the beginning of his speech that protection was very largely in the interest of the farming community. It is evident from the statements he made that he is not a farmer himself—that he does not make his money on the farm, but behind the desk. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that if he were a farmer under the National Policy he would not state that the National Policy had ever put a dollar into his pocket. It is one thing to have protection on the statute-book of the country; it is another thing to have protection that will benefit the farmer financially. It is impossible, in my opinion, to protect the farmer in any article that he has to sell in foreign countries in open competition with similar articles from every other part of the world; because it is a well-known principle in political economy that the price of the exported article in the markets of the world determines the price of that article in the country from which it comes. I do not think any member of this House, if he reads the political economy of any great author, will come to any other conclusion. If we have a surplus of wheat and send it to the English market, the price we obtain there for it will fix the price for every bushel of wheat sold to the Canadian people for home consumption, and all the protection now on our statute-book would not increase the price to the Canadian farmer one-tenth of a cent per bushel. And what is true of wheat is true of every other article produced by the farmer of Canada and exported to foreign countries; and I do not think there is a single individual on the other side of the House who will rise here and say distinctly that such is not the fact. If protection would afford a higher price in this country for wheat, why, instead of having 15 cents a bushel on it, do we not put the duty to 50 cents or 60 cents a bushel, so as to give the farmer more for his wheat than he is getting at the present time? If, on the other hand, protection does not increase the price to the farmer, why do you mock him by telling him that he receives benefit from the National Policy, while his protection is only on the statute-book, and not in the reality? The hon. gentleman said also that protection actually decreased rather than increased the price of articles manufactured in this country. Did you ever in your life hear such a doctrine stated before? Why is it that the manufacturers of this country are so strongly in favour of protection if they do not know that they are going to receive a benefit from it in increased prices? The hon. gentleman read a letter from the president of a company who manufacture what they call Portland cement in the town from which he comes, namely, Owen Sound. That gentleman is said to have been a Liberal at one time, and I supposed he changed his opinion because he found that there was more money for him in the National Policy than there would be in the absence of protective duties on Portland cement. That gentleman sends a letter to the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) asking for some changes in the duties on articles used in the manufacture of Portland cement. Now, if those articles are not increased in price by the duties, to the man who is manufacturing Portland cement, why is he asking the Government to reduce the duties upon them, so that he can use them as raw materials? If that is true with regard to the raw materials, why is it not equally true in regard to the finished article?

Mr. MASSON. What he asked for was a rebate on certain machinery, on the ground that it was similar to mining machinery.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I wonder, Mr. Speaker, at the hon. gentleman in making such a statement. He would protect one article and not the other. Does not the machinery stand in the same position as the article the gentleman is manufacturing? And if the removal of the duty on the machinery would reduce its price, would not a reduction in the duty on Portland cement also reduce its price? According to the hon. gentleman, this protective tariff in regard to certain articles has a certain effect, and in regard to certain other articles the direct opposite effect. I would like to know from the hon. member why the Government gives a rebate on the raw materials that enter into the manufacture of certain articles in this country, such as agricultural implements, so that those articles can be sold to outside countries more cheaply than they can be sold in Canada, if the application of the duty does not increase the price? The hon. gentleman also said that the keen competition between the manufacturers in Canada so reduced prices that they actually sold their productions at a lower price than they could if the duty was not on at all. Now, I would ask the hon. gentleman, is not coal oil manufactured in this country? And when the duty was reduced on coal oil, what was the result? The result was a reduction in the Canadian market of several cents per gallon; and if the duty did not raise the price, the removal of the duty would not reduce it.

Mr. MASSON. When was the price reduced?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). One year ago. And the price fell from 18 to 12 cents of second-class Canadian coal oil.

Mr. MASSON. The reduction of price took place before the duty was removed.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). No, sir. Did the hon. gentleman know that binding-twine was manufactured at several points in the country, and that when the duty was reduced from 25 per cent to 12½ per cent the price fell one cent per pound. If the duty had not enhanced the price, how is it the price came down when the duty was removed? Does the hon. gentleman know that salt was higher a few years ago, and that the Government believed that the imposition of the duty had increased the price to the Canadian farmers? The Government cut the duty in two, and what was the result? The price came down in the Canadian market. But the hon. gentleman maintains that the duty has an influence only in cheapening the prices in the Canadian market of Canadian manufactures. If that be so, it would be in the interests of the country to increase the duties as much as possible and put as much money in the public treasury as possible. The Finance Minister, a few years ago, in his place in this House, told us he was going to remove $3,500,000 of duties or burdens from the shoulders of the Canadian people. By one stroke of the pen, he said, I am going to do it. I am going, he said, to remove the duties upon sugar. Now, if this burden of $3,500,000 had not been upon the shoulders of the Canadian people, the Finance Minister could not have removed it by one stroke of the pen.

Mr. MASSON. Does the hon. gentleman pretend that the duty on raw sugar was protective?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I am speaking of refined sugar which was mostly refined in Canada. At that time the duty was eight-tenths of a cent per pound, and when that was reduced to 65 one-hundredths of a cent per pound the refined sugar in the Canadian market fell correspondingly. Here was an article manufactured or refined in this country, and yet when the duty was reduced to the extent of fifteen-hundredths of a cent per pound, the price fell in the Canadian market, thus disproving the argument of my hon. friend. Now, the burden was on the Canadian people for many years. The total amount exacted was a good many millions by the protective duty on refined sugar. And yet, Mr. Speaker, in the face of those facts, there are gentlemen here who will get up at this late hour and at this late period of the nineteenth century, and in the broad daylight, make fallacious statements such as those we have listened to. I would ask the hon. gentleman if the protective duty increases the price to the farmers, how can it at the same time reduce the price to the manufacturers? It must be a very peculiar policy which increases the price of a product to one class and reduces the price of the product to another. The hon. gentleman could not have considered previously what he was going to say, and therefore made the contradictory statements he did. Then, the hon. gentleman said that by the policy of the Liberals, under the Mackenzie Administration, our farmers were ruined by American competition. He said that a great quantity of American wheat came in to compete with Canadian wheat and reduced the price to Canadian producers. Now, the hon. gentleman must know, if he studied the history of that period, that the American wheat brought into Canada was not brought in for Canadian consumption, because we had wheat enough of our own, and exported large quantities besides. It was imported, in the first place, to mix with our wheat. We had not Manitoba wheat then, and had to get our hard wheat from the United States, which, mixed with Canadian wheat, made a better flour, and enabled us to realize a better price in the English market. Then, in the second place, Canadian dealers found it profitable to buy wheat in the Western States and ship it across our country to the English market. This was of great advantage to the carrying trade of Canada, to our steamers and railway companies and the thousands of people employed in transporting this wheat from the west to the east. These people are now, as the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) admits, out of employment, because that wheat which was formerly transported across Canada by Canadian steamers and other means of transportation, employing Canadian labour, is now shipped through American ports, and all the labour employed in that business belongs to the American Union. So that instead of the exclusion of American wheat being an advantage, it is a decided disadvantage to Canada. In 1878, while we imported only 1,500,000 bushels of wheat from the United States, we exported 4,000,000 bushels, showing that the import was not for home consumption. Then, we have been told in this debate that the National Policy was stimulating the production of pork products, and that we were now exporting a great deal more than at any former period. We have been told that, while in 1889 we exported about 4,000,000 pounds of pork, ham sides and lard, in 1894 we exported 20,000,000 pounds of those articles, and therefore these hon. gentlemen drew the conclusion that the National Policy had been of great benefit to this industry. But what is the real reason for this increase? Will the hon. gentleman, who has conscientious convictions and political morality, stand up and say that the protective duty imposed in 1889 is the cause? Do not hon. gentlemen know that our farmers have gone into hog-raising because they find it more profitable to feed their grains to their hogs than to sell it in the open markets? They went more into live stock simply because of the low price of other articles. They can make a better profit by raising live stock in the form of hogs than by selling their grain by the bushel. To show the fallacy of the argument that the National Policy is the cause of increase of export of pork, let me give you another fact taken from a former period of Canadian history. From 1874 to 1878 we exported 85,750,000 pounds of pork, hams, bacon and lard. From 1889 to 1894, under the influence of our National Policy, we exported only 52,200,000 pounds. Now, if the National Policy is to be credited with this large export from 1889 to 1894, by a parity of reason we must credit the revenue tariff with the still larger exports from 1874 to 1878. But, Mr. Speaker, neither the National Policy nor the revenue tariff had anything to do with it. But hon. gentlemen opposite are so anxious to bolster up the National Policy, that they will grasp at straws and make arguments of which a very slight examination shows their fallacy.

After Recess.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). In rising to continue my remarks, I beg leave to refer further to the arguments used this afternoon. The hon. gentleman was kind enough to speak of the Liberal party as the party of many policies. Now, Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time that I have heard such remarks; and the gentlemen who make them are as conscious that they are in error as they are that they are living. We are referred to as the party who, in past years, have favoured the policy of commercial union, and hardly a speaker upon the other side of the House but speaks of the Liberal party as believing in that policy. Now, I have challenged hon. members before to quote one single statement wherein the Liberal party has ever favoured commercial union, as properly understood. We are opposed to the principle involved in that policy; we have repeatedly told the Liberal-Conservative party that we never endorsed that policy, and still, day after day, in the House and on the public platform, they continue to repeat what they ought to know to be untrue. We are also said to have changed our opinions in relation to reciprocity with the United States. I deny that there is any change in the Liberal party with regard to that subject. We are as much in favour of reciprocity, based upon equitable principles, as we ever were. At the same time, I do not think that the sentiment on this subject in the United States is as favourable as it was some years ago. But if the Government in power now, and in power at that time had been as conscientious in their efforts to obtain reciprocity as they sought to have the people believe, we should have obtained reciprocity, greatly to the benefit of the people of this country. Gentlemen opposite are aware that, during the last general elections, they had to announce themselves, in the eastern provinces especially, as strongly favourable to reciprocity, or they would never have received the votes they did. The fences and walls throughout the country were placarded with these words: "Vote for the Liberal-Conservative party and reciprocity." For this reason, it comes with very bad grace from gentlemen opposite to say that we have changed our opinions. These gentlemen have changed their opinions, but the Liberal party is of the same opinion as before. There is another point. I suppose, as usual, these loyal men will say that the Liberal party are decrying their country because we point out the effects of the present fiscal policy, upon the interests of the country. In doing so, we do not decry the country, but we show that a different policy would have a different effect, and one much more beneficial to the people. We are told by some of these gentlemen that the country is prosperous—prosperous from the Atlantic to the Pacific, not a word of discontent in any part of the country. But others on that side of the House tell us that there is a depression in trade; in fact, a declaration was put into the mouth of His Excellency the Governor General in the Speech he made from the Throne at the opening of Parliament, to the effect that there is a depression in the country. And we are here for the purpose of pointing out that that depression arises largely from the policy adopted and continued by those in power. Now, Mr. Speaker, we are told upon the public platform that the policy adopted and carried out by the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, when at the head of the Liberal party, so exposed the markets of this country to competition from the United States that our farmers and manufacturers had no chance to get on. Now, if we look at the facts and figures given us in official documents, we find that this statement is only made for political purposes, and contains no truth whatever. I have before me a statement which will show the truth of what I say. In 1877 we imported from foreign countries only $1 worth of furniture for every $13 worth manufactured in Canada. We imported only $1 worth of carriages for $52 worth we manufactured in Canada. In clothing, we imported $1 worth for $57 worth manufactured here; in spikes, nails, tacks, and other manufactures of that kind, $1 worth imported to $10 worth manufactured here; in boots and shoes—which were particularly mentioned by public speakers and hon. members as an item in which the American competition was particularly severe—we imported $1 worth for $69 worth manufactured here; in saddlery and harness, $1 imported to $73 manufactured; in other goods of all kinds, $1 to $26; in woolen goods, $1 to $17; in machinery of all kinds, $1 to $27; agricultural implements, $1 to $14. And out of eighteen leading articles, representing a total of $73,263,000 manufactured in Canada, we only imported $3,624,000 worth, or, in the relation of about $1 to $20. Now, during the existence of the National Policy, from 1879 to 1883, we imported 42 per cent of foreign goods to come in competition with Canadian manufactures. From 1883 to 1888 we imported 45 per cent; from 1888 to 1893, we imported 46½ per cent. So you see there were more foreign goods brought in to compete with Canadian manufactures under the National Policy than under the revenue tariff policy which existed under Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. These figures show that this argument is used for political purposes, to frighten the manufacturers and others into supporting the National Policy. I notice the hon. Minister of Railways is busily talking, but, as I wish to refer to something that he said, I hope that he will give me his attention, and that, if I am wrong, or if I misrepresent him, he will put me right. He made a statement during his tour westward with regard to the leader of the Opposition, to which I desire to draw the attention of the House. The report I intend to read was taken from the "Empire" newspaper, which sent a special reporter to report the speeches of these hon. gentlemen. The hon. gentleman made reference, a few days ago to the same question, but he did not then charge the hon. leader of the Opposition as he charged him in the country, behind his back, where there was no opportunity given the leader to answer him, nor was any other person given the opportunity. Speaking of the Interprovincial conference which proposed an increase in the subsidies of the provinces, the other day, he used these words:

We remember that there was an interprovincial conference at Quebec some time ago, and I will just analyse some of the demands of that conference. The leader of the Opposition is bound in a sense by that conference, because one of my hon. friends the other day read a letter from Mr. Mercier, then the leader of the Quebec Government, in which he stated, if I am not mistaken—at least the statement has never been denied in this House—that if the leader of the Opposition got into power, he would carry out the pledge made by Mr. Mercier during the election, and give increased subsidies to the provinces. The result of fulfilling that promise will be to increase the subsidies to the different provinces to the extent of $1,721,476.

Then he goes on :

Now, if this is the policy of the leader of the Opposition, or of the Liberal party, we want to know it, and this is the time for them to speak.

Now, when he was out west, speaking to the electorate of Canada, he was not doubtful as to what that policy was. He stated distinctly to the audience whom he was addressing, that Mr. Laurier, in this House, had stated that if he came into power he would agree to increase the subsidies to the provinces to the amount of two million dollars. Now, lest I misrepresent him, I will read the report of the "Empire" on the subject :

I asked Mr. Laurier about this in the House of Commons, and his answer to me, in the presence of Parliament, was that he would carry out those resolutions. Now, what would be the result? The result would be that the expenditure would be increased by two million dollars.

Of course, his friends cheered.

But none of Mr. Laurier's friends have been saying that this is not his policy. As I have shown you, undoubtedly it is his policy.

Why did not the hon. gentleman have sufficient moral courage to repeat the words that he used on a public platform in the west, before the hon. leader of the Opposition in this House, and give him an opportunity to contradict or acknowledge the statement?

Mr. HAGGART. Did the hon. gentleman hear me say that?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I did.

Mr. HAGGART. I never said it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Well, if you say that this report is not correct, of course, that is your affair. I have this advantage of you to-night, that this report was made in your own paper by one of your friends, and I heard you say it myself. So you see there are two against one.

Mr. HAGGART. Well, Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that I never asked Mr. Laurier the question, and he never answered it, and I never said so.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I knew he never asked Mr. Laurier at the time, but there was no opportunity, on my part, to answer it then. But he did make the statement, and I heard it, and this is the report in the "Empire" of the next day. But if he did say it—and he did so—he should have the manliness to repeat it here so that the leader of the Opposition could have an opportunity of contradicting those false statements made on public platforms before the electorate. There was another statement made at that meeting, and I want to give an opportunity to the parties making it to contradict or acknowledge it. There were two parties who made the statement to which I refer, one party made it upon a public platform that evening, another party made it in this House during the debate on the Address. I notice that the hon. gentleman who made it in this House is present to-night, and, as I understand he is to follow me, I wish him to give his authority for the statement which he has made in reference to a leading member of our party. It was stated by the present Secretary of State on that same evening that in 1887 the Hon. Edward Blake was in perfect unison with the protective system, that he sent a circular to the manufacturers of Canada telling them that if he was elected at the coming elections, he would not interfere with the protective system. Now, I think it is right and just, in the interests of the Hon. Edward Blake, and in the interest of the Liberal party, that some evidence should be given that such was the case. I have before me Mr. Blake's own words in reference to the National Policy, and the expression he made use of will go far to contradict anything of that kind, because he was not so inconsistent as to say to one party that he would support the National Policy, while he condemned it so vigorously before the other. The Hon. Edward Blake did say in 1887 that on account of the corruption and extraordinary extravagance of the present Government, there were liabilities lying upon the people of this country that demand a high tariff, and that it would be impossible for him or for the party coming into power, to cut that tariff down as low as he would like to see it, and, therefore, the incidental protection would be, of necessity, pretty high. But, to say that he was in favour of a protective policy is a slander upon him. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want you to hear what the Hon. Edward Blake's opinion of the National Policy was :

Its real tendency has been towards disintegration and annexation.

No matter how much you may disagree with the Hon. Edward Blake, you cannot charge him with being opposed to the interests of his own country, with a desire to break up confederation, a work in which he was himself engaged in bringing about, and to unite this country with the great republic to the south of us. But the Hon. Edward Blake said more about the National Policy :

It has left us with a small population, a scanty immigration and a North-west empty still.

That a man, speaking in this way with regard to the National Policy, would write to the manufacturers of this country and tell them that if his party came into power, he would be willing to support the very principles which he thus condemned, is utterly preposterous. But he goes on to give us his opinion of the National Policy :

It has left us with an enormous debt, an extravagant expenditure, an expensive tariff, with re stricted markets, with a trade diverted from its natural into less profitable channels.

And still further, he goes on to characterize this National Policy, which, it is said, he supported :

Worse, far worse ; it has left us with a lower standard of public virtue ; it has left us with our hands tied, our future compromised.

Sir, does that sound like a man who would support the National Policy, who would send a circular to the manufacturers of this country, telling them that they need not fear him, that if he came into power he would not interfere with the protective system. Now, I hope that the hon. gentleman who reiterated this charge will make it good, or have the manliness to withdraw it. Here is what the Secretary of State said upon that occasion :

The leader of the Liberal party at that time was the Hon. Edward Blake, and you will remember in the campaign of 1887 that Mr. Blake's public announcements were, that he would, if elected to power, not disturb the defensive fiscal policy which Canada adopted in 1878.

Then he says further on :

Well, Sir, not only was that the case, but Mr. Blake, as you remember, was sending a private circular—and I have no doubt there are some manufacturers here who will bear me out in this statement—to every manufacturer in Canada, advising him that he need not be afraid of the Liberal party, for they would not disturb his protection.

Now, Sir, that appeal was made to the manufacturers in that large audience that evening, most of them were Conservatives, but not one of them said he had got the circular ; and I have not yet found out a single manufacturer in the country who ever got that circular, and I do not believe it was ever issued. Now, I hope the hon. member for Ottawa will say that he was in error, and that the Secretary of State will withdraw his charges against Hon. Edward Blake.

Sir JAMES GRANT. As the hon. gentleman has mentioned my name in connection with this matter, suffice it to say that it was pretty well known and generally circulated throughout the Dominion, what the policy of the Hon. Edward Blake was on the subject of protection. It was well known that he had studied the question of the fiscal policy of this country, and he thoroughly understood that the only way for a political party in this country to hold power was by the exercise of the principle of moderate protection.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Sir JAMES GRANT. And in that way, Sir, he informed the manufacturers of this country—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Order. This is no explanation at all.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The Hon. Edward Blake was a man who always expressed the opinions he entertained. He travelled through the country in 1887 and delivered nearly 100 addresses, touching every phase of the political questions in Canada, and I have read all those speeches and I challenge any hon. member opposite to point to a line or a paragraph in the entire 100 speeches that will corroborate by a scintilla of evidence the statement made by the hon. member for Ottawa (Sir James Grant). The only way we can judge a public man is by his public utterances, and I have given the House Mr. Blake's opinion, contained in the celebrated public letter written by him, in which he characterized the National Policy as I have described. There is too much misrepresentation and jealousy exhibited on the public platform ; there is a want of conscience in public speakers which we must all deplore, and misrepresentations are given of the views held by public men and efforts are made to fasten on them the enunciation of policies which they never advocated. This is done by men in both political parties, while both sides should exercise care in representing the views of public men as expressed in their public utterances. I was about to fortify myself in regard to a position I took previous to six o'clock, with respect to the effect of the National Policy as increasing prices of farm products. The hon. member who addressed the House this afternoon said that the National Policy protected the farmers, and, therefore, if it protected the farmers, it must give increased prices to articles produced on the farm. Here is what one of the quartette, as I may properly call them, who went West last December in the Government car, said on the public platform. Senator Ferguson told the farmers :

I want to show you that no Government can keep your prices up. Under the law of supply and demand, the world is producing more wheat to-day than the people can consume, and, therefore, the prices must go down.

Now, that is Liberal doctrine ; that is what we contended in 1878 when the present Liberal-Conservative party wished to impose the National Policy on the people, and when the then Government declared that such a policy would keep up the prices. We were then told by the present Minister of Railways and Canals that the National Policy would increase the prices of their products to the farming community. Let me fortify myself with a greater authority even than the one I have quoted, and I think one that the hon. gentleman will not deny is a greater authority than himself. This authority said :

The price of an article at home must be determined by its price in foreign or unprotected markets, and therefore, even if protective duties are prescribed upon the Statute-book at home, their effect must remain absolutely null, so far as that particular article is concerned.

Again he said :

It is beyond human wit and power to give the grower of wheat or cotton in the United States the tenth part of a cent per bushel or bale beyond what the price in the market of export will allow him.

I said that this authority was even a greater one than Senator Ferguson ; this is the testimony of no less authority than the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, the greatest statesman living to-day. His view is that whether there is a protective duty placed on the Statute-book or not, such legislation cannot give increased prices in a foreign market. I desire to refer a little while longer to the speech of the Minister of Railways and Canals. The hon. gentleman endeavoured to bring into disrepute a statement made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) with regard to agricultural lands in this country. It appears that the hon. member for South Oxford stated that in his opinion the value of farm lands in Ontario had fallen by nearly $200,000,000, and the Minister of Railways and Canals sought to show that he was wholly wrong, and that instead of the value having diminished it had increased by $95,000,000. To enable him to make up the amount, he added the value of live stock and implements to the value of the land, so as to make up his total amount. Who ever heard of adding the value of live stock to the value of the land, and then call it all land value ? So important does this statement appear to be that nearly all the Conservative papers which I have had the opportunity of perusing have published this statement, to show that the hon. member for South Oxford was wrong in the statement and loose in the figures he used. I desire to show the House that the hon. member for South Oxford was nearly correct and that the Minister of Railways was wholly and entirely wrong. Speaking in regard to the hon. member for South Oxford, the Minister of Railways said :

Farming property in the province of Ontario had decreased in value to the extent of $200,000,000. But, Mr. Speaker, what do you say to a statement of that kind, when I tell you that there has been no decline whatever in that respect. On the contrary, Sir, there has been a gain of $95,000,000 in ten years.

So there is a difference of $295,000,000 between those hon. gentlemen. Let us examine this question carefully. I will give the House a detailed statement, and I challenge any hon. gentleman to show that it is incorrect. In 1882 the land in the province of Ontario was of the value of $632,343,000 ; there were at that time 202,000 farms, and each farm on the average was worth $3,130. In 1893 the farm lands of the province were worth $602,665,000, there were 243,000 farms, of an average value of $2,480, or a reduction of $650 on each farm. If you multiply 243,000 by $650 you will have a depreciation in the value of the land of $158,000,000. It must, however, be borne in mind that the hon. gentleman never took into consideration the increased number of farms between those years. We know that in Algoma and in the Rainy River district that a large portion of uncleared land has been brought under settlement, and no calculation whatever was made by the Minister for the increase, but he simply took the value (and to attain his object added the value of live stock to farm values of 1893) of farms in 1882 and 1893 and made the comparison. If you add to $158,000,000 the money expended for the clearing of waste lands, which is an unknown amount, that expended for drainage works established by the various municipalities for the improvement of the land, for under-draining, which in the west particularly has been carried out to a very large extent, all of which improvements cost an enormous sum of money, the depreciation in value will not prove very far short of $200,000,000, the sum mentioned by the hon. member for South Oxford. You see Sir, instead of being $95,000,000 better off to-day, they are nearly $200,000,000 worse off than they were in 1882. I ask the hon. gentleman who will reply to me to take these figures and go to the reports of the Bureau of Industry of 1882, and to the report of the Bureau of Industry of 1893, and he can convince himself that the figures that I present to the House and to the country are perfectly correct, and that the estimate made by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals is far away from the real facts. I want now, Mr. Speaker, to make a few remarks in regard to some comparisons instituted by the Minister of Finance, and I want his attention. He gives a table in his speech setting forth several comparisons. I must admit that it was a very ingenious speech, and I must admit, too, that if it went through the hands of parties who were not willing to examine all the figures, they would have a plausible effect, and I suppose, he being a plausible man, wished his speech to be plausible in the country ; but I want to point out to him that some of his comparisons were unfair and misleading. You may say that the figures were fairly correct ; but in the way he placed one statement against another, it would mislead many persons who would read the statement. He said that the customs tax during the Mackenzie Administration only fell $1,400,000, but he was $226,000 out in his figures, but that is not the point of attack, that discrepancy may have been a slip. Now, let me give you the figures. The customs tax in 1874 was $14,422,000, while the customs tax in 1878 was $12,796,000, or a reduction of $1,626,000, or 14 per cent decrease during the five years of Liberal Administration. Now, the Finance Minister compares that reduction to a reduction from a much larger income from customs taxes. You must know the sums from which the reductions are made in order to form a proper conception of the comparative degree of reduction. Now, the Conservative party commenced with a customs tax, as I said, of $12,796,000, and they ended in 1883 by a customs tax of $23,172,000, or an increase during these four years of $10,376,000, or 81 per cent. It is from this increased tax that the Minister of Finance made his comparison with the taxation of last year. From 1878 to 1894 there was a net increase of 51½ per cent; that is, from $12,796,000 of customs taxes to $19,380,000. So you see that the increase was so very great under the Conservative Government that the decrease was comparatively small in comparison with the decrease which took place under the Mackenzie Government. Therefore, when you look upon this table given by the Finance Minister and see taxes reduced $1,400,000 from 1874-79, and customs taxes reduced four and a half millions of dollars from 1889-94, the inference would naturally be that the Administration of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie was not so economical as the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite. Then again, the Finance Minister made another very unfair comparison. He says that from 1874 to 1879 the debt increased $40,000,000, and from 1889 to 1894, $8,500,000. Any person reading that without knowing the facts concerning the conditions of the both series of years, would come to the conclusion that the Finance Minister gloried in his economy and wished to reflect upon the Mackenzie Administration for spending so much money. It is well known to the Finance Minister and to other gentlemen on the other side of the House, that a large proportion of the money spent during the five years when Mr. Mackenzie was at the head of the Liberal party, was expended because of the responsibilities thrown upon him by the preceding Government. I want you to listen, Mr. Speaker, to a few words which I will quote from Sir Leonard Tilley's Budget speech of 1873, in which he says:

We are further entering upon new and increased engagements involving very large sums of money. We are entering upon works—we have already done so—which will require a large increase of our debt. We have $30,000,000 for the Canadian Pacific Railway, we have $10,000,000 to spend on the Intercolonial Railway, and the canal system that has been accepted by the Government, will involve an expenditure of at least $20,000,000. These are serious matters, inasmuch as they add $60,000,000 to our existing debt.

Now, these were the burdens left as a legacy to the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie when he came into power, and both parties were then agreed as to the necessity of spending money upon these great works. There was no difference of policy with regard to them, but the work had to be undertaken by the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, and the funds provided for the execution of these works by him. Now, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) says that Mr. Mackenzie increased the debt $40,000,000, but he did not tell the people of this country, as he should have, that there were $3,690,000 of the forty millions voted in 1872, previous to the advent to power of the Liberal Government. The Minister of Finance also forgot to tell the country, and to tell this Parliament, that $5,277,000 was voted in 1873, previous to the Liberal Government, and for which Hon. Alexander Mackenzie had to make provision when he came in. Now, on these very works which Sir Leonard Tilley had referred to, and which had been accepted by the Government and decided upon by both political parties from the 1st of July, 1874, to the 1st July, 1879, Mr. Mackenzie spent on the canals, $16,232,000; on the Canadian Pacific Railway, $11,362,000, and he spent on the Intercolonial $10,103,000, or making a total upon these three public works of $37,797,000, which was nearly the entire increase of debt which is attributed to him. Mr. Mackenzie did not undertake a single new work with the exception of the St. Peter's Canal, which cost him two or three hundred thousand dollars. He simply carried out the obligations and engagements that were entered into before the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie came into power. Our canals, on the whole, cost $62,500,000, and before confederation $20,500,000 were spent by the provinces and by the Imperial Government. Since confederation, $42,000,000 have been spent, and out of this sum $16,332,000 were spent by the Government of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie or considerably over one-third of the entire amount of money that has been expended on them during the last twenty-seven years. Yet, Sir, hon. gentlemen opposite would draw a contrast between five years in which there was very little expenditure of any magnitude whatever on public works, and the five years that these works were undertaken by the consent of the two parties in Parliament, and they would accuse the Mackenzie Government of the improvident expenditures of these moneys. Now, Sir, it is said that certain responsibilities were placed upon the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie. What did the Minister of Railways and Canals say in his speech a few days ago? He asked us: What did the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie do? And he told us that he cancelled every contract that was given him under Sir John Macdonald's regime, and then that he changed the policy and gave the contract to his own friends, and not to the lowest tenderers? Is that true?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Sir, that is not true. I have the testimony here which will settle that question, from a return which was brought down in answer to a requisition made by the Hon. Edward Blake a few years ago. Let me read what the hon. Minister said a few days ago that I may not misrepresent him:

The policy of the Government of Sir John Macdonald might have been reversed; but the hon. gentleman approved of that policy. It is true, contracts were let on some of the works, but the moment the hon. gentleman and his friends came into power, they cancelled every contract. Afterwards they changed their policy and re-let the contracts again, and I would like to have the pleasure of showing to the hon. gentleman in what manner they re-let them. Did they let them to the lowest tenderer? No; they picked out their particular friends, and to them they awarded the contracts.

That is the deliberate statement of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals. He is an old member; he was in the House at the time, and he should have known the facts. Now, I am going to show, by a reference to the actual facts, that the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie did not give the contracts to his friends, unless his friends were the lowest tenderers. Mr. Mackenzie did change the Government's policy, in this respect, that from the time he came into power, all tenderers had to deposit with the Government a certain sum of money in proportion to the amount of their tender, and if the contract was awarded to them, and they were not in a position to execute it, they forfeited the deposit. That system did not prevail in the time of Sir John Macdonald's Government previous to that of Mr. Mackenzie; and while I believe the law makes the same provision to-day, it is violated every year. Now, let me give a statement of the contracts let by both Governments for several years:

UNDER CONSERVATIVE GOVERNMENT.

Year.	No of Contracts let.	No. given to lowest Tenderers.	Total Value of Contracts.	Value given to lowest Tenderers.	Percentage to lowest Tenderers.

1874-76	193	164	19,435,663	16,381,862	84

Now, Sir, this is from an official document, and these facts and figures are in the hands of any body who takes the trouble to ascertain them; yet, in the face of this statement, the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals will say that the Hon. Alexander

Mackenzie gave contracts to his own friends, and not to the lowest tenderers, thus reflecting on a dead statesman, whose name, for integrity and political uprightness, stands above reproach in the esteem of the people of this country. This shows that the assertion of the hon. Minister was made for the purpose of misleading the public ear rather than to present the real facts of the case. Now, Sir, the hon. Minister of Railways appeared with the quartette in the west, and therefore his statements must be taken as official in their character; at any rate, they were taken by his friends to be well thought out and to present the actual facts of the case. Now, when we read what he said in the west, it is astonishing what "rot" is uttered on public platforms for the purpose of leading people astray. For fear that I may misrepresent what the hon. gentleman said, I will read an extract from his speech, in the "Empire":

Mr. Laurier has been stating that he will reduce the expenditure $2,500,000. How will he do it?

Then the Minister of Railways went on to say:

The uncontrollable expenditure of the Dominion is between $35,000,000 and $36,000,000.

Whoever heard such a statement as that from a responsible member of the Cabinet? Did he really suppose that we were all ignorant up there? Did he suppose that we did not know the uncontrollable expenditure was not equal to that or more than half of it? The Finance Minister has answered all this. He said the other day that the real controllable expenditure of the Government was $17,000,000. And yet we had another responsible member of the Government stating to a public audience that the uncontrollable expenditure was between $35,000,000 and $36,000,000. The Finance Minister said the other night that there was another item which you might largely call uncontrollable. That was the collection of revenue which amounted to $9,500,000. Add that to the $17,000,000, and the uncontrollable expenditure was about $27,000,000. But there are still $8,000,000 to $10,000,000 discrepancy between the two heads of departments, who are now in such close consultation opposite, trying, no doubt, to reconcile their contradictions. Then the Minister of Railways went on to give the items of uncontrollable expenditure, and those who understand the figures cannot help laughing when they hear the items he mentions. He first mentioned a few items that were uncontrollable. He said:

The uncontrollable expenditure of the Dominion is between $35,000,000 and $36,000,000. Now, what is that made up of? First of all, there is the interest on public debt, nearly $11,000,000. That no Government can decrease. Next, there is a sinking fund of over $2,000,000, which is not really an expenditure, but money set aside for the redemption of Dominion securities whenever they become due. Next, there is the subsidies for the provinces, amounting to $4,000,000. Will the hon. gentleman reduce this?

And then he goes on to say what I have already referred to with reference to Mr. Laurier. He then passes to consider some other articles. Among these, he mentioned the penitentiaries, the North-west Mounted Police, Immigration, Indians, and nearly all the expenditure in the Public Accounts, and then he concludes by calling them all uncontrollable. Now, the Finance Minister says they are not uncontrollable. The Minister of Railways said the collection of revenue is uncontrollable, but the Finance Minister replies: You are wrong, for I am going to control them to the extent of $50,000. The Minister of Railways says that civil government is uncontrollable, but the Minister of Finance answers: No, you know nothing about it, for I am going to control it to the extent of $30,000. Then the Minister of Railways and Canals says the expenses of Indians are uncontrollable, but the Finance Minister corrects him, for he says I am going to control it to the extent of $85,000. The Minister of Railways finds the item of penitentiaries uncontrollable, but the Minister of Finance is going to control it to the extent of $36,000. Again, the Minister of Railways finds legislation uncontrollable, but the Minister of Finance retorts: No, I will control it to the extent of $22,000.

Mr. HAGGART. I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. MACDONALD. I heard you say it, and it appears that the reporter you had travelling with you at all your meetings heard it.

Mr. HAGGART. I thought it was a speech in the House you were referring to, but I never said it either in the country or the House.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). That is a serious reflection upon the "Empire" and its reporter, and upon myself, because I was there and heard you.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman has repeated that before. Perhaps this time I may make a correction. He alleges that I stated that I had asked the leader of the Opposition with reference to the inter-provincial resolutions and that I had received an answer from him. On the contrary, I said that I never did. What I said in the country was this, that I had heard the question put in the House and had heard the leader of the Opposition make the statement that he was in favour of the inter-provincial resolutions. It amounts to the same thing, but I never said that it was I who asked the question, and I have heard the fact stated in his presence.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). When a criminal is on trial, all the suspicious circumstances tell against him. I cannot understand how an hon. gentleman will go to the country and speak in the presence of people who can hear every word he says and then go back on his own utterances. At Wingham, he made the statement which I have given, and which I heard him make, and which appeared in the "Empire" the following day. At Warton, the evening before, some forty or sixty miles distant, he made the statement, and it was so reported. It is too much for the hon. gentleman, after having repeated this statement publicly, and after I had heard him make the statement on the public platform, to come to this House, where he knows we can meet him, and ask us to accept his denial. I cannot accept it at his hands.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). If the reporter of the "Empire" had not also heard this statement and published it, I would be willing to accept the hon. gentleman's denial, but when the "Empire" published what I know the hon. gentleman said, I cannot withdraw my statement, without casting a reflection upon myself.

Mr. FOSTER. I call the hon. gentleman to order. He has attributed a certain statement to my hon. friend the Minister of Railways. My hon. colleague has denied, in his place, that he ever made such a statement, and the hon. gentleman refuses to take his denial.

Mr. SPEAKER. That question was raised last year, and my ruling then was that I was not called upon to require a member to withdraw a statement he may have made respecting something which occurred outside the House. I presume that the hon. the Minister of Railways knows what he said upon the occasion referred to, and I think, as I stated upon the former occasion, that he must know better than the hon. member does, and it would be well for the hon. gentleman to accept his statement. But I cannot require him to withdraw the allegation he made.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Mr. Speaker, how is it possible for me to accept the denial of a statement which I heard deliberately made, especially when that impression upon my mind is corroborated by the report in a newspaper friendly to the hon. gentleman. If I were to accept his denial, then I would be reflecting upon my own veracity. Therefore I cannot withdraw my statement. Now, the hon. Minister of Finance contends that he can reduce the uncontrollable expenditure mentioned by his colleague, to the extent of $2,387,648. I wonder if the hon. Minister thought that the following expenditures were uncontrollable :—Did he think for a moment that the expenditure of $230,000 squandered on the Montreal bridges was uncontrollable ? Did he suppose for a moment that the $476,000 spent on the Tay canal was uncontrollable ? The excuse that he gave for the expenditure on the Tay canal was that the Liberal members did not oppose it. So hon. gentlemen will see that if they do not oppose these extravagances, they are held accountable, notwithstanding that they are on this side of the House. Did the hon. gentleman really suppose that the amount, something less than a million dollars, spent in the Trent valley canal is uncontrollable ? That is a work which is not fairly to be called a work in the interests of the Dominion, but is wholly and entirely a local work and as such should have been relegated to the province or to the municipalities. It was to have been relegated to the province some years ago. But when Sir John Macdonald came in after the defeat of the Mackenzie Government, he agreed to make it a national work and to spend national money upon it. And from that time over $800,000 has been spent on this local work ; and, Mr. Speaker, there is not an hon. member here to-day who will say that it can ever become a truly national work. There can only be six feet of water in the canal, so that even if it were sought to be used by ships coming down from the northern lakes they would have to unload and reload. Mr. Shanly, one of the most eminent engineers in Canada stated in his place on the floor of this House that this could never be anything but a local work. Under these circumstances I think that such large amounts of money ought not to be spent in order to carry favour with the constituencies lying along the route of this canal. Does the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, think that the three-quarters of a million of dollars that Larkin, Connolly and Company were permitted to steal out of the treasury of this country was part of the uncontrollable expenditure of this country, considering that it was shown on sworn evidence that there must have been an arrangement between these rascals outside and—I will not say rascals—on the inside ? It is evident that there was incapacity and want of that supervision over the public departments that was necessary in the interest of the country. Did the hon. gentleman for one moment believe that the $350,000 spent in the Langevin block over and above the original contract was an uncontrollable expenditure ?

Mr. LISTER. And not settled yet.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). And not settled yet, as my hon. friend remarks. Does not the hon. Minister know that there was extravagance in connection with that building that cannot be attoned for ? Does he not know that the agreement entered into by Charlebois was of a nature different from any other ever made by the department ? Does he not know that there was a clause enabling Charlebois as the contractor to charge 25 per cent to every sub-contractor before allowing him to go on the work in order to carry out his contract ; that they refused to pay ; that they were sent back to remodel their tenders and that they simply added 25 per cent to every sub-contract, which money went into the pockets of Charlebois at the expense of the people of this country ? Does the hon. gentleman believe that the $1,200,000 spent under the Franchise Act in revising the voters' lists was uncontrollable ? For seventeen long years we had the local lists and not a single fault was found with the system. But in order to burden the people of the country and the candidates in the various counties with the necessity of expending large sums in the preparation of the voters' lists, they brought in this law which has caused an expenditure of $1,200,000, and only two elections held under it thus far. Is that uncontrollable expenditure ? Can a single hon. member on the treasury benches justify the position they have taken with regard to the expenditure of so large a sum ? Was the $270,000 wasted on the Sheik's Island dam uncontrollable ? If the Government had looked to these matters they might have controlled this expenditure. Was the $69,000 spent on the Royal Commission on the Liquor Traffic uncontrollable ? No higher object was aimed at in that, I venture to say than for that of shirking a direct vote upon the principle of prohibition. Sixty-nine thousand dollars of the good money of this country was spent to obtain the evidence of men who know no more about the question than do seven-eighths of the people here. We have presented to us five or six volumes that no person in this world—or in the world to come—will ever read. That evidence might have been in the heads of those who gave it and it would have been as accessible as it is now in these five or six blue-books that are handed to us. Now, Sir, I have dealt at some length with the financial condition of the country, and I want to say a little about the National Policy. In my opinion it has been a failure, it has been a fraud and an iniquity perpetrated upon the people of this country—that is upon a certain class of the people, upon nine-tenths of them. The National Policy was inaugurated for a purpose. The late Sir John Macdonald, speaking in 1878 in the amphitheatre on James Street, Toronto, made use of these words :

If you desire this country to prosper ; if you desire this country to rise out of the slough of despond into which it has sunk ; if you desire to see manufactures rise ; if you desire to see labour employed ; if you desire to see the emigration of your young men stopped ; if you desire to bring those who have emigrated back to this country ; if you desire to see the value of land rise—

—Note that gentlemen :

—if you desire prosperity—you will support the National Policy, and say we must have Canada for the Canadians.

The first object was to increase the immigration. It was stated by the Conservatives on public platforms from one end of this country to the other that if we had the National Policy large industries would be established which would give employment to hundreds and thousands of men and that people in foreign countries would come and settle amongst us and add to the prosperity of the country. Has this been the effect? We expended $3,000,000 from 1881 to 1891, and brought into this country 886,000 people who expressed their intention of remaining in Canada. If you take the natural increase in the population of this country as being the same as in the United States during the last decade—and that was not very high; only 14 per cent—you will find that there was an increase in that way of 605,000. Take the natural increase and the immigration together and we have a total of 1,491,000, who should have been in the country at the end of the decade. But only 504,000 of an increase was found; so that you have 987,000 who have not been accounted for. The census takers went up and down this country, and in many cases, no doubt, saw two faces where there was only one. Put all these together and we have only 504,000, or over 100,000 less than the natural increase during the ten years, without taking into consideration the 886,000 brought in by the expenditure of three millions of money. Is that a satisfactory condition in regard to population? Sir John A. Macdonald, and many others, stated on public platforms that the National Policy would secure a large increase of population. Now, we increased 638,000 from 1871 to 1881, or, in other words, we gave employment in this country to 638,000 more than we were employing in 1881. From 1881 to 1891 we gave employment to 504,000, that is, the labour market had 504,000 more population in Canada who were working among us than we had in 1881. It is evident that, under the regime of a revenue tariff our population increased to a greater extent than under the "benign influence," as the manufacturers call it, of the National Policy. But, Mr. Speaker, the National Policy discriminates against the poor man in favour of the rich man, a bad principle. Let me show you in what respects. As I said, the present tariff discriminates against the poor man, takes from one class and gives to another. That comes about by this iniquitous system of specific taxes, a system that cannot be justified under any circumstances. Now, here are a few examples showing the tariff upon the dearest and cheapest articles of the same class :

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

	Dearest.		Cheapest.
Collars	42 p.c.		58 p.c.
Cuffs	50 "		75 "
Blankets	33 "		37½ "
Tweeds	30 "		65 "
Overcoatings	28 "		55 "
Books	1 "		100 "
Ready-made cloth'g	33 "		42 "
Socks and stockings	36 "		51 "
Rice	12½ "		25 "
Raisins	8 "		20 "
Carpets	30 "		40 "
Window shades....	35 "		50 "
Baking powder....	10 "		20 "

This discrimination is caused by the pernicious system of specific duties. Now, Sir, we heard it stated the other day that if a 25 per cent protective duty was robbery, 15 per cent of incidental protection was also robbery. But that does not follow. Here is the distinction given by one of the ablest statesmen of the day :

To impose an extra price upon one class for the benefit of another class, without compensation, is robbery, and robbery not rendered more respectable because the state is the culprit.

Who is the author of that statement? The Hon. Mr. Gladstone, the ablest statesman now living. And it is in that light that we say protection is robbery, because it takes from one class more than it can return, and, therefore, it is robbery to the extent of the difference. But, Sir, the National Policy does more than that, it enables the manufacturer to make too much wealth—if the census report is to be taken as true—at the expense of other classes, especially of the farmers. Now, I want to show you the extraordinary profits made by the manufacturers of the province of Ontario—always providing that the census can be relied upon. The capital invested by manufacturers in Ontario is $176,604,000; the value of the products is $240,100,000; wages paid, $49,208,000; raw material used, $128,201,000. Now, we will put on 10 per cent for wear and tear, $17,660,400, making a total of $195,013,000. Deduct this from the value of the products, and we have a balance in favour of the manufacturers of $45,087,000, or 25 per cent of net profit, or $272.30 to the manufacturer on every hand employed. Is not that a large profit? Now, let me tell you that the manufacturers of this country are very thankful for the profits they are getting. Let me read a few extracts from a report of the secretary of the Manufacturers' Association, made a few months ago. I want to read to you the opinion this association entertains of the National Policy, and what fine, honeyed words they apply to it :

Under the benign auspices of the National Policy the entire manufacturing industries of Canada had virtually become possessed of the home market, and required outlets into other markets for their surplus products.

And how did they become possessed of the Canadian market? By barring out the competition that was threatened from the outside, and putting up their prices, reducing their output, thus controlling the Canadian market. Let me read you a little further their reasons for gratitude:

It is gratifying to know that under the newly organized Government the interests of Canadian manufacturers will receive the best consideration.

"The best consideration." Other interests are to receive a secondary consideration. The best consideration is to be given to the manufacturers of Canada, and whatever consideration is left is to be given to the farmers and the other industrial classes. They have reason to feel gratified. Let me read a little more:

It has always been the policy of the Conservative Government to encourage the manufacture of iron in Canada, and in addition to the inducements offered in previous legislation, the new tariff makes considerable and important extensions of such encouragement.

I notice that was not always the policy of the Conservative party, because I have understood from one of those foremost among their ranks a few years ago, that they were just about to take up free trade when the thought struck Sir John A. Macdonald that probably a protective policy would carry them to power faster than a free trade cry. So it has not always been their policy, but it is to-day. Now, look again at the influence the association wields:

The Association has just reason for congratulating itself upon the influence it possesses—

I suppose this means Red Parlour influence.

--in assisting to mould public opinion in the matter of affording tariff protection to our manufacturing industries, and in shaping the laws of the country in conformity thereto.

Sir, they have exercised their influence to such an extent that they formed a brief for the Minister of Finance, and he followed it out, not only in selecting the articles upon which to put a duty, and from which to take off a duty, but he adopted the exact words proposed by the association to the Government of this country, showing what an influence they have. Now, what do they call for?:

United and harmonious as they have always been, it is of the utmost importance that as members of this Association our manufacturers should continue together and work together for the perpetuation of the great cause they have in view, that of protection.

I was almost going to read as the end of this sentence, "the great cause they had in view, the general interests of the country." That is not what they said, it was the interest of protection. This afternoon, we heard an hon. gentleman state that protection reduced the price of articles made in this country, but these manufacturers, meeting together and preparing a brief for the Minister of Finance, do so, not for the purpose of reducing the price of articles manufactured in this country, but to increase the price. Now, I desire hon. gentlemen opposite to listen to the conditions of their support, for it is an important matter. Here are the conditions on which the manufacturers will support the Government. They said:

In Sir Mackenzie Bowell we have a man at the head of our national affairs who is a sturdy and devoted adherent to our existing system, and who, having the courage of his convictions, will hold his way steadily in the course he long since helped to mark out, and as an association, and as individuals, no doubt your best and most earnest support will be given to the Government as long as the Government adhere to the principle of tariff protection to Canadian manufacturing industries.

And no longer. That is all the association thinks of the Government; they will give the Government support so long as they will give them protection and no longer; so long as the Government are putting money in their pockets and will protect them in their investments, they will continue to support the Government, and give them contributions on the eve of elections, as they have done before. But what about the farmers? I have been presenting one side of the shield, and I desire now to present the side of the farmers. Do the farmers pass resolutions on the line of protection? What is the meaning of the petitions presented every day to this House? What is the meaning of the petition of the Grange Organization that is now before the House? These petitions ask not that there should be more protection, but that there should be less protection, showing clearly that the farmers are not convinced that protection benefits them. I have promised to give the farmer's side of the question, and I will proceed to discuss it on the same basis as I have discussed it from the manufacturer's standpoint. The farmers' capital is $861,500,000. That includes their land, houses and machinery. What is their income, what is the value of their output, their crops of every description? In 1892, it was $110,000,000. The total value of live stock disposed of, sold or used at home was $32,500,000. The value of live stock in 1892 over the value of 1891, the increase during the year, was $8,718,000; of cheese, butter, eggs, wool and fruits of all kinds, $30,000,000, making a total of $181,443,000 as the total income of the farmers during that year. What was the cost of production? The cost of all seeds was $12,000,000; feed for stock, $16,000,000; wages at $253 per year for 486,000 farmers and labourers employed in agriculture, $123,000,000; and now instead of allowing 10 per cent on capital, as I did for manufacturers, I will only allow 5 per cent, giving $43,000,000, making a total of $194,000,000 as the cost of production.

Allowing current prices and wages, the year resulted in a loss to the farmers of $12,157,000. Instead of having 25 per cent net gain, as the manufacturers had, the farmers had a loss—that is, taking the same wages as are paid to labouring men—of no less than $12,157,000 on the transactions of that year. I challenge any hon. gentleman opposite to deny these figures. They are taken from the official documents. And these men who have lost over $12,000,000 on the year's transactions are asked to contribute in the form of duties to pay the manufacturers who have received 25 per cent not on their capital. Is that not actual robbery, is that not taking money from one class and giving it to another, and in this way is not the National Policy a fraud discriminating against one class and in favour of another class of the people of this country? I will bring another charge against the National Policy. It wastes capital that might be invested in various industries which might give employment to a large number of people. Let me illustrate. Supposing a capitalist was sufficiently rich to distribute all the imported steel and iron manufactures imported, a certain amount of capital would be required for the purpose. The iron and steel manufactures imported amounted to about $10,000,000. If there was no duty on it, the entire product would be purchased for $10,000,000, and its distribution through the different sections of the country would require about $2,000,000 working capital, or a total of $12,000,000 would accomplish the distribution of all the iron and steel manufactures required in the country. How is it now? It takes $10,000,000 to purchase the goods in the first place, $3,000,000 are required to pay the duty, and $2,000,000 working capital as before, for distribution, or $15,000,000 to accomplish the same result. The distribution of the article is the same, the number of hands employed is exactly the same, the number of stores required is the same under the one system as under the other; and although we cannot arrive at free trade, the proportion of duties we knock off will give us that proportion of free capital to invest in other industries. There could be hundreds and thousands of men employed profitably in other industries. Hon. members may multiply that single instance by every department of trade, and they will find that the saving of capital would be enormous, sufficient to give employment to tens of thousands of men and not minimize or in the least interfere in the distribution of these articles or hands employed. Here is what Mr. Gladstone said in regard to the waste of capital:

In my view, I may say for my country that protection, however dignified by the source from which it proceeds, is essentially an invitation to waste, promulgated by the authority of law.

The National Policy increases the price of

home made articles, and thus large sums are taken from the consumers and passed into the hands of manufacturers and middle men. I will give the House an illustration. I will take a few articles, commencing with cotton. We manufactured last year cotton to the value of $9,000,000, as was estimated by hon. gentlemen opposite, although hon. members on this side of the House give a somewhat higher estimate. That cotton is increased in price by reason of the duty to the extent of say, 25 per cent, or $2,250,000, which amount the consumers have to pay on the home manufactured article by reason of the duty. In 1894, we imported cotton to the value of $4,007,000, on which a duty was paid of $1,140,000. Now, we take the profit of the importer and retailer, say 40 per cent, divided between the two, which amounts to $446,000. Add these together, the increase of price on the home made article, the duty paid on the imports and the wholesale and retail profit on the duty, and the result will be $3,836,000, of which only $1,140,000 goes into the revenue of the country. The balance of $2,696,000 comes out of the consumers and goes into the pockets of the middle-men and the manufacturers. Take coal oil. There were imported in 1894, 3,543,000 gallons valued at $420,575, duty paid, $466,164, importers profits, at say, 20 per cent, $93,233, retailers profits at say, 30 per cent—and I am putting these percentages smaller than the persons dealing on coal make—$167,819, making a total of duty and profits paid by the consumer of $727,216; and of that only $466,164 is revenue and goes into the treasury of the country. Now, let us take the home manufactured coal oil. In 1894 it amounted to 11,000,000 gallons. The increase of price by reason of the duty was say, 4 cents a gallon. You see I have come down 2 cents below the actual duty, for it is admitted by the producers that they use 4 cents of the duty as protection to the Canadian manufactured article. The 4 cents increase of price by reason of duty on the 11,000,000 gallons would amount to $440,000, and the retailers' profits—the importer is not in it this time—would amount to $132,000, so that the grand total of extra costs by reason of the duty amounts to $1,299,216, or in round numbers $1,300,000 per annum. Let us take the industry of boot and shoes. There were imported in 1894, $247,500 worth, on which a duty was paid of $61,876, and the retailers and importers profits say, 35 per cent, amounted to $21,657, leaving a total on imports caused by duty of $83,533. The boots and shoes manufactured in Canada in 1894 amount in round numbers to $18,000,000. The increase of price by reason of the duty was say, 20 per cent, amounting to $3,600,000. The duty on boots and shoes is 25 per cent, but I only put 20 per cent as the increased price on these articles manufactured at home, and that would amount to $3,600,000. The retailers profits was say, 25 per cent, which would be on boots and shoes $900,000, or a grand total on boots and shoes of $4,583,533, or in ten years, $45,800,000, which is taken out of the consumers of boots and shoes in this country in order to sustain the protective policy of the Government. That would pay the entire cost of Government for one year and leave a surplus of nearly $10,000,000. Take pig iron. There was imported of pig iron in 1894, 46,106 tons, and the duty paid on that was $179,000. The importers' and retailers' profits at 40 per cent amounted to $71,600. The cost of imported pig iron was $11.54 a ton. There was manufactured pig iron in Canada in 1894, to the extent of 56,000 tons, and the bounty paid on it amounted to $112,000. The increase of cost of the home manufactured pig iron by reason of the duty was at least $3 a ton, and it therefore amounted to $178,000. The retailers' profit on this increase was say 25 per cent and amounted to $44,500. So the total increase to the consumers by duty, bounty and profit, amounted to $585,100, and for every ton of pig iron produced it cost the consumer $10.44 protection. It was stated by the Controller of Customs this afternoon that the average price of imported pig iron was $10 and some cents per ton, and here we pay in order to protect the iron that we do not own when it is protected $10.44 per ton. That is over 100 per cent. Now, let us take the iron and steel goods imported into Canada in 1894. They amounted in value to $8,844,000, and the duty paid was $2,457,000. The importers' and retailers' profits, at, say, 40 per cent, amounted to $982,800, so that the total on imports of these articles was $3,439,800. I can safely say, Mr. Speaker, that we pay at least two and a half million dollars of increased price on Canadian manufactures of iron and steel at the lowest calculation, which when put with the other sum makes a grand total of $5,939,800 that comes out of the pockets of the consumers of protected iron and steel goods in Canada, or in round numbers, $6,000,000 a year, which in ten years would amount to $60,000,000, a sum which would build the Canadian Pacific Railway. It would build our canal system, and would leave $20,000,000 to spare. It would pay the interest on our public debt for over six years. Let me sum up and give you the amount on those few articles taken from the people of Canada in ten years by reason of bounties, duties, and profits on duties by importers and retailers to protect the following industries:—

1. Cotton	$ 38,360,000
2. Pig iron	5,851,000
3. Manf. iron and steel.....	59,398,000
4. Boots and shoes.....	45,800,000
5. Coal oil	12,992,000

Grand total..... $162,401,000

Mr. Speaker, how much of that immense sum of $162,401,000 goes into the revenue ?

Just $43,000,000, and the other $119,401,000 comes out of the pockets of the Canadian people without adding one single dollar to the revenue, but goes into the pockets of manufacturers, middle-men, importers and retailers in the form of profits and increased prices. This enormous sum is taken under the plea of protection. I tell hon. gentlemen opposite that this is the result of protection and by whatever percentage we can reduce it, it will by so much lessen the burdens of the people, burdens under which they have suffered for fifteen years of this iniquitous policy, inaugurated, continued and proposed to be continued by the Government now in power. I have a few other things to say, but I will now draw my remarks to a close. I think, Mr. Speaker, I have given facts enough to the Conservative party to think over for a while. I think I have convinced them, at least in their hearts, that the policy they are wishing to impose upon the country for another five years should be abandoned. I am of the same opinion as regards the National Policy that a socialist in Russia was with regard to the late Czar. An interviewer called upon one of the leading socialists in Russia shortly after the late Czar was dead ; and the interviewer said to the socialist : " Well, the late Emperor has done many good things for the country ? " " Yes," replied the socialist ; " I think he has done some good things for the country, and some bad things for the country, but the best thing the late Czar ever did for this Empire was when he died." So it is with the National Policy. The best thing the National Policy could ever do for this country is to die, and let me tell hon. gentlemen on the other side : it is now in a moribund condition, it is in the last stages and throes of death, and if you only went to the country a few months ago the National Policy would be dead now.

Sir JAMES GRANT. Mr. Speaker, at this advanced hour of the evening, and particularly after the extended discussion that has taken place on the fiscal policy of this country, I feel that it would be almost an injustice to the House if I were to detain hon. gentlemen too long at this late hour. I approach this subject with a considerable degree of diffidence. It has been so ably discussed in every detail that I think it is quite unnecessary for me to dwell at any great length on the fiscal policy of the Government.— We have had in this Chamber expressions of opinion from two intellectual financial athletes—the one the leader of the Government on this side, who, I must say, delivered one of the ablest financial expositions that it has been my pleasure to listen to during the last quarter of a century that I have been connected with the political life of Canada ; and the other, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), a gentleman who for a number of years was connected with the Department of Finance. In order to become somewhat posted in the details of the observations of the hon. gentleman, I have taken occasion to look over the various financial statements made by him to this country, extending over a period of a quarter of a century; and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that after reading those various speeches, while recognizing that the hon. gentleman possessed more than ordinary literary ability and acuteness of observation, and high-toned ability in many directions, still, in all, I failed to find out it was possible for him to put before the country those remarkable statements that he has done, on almost every occasion when he has undertaken the serious responsibility of responding to the financial statement made on this side of the Chamber. The depression in trade that hon. gentleman attributed to the National Policy. The National Policy, with the opposite party, seems to be a 'bête noire.' Is it not, however, a well recognized fact in this country that from the very inauguration of that policy we have had, on the whole, not deficits, but something to the credit of the country, except during the last twelve months, when, owing to the extraordinary depression which has prevailed, not only in Canada, but in every other portion of the world, there has been some little falling off in revenue. This is attributable, not to the Conservative party, but to the fact that there has been a general fall in prices. However, our revenue has been almost sufficient to meet the requirements of the country, with a little addition. The tariff which was presented to this country at the inauguration of the National Policy was such as was destined to meet the needs of the country, as it has done; but within the last year or two there has been a great discussion upon this whole question of the tariff—so much so that our public men on both sides of the House set themselves to work to see what could be done. The Opposition alleged that the Government were not doing what was necessary for the wants and requirements of our people. However, last year our two Controllers went over the country and consulted with leading farmers and manufacturers, and brought down to this Chamber such a tariff as was destined to meet the requirements of the country; and were it not for the remarkable depression that came upon us suddenly and unexpectedly, that tariff would have given us, not a deficit, but something to the credit of the country. To-day, when I picked up the "Shareholder and Insurance Gazette," what did I find? That according to the "Chronicle," the Bank of England hold £37,429,282 in gold, against £31,838,207 last year; the Bank of France, £82,640,665 gold and £49,305,578 silver, against £69,734,000 and £50,900,000; the Bank of Germany, £38,138,253 gold and £15,577,597 silver, against £31,362,120 and £12,809,880; and the Bank of Austro-Hungary, £18,606,000 gold and

Sir JAMES GRANT.

£13,612,000 silver, against £10,348,000 and £16,360,000. Now, what do these figures point to? They point to the fact that the remarkable depression of the past year has not been confined to Canada, but is found in England, France, Germany, and, in fact, in all monetary centres in the world. There seems to be a general want of confidence in trade and commerce—and why? Because this stagnation is general in its character. Otherwise, you would have that money, which is now housed up in these banking institutions, going into circulation; but the reason it has not been put into circulation is that they were afraid to invest it. But to-day we find a great change taking place. During the last few weeks, as the hon. Finance Minister pointed out in his Budget speech, a rise has taken place in the price of wheat, timber, iron and those other products, the prices of which are a perfect index to the trade and commerce of the country; and I am sure that we are now just at the commencement of an improvement in trade, and that before another year passes over, we shall find a great advance in every portion of this country. The hon. member for South Oxford in his address stated that for the first time in sixteen years the hon. Minister of Finance had said nothing about the National Policy. Why should it be necessary for us to say anything about the National Policy? Is it not an acknowledged fact what this National Policy has done for Canada? We are not the class of individuals who are always praising ourselves or boasting of what we have accomplished. We know that in this country the National Policy has done more for Canada than any other policy. Why? Because it met the requirements of our people, because it built up our industries, because it brought people into the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that our people are going out of Canada. Before I get through I hope to prove the contrary. The hon. member for South Oxford said that the National Policy was a blight and a curse upon this country. Such, Mr. Speaker, is not the case. From 1878 to 1895 it has the most remarkable record that has ever been inaugurated. When the late Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald spoke in this House, the sound of his voice reverberated, not only through this Chamber, but broadcast through this country, and the people were satisfied that his policy was of such a character that it would lift our country out of its despondency, foster its institutions, and encourage our labourers, manufacturers and artisans, as experience has proved it has done. The hon. member for South Oxford had something to say concerning our trade with Australia. The Government were proposing more favourable terms with that country, and the hon. gentleman is prepared to find fault with those terms. Why? Because he imagines that the products of Australia sent into this country will interfere with the trade of Canada. And yet the hon. gentleman preaches free trade. But the very moment that the Canadian Government is desirous of extending our trade and commerce with our sister colonies, the very moment that the representatives of these colonies are here, we are found fault with because we are taking hold of enlarged ideas, and desire to extend those opportunities of trade and commerce which are likely to advance the best interests of the whole Dominion. Again, what do we find? As was pointed out by the Minister of Railways in his able address the other evening, the hon. member for South Oxford found fault with the Finance Minister for going into the English market to borrow money. He charged the Finance Minister with always borrowing and spending more than is absolutely necessary. And in the same breath, the hon. gentleman criticises the Finance Minister for not having borrowed more when he had the opportunity of doing so, and for not having taken more than was absolutely necessary for our requirements. He blows hot and cold in the one breath, but that is a characteristic of the hon. gentleman, and I am not at all surprised. The fact of the matter is, after listening to the observations made by the Opposition in the last few days on matters of trade and commerce, I am impressed very strongly with the sentiment which flowed from no less a person than the national poet of Scotland as being applicable to our friends in the Opposition:

O, wad some pow'r the giftie gie us
To see oursel's as others see us.
It wad frae monie a blunder free us

There is another thing the hon. gentleman charged to the Government. He almost said that the National Policy was the cause of the fall in wheat. Do not we know perfectly well that there has been a remarkably heavy drop in the price of this article throughout the world. And why? Because it is now being produced in great quantity in the Argentine Republic, India, and Russia, and, owing to the climatic conditions of these warm countries, and the low price of labour, it is very easily produced, and consequently there is actually more wheat grown than is absolutely necessary for the requirements of the country, but, forsooth, because it happens to be low in price, that is entirely due to the National Policy, and the Liberal-Conservative party.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman repudiate the proposition that the National Policy has the power to raise the price of cereals?

Sir JAMES GRANT. I think that the National Policy, by exercising a fertilizing and progressive influence on every industry in the country, cannot fail to beneficially affect the price of wheat, though not sufficiently to counterbalance the other influences of which I have spoken. There are two subjects which are somewhat of a novel character that I desire to bring before this House and the country, inasmuch as they are intimately connected with the status of the provinces and the financial condition of this country. We have two great sources of revenue, our great forests and our mineral resources. We know that at present those forests are partly under the Dominion, and partly under the control of the Provincial Government, and our mineral resources occupy the same position. But we know perfectly well that to-day the large revenue from both of these lines is more under the control of the local than of the Dominion Government. and yet, notwithstanding this, we find the uttermost farthing extracted in the way of provincial demands on the central purse. That is a very important point, and one that really should not be lost sight of. The forest primeval is the most valuable inheritance that this generation possesses. In fact, it is the ready cash of the soil. It is that cash which always turns up wherever it is touched. To-day, our forests are more valuable and extensive than even those of the great neighbouring republic. Professor Macoun, in a very able paper presented to the Royal Society of Canada, last year, said, after a careful consideration of this whole subject, that our forests extended to the Pacific towards the unknown regions to the north and southwards until they came to Lake Superior and joined the deciduous forests of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, having a breadth about two hundred miles and width of about three thousand miles. These forests are extremely valuable and extremely important. We know that portions of these forests are under the control of the Dominion Government, particularly the Indian reserves and the central poplar regions of the North-west Territories. Now forests have become so important in the opinion of the people of the various European countries that the governments of those countries have appointed agents who are called chiefs of the forestry departments to take entire control and superintendence of these areas. And, as a result, millions of dollars have been saved in various portions of Europe which would have been entirely lost, were it not for the care and supervision exercised over these immense sources of revenue. In Canada we know perfectly well that more forests have been destroyed within the last 25 years than would have built the Canadian Pacific Railway from ocean to ocean. And let me say that even since that Pacific road was constructed, having made three trips myself to the Pacific Ocean. I have been amazed beyond measure to find the enormous destruction of forest and forest wealth along the line of the railway, owing to the want of careful supervision of the forests on either side of the road by the company or by those who are employed as its servants. Prof. Macoun says that the forests of the North have an area of 600,000 square miles. In fact, he goes beyond that and estimates them at a million square miles. He estimates the poplar region which extends from Edmonton to Vancouver, a distance of about 900 miles at an average width of 50 miles, which gives a total area of 45,000 square miles of forest for use of the settler. Now, it is well known that these poplar lands are extremely valuable. Wherever those trees grow there is invariably good soil. I trust that the same supervision that is being exercised over the forest lands of European countries will be exercised over the forest lands of this country. In this connection I wish to quote briefly from an address delivered before the Natural History Society at Montreal, no later than a few days ago by Hon. J. K. Ward, a member of the Legislature of Quebec :

In my thirty years of experience I have come to the conclusion that most of the bush fires has been the work of fishermen and hunters, who not only destroyed valuable timber, the property of the public, but also the shanty and material of the lumbermen. In view of this being the case, I would suggest that the Government, which is most interested in the preservation of forests, employ as many men as are thought necessary in each agency, to look after and trace the origin of fires on the public domain, giving them the power to take evidence, so as to bring to punishment who either wantonly or carelessly set fire to or cause the destruction of such valuable property. I would also suggest that no lands unfit for settlement should be offered for sale ; from what I have seen in my travels on the rivers running into the St. Lawrence and Ottawa from the north, a very large proportion of such territory is of this character.

I mention these facts in the hope that they may lead to greater care in the supervision of these valuable forests. And not only that but I would suggest that, as they do in Europe through their various governments, the farmers of the North-west Territories should be encouraged to devote a certain time each year towards the planting of trees, so that in the future they may have something of value in itself and exercise a beneficial effect upon the climate of the country. There is another point to which I wish to draw attention—the mineral resources of this country. I believe there is no subject which may better engage our attention to-day than that of the mineral development of Canada. When I heard the observations of gentlemen on the other side of this House the other evening, I was amazed beyond measure at the doleful view they took of Canada, its prospects and its future ; and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that in bringing these statements before the House to-night I have done it mainly with the object of letting the country know how enormous our resources are, what great wealth we have in store. I wish to show what a future the Finance Minister has to con over in preparing his addresses, as I have no doubt he will for years to come ; for the Liberal-Conservative party of Canada, who have taken such an energetic part in developing these resources have held the confidence of our people and by their indefatigable perseverance have prompted the development of the powers and resources of this country and will continue to do so and, entrusted with the people's confidence will continue to win for Canada a name and reputation even greater than that she already enjoys. From 1886, when the Geological Survey first began a systematic collection and analysis of mineral returns, the value has grown almost steadily from $12,000,000 to $20,900,000 for the year 1894. All this represents real wealth, produced from our natural resources, not made by gains in trade by selling and buying. It is wealth, too, of a kind not easily exhausted, for in very few cases is any sign of exhaustion found. We find that the Geological Survey, whose men are of scientific merit not to be surpassed in the known world, who, in the investigations east and west have achieved a name and reputation which is a credit to Canada, have by their energy and ability, guided by the head of the department and under the influence and prestige of the Liberal-Conservative party, led to this return of no less than $20,900,000. We find that this outcrop of minerals is a merely surface indication, and that further investigation by the opening up and developing of these tracts brings to light even greater resources. All these may be counted as assets of this country. Running over the statistics of mineral production for 1894, and comparing these with the figures of the three foregoing years, the following particularly hopeful and striking facts may be noted :—In 1894 chromic iron first produced in any quantity value $36,946. Lead, a great increase in the past four years, owing to the working of the rich silver-lead ores of British Columbia. They never turned out so much of this material as they did in 1894. Of nickel, now nearly 5,000,000 pounds are produced annually, valued at $2,000,000. Will any man tell me what was the cause of this production ? How did it come about ? Was it by accident ? Was it the work of some bush ranger, or of some of the aborigines of that country striking a pick into the ground ? No, far from it ; it was the result of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which opened up this tract and discovered this mineral, which scientists at once knew was the basis of an extraordinary metal that is now attracting the attention, not only of Canada, but of the civilized world, and bringing hundreds of people in here to occupy those mines and develop them. Still we are told that the people are flocking away to other countries, although these other countries are nothing like as attractive as is our own. Then again we find that silver, notwithstanding the fact that it has fallen so much in price within the last two years, that many silver mines cannot be worked owing to the low grade, I observe that mines are being worked in British Columbia of so high a grade, and the silver contained in them is in such quantity, that it pays remarkably well to the hundreds of people going in there to develop those mines. I would strongly recommend any young men who want to make homes for themselves and to carve out a name and reputation, to go out to British Columbia, and there they will find something worth working for, and in a country and in a climate inferior to no other in the world. Then again as regards asbestos, we know this material has been found in large quantities in Quebec. Last year the product amounted in value to nearly half a million dollars. Of coal, the outputs are steadily increasing. In 1894 there were 3,853,235 tons, valued at $8,447,329. Of gypsum, about $200,000 was taken out, principally in the province of New Brunswick. In mineral waters, from $95,000 to $100,000 worth were consumed last year. Now, this is a very important point, and I wish to say a word about it. The idea is prevalent that the mineral waters of the Humber and the Spas of Germany are far superior to anything we have on this portion of the North American continent. Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that there is no country in the world that possesses more valuable mineral springs than the Dominion of Canada. Hundreds of people are coming in from Great Britain, from Europe, from the United States, to enjoy the benefits of our mineral springs. These call for increased railway facilities, increased housing accommodation. The mineral springs of Canada, those of Caledonia, those of Banff, those of the Pacific, and those of the Lower Provinces, are attracting such attention to-day that shortly they will become the source of a larger revenue for the Dominion than they are at the present time. Then in natural gas, the borings in Canada not only supply our wants but they also supply the city of Detroit, and many thousands of dollars accrued to the revenue of our Dominion from this source, in consequence of those scientific investigations that are being carried on through our geological survey. Last year no less than $300,000 worth of natural gas was sold. Petroleum we find is slowly increasing in the quantity produced. In 1894 there were 829,104 barrels taken out of the earth in the Dominion of Canada. Of salt, 45,000 to 60,000 tons were produced last year, salt of the very best quality. Almost every where throughout the Dominion the most gratifying progress is being made in the further development of its mineral wealth. Beginning with British Columbia what do we find? Mr. Speaker, there is no province in the Dominion to-day that has a greater future before it, that has greater prosperity in store for it, than British Columbia. I have visited it and gone through a great portion of it, and I am thoroughly convinced that it is now only in the initial state of development. We know that it sends first-class men to this Parliament, and it likewise produces first-class minerals. The minerals developed on the Pacific slope have been chiefly coal. Recently, explorations of the Geological Survey have pointed out that in one part, particularly in the vicinity of the Crow's Nest Pass, a very large deposit of coal exists, and when the Canadian Pacific Railway is continued from Macleod by Crow's Nest to the Pacific, there will be opened up a very large country, and by the combination of iron and coal, both of which are known to exist there, I have no doubt that we will have shortly on the Pacific slope, a great black country developed, such as has made the name and reputation of old England in respect to her manufacturing industries. In metalliferous mining, the Kootanie district is at present taking the lead, wonderful discoveries of ores yielding silver and gold have occurred there during the past few years, and thousands of miners, building towns and calling for banks and post offices have entered this region of country, which till lately was a wilderness. In West Kootanie, the vicinity of Kootanie Lake is ribbed with veins holding argentiferous lead ores, and Toad Mountain includes the celebrated Silver King lode, with silver and copper. Kaslo and Slocan with ores chiefly of silver and lead, and Trail Creek, with pyrrhotites rich in gold, are names already well-known in the mining world, but destined to become better known, for the actual output of ore has so far been small as compared to the deposits from which these first gleanings are derived. Then let me mention East Kootanie, the McMurdo district and many others. In Okanagan, Fairview, Boundary Creek, &c., there are gold mines. The Cariboo district, famous in past years for its placer mines, is now entering into a new era of development with abundant capital and the introduction of hydraulic mining on a large scale. In the north-west country, the chief mineral wealth, examined and mapped out in large part by the Geological Survey is coal of various kinds, varying in character from anthracite to lignite. The investigations of the Geological Survey likewise give reason to believe that a great petroleum region may soon be developed in this region. Boring operations under the auspices of the survey are now in progress at Athabasca. In Ontario we find veins of gold-bearing quartz in process of discovery and development at the Lake of the Woods, Rainy Lake and Seine River, Sault Ste.

Marie, Sudbury and in Madoc and Marmor—all in rocks of the Huronian formation. Silver has long been mined in the vicinity of Port Arthur, and Sudbury is the site of a great and growing industry of nickel and copper mining. Iron ores are plentiful throughout the province and petroleum, salt, natural gas, gypsum and other minerals have already settled down to a satisfactory yearly output. It has, besides gold, large deposits of asbestos, iron ore and minerals of various kinds. New Brunswick is not destitute of minerals, with its gypsum, granite and grind-stones. Nova Scotia, the last province to which I shall refer, is now attracting a very great degree of attention. And why? Because a great change has come over the spirit of their dreams within a short space of time. By the investigation of scientists, it is found that it is not only valuable to dig those mines which show ore in large quantities, but through the introduction of different processes of mining, that is, crushing rock of low quality, the same as is done in Alaska, where this process is carried out on rock that contains ore worth only a few dollars to the ton, there never was a brighter future for Nova Scotia than there is to-day with respect to its mineral resources owing to the improved appliances and machinery and advanced investigation with respect to the extent of gold ore in the province. The province also possesses deposits of iron and coal which contribute very materially towards its prosperity. If I have gone to-night over these matters somewhat in detail, I trust I will be excused doing so because I have been stirred up to adopting this course by the ideas thrown out with respect to the future and the prosperity of our country. I trust that no man will live in Canada and think we are in a state of decay and ruin. Such is far from being the case. We find that in 1886 the output of the mineral products of Canada was only of the value of $12,000,000, whereas in 1893 its value was $19,250,000, and in 1894, the grand aggregate of $20,900,000. Nothing affords me greater pleasure than to have had this opportunity of placing before the House and the country the importance of our resources with respect to forests and minerals; and when I speak of our forests, before concluding my remarks, I must say that I feel thoroughly satisfied that the forests of Canada to-day are more valuable than those of the United States. What do we find in a report made by Prof. B. E. Fernow, Chief of the Division of Forestry of the United States. In his report to the American Government, he said:

The total annual product of wood material of all sorts consumed in the United States may be valued in round numbers at $1,000,000,000, representing, roughly speaking, 25,000,000,000 cubic feet of wood, or the annual increase of the wood growth of 500,000,000 acres of forest in fair condition. This value exceeds ten times the value of our gold and silver output, and three times the annual product of all our mineral and coal mines put together. It is three times the value of our wheat crop; and with all the toil and risk which our agricultural crops involve they can barely quadruple the value of this product yielded by nature for the mere harvesting.

If to the value of our total mining product be added the value of stone quarries and petroleum, and this sum be increased by the estimated value of all the steamboats, sailing vessels, canal boats, flatboats and barges plying in American waters and belonging to citizens of the United States, it will still be less than the value of the forest product by a sum sufficient to purchase at cost of construction all the canals, buy up at par all the stock of the telegraph companies, pay their bonded debts, and construct and equip all the telephone lines. The value of the annual forest product exceeds the gross income of all the railroad and transportation companies. It would suffice to pay the indebtedness of all the states, if we leave out New York and Pennsylvania, including that of all counties, townships, school districts, and cities within those states (in 1880); and it would more than wipe out the remaining public debt of the United States. In fact, ranking manufactures of all kinds and agriculture as respectively first and second in importance, as far as production of values goes, the forest product occupies the third place. This was the case according to the census of 1880. It is claimed that since then the lumber industry has enlarged to such an extent as to make its product second, if not first in value.

Under these circumstances, is it not evident that we have no reason to fear with regard to our resources, with regard to the future of our country, with regard to the call of our Administration for money to carry on the affairs of this country, when we know we have in our minerals, in our forest lands, such an extraordinary outcome of material not only for the present but for coming generations, and long may these remain under the control of and under the supervision of the Liberal-Conservative party of Canada? On the subject of finance, there are one or two points which I wish to bring to the attention of the House. In discussing the progress made by Canada during the last quarter of a century, reference has frequently been made to money accumulated in our savings banks. However, we know perfectly well that it is a substantial structure to build upon. But there are other channels of investment for the surplus earnings of our people. We know perfectly well that every family in our country takes into serious consideration the advisability of life insurance, and at no time in our history was life insurance in a more prosperous state than it is to-day. Let me tell the House that one company in the Capital of Canada, the Metropolitan Life, one of the largest industrial companies in the world, has forty agents at work to-day in this city insuring the lives of our people. And it is perfectly extraordinary how much is expended every day, week and month as an investment in this direction. Then we may look into the history of the Canada Life Insurance Company of Canada? Was there ever an institution that made greater progress or advancement? To-day, not only is it one of our leading insurance companies, but it is also one of our leading financial institutions. Out of whom did the company make their money? Out of honest investment of capital in the insuring of the lives of our people. If we turn to-day to the records of our companies, is it not pleasing and gratifying to see what they have accomplished in giving insurance and building up the fair name and reputation they enjoy throughout the Dominion. Life insurance is considered almost indispensable in every family. We find, on examining statistics—although hon. gentlemen opposite, with their blue ruin ideas, cannot see it—that the amount of premiums aggregate $106,458,863 during the last twenty years. If, from 1875 to 1894, we have been going from bad to worse, as has been stated by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), it so happens that of the $106,458,863 of insurance subscribed, contributed and paid as premiums in Canada during the last 20 years, no less than $75,640,436 have been paid up during last ten years, as against $29,818,027 during the ten years previous. Is that no evidence of the advancement, of the progress and of the resources of the people, and of their ability, out of their honest earnings, acquired by the exercise of brain and muscle, to pay that money, and thus insure their lives and build up the institutions of the country. The net amount of life insurance in force in 1875 was $85,009,264; in 1885, ten years later, that had risen to $149,962,146, and in 1894, it reached a total of $308,795,881. The number of people covered by this insurance can be inferred from the fact that the number of policies in force in 1893 (I have no later figures) was 166,384, whereas in 1885 the number in force was only 90,517. Surely these indications show that Canada is able to stand a rainy day, and what better prospects can we have of the prosperity of our people than to know that life insurance has quadrupled during the last ten years. I do not believe that there is anything like the cloud of desolation spoken of by the hon. gentleman opposite as overshadowing this country, since the regime of the Conservative party commenced. I believe that we are living under a clear sky and that we have as prosperous a future before us to-day as we ever had in the history of this country. I have not spoken of all the Insurance Associations, for I have not included the numerous benevolent and friendly societies such as the Foresters and the United Workmen, in both of which associations a large amount of money has been invested. These are only still further evidences of the prosperity of our people such as I have endeavoured to bring before the House and the country on this occasion. There is one other very gratifying feature of our present condition in this country to which I wish to refer. It is connected with the education of our people and the building up and fostering of our higher educational institutions. We know perfectly well that those to-day who go to schools and colleges are not as they were some fifty years ago, children of the wealthier classes; but they are the children of the middle classes, the ordinary labourer and mechanic. Those people are acquiring wealth enough to educate their children so as to enable them to compete with other individuals no matter in what walk of life they be. As long as they have brain and muscle these channels are open to them in this country, and that is the reason we encourage all classes of our people to be thoroughly and well educated. Let me remind hon. gentlemen of these figures. The number of students attending McGill University in 1892 was 926, and in two years afterwards they had increased to 1,149. The number of students attending the Toronto University in 1891 was 857 and in two years later that number had increased in 1,132. These are gratifying facts. This state of affairs has not been confined to these two universities but we find the same thing in Queen's University, in Laval University, in Dalhousie University, in Manitoba College and from one end of our country to the other. Those privileges of education have been extended to the ordinary classes in life who have now the means to give a higher education to their children and that is proof positive of the undoubted prosperity which marks the growth and progress and advancement of the people of this country. The hon. the leader of the House (Mr. Foster) gave us a great many facts in his Budget speech, but before I refer to these, I wish to advert to one fact mentioned in a very able article emanating from the pen of our worthy Clerk of the Commons, Dr. Bourinot. In a leading article on the progress of Canada, in the "Edinburgh Review," Dr. Bourinot points to our advancement in science and literature, and what better proof can we have of the prosperity of a people than that those higher channels of education should be utilized? It is a proof that our people are availing themselves of that which not only tends to the comfort and happiness of themselves, but which will go down as a legacy of happiness to their children who come after them. Dr. Bourinot says:

We have already seen the low condition of education fifty years ago—only one in fifteen at school; but now there are nearly 1,000,000 pupils in the educational institutions of the country, or one in five, at a cost to the people of upwards of £2,000,000, contributed for the most part by the taxpayers of the different municipalities in connection with which the educational system is worked out. In Ontario the class of school houses is exceptionally good, and the apparatus excellent, and the extent to which the people tax themselves may be ascertained from the fact that the legislature only contributes annually some £52,000 out of the total expenditure of about £800,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with reference to the financial condition of Canada. We know perfectly well that the Budget speech presented to us by the hon. Finance Minister was so exhaustive in its character that it is scarcely necessary to add anything to it. But notwithstanding that, when I hear gentlemen, like the hon. member from Huron (Mr. Macdonald) give to this House and to the country such extraordinary ideas with reference to our financial condition, I think it well to quote to the House some statistics which show the marked progress and development of Canada, and which may be of some use to our people who may have an opportunity of reading them, and who take an interest in our welfare. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) in one of his excellent speeches delivered in Western Canada says :

“ Life may be divided into two great divisions : the producing and the distributing.”

No matter what may be produced in a country, it is of very little consequence unless it is also distributed, and the great aim and object of the trade and commerce of this country is to find not only a home market but a foreign market as well. Our surplus products have been going to the foreign market in Europe and long may they continue to go in the same direction. The exports of Canada in 1879 amounted to $71,000,000, and in 1893 they amounted to $118,000,000, or an increase of 66 per cent under the National Policy. Our imports in 1879 amounted to $81,000,000, and in 1893 they amounted to $129,000,000, or an increase of fully 60 per cent in the same period. Taking our total imports and exports together, we had in 1878 a business with other countries amounting to $153,000,000, whilst in 1893 that total business had increased to $247,000,000, or an increase of 65 per cent. Our shipping and railroading trade shows a solid and substantial increase. In 1878, the sea-going tonnage amounted to 6,500,000 tons entered and cleared from Canada, and in 1893, it amounted to 10,500,000 tons, or an increase of 60 per cent in the period. The coasting trade tonnage increased in the same period from 11,000,000 tons in 1878 to 24,500,000 in 1893, or an increase of about 110 per cent. The inland and water tonnage of Canada which is a good indication of our increased trade was as follows :—Entered in the ports in Canada in 1879, 5,000,000 tons and in 1893 that was increased to 8,000,000 tons, or an increase of 60 per cent. The circulation of our banks, in 1879, was $19,000,000, and in 1893 it actually reached $34,000,000, an increase of 80 per cent. We find the same increase in our telegraphs.

Sir JAMES GRANT.

our post office circulation, and our natural products, for instance, in cheese. We know that the Hon. George Brown, during his lifetime took an active and energetic interest in Canada's trade and commerce, and when the reciprocity treaty was abrogated he did not fail to express his conviction, not only in his journal, but on the public platform, that it was not going to be so detrimental to the trade and commerce of Canada as was supposed. I was glad, indeed, to hear him say so. I was glad that he had that largeness of heart, comprehensiveness of mind, and acuteness of observation to enable him to recognize that Canada was not going to be demoralized by the abrogation of that treaty, but was going to go on and prosper, as she has done. In 1878 our export of cheese amounted to 46,000,000 pounds, valued at $4,000,000 ; whereas, in 1893, it amounted to no less than 134,000,000 pounds, valued at $13,000,000, being an increase in value of 240 per cent. Our cattle export in 1878 was valued at only $1,500,000, and in 1893 it reached a value of $7,500,000, being an increase of 500 per cent. Who will have the hardihood to assert on the floor of this Chamber, no matter what he may think to the contrary, that the National Policy has not been the basis of the strength and the stability of this Dominion, for the developing of our resources and the building up of our trade and commerce. In an able address, delivered only a short time ago, while presiding over a dinner given in London, in honour of Canada, Sir Charles Tupper, our High Commissioner, brought out some very important facts, which I wish to cite now, because an effort has been made to prove to the country that the Conservative party have actually used the resources of this country for their own personal aggrandisement and advancement, instead of for the building up of the great works of the country, which have given us such a high reputation throughout the world. In that able address, what did Sir Charles Tupper say ? :

Canada has expended on her canals and that great interoceanic line of railway from Halifax to Vancouver—works absolutely vital to the defence of that section of the Empire, and that half of North America—$141,000,000. In deepening the St. Lawrence $3,384,000 have been spent, so that, whereas a few years ago a vessel drawing nine feet of water only could reach the city of Montreal, the largest ocean steamer may now ride in safety in its harbour. (Cheers.) We have also expended $2,700,000 in the construction of graving docks, built under the superintendence of and in concert with, Her Majesty's Government to receive for repairs the largest ocean steamers frequenting the Atlantic or the Pacific. We have paid $7,000,000 to obtain the control and rights of the Hudson's Bay Company and organize the North-west country for settlement. * *

* Within the last twenty years, we have paid $13,500,000 to keep good faith with the Indian subjects of Her Majesty. * * * When we turn to the Pacific coast, we find Canada spending $250,000 in conjunction with Her Majesty's Government for the construction of fortifications at Esquimalt, and I have the satisfaction of learning that Her Majesty's Government is satisfied in the highest degree with the manner in which Canada has come forward to share one-half of the cost of constructing the fortifications and the entire cost of maintaining the garrison there. Taking these items altogether, we have a total of $174,839,000, and I record it as some proof to the people of this country, with whom we are very proud to be connected, that Canadians are not slow to recognize their duty towards the Empire. * * * And what does Canada expend to maintain her militia force? No less than $1,300,000 per annum. For the Mounted Police, that most efficient protective force in the North-west Territories, she spends $625,000 per annum, for the maintenance of the fishery protection service to discharge duties formerly falling upon the British navy, she pays $128,000 per annum; for the war cruisers plying between Vancouver and Japan and China, at the command of Her Majesty's Admiralty, as the most efficient means of protecting the commerce of this country, and for the steamers plying between Vancouver and Australasia, equally prepared to come to the service of the Empire in time of emergency, Canada pays $200,000 per annum; while Canada is also ready to-morrow to pay $750,000 per annum more to obtain a fast steamship line across the Atlantic.

Talking of this fast Atlantic service, gentlemen on this side of the House have been actually taunted because they mentioned a fast Atlantic service. What does a fast Atlantic service mean, Mr. Speaker? It is one of the most important propositions ever submitted to this House. What did we find the other day? We found passengers who had arrived at Vancouver by the "Empress of India" from Japan, China, Australia and India at our very Ottawa station, passing through the very centre of this Dominion. This shows what the Liberal-Conservative party of Canada have accomplished, in building the Canadian Pacific Railway, which a few years ago, when I first had the honour of a seat in this House, was not known—when it took three months to go from the capital of Canada to Winnipeg, the capital of the North-west Territories, as compared with to-day, when you can reach that point in three days; and still are told that the Conservative party of Canada are slumbering on their oars and doing nothing. When the hon. leader of the Opposition was in the North-west last summer, delivering those eloquent addresses to the people there, and enjoying the luxury of a special car on the Canadian Pacific Railway, which, I was glad to find him enjoying, did he tell the people there what had been accomplished by the Conservative party to cause Winnipeg to grow, in a few years from being an Indian post to be the Chicago of the North-west? No, not a single word. He gave all the credit to the aborigines of this country, and to the early voyageurs, and not to those who were instrumental in building up the great work of the country, establishing law and order, planting centres of Government, trade and manufactures, and bringing population into the country. Rely upon it, Mr. Speaker, that we have something more to consider than mere subterfuge. We have to look at this question in a broad and comprehensive spirit; and, when we think of those passengers from the great eastern hemisphere coming through central Canada, wending their way towards that great country to which we are all proud to belong, and to which I hope we shall long continue to belong—when we think of what the Canadian Pacific Railway is accomplishing, we have but to remember that it is but one line in the great chain of communication; and if the public men of Canada are to-day contending for the maintenance of its supremacy on this northern continent, one of their purposes is not only to establish a line of communication from the Atlantic to the Pacific, but to connect with fast steamship lines, one great hemisphere with another, and, as much as possible, to shorten that route, because we have a great competitor to contend against in the Suez canal route. We know that Sir John Pender, a gentleman of great energy, zeal and ability, who controls the continental lines of telegraphic communication throughout the eastern world, and who was the pioneer of the electric cable system of to-day, looks at us with a great deal of interest, because he fears that the day will shortly arrive when the voyage through the American continent will be so shortened by this line that this route will become the great way of travel connecting the two great hemispheres and be preferred to the Suez route on account of its better climatic conditions and other advantages. I trust the day is not far distant when Canada, notwithstanding the efforts of the Opposition, will see, under the auspices of the great Conservative party, the shortest line possible across the North American continent an accomplished fact. Another matter to which I shall call attention is the Hudson Bay Railway. I find in the "Daily Nor' Wester" the following reference to Mr. Laurier's visit to the North-west:—

When Mr. Laurier visited Winnipeg in September last, he found the construction of the Hudson Bay Railway was a crucial question in so far as the general support of the electorate was concerned. As he said, he was not a Minister, and could not make promises; but he would contrast what he would do, if in power, with what Ministers, in their lukewarmness, had not done. He said: "Not only have they been unable to make up their minds, but they are also not in favour of a railway to Hudson Bay."

Then we find that the hon. member for Winnipeg said:

The Government do not care to take the trouble to make any investigation as to the character of the Hudson Bay navigation. Well, I can say this for the Liberal party, it is our duty to make an investigation of these resources.

Mr. Robert Watson and several others expressed themselves to the same effect. I am not going to enter into any discussion of this subject, which we know is a sort of bête noir, because I do not know anything about the policy of the Government, except what emanated from the able statement of the Premier in the Senate the other day. That was a plain, straightforward, common sense statement, and any man who reads may learn. I look upon that road with a considerable degree of interest. We know that the currency of the North-west is its wheat and that the only way to give that wheat its greatest value is to bring the North-west as close to the English market as possible. Nearly seven-tenths of the wheat of that country finds its way to Port Arthur, through Port William down to Buffalo and thence to American seaports. And why? Because there are more bottoms in New York market for shippers than they can possibly get in Montreal. But time will change that, and we will be enabled to ship our wheat through Canada to greater advantage. There is a great future before the North-west. It is the thorax of the Dominion. The prosperity of the North-west means the prosperity of Canada. Our Ministers are showing their sense of the situation by putting great energy into the development of the country, and certainly in the last twenty-five years they have accomplished wonders. We know well that we are passing through a very serious financial crisis throughout the world, and we feel certainly the necessity of being economical; but the day must come when that railway from Winnipeg to Hudson Bay will be built. I have looked into this whole question. I have examined its history and all the explorations made in that country, and I am thoroughly convinced that history will repeat itself so far as Hudson Bay Railway navigation is concerned. I recollect thirty-five or forty years ago when it was said that the St. Lawrence was not navigable owing to the immense quantity of ice at its mouth; and last session, when the question of the fast service was discussed, the leader of the Opposition quoted from some old, dusty literature to prove that even the St. Lawrence was not suited for fast navigation. The then Minister of Marine (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) pointed out that the literature quoted from was as far behind the times and as antiquated as the policy of the Opposition itself. I think that we will see the same change of opinion with regard to navigation of Hudson Bay. I have friends who have lived there for years, and I have had occasion to look into the statistics, and I am satisfied that the day will come when Winnipeg will be 1250 miles nearer to Liverpool than it is now. It will be just as near Liverpool as Montreal is. As the building of this road will give an increased stimulus to farming in the North-west, the whole subject should be most thoroughly inquired into. Our Dominion has a wonderful future. We will have more people in the next half a century west of Red River than we have in all Canada to-day, and it is the duty of every true patriotic Canadian to contribute, as far as he can, to this enterprise. I thank you, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, for the kind attention you have given the few observations I have had to offer. I am here but as a humble Canadian, a citizen of the capital, to assist as far as I possibly can any advance in the prosperity of this country. And, if there is one circumstance more than another that gives me pride and satisfaction, it is to be a humble member of the great Conservative party which has done so much to develop the resources of this Dominion of ours.

IMPORTATIONS OF SUGAR.

Mr. GIBSON (for Sir Richard Cartwright) asked, What amounts of raw and refined sugar were imported into the ports of Montreal and Halifax from the 30th of April to the 3rd day of May in 1894 and 1895, respectively ?

Mr. WALLACE. 1894—Montreal: 3,304,389 pounds raw sugar were imported and entered duty free at the port of Montreal between 30th April and 2nd May inclusive, 1894. No refined sugar was imported during that time at the port of Montreal. 1894—Halifax: 2,174,287 pounds raw sugar were imported and entered duty free at the port of Halifax between the 30th April and 2nd May inclusive, 1894. No refined sugar was imported during that time at the port of Halifax. 1895—Montreal: 9,285,499 pounds raw sugar were imported at Montreal between the 30th April ultimo and the 2nd May inclusive, and passed through the Customs duty free and delivery obtained during that time; also 141,830 pounds refined sugar. 1895—Halifax: No sugar was imported at Halifax between the 30th April ultimo and the 2nd May inclusive. 23,547,313 pounds raw sugar had been imported between the 23rd February and the 26th April and stored in sufferance warehouse, and entered free through the Customs and delivery obtained between the 30th April and 2nd May inclusive; also 11,035 pounds refined sugar.

MR. L. J. A. McMURRAY.

Mr. LEGRIS asked, 1. In what capacity is Mr. L. J. A. McMurray employed at the Experimental Farm? 2. How many years has he been so employed? 3. What was his work in the years preceding this, and what is his present employment? 4. What pay has he received each year?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The answer as supplied to me by the Department of Agriculture, is as follows:—1. Mr. L. J. A. McMurray is now employed at the Central Experimental Farm in general office work and in showing visitors over the farm. 2 and 3. Mr. McMurray was at first engaged on the Experimental Farm as a day workman and received $1.25 per day, paid weekly. He was employed chiefly in outdoor work in connection with the experimental plots of grain. Beginning with October, 1890, he was paid monthly, at the rate of $35 per month, and from that time to the present has been chiefly employed in general office work and in showing visitors over the farm. 4. From 2nd May, 1890, to 30th September, 1890, he received $1.25 per day; from 1st October, 1890, to 30th June, 1891, $35 per month; from 1st July, 1891, to 31st October, 1892, he received at the rate of $500 a year, and from the 1st of November, 1892, to the present time, he has received $600 a year.

VOTERS' LISTS—CORRECTION.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to correct an error in the revised "Hansard," to which my attention has been called. Some days ago the member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser) asked a question which stood in his name, as to whether the lists would be revised during the present year, and my answer was that the lists had been revised this year and that it was the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill, which is now being introduced, legalizing the non-revision of the lists this year. I see that an error has crept in and that my answer is given in "Hansard": That we intended to introduce a Bill to legalize the new revision of the lists this year.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to notice that my esteemed friend from Ottawa (Sir James Grant) is not in his place this afternoon. We were greatly delighted last night with the very interesting address he gave us. He usually affords us considerable merriment when he speaks, but I do not at all intend to deal harshly with him, and I propose to offer only a few remarks in reply to his statements. He told us about the balances in the savings banks, and also about insurances and many such things, for the purpose of endeavouring to prove that the country was in a prosperous condition and that the National Policy had accomplished a great deal for Canada. I would judge from what he said that he made insurance a hobby, and I dare say that immediately when he is called in he advises every one of his patients to insure their lives. I heartily commend the hon. gentleman for doing that. Now, the hon. gentleman also said something regarding the Hudson Bay scheme. My hon. leader (Mr. Laurier) is often found fault with in this House for not expressing himself very distinctly upon important questions, but although Parliament has already been in session for a month, and the question of the construction of the Hudson Bay Railway has been agitated in the country and in the press, we have not yet had the slightest inkling either from the Government or from any of their followers,—not even those from Manitoba—as to what they intend to do with regard to that project. Last night my esteemed friend (Sir James Grant) professed to be fully cognizant of the peculiar character of the country through which the proposed line was to be built, and he told us he knew a great deal about the Hudson Bay territory. He said, for instance, that he had some relations in Hudson Bay. Well, I never thought for a moment that the hon. gentleman was so nearly related to the "finny" tribe; but we have his own word for it, for he said that his relations were resident in the Hudson's Bay, and not on the shores surrounding it. I understand that there is an hon. gentleman on this side of the House who has taken a good many notes of the speech of the hon. member for Ottawa (Sir James Grant), and I will, therefore, not follow him further. I have, however, to deal with some statements made by the Minister of Finance, and I will commence by referring to what he said as to the interest. A great many statements have been presented in this House by hon. gentlemen opposite for the purpose of showing that the per capita interest charge of this country has not been largely increased. The hon. Finance Minister stated that the per capita interest at one time stood at $1.86, and that it was down now to $1.79. He did not say that it was during the Mackenzie regime that it rose to $1.86, and had he said so it certainly would not have been correct. I have looked over the different years of the Mackenzie Government, and I cannot find that the per capita rate of interest ever reached that amount, so that if it did reach it, it must have been under the administration of the present Government. They are better hands at raising the rate of interest and borrowing money than they are at reducing the annual expenditure. If it had not been for the fortunate fact that the rate of interest in the money markets of the world has considerably fallen off during late years, and if we were now compelled to borrow at the high rates charged during the time the Mackenzie Government was in power, the per capita interest to-day would be nearly double what it was during Mr. Mackenzie's time. It is fortunate, in the interests of hon. gentlemen opposite, and fortunate for the country also, that the rate of interest has greatly decreased during recent years, because while to-day we are paying an enormous amount of interest, let the rate be what it was years ago, and sad indeed would be the drain on our resources to meet the demand. In 1881 the net interest paid was $6,826,795 on a population of 4,324,810, or $1.57½ per capita. The net interest paid in 1891 was $8,677,558 on a population of 4,833,239, or $1.79½, or very nearly $1.80 per capita. So that there has been a steady increase in the interest in place of a decrease; and this is greatly to be regretted, because last year the Finance Minister told us in his Budget speech that the borrowing period in Canada's history was about ended, that we were drawing near to the time when we would begin to reduce our debt, and that everything pointed to a considerable reduction year by year. We have not yet begun to experience the fulfilment of that prediction. It is in accord with a great many predictions which hon. gentlemen opposite have made in past years. With regard to the blessings of the National Policy, we are accustomed from year to year to hear those predictions reiterated, and when they fail to be fulfilled, hon. gentlemen opposite have no explanation to make; and I am sure that they will treat in the same way the announcement made by the Finance Minister last year with regard to the stoppage of borrowing. The hon. Finance Minister appeared to speak in a very boastful way of the manner in which he had relieved the people of this country from taxation by taking the duty off sugar, claiming that he had allowed them to keep some $4,900,000 in their pockets. But while that tax was removed, so far as the revenue was concerned, its protective feature in the interest of the sugar refiners, was kept intact. The hon. gentleman put on eight-tenths of a cent a pound on refined sugar coming into Canada, and admitted the raw material free. Eight-tenths of a cent a pound on 250,000,000 pounds, the quantity we imported last year, makes $2,000,000 of taxation which the consumers of sugar paid, but none of which found its way into the Dominion treasury. It all went into the pockets of the refiners of this country for the purpose of protecting them against competition. This is the feature of this vicious policy that we desire to call the attention of the House and the country to. During the present session we have had a change in the duty on sugar. The Finance Minister has proposed a duty of half a cent a pound upon imported raw sugar; but he has not removed the duty of six-tenths of a cent a pound which is still kept on in the interest of the refiners; so that the consumers of sugar in this country will have to pay one and one-tenth cent a pound of taxes from the day the Finance Minister made his Budget speech until that tariff is altered. But out of that one and one-tenth cent a pound for protective duty, only half a cent goes into the Dominion treasury, while the six-tenth cent goes into the pockets of the refiners. We have evidently reached a period where we are producing so largely the commodities that enter into every-day use that we are now forced to turn around and put a duty on raw materials to produce a revenue, and we have commenced with sugar. I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite, if the people permit them to continue to occupy the treasury benches, will go on putting duties on other raw materials in order to provide a revenue. Now, what must be the fact with regard to sugar next year? Suppose we import 300,000,000 pounds, the quantity that we imported this year, we shall obtain from that $1,500,000 of revenue, but in addition to that we shall have to pay the refiners $1,800,000, making together something like $3,300,000 of taxation. That is the condition of the tariff with regard to sugar at the present moment. The Finance Minister also drew attention to some increased trade with Spain, Italy, Belgium, China, Japan and Australasia. We in Canada, owing to the fact that we have been largely deprived of the market to the south of us, appear to be hunting the world over in the effort to find an outlet for the commodities we have to sell. We had a very advantageous and convenient market in the United States for a great many of those commodities before the tariff wall that separates us from that country had been erected. But, Sir, from the time we introduced the National Policy down to the present time, the barriers of restriction have been growing higher and higher, until we are now almost absolutely shut out of that market. The hon. Finance Minister said last year that our gross trade with the United States had dropped $13,000,000, and he appeared to rejoice in that fact. Permit me to tell him that there never was a change in the tariff of Canada or in the tariff of the United States that the people of this country felt more seriously, or deplored more earnestly than the change which brought about the present condition of things. In the United States, our people found, and would to-morrow find, a very desirable outlet for a great many commodities which we can most lucratively and conveniently produce. But we have been shut out of that market, and we are now compelled to sell a very large proportion of our products in the slaughter market of creation—the British market, where all the products of the world are gathered, and where keen competition from all climes and countries has to be met. The agriculturists of this country cannot afford to compete with the cheaper labour of India, Northern Russia, Africa, and other countries. We want, if we can, to get a fancy market for much of what we have to sell, and that fancy market is to be found in the United States; but, in place of hon. gentlemen opposite making an honest effort to secure the advantages of closer trade relations with that country, they have, by every possible trick and deception, laboured against a treaty with the United States; they have fooled and humbugged the people of this country in regard to it, and the condition we are in to-day is directly attributable to their action. That has been the outcome of their course. I shall say a few words more with regard to interest, because that appears to be a question upon which there has been considerable dispute. In 1882, the net interest was $6,667,359.93. In twelve years we have increased that amount to the sum I have already given, $8,933,787. That is the increased drain upon the resources of the people in that number of years of $2,266,427.23, or an increase per capita in interest alone, in twelve years, of $50 per head of the population. That is a very important matter when you come to consider that it covers every Indian, every half-breed, every papoose in the cradle, every inmate of the asylums, every inmate of the jails, and every tramp that walks our streets. Somebody has to pay the increased interest; for it is there to be met. It thus becomes a matter of very serious moment for our people. But start with 1878. The actual interest paid in 1878 was $7,194,734. The actual interest paid in 1894 was $10,212,596, or a net increase in those sixteen years of $3,017,862. This is unquestionably a very serious bit of financial history for this country. It shows how rapidly we are running into debt, and when we take into consideration the very limited progress we have made in population and development, we must look upon that increase very seriously and begin to realize what an enormous drain the people are subjected to in having to pay that sum every year. I shall now deal with some features of the National Policy. It is contended, and I notice that it has been contended by Ministers on the stump as well as in this House, that the continuation of the National Policy does not tend to increase the prices of the commodities which enter into the everyday use of the people. I have noticed on several occasions that they have declared that on goods purchased in this country our people pay no taxes. There are, they say, no taxes paid on wools and cottons, and the other lines manufactured here. I wish to show that such statement is not correct. Last year, 1893-94, we imported raw cottons to the value of $2,610,538, and of manufactured cotton, $4,001,618. On the manufactured imports we paid a duty of $1,139,068. The estimated consumption of cotton in Canada is $9,000,000, a year. Take the average duty of 30 per cent on $9,000,000, and you will find it will amount to $2,700,000. Now, we collected in duties on the manufactured commodities imported, $1,139,068, leaving a balance of $1,560,132, which went into the pockets of the cotton manufacturers. By this statement we see, and I challenge contradiction, that there is a pretty good thing in the National Policy for the cotton manufacturers, and it is not to be wondered at that they should sound its praises and blessings. If it tended to contribute to the financial well-being of every other class as well as the cotton manufacturers, it would certainly be a blessing all round, but it has, on the contrary, taken that amount of money out of the pockets of Canadian consumers to give it to the manufacturers. Take another article, because, in my opinion, this is the only proper way to point out the advantages which the National Policy confers on the manufacturers and how injuriously it affects the consumers. Take starch, the consumption of starch is 5,000,000 pounds. The protection on starch is 1½ cents per pound, or $75,000. We imported last year 44,088 pounds, on which we collected duties, $14,473.61. Taking that from the protection on the amount consumed, we find there is $60,526.39 which the people have paid and which never reached the Dominion treasury. They paid the whole $75,000,000, of which the small percentage of $14,473 only reached the treasury, and the $60,526.61 went into the pockets of the starch manufacturers. There is, therefore, a considerable benefit in the National Policy for the starch manufacturers, and they have a very nice thing. Not much wonder that they should clamour in its behalf. It is stated, of course, in reply that they pay 7½ cents per bushel duty on corn, but looking over the exports and imports of corn, I am surprised to find that although we have four very large distilleries in the country and some five or six starch factories, and although there is quite a quantity of corn used throughout the west, all the duty we got on corn last year was $120,000. We imported over 11,000,000 bushels, but have credited over 10,000,000 bushels as exported, and the small percentage left is what we collected the duty on. It is rather singular, with all these establishments in existence, that we get so small a revenue from corn. Then take sugar. We imported 303,789,809 pounds free, and 2,823,448 on which we paid $22,230.66 duty, which shows that the manufacturers sell the product refined up to the price at which it can be imported. Should we import the same quantity next year, the consumers of sugar will have to pay that, and in addition the half cent a pound which goes into the Dominion treasury, so that there is a very considerable advantage to the sugar refineries in the National Policy, and we need not be surprised that they should urge what a blessing it is to Canada, and loudly call for its perpetuation. Take agricultural implements. Last year, 1893-94, we imported 755 self-binders, on which was paid $24,478.50 duty, or $32.42 per binder. This will be found on page 117 of General Statement of Imports. I have good reason to believe, because it has been stated to me on reliable authority, that the Massey-Harris Company manufactured some 12,000 binders during the last year. The protection is $32.40 per binder, which on 12,000 would amount to $389,040. But they claim that they pay a duty of $5 per binder on the stuff which goes into its manufacture. Well, taking that off, there is still left the net sum of $329,040 protection to the manufacturers; of 12,000 binders. This is, in my opinion, a very considerable protection against competition. Sometime ago the threat was made that the Massey-Harris Company were going to move their factory to the other side of the Niagara River. I think, if the protection is what is indicated by the blue-book, they have a very decided advantage over all outsiders and should be well satisfied. It is not they, but the people who use the binders who ought to complain. We will take spades and shovels. We imported last year, according to our returns, 2,637 dozens of spades and shovels. The duty paid upon that importation was $5,599.91, or $2.12½ per dozen. Now, the Gananoque spade and shovel factory turns out, according to the Finance Minister, 9,000 dozens a year. Their protection on that at $2.12½ would be $19,125. They employ about 80 hands, so that we pay toward their wages about $240 to their average hand each year. This shows that, so far as the Gananoque factory is concerned, it is quite natural for the proprietors to praise the National Policy; for it does a great deal for them and gives them a great advantage over their outside competitors. I have no doubt that the proprietors of the factory are ready at all times to hold up their hands and throw up their hats in favour of the National Policy. Let us turn to another item, that of wall paper. The consumption of wall paper in Canada is about half a million dollars a year—the year before last it was $495,000. We produce in Canada about $300,000 worth each year. The average protection on wall paper is 42 per cent. On our total consumption that would be about $207,900 of protection. How much did the treasury get last year from this source? Only $61,249.19. So that left $146,650.81 to go into the pockets of the wall paper manufacturers of this country. These people should be well satisfied with the tariff. They should be pleased to be authorized by law to compel the consumers of wall paper to give them such a comfortable profit each year. I believe there are three factories that manufacture wall paper in Canada. If that is so, they are protected, on the average, to the amount of $48,883.60 to each factory. It is not much wonder that you find the manufacturers gathering together and passing resolutions expressive of their strong approval of the continuation and perpetuation of the National Policy. This policy has undoubtedly done much for them, but the consumers of the country are being made the victims. I contend that this policy of levying a tariff first with a view to granting protection to special industries, while making the question of revenue a secondary consideration, is a vicious fraud and wholly unjust to the consumer. Why, Mr. Speaker, it simply means levying taxes in Her Majesty's name but not for Her Majesty's purposes; it means levying taxes for the purpose of putting into the pockets of certain individuals money that they never earned and are now entitled to. Without further dwelling on the advantages that specific manufacturers get out of the operation of the National Policy, I shall simply repeat, because I think they are worth repeating, the statements made by my esteemed friend from Huron (Mr. Macdonald) last night with regard to what the census of this country clearly proves. I have here a statement which I should like very well to have some Minister of the Crown or some other gentleman deal with and to explain away if he can, the inferences which must be drawn from it, or justify, if he can, the enormous drain to which it shows the people of this country to be subjected under the operation of this system. Now, this is the statement of the manufacturers themselves, and you will find it in table No. 2, page 382, Vol. III. of the census of 1891. I commend it to the study of every man who takes an interest in the affairs of this country. It shows that the number of manufacturing establishments in Canada is 75,968. The capital invested in these establishments is as follows:—In land, $31,466,324; in buildings, $60,303,043; in machinery, $81,401,247; working capital, $181,450,136. That makes a total of $354,620,750. Remember, these are the manufacturers' own figures; these are the statements that they themselves have voluntarily given the census enumerators. The value of raw material used in these manufacturing establishments in a year is $256,119,042; the value of labour engaged—wages paid—is $100,663,650, making a total of $356,782,692 for raw material and labour. Now, they give also the value of the articles produced, the total being $476,258,886. Now, taking the raw material and wages from that and we have left $119,476,194, which shows the profit on the investment on capital. Now, what percentage is that? That is a percentage, Mr. Speaker, of 33½, showing a clear profit at that rate on the capital invested and money used in these manufactories. I challenge any denial of these figures; they are as stated by the manufacturers themselves. These are not our figures; they are compiled by the manufacturers themselves and are the reports given by them to the census enumerators about their own business. Now, Sir, I would like to know of any other business in Canada—that of the farmer, the fisherman, the lumberman or any other that will give a clear net return on the invested capital.

An hon. MEMBER. That is their profit?

Mr. McMULLEN. That is clear profit after paying for raw material and wages. After paying for these there are only the four items of investment—land, buildings, machinery, and working capital, and the sum I have given represents the profit on that investment.

Mr. GILLMOR. The consumers pay that.

Mr. McMULLEN. The consumers pay it, because they buy the articles and have got to pay it, and they report that the gross amount sold is the sum that I have mentioned to the House. Now, my hon. friend behind me gave you the figures in regard to the farmers. He shows clearly that the farmers of this country, allowing only 5 per cent for the money invested, allowing only ordinary wages to be paid for the men, allowing only ordinary wages for themselves and their families, after all that, over 10 millions of money have been lost by the farmers of this country within the last year, as compared with the advantages enjoyed by the manufacturers of this country. I have prepared some figures with regard to the condition of agriculture in Ontario. Total value of the land in Ontario, $680,000,000; total value of buildings, $180,000,000; total value of stock, $104,250,000; value of implements, $48,500,000; making a grand total of $1,012,750,000. Now, I want to draw the attention of the House to this fact, that, although in one line of business, in one province alone very nearly three times as much money is invested in the interest of agriculture as is invested in manufactures, yet the policy of this country during the last fifteen years has been to build up manufacturing institutions and to cripple and hinder the farming industry. I know that hon. gentlemen opposite claim that they are doing good work for the farmers, but you cannot get any sensible, intelligent farmer in this country to swallow that statement nowadays. When you remember the fact that the Patrons of Industry and the Grangers of this country, in almost every lodge, in almost every meeting, have passed resolutions condemning in the plainest terms the policy that is now in existence in this country, it must be admitted that they have shown clearly that they consider themselves victims of an imposition under the operations of that tariff; they have shown that by the intelligent manner in which they have dealt with the question of a protective tariff and a revenue tariff. Now, Sir, when hon. gentlemen go out on the stump, they do not hesitate to say to the farmers of this country: Why, you are protected in your pork; if American pork were not excluded, you would have to take considerably less for the pork you raise. I am glad to notice that the Controller of Customs is listening to me while I speak about pork, because he has made that subject a hobby, and has been telling the farmers that they were protected against competition in pork, and that, if they were not so protected, American pork would come in here and flood the market, and they would get very much less for the pork they raise. Well, Sir, what are the facts? Here are the figures taken from the blue-books: In 1889, we exported 4 million pounds of pork; in 1891, we exported 7 million pounds of pork; in 1892, we exported 12 million pounds of pork; in 1893, we exported 20 million pounds of pork. These figures show that, instead of bringing pork into this country, we export a large quantity of that article. If you take the reports in any of the newspapers with regard to the price of pork, you will find that the price in Chicago and Buffalo is quoted considerably higher than it is in Canada. I challenge any hon. gentleman opposite to produce a paper that will show that pork has been higher in Toronto at any time during the last six months than it was in Chicago or Buffalo. It has been higher, and it is now higher. You may take either dressed hogs or live hogs, and I give hon. gentlemen the opportunity of testing either. I know whereof I speak, because I have kept a close watch of the hog market for some time back, and I know that the market in the United States has been higher than it is in Canada. Now, Sir, to try to fool the farmers with the idea that the removal of the duties on hogs would endanger the price here, is trying to persuade them to believe something which no intelligent and well-informed farmer will believe. Now, with regard to the North-west and the exportation of wheat from that country, in my humble opinion, it is becoming more evident every day that the natural course for the surplus crop of that country to take would be to go to St. Paul and Minneapolis, as well as Montreal. I do not believe we shall ever succeed in trying to carry it north. Let us remember the fact that the Americans' wheat crop was short last year, according to their own report, being some six and a half millions less than they are able to consume. Therefore, I believe that the day when Americans are able to export wheat to other countries is rapidly drawing to a close. They have largely gone over the virgin soil of their country, and, notwithstanding their efforts to cultivate their land, they will not be able to raise wheat for export, and they will find year after year, as the population increases, that, instead of being exporters of wheat, they will have to become importers. I contend that under those conditions it would be most desirable to make a market for Manitoba, to have an opportunity of selling wheat there, if they choose, or else send it to Europe, if they found a better price. Now, I contend that protection does not always protect. In 1870, when the Americans adopted their protective system, they had a very large supply of sheep, and they put a duty on wool for the purpose of increasing the number of sheep and increasing the production of wool. After that duty had been in existence for over fifteen years, when they came to take a census in 1891 and enumerate their flocks of sheep, they found that in five of the largest wool-producing states, they had 3,600,000 sheep less than they had when they put on a duty for the purpose of increasing the production of wool. That fact shows that, while the Americans believed that the imposition of a duty would have the desired result of increasing the production of wool, they were mistaken, as it did not have that result.

Mr. McMULLEN.

The reason was not that it did not pay the Americans to raise sheep and produce wool, but it was because the farmers of that country were so pauperized under the operation of the National Policy that they had in force in that country for twenty-five years, that they could not afford to keep sheep, and they had to sell the sheep they already possessed. The result was that in place of increasing the production of wool, the quantity of that article produced by the farmers notably fell off. We must admit that the National Policy has caused a boom. We have, no doubt, enjoyed very large expenditures in this country for the last number of years. From 1880 to 1893 we have been continually borrowing money. We have borrowed, in that time, something in the neighbourhood of $610,000,000, including money borrowed by the Dominion on our national credit, as well as on railways and on the credit of the provinces. That money has been spent on railways and in other directions. But, Sir, the only percentage we have left at the end of these years is the comparatively small sum now lying in the post office savings banks, and in kindred institutions: the money which has been borrowed has been expended and carried away from the country, and we are left largely in debt. We have gone largely into the construction of public works; but, what is their value to-day? They are monuments of the greatest folly, and we have many such. They were entered upon, not because they were necessary to the country's requirements, either at the present time, or in the future, but they were entered upon for the purpose of perpetuating the occupancy of the treasury benches by hon. gentlemen opposite. Have we not had most scandalous exposures with respect to the construction of public buildings throughout the country? For example, there was a post office built at a place called Farnham, where the revenue is only $460. It is impossible to point to a single public building erected by hon. gentlemen opposite that the plans have not been changed and the price largely increased, but I am glad to say that this rule does not hold with regard to buildings erected by the provinces. Where is there a Government railway which has been constructed within the original estimate? There is not one. We have had post offices built which were estimated to cost $20,000 or $30,000, but ultimately cost $54,000. We have also the Langevin block, which stands as a monument to scandalous and reckless expenditure, and which in centuries to come will be pointed to as an evidence of the gross corruption which existed at the time of its construction. Then we have the St. Charles Branch Railway, a road that was to be built for less than $15,000 a mile, or a total of about $150,000, but which actually cost in the neighbourhood of $2,000,000. We have also the Oxford and New Glasgow branch, which was to cost less than $1,000,- 000, and has cost $2,000,000. And so hon. members may go from place to place and find public works that cost from 25 to 50 per cent more than the original estimate. To cap the climax, we must turn to the Curran bridge. That stands as a monument of the grossest kind of corruption, and I notice by the newspapers to-day that Mr. St. Louis has been acquitted. And why did the judge acquit him? Because the judge said that the contract had been so loosely drawn that there was room for all the corruption and extravagance that had been committed. Yet the Finance Minister will sit day by day, with his hon. colleague and he will throw charges across the floor that hon. members on this side are incompetent to conduct public affairs—he will sit with a colleague who was connected with a public work which was to cost less than $200,000, and on which $200,00 has been actually lost, as it has cost over $400,000.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Stolen, and no one punished.

Mr. McMULLEN. Stolen. I say that all these facts afford evidence of the reckless extravagance that has been committed, and they show clearly and distinctly that the National Policy has had a most injurious effect on this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite have borrowed money and spent it for the purpose of holding their seats on the treasury benches, and I believe they are prepared to-day to resort to anything before they will consent to remove from those benches. They will sink the credit of this country financially until it will not be worth 50 cents on the dollar; and, if the erection of another Langevin block would perpetuate their occupancy of office for another term of years, they would willingly build it. We have, at all events, one building in this Dominion, in the erection of which there was no rascality, and that is the Parliament building in Toronto, built by Sir Oliver Mowat, a man who has a record for honesty and uprightness unequalled by any man except, perhaps, the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, who has gone.

Mr. BOYLE. How about your present leader?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He has not been in power.

Mr. CHARLTON. Put him in power, and he will show you an example.

Mr. McMULLEN. I can say for my leader, he is a man who has a record in Canada that is untarnished and untainted by any scandal. He has never sat in the House with the position of Collector of Customs in his pocket, and the hon. gentleman should be the last man to bring up this fact.

Mr. BOYLE. I wish to say—

Mr. McMULLEN. If the hon. gentleman will take his seat, I will allow him a chance to reflect a little on the answer he will give me.

Mr. BOYLE. I wish to make a personal explanation.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Monck has not the right to interrupt the speaker.

Mr. McMULLEN. Years past, when we pointed out to hon. gentlemen opposite how reductions could be made in the annual expenditure, they persistently insisted that it was impossible to cut down the Estimates. We are glad to see that when the necessity arose the Finance Minister was able to make a few slight reductions, but not so many as should have been made. I will point out some further reductions which can be effected. I observe that the Finance Minister has given notice of the introduction of a Bill regarding superannuation. I wonder if he is prepared at this late date to abolish this pernicious system. It has been very objectionable simply because it has been recklessly administered, simply because hon. gentlemen opposite have been prepared to utilize that system for party friends and purposes. They have shelved men who were in health, and capable of performing their duties, in order to find comfortable places for their own friends, and the result is that to-day there are over 550 superannuated officers of this Dominion drawing $263,000 of the people's money, and living at ease. I say the people cannot tolerate this system any longer. Had the Act been honestly administered, such results would not have flowed from it; but we claim now that the civil servants should be required to provide for themselves in their old age, if they reach a period of life when they are incapacitated from performing their work. We should abolish the superannuation system. The Minister of Railways and Canals claims that he has made a very considerable reduction in the running expenses of the Intercolonial Railway; but I believe that vast reductions can yet be made in connection with that railway. In a great many cases an immense number of employees on that road are altogether unnecessary. I believe the number of trackmen is double what is necessary, and that the number of men at the stations in the shape of baggage men and so on is altogether too much. I have had a look through the figures connected with a portion of that line, and I am satisfied that if the Government wished to do so, they could make considerable further reductions in the operating expenses. Mr. Speaker, I claim that we should reduce the number of our Cabinet Ministers instead of increasing them. We have altogether too many of them now, and the country should not be burdened to sustain such a large number in comfortable and easy positions at the rate of $7,000 a year each and $1,000 each for sessional allowance. I believe that the affairs of Canada would be better administered, and I have no doubt that the rows and rackets that take place in the Privy Council would be fewer if there were less men meeting there. We should get rid of three of them, at least, and save $21,000 a year. Then, in regard to the civil list. We are now paying over three and a half million dollars for the Civil Service, and under a proper administration the staff and expenditure could be very considerably reduced. But, Sir we cannot expect hon. gentlemen opposite to do that. They have too many friends and relations to provide for. It appears to become a weakness with every Minister when he is installed in office, to place his friends and relations in positions, and when Ministers set that example, it is only natural that their followers should try and benefit by the example. I do not know of any Minister occupying a seat on the treasury bench who has not done something for his relations. When we come to deal with the Estimates, I shall have the privilege of pointing out something specially interesting to the Finance Minister in this direction, which I hope he will be able to explain.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, yes; I will explain it.

Mr. McMULLEN. I now forewarn the Finance Minister so that he may be prepared to give the explanation.

Mr. FOSTER. That is very kind of you.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes, there have been some men who have been recently superannuated. I don't say they are relations of his own, but you know that when these men undertake to do something for friends, they do not stop at second cousins; but their uncles, and their aunts, and their wives' relations of all kinds, are usually provided for.

Mr. FOSTER. You seem to know how it is done.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Minister of Finance has had a considerable hint of what is before him, and he may expect to get it when we reach the Estimates. Now, Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested that we should abolish the Franchise Bill, and it is my opinion that we should do that at once, and adopt the municipal lists. Look at our enormous and useless expenditure for immigration. For the last ten or fifteen years that money has been absolutely thrown away, and we should now, at long last, completely change our system in this regard. We should quit paying these men to travel and deliver lectures. I notice that there is one gentleman belonging to the city of Ottawa, a very venerable man, no doubt, and one who probably can give a very good lecture; but, after all, I do not think we should have paid him $1,000 and travelling expenses for going home recently and delivering a few lectures. We have Sir Charles Tupper in England, and he should be able to deliver all the lectures necessary, because he does not seem to be able to do anything else. We got our cattle scheduled when he was in England, and he has never been able to get the embargo removed. When Sir John Macdonald asked the consent of the House to send Sir Charles Tupper to England as High Commissioner, he assured us that we would save from $25,000 to $30,000 a year commission on our debt, yet we have never saved a cent in that respect, and two years ago when the Minister of Finance returned after making his financial arrangements with the Bank of Montreal, he declared that he would not be able to use Sir Charles Tupper for that purpose at all. If we cannot make anything out of him in London we should bring him over here. However, I do not know, after all, that we have much use for him here, and I dare say that he would cost us just as much.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Superannuate him.

Mr. McMULLEN. No, he does not want superannuation, because I understand that he is a millionaire already. Then, again, we could save a great deal of money on our public works if the Government would use the money prudently and carefully in place of squandering it as was done in the case of the Curran bridge. I am glad to notice that hon. gentlemen opposite propose to make a reduction in the Mounted Police Force, and I think it is full time that they should do so. While a few men might be necessary out there, still I believe that the large number maintained on the force has not been a necessity. The First Minister stated to this House last session that the Mounted Police performed a desirable duty in preventing the smuggling of goods into Manitoba and the North-west Territories; but if preventive officers are necessary up there, they should be under the control of the Customs Department, and their expenses charged to it. I am sorry to notice, Mr. Speaker, that the Government have not decided to abolish the Land Board at Winnipeg, because, in my humble opinion, that is an unnecessary organization. From the time of its inception down to the present, it has never done any work that would justify the expenditure of $35,000 or $40,000 annually on that board. Mr. H. H. Smith, who is the manager or president or chief official up there, gets $5,000 a year, but yet I believe that a very large number of cases that come before the Land Board at Winnipeg are reported at Ottawa, and reconsidered in the offices here. Now, that is paying two sets of officials for performing the one kind of work, and in the face of the limited increase of population in Manitoba and the North-west, and the limited proceeds from lands and other resources of that country—because we are not receiving $1 for every hundred that was promised, on account of the opening up of that country by the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway—we should abolish the Land Board at Winnipeg and save so much to the people of the country. Now, Mr. Speaker, something has been said with regard to free trade. Hon. gentlemen opposite are ever ready to point out to the farming community of this country, their contention that the inevitable result of the introduction of free trade in Canada would be to impose a tax upon every carriage used by the farmer, upon every gun he has, and all that kind of thing. They say that under free trade we would have direct taxation, and that the people will be fleeced right and left. Now, they have no authority whatever for any such statement as that. Neither Mr. Laurier nor any of his followers ever made any such statement, and the assertions of hon. gentlemen opposite are therefore based upon pure fiction.

Mr. McMULLEN.

Mr. COATSWORTH. How about "free trade as it is in England."

Mr. McMULLEN. I will let my hon. friend (Mr. Coatsworth) know something about free trade. When it suits him and his political friends, they like to point to England, they like to praise the old flag, and they like to hurrah for the Queen when it suits them to do so; but, Sir, when it does not suit their purpose, and when American ideas and American principles suit them better, they are quite willing to take the other side and to desert English principles. Now, Sir, I will give hon. gentlemen opposite some little idea of what Britain has done under free trade. In 1846, when England adopted free trade, her debt was £850,000,000 sterling. Since that time she has had many wars—the Russian war, her Indian Mutiny, and other minor wars. She has paid the cost of all these, and in addition has reduced her national debt by $900,000,000. But she has done more than that. She has reduced her paupers 50 per cent and her criminals 71 per cent; she has sold 13 jails, because she had no criminals to put into them. She has improved the education of her people 100 per cent. She has increased the wages of her workingmen 25 per cent, and she has decreased the cost of all necessaries of life 50 per cent.

Mr. COATSWORTH. What about tea and coffee?

Mr. McMULLEN. When my hon. friend gets cornered in one place, he flies to another.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I have to do that to follow you.

Mr. McMULLEN. In this country we have four sources from which we may expect to develop this country, to increase its population, and to make our people happy and comfortable: these are our fisheries, our forests, our fields, and our mines. These are the four sources from which we have to draw what will enable us to get rid of our national debt, reduce our expenses, and make our people prosperous. None of these four sources have received any benefit from the operation of the National Policy; they have been virtually overlooked and forgotten. Their interests have not been considered to the same extent as the interests of the manufacturers. Why, Sir, to-day we have a fast steamship line running from Vancouver to Australia and subsidized to the extent of $125,000 a year. We have recently sent Mr. Larke to Australia at a cost of $3,000 a year, in addition to living allowances. What has he gone to do? Is he going to accomplish anything for the farmers of this country? Is the prosperity of the farming industry of Canada going to be promoted by the establishment of a trade agency in Australia? I do not think anyone is foolish enough to think so. The sending of Mr. Larke there is virtually money wasted, apart from the interests of the manufacturers. We have already sent some manufactured products to Australia. The First Minister went there, at considerable cost to this country, for the purpose of promoting the business of our manufacturers. I carefully read all the speeches he delivered during his absence from Canada, and I could not find a single word that he uttered in favour of the interests of the farmers of this country. Their interests were not considered, nor are they considered to-day, and there is no hope that anything will be accomplished there from a farmers' standpoint. I contend that the subsidy to that steamship line should be abandoned, unless it can be shown that something more substantial will be accomplished than we have experienced in the past. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish further to continue the debate; but before I close I want to emphasize what I have already said with regard to the necessity of reducing our annual expenditure. I believe the time has fully come when Ministers should at once frankly state that very considerable reductions must be made. The people of this country cannot afford to continue the present condition of things, and there is no possible escape from the heavy burdens to which we are now subjected except by the practice of rigid economy in the public expenditure. What the people of this country require is to be severely let alone. What they want is a tariff that will exact from them only what is necessary to meet the demands of the treasury. We want a tariff that will not take money out of one man's pocket and put it into the pocket of another man without a consideration in return. We want a tariff that will enable people to live without being fleeced and robbed, as I contend they have been by the tariff we have had in this country during the last fifteen years. It has created millionaires in Montreal and Toronto, it has made sugar kings and cotton lords; but it has robbed the masses of the people and pauperized the farmers and working classes. There is not a farmer in this country to-day who will not find, if he puts his hand in his pocket, that his condition is not as good as it was years ago. To whom does this country belong, anyway? To the sugar kings and the cotton lords; to be utilized for the purpose of keeping the Tory party in power? No, Sir; and I hope that the people of this country will rise in their might and pronounce in favour of reforms, which have to be made if they are going to escape their present troubles, and that they will install in office men imbued with ideas that will tend to promote the people's interests and permit them to sell in markets where they will get a lucrative price for what they have to sell, and to buy in the cheapest market, restricted only by the necessities of such a revenue as will meet the demands of an economical expenditure.

Mr. NORTHROP. Mr. Speaker, since this debate has commenced, as day has followed day and speaker has succeeded speaker, I have been waiting, as I am sure this House and the country have been waiting, to hear from hon. gentlemen opposite a fair discussion and comparison of the financial policies which at the present time are or should be before the people of this country. I understand, Sir, that in a Budget speech, the Finance Minister is supposed to lay before this House, and through this House before the country, the financial policy of the Government; and I presume that when hon. gentlemen opposite take the course they have taken, and properly taken, on this occasion, of introducing an amendment to the motion to go into Committee of Ways and Means, that was the time for them to lay their financial policy before this House and before the country. Now, it seems to me, with all due respect to hon. gentlemen opposite, that in their discussion of this question, they have very carefully avoided saying one single word which could enable this House or the people of this country to form the slightest conception of what their policy is. This, it may be said, is a natural sequence of the policy they have pursued in years gone by. We know that in the great Liberal convention which was held in the city of Ottawa only two years ago, a financial policy was adopted, which was drafted in such terms that a jury of Philadelphia lawyers could not discover what it meant; and the amendment before the House at this very moment is drawn in such terms that the hon. gentleman who drew it must know that not one man in the Dominion of Canada could put an exact and definite meaning on the words he there uses.

Mr. McMULLEN.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is the matter with it?

Mr. NORTHROP. I will tell the hon. gentleman what is the matter with it; and when the difficulty is pointed out, I hope these hon. gentlemen will, as honest men, endeavour to explain it to this House, and also endeavour to explain the policy which for years past they have been trying to place before the people of this country. If we read the amendment moved by the hon. member for South Oxford, we will find that the whole gist of his amendment depends on the meaning to be given the words of tariff for revenue. He says:

It is expedient that, in making provision "to restore the equilibrium between revenue and expenditure," as recommended in the Speech from the Throne, the existing tariff be so modified that it may be made a tariff for revenue only.

I say here, in all sincerity, and with the consciousness of what I am saying, that no living man who has studied political economy in any school under the sun, would pretend to attach any precise, definite meaning of the words "tariff for revenue only." If the works on economy are not clear and conclusive on that point, the very utterances of hon. gentlemen opposite will convince us that they do not attach any definite, precise meaning to the term, because hardly any two of them so far have agreed as to what it does mean. If we examine into it, we find there is a certain technical meaning to be properly attached to those words, and also a meaning which, in common colloquial phrase, has been attached to the expression, and there is a third meaning which hon. gentlemen opposite are endeavouring to attach to it and which is not found anywhere. What is the meaning of tariff for revenue? Using the term in its technical sense, it is a tariff which levies duties exclusively on articles not made at home. That is one meaning of tariff for revenue. Then there is another definition: "or which compensates the duties on articles made at home by equal excise duties on the home production."

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Where does the hon. gentleman get that definition?

Mr. NORTHROP. Where it would be probably better for the hon. gentleman to look for definitions—in scientific works.

Mr. CHARLTON. What scientific work?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Give the work and the page where you got that definition?

Mr. NORTHROP. I accept the hon. gentleman's challenge, and before the debate is concluded he shall have the book in his hands with the page marked.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Give it now.

Mr. NORTHROP. Having accepted the challenge of the hon. gentleman, I am entitled to the promise in return that he will do me the courtesy of reading the work, studying it and trying to understand it. In addition to these meanings, for there are two meanings to the expression tariff for revenue, hon. gentlemen opposite have attached other meanings to it. Take the hon. member for South Oxford, who moved this amendment, and who should be supposed to know what is meant by the term. He explains to us :

I am not going for one moment to conceal from the House the fact that a considerable customs tariff must be enacted for some time to come, but it must be a just tariff, it must be no tangled mass of dishonest absurdities like the one under my hand ; it must be something which is fairly and honestly framed for the purpose of bringing revenue into the treasury, and not at the dictation of a protected manufacturers' association, for the purpose of enabling them to divide with the Government the plunder unjustly obtained from the people.

No person desirous of ascertaining the views of the mover of the motion, and seeking to discover those views from his language, could possibly say what particular line of fiscal legislation the hon. member for South Oxford intended to suggest, because any line of legislation which any hon. member would like to suggest could properly be described in those words. If we turn to the speech of the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) who spoke the other day, in support of the amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford, we find him telling us, replying to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals :

Sixteen years should not have entirely obliterated from his mind the policy which was in vogue in this country prior to that when we had a tariff for revenue. That policy was in vogue when confederation was formed, it was continued for six years under a Conservative Government, and for another five years under a Reform Administration. Surely, the hon. gentleman cannot have forgotten that, and surely he must remember that it is the policy which he and his friends are so fond of contrasting in its effects with their own policy. Sir, it was held by the Reform party at that time, as it is to day, that to depart from the principles which then guided us in fiscal matters, and to adopt a protective policy, would be a mistake.

The hon. member for South Brant attaches to the words tariff for revenue, just such a tariff as we had from 1873 to 1878. But every one knows that if you put on a duty, be it 1 per cent or 50 per cent, on any article manufactured in this country, the duty is to that extent protective. It is idle for hon. gentlemen opposite, who raised the scale of duties from 15 to 17½ per cent—and who raised it indiscriminately and without appreciating how they might at the same time assist the country while increasing the revenue—it is idle for them to contend that a policy such as that is not in one sense a protective policy, inasmuch as every imposition of duty on the manufactured article is a protective duty. Another gentleman, who appears to stand high in the councils of hon. gentlemen opposite—the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin)—gave us his understanding of these words “revenue for tariff only.” It will be found on page 954 of the unrevised “Hansard.” He said :

I say that the policy of the Liberal party, so far as the tariff is concerned, is the policy of Canada as it was in the Conservative period from 1868 to 1873, and as it was in the Liberal period from 1874 to 1878. I have said myself to the people of the North-west Territories, that the Liberal party have made a pledge that, when they came into power, every vestige of protection would disappear from the tariff. I meant by that statement that I understood the Liberal leaders meant that, where there is an item of taxation, the effect of which is protective only, or so far as it is protective only, that is, to exclude exports, that such would be done away with.

Then he continued :

The Liberal party intend to raise a revenue by a tariff for revenue, and where a tariff for revenue has the effect of giving protection to those industries which are suited to Canada.

Evidently the reporter, or the printer, left something out here.

Reference was made by the Minister of Militia to an old speech delivered by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), in which he stated it was his policy to encourage industries natural to the country. That is still the policy of the Liberal party.

Then we have the hon. leader of the Opposition touring throughout the country not very long ago. He is reported to have said, and he has never contradicted the statement :

His idea of the policy of the Reform party was free trade as they have it in England.

Well, free trade as they have it in England, would be in no way inconsistent with the amendment to go into Supply, moved by the hon. member for South Oxford. Hon. gentlemen opposite are, at least on this ground, entitled to be called the Liberal party. So liberal are they in their views of fiscal legislation that they will admit any one into their ranks, no matter what he may believe in or what he may say, provided he does not believe in the National Policy. When hon. gentlemen opposite accuse members on this side of being wedded to protection, and then give all sorts of definitions of the meaning they attach to the word “protection,” they are not treating this House or the country fairly. The Conservative party have been before the country for years, and its policy should be well understood. We know well that in the case of protection as well as free trade, or tariff for revenue, different meanings are attached to the same term, and we find hon. gentlemen opposite attaching to protection a meaning not given by hon. gentlemen on this side, and then blaming us for the consequences. They have stated that the late Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald was opposed to the policy which has been and is still, and will be for years to come, the policy of this country. We have been told again and again that the right hon. gentleman was not in favour of a policy such as that at present imposed on this country. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand an address by him to his supporters in Kingston, published in 1861. In this address, he gives quotations from different speeches he made throughout the land, showing that at that time he was thoroughly in accord with the policy now in force in this country. At page 8, in referring to what had been done by the Government of the day in regard to fiscal legislation, he says :

We have, however, readjusted the tariff on imported articles so as to secure a sufficient revenue, and at the same time, incidentally, to encourage home manufactures. The success of our policy in this respect is already shown by the numerous manufactories of every description which have sprung up in both sections of the province.

Looking through this little book I find, at page 61—I give the page in case the hon. member for Queen's may be anxious to see this book—Sir John Macdonald spoke at a dinner in Hamilton, and on that occasion he said :

It is, as I have often said before, useless to discuss the abstract principles of free trade and protection, but it is a matter for consolation that the tariff has been so adjusted as incidentally to encourage manufacturing industries here. I hope all will see the advantages of a home market. * * * If we were altogether an agricultural country, we should be dependent for the value of our produce on the quantity of the harvest on the Baltic and Black seas. As it is, when we have attained our full development, we shall not be so. Manufactories are springing up, east and west, and I hope this great commercial city will see the advantage of encouraging them.

In the same speech, he refers to the protest which was made by a number of Sheffield cutlers against the scale of duties. The objection of the Sheffield people was as follows :—

The merchants and manufacturers of Sheffield have no wish to obtain special exception for themselves, and do not complain that they are called upon to pay the same duty as the American or the German, neither do they claim to have their goods admitted free of duty. All they ask is that the policy of protection to native manufacturers in Canada should be distinctly discountenanced by Her Majesty's Government, as a system condemned by reason and experience, directly contrary to the policy solemnly adopted by the mother country, and calculated to breed disunion and distrust between Great Britain and her colonies.

It goes on to say :

It cannot be regarded as less than indecent and a reproach that, while for fifteen years the Government, the greatest statesmen, and the press of this country have been not only advocating, but practising, the principles of free trade, the Government of one of her most important colonies should have been advocating monopoly and protection.

Again, in a speech made at St. Catharines, and referred to in the same work, he says :

Some of you will be surprised to hear that we have not raised the taxation higher than it was during the time of Mr. Hincks. We have, however, readjusted the tariff, reducing the duties on articles of necessity and raw materials and increasing those on what is required for home manufacturing—this being a direct encouragement to our artisans and mechanics. It is as if there had been half a dollar duty on a hat and half a dollar on a silk necktie, whereas there are now three-quarters of a dollar on a hat and one-quarter on a silk necktie ; thus protecting the maker of hats, which we can manufacture in this country, and letting the consumer have his silk necktie cheaper, which we cannot produce.

These utterances by Sir John Macdonald were along the same line as his utterances as long ago as 1846, when, in the Parliament of that day, he urged the support of a Government resolution calling for the adoption of a differential scale of duties on manufactures of leather on the ground that the measure was a protective one, and, as such, deserved unanimous support. So that we see that as long ago as 1846 and 1860, Sir John Macdonald was in favour of what has been called a protective policy. But, Sir, while it is said that the policy supported by gentlemen on this side of the House is a policy of protection, again, I object to this as a most misleading term. As I understand, Sir, a policy might be protective even though there were no tariff ; for, under a scale of bonuses we may seek to assist and encourage any home manufacture. That, certainly, is not the style of protection we have at the present time. A policy would be protective, Sir, if the duties were imposed upon goods simply for the purpose of encouraging the manufacture of these goods in the country, utterly irrespective of the revenue of the country. But that is not the policy advocated by the Government of the day. Sir, the policy that has been laid before the people of this country, and again and again approved by the people, is a policy that does not insist or suggest levying one cent of taxation upon the people for the protection of any manufacturer in this country. But the Government, recognizing that a certain amount of revenue must be raised, without desiring to increase that revenue, desire to collect it in such a way that the collection shall injure as little as possible, and assist as much as possible, the various manufacturing interests of this country. Now, when hon. gentlemen opposite speak of this subject of the National Policy as they have been doing for the last few days, it seems to me that the references that they make to the state of affairs existing within the last few years, as compared with the state of affairs existing from 1874 to 1878, are not wholly fair, and are, in some sense, misleading. We know that in the years between 1874 and 1878 there was a depression the world over; and it is worse than idle for the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), an ex-Finance Minister, to stand up in this House and ask us in heroic terms, if we blame him for the depression that then existed in the United States. No, Sir, we are not so hard up for arguments as that? but I can tell him what we do blame him for. We say that between 1874 and 1878 there was a depression the world over, and, among other countries, Canada suffered. And we say that at that time, something might have been done to assist the struggling industries of Canada, and we blame him that nothing was done. And we say that hon. gentlemen opposite had not even the excuse of invincible ignorance for their conduct, because they were told again and again what was required, not only by those outside of this House, but by those in this House, and not only from the opposition benches, but from the ranks of their own supporters. We know that at that time the farmers of this country, in whom hon. gentlemen now take such an interest, sent a mammoth petition containing, I believe, some hundred thousand signatures, praying for the protection of the farming interests of this country. And we know that all the satisfaction the petitioners got, and all the assistance they received was a gentle intimation from the Finance Minister practically to the effect that they could work harder, eat less, and wear cheaper clothes, and thereby they could, perhaps, attain the prosperity they desired. And the manufacturers represented to the Government and the Finance Minister that, from one end of the land to the other, factories were being closed, and industries prostrated. And all the assistance they received was a hint to betake themselves to a locality where, by all accounts, manufactured goods would require insurance immediately on their arrival. And not only by outsiders, not only by the leader of the Opposition, at that time, but by the very gentlemen who sat behind the Government of the day, it was pointed out that the policy then existing was a failure, that something could be done, and that that something was the adoption of a system of protection. I do not intend to take up the time of the House in reading long extracts from the speeches of these gentlemen. But I think that when gentlemen opposite, when discussing the state of affairs between 1873 to 1878, as compared with that of the last four or five years, declined to face the fact that the leaders of the Reform party, having the means of remedy suggested to them were unwilling to adopt them; when we find, as I shall show, that the leaders of the Government of the present day did adopt means to protect the people, and when we find that the results were just as it was said they would be—then we have a right to blame hon. gentlemen opposite for having done nothing. If they would not listen to the people of the country, to the farmers and manufacturers, they might, at least, have listened to leading men in the ranks of their own supporters. Why, Sir, here in "Hansard" for 1875, page 840—I give the page for the benefit of my hon. friend who is so precise in relation to some statistics and so grossly careless about others—I find the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) advised the Government to this effect:

It may be safely assumed that no nation has attained to greatness in commerce or manufactures without having, in the course of its history, imposed exactions and restrictions, notably the case of Great Britain. When industries are adapted to the land, it is the duty of the Government to protect them.

He proceeds to give reasons for protection, saying that arts and manufactures do not spring up readily on a virgin soil; that trade has a tendency to remain in beaten tracks; that advantage is on the side of a nation where manufacturers are established, because money is more easily obtained than in a new country; that possession of organized and skilled labour in a country where manufactures long existed, is an advantage that such country possesses over a new country. He goes on to say:

I believe that the agricultural interests of the Dominion would be promoted by protection, and that the manufacturer, being brought to the door of the farmer, would afford a market for a great many articles of produce that would not be saleable if the market were three thousand miles away. With a home market established by protection to manufacturers, the farmer can benefit his soil by a rotation of crops.

He then answers the objection that protection prevents foreign commerce, by referring to the domestic trade of the United States in 1875, as computed at 200,000,000 tons, valued at $10,000,000,000. He then went on to say:

They had heard a great deal said about protection vs. free trade, but that was not the issue at the present time. The issue was as to the relative degrees of protection it would be proper to afford our industries. We have now what some considered an efficient protection, and what others claimed to be insufficient.

So the hon. gentleman at that day was prepared to lay before the House and before his leaders, as strong a protectionist opinion as could be expressed even by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean). But he did not stand alone by any means. There was an hon. gentleman at that time who represented South Brant. The name is the same as that of the hon. gentleman who to-day so worthily represents that important riding, but the identity cannot be the same, the opinions are so dissimilar. I find that the hon. gentleman representing South

Brant in 1878, spoke to this effect, as appears at page 110 of "Hansard":

I hold that the position is impregnable! that there is a duty other than the collection of revenue devolving on a Minister of Finance. Let us look for a moment at the article of boots and shoes. Within my own recollection almost all these goods were imported from the United States, and I remember that when the tariff was raised to 10 per cent, a great stimulus was given to that branch of our industry which now finds employment for tens of thousands of persons. I am not one of those who believe in erecting a wall so high that you cannot trade with any other country, but I must admit I am in favour of a defensive policy. I cannot view with complacency what we see in this country.

You see, Mr. Speaker, how the change of position will sometimes affect an hon. gentleman's mind.

We live beside a country with a population ten times greater than ours, whose industries have been fostered by protection until they are enabled, even in some articles in which Britain excels, to challenge supremacy with her. While that nation has erected against us and other countries a hostile tariff, we have our hands bound, and give them a free and unrestricted right to trade in our markets. The other year, the Minister of Finance, in revising our tariff, gave some encouragement to our industry that it never had before. The result was that a thousand men who were engaged in that industry in Germany, were literally transported by the tariff, to Canada, and set to work here.

Gratifying as was the addition to the population, and gratifying as it was to the hon. gentlemen opposite to have that addition to the population, mark this—I give my hon. friend as my authority—for he continued:

The cost of the article was not increased one iota.

It might seem puzzling, but there was an explanation, and the hon. gentleman, with his usual astuteness, gave it.

The middlemen suffered a diminution of profits, but for them no one seems to care much. It is inevitable that a like result would flow to other manufacturers under the same policy. If the Minister of Finance finds that such is the case, I trust that the wisdom—

"Wisdom," not folly, mark you, but "wisdom."

—which led him to yield that point, will induce him to grant the same to other industries, and that no sectionalism will tie his hands.

At page 186 of the same report—

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Will the hon. gentleman please answer one question. What Minister of Finance did that?

Mr. NORTHRUP. It is a matter of utter indifference to me, because, as a matter of fact—

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It was the hon. member for South Oxford who accomplished that.

Mr. NORTHRUP.

Mr. NORTHRUP. So I would have thought.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What year was that?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). When he made that change he has alluded to.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But you asked him to make still further changes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I asked him to make them in the same direction, to bring in more people here, but not to raise the tariff.

Mr. NORTHRUP. In the year 1876, protection was the only reasonable policy for the Minister of Finance, and when the Minister of Finance did take the advice of the hon. member for South Brant, he praised him for doing it, and hoped that he would go still further. But times change, and we change with them.

Mr. CHARLTON. I ask the privilege to make a correction.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no; sit down.

Mr. CHARLTON. As a matter of fairness, I ask for the opportunity to make an explanation.

Mr. NORTHRUP. I have no desire to prevent the hon. gentleman making any correction, with the consent of the House. I am perfectly willing.

Mr. CHARLTON. If I am allowed to do so—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order; sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER. What is the point of order?

Mr. CHARLTON. I asked to be allowed to make a correction. The hon. gentleman who is speaking, has permitted me to do so, but the leaders of the House do not propose to allow it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman can only rise to make a personal explanation.

Mr. CHARLTON. So I do.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What is the explanation?

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman has quoted certain words from my speech delivered in 1876, and I ask the privilege of giving the concluding and qualifying portion of that speech, in a few words. These concluding words are as follows:—

Mr. OUIMET. The hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Northrup) is quoting from a speech delivered by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and it is to be presumed that he is quoting it correctly.

Mr. CHARLTON. I only want to say this—

Mr. OUMET. If the hon. gentleman can state that the hon. member for Hastings is not quoting his words as they are printed in the "Hansard," that fact might give rise to a personal explanation, it might give rise to a contradiction or denial. But it is preposterous for the hon. member for North Norfolk to ask the hon. member for Hastings to quote the whole of his speech. The hon. member for Norfolk will have a chance to explain afterwards.

Mr. LAURIER. There may be something after all in allowing the hon. member for North Norfolk an opportunity to explain his speech, as my hon. friend opposite explained one of his speeches the other day.

Mr. OUMET. Well, you might explain yours, too.

Mr. LAURIER. As soon as you speak, I will be prepared to speak.

Mr. OUMET. You will speak in good time.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for North Norfolk has not yet spoken upon the question before the House, and, of course, he will have an opportunity later on to make any qualifying explanation in regard to his speech delivered in 1876.

Mr. LAURIER. Pardon me. It has always been allowed to any hon. member to interrupt the speaker, and to make a correction, with the consent of the hon. gentleman who has the floor. This is the first time that right has been denied.

Mr. FOSTER. I beg your pardon. A moment ago when the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) was speaking, the hon. member for Monck (Mr. Boyle) rose to a personal explanation, and the other side of the House howled him down.

Mr. McMULLEN. No; he sat down.

Mr. SPEAKER. My view with reference to a personal explanation is this: An hon. member who has already spoken upon a question before the House, if his statements are misquoted or misunderstood by a subsequent speaker, would have a right, with the indulgence of the House, either at the moment, if the speaker chooses then to give him the opportunity, or when the hon. member in possession of the floor concludes, to make the personal explanation.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We might as well settle the point now. There is a vast difference between correcting a misquotation or a mis-statement, and reading the balance of a speech to which an hon. member referred.

Mr. LAURIER. That altogether depends on the speech and the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. BERGIN. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) did not, at the time the quotation was made from his speech, make any objection at all.

Mr. CHARLTON. I sent for "Hansard."

Mr. BERGIN. An objection was taken to a quotation made by the hon. member for Hastings from the speech of the hon. member for South Brant, and the questions were answered. Some time after that the hon. member for North Norfolk interrupted.

Mr. CHARLTON. So soon as I obtained "Hansard."

Mr. BERGIN. The hon. gentleman interrupted the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Northrup), and I ruled that he was out of order.

Mr. CHARLTON. I rose at the moment I obtained the "Hansard."

Mr. NORTHRUP. When this interruption occurred, I was taking the liberty of instructing the House as to the views of political economy which prevailed in 1876. At page 186 of "Hansard," I find it was laid down by the hon. member for South Brant, as follows:—

At the last election, when my opponents told them that they need not expect any protection from the Reform Government, I had to assure them that, whenever this subject came up in the House, I would raise my voice in their behalf.

I am sure every hon. member will frankly and unhesitatingly admit that if the voice of the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) had been raised in this Chamber, or within any reasonable distance beyond this Chamber, we would have heard it. That hon. gentleman also pointed out that in any attempt to gain American markets he would have something to give. At page 646, he is reported to have said:

Eight days before the tariff was introduced he had spoken regarding the appointment of the Depression of Trade Commission, and he took the ground that it was the duty of the Minister of Finance in the introduction of a tariff, to see what industries could be cultivated, what was already established, whether any were being crushed out, and whether any could be successfully fostered. If he thought the Ministry were going to retrograde in regard to incidental protection and sweep away the duties, he would withdraw his confidence, but they had no intimation that such a step was contemplated, and, in point of fact, the contrary was announced.

It is just possible it might still be urged by the Finance Minister of those days that although the hon. member for South Brant raised his voice in the House on the subject, he had not been heard, so I take the liberty of appealing to the utterances of the ex-Finance Minister to show that he, too, had heard something about this legalized robbery, as it is now declared to be, the principle of protection. The ex-Finance Minister, in 1876, page 241 of the "Hansard," said :

It may be well before going further to offer a few observations on the causes of the prevailing depression, which we all deplore. I do not propose at this present moment to enter fully into the discussion raised as to Canada being a sacrifice or slaughter market, but I must admit candidly and honestly—

The hon. gentleman distinguished the sense in which he spoke on that day from the manner of statement he usually made :

—that I have no doubt that the distress of the manufacturers has been aggravated—I will not say to what extent—by this cause. I do not entirely agree with those gentlemen who maintain that there is no ground for the champions for the protectionist party. I have always myself been of the opinion that in a new country like this there is considerable force in the argument that it is not well to allow ourselves to depend exclusively upon foreign manufactures, and if we do, there is some chance that we may be supplied with a mere refuse exportation. As to the curious argument made by the protectionists, that, if our manufacturing friends are sufficiently protected, it will not increase the cost of the consumer, as sufficient competition will arise to cut down prices so low that we will be just as well off as under the present tariff, I have simply this to say, that I think in time the result would be produced, but I also think it would take time, and during that period a few gentlemen would make large fortunes, while the rest of the community would have to pay an enormous price for that benefit. Neither do I wish to lose sight of the fair-play which is due to our manufactures. It is undoubtedly a hardship that they should be excluded from the markets of the United States, while our tariff enable American manufacturers to compete with them in ours, or, as it is called, slaughter our goods here. Theory apart, there are very few others who would object to a moderately low rate of duty, or would care much to be found opposing a tariff, though in defiance of free trade theories, which would bring a large addition of population to the country at a very moderate cost to the remainder of the population. In concluding, I might say, Sir, that I am exceedingly sorry that I have been obliged to differ in opinion with some friends whom I value highly. I admit that there was considerable force in the arguments they employed. Undoubtedly, a great deal of distress exists among certain classes and in certain parts of this country, and I regret exceedingly that the Government have not been able to see their way to relieve this distress, except at the risk of inflicting ultimately very great and permanent injury on the whole population of Canada.

I think the leader of the Opposition has no particular reason to be ashamed of his utterances in 1871 and in 1876, when he declared he was a protectionist, that had he been living in England he would have been a free trader, but, as Canada was his home, he was a protectionist ; he had no reason to regret those utterances, or to apologize for them when he found himself in such excellent company at that date when he held those opinions. But the reason I spoke of those opinions was simply this : That the subject which is now engaging, or should now engage the attention of the House is the most important question before this Parliament, the regulation of our fiscal matters, and, at such a time it was the duty of every legislator to endeavour, to the best of his ability, be it great or small, to contribute something to the settlement of this vexed question ; and we on this side of the House have the right to demand of hon. gentlemen opposite, who, a few years ago, declared themselves to be diametrically opposed to the views they entertain to-day—not to accuse them of dishonesty because they changed their views, not to accuse them of stupidity because they differ from us—that, as a matter of fair-play, they should give the reasons, for there surely must be reasons, for that change. And that is the reason why, at the opening of my remarks, I complained that I had not heard one word from any hon. member opposite in defence or explanation of the arguments they had advanced some eighteen or nineteen years ago. We would be deemed presumptuous and impertinent if we suggested that hon. gentlemen standing so high in the councils of a great political party had changed their views without some reason. We would be called to order if we suggested the reasons that prompted the change, but if hon. gentlemen opposite dare not state them, they cannot complain if, recognizing the undoubted probability of the existence of such reasons for the change, we should ask them to give us the benefit of the reasons which undoubtedly caused them to make this change, since, peradventure, thereby we, too, might follow their example, and enter into the broad light of day in which they now live.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Who has changed ?

Mr. NORTHROP. One thing is clear,—who have not changed. In the days I have referred to, between 1873 and 1878, when an appeal was made to the Government to assist in developing manufactures, the reply was given that nothing could be done, and nothing was done. The Conservative party at that time declared that something could be done ; and the proper question to consider is whether the reasons that existed in 1878, which led an overwhelming majority of the people to support the adoption of the National Policy, still exist, or whether changed circumstances have arisen, so that the reasons which, at that time, were good, no longer prevail. Looking at the facts of the distress in the years between 1873 and 1878, what were the obvious difficulties under which the country then laboured ? It was admitted by hon. gentlemen opposite, in the extracts I have quoted from their speeches, that one great difficulty was the existence of the slaughter market, which had destroyed our manufactures. Now, the slaughter market also affected our farmers, and it being admitted that an injury was being done to manufacturers and farmers—admitted by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), who said he would oppose the Government if they endeavoured to remove the protection they had then given—and recognizing the existence of these evils, what could the Government do? “Nothing,” said one side; “something,” said the other; and something was done by the Conservative party, and the question now is: Was it effectively done or not? There being a slaughter market, as was admitted by the Finance Minister of the day, the question arose: Whether it was not better to get rid of that slaughter market? and by putting up a customs duty we did get rid of it. And so, when the next wave of depression struck the country in 1891, whatever other difficulties we had to contend with, at all events, we escaped that difficulty, in that we had no slaughter market which tended to the injury of our farmers and manufactories. I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite will stand by one thing which they said once or twice within the memory of hon. gentlemen present, and that is: That the population of this country was not increasing in those days at the rate they liked to see it increase, and that, in fact, during the Liberal Administration there was an exodus of the able-bodied men from this country. The Government, thinking on this subject again, had an opportunity of laying down a principle which would get rid of this trouble. Here was the remarkable fact that able-bodied men were leaving the country, and the question arose: Can anything be done to keep the people in the country? The first question was: Why were they leaving? some going to farming in the Western States, others going to work in American factories, and others seeking the advantages they believed existed in the large cities of the United States. Here, then, we saw the evil, and we also saw the cause. How was the evil to be removed, and the answer came: By giving the young men of Canada equally good and cheap lands within this country, and under our own flag; by building up manufactories in this country, so that those who were compelled to go to the other side of the line to work in factories could work in similar factories at home, and by so doing, we found that we would be able to build up cities in this land, so that here too we would have, as it were, a magnet to attract those who were enterprising and desirous of the advantages of city life, without making it compulsory for them to go to the large cities of the American republic. What was done by the Conservative Government? Is it not well known that by opening up the North-west—a scheme which hon. gentlemen opposite do not seem to be able fully to decide, to this day, whether they wish to claim credit for or not—is it not well known, I ask, that by opening up the North-west we furnished cheap farms for our people? Many hon. gentlemen sitting in this House know friends and acquaintances who are out in our Canadian North-west, and they know thousands of people who left the older province of Ontario, who are now settled in the North-west, and who would have been settled in the Western States had not our own western country been opened up to them. I do not intend to occupy the time of the House by quoting figures to show this, because they have been quoted time and again. The wonderful growth of our factories shows that employment has been provided for hundreds of thousands of people in Canada, who otherwise would have been compelled to go to the United States. The growth of our cities throughout the length and breadth of the land—a growth complained of by hon. gentlemen opposite, and somewhat regretted by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, owing to one of the causes which leads to it—has given an opportunity to the enterprising young man to find a suitable forum within our bounds in which to exercise the abilities with which heaven has blessed him. The evils and difficulties existed during the regime of the Liberal Government and nothing was done to remove them. The Conservative party found that the National Policy professed to be able to remove these difficulties. We claim that it did remove these difficulties, and we say, looking at the depression of the last four years, that the particular incidents of that depression which were most conspicuous and most objectionable between 1874 and 1878, did not exist in Canada during the last four or five years. Therefore, we join in asking the people of this country to stand by a policy that has done what it was promised it would do, and we ask them to open their own eyes, and to see for themselves the practical fruit of that policy, instead of discrediting it merely on account of reckless assertions by members of the Opposition, assertions which are generally made without the slightest atom of truth in them. Now, Sir, if there is one theme more than another which hon. gentlemen opposite grow eloquent upon, it is on what they call the woes of the unfortunate agricultural classes under this policy. If I held the same views as hon. gentlemen opposite, it seems to me the deepest source of regret that I would have is that the agriculturists of this country are so stupid, that suffering all these woes they do not seem to know it, because when the opportunity is afforded them at the polls of overthrowing or supporting this policy, in the overwhelming majority of cases this policy is triumphantly supported even in agricultural districts. But, Sir, as a matter of fact, and trying to look at the subject dispassionately, let me ask: Has the Government done anything or not for the farming classes? The last speaker (Mr. McMullen) referred to the great advantage it would have been to the farming classes of Canada if they could have had the American market. He intimated, although he did not say it in so many words, that if hon. gentlemen opposite had been in power, our farmers would have been enjoying this great American market of sixty millions of people for the last few years. Now, was there anything that occurred in the course of the reciprocity negotiations that were undertaken when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, which would give a colour of support to his statement? Was there any result that flowed from these negotiations to lead the people of this country to be so perfectly sure that the mere fact of the Liberal party undertaking the negotiations was a guarantee of success? No, Sir, the statement is as absurd as the story of the "sixty millions market" for our farmers. The changes have been rung on the American market of sixty millions from one end of the country to the other, and yet, if hon. gentlemen only pause for one moment to reflect, they will fail to see where, in the United States, the farmers of Canada could ever find a sixty million market. Why, half the population of the United States are farmers, and therefore at one single stroke and at one fell swoop, off go thirty millions of that market. The farmer of Canada is not more likely to sell to the farmer of the United States, than he is to sell to his own next door neighbour, and yet hon. gentlemen of the Liberal party in their desire to increase the advantage of this wonderful policy of theirs, have pointed, without a blush, to the "sixty million market" for our farmers to be found in the United States. Apart from the thirty millions which have been wiped out from the calculation, let me ask: how many states there are in the American union, which, because of their geographical position, the farmers of Canada cannot send any of their products to? That consideration is altogether apart from the well-known objection that those who have similar products to sell are not apt to make money dealing with one another. When hon. gentlemen refer to the condition of the farmers, and refer to the fancy market to the south of us—on reflection the hon. gentlemen will see that it is a "fancy" market because it exists only in their own fancy—it might not be out of place to remind the House of what the Government has done for the farmers of this country. We know that one of the reasons that always has been given for the National Policy, and one of the reasons which has been verified by experience, is of course the number of hands that are employed in the various manufacturing, and who are fed by the farmers of this country. I do not intend to occupy time by referring at length to that. Sir, I do not myself know of any class in the community which has had so much done for its welfare, as a class, as that class which has experimental farms, for their benefit, scattered throughout the land. How is the condition of the farmer to be improved in this country? We all know that many an enterprising farmer with all the ambition and energy and push desirable, lacks the means to undertake those experiments which are necessary to successfully improve his mode of cultivation. Then, Sir, this Government steps in, and with the money of the people of this country, freely given for such a purpose, it makes these experiments which the individual farmer cannot make for himself. Not to deal in theory or prophesying, but to look at the practical results we have before us at the present time, our farmers are directly benefited by the instructions they have received, by the seeds that have been distributed to them, and by the many ways in which the experimental farms, and dairies, and creamery factories, have assisted them in this country. A short time ago when the Government undertook to furnish a market,—as it were, to guarantee a market in the old country—for the sale of our butter, they were blamed for so doing by the supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite as if they had initiated a novel and unpardonable course. The same course was tried in New Zealand with the most gratifying results, and this Government now in power, always willing to borrow experience from good results—even willing to borrow experience from the Opposition—were prepared to follow the example of New Zealand which had been proved to be a success, and they thus have inaugurated a trade with the old country which may grow to great dimensions. We know that the cheese industry of this country has grown to an enormous extent, and we know, strange to say, that while it has been growing, the cheese industry on the other side of the line has not been growing. We cannot but connect the improvement in our cheese trade, and the improvement in our cattle exportation, and the improvement in the North-west Territories under which our farmers have bettered their condition; we cannot but connect all these with the wise policy which our Government has adopted. Now, Sir, there was one observation made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) that I have heard before, and it seems to me that it betrays a signal misconception of the real differences that lies between parties who hold opposite views on this particular question. He spoke about the removal of the restrictions on trade. Although it may sound strange to his ears—if he requires page and volume for my assertion, I can give it to him without doubt—although it may seem strange to his ears, yet those who are in favour of protection—and they may go much further in that than is necessary for hon. gentlemen to go to support the Government in their policy—those, I say, who are protectionists out and out, are just as much in favour of the removal of the restrictions on trade as any hon. gentleman opposite. The only difference between the two parties is that while one party recognizes restriction another party does not. Let me illustrate what I mean. If a farmer in my riding raises his crops and brings his crops and stock to the county town for sale, I suppose he goes there to trade, and he engages in the occupation of trading when he is selling his stock there. As one who supports the present policy of the Government, I say that anything that tended to hinder the carrying on of that trade, or placed a barrier between the producer and the consumer, would be a restriction upon that trade. If that barrier is in the shape of goods coming in from the United States and depriving our farmer of his home market, that is a restriction upon his trade just as much as any tariff restriction would be; and we on this side of the House recognize it as a restriction which ought to be removed. Suppose a gentleman in this country wants to start a woollen mill. He has to meet the competition of the woollen millers of the old country. He puts his goods on the market here, and anything that prevents his customers obtaining those goods is a restriction upon his trade. As a matter of fact, the difference in the rate of interest or the difference in the price paid for labour in the two countries gives the old-country manufacturer an advantage over the Canadian manufacturer. A difference in the cost of raw material, in consequence of the manufacturer there getting it in the morning and using it in the afternoon, while the manufacturer here has to get his raw material six months ahead, also gives the former an advantage. All these things are restrictions on trade which the Conservative party recognize as such, and are determined to remove. The great difference between hon. gentlemen opposite and us is that we are determined to remove restrictions from the trade of the people of Canada, while hon. gentlemen opposite seem determined to remove restrictions from the trade of outsiders. I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite will not dispute the statement that there are two ways, and, perhaps, only two ways, in which the Canadian market can be secured and maintained for the Canadian people. One way is by grinding down the wages of employees and the profits of capitalists, so that we can produce more cheaply in this country than any other country in the world; that is the way of hon. gentlemen opposite. Another way is to put up a tariff which will make outsiders who wish to come into this market pay something for the privilege; that is the Conservative way—the way in which we propose to keep our market for our own people. In fact, the difference between the two parties could be stated thus: The policy of the Reform party is, if possible, to make this country a cheap country to live in. Everything is subservient to that; that is the goal of all their ideas. If I understand the policy of the Conservative party, it is first and foremost and above everything else to see that for every Canadian throughout the length and breadth of the land, who is able and willing to do an honest day's work, there shall be an honest day's work to be done, and an honest day's wages to be paid. Hon. gentlemen opposite frequently find fault with us criticising this, that or the other detail of the National Policy. I take for granted that there is no gentleman on this side of the House who believes for one moment that the National Policy, or any other policy ever framed by any body of men, was an ideal piece of legislation. In all legislation there must be an infringement on some one's liberty. No large class can ever be benefited without someone being, in some way, injured, and I have no doubt that, from time to time, our experience of the working of the National Policy will show—sometimes because the facts were not thoroughly understood in the first place, sometimes because conditions have changed, sometimes because of new inventions, sometimes because of increased capital—for a thousand reasons—that changes should be made, as they were made a year or two ago, or that the protection should cease when the end aimed at is accomplished. The Government may change the incidents of the tariff while maintaining, all along, the underlying policy. But when changes are made, we are taunted by hon. gentlemen opposite that the making of these changes is an admission by the Government that the tariff was wrong from the very beginning. When I hear an argument of that kind, it appeals to me as one of the very strongest arguments in favour of the policy which I have the honour to support; and if hon. gentlemen opposite cannot discover a better argument than that, I think we on this side may fairly conclude that the National Policy is not as bad as it is painted. We have heard something, too, in the course of this discussion, about the fall in value of farm property throughout Canada. Now, I am not here to say that farm properties have not fallen in value; but I do say, and I say unhesitatingly, that farm values have not fallen one-tenth of what hon. gentlemen opposite say they have. Let me explain what I mean. We hear of a farm having been sold for $7,000 or $8,000, which, a few years ago, was worth $10,000. Suppose it was worth $10,000 a few years ago, the things which the value of that farm would then buy were correspondingly higher in price than they are to-day. We know that dollars are but the medium of exchange; and the man who, a few years ago, could sell his farm for $10,000, if he wished to-day to convert it into the various products which he required, would obtain just as much of those products for $7,000 or $8,000 in consequence of the reduction in prices which has since taken place. We must not forget, either, the extraordinary fall in the rate of interest which has taken place in this country, which itself makes a wonderful difference in the apparent values of many things. But hon. gentlemen opposite will continue to make the broad statement that farms have fallen in value so many dollars, and, therefore, that the National Policy is to blame. Now, as hon. gentlemen opposite have frequently spoken of the mother country as the ideal land, the land of free trade, I have taken the liberty of bringing here the report of a commission appointed by the Liberal Administration of Great Britain on the state of the agricultural depression which exists there, and the remedies asked by the farmers themselves to meet it; and this volume, which contains reports compiled by various commissioners, I commend to the study of hon. gentlemen opposite. Though it shows on every page the clear and avowed preference of the writers of free trade, yet, having been appointed to make a report, he was bound to report the facts as he found them. I refer first to the report on the Isle of Axholme and the Ongar, Chelmsford, Maldon, and Braintree districts of Essex, pages 13, 14, and 15: the commissioner reports:

The position into which it has been my duty to inquire is very peculiar and painful. It is peculiar, in that the mortgagees rarely foreclose so long as the interest is paid. They take what they can get, and add the arrears to the outstanding account. The fact of a man remaining undisturbed, although he may only have paid 2 instead of 4½ per cent for each of the last five years, does not save him in the future. It only means a big bill of arrears to be presented on the first favourable opportunity. Should times mend and agriculture once more become a flourishing industry, many a year's hard-earned profits must be paid over before the back dues are written off.

It is painful, in that the rent now due in the shape of interest, far exceeds what would be a fair rent. The people realize the hopelessness of their position, and most of them are in utter despair. The weight attached to the neck of many a freeholder in the Isle of Axholme is heavier than he can bear, and it is the general opinion that without assistance their position is doomed.

The continuation of agricultural depression from about 1877 till the present time has had one unmistakable result in this district. All connected with the industry are poorer, and their credit is gone. Farmers are loaded with debts to merchants, tradesmen and banks, and their rents are heavily in arrear. Landlords are sorely hit by the great and numerous reductions in rent, and in some cases are almost ruined; indeed, estates burdened in the good times do not now bring in sufficient even to pay interest on mortgages.

He gives one case from which you may judge many:

The owner of this estate, which is 3,500 acres in extent, has been compelled to take what rents the tenants could pay. He says: "If we had been strict to mark iniquity or insist upon payment of rent in full, hardly an old tenant would have been left on the estate. Our 1893 accounts are worse than ever. Plenty of land has been put up for sale of late, but can't be sold, unless for a mere trifle. Persons won't lend money now on landed security. Considering the bad payments of rents and the fact that taxes and rates must be paid, there is almost nothing left over for the estate owner."

But naturally finding this state of affairs, he inquired as to what remedies the people had to suggest; and just as in this country between 1873 and 1878, the people seemed to be a unit in their opinion of the remedy required so in England to-day—and I give the fact to hon. gentlemen opposite that they may take what profit from it they like—throughout the length and breadth of the country, the invariable reply of the suffering agriculturists is protection. I read from this report under the heading of "Summary of Complaints and Suggested Remedies":

There is one point on which the people are unanimous, and that is that the free importation of corn is one of the chief causes of depression.

Mr. FLINT. Will my hon. friend read any extracts in which they recommend a protective duty on these articles?

Mr. NORTHROP. I will give you a dozen before I get through. There is another report by the assistant commissioner in the counties of Oxford, Gloucester, Wilts and Berks and the neighbourhood of Taunton, Somerset. On page 30, he said:

There was only one opinion that I received, wherever I went, as to the cause of the depression. It is mainly caused by the general fall of prices owing to foreign imports, aggravated by unkindly seasons at home. This is the opinion firmly held by farmers in every locality, and I don't think any one can doubt its soundness.

As to the remedies suggested, we find on page 37:

Farmers throughout the districts which I have visited, recognizing the fact that it is to foreign importations that their misfortunes are mainly due, are very much in favour of some measure of protection which will tend to restrict this importation. It is said that agriculturists would be greatly benefited by a duty which would discourage the importation of flour. In support of this farmers point to the number of mills now disused, and the abandonment of which both cause a diminished demand for labour and makes it more difficult for the farmer to sell his corn than it used to be, for the local miller was his best customer.

That sounds like an extract from one of our campaign speeches. At Cincenster it was said:

If it were not for the two local mills still left, we should be unable to sell our wheat here at all.

In this same report this commissioner has given an extract from the "Spectator." The commissioner is himself a free trader, and a paper was handed to him to read, containing an extract from the "Spectator," a free trade journal, to which I would like to invite the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite. The writer says :

Perhaps the most distressing, depressing and discouraging feature is the feeling in favour of protection which is growing in strength, even among the more educated classes of the community.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. NORTHROP. When you left the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I was giving the House some extracts from the report of the agricultural commission appointed by the Liberal Administration in the old country to inquire into the depression at present existing in England and the causes thereof and the remedies suggested for its removal. I proceed to give an extract from another report made by the commissioner of the Andover district of Hampshire and the Maidstone district of Kent. On page 5, he says :

I made a point of asking all farmers whose experience had been of sufficient length, how the present crisis compared with that of 1879. The answer invariably was, that the existing depression is worse, far worse, than that of thirteen or fourteen years ago.

On page 7, he says :

In the area that came under my observation, I did not meet with a single exception to the rule that rents had been reduced during the past twelve years. In some cases these reductions had been so great that the tenants are practically keeping on their farms at their own rental. A large tenant farmer said to me : It has come to this. You may regard the land as practically of no value, and look upon the rent as merely covering the interest on the outlay on house and buildings.

Speaking of suggestions for the removal of this depression, on page 16, he says :

Only better seasons and improved prices can, it is argued, restore agriculture to a flourishing condition in this district. As the seasons are beyond control, the question remains, by what means can improved prices be established. The answer I received in nine cases out of ten, in all parts of the district, may be summed up in one word—protection.

On pages 27 and 28 of the same report, he says :

In seeking for a comparison between the existing depression and that of 1879-80, I was invariably told that matters are worse now than they were then.

As to the rents paid, on page 28, he says :

In some parts of the district, especially outside of the hop lands, very material reductions have been made in the rent.

On page 37, he thus speaks of the remedy suggested :

There is in the district a widespread, though by no means universal, feeling in favour of protection. It was argued that flour being a manufactured article—and one farmer maintained with considerable skill, that wheat also comes within this category—its importation in large quantities lessens the home demand for labour, besides diminishing the local value of home-grown wheat. Many millers in the district used more imported than home-made flour. Hence it was contended that the duty on flour would help the labourers. I was informed that it is a common practice for local millers to buy foreign flour in marked bags, mix it with some of their own grinding, and sell all as English flour.

In the report from the district of Somerset, on page 8, we find :

The farmers of this district do not, as a rule, keep count accurately, but there can be little doubt they have suffered loss during the past two years. Large farmers are said to have suffered most.

On page 10 :

I have heard, from various sources, of great loss caused by forced sale of cattle, dairy stock having been sold at an average of four pounds ten shillings per cow. Very considerable reductions in rent have been made in arable farms. In one case a farm of 1,300 acres, formerly rented at £800, has been reduced to £650 ; and another of 1,600 acres, which formerly let at £1,000, is now offered at £450.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That is blue ruin.

Mr. NORTHROP. Under free trade.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Under the British flag.

Mr. NORTHROP. I am very glad that our hon. friends have at least learned one lesson, and that is that blue ruin can exist under free trade. At page 12 :

Throughout the whole of the district I have no prominent example of a farmer who had succeeded in a much greater degree than his neighbours.

And here, also, when the remedy is asked for—page 13 :

In almost every reply I received, the chief causes of depression are attributed to low prices resulting from foreign competition and bad seasons, with consequent failure of corn and hay crops. For the latter no remedy but patience can be found, but the former is considered removable by a change in the fiscal system which would force the foreigner to pay a corresponding tax to that borne by the producer of home-grown corn and hay, by the maker of cheese, butter, &c., and by those engaged in every agricultural industry, which is now severely handicapped by the preference given to the foreigner. This, it is urged, should take the form of duty on all foreign manufactured articles, which would include flour, articles which cannot be produced in the United Kingdom being admitted free of duty. * * * It is pointed out that the imposition of a tax upon foreign flour would enable farmers to procure bran and offal at a much cheaper rate than at present, would give much employment to artisans, and help to re-instate the milling industry in England, where it is now practically ruined. At the same time it is argued that the price of bread would be increased infinitesimally by the proposed tax.

Again, at page 29 :

It is a somewhat difficult task to select successful men in a district avowedly suffering from agricultural depression, and it will be found in each case where success can be noted, that there are certain conditions of soil and situation which conduce to its attainment.

The remedy again is suggested in pages 31 and 32 :

The causes of the depression are stated by all farmers whom I have conversed with, or heard from, to be "Low prices of farm produce, especially of wheat, caused by excessive foreign competition."

* * * * *

In all but a few instances, "protection," in some form or other, is advocated as the remedy, the majority indicating a tax on foreign manufactured articles, including flour. This, it is pointed out, would not interfere with the supply of food to any appreciable extent, and would benefit the nation at large by finding employment for workmen in mills which are now being abandoned or destroyed. The fall in the value of this kind of property is stated to be at least 70 per cent in twenty years.

It is pointed out also :

That thirty years ago, the home-grown crop, according to the official returns, reached 17,922,048 quarters, and 7,000,000 quarters were then imported. The last returns show a total of 22,263,000 quarters imported, and, according to Sir J. Lawes' estimate, less than 6,000,000 quarters are grown this year. * * * Whether the displacement of such an amount of home-produced food is beneficial to the nation at large, is a question requiring grave consideration, especially as the purchase money for the extra figures, 12,000,000 quarters, which were formerly grown in the United Kingdom, is now paid over to the foreigner instead of the Englishman.

I find in the report from the manufacturing district of Lancashire, pages 14 and 17 :

Although agricultural depression has existed since 1880, to some extent, in North Lancashire, and has been more particularly felt during the last three or four years, the evidence of its existence is, perhaps, not so marked as in many other counties, partly because it has been of longer duration elsewhere, though I venture to think that it is more acutely felt than appears at first sight.

* * * * *

Thus at the present time in some districts it is the farmers' sons and daughters who have suffered, rather than the land, for they have been, and are, giving their best energies towards its cultivation, receiving no reward in the present and with but little prospect of any in the future. How far they will consent in the future to stop with their parents, under such conditions, remains to be seen.

* * * * *

But, apart from these considerations, there is plenty of evidence that farmers are feeling the depression very acutely, and indeed it must be so in a country which is largely grass, and where the prices of stock have dropped 30 or 40 per cent in the last few years.

Further on, he gives a quotation from some of the evidence adduced :

Most of the farmers are nearly ruined, and many are farming on borrowed capital.

Mr. NORTHROP.

The chief cause of agricultural depression in North Lancashire is stated to be foreign competition in food products, especially in cattle. And here the remedy is suggested—page 28 :

A good many witnesses advocated that a duty should be put on live cattle and all manufactured articles coming into the country, and numbers said that all cattle should be killed on landing.

This, remember, is in the manufacturing district of Lancashire :

The chairman of the Liverpool Farmers' Club advocated putting a duty on imported flour and manufactured articles as long as other nations put duties on English exports, adding : "If this country is right, all the rest of the world must be wrong ; for every other country has a tariff."

I will not occupy the time of the House reading a table which is furnished, but which hon. members who desire to do so can read at page 81. It relates to the district of Northumberland, and gives a list of properties and the reductions which have taken place in the last few years. But I may say generally that the rental of land has decreased from 20 to 25 per cent since 1879.

On the Duke of Northumberland's property, 150,000 acres, the permanent reductions made in rents since 1882 come to 25 per cent of the rental.

On the Marquis of Waterford's estate at Ford, the permanent rental is lower by 24½ per cent than it was in 1879.

In the report relating to the Glendale district of Northumberland, the remedy is suggested :

Many farmers advocate fair trade, and say that a duty should be placed on imported manufactured goods as long as English exports are subject to duties in foreign countries.

It is represented as being grossly unfair that English goods should be subject to taxation abroad, while at the same time the foreigner pays no duties, and has the free use of the English markets, contributing nothing to the taxation of the country, besides having better terms on the railways than Englishmen. With such advantages as these, the farmers say it is impossible to compete with the foreigners.

I have here a report for the county of Lincolnshire. I read from page 59 :

The yeoman farmer, who in the good times bought a farm at double its present value, is usually in a worse plight than a tenant, because a large proportion of the purchase money was left on mortgage, and the rate of interest paid now represents a considerably larger sum than the land would be worth to rent. Not unfrequently, family money was put into such farms, being considered a remunerative and safe investment, and also because it was a source of pleasure and pride to assist one of their members into a position of independence, to which at the same time certain social advantages were attached.

Many of such men have already sunk, overwhelmed by the burden of interest they had to pay. A number of this class were the first to go when the bad times began, and they were quickly followed by a large number of tenants between the years 1879 and 1883.

Here are two suggestions made as to the remedy for depression—page 110 :

The majority of farmers I met were in favour of either protective tariffs on certain foreign imports, usually manufactured ones, or that retaliatory duties should be imposed until other nations consented to admit free trade principles.

The last report I will give the House is that on the Vale Aylesbury, and the county of Hertford. At page 22, I find the following :—

Here, as elsewhere, farmers have been seriously injured by the fall in value of articles of produce, more particularly as regards cattle and milk, and by unfavourable seasons. The fall in rents already mentioned is itself clear evidence of the existence of the depression. There has also been a considerable fall in the selling value of agricultural land, though not so much as in arable districts.

The suggestions made include the following—page 27—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did not quite catch what the hon. gentleman was quoting from. Was it a committee of the House of Lords ?

Mr. NORTHRUP. It is the report of the Royal Commission on Agriculture, presented to both Houses of Parliament.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do you happen to remember who composed the committee ?

Mr. NORTHRUP. I can give the hon. member, if he wishes, the names of the gentlemen of the various committees who sent in these reports. They are all stated in the reports. This commission reports :

The remedy suggested in this district (of Hertford) were mainly the same as those in the first district reported upon by me. Several farmers of position and intelligence, who have hitherto always been free traders, said that they had been convinced by recent experience that the agricultural interests in England could only be saved by checking the importation of foreign corn and flour. There was a very general expressed opinion in favour of an import duty on foreign manufactured articles, the object being more particularly to discourage the importation of foreign flour.

I think these quotations, which I have given the House in these reports, show that at all events the depression of which we have heard so much, is not confined to this country, is not confined to countries which have the benefit of a national policy or a protective system, but is found in an extreme degree in the one country, the only country in the world, to which hon. gentlemen could point, as a country supporting the principle of free trade. But since at an earlier period in this debate Great Britain was referred to as being the mother of free trade, it may not be out of place to consider the circumstances under which free trade was brought about in that country. I do not intend to weary the House with a long historical dissertation on the protectionist measures of England for many centuries, but it must be a fact known to all that at the time the corn laws were repealed in 1846, there was a contest, a struggle, between the two great interests in the island. On the one hand were the manufacturers who had lately come into prominence and had acquired great wealth, and had so prospered that at that time Great Britain was literally the mistress of the markets of the world. On the other hand was the agricultural interest which had been protected up to that time. But, Sir, at that time the manufacturers—I presume the hon. gentlemen opposite would say as they always do—desired more protection, and it must be patent to all that there was but one way under the sun by which further protection could be given to the manufacturers of England. They had then control of the markets of the world. A duty of $1 a yard, or $10 a yard, on cotton or woollen goods would have been no protection to the manufacturers of England, since other countries were not exporting to her shores, but were buying from her. Therefore, the only possible protection that could be given to the manufacturers of England was a protection on the other side that would reduce the cost of the necessaries of life to their employees whom they had to pay. And so it was that on the one hand the manufacturing classes were striking for further protection, and on the other hand the landed classes were bitterly opposing the removal of the duties which were imposed for their benefit. Those who have read the literature of those days must remember well the promises that were made on the one hand by the advocates of free trade, and the direful predictions made by those who represented the landed interests. It will be remembered that those who advocated free trade said that within ten years all the nations of the world would have thrown their ports open to the goods of England ; and it is well known to every member of this House how entirely that prediction has been falsified. On the other hand, it was predicted by the landed interests that the removal of the protection which they had always enjoyed and under which they had prospered, would mean direful ruin indeed to them ; and I think I can appeal to the reports coming from the mother land, those which I have just read to this House, to prove that those predictions have been unfortunately verified to the very letter. Now, Sir, alongside England there is another country which has had a little experience of the beneficial effects of free trade. It has been the custom to look to that unfortunate island lying to the west of England as one that is hopelessly doomed to misery—hopelessly, I say, simply because, owing to the circumstances and power of the larger island by its side, the means which it was supposed would secure its prosperity, the means which were adopted and did give prosperity to Ireland, were banished in the interests of the manufacturers of England. I am not here to-day to make an oration on the woes of Ireland, but those who have read the history of Ireland and know how completely her manufacturers were then choked out of existence in order to maintain the manufacturers of England, those who know how those manufacturers flourished in the twelve or fifteen years while having a Parliament of her own, she legislated along the lines that this Parliament has followed, giving protection to home industries—those who have read the history of those days will know that both those who were the friends of Ireland, and those who were the foes of Ireland, admitted that during those twelve or fifteen years there was no nation in the world that progressed at the rate Ireland did. But, Sir, after the union, when, in order, as I say, to protect the manufacturers of England, the manufacturers of Ireland were exposed to this fierce competition from their competitors in England, one after another the interests of Ireland were choked, and from that day to this she has been suffering for the reason that the people who were employed in those industries were driven back to the land through the stoppage of those industries, thus overcrowding the land when there was no market for the products of the land. I have here a statement sufficient to illustrate what I am saying, as to the effect upon the industries of Ireland produced by the union: In Dublin, in 1800, there were 30 master wool-combers, and 230 hands. In 1834, there were 5 masters and 66 hands. Of carpet manufacturers, in 1800, there were 13 masters and 720 hands; in 1841, there was one master and no hands. Of broad silk loom weavers, in 1800, there were 2,500 at work; in 1840, 250. Of calico looms in Balbriggan, in 1799, there were 2,000 in full work; in 1841, 226. Take the city of Cork, only to give one or two illustrations which could be paralleled, if I took the whole country, place after place:

Braid weavers	1,000	40
Worsted weavers	2,000	90
Hosiers	300	28
Wool-combers	700	110
Cotton weavers	2,000	210

I say when we find the industries of a country thus closed, the trade paralyzed, what wonder is it that misery and depression have notoriously existed in Ireland during all these years. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite, in discussing the depression between 1873 and 1878, have forgotten that the causes which led to the accentuation of that depression between 1874 and 1878, namely, this country being a slaughter market, and our farmers being deprived of a home market for their goods, did not exist in the last two years. I would like to ask any hon. gentleman opposite, in face of the fact, which he must admit, that world-wide depression existed at that time in the United States to a degree far worse than existed in this country, how could any sane man say for a moment that the interests of the farmers and the manufacturers of this country in those times of depression would have been benefited by throwing our markets open to goods from a foreign country? I submit that the mere statement of the proposition give its own answer. Now, we have heard a good deal during this debate, and at other times, with regard to the story told by the census; and hon. gentlemen opposite seem to base the greater portion of their attacks against the National Policy on the results shown by the census. It is rather surprising that gentlemen, who presumably desire to arrive at a true conclusion, should be so perfectly indifferent as to the premises from which they argue. Every argument which has been urged by any hon. gentleman opposite with regard to the failure of this country to increase in population, as it was contended that she should, must of necessity be based upon the accuracy of the census returns for the year 1881. If, as a matter of fact, the census returns for 1881 were wholly unreliable, then it is quite clear that any argument based upon a comparison of the census of 1881 and those of 1891 is fallacious and misleading. Now, what have hon. gentlemen opposite said themselves as to the census returns of 1881? I do not ask them to take what has been said by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, or by gentlemen outside of the House, but I think we can fairly ask them to show some reason for refusing to accept the statement made by hon. gentlemen opposite, particularly when these hon. gentlemen occupy so prominent positions as the two hon. gentlemen whom I shall quote. By reference to "Hansard" of 1882, page 165, we will find what was said by an hon. gentleman who has been admitted by all members of the Reform party, and by hon. gentlemen differing from them in Parliament, to have been one of the greatest minds that has ever been in the Reform party of this country—I refer to the Hon. Edward Blake, who gave his opinion of the census returns of 1881 in this language:

In some cases they have counted every person who belonged to a house, even though that person had been for a very long time resident in foreign parts unless the head of the household would say that he was quite sure the person was not coming back. In other instances, men who had been absent 8, 15 or 20 years have, as I have been informed by persons in the locality who were familiar with the circumstances, been counted.

Then, on page 166, he stated again:

It is entirely uncertain, then, under the circumstances, what our population numbers. Nobody can tell by this mode of taking the census the actual number of our Canadian population.

Now, if there was any doubt as to the accuracy of the Hon. Edward Blake—possibly hon. gentlemen opposite might have some doubts on the ground that he was not a born financier—we have an expression of opinion by another hon. gentleman who has filled a most prominent position in this House, I refer to the late Minister of Finance, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). In 1885 he gave his opinion of the census returns of 1881, as found on page 213 of "Hansard," on which returns I venture to say he has based hundreds of arguments to attack the Government and the Conservative party throughout the length and breadth of the land. He said :

Now, I want to call the attention of the House to this. During the taking of the preceding census, we, from this side, called attention to the manifestly fraudulent intention with which it was taken. The result of that census has been that we have paid $500,000 for a document as to which we only know this, that it does not contain one single statement that can be relied upon ; that in the very first statement, the most important of all, the statement of the number of people who are now in the Dominion of Canada, that census had been deliberately and fraudulently falsified, and falsified for a purpose.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. On both occasions, precisely in the same way.

Mr. NORTHRUP. No doubt it was for a purpose. The hon. gentleman continued :

And that the purpose, so far as the hon. gentleman, the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, and those who support him, could make it, was, I believe, to deprive the province of Ontario of its legitimate representation.

Further on, the hon. gentleman said :

What I say is, that that census has been taken in a way to render the statements made in it worthless. That census has been taken in a fashion which has caused several thousands of people in every province to be put down as residents of this country who are not residents there. There may have been many purposes for that.

Omitting some sentences, I find the following :—

But whatever may have been the object, whatever may have been the purpose, the fact remains that we have a census that cost us $500,000, if not more, and of that census no man who takes the trouble to analyse it, to scrutinize its tables, can affirm with certainty any proposition except that in the most important part of all, it exaggerates, by thousands of people, the number of persons supposed to be resident in Canada.

If there is no reliance to be placed on the census of 1881, what possible reliance can be placed on the arguments of hon. gentlemen, which were based solely and exclusively on that census ? But the hon. gentleman whom I have last quoted does not appear to be always particularly happy in his reference to the census. I noticed the other day on page 667 of the unrevised report of "Hansard," speaking of the growth of population in the United States, he said :

And if a further indication is wanted, I will call the attention of the House to this further fact—that in the United States, during a period when their population corresponded with ours, from 1790 to 1800, and from 1800 to 1810, and downwards, their average natural growth of population appears to have been rather more than $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. Their growth was $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent per annum from 1791 to 1820, without considering the assistance from immigration.

That statement may be right or it may not be right ; I do not profess to express an opinion as to the accuracy or inaccuracy of the statement. But allow me to give to this House the opinion of a reliable and honoured member of this House as to such a statement with respect to the growth of population being $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent per annum. On page 273 of the debates of 25th April, it was observed by an hon. gentleman as follows :—

I do not know whether I correctly heard what the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) stated, but if his statement be correct, that the United States estimated their natural increase in ten years at eighteen millions, I beg to call the attention of the hon. gentleman and the attention of the House to the fact that that would be an increase very considerably more than 3 per cent per annum, a rate I never heard given by any man who deserved to be called a statistician or who possessed any information on the subject worth noticing. As my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) suggests, that is an increase which may take place in a rabbit warren, but hardly, I think, in a civilized community.

Will it be believed that the hon. gentleman just quoted was the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) ? I wish to be fair, I have no desire to misrepresent the hon. gentleman ; I have no desire that any one on this side of the House should misunderstand my words, and, therefore, I call attention to the fact that in the last statement I read there is no real contradiction of the statement I read in the first place. On its face it might be thought that there was a contradiction, but the hon. gentleman does not say the statement is false, but only one that he never heard given by any man "who deserved to be called a statistician or who possessed any information on the subject worth noticing." It is amusing to hear hon. gentlemen discussing the census figures with a glibness and recklessness of assertion which I venture to think could hardly be found in any deliberative body outside of this. Without any grounds whatever as a basis for a proper annual increase of population, they violently attack, or hurl against, this side of the House accusations, because, forsooth, in Canada the increase of our population between 1881 and 1891 was only 10 or 11 per cent ; and it is charged against the Government as one of the most serious offences of which it can be guilty, that our increase of population has fallen far behind that of all civilized people. But let hon. gentlemen opposite give facts and figures to show on what they base their opinion, that an increase of 10 or 11 per cent is not a reasonably good increase. I have shown already that the census of 1881 is unreliable; I have shown from the mouths of hon. gentlemen opposite that the population was exaggerated at that time. So that even if our census returns show by a comparison of 1891 with 1881 a nominal increase of 10 or 11 per cent—the facts I have stated being borne in mind—why should not that be a satisfactory increase? What is the experience of other countries? Look at France. It had a census in 1886 and in 1891; in the former year the population was 38,218,903, and during the five years the population only increased by about 100,000, it being in the latter year, 38,343,192. Take Germany. In 1885 the population was 46,855,704; in 1890 it was 49,416,476, an annual rate of increase of 1.06, or for ten years only about 10 per cent. But hon. gentlemen say that emigration accounted for that. From 1886 to 1890 the emigration only amounted to 456,136, and so that it does not afford a sufficient reason. Belgium in 1876 showed an annual increase between 1876 and 1880 of .85 per cent, or about 8.5 in ten years. The Netherlands showed an annual increase of .09 between 1880 and 1890, or an increase of about 9 per cent in ten years. Great Britain showed an increase between 1881 and 1891 of 8.17 per cent, the population in the former year being 35,241,482, and the latter year, 37,888,153. Scotland showed an increase during the same period of 7.96 per cent. So if we look at the civilized nations of the old world we find that in no case has there been an increase equal to that of Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite are fond of looking to the republic to the south of us, and every hon. member is well aware that as regards immigration the United States possess wonderful advantage over us, owing to the form of Government they enjoy. People living in the old European countries are often anxious to escape a form of Government which is objectionable to them, one which has proved restrictive, and they seek that liberty which they think is to be found in a republic on a foreign shore; and so the United States have an advantage in that respect as regards attracting immigrants which we, as a colony, must necessarily lack. But what are the facts if we look at a hundred years?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). So much the worse for British connection.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Take a period of one hundred years and examine the figures relating to the United States, and take that part of British North America which is now the Dominion of Canada and institute a comparison. We find that the population of the United States was 3,929,214 in 1790. That population increased eighteen times in one hundred years. On the other hand this little country a hundred years ago had only a population of 200,000, but its population increased twenty-two times during the century. So that if we go back a hundred years, we find our population has increased more times than the population of the republic to the south. I do not intend to occupy the attention of the House at much greater length on the subject of the census but I desire to call attention to one feature to which frequent reference is made by hon. gentlemen opposite. Most of the speeches we have heard from hon. gentlemen opposite, particularly last session, were composed of attacks on the absurdities of the census and the unreliability of the census on account of the ridiculously large number of small establishments, which, not being entitled to be considered manufacturing or industrial establishments have been so considered. We know, Sir, that a bitter attack was made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) last session, based almost entirely on the conclusions which he drew from his ridiculous increase, as he called it, of the smaller establishments, and hon. gentlemen sitting opposite have advanced the same arguments to this House. Now, what do we find from an analysis of the census? Suppose we throw out altogether every single manufacturing or industrial establishment whose annual output is under $2,000 a year. Surely, an establishment whose output is more than that is worthy of being considered, and if we throw out all the establishments whose output is under $2,000 we only lose $20,734,000 in 1881, and $32,255,000 in 1891. If we throw out the smaller establishments to which I refer, we find that the total output in 1891 was $576,000,000, less the $32,000,000 to be subtracted; so that, by comparison of these figures it will be found that, looking at the percentage, all these smaller establishments with an output of under $2,000 only amount to 6.7 per cent of the sum total of the output of our manufacturing establishments. And, Sir, it was charged that the enumerators had been instructed to swell the returns, and that they were paid for the results they discovered in order that the returns might be swollen. If that be the case, it is a most marvellous thing that the increases between 1871 and 1881, and the increase between 1881 and 1891, in those same establishments with an output of under $2,000 a year, is precisely the same, namely, 6.7 per cent. But, Sir, were we to take the establishments with an output of over $50,000—and surely hon. gentlemen opposite will admit that these should be included—we find that in 1881 the output was $153,000,000, and that in 1891 the output was 260,000,000, or over $100,000,000 increase in the output of the large establishments. The instructions given to the enumerators were :

An industrial establishment is any place where one or several persons are engaged in manufacturing, altering, making up or changing from one shape into another, materials for sale or for consumption.

It is all very well for hon. gentlemen opposite to ridicule the small establishment employing one or two hands ; but if the object of the returns is to find the annual output in industrial and manufacturing lines in this country, how else could that be obtained than by enumerating every establishment that has an output ? In a large city, such as Ottawa, for instance, with a population of, perhaps, forty thousand, if we take the item of boots and shoes and allow two pairs a year to each person, or, in round numbers, 80,000 pairs, to be consumed in the city of Ottawa, it is quite conceivable that probably half would come from wholesale establishments outside the city, and probably half would be the product of the small shoemakers' establishments in Ottawa. How, in such a case, could we show the output of our Canadian industries if we only considered the larger, and carefully shut our eyes to the smaller establishments. Now, Sir, it was suggested by the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) that if his party came into power certain changes would be made, and I refer to those remarks of his because they are the only approach to a suggestion in that line of any definiteness which we have received from gentlemen on the other side of the House. He pointed to the fact that the superannuation of officers would come to an end when his party came into power. I do not intend to discuss that subject with that hon. gentleman, but I refer him to his own speech delivered last spring in Bowmanville or Oshawa, at all events some place in Central Ontario, in which he discussed this very question, and without committing myself to the literal accuracy of his figures in round numbers, this was the result that he discovered. He said that there were from 460 to 500 superannuated officials, and he showed what an outrage it was in this country that so many men who were able to discharge their duties should be walking the streets ; and holding up his hands he glorified himself and his party and remarked : That of the whole 460 or 500, only 130 had been superannuated by the Reform party. Well, just consider for a moment what that statement means. A party that has been out of power for sixteen years, and yet had conducted the superannuation in such a way that, after the lapse of sixteen years, there were still 130 officials walking the streets who, sixteen years ago, were also able to walk the streets, and, for all we may know, may be able to walk the streets sixteen years hence. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman took objection to the number of Ministers.

He complained that there were too many Cabinet Ministers in Canada. Does any one seriously believe that, with an annual expenditure in this country, enormous as of necessity it must be, any burden of taxation would be removed from any suffering taxpayer's shoulders by decreasing the Cabinet by one, or two, or three Ministers. I notice that hon. gentlemen opposite are not so fond of discussing that question now as they were a few years ago, when they maintained that in the motherland there were only about as many Ministers to govern Britain as we have here ; but their attention was called to the fact that there were fifty Ministers in Great Britain ; and from that day to this, until the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) brought it up this afternoon, we have heard nothing on this subject. The hon. member told us also that we would save a good deal of money by the abolition of the Franchise Act. I was rather pleased, in one sense, to have the hon. gentleman advocate this, because it is the nearest we have come yet to any expression of opinion from members of the Opposition as to what they think of the resolution of my hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Mills), which was discussed here a few days ago. We were anxious that day to get an idea of what hon. gentlemen opposite thought of the provincial franchise, but we failed to secure any expression of opinion then. To-day, however, one gentleman was bold enough to say that he would advocate that this House should adopt the provincial franchise, which he evidently, therefore, considers to be a proper franchise. I would congratulate my friend from Annapolis (Mr. Mills), were he here, that he has at least one supporter on the other side of the House, because an hon. gentleman who believes that provincial franchise to be founded on a correct principle, surely cannot object to its extension into the Dominion Franchise Act, which he declares to be so defective. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) also would wish to economise with regard to the North-west Mounted Police. He would remove a number of them—he did not say he would dismiss them—but he would remove them from the duties they were now discharging, and, inasmuch as they very efficiently discharged the duties of preventing smuggling in addition to their police duties, he would attach them to the Customs Department. I always thought that that was about the way that the hon. gentleman would administer the affairs of the country if any unlucky chance ever put him on this side of the House. At the present time the North-west Mounted Police discharge two kinds of duties ; their police duties and their duties in connection with the Customs Department, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen), in order to effect, not an economy, but a change, though the change be not an improvement, would have them cease to discharge their police functions. According to him their pay would go on all the same, but he would only allow them to discharge their duties as customs officials. Now, Sir, in conclusion, I would like to ask the House to seriously consider what suggestion has fallen from hon. gentlemen opposite as to the way they would manage the affairs of the country were they in power? We found the other day the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson)—and I am sorry he is not in his seat just now—showing by comparison of the figures between 1874 and 1884 what he considered the proper way of comparing the success of his party as administrators with the success of the administration of the present Government. If the hon. gentleman were in his seat, I would like to ask him how, in his own business, he would like to have a similar parallel drawn? If we could imagine a young and enterprising dealer, prior to 1874, anxious to promote his business and to secure success, and in order to secure the very best articles that could be obtained, he bought his pickles, jams and jellies from the member for South Brant; and he carried on his business so successfully that after a term of five years he was $25,000 ahead. Surely, under such circumstances, he would have reason to think that his business connection with the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) was successful and satisfactory. But, allured by the promises of a rival firm, we will suppose that this enterprising dealer left the safe and conservative establishment of the member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), and dealt with a less reliable and less successful firm, with the result that, at the end of another five years, his capital was all gone and he was $50,000 in debt. Late in the day, as a sort of death-bed repentance, he returns to his first love, and again he begins to deal with the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), with the inevitable result that his business increases, his style of goods are better—they having been improved under the protection of the National Policy—and after another five years in business he has paid off his debts and is worth $5,000. Would not the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) be rather indignant if any person referring to the dealings between him and this customer were to say: Well, your dealings with him have not been profitable to him. Ten years ago he was worth $25,000, and now he is only worth $5,000; we will compare 1874 with 1884 and 1884 with 1894 in his business. Don't you think, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) would very properly point out that when he took this unfortunate man in hand the second time, he, through his fault in leaving the firm which led him safely through dark places, having lost an accumulated fortune, had regained a part of it after he renewed his business relations with the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson). Would he not point out that during the time he dealt with the other party he was insolvent, and would he not ask you to compare the two periods that he dealt with him, and exclude the time he spent in dealing with the other party? And so with regard to the dealings of this country. In 1874, we had a trade of some $217,000,000, and my hon. friend says, "you only put it up to $240,000,000, in 1894," but we did not start our administration with a trade of $217,000,000; we started in 1878 with a trade of only $153,000,000, to which it had declined during the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, and from that figure we worked it up to $240,000,000 in 1894. Now, what is it that hon. gentlemen opposite offer to this country, except the one old threadbare cry of economy, which we have heard from every platform in the country for years—economy, economy, economy. But have we any reason, derived from our experience of that party in the past, to expect that the economy which they have promised so loudly would be realized should they succeed in gaining power in this country? We have had experience of their political administration in all the provinces of this Dominion; and has that experience been such as to lead us believe that on the ground of economy, this country would be likely to be a gainer by their accession to power? We know one province, not very far from here, which no one in this House would dare to say was economically administered during the time its late premier, a friend of hon. gentlemen opposite, held office; but, we have yet to hear any one of those hon. gentlemen denounce the rascality that distinguished that Government. I admit that for several years there was a man at the head of the opposite party whose nobility of character, integrity and honesty no one can dispute. I am willing to bear testimony to the virtues of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, although I do not forget the treatment that he received from some of his friends. We know that he wrote a letter in 1875, in which he detailed the woes to which he had been subjected when he came to occupy the treasury benches. In that letter, he said:

I would like much to be relieved of the Public works Department. * * * Friends expect to be benefited by offices they are unfit for, by contracts they are not entitled to, by advances not earned. * * * I feel like the besieged, lying on my arms night and day. I have offended at least twenty parliamentary friends by my defence of the citadel.

Why, Sir, when we look to the records of the past, and see the illustrations that they present of the conduct of the Reform party, while in power, I think the people of this country will want to leave them where they have been for many years, and where, at all events, they will do no harm to the best interests of this Dominion.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, in rising to address the House on this very important question, I may say that I have been rather astonished at the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) calling out "economy, economy, economy," and asking if the Reform party practiced it when in power. Let me tell him that they did practice that economy, and I will give a little statement of the condition the country would be in to-day if the Conservative Government had practiced the same economy. When the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie came into power in 1874, he found a per capita expenditure of $6.10. When he went out of power, he had reduced it by 34 cents per head. Now, it has been admitted on the other side of the House that if a Government does not increase the expenditure in a greater ratio than the increase of population, it is fairly economical. Well, the population increased during the time of the Mackenzie Government fully as rapidly as it has done since, although, during the same time they reduced the per capita expenditure by 34 cents. In 1879, under hon. gentlemen opposite, the expenditure was increased 14 cents per head, which cost the country $580,476. In 1880 it was still increased 14 cents per head, which cost the country $600,154. In 1873 there was an increase of 72 cents per head, which caused an increase in the expenditure of $3,194,187. In 1885 the increase was $1.96 per head, an expenditure greater than that of the Mackenzie Government of $8,886,000. And when we come to the year 1886 we all remember the bungling which caused the expenditure in that year to be increased $2.74 per capita, or $13,674,000 over the expenditure of the Mackenzie Government, in consequence of the North-west rebellion, which would never have occurred under the Mackenzie Government. Coming down to 1894, it shows an increased expenditure of $14,000,000, of which $5,600,000 is a justifiable increase, while $8,700,000 would not have taken place had the Conservative Government administered the affairs of the country in the same economical manner as the Government of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. From 1878 to 1894, there has been an over-expenditure for which the country has received no corresponding benefit, of $104,975,000. I have taken these figures from the Statistical Record, so that it is a fair statement to show the reckless expenditure of the present Government. That large sum of money would have been saved if the Government that succeeded the Mackenzie Government had fulfilled their promises, because Sir Leonard Tilley stated at St. John, in 1879, that had the Government of which he was a member been in power in the last five years, they would not have required to spend more than $22,500,000, which was $1,000,000 less than the expenditure of the Mackenzie Government in 1878. Sir Charles Tupper also stated that they would not require so large an expenditure as the Mackenzie Government—that as they had carried on the Government with a small expenditure in the past, they would be prepared to do the same thing in the future. Now, we have been asked by the last speaker what means the Reform party intend to take to remove the depression. That is the cry of every individual on the Government side, both from the treasury and the back benches. What are to be the tactics of the Opposition, they ask, they appear to have no tactics? And they would like very well that the Reform party should show their hand. It is very seldom that I indulge in prophecy, but if the people get a fair opportunity, if the Government does not bring on something in the shape of reciprocity or something else of that description, as they did in 1891, when they went to the people with a false cry, they will soon find what the policy of the Reform party is. I was astonished at the statements of the last speaker. He said there were fifty Cabinet Ministers in England. Why, I made a comparison a short time ago, and found that the number was about equal in Canada and England. There was another statement he made at which I was very much astonished. When he undertook to show how the manufacturing industry in Ireland had been depressed and crushed out of existence, what period did he choose? He took the period from 1799 to 1834. But during that period protection ruled supreme in Scotland and England and Ireland, and it was during that period that the Irish industries were ruined. He did not touch on the free trade period in Great Britain which commenced in 1846. His statement only proves that under the protective policy which brought England to the verge of ruin, the manufacturing industries in Ireland also suffered. I am going to take a few statements also from the report of the Royal Commission of Agriculture in Britain; and let me tell you, Sir, that there are varied suggestions for the removal of this depression as one could possibly find. A great many causes exist there that do not exist in this country. One cause is the law of entail upon real property. Under this law, landlords, in many instances, have a life interest in the property, and will not pay their tenants for any improvements, so that the lands become exhausted in many instances and will not give crop, and the landlords will not give the tenants redress in the shape of improvements to which they are entitled. There is something else. There is a cry all over Scotland and England that the depression among agriculturists is much intensified by the disease among the cattle. Two or three farmers in Scotland and England have shown that on account of tuberculosis they have lost 10 to 15 per cent on their stocks, or what would be a fair remuneration for their labour. There were also other causes at work. In Scotland, in 1870, a new school law was brought in. Under the old school law, the landlords paid all the taxes, but under the new school law the taxes fell on the tenants at which they complained bitterly. They also complained of railway discrimination in not giving them proper railway facility. Another cause why the farmers suffered severely in Britain, is to be found in the fact that they had nineteen years and twenty years' leases, which when the depression came on, were still existing, and the farmers were ruined before they could get any reduction in rent. This has disappeared to a great extent because many farmers now are upon yearly leases. There was talk, it is true, of a certain amount of protection in certain quarters, but such talk was by no means universal as my hon. friend stated before recess. Protection to the farmer in Britain would impose on him a great deal of extra expenses in many instances. Here is a statement from the report of the district of Northumberland :

A number of farmers, who are opposed to putting a duty on manufactured articles, as a whole, advocate a duty on foreign barley, which, they urge, would not result in raising the price of food, and not necessarily of drink, while it would greatly benefit the farmers.

The Commissioner goes on to report :

On the other hand, there are farmers opposed to protection in any form.

Mr. Forster of Budle, says :

I pass from the idea of protection as something too childish to trouble with. As long as other nations send their produce here, it is quite clear it is the best market for our own as well as theirs. And there are others who recognize that the cost of living is cheaper for the whole community in consequence of free trade ; that probably it would be an impossibility to raise the cost of living of the community to assist the farming interest, and that remedies must be sought in other directions.

Now, there is another point which has not been touched by the hon. gentleman who quoted from the report of this commission, and that is the condition of the working-men, even under free trade in England. Let me state that the country which is most prosperous is that where the artisan and the labourer live in comfortable circumstances and where wages are increased. That is the case in Britain at present. Farm labourers there are having their wages increased. Let me read the statement of a farmer :

All the labourers have a rise of 1s. 6d. a week. The blacksmiths' work has risen 40 per cent.

Can hon. gentlemen opposite show me this in any protective country? I will show that in free trade Britain the working-men get higher wages than in any protected country on the continent of America. I can show that wages are going up in Britain while the wages of the agricultural labourers are going down in the neighbouring republic. Here is another statement :

Labour has not been curtailed. I employ more men on the land I have left, and find the more machinery I have, the more men I require. My labour bill is much higher, according to the amount of land cultivated.

These are statements that cannot be set aside. According to the reports I have read, the average reduction of farm property amounts to from 30 to 33 per cent, while in some cases it is not more than 12. As regards my native country, I have a report from the parish to which I belong, and that shows that the reduction in the value of land there only amounts to 12 per cent. I will also show another farmer's views of the condition of things. He points out very vividly the condition of labourers in free-trade England. This is in the district of Wiltshire :

A very representative farmer of large experience gave me his views at some length on the present position of labour. He observed, that labourers, as a rule, practised considerable thrift, and the marked improvement in their condition is readily observable. He himself takes great interest in the welfare of the labourers' families, and is a teacher in the Sunday school. He observed that the dress of the labourers and their families on Sundays showed their well-to-do condition, and he stated that at least 75 per cent of the boys under twelve years old possessed watches, showing that there is money available for comparative luxuries. The fact that women now decline to do any field work, is another proof that they are in independent circumstances. On this farm 10 or 12 women used to be employed at weeding and hay-making, earning 8d. or 9d. per day. Now they will not even tie the corn in harvest, and will hardly carry their husband's dinner to them in the field.

Showing conclusively that even in free-trade Britain the condition of the working classes is being steadily improved. And let me say that as to the condition of the farmers, another farmer gives his views to the effect that protection would be of very little benefit to the farmers of Great Britain, because, as he says, if we have to get protection it would only benefit us for one or two years, until the lease expires, and then the landlord would get the benefit.

Mr. DAVIN. Is the farm labourer in England as well paid as the farm labourer in Canada?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, Sir. I have visited Scotland within the last three years, and have been over a good many of the farms mentioned in the report, and the labourers are as well paid as the labourers in Canada, when you count all the perquisites allowed with their wages.

Mr. DAVIN. Are they as well fed?

Mr. McMILLAN. They are—better fed ; for the simple reason that they get good porridge and milk. It is complained of the labourers in England they are not giving as good service as formerly, and one reason is that they have given up porridge and milk and ground wheat, and have taken to flour and tea. Here is the news from Gloucester, Wilts, and Berkshire in England :

Feeding stuffs are generally a more important item on a grass than on an arable farm, and in this respect grass-farmers have benefited by the lowering of price of cake and the importation of cheap foreign corn. The latter was a specially important matter in 1893, when, owing to the drought, most farmers had little or nothing to feed their cattle on, and were compelled to purchase a large quantity of food. Many grass farmers said to me : " We like the importation of cheap corn. It is the only thing that saved us last year." " The low price of corn is an advantage to the dairy farmer."

In another place the report says :

Farmers in dairy and grazing districts, who have benefited by cheap foreign barley and meal and feeding stuffs, frequently said to me, that a duty on foreign corn would injure rather than assist them.

Let me say, there is a universal feeling, both in Scotland and in England that a duty ought to be imposed upon flour, but that wheat ought to come in free. The only grain they ask a duty on is barley. They also wish a duty placed upon malt. The duty has been removed from malt, and they believe that if the duty were re-imposed upon malt and a small duty placed on barley it would benefit the farmer. But, as a rule, they ask that no duty be placed upon feed. At page 47, the following statement is quoted :

Mr. King (butcher) thought the price of beef and mutton was high enough now, and it was impossible to return to protection, or they would have meat at starvation prices.

The people of England feel to-day that if they were to return to protection it would be impossible for them to keep their position among the nations of the earth ; that if they were to put a tax upon beef, it would be so high in price that the majority of the people could not use it.

Referring to the commencement of the depression in 1882, the Commissioner asked how matters had been going on since the depression began ? Mr. Bennett said, from bad to worse. One or two farmers observed that in 1879 matters were at their worst. Mr. Bennett said, that cheap corn was the salvation of the country for feeding cattle last year. A farmer stated that the matter worked out that they had to pay foreigners for stock and then send them the money for the corn, and when they sold the fat stock, they only got the same price as for poor stock.

Let me say, also, they have asked, as a redress for their grievances in both Scotland and England, that the Canadian cattle known as stockers be allowed to come into the country. They believe that with stockers and free corn they would be greatly benefited. Now, here is the rent roll of a very large estate, and I have just taken the parish to which I belong, the parish of Kirkconnel in Duarfrieshire. In 1879-80, the land rent roll was £9,157 10s., and in 1893-94 it was £7,973 2s. 6d. But when we take the total valuation, including houses and mansions, woodlands, fishings, shootings, and sundries, we find that in 1879-80 the total valuation was £13,920 17s. ; and in 1893-94 it was £13,888 0s. 6d. This shows that there was very little reduction, the shrinkage being only 2.12 per cent. I need not pursue this question any further, because it is admitted on all hands that the wages of farm labourers have increased in some localities from 12 to 15 per cent. We have been told about the census, and about the large exodus from this country. Here is a statement made by the bureau at Washington, showing what the exodus from Canada has been. I find that in 1873 it was 37,871 ; and in 1878 it was 25,568. In 1881 it went up to 118,664. Under Tory rule up to 1873 the average exodus was 37,171. Under the Liberal Government from 1874 to 1878 it was 24,433, or 12,000 a year less than under Tory rule. From 1879 to 1881 the average was 83,212 annually. So that we see that as soon as the country was brought under the influence of this blessed National Policy, the number of those leaving Canada for the United States was more than trebled, showing conclusively the effect the National Policy had in driving the people out of the country. Another statement that has been made is that wherever the Canadian farmer puts his goods upon the market and the American farmer filled the Canadian market with his goods, the market of the Canadian farmer was restricted. The hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) also made a statement yesterday showing that the farmer was benefited by the National Policy in the prices that he received from grain. The Minister of Militia also made a statement with reference to pork, to the effect that the farmer had been benefited to the tune of $1,150,000 by pork being kept out of the markets of this country. Now, there is a statement here that shows conclusively the effect the National Policy has had upon the Canadian farmer in reducing the price of his grain. I find the statement in the statistical record for 1886, showing that in 1881 wheat in Montreal was $1.33 per bushel, while at the same period in the United States it was $1.11. It was higher in Canada by 22 cents than it was in the United States during the year 1881. There was a fall in other countries from 1881 to 1886, but that was at a time the blessed National Policy kept out all American grain. In 1886, under the influence of that blessed National Policy, wheat had fallen in Canada from $1.33 to 85 cents per bushel. Wheat had fallen in the United States from $1.11 in 1881, to 87 cents in 1886, or only 24 cents per bushel, did wheat fall in the United States during the same time that it fell 48 cents in Canada ; and instead of being high in Canada in 1886, it was 2 cents lower than it was in the United States. Now, here is a statement contained in that same record, which I will read :

The very marked effect which the adoption of the National Policy, in 1879, had upon the imports of wheat and flour will be immediately apparent upon looking at the above table. It will be seen that, while the average importation of wheat in each year from 1868 to 1879 was $5,480,735, in the period 1880 to 1886 it only averaged $168,097 per annum, increasing the home market for wheat to the extent of $5,312,638 annually.

But there has been a marked decline in the price of wheat during the last five years. In Montreal, in 1881, it was $1.33 per bushel, and in 1886 it was only 85 cents, being a reduction of 48 cents. According to the United States reports, the export price of wheat in 1881 was $1.11, and in 1886 it was 87 cents, or a difference of 24 cents per bushel. That is the benefit that the Canadian farmer got from keeping out that $5,312,000 worth of wheat. There is a statement that cannot be denied ; and I am in a position to say that oats, barley and rye all fell in Canada more than they did in the United States during the existence of this blessed National Policy. Yet, hon. gentlemen opposite, with a knowledge of all these facts, with these statements brought under their notice time and again, have the audacity to rise and say that the farmers have been benefited by the duty that is placed upon agricultural products. Now, let me give another statement. On 26th last February, cattle in Buffalo were $5.30 per hundred, the lowest being $2.80. In Toronto, at the same time, the highest price was $4 per hundred, and the lowest, $2. Now, here was more than $1.50 in favour of the American farmer, and if we had had reciprocity with the United States we would have got over a dollar a hundred for every animal we had to sell. I find that last year, when I made a speech upon the budget in this House, I stated that the best of our cattle in Canada was selling at $4.50 per hundred pounds, while they were selling in the United States at $6.10, showing that we are not benefited but injured by the duty that is placed upon cattle. We have been injured in more ways than one, we have been prevented from shipping our cattle in bond through the United States into the British market, which we would have been able to do had the duty and quarantine restrictions been removed. Now, how many cattle did the people of Ontario sell during this last year, and what was their loss on those cattle ? They sold 436,352 in the home and foreign market. Let me state that on the price of animals that we sold for export, and the price of animals that we slaughtered at home, we lost just the nice little sum of $10 per head, making $4,363,000 that we lost upon our cattle, which sum we would have saved under reciprocity with the United States. Now take hogs. We are told that we are greatly benefited by having a duty placed upon pork and hogs shipped from the United States. I find that in Buffalo, on the 26th February last, hogs were selling at $4.40 for the highest quality, while in Toronto they were selling at $4.30 for the highest. We sold 978,790 hogs, and taking them at an average weight of 170 pounds each, there was a loss to the Canadian farmer of $166,394. Now, in sheep we sold 575,934 to the United States at $1.25, for those over a year old, higher in the Buffalo market than in the Toronto market, while lambs were 75 cents higher. But there was a greater number of sheep sold over one year old than under ; therefore, on sheep there was just a loss, when compared with the United States market, of $575,934. Now, when we come to barley, who does not remember that we have been accustomed to sell barley to the United States ? Who amongst the farmers in this House does not know that barley was the best paying crop we had ? We could profitably raise that crop and send it to the United States until such time as the McKinley Bill became law. Now, I admit that we can get a good price for our barley since the Wilson Bill was passed. That Wilson Bill did more to relieve the farmers of Canada than all the legislation that the Tory Government has given us during the last thirteen years. Of barley we raised 12,000,000 bushels the last year before the McKinley Bill took effect, of which we sent 9,000,000 bushels to the United States, and reckoning a loss of 18 cents per bushel, we find that the farmers of Canada lost $1,800,000 upon their barley. How often upon the floor of this House have I asked the Government to give us free corn so that we could sell our barley to the United States. We asked this Government to reciprocate with the United States in order that they would give us free corn for our barley. Then take oats. We raised 38,000,000 bushels of oats, and I find upon the same date mentioned above, oats were 3 cents a bushel higher in Buffalo than they were in Toronto. If we only sold half of that quantity, we would lose on our oats $1,600,000. Besides, instead of 3 cents we would lose 5 cents per bushel, because a bushel of oats in the United States only weighs 32 pounds, while in Canada it weighs 34 pounds. Now, take these with a few other articles, and the difference in price between the markets of Buffalo and those of Toronto represents the nice little sum of $7,691,000. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite will prate about the protection that the farmer gets in the Canadian market for his produce. There is no market in the world equal to the American market for the produce of the Canadian farmer. If you will go back to the year 1889 and see the amount of agricultural produce that was sent into the markets of the United States and the amount that was sent into the markets of Great Britain ; you will find that the United States, in animals and their produce, and in agricultural products, took about the same sum that Great Britain did, if we leave cheese out of the question. So I hold that the United States is our best market. We were also told that farm property in Canada has not been reduced in value to any appreciable extent, this statement being made by the Minister of Railways and Canals. The very fact that such a statement is made by an hon. Minister shows that he is not posted on the subject, and I think before I resume my seat I shall be able to show that the value of farm property has been reduced to a great extent. Before I enter on this subject, however, I wish to devote some attention to the Intercolonial Commission. I am astonished at some of the statements made during the proceedings. We are there told that a large quantity of machinery will be shipped to Australia from Canada. But how will it benefit the farmers to know that the Government has passed an Order in Council to remove all duties on raw material coming into this country, when the manufactured implement is exported, and that our manufacturers will be allowed to send machinery to the furthest corners of the earth so that the people there will purchase farm machinery at a cheaper rate than do the Canadian farmers. They can send machinery to the Argentine Republic, which is competing keenly with us both in wheat and cattle, and also send machinery to Australia, as I have said, so that the farmers there will be able to obtain it at less price than do Canadian farmers. Not only so, but we are paying $125,000 a year as bounty to a steamship line to carry machinery so as to place Australian farmers in that advantageous position as compared with Canadian farmers. Many statements that are very injurious to our farmers were made at this Intercolonial Commission. The Minister of Finance stated :

Mr. McMILLAN.

There are a number of things which have been mentioned, with regard to which I do not see why a good trade should not be done. I do not think you will be able to send very much of your butter here, except along the Pacific slope, where it will compete, to a certain extent, with butter from the eastern provinces, and perhaps a little from the United States.

Is it not absurd to subsidize a line of steamships to bring butter to Canada, while at the same time we are producing butter in our creameries and paying 20 cents a pound for it, which butter is afterwards sent to the old country where it only realizes 15 cents. Surely it is taking money out of the pockets of the people to subsidize a steamship line to bring agricultural products to Canada and dispose of them to the disadvantage of the farmers of the Dominion. The Finance Minister further said :

You ought to be able to do a very good trade under the present tariff, which we reduced very much last session, in frozen mutton, along the Pacific slope, because, hitherto, we have been entirely unable to supply them with the meat that they require.

That statement is lacking in one essential element, and that is the element of truth ; because we have been able to supply the Pacific coast with all the meat the people require. Any one has only to visit Calgary and see the ranches there to know that all that is needed is to turn the supply of beef westward over the Canadian Pacific Railway and supply the Pacific coast with all its needs. It must have been in a moment of weakness that the hon. Minister of Finance made such a statement. He further said :

—especially mutton, and they have imported it from the United States. I see no reason why you should not cut off a good deal of that trade which now comes from the United States.

How much mutton do the United States get from Canada ? The Trade and Navigation Returns of 1893 show that the quantity was about 7,000 pounds. No more than 29,000 sheep went into British Columbia. In 1894 there were something like 40,000 pounds of mutton and 40,000 sheep sent into British Columbia. Yet the Finance Minister has to invite the people of Australia to send products of animals to compete with the farmers of Canada, while at the same time we are bearing a tax in order to pay a subsidy for a line of steamships to drive our own products from our own markets. But the hon. gentleman is not content with simply driving the products of our farmers from our own market, but he also apparently desires to bring goods from other colonies to supplant the manufacturing products of Canada. With respect to binding twine, the hon. gentleman said :

With regard to binding twine, I am afraid we cannot offer much to New Zealand under present conditions. We have reduced that duty to 12½ per cent on invoice prices. It is really a very small duty. If you have much of an advantage in raising the raw material and working it up, you ought to have a fair chance for our western prairie market.

The hon. gentleman desires to supply the market in the prairie province with a foreign manufactured article, and thus injuriously affect the cordage manufacturers of Canada. And then with respect to wool, the hon. gentleman said :

Then, with reference to wool, I do not want to go farther than the Government would be willing to carry me out, but I do not think there would be much difficulty in giving New Zealand a chance, if there is anything she can give us a compensating chance for in her market. You must take things now as being in statu quo. We are commencing to make a bargain, and this wool business, I think, could be arranged so that you could get a differential on that, and I do not know how far it might go ; it might go clear to the line of freeing it, in return for a corresponding advantage that you might give us upon something we send to you.

When the tariff was being revised last session the Minister of Finance put forward the idea that a small duty placed on wool would be a benefit to the Canadian farmers. But in order to carry out this imperial federation fad, with which he is now possessed, he is willing to sacrifice the interests of the farmers and compel them to pay a subsidy for a line of steamships to carry produce to supplant them in their own market. That is not all. I find that we are likely to be saddled with another line of steamships, for the Premier was perfectly willing that this should be done. He stated that in a very few years he hoped to see a line of steamship running from Halifax to Cape of Good Hope, for such an undertaking would require the investment of a very small sum of money. I do not know where the expenses of the present Government are going to end. They are subsidizing lines of steamers to carry merchandise to the antipodes. How much of this will consist of the products of the farm? I see that Australia took our agricultural products to the value of $18 in 1893, according to the Trade and Navigation returns.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is an increase.

Mr. McMILLAN. We were also told by the Prime Minister that we are working up a large trade in machinery with the Australian colonies, and he stated at the Inter-colonial Conference that we had sent 8,000 machines last year to these colonies, whereas, three or four years ago, we only sent about eight machines. Therefore, he contended that trade had developed in this direction. Now, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns, we sent machines to Australia to the value of $79,356, and to New Zealand, to the value of $22,505, or, in all, $101,862 worth. If we sent 8,000 machines, they must have been very small machines, indeed, and, according to our Trade Returns, they would be only valued at $12.61 each. They were not binders, nor reapers, nor mowers, so they must have been some kind of small sewing machines. Yet, for this petty trade, the Prime Minister was willing to sacrifice the interests of the farmers of Canada. Last year, when the tariff was being revised, we were led to believe at first that a large reduction of duty was to be made in a good many lines, and that the tariff would be amended to a considerable extent by taking away the specific duties and making the duties ad valorem. In this, however, we were sadly disappointed, for we found that before the final revision of the tariff, the specific duties had all been reinstated. Let me give you, Mr. Speaker, the following figures to show what duties we are paying now on staple articles, and the figures will plainly show that the duties have not been reduced:—

Mr. McMILLAN.

During the month of December $5,305 worth of rice was imported, on which the duty was $4,189, or over 78 per cent; 587,145 tons of coal, with duty of $142,523, or 24 per cent; $13,077 cotton clothing, with a duty of $4,289, or 30 per cent; $75,037 cutlery, hardware, tools and implements, with a duty of $22,480, or almost 30 per cent; $16,173 boots and shoes, with a duty of $4,033, or 25 per cent; $53,034 coal oil, with a duty of $48,822, or over 92 per cent; $8,885 of soap, with a duty of $3,111, or over 34 per cent; $18,125 of woollen clothing, with duty of $6,123, or 33 per cent; $119,553 of dress goods, with a duty of $35,733, or almost 30 per cent.

These figures prove plainly, Mr. Speaker, that we are paying as high duties as we did before the reductions which the Finance Minister boasts so much about. Now, with reference to the position of the manufacturers in this country towards the present Government. Ever since the first necessity arose for the establishment of a Manufacturers' Association, we find that the report of the Association says "that it is a strong factor in Dominion politics." In the annual report of this association, published in February last, I find the following statement:

Since the inauguration of the National Policy, Canada has prospered and the social well-being of the people elevated. Wages have been increased, and the working classes have received great benefit.

Sir, I take exception to such a statement, because I believe that the wages of the working classes have been reduced, and I think I will be able to prove that. In 1882, those engaged in the manufacturing industries in Canada had an average wage of $332 per annum; while the average wage for last year claimed by the Government statistician in the Statistical Year-Book, is only $271. Here we have facts to prove that the reduction of the wages of those engaged in manufacturing industries in Canada amounts to $50 a year for each person since the year 1882. The report goes on:

A matter upon which your committee laid strong stress, was that relating to drawbacks of duties upon exports. In frequent interviews with the Finance Minister, your secretary urged that this policy should be embodied in that of the Government, and this was finally done by an Order in Council. It is contended by the manufacturers that the Order in Council encourages sending abroad for certain lines of products that used to be made in Canada. * * *

The manufacturers go on to state that that must be remedied immediately, and, no doubt, the Finance Minister will bow to the dictates of his masters, the Canadian manufacturers, because we found last year, when the tariff was being reduced that there was some power behind the throne that we could not understand. Not a single reduction was made in favour of the farmers or the workingmen of Canada, but a great many changes were made at the dictates of the manufacturers. In fact, they tell us themselves that this was the case :

The Association has just reason for congratulating itself upon the influence it possesses in assisting to mould public opinion in the matter of affording tariff protection to our manufacturing industries, and in shaping the laws in conformity thereto. There never was a time, since the formation of this Association twenty years ago, that its influence was stronger or more pronounced than now.

That is the language contained in the report of the Manufacturers' Association last February, when they had their annual meeting. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that the farmers of the Dominion of Canada, especially the farmers of Ontario, who have read these statements which I have quoted to the House, begin to believe that it is time that those who should really rule the country should occupy seats on the treasury benches, and not have it, as it is now, that the country should be ruled by a set of manufacturers, whose dictum has become the law of the land. The report goes on to say :

On February 14th, 1894, a largely attended joint meeting of the Tariff and Executive committees of the Association and of other members was held in this office. The brief of the Association was presented to Mr. Foster, at Ottawa, on February 26th, 1894, the receipt of which was acknowledged by him, as hereinbefore alluded to. The fruit of this sense of responsibility is to be found in the fact that in many instances the very words of our recommendations to the Government regarding tariff features, are found in the Tariff Acts. We have in the past, and, it is to be hoped, we will in the future, devote any small surplus of our membership fees to spreading the truth by means of campaign literature and campaign speeches, following the manner, but not the matter, of the English Cobden Club.

We have always felt that there was some power that furnished the means to the present Government for more than campaign speeches, or campaign literature, and I believe, Sir, that the manufacturers have only acknowledged in this, a part of what they do. That is one of the reasons why the present Government have got to accept their brief, and to act upon it, in order that the manufacturers may be able to bring a more potent power than speeches and literature to bear upon the electors of this country when the general elections come off. We have heard a great deal from hon. gentlemen opposite about the condition of Great Britain under free trade. Before free trade was adopted in England, in 1842, the state of affairs in England under protection was quite appalling, and I shall quote from Dumbley's "Charter of Nations," page 67, to prove this. He says :

But it was in the manufacturing districts that the sufferings were most frightful. Some of the details are quite appalling, and testify to an intensity and universality of destitution, starvation and misery to which no period of temporary distress, since the adoption of free trade in England, can show the slightest approach. In Leeds, there were 20,936 persons whose average earnings were under one shilling a week. In Nottingham, 10,580 persons, nearly one-fifth of the population, were in receipt of parochial relief. In most of the leading trades of Birmingham the men were earning one-half, and in some cases one-third, of their usual wages, while some of the masters were so near ruined that they had on a Saturday night to pawn their goods to pay their men's wages. In Paisley thirty failures took place within two months, and one-third of the wage-receivers were thrown upon the public for support. In Manchester, 12,000 families, after having pawned every article of furniture and of dress with which they could possibly dispense, were supported by voluntary charitable contributions. One-third of the population of Coventry was out of work. In Spitalfields, 8,000 looms were idle, and 24,000 persons thrown upon parochial relief. In the metropolis, a thousand letter-press compositors and 9,000 tailors were altogether without work. But enough. There is no need to multiply instances to substantiate the fact.

Hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House have made a great deal of statements about free trade in England, and the other evening the Minister of Railways and Canals asked what effect free trade would have, and what the effect the abolition of the National Policy would have upon Canada? He said that if the National Policy were abolished, all our manufactures would be swept out of existence, we would be paying for foreign labour, and sending our goods to a foreign market. Here is what Mr. Drummond says :

Mr. H. Drummond said that the end and intentions of the Manchester school were to discharge all British labourers and to employ foreign labourers in lieu of them.

That is a prediction that was made in England at that time, and it is made in Canada to-day.

Mr. Herries deprecated these attacks on a system which was the nursery of our flourishing mercantile marine, the foundation of our naval supremacy, and which, if once abandoned for the sake of a rash experiment, could never be restored. Mr. T. Baring called on all those who attached any importance to the national safety, to vote against the Bill, which he believed was forced upon a reluctant people and a hesitating Parliament.

But, in spite of all these predictions, the Bill abolishing protection in England was passed in 1849, and from that time, England took a start forward and has attained a position among the nations of the earth which she never could have obtained under a protective policy. Let me read a statement made by Sir William Harcourt at the opening of Parliament last spring :

Sir William Harcourt made an interesting comparison as to pauperism. In 1851 pauperism, on the total population was 4.5 per cent ; it is now 2.4 per cent, or about one-half. Of children under 16, it was then 5 ; it is now 2.3. From the ages of 16 to 60 it was 1.4 ; it was now .5. In old age, after 60, it was 21.5 ; it is now 13.7. In 1849, the mean adult pauperism was 13 per 1,000 ; it has now fallen to 7·7 but it never fell much below that figure until after 1871, when the fall in prices began. This has reference to the period since 1871. From 1849 to 1871 the fall was down to 7·7; but it has now fallen concurrently with the fall in prices to 2·4. There is severe depression in Great Britain, no doubt, but there are facts also which tell on the other side, and show that the progress of the people in comfort and abundance of food has been continuous.

That shows the condition of the people of England under free trade. Now, I am going to attempt to show that the National Policy has borne extremely hard on the workingmen and farmers of Canada, apart from the reduction in prices that has taken place. The statement I am about to make goes to show that the value of farm lands must have been reduced in Canada 33 per cent from 1880 down to the present time. I am going to read from the Statistical Year-Book for 1893. It gives the census returns of the produce of Canadian farms in the years 1880 and 1890, in barley, oats, rye, pease, buckwheat, beans, corn, potatoes, turnips and other roots, and hay, and says:

Taking these articles, with wheat, and putting them into tons, we find that the total number of tons reported as the product of the farms of Canada in 1890 was 15,092,227 tons, against 11,576,317 tons in 1880, an increase of 30·4 per cent. While, however, there has been this increase in the quantity raised, there has been a decrease of about 11 per cent in the aggregate average price. During the same period there has been a decrease in the number of farmers equal to a little over 1 per cent.

Now, that is something I cannot understand, how there has been a decrease in the number of farmers, in view of the fact that, according to the census, there were some 464,000 resident occupiers of the soil in 1881, and 620,000 in 1891. Then, it says:

This points to an increase in the acreage of the individual holdings. Such increase is in accord with the facts obtained from the census of 1891, according to which there were in the Dominion 1,149 more occupiers of properties of 50 to 100 acres in extent; 28,028 more occupiers of properties ranging from 100 to 200 acres, and 16,477 more occupiers of properties ranging from 100 to 200 acres, and 16,477 more occupiers of properties ranging from 200 acres upwards, than there were in 1881.

How it can be that there were more occupiers of the soil in 1891 than in 1881, and yet a reduction in 1891 of over 7,000 farmers, is something I cannot understand:

In 1891 there were 649,506 farmers to divide among them 15,092,227 tons, and in 1881 there were 656,712 farmers to divide among them 11,576,317 tons. The average for 1891 was 23 tons, and for 1881, 18 tons. Thus, there was an increase of five tons per farmer in the quantity.

The total tons, multiplied by the aggregate average price, $18.18 and $20.41, would yield $279,426,686 for 1891 and $236,272,629 for that of 1881. The average farmer, therefore, would receive in 1891, $430 from his crop of the articles enumerated, against $360 in 1881.

Mr. McMILLAN.

Now, I have made a little calculation. I have gone over these figures, having, like some others, had my doubts with reference to their correctness. I took the quantities of grain given in the Statistical Year-Book for 1891, and I took the price that I found recorded in the markets of Ontario, and I found that there was a little discrepancy. I find that while the statistician made it $279,000,000, I only made it $229,000,000, so that I made the farmer of 1891 only receive the sum of $370 a year, while the farmer of 1881 got something like $433. This is reversing the condition of things from what the Statistical Year-Book makes it. That makes the farmer of 1891, $70 better off than he was in 1881. But by the calculation I have made he is $74 worse off than he was in 1891. Just a little difference in our calculation of $144 in the income of a farmer in 1891. But there is another strange calculation made, a very strange one indeed, and one that I can hardly account for. There has been a little blue-book issued, being an appendix to the report of the Minister of Agriculture respecting manufacturing industries. I find on page 8:

It has been calculated that the output of the farmers of Canada, allowing an average of 25 cents per day as the costs of farm products consumed by each person in Canada, plus the exports of the products of the farm, is equal to $500,000,000 a year. The output from the mechanical and manufacturing establishments is valued at $476,260,000. The farmers numbered 408,738 in 1891, and, therefore, the average farmer contribute to the state the sum of $1,223 a year.

But that same year they numbered 649,506 according to the Statistical Year-Book. It is a very convenient way of making a calculation. Let me just examine this calculation. Each individual in the province of Ontario consumes 25 cents worth of farm produce per day. Let us see what that would lead to. If each individual consumed 25 cents worth per day, he would consume $91.25 per year. Therefore a farmer with a family of five would consume $456 worth per year. So that, according to the statements of the statistician himself, when he takes the total amount of agricultural produce raised by each farmer as amounting to $430, each farmer and his family consumes per year $26 worth more than they produced. By this method of calculation, the statistician makes each hand on a farm produce $1,223 worth, taking only 408,736 as the number of farmers, whereas in reality he only produces $436 worth, making the calculation properly—a slight mistake of $737 for each farmer. Now, we come to deal with farm values. It has been stated that there was a large increase in the value of land in Ontario. In 1882 it was $632,342,500; in 1893 it amounted to, $602,664,361, or a reduction of $29,678,139 in farm land alone. Last year the reduction was $13,164,110. Now, there has been since 1882 something like 2,000,000 acres of land cleared in Ontario. Taking that at $20 per acre which is the lowest calculation, that would give $40,000,000, which added to $29,678,138 would make something like $70,500,000. Yet to my certain knowledge there is not a township in western Ontario but which on Government or municipal and private drains has spent some $5 or $6 per acre. This also ought to be added and let me say, from my own personal knowledge, that I know that land has decreased in value at the lowest calculation $10 an acre all over Ontario. I know of a farm for which some ten years ago $5,500 was offered. There was a comfortable brick house built on it, the contract for building which and furnishing all material except stone, sand and lime, was let for $1,200. That farm was sold last spring at $4,000. There is another farm for which $5,500 was offered ten years ago, and two years ago it was sold for $4,000, although it had a nice bank barn and outhouses added to it. Another farm, with a first class dwelling house on it, for which $6,000 was offered and was sold two years ago for $4,000. At Seaforth a farm for which, five or six years ago, $10,000, was paid, was sold for $7,000 three years ago. These are fair samples of the reduction in the value of land all over Ontario. I have travelled over the province for the last three years from Montreal to Sarnia, and I find that for every farm that can be sold there are ten in the market. I would just say that in this as well as in the old country, the very best of farms have not been reduced quite so much as the poorest farms, but to my certain knowledge the reduction on value is over 30 per cent on an average. How could it be possible that farm lands have not been reduced? The values of all field crops during the last year in Ontario was $101,886,557, which on 285,608 farms gave to each the sum of $357. The total average yearly value of the field crops from 1882 to 1892 was $114.

533,844, or an average of $401 to each farmer. Now, when we take the field crops of 1882 we find that they amounted to $155,000,000, giving an average to each farmer of $771. Now, is it possible that land could maintain its value seeing that the farmers' receipts for his field crops had been reduced from $771 in 1882 to $357 in 1893? And I am perfectly certain, Mr. Speaker, that if we had the report for 1894, it would make even a worse showing. If we take the prices of these field crops separately, we see how the farmers' land must have been reduced in value, because I hold that a farm is only worth, in reality, what the products of the farm will bring when placed upon the markets of the world. In 1882, fall wheat, in Ontario, averaged $1.14 per bushel; in 1893, it averaged 59 cents, a fall of 55 cents per bushel. Spring wheat in 1882 averaged $1.19 per bushel; and in 1893, 59 cents, a fall of 60 cents. Barley, in 1882, averaged 71 cents per bushel, and in 1893, 40 cents, a fall of 31 cents. Oats fell from 43 cents, in 1882, to 33 cents in 1893, a reduction of 10 cents. Pease fell from 76 cents to 54 cents, a difference of 22 cents. Rye, in 1882, was 74 cents, and in 1893, 47 cents, a reduction of 27 cents. Beans fell from $2.35 to $1.18, a reduction of $1.17. Hay averaged $12.84 a ton in 1882; and $7.64 in 1893, a reduction of $5.20 per ton. Wool averaged from 20 to 32 cents, according to quality, in 1882; and in 1893 it averaged 18 cents, a fall, on the average, of, say 6 cents. Now, that proves that the farmer's income must have been reduced to a very great extent. The following table will show the reduction in the income of an average farmer, with forty acres under field crops, taking the reduction in prices I have just given:—

—	Per Acre.		No. of Acres.	Total Crop.	Reduction per		Total Reduction.
					$ cts.	$ cts.
Wheat	bush.	20	10	bush. 200	bush. 0 55	110 00
Barley	"	25	5	" 125	" 0 31	38 75
Oats	"	34	10	" 340	" 0 09	30 60

Total								276 35

And yet hon. gentlemen opposite will tell us that the farmers are in a prosperous condition, that no other class in Canada is so prosperous. Now, I want to show conclusively that wages have not kept up in Canada, but that they have fallen. According to the statement, given in the Statistical Year-Book, the average wage of those working in the manufacturing industries, was $271. I have here a statement of thirty-eight of the principal industries for 1882, showing that the average wage is $322. This would indicate an average reduction of $51.00 in the wages of the hands employed in manufacturing industries from 1882 to 1893. I am convinced that even in England, with her free trade policy, wages have gone up rather than down. The statistician Mulhall, in his "History of Wages and Prices," says that in 1850 the wage-earners in the United States received 23·3 per cent of the value of the product. In 1860 they received 21·2 per cent, and in 1870 they received 19 per cent; and in 1880, 17·8 per cent—a drop in wages of nearly one-quarter. In the same period, the products of each individual, on the average, increased 83 per cent, while the wages increased only 33 per cent. In Great Britain, operatives received, as wages, from 30 to 33 per cent of the value of the manufactures they produced. In Europe, the proportion was 30 per cent, and in the United States, as stated, 18 per cent. These calculations were made in 1885, and the relative conditions have not changed since. In Canada, the number of hands employed in manufacturing industries in 1890 was 367,865. The amount paid in wages was $99,762,441, which gave an average of $271. According to the report I mentioned before, thirty-eight of the principal industries in Ontario averaged $322 in wages for each operative employed, showing a higher rate of wages in 1882 than in 1893, of $51 per operative. Now, here is a statement relating to the United States, taken from the tables of trade and labour statistics, beginning with 1860. In this table, $100 is taken as a basis and increase or reductions noted accordingly. In agricultural implements, between 1871 and 1891 wages fell 14·2 per cent. In books and newspapers there was a fall of 11·2 per cent from 1881 to 1891; in building trades, there was a fall of 10·2 from 1871 to 1891; in carriages and wagons there was a rise; in city public works, there was a fall of 10·7; in cotton goods, there was a fall of four-fifths of 1 per cent; in dry goods, a rise of 49·3; in gingham, a fall of 9·2; in illuminating gas, a fall of 21·2. Between the years 1871 to 1881 there was a fall in eight industries in the United States of 22·4 per cent. In six industries, from 1881 to 1891, there was an average rise of 10 per cent, which still left them 12 per cent below what they were in 1871. In three industries, ale, beer and porter, there was a rise of 56·6; in carriage and wagon makers, there was a rise of 22·5; and in groceries, a rise of 47 per cent. Now, I have another statement here with respect to labour in the United States, showing that in that highly protective country wages of labourers have greatly shrunk. From 1840 to 1866 wages rose steadily, but in 1862 the Morrill tariff was imposed, and from that time wages fell steadily. I have here a work entitled "Results of Statistical Investigations from 1866 to 1892, with extensive inquiries concerning wages from 1840 to 1865." This shows that wages with board fell in certain district from $1.74 in 1886 to $1.02 in 1892. Wages without board fell from $2.20 in 1886, to $1.30 in 1892. Wages with board in another locality fell from $17.45 per month in 1886, to $12.54 in 1892. Wages per month by the year or season, fell from $22.87 in 1866, to $18.60 in 1892. So that there has been a steady reduction in wages in the United States from the time they adopted protection down to the present. This is a statement that has just come into the library within the last two days. Now, here is a statement respecting prices in various European countries, Italy, Germany, Switzerland, Russia, France, England and Belgium. I will merely summarize the statement by saying that wages are over 20 per cent higher in England than in any of those protected countries, in all but two or three occupations. In Russia, engineers are paid a little higher than in England, and the reason is that the engineers in Russia are mostly Englishmen. Also, glass blowers in Belgium, and female cotton spinners in Germany receive a little higher wages than in England. I have here a statement of a gentleman who travelled all over the continent of Europe, and paid strict attention to the wages given in each country, and at the close of his journey he wrote this book, and gave statements with respect to the wages that I have just quoted. At the end he says:

Let the protectionist read these tables and say why, if protection protects, if tariffs make high wages, the protected states of Europe are in so impoverished a condition. If free trade causes stagnation and low wages, why is England so far ahead of her protected European competitors? so far ahead of her own condition forty years ago, before she had the sense to adopt a free trade policy? Until these questions are answered, the thoughtful student cannot but ask himself, "Does protection protect?"

Here is another statement I want to give you. The manufacturers of Canada claim to produce $475,475,705 worth of goods, of which only $7,692,755 worth are exported from the country, which leaves $467,776,295 worth of goods to be consumed in Canada upon which no duty is paid. Now, the statement has been made that we pay 30 per cent more upon $265,000,000 of these goods than we would pay if the National Policy did not exist. If we take the $467,766,295 and reckon a duty of 17 per cent upon that sum, it would amount to over $79,000,000 that come out of the pockets of the people and go into the pockets of the manufacturers, because we must admit that the whole amount that the people pay extra does not go into the pockets of the manufacturers. The manufacturers sell to the wholesale merchant, and the wholesale merchant puts his profit upon the cost, and the retailer puts his profits on what he pays. Now, reckoning the population of Canada at five million people, 17 per cent on $467,766,000 gives to each individual in Canada a duty of $16 per head, or $80 per family, as taxes that come out of the pockets of the people. Of the taxes that come out of the pockets of the people not one cent enters the treasury. Then of customs duty, we pay $4.22 per head, or $21.10 per family. Then in excise we pay $1.69 per head, or $8.45 per family of five persons. So that in taxes under this blessed National Policy, each family in Canada pays $129.55. Let me say that these duties fall more heavily upon the agricultural portion of the community than upon any other class, for this reason, that they have got to pay their share of all other duties, and they have got to pay the duty on agricultural implements, besides. Now, we have been frequently told that this tariff is a farmers' tariff; we have been told of the great benefits that this Government have conferred upon the farmers. But let me repeat what I have already repeated, I suppose, half a dozen times in this House, that during the Mackenzie regime there was a clause in the tariff providing that agricultural implements could come into the country free of duty when imported by agricultural societies for the encouragement of agriculture; so that any farmer who paid duties upon implements during the Mackenzie regime, did so through his own fault, and because he did not take advantage of that provision in the tariff. I know whereof I speak, when I say that the farmers of Canada are worse off to-day than they were then. They have only $357 per head worth of farm produce, but out of that they have got to take their seed and to feed their teams. But it is impossible to place the products of animals on the market and, at the same time, feed animals on the farm. There is, moreover, to be paid by the farmer, taxes and statute labour, and other expenses to keep up his farm, and the farmer has only $300 a year on which to do this. Let him hire a man and give him $150 a year, and the farmer has only $150 left to cover his own labour and provide food and clothing for his family. He is, therefore, worse off than workingmen are to-day, in a great many instances. I hope the time is at hand when the Opposition will have an opportunity of doing what hon. gentlemen opposite are constantly asking us to do, to show them the policy we will adopt, and I believe the Opposition, on attaining power, will be able to frame a policy that will reduce the annual expenditure to a much smaller amount than at the present day—when a new Government is fairly organized—and that the country will no longer hear of charges with respect to Curran bridges, Tay canals, and a great many other improvements that have robbed the people of this country of large sums of money.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 83) respecting the Eastern Assurance Company of Canada.—(Mr. Fraser.)

NORTH-WEST RIFLE ASSOCIATIONS.

Mr. DAVIN asked, Whether the Minister of Militia is aware that his predecessor in office promised more than a year ago to lend the Rifle Associations of the North-west some of the discarded rifles in store, not in use and not to be put in use by the militia or the North-west Mounted Police? Whether the Minister will redeem this promise of his predecessor?

Mr. DICKEY. There is no record of any such promise in the department, and the Government has no knowledge of it. The subject-matter of the question is now receiving the attention of the Government.

NOVA SCOTIA SOUTH SHORE RAILWAY COMPANY—CONTRACT.

Mr. FORBES asked, 1. Has any contract relating to the construction of a railroad along the south shore of Nova Scotia been entered into between the Government or the Railway Department and the South Shore Railroad Company? 2. If so, when was the said contract entered into and by whom is the same signed?

Mr. HAGGART. 1. Yes, a contract was entered into. 2. Contract was entered into on the 28th February, 1895, and it is signed by: Tunis W. Bergin, president, South Shore Railway Company; Frederick B. Bard, secretary, South Shore Railway Company; John Haggart, Minister of Railways and Canals; John H. Balderson, secretary, Department of Railways and Canals.

SUPERANNUATION OF MR. HATCH.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Has the superannuation of Walter Hatch, of the Interior Department, been recommended? If so, from what date? Why was Mr. Hatch recommended for superannuation? What is his age? How long has he been in the public service? How long has he contributed to the superannuation fund, and the gross amount paid in by him? What is the amount of annuity granted, and the number of years added to time of service, if any?

Mr. DALY. 1. The superannuation of Mr. Walter Hatch has been recommended, to take effect from the 1st July next. 2. His superannuation has been recommended because, for the purpose of promoting efficiency and economy in the public service, the clerkship held by him will be abolished from and after the 30th of June next. 3. He is thirty-eight years old. 4. At the present date he has been 21 years, 9 months and 5 days in the public service. 5. He has contributed on his monthly salary for 21 years and 10 months. The gross amount contributed is $251.65. 6. The amount of the gratuity to be granted has not been fixed yet. It is not proposed to add any years to his service for the purpose of calculating that amount.

Mr. McMULLEN.

DYNAMITE FACTORY—LACHINE CANAL.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier) asked. 1. Whether the Government is aware that a dynamite factory has been erected and operated on one of the Lachine Canal banks or dams, within a few feet of the channel of navigation used by hundreds of people every day, and a few acres of the town of Lachine? 2. Was the construction and operation of said factory authorized by the Government? 3. Is the operation of said factory and the storage of said dynamite at the said spot dangerous to the people navigating through said canal in particular and the said population of the town of Lachine? 4. Does the Government consider itself responsible for any damage which might be caused by any explosion of said dynamite? If not, who will be so responsible? 5. Has any protests been sent against the manufacture and storage of said dynamite? If so, by whom?

Mr. HAGGART. 1. The Government is aware that dynamite is stored on the pier entrance to Lachine Canal, about 800 feet from the waterworks of the town of Lachine, and about 1,200 feet from any other buildings. 2. Not aware of any factory being erected or in operation. 3. The matter was referred to the superintending engineer, who reports that in his opinion the spot on which the dynamite is stored is not dangerous to either property or life. 4. The Government does not consider itself responsible for any damage which might be caused by explosion of said dynamite. If any trouble would result, it is probable it would be against the contractor who is storing the dynamite. 5. A protest has been sent from the town council of Lachine against the storage of the said dynamite.

APPOINTMENT OF REVISING OFFICERS.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell) asked. Under what authority does the Government acquire the right of appointing two revising officers for the same electoral district?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Government are entirely guided by the law as laid down in 54-55 Victoria, chap. 18, An Act further to amend "The Electoral Franchise Act," which says:

4. Subsection four of section eleven of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:—

"A revising officer may be appointed for and be required to discharge the said duties in respect of more than one electoral district, and may be appointed for a portion of any electoral district."

And by 57-58 Victoria, chap. 12, An Act further to amend "The Electoral Franchise Act," which reads:

5. The Governor in Council may at any time after the passing of this Act appoint a revising officer for any electoral district for the constitution of which the Redistribution Act provides, or the limits of which are defined by that Act, or for any portion of any such electoral district, or for any such electoral district or portion of an electoral district, and any other electoral district or portion of an electoral district, which he thinks fit to attach thereto; and upon such appointment, the jurisdiction of any revising officer heretofore appointed shall cease and determine and his commission shall be superseded so far as such jurisdiction and commission extend to any territory included in the jurisdiction of the new appointee.

MAPS OF ELECTORAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, Has the Government, or any member of the Government, given directions or made provisions for the preparation of maps showing the boundaries of electoral divisions of the Dominion or any province thereof, or are maps of electoral divisions for the Dominion or any province of the Dominion being prepared under Government supervision, or with the knowledge of the Government, or any of its members?

Mr. MONTAGUE. In response to the hon. gentleman's question, I would say yes, with the knowledge and by the direction of the Government the Queen's Printer has had in charge the preparation of maps of the various electoral districts of Canada. I am sure that the fact that the Queen's Printer, whose reputation for skill and care is so great, is in charge of this work, is a guarantee that it will be well done, and I am sure that hon. gentlemen opposite will recognize the utility of the work itself. These maps have been prepared from the postal maps as a basis. The cost of the work will therefore be very light. The plan of distribution is not yet arranged, but I think I am authorized to say that a volume such as the one I hold in my hand, containing maps of all the electoral districts and a number of copies of the map of his electoral district in sheet form, will be presented to each member of the House with the collected sets. Libraries and such like will be supplied also. The work is very nearly finished, and I hope to have it ready for distribution during the present session.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If I may be permitted to say so, I would suggest that when that work is published, it might be desirable not to have it distributed, because so far as my district is concerned—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. Entirely out of order.

FISHING GUARDIANS ON THE MIRAMICHI.

Mr. COLTER asked, 1. What are the names of the fishing guardians employed by the Dominion Government on the south-west Miramichi, from the Tide head to the Forks during the seasons of 1893 and 1894? 2. What was the amount of money paid each? 3. Is it the intention of the Government to place any guardians from the Forks up the North Branch? 4. What instructions were given to such guardians? 5. Is there any unleased waters between Burnt Hill and the Forks? If so, how much?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I beg to reply as follows:—1. The following guardians were employed on the south-west Miramichi River during 1893 and 1894, at the remuneration set opposite their respective names. The particular locality in which their supervision is from time to time—according to circumstances—required, is arranged by the district inspector and the local fishery overseer, who are responsible for the proper placing of the men:—1893—S. Standish, $100.80; Wm. Palmer, $120; Alex. McDonald, $150; T. Weaver, $183.60; Wm. Russell, $183.60; R. Hurley, $183.60; Jas. Astle, $188.40; N. O'Brien, $188.40; J. L. A. Bonnell, $159.60. 1894—R. O'Brien, $27.60; Wm. Palmer, $125.60; S. Standish, $136.80; Alex. McDonald, $181.65; H. Scott, $91.20; Thos. Weaver, $34.80; N. O'Brien, $110.40; Jas. Astle, $110.40; M. Bowes, $110.40; S. Holmes, $74.40; J. L. O'Donnell, $110.40; F. McCormack, $75.60; B. H. Jardene, $30. 2. Answered above. 3. Yes; the Government at present employs guardians there. 4. Their instructions are given them by the inspector of fisheries for the district, and in addition to the general instructions, cover such special directions, from time to time, as the local conditions and requirements demand for the proper protection of the fisheries. The general instructions are: To enforce the fishery laws and regulations; to report the names of all persons found violating them, and to remove and deliver to the fishery overseer for the district, all appliances being used illegally. 5. The Department of Marine and Fisheries is not in possession of the specific information asked for; any leases granted for non-tidal waters in this river, are issued by the Provincial Government.

THE CONSOLIDATED FUND.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, What are the receipts and expenditures chargeable to Consolidated Fund, from the 1st to the 10th of May, in 1894 and 1895?

Mr. FOSTER. The receipts for 1894 and 1895 are respectively $31,098,545 and $28,549,968, and the expenditures respectively $26,926,648 and $27,447,636.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would like to ask the leader of the House whether, in view of the great public interest taken in the pro-pcsal contained in the Government's Order in Council of March last to convert into a cash payment of $2,500,000 the subsidies provided by Parliament for the Winnipeg and Saskatchewan Railway, popularly known as the Hudson Bay Railway, the Government is prepared, since it has had a consultation with its followers, I understand, this morning, to announce to the House its policy with respect to that order, and whether the Government will ask the House to carry it out or withdraw it?

Mr. FOSTER. The Government is not prepared to put this matter before the House at this moment.

REPORT.

Report of the Department of the Interior, for the calendar year 1894.—(Mr. Daly.)

THE SEAL FISHERIES.

Mr. PRIOR. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Government whether they have received any intimation as to whether the arrangement for the sealing up of sealing arms and implements, agreed to between Her Majesty's Government and that of the United States for 1894, will be renewed for 1895?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The Government has just received a despatch from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, announcing that "Her Majesty's Government have decided not to renew agreement signed with the United States Government, as to sealing up of arms and implements of sealing vessels."

COMMISSION ON THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. FLINT. Before the Orders are called, I would like to ask the hon. leader of the House what probability there is of our having the printed report of the Royal Commission on the Liquor Traffic placed in our hands shortly. Of course, it is impossible to go on with the discussion that will arise on a resolution of which I have given notice, unless that report is first in our hands.

Mr. FOSTER. The report was laid on the Table, and then, of course, became the property of the House, and was sent to the Printing Committee. It was sent to the Printing Committee in order, of course. The Printing Committee, I believe, has not had its meeting, the Senate division not being present, but I asked the chairman of the House Committee yesterday to send the report to the printer, in order that it might be gone on with in the meantime.

SUPERANNUATION.

Mr. McMULLEN. When does the Minister of Finance expect the return he kindly promised to furnish with regard to superannuation?
Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Mr. FOSTER. The return is in progress, and will be brought down as soon as possible. I do not think there will be much delay.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. COCKBURN. The truth of the apothegm that "hope springs eternal in the human breast," was never more fully verified than in the extraordinary action taken by hon. gentlemen opposite when they adopted and presented to us for adoption, this new and strange policy of free trade as it is practised in England. I would suggest to these hon. gentlemen the propriety of remembering that it is well to be off with the old love before they are on with the new. Not a few gentlemen who have neglected that precaution have found themselves in a suit for damages heavily mulcted.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do you speak from experience?

Mr. COCKBURN. Before I am done with some of the figures of the hon. gentleman, I may, perhaps, have enlarged materially his experience. I confess that I did not expect such a display of hope from hon. gentlemen opposite so early in the session. I did think that after the untimely demise of those poor, miserable triplets, commercial union, unrestricted reciprocity, and continental union, those gentlemen would have come here showing some signs of the bereavement they had sustained. I did expect that, if not draped in the emblems of woe, to which, as we all know, they are well accustomed, they would have come here somewhat subdued—not showing such callous indifference to the loss of their only offspring, but showing some grief for those poor little departed ones. But I must admit I find some excuse for them when I reflect that when they looked at commercial union, they must have seen it was but a miserable, distorted abortion, which never could survive its birth beyond a week or two. And when the poor little thing was dead and buried, they resurrected and rebaptized it under the name of "continental union," but so feeble was the constitution of the little infant, that the first breath of public opinion blotted out its flickering existence. I must say, however, that I had higher hopes of unrestricted reciprocity. I felt that with it I had something to give and something to take; but when I am asked to give away all that I have, and still carry out the policy of unrestricted reciprocity, I feel that by some chance or other I must have come into a house from which common sense must have fled. I was, at first blush, deeply attached, I may say, to unrestricted reciprocity, and looked for great things from it. Well do I recollect how the hon. and gallant knight from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), when he presented his little hantling to the House, hugged it to his arms and depicted to us the enormous advantages that would accrue from our adopting it into the family. Why, the whole wealth of the coral strands of India or all the El Dorados were nothing to what the hon. gentleman offered to this House if we would but accept it. Talk of him as a pessimist, no man in this House has been a greater optimist. He told us the other evening that he was unjustly charged with this quality; he told us that during the short regime in which he held the reins of government, so far as financial matters are concerned, he was accused by his friends of being too sanguine. I may say that he has got over that defect, but well do I recollect, and still hug to my memory the great promises he made us when he ushered in this little babe to take the place of its two deceased little brothers. He told us that hailing, as he did, from Ontario, he considered it his duty carefully to look into this matter, and he stated, not as a matter of opinion on which there could be doubt, but as a matter of certainty, that the moment we accepted this unrestricted babe, that moment every acre—rather every cultivated acre, for I wish to be exact—in the whole of Ontario would increase ten dollars in value. He condescended to inform us at the same time that Ontario had of such land, 22,000,000 acres. Simple man that I was, I took my pen, and I multiplied my 22,000,000 acres by ten, and I found that I had there safe in hand a no smaller sum than $220,000,000. Why, when our gallant friend touches figures, he never does it by halves. Tens of millions and thousands of millions are much the same to him. Our hon. friends opposite, having been so long denied the privilege of rolling the money of the public under their hands, seem to gloat over the enormity of the figures. My hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. Macdonald) last night, rolled out 200, 400, 500 millions, just as if they were his most familiar friends on earth. I do not grudge them that joy; it is all they are ever going to get. The last chance of redemption they have lost in bringing forward the most absurd policy ever offered for the consideration of the Canadian people. But, not content with offering us $220,000,000, the hon. gentleman said. You have got 1,250,000 horses in Ontario, and I can assure you that the moment you pass this treaty of unrestricted reciprocity, that moment every horse will be worth $30 more. God be thanked, I said, for this new blessing. I added these $37,500,000 to my $220,000,000, and I had $257,500,000, with which I intended to pay off the national debt in a handsome way, and put $7,000,000 in my pocket. As I lay awake sometimes, when I first came to this House, terrorized by the awful pictures of gloom which those gentlemen depicted to us—as I lay awake, unable to indulge in the sleep necessary to us all, visions of this El Dorado floated through my mind, and I could see this $257,000,000 coming in in a long line of cart-loads. I hugged to myself the prospect. It was consoling to me to think that the province from which I hail, the province of which I am so proud, was not only able to pay the national debt; but have $7,000,000 over, but that was not, by any means, all the profit and blessing which was to be brought us by this same wonderful babe of his old age. There are as many horses and acres in Quebec as in Ontario, so that we must add another $257,000,000, making over $500,000,000 which the hon. gentleman could put his hand on at a moments notice. And if he should go away down to the shreds and patches, in our Maritime Provinces he would find there enough to roll up his $500,000,000 to $800,000,000 or $1,000,000, which he assures us is truly the collective present indebtedness of this country. One thousand millions, he said, is the debt owed by this country. And what do we pay for the use of that amount? All that we pay is $25,000,000, or 2½ per cent. Is there any country that can show such a standing as that? We can turn to the dear old mother land and say: Here is the debt that is such a trouble to you; we will take it over at 2½ per cent. We can turn to our cousins on the other side of the line, with their broken banks and bankrupt railways, and say to them: We will save you, we will give you unrestricted reciprocity, and we will pay off your debt. When any man in this House gets up and tells us that one thousand millions is the total indebtedness of this country, and that the people who have loaned us this money are charging us only 2½ per cent on the money, a lower rate than that charged to any other power on earth, by that very statement the hon. gentleman tells us that we occupy the foremost financial position in this world. Now, of course, when we have come to the thousands of millions, what does it matter that he should tell us that during the last twelve years we are hundreds of millions worse off than we were before. Well, Sir, while we are hundreds of millions worse off than we were before, what do we find? We find that the worse off we get the more eagerly do people run after our I. O. U.'s; the worse off we get the lower is the rate charged to us on our debt. We find that in the very last loan we made, which loan was floated at 3½ per cent, though we asked $12,000,000, there was a rush, and over $60,000,000 was offered. And this to a country that has grown hundreds of millions worse off within the last twelve years. Why, Sir, this nonsense, this trash—I must call it so—may be talked in the backwoods, it may be given to illiterate Patrons, if there are any. But to ask us here in this chamber to believe that we have debts of this character, and that in Europe we are able to borrow a thousand millions of dollars and only pay 2½ per cent interest for it, is sheer nonsense; the thing is a contradiction in itself. Not only are we told that, but we are told that there is an adverse balance of trade of $300,000,000. Oh, I like to roll these millions under my tongue; it makes me feel as if I had them. Now, this statement of the hon. gentleman is based upon the old Balance of Trade theory, which has come down to us from the time of the Mercantilists. I did think that a gentleman with the knowledge and experience of the gallant knight would not have so presumed upon the possible ignorance of the House as to re-vamp a theory which political economists have long ago abandoned. It is a popular theory arising from the supposed analogy between the individual income and the individual expenditure on one hand, and the national exports and imports on the other. It was assumed that when the exports exceeded the imports, the country was so much to the good, and that when the imports were more than the exports, the country had so much more to pay. In private life this rule suits fairly well, but when we begin to apply it to the transactions of nations it utterly fails, for an excess of exports does not necessarily indicate a favourable state of affairs. We may take the case of India, whose exports exceed its imports, but they are largely supplemented by the amounts sent abroad for the settlement of debts. Take a country like England. We know that the balance of trade, so far as the figures show, is against that country. And even in the case of Canada itself, from 1879 to 1893, we find the exports exceed the imports by some $250,000,000. We find that in Europe there is an annual excess of imports of $1,200,000,000. So, Mr. Speaker, you will see that the ground taken by my hon. friend is not a fair one. For instance, in England, in counting the large adverse balance of trade, so far as exports and imports are concerned, the important fact that England does not only the loaning but the carrying trade of the world is lost sight of, and so what we may call the "invisible export" of transportation does not appear. The error arises in this way: Imports into this country, for instance, are entered here at the value put upon them. But the same goods, when they left the country from which they started, were valued as exports at so much less, for the imports must carry the cost of transport and handling. Therefore, you will always find this disparity. Of course, the greatest objection to this theory is that it assumes that debits and credits are settled directly between debtor and creditor, whereas we know in the case of nations they are not so settled in the majority of cases, but one nation gives its bill, or pays its debts by setting off the debts due to it by other nations. So, I cannot accept the theory of the adverse balance of trade. If, however, our friends are anxious to take the exports as a test of the value of the high position held by Canada, I would cite the fact that between 1890 and 1894 Canada increased its exports by 22 per cent. But Great Britain, the United States, France, Australia and Germany showed decreases in their exports of 18, 15, 13, 10 and 5 per cent respectively. Now, Sir, our friend also has directed attention to the national debt. I admit that the debt is not a small debt, but at the same time I declare and firmly believe that we are as well able to deal with the national debt now as we were in the time of the Mackenzie Administration. I have some dislike to going back nearly a quarter of a century to deal with such matters, as I think it is better to consider, not what was done or what might have been done in Mr. Mackenzie's time, but what we are able to do at this day. Well, Sir, the gallant knight tells us that the interest in 1878 would have cost us $20,000,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He never said anything of the kind.

Mr. COCKBURN. It is from fifteen to twenty millions of dollars.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Never said anything of the kind.

Mr. COCKBURN. I have here the words and I shall read them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You will never find any statement of mine that the federal debt cost fifteen millions of dollars for interest.

Mr. COCKBURN. The interest on the amount of the net debt for 1878 would have cost $15,000,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman suppose that that referred to the federal debt?

Mr. COCKBURN. That was the subject under discussion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman suppose—is he so supremely ignorant as to suppose—that that referred to the federal debt?

Mr. COCKBURN. Well, suppose I adopt the hon. gentleman's statement it will not affect my argument, which is simply this:

He said at the time that we could have wiped out the debt of $15,000,000 by 15,000,000 bushels of wheat, that is to say, he was putting the wheat at $1 per bushel; and he said that would be the produce of one million acres. He said, in effect, if you were to undertake to pay the interest now, you would require two acres, or so, for every acre you would have taken before; or at any rate, he said, you would require 30,000,000 bushels of wheat now to pay the interest $15,000,000, that is to say, he took wheat at 50 cents per bushel. Now, when I turn up the papers of yesterday's date, I find that our best wheat sold at 90 cents in the city of Toronto, and I consider it most unfair that a representation of this kind should go abroad to the farmers. I know the object of it; of course, it is to make the farmers believe that they have got to pay two bushels of wheat for taxation whereas formerly they only paid one. But, Sir, I say that even if there is this difference of 10 or 12 per cent over what there was in 1879, we are more able to bear it than we were then. I say that wheat, owing to the improvement in the manufacture of agricultural implements and the lessened cost of running a farm, is more easily and cheaply raised now than it was twenty years ago; so that the farmer is able, with less labour and at less expense, to pay his proportion of the interest of the national debt than he was in 1874. Then, Sir, we are told that the $297,000,000 in the savings banks are not a sign of general prosperity. I will admit this much, that if the money that lies in the savings banks cannot be used in any other way, it is a proof, at the time, if you will, of temporary stagnation. But to say that it is a sign of poverty, or that it is not a good sign, to deny that it does in a manner embody the saved labour of past generations, is, I think, a mistake. Perhaps it may be that the savings in those banks now are unduly large, owing to the fact that the interest paid by the Government on savings bank deposits is larger, I think, than it should be. We are now paying 3½ per cent in the savings banks, while the banks of the country, I think, are paying not more than 3, and some less than 3 per cent. The addition of one-half of one per cent naturally attract a large amount of deposits to the savings banks, which, I think, could be more properly put into the ordinary banking of the country. But, Sir, the real point we have to deal with is the new policy that has been evolved by hon. gentlemen opposite, and that is the question of free trade vs. protection. Now, I read here the definition of what those gentlemen mean by free trade; it is from their own accredited organ. They say:

Free trade, as it is practiced under the British system, and the British system is this, that duties are to be levied on such articles as cannot be made within the country; and secondly, if by any chance duties are placed on articles that cannot be manufactured in the country, an inland revenue tax is placed upon them so as to absolutely destroy the protective element in these duties.

Now, this is the policy hon. gentlemen opposite wish to adopt; and that there may be no doubt about it, I shall read you the declaration made by the leader of the Opposition himself. He says, in his speech at Winnipeg:

We shall not give in one whit until we succeed in carrying into effect the British system of tariff.

At St. Thomas he made another declaration:

We shall not leave a trace of protection; every vestige of protection shall be removed from the soil of Canada.

Now, Sir, I do not say that free trade by itself is bad, but I say that it must depend upon the peculiar circumstances of the country into which it is proposed to transplant it. Free trade, considering the position that England occupied when she adopted it, is one thing; free trade transplanted into Canada at this hour, would be a very different thing. We must not forget that England for 400 years was paving the way to a policy which would enable her to throw down all the barriers of protection. My hon. friend was quite correct the other evening in stating that so far back as the time of Edward IV., in 1643, measures were brought into Parliament with a view of securing the home market. They were rough, rude measures, if you like, but at any rate they showed the early yearnings of the British public for protection to native industries. You will find under Queen Elizabeth the same policy being carried out; and when the Huguenots and the Flemish were driven from France by religious persecution, we find them welcomed in England, and everything was done to give strength and solidity to the various industries. Well, Sir, we must recollect that when England adopted this policy of free trade some 50 years ago, she had full command of the whole commerce of the world, you may say. The protection that she had been giving to her merchants and manufacturers had then become of such little account to them, that Lord Brougham himself presented a petition from those merchants praying that it be swept away; they wanted none of it. Things had come to that point that they were able to command the markets of the world without any protection whatever. All they wanted, as my hon. friend from East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) told you, was that bread should be made cheaper, and that the workingman should be able to have his corn free. Hence there was the Anti-Corn Law League, and let us remember that the Anti-Corn Law League was led by Cobden and Bright, themselves manufacturers. There was not a large body of manufacturers, as we have in this country with some $500,000,000 invested in their machinery and their commerce, crying out against free trade. Men of the very class who in this country are opposed to the introduction of free trade, were the men who, in England, after four centuries of the enjoyment of protection found themselves in a position to demand the perfect freedom of trade. I was indeed astonished to learn from the hon. gentleman who spoke last, that wages in Canada were even lower than wages in Scotland or England. All I can say is that my experience does not corroborate his. While he may ask his friends in Scotland to console themselves with the reflection that they have porridge and milk, while the artisan here has roast beef and pudding, I am afraid that the consolation his friends will draw from his remarks, will be but small. Sir, the most eminent authority on political economy, himself a Liberal, John Stuart Mill, is quoted as saying :

In the case of a young nation, protective duties were defensible on principles of political economy, when they were imposed "in hopes of naturalizing a foreign industry in itself perfectly suitable to the circumstances of the country."

Again, he says :

The whole question of the applicability in a particular nation of free trade or protection, must be studied out in accordance with the facts of the case.

Well, Sir, what I wish to impress on the House is the utter diversity that exists between the condition of Canada at this hour and the condition of Great Britain when fifty years ago they threw down the barriers and adopted free trade. The conditions are entirely different. We might almost have come to that conclusion from this fact : The last fifty years, during the reign of Queen Victoria, have been years in which there has been extraordinary development in every direction, politics, literature, science and art, and while every matter pertaining to the welfare of the people has been discussed, every nation on the continent of Europe have adopted a policy of protection to its own industries. I call upon hon. gentlemen opposite to show why, in view of all that has been done by such nations as France, Germany, Italy and others, we should abandon the experience which they have acquired and take the single experience of the motherland, especially when we know that the motherland adopted that system after a long preparation which we have not made. I feel assured, Sir, that the policy which hon. gentlemen opposite have enunciated, one utterly at variance with unrestricted reciprocity, is one which will be condemned at the polls.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman know about the length of time that will be required to enable us to introduce free trade here ?

Mr. COCKBURN.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Five hundred years.

Mr. COCKBURN. I have no doubt that owing to the changes that have taken place, we are able to go ahead faster than our English ancestors. I have already told the hon. gentleman that I regard him as the Rip Van Winkle of the maritime provinces, and I can assure him that the Dominion does not intend to go to sleep for the next four hundred years ; but neither in his time nor in my time, nor in the time of our children, is it likely we will be able to build up such a system of protection in Canada as to so fortify the position of Canadian manufacturers that we will be able safely to follow the example set by England when it adopted the ideas of Cobden and Bright, after it had enjoyed protection for four hundred years.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What discount will you allow us off the four hundred years ?

Mr. COCKBURN. As the hon. gentleman is asking me questions, I desire to ask him this question : Now that hon. gentlemen opposite have abandoned the policy of unrestricted reciprocity and adopted that of free trade, in the name of common sense will they tell me what we have to offer to the 60,000,000 of people in the adjoining republic to induce them to come and throw in their lot with us ? We have given away everything we had, there is nothing left, hon. gentlemen opposite are still talking about reciprocity, but we have nothing with which we can reciprocate. We have thrown everything away and we are at their mercy ; and the people of Canada are not so stupid as for one moment to place themselves in the position of being free traders and at the same time try to secure by unrestricted reciprocity the market of the adjacent republic which is the most heavily burdened, most heavily taxed and most protected nation in the whole world.

Mr. DEVLIN. I rise for the purpose of explaining in as few words as possible the vote which I propose recording in favour of the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I have much pleasure in following the hon. member for Toronto, Mr. Cockburn, the distinguished representative, as he calls himself, of St. John's ward. The hon. gentleman has made light of the position occupied in the Liberal ranks by the hon. member for South Oxford. I think if the hon. member would consider his own position in his party, he would have material for serious reflection. He is the gentleman who two years ago was spoken of in connection with the high position of Premier of Canada.

Mr. FERGUSON. Nobody ever dreamed that of you.

Mr. DEVLIN. I will speak of my position in our party later on, when it is brought up. I am quite satisfied with it.

Mr. FERGUSON. Why do you kick ?

Mr. DEVLIN. What does the hon. gentleman say ?

Mr. FERGUSON. There is no need for an apology.

Mr. DEVLIN. I am not offering an apology. If the hon. gentleman has anything to say, let him speak out like a man. I am defending the hon. member who is the object of continuous assault by the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) and the whole Conservative party, not only in this House, but in the country—I am defending at this moment the hon. member for South Oxford, who is the first authority on financial matters in this country, and since the hon. gentleman has been pleased to attack his character, I say that his character is as irreproachable as that of any hon. member on the other side of the House, and to-day it is as dear to the Reform party of Canada as that of any member in this House. The hon. member for Toronto Centre made an attack upon that hon. gentleman. I would ask the hon. member for Toronto Centre if he occupies a position of sufficient independence to be able to attack any hon. member on this side of the House? Is he not the gentleman who but two short years ago was content to travel to Chicago, and to accept $4,000 or $5,000 from the treasury of this country ?

Mr. COCKBURN. That is what I would call adding insult to injury. I went to Chicago, spent five and a half months there, and received not one iota of salary. I state now, what I have not stated before, that I spent over $5,000 of my own money, and that the whole expenses of that commission, the expenses of both Mr. Tassé and myself, were less than the personal expenses of the commission from Ontario alone. I am glad the subject has been brought up, Sir, and I shall only be too glad to appear to-morrow or any day before the Committee of Public Accounts. I think I will show that—

Mr. LANDERKIN. Oh, you will have a chance, don't forget.

Mr. COCKBURN. I shall avail of the opportunity with pleasure.

Mr. DEVLIN. If anybody has an apology to offer the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn), it should be the Auditor General of the Dominion of Canada, because I find that in his annual report, the sum of $4,425 was paid to Mr. G. R. R. Cockburn, M.P., as advances on account of expenses. I find elsewhere that the same Mr. Cockburn has sent a statement of the whole amount of his expenses and that they amounted to $4,425.

Mr. COCKBURN. I don't deny for one moment that they amounted to that. You have a voucher there for every dollar. I did not act as was done by the Commissioner for Ontario, who told the Assembly that he kept no account, that he never kept an account.

Mr. DEVLIN. It is evident that the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn), is a little bit touchy, Mr. Speaker. I took up only one little item and see the temper he gets into.

Mr. LANDERKIN. But wait till we get at his gas bill.

Mr. DEVLIN. Now, Sir, the hon. member (Mr. Cockburn) found fault with hon. members on this side because they propose to support the amendment which has been brought before the House by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright.) There are three good reasons why I support that amendment. First, because I look upon the financial policy of the Government as worthy of condemnation : second, because I think the trade policy of the Government an unsound policy for this country ; and third, because I consider that the administrative policy of the Government cannot receive the support or the defence of any hon. member in this House. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) spoke at considerable length in regard to the debt of Canada, and, Sir, he fell into a fit of ecstasy before the proportions of that debt. Does he really know what the debt of Canada is to-day ? He well knows, as he told us, that the population of Canada is yet on this side of 5,000,000, and the gross debt of Canada to-day is, according to the last number of the Canadian official "Gazette," $317,166,393. And, Sir, because we are able to borrow money at a rate of interest that is not too heavy, he takes great glory on account of that. Is it because of the gentlemen who are in power that we are able to borrow this money, or is it because of the people who live within this Dominion and who are obliged to pay the money ? Is Canada the only country in the world able to borrow money at a low rate of interest, or is it not a well-known fact that there are many other countries able to borrow money at terms just as low as those at which we borrow money ? Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cockburn) say, that we of all people in the world are able to borrow money at the lowest possible rate ? I do not think, Sir, and I know as a matter of fact that recent events will not bear out such a statement.

Mr. COCKBURN. I never said so.

Mr. DEVLIN. The hon. gentleman took great glory from that fact. Let the hon. gentleman keep his seat. He will have some of his friends afterwards to answer me, and I will stand all the answering that they will give. I am putting some questions that I know are troublesome for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cockburn) and so he cannot remain cool two minutes. He condemned the Mackenzie regime with much energy of language, but he could have considered what the debt was when Mr. Mackenzie came into power, and when he went out of power, and what the debt is to-day. I have figures here, Sir, which will show that in 1878, the gross debt was $174,000,000, whereas the debt to-day is over $317,000,000. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Cockburn) knows how that increase has been brought about. He knows what has constituted this large increase of debt. It is not only because of the moneys which have been voted for railway subsidies, but it is also because of the money which have been lavished upon works that should never have been undertaken, upon works which have been scandalous in the manner in which they have been executed. I venture to say that if you took note of the small items which make up the reckless expenditure of the Dominton, you will find that it is in great part because of such items as have been voted, even to the hon. gentleman himself, to go and squander in the city of Chicago. If he dwells upon the table which I have just pointed out he will find matters for serious study. He will find that in the years 1878 the total taxes from the source of excise and customs amounted to $18,476,000 ; where as in, the year 1894, under the Conservative system and while these godfathers of the National Policy are in power, it amounts to nearly $28,000,000. Mr. Speaker, I bring these figures out for a purpose. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Cockburn) will find that the total revenue taken from the people of Canada in 1878 amounted to about $22,000,000 ; whereas in the blessed year of 1894, it amounted to $36,000,000 and over. He will find that the expenditure in 1878 did not exceed the sum of $23,000,000, whereas in 1894, it has exceeded the sum of $37,000,000. He will find that in the year 1878 we paid a sum of $7,773,000 for interest, whereas to-day we pay more than $10,000,000. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cockburn) further in his remarks boasted that the party with which he is allied never changed their policy, but that the Liberal party invariably change their policy. Is it not a fact that the leader—the hon. gentleman whom it was supposed the member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) was to succeed as Premier—is it not a fact, that the Rt. Hon. Sir John Macdonald went to the country at the last election with the cry of reciprocity ? Is it not a fact that the policy was announced by members of the Conservative party on every platform ? Is it not even possible, and probable, that the hon. gentleman's own eloquent voice was oft heard in the city of Toronto speaking of the benefits that might flow from reciprocity ?

Mr. COATSWORTH. It was not your baby ?

Mr. DEVLIN. I see the baby member from Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) has something to say. He wants to keep company with his brother member.

Mr. COATSWORTH. Not with your policy, though.

Mr. DEVLIN. To come back to my point, Mr. Speaker, reciprocity has been severely dropped by the Conservative party. It is true that they had to show some pretext of sincerity in regard to this advocacy which they had made of reciprocity, and after the election they did go to Washington. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Landerkin) in this House well and truly depicted the trip to Washington and back, and especially the negotiations which occurred there ; when he said : They were shown in and shown out ; and we have never heard any more of reciprocity from them since that time. Is it not true that they insisted during years that the National Policy as introduced by them was the only policy that should prevail in this country, that it was a sacred policy which should not be touched, and that we were traitors to our country, because we had the audacity to denounce that policy ? Yet, shortly afterwards, we found the Controller of Customs and the Controller of Inland Revenue despatched from one end of the country to the other to see wherein that tariff was not perfect, to see what amendments might be made in it, what little bits of patching might be done in it ; and they came back here with what they were pleased to term, last session, the reduced or reformed tariff ; yet they say they have not changed their policy. Have we not heard the Finance Minister tell this House of his wonderful feats of remitting to the people millions of dollars of taxes, boasting that he was making them a present of those millions, which he had not yet taken from them, but which, he said, he could take from them ? And the very next session we found him putting those millions on again. Shall I be told that this is not a change in policy ? The Conservative party, in 1878, when the late Hon. Mr. Mackenzie was in power, moved in this House a motion condemning the expenditure of that time as excessive, and alleging that $22,000,000 a year was sufficient to provide for all the needs of the public service. Who have changed their policy ? I ask. Has it not been hon. gentlemen opposite, who got into power by denouncing an expenditure of $22,000,000, and year by year, as soon as they had attained power, exceeded that expenditure, multiplied employees, and became extravagant in every possible shape and form? Sir, I will quote the resolution which was moved in this House in the year 1877, by the Conservative leaders:

That this House is of opinion that the deficiency in revenue should be met by a diminution of expenditure, aided by such a readjustment of the tariff as would benefit the agricultural, mining and manufacturing interests of the Dominion. They demanded, therefore, that the expenditure should be diminished. Is it not fair to put the question, in what year have hon. gentlemen opposite diminished the expenditure of this country? Is the expenditure to-day, or has it been at any time since 1878, less than it was in the days of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie? They are condemned by their own motion. I have here a table which has been carefully prepared, and which I believe to be perfectly correct, showing the amounts obtained by taxation during the twenty years from 1874 to 1893, inclusive, in periods of five years:

TAXATION UNDER LIBERAL GOVERNMENT.

1873 to 1878.....	$ 94,948,000
Average per year.....	18,900,000

TAXATION UNDER CONSERVATIVE GOVT.

1879 to 1883.....	$117,717,000
Average per year.....	23,543,000
1884 to 1888.....	132,960,000
Average per year.....	26,500,000
1889 to 1893.....	150,282,000
Average per year.....	30,000,000

Thus, in the first five years of Conservative government, the taxes increased over the Mackenzie average by $4,500,000 a year; in the second period, by $7,600,000; and in the third period, by $11,067,000 a year; and this, in face of the motion moved by the party of hon. gentlemen opposite in this House, to capture public favour, and to drive honest Alexander Mackenzie from power. Sir, I followed the hon. gentleman's description of unrestricted reciprocity, continental union, and all the other vain thoughts which he put before this House, and I venture to say that there has been no change in the policy of the Liberal party.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, which is it now?

Mr. DEVLIN. I will give it as it is now, and as it always has been, since 1878. But there has been a change in the hon. gentleman's policy. He was one of the first who, two years ago, denounced many faults which he found in the protective policy of the Government; but suddenly a change came over him. He shakes his head. He admits, then, that no change came over him, so that he was not serious when he complained.

Mr. DAVIN. Now, give us your policy.

Mr. DEVLIN. Like many others, he insinuates that we have no policy, and never had any. That is one of the charges made against the Liberal party. The second charge is that our policy means nothing.

The third charge is that we are always changing our policy.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DEVLIN. Hon. gentlemen say: "Hear, hear." How can we change a policy if we have none? We all remember, Sir, under what circumstances the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie was removed from power. It was because he refused to change his policy—because he refused to adopt the principle of protection. It was because he was in favour of a tariff that would bring a revenue sufficient for the needs of the public service. No hon. member will deny that, and if any hon. member will read the policy which has been laid down by the Liberal party of this country, he will find that it is the same as it was in 1878.

Mr. COATSWORTH. Where can we find it?

Mr. DEVLIN. I will give it to the hon. gentleman if he will give me his kind attention for one moment. It will be found in a resolution that was adopted by the great Liberal convention held in this city two years ago; it will be found in the amendment which was moved by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) two or three days ago; it will be found in every amendment that has been moved by that hon. gentleman in opposition to the National Policy of the Government. Our policy means this: Freedom, as far as possible, for the people of Canada against those who try to tyrannize over the people for their special benefit, and for the benefit of the few masters who send them here. The policy of the Liberal party will be found in these words:

That the customs tariff of the Dominion should be based, not as it is now, upon the protective principle, but upon the requirements of the public service.

Mr. COATSWORTH. But how about free trade as they have it in England?

Mr. DEVLIN. I will come to that point in a moment.

That the existing tariff, founded upon an unsound principle, and used, as it has been by the Government, as a corrupting agency wherewith to keep themselves in office, has developed monopolists, trusts and combinations.

Defended by the junior member for Toronto.

It has decreased the value of farm and other landed property;

It has oppressed the masses to the enrichment of a few;

It has checked immigration;

It has checked immigration. Will the hon. gentleman deny that?

Mr. COATSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. DEVLIN. He will deny anything.

It has caused great loss of population ;

It has impeded commerce ;

It has discriminated against Great Britain ;

In these and many other ways it has occasioned great public and private injury, all of which evils must continue to grow in intensity as long as the present tariff system remains in force.

That the highest interests of Canada demand a removal of this obstacle to our country's progress, by the adoption of a sound fiscal policy, which, while not doing injustice to any class, will promote domestic and foreign trade, and hasten the return of prosperity to our people.

That to that end the tariff should be reduced to the needs of honest, economical and efficient government ;

I would ask the hon. gentleman to take these words into his serious consideration :

That it should be so adjusted as to make free, or to bear as lightly as possible upon, the necessities of life, and should be so arranged as to promote freer trade with the old world, more particularly with Great Britain and the United States.

We believe that the results of the protective system have grievously disappointed thousands of persons who honestly supported it, and that the country, in the light of experience, is now prepared to declare for a sound fiscal policy.

We do believe it, and we were ready to test the feeling of the country on that policy. Hon. gentlemen opposite themselves would have tested that feeling were they not afraid of the feeling of the country on this very point.

The issue between the two political parties is now clearly defined. The Government themselves admit the failure of their fiscal policy—

Mr. COATSWORTH. Not at all.

Mr. DEVLIN. They do ; they sent a Controller all over the country to find out what was wrong with the fiscal policy.

—and professed their willingness to make some changes.

They did until the monopolists and combinesters came here last session and filled up our hotels and choked the Government off in their professed efforts to make reductions.

The issue between the two political parties on the question is now clearly defined.

The Government themselves admit the failure of their fiscal policy, and now profess their willingness to make some changes ; but they say that such changes must be based only on the principle of protection.

We denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound and most unjust to the masses of the people, and we declare our conviction that any tariff changes based on that principle must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burdens under which the country labours.

This issue we unhesitatingly accept, and upon it we await with the fullest confidence the verdict of the electors of Canada.

Is there any difference between that policy and the amendment which was moved the other day by the hon. member for South Oxford ? I will take the last clause of that amendment, which is our policy to-day. It is the same as the one I have already read. It condemns in its first part the corruption which prevails in the administration of affairs. I will content myself with reading the last portion :

That, inasmuch as enormous sums of money are now exacted from the people of Canada which are not paid into the treasury, and inasmuch as the burthens of the people are thereby greatly and unnecessarily increased, and it is of the utmost importance to the well-being of the community that not only should the present extravagant expenditure be diminished, but that the said burthens should be reduced as largely and speedily as possible,—it is expedient that in making provision to restore "the equilibrium between revenue and expenditure," as recommended in the Speech from the Throne, the existing tariff be so modified that it may be made for a tariff for revenue only.

Mr. COATSWORTH. Is that free trade as they have it in England ?

Mr. DEVLIN. In 1879, when the principle of protection was first announced in this House, the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie moved an amendment, which I will read, as it bears out my contention that the policy of the Liberal party has not changed. That amendment was to this effect :

That while this House is prepared to make ample provision for the requirements of the public service, and the maintenance of the public credit, it regards the scheme now under consideration as calculated to distribute unequally and, therefore, unjustly, the burden of taxation ; to divert capital from its natural and most profitable employment ; to benefit special classes at the expense of the whole community ; tends towards rendering futile the costly and persistent efforts of the country to secure a share of the immense and growing carrying trade of this continent, and creates an antagonism between the commercial policy of Great Britain and that of Canada that might lead to consequences deeply to be deplored.

That resolution was voted down. The policy then propounded by the Liberal party was voted down, but nevertheless, after fourteen years' experience, after fourteen years' disappointment, the people have come to appreciate the soundness of that policy, and the Liberal party still adhere to their policy of 1879 as the only sound one for this country, and the only policy which will meet the requirements of the country and re-establish that prosperity which the National Policy has so much tended to destroy. Again in 1884, 1886, 1889 and 1890, we proposed amendments similar, if not in words, certainly in principle and spirit, to those I have read. In 1890, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved :

That, instead of adding to the existing oppressive taxation, the House should apply itself to the reduction of burdens, by abolishing or reducing the taxes now imposed on prime necessities to farmers, miners, fishermen and other producers.

In 1891, we proposed another resolution expressive of the policy of the Liberal party, couched in almost the same words. In 1893, we proposed a resolution which embodies the spirit and the aims of the policy of the Liberal party, and which reads as follows:—

The present customs tariff bears heavily and unjustly upon the great consuming classes of the Dominion and should be at once thoroughly reformed in the direction of free trade, and that the amount of taxes collected be limited to the sum required to meet the necessities of the Government efficiently and economically administered.

Therefore, taking up all those resolutions which have been moved by the Liberal party and for which the Liberal party struggled, we find that our policy has always remained the same, and whenever we come before the people for their verdict, you will find that our policy will be the one which we formulated in 1879, 1886, 1890, 1891 and 1895. Our policy is known and does not change. It is the same to-day as it was in the days of the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, whom hon. gentlemen opposite denounced in every possible way during his lifetime, but whom to-day they laud as one of the grandest figures in Canadian public life. It was the same policy which was afterwards urged by his successor, the Hon. Edward Blake, who to-day is quoted so frequently by hon. gentlemen opposite, but whom they formerly condemned and endeavoured by every means in their power to crush.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Blake left your party because he would not support it.

Mr. DEVLIN. The hon. gentleman will never leave his party because of any deficiency he may find in it.

Mr. COATSWORTH. Because their policy is always right.

Mr. DEVLIN. The hon. gentlemen opposite claim, and that is a charge which is frequently made, that our policy might possibly discriminate against England. There is but one inference to be drawn from this, and that is that their policy favours the motherland, and promotes trade with England. But is it so? Will the facts bear out such a statement? Such a pretension is so wholly unfounded that even the Ottawa "Citizen," the organ of the Government, only a short time ago contained an article proving the contrary. That article was based upon a remark of the Controller of Customs which caused considerable newspaper discussion. The Controller of Customs had stated that it would be the basest of ingratitude for Canada to discriminate against the mother country. In the discussion that followed, the "Citizen" had this to say:

It is not true that Canada discriminates against the United States. On the contrary, we imported from that country last year goods to the value of $58,221,000, of which $29,659,000 were admitted free of duty. From England we imported goods to the value of $45,925,000, of which only $13,226,000 worth were admitted free of duty.

So that if there is discrimination anywhere it comes from the gentlemen who proclaim themselves most loyal to the motherland. Sir, I have shown that there has been extravagance in our public expenditures; I have shown that hon. gentlemen opposite have not kept their promises to reduce the expenditure, but, on the contrary, they have striven to increase the expenditure, and to increase the burden of taxation upon the people. But this is not the worst feature of the position, as laid before the House by the hon. Finance Minister. We remember how that hon. gentleman, who has been pleased to charge us with something approaching treason, denounced the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) because, in the years during which he was Finance Minister he had a few small deficits. But we find that in two years this Administration have had deficits amounting to ten millions of dollars. In 1885, the Finance Minister had to come before this House with a deficit of $5,000,000. Of course, he told the House and the country that it was no fault of his, or of the Government, but that it was due to the expenditure necessary to suppress the rebellion in the North-west. But, if the truth is to be brought home to the Government in all matters, how was that rebellion caused, if not by the negligence of the Government and their officers? Who, then, were responsible for the deficit of $5,000,000 in that year, if not the Government? And, Sir, ten years afterwards, the same Finance Minister comes to this House and says, not that he is sorry that he had charged a previous Finance Minister with having deficits, not that he takes back one word at all of all the insults and reproaches hurled as he alone can hurl them across the floor of this House, but that he has to announce to the House, and through the House and through the press, to the country, that, notwithstanding that he has levied taxes upon the people in every conceivable form, and in every corner of the country, he is short $4,500,000 in his revenues. He is the last man in Canada to speak of a deficit, or to say a word about change of policy. Last year there was over a million of dollars of a deficit, and this year almost $5,000,000; and he holds out the consoling promise that next year there will be a deficit of nearly two millions of dollars. And this is the hon. gentleman who denounced deficits. Let him stand up in the House and denounce himself; let him take back what he has said against the hon. member for South Oxford. Two years of administration under these gentlemen, the only people, according to their own account, who have capacity to govern the country—two years of administration with ten millions of dollars of deficits. Is that the only evidence of capacity that the hon. gentleman can give? The hon. gentleman says he does not tax enough. Why, he begins taxing at the cradle, and he only leaves off after he has taxed the coffin. When the child comes into the world, the hon. Minister constitutes himself his guardian angel, and at every step, from childhood to manhood, and from manhood to the grave there are taxes, heavy taxes. Not heavy enough taxes? I venture to say, that there is not a man in this country to-day earning a dollar a day but is obliged to pay about 30 cents of that dollar in taxes. It is a hard thing that the man who labours from morning till night to gain a subsistence for his family, when he comes home tired with his day's toil, as he congratulates himself that he has earned a dollar, must recognize that 30 cents goes to this paternal Government, and only 70 cents for the benefit of his family.

Mr. COATSWORTH. Would you have no taxes?

Mr. DEVLIN. Yes, but not such taxes as I am speaking of. Why, Sir, in the article of nails alone, the country paid $13,000 into the treasury, and to the friends and masters of the hon. gentlemen they paid $225,000. In cotton, they paid to the treasury $1,250,000, and to the friends and masters of the hon. gentlemen over $2,000,000. In sugar, they paid $125,000 to the treasury, and to the masters and friends of the hon. gentlemen, over $2,000,000. Why, Sir, they ask us why it is we have not attained power—

Mr. COATSWORTH. Would you abolish taxes?

Mr. DEVLIN. Let the hon. gentleman keep quiet, and I will give him a lesson—a lesson in modern history. How is it that the hon. gentleman occupies a seat here?

Mr. COATSWORTH. Because I got a majority of votes.

Mr. DEVLIN. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that if the people of Toronto were free to exercise their own judgment, were not, to a certain extent, influenced and carried away by the misrepresentations of these manufacturers, that he would ever occupy a seat here, as the representative of one of the greatest cities in the country?

Mr. COATSWORTH. Yes; every time.

Mr. DEVLIN. Never.—

Mr. COATSWORTH. Would you abolish taxes altogether?

Mr. DEVLIN.—The distillers send the hon. gentleman here to vote for prohibition. And he speaks for it, but votes against it, if I mistake not. And then, in order to give the country some compensation for the trouble of bringing him here, he gives us, now and again, his ideas as to pigeons.

Mr. DEVLIN.

Mr. COATSWORTH. When are you going to abolish taxes?

Mr. DEVLIN. The hon. gentleman complains that I have not told him enough about the taxes. Why, Sir, if he will look at the official returns he will see how the people of this country are taxed to the very death in order to suit the personal ends of the gentlemen who sent him here—taxed on everything they wear; taxed on everything they use; taxed wherever they go; taxed from head to foot—for the benefit of the men who sent him here. And he would find fault with us because, in the name of the people, we protest against this enforced tribute.

Mr. COATSWORTH. How would you raise the revenue?

Mr. DEVLIN. Let the hon. gentleman follow me, and let him, if he can, disprove one statement I have made. I have given the facts that are contained in the public reports put in our possession by the Government. Does the hon. gentleman pretend that the promises made in the name of the National Policy have been carried out?

Mr. COATSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. DEVLIN. Yes, of course, he can pretend anything. We were told that we would have about 15,000,000 people in the North-west by the year of grace, 1895. Where are they? They are in the imagination of the junior member for Toronto, they are not in the North-west. We were told that the exodus which was going on in this country in a small way from 1873 to 1878, would cease, and that we would be able, not only to retain our immigrants, but likewise to retain the natural increase of our population. Sir, the fact is now admitted on all sides, admitted with sorrow, that Canada has lost all the natural increase of her population, and 300,000 immigrants in ten years. The people of Canada have been taxed to pay for bringing out these immigrants. The people of Canada were assured that the vigorous immigration policy inaugurated by the hon. gentlemen on the Government side, would be the means of keeping them here. Why have they not been kept? Why is it that under this National Policy we have lost the whole natural increase of our population, and lost also at least 300,000 immigrants who had come in? This fact is the worst possible condemnation of the National Policy. Has the National Policy, as it was predicted, kept up the price of wheat, kept up the price of farm products? The hon. gentleman seems to know something about grass. Let me ask him, has the National Policy kept up the price of hay? Can he tell me what the price of hay is to-day, without the inspiration of the hon. gentleman behind him? Under the National Policy, every farmer in the land knows that the price of hay is between $5 and $6 per ton.

Mr. COATSWORTH. Where?

Mr. DEVLIN. In Canada, under the National Policy, in the year of grace, 1895.

Mr. COATSWORTH. It is $11.50 in Toronto.

Mr. SCRIVER. In several cities of the province of Quebec it is less than $6.

Mr. GIBSON. I bought some the other day for $6.

Mr. SMITH. The Toronto "Globe" of yesterday quotes hay at $10 to $11 per ton.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That is something that grows in the streets of Toronto.

Mr. DEVLIN. The hon. gentleman knows well that the price of hay in Canada is $5 to $6. I do not know what market the hon. gentleman refers to, but I know the market which he quotes is not the only market in Canada. I am speaking of the great majority of the markets, and I state, with knowledge of what I am saying, that hay can be bought at a price as low as $5 per ton, and that under protection.

An hon. MEMBER. Where?

Mr. DEVLIN. You can buy it in Ottawa, if you like, buy it in Montreal. What, then, has the National Policy done for hay? The hon. gentleman who preceded me also spoke of the effect of the National Policy in keeping up the price of horses. Why, Sir, it is a notorious fact that a horse to-day cannot bring the price it did years ago. The National Policy has not maintained the value of horses and cattle. They are a drug in the market, and can be bought for almost anything. So that, examine it as you will, the principle of protection, otherwise styled the National Policy, has certainly not benefited the farmers of this country. But what has it done for the labourer, who has done so much for it? What has the National Policy done for the labourer, who in large cities, has voted so often for it? Is there a man in this House who can say that the condition of the labouring class in Canada has improved from 1878 to 1895? When we say that the condition of the labourer is improved, we mean that employment is more easily obtained, that employment is abundant, that wages are steady, that the labourer is able to purchase articles as he requires them, and able to pay for them. Is that the state of affairs in this country to-day? Not at all. Why is it that there were in Montreal, only a few months ago, large processions of unemployed labourers? Why is it that we hear so much of the distress that exists in the great city of Toronto? Will it be said that in the large cities of Canada during the last year, labouring men were not in a far worse position than ever they were from 1873 to 1878? Why, Sir, we know as a matter of fact that hundreds and thousands of the unemployed, during the last winter, went to the mayor and went to the aldermen of Montreal and begged him in God's name to give them the bread that they could not obtain for want of employment under the National Policy. No, Sir; there are only two classes in this country who are benefited by the National Policy, the Conservative Government of Canada and their friends the combinesters, the men who have taken millions from the pockets of the farmers, from the pockets of the labourers, the very men who have built up those fortunes, and having built them up, are poorer than when they commenced. That is a fact recognized by all who know something of the condition of affairs in our country to-day. Has protection developed trade? Is it not the first principle of protection to restrict trade? Has it not kept trade within the boundaries of Canada? Why, Sir, look at the exports of manufactured goods in Canada, and what they chiefly consist of. Are those exports large? Are they sent to many countries? We had the evidence only yesterday of what the exports of Canada are in one line to Australia. I remember well that the Premier of Canada went to Australia and opened negotiations with that country, and when he came back he presented to the people of this country a vision of the prosperity they were about to enjoy in carrying on trade with Australia. Well, Sir, we have now learned that last year our farm exports to Australia amounted to $18. Our exports are chiefly in the line of lumber, the products of the forest, lumber that is not protected, and does not require to be protected, by the Government. What were the exports as found in the last number of the Statistical Record? The exports of our mines amounted to $5,000,000; of our fisheries, $8,000,000; of our forests, $5,500,000; of animals and their products, $31,500,000; of agricultural products, $22,000,000; of manufactures, of which lumber constituted over $22,000,000, a total of $28,000,000; leaving a balance of manufactured articles exported from this country of $6,207,000. We have exported the products of our farms, of our mines, of our forests and of almost every source of our great natural wealth; but from the tall chimneys, from factories which we have protected so heavily, what have we exported in one year? The value of $6,000,000. That is what protection has done for Canada. Look at it as you will, call it by any name you choose, examine it as you please, it must be admitted that this policy is robbing the great mass for the benefit of the few. That is its principle, that is its application, and the results flowing from it show that it is robbing and injuring our country. We have been charged by hon.

gentlemen opposite with trying to copy the trade policy of England. But those hon. gentlemen forget that we are the men who have been charged with disloyalty. They copy the trade policy of the United States: they are loyal. We try to follow as nearly as possible the example of the motherland; we are disloyal. We try to introduce in Canada a policy which has made England rich, prosperous and powerful; we are disloyal. We had the Finance Minister of this country only a week ago throwing across the floor the charge of treason—treason was the word he used, a word which he had no right to use against any hon. member on this side of the House. He charged us with treachery; he revived the old charge which he made some years ago and unfurled the flag of misrepresentation. Where is the man on this side of the House who is not as loyal to Canada and Canadian institutions and possesses as honest convictions of heart and soul as the Finance Minister? Will it be said the leader of the Opposition is not at least as loyal to his country as the Finance Minister? Has the leader of the Opposition at any time in his life gone back on any great policy that he has advocated and put before the people of Canada? Never. But the hon. Minister went back on the policy for which he fought in early manhood, and to-day he condemns it on the floor of this House. If there was disloyalty, there was disloyalty on the part of the hon. gentleman in going back on prohibition. It is a strange circumstance that there was a time when the hon. Finance Minister called a certain article liquid distilled damnation, and to-day he places confidence in that distilled damnation to raise the revenues of the country. But there was one thing I was pleased with. When the hon. gentleman made this charge of treason across the floor of the House, he looked very serious, he looked very cross, but he sat down immediately afterwards and smiled and laughed and wondered if the joke would take in the country. Treason! Where is the treason in asking that the people of Canada should be relieved from the heavy taxation which they are called upon to bear for the benefit of the masters of hon. gentlemen opposite? Treason! Where is the treason in demanding that the public service shall be conducted in an honest and economical manner? Treason! Where is the treason in defending the policy which we have been constantly urging on this country for the last fifteen years? Treason! There is treason, perhaps, on the other side of the House. There is treason in the remark made by the Minister of Finance when he brings that charge against his fellow-members. There is treason in making such a charge, but there is no treason on this side of the House. We are true to our country, and we are as anxious for its welfare and prosperity as are hon. gentlemen opposite. We hold our convictions, we stand by our policy, we work for the benefit of the great mass of the people, while hon. gentlemen opposite put before the country a policy designed to carry them into power and achieve success, but a policy that is treasonable to the best interests of Canada. The hon. gentleman spoke of free trade as it is in force in England. If free trade is such a bad policy for England, why is it that you dare not speak of protection in that country? Lord Beaconsfield himself said only a few years ago that protection if adopted in England would bring about civil war; and there is no serious public man to-day, except perhaps the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill) and the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn), who advocates a policy of protection for England. We had the statement made by the hon. member for Centre Toronto that our tariff had been revised. How was it revised? We find that under the old National Policy of 1893, during the months of July, August, September, October, November and December, the value of dutiable imports amounted to $32,845,000, on which duty was paid of $10,198,860. In 1894 under the new tariff the value of dutiable imports for the same month was $28,046,705, and the duty paid, $8,701,000, the average duty being in the first instance 31·03, in the second instance 31·02, being a reduction of one-tenth of 1 per cent. What is the value of such a trifling reduction? Sir, I shall close my remarks—

Mr. McKAY. Hear, hear.

Mr. DEVLIN. The hon. member for Hamilton says "hear, hear." I am sure he will not have many remarks to bring to a close before the end of the session. It matters not what comes before the House he will complacently bow and say the measure is good. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McKay) will find good, every transaction that is done by the Government in the shape of their expenditure, (Mr. McKay) will find good, every was to have cost the country $46,000, and which, in fact, did cost the country $260,000; which was to have developed trade, and which, in fact, did not develop trade; which was to open a great source of navigation, and which, in fact, did not.

Mr. COATSWORTH. Do you object to that lock?

Mr. DEVLIN. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Coatsworth) has brought himself sufficiently into contempt and derision, without continuing.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEVLIN. He has lost all sense of shame, evidently.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. I am sure the hon. gentleman (Mr. Devlin) will withdraw these last expressions he used.

Mr. DEVLIN. Well, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the rule of the Chair is, that I must withdraw the last words.

Mr. SPEAKER. Those expressions, yes.

Mr. DEVLIN. I do withdraw, but I hope the Chair will keep the hon. gentleman quiet, too. He is a source of great annoyance. He is continually interrupting and is carrying on a little game that is utterly unworthy of the character of a representative of a great city.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. DEVLIN. What is the word out of order now, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member (Mr. Devlin) has stated that the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) has pursued a course unworthy of his character, and that is out of order.

Mr. DEVLIN. I did not say "his" character. I said, "the character of the representative of a great city."

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes. That is out of order.

Mr. DEVLIN. Well, Mr. Speaker, I will take it back, and say "worthy of his character."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise to a point of order. Is it right for an hon. member to sit continuously in his seat while a member is speaking in this House, interrupting him, and bringing in matters not pertinent to his speech, for, perhaps, a whole hour, without any attention being called to it?

Mr. SPEAKER. It is certainly not in order for any member to interrupt a member who has the floor, and I have endeavoured by calling "order," to prevent these interruptions since the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Devlin) has commenced his speech.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that, in my judgment, the hon. member (Mr. Devlin) has invited comments on his speech as he has gone along. He has, two or three times, put questions to me, and invited comment.

Mr. DEVLIN. The question is, whether the hon. gentleman (Mr. Coatsworth) has got any judgment.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEVLIN. I am sure that if Mr. Speaker had to rule on that subject he would rule in my favour. With my compliments, too. Mr. Speaker, I have taken up certain matters which have been brought before the House, and I answered the charges that were hurled across the floor, but I would be sorry to resume my seat before, at all events, answering one charge that was made by the Minister of Militia. I see that he is not in his seat. The Minister of Militia, speaking the other day, and forgetting the Augean stable of which he is a resident just now, the one in which are found all the scandals known as the Tay canal, the Little Rapids lock, the Onderdonk scheme, the Langevin block, the post office scandals, and, in fact, all others of that nature; proceeded to assail the memory of the late Hon. Honoré Mercier. It is not my mission, nor part of my province, to defend the memory of that hon. gentleman. But, Sir, the Minister of Militia said that Mr. Mercier and his regime had been unfortunate for the province of Quebec, that he had violated every principle of honour and of honesty, and that it was a good thing for the happiness of Canada generally that he was dismissed from office. It is well, and I say it fearlessly, that hon. gentlemen opposite would know this: That Honoré Mercier, notwithstanding what his faults were, is one of the great and respected dead of the province of Quebec. If the faults of hon. gentlemen who are in the Government now, were given the same publicity as were given the faults of the Hon. Honoré Mercier, I question very much whether they would be to-day in power; I question very much whether His Excellency the Governor General would not be called upon to intervene. But, Sir, what are the facts: facts which are well known? It is true that the gentleman who, to-day, has his reward in the Senate, who was known as the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, who was at one time judge of the district of Montmagny, who hopes shortly, I believe, to fill the position of Judge of the Supreme Court, who has fared so well and fared so sumptuously at the expense of the country; it is true that gentleman did dismiss the Hon. Honoré Mercier. It is likewise true that the Ministry which he brought into power, and which assumed full responsibility for his acts and for his conduct, declared that they would place the Hon. Honoré Mercier in prison. It is a fact, concealed from nobody, that they proceeded to carry that into execution. Everything seemed favourable to them. They had the reins of power; they had a Lieutenant-Governor most unscrupulous, ready to serve, in every possible way; they had at their disposal the judges; they had the officers of the court; they had all the documents that could be found in the public service; they dragged Honoré Mercier before the criminal court of the city of Quebec; they made their charges; and they selected judge, and they selected jury. And, Sir, the result of the proceedings was that, after all the facts had been fully exposed, that after the charges had been made, that after those angels of innocence and political purity that had been brought into power by Lieutenant-Governor Angers had thrown against this man, to use a common expression, all the mud they could, that jury stood up and declared that the charges were false, and that Honoré Mercier was an innocent man. His enemies, however, were not men enough, in this bit of personal persecution and prosecution; they were not men enough to take their own money. Whether it was because they were so long out of power that they had no money, I know not; but at this stage they were not men enough to take their own money to carry out their own little personal spites and persecutions. But, Sir, they took nearly $100,000 out of the people's money to try and wreck and ruin the reputation of Honoré Mercier. Mr. Mercier had a thorough vindication at the hands of the people of his province. It was in the days of his adversity. He was respected, in adversity, as perhaps no politician in Canadian political life ever was respected before. So much, so, Sir, that one of his great opponents, a man with a heart and with soul, different from the heart and soul of the man who had driven him from power; a man with heart and soul, but who was his opponent from beginning to end; that man said: Honoré Mercier was great, was a hero in adversity, and was great and a hero in death. The truth was realized by the people of the province of Quebec, and shown by them when the remains of this man, the great and respected dead of that province, were carried to their last resting-place. It was not a state funeral; it was not a funeral paid for with the money which came from the public treasury; it was not the funeral of a man in power. It was the funeral of a man poor and penniless; a man who had been falsely charged with having a million dollars when he had not one dollar. It was the funeral of a man who, being thus poor, was carried to his last resting-place by those who admired and respected him. It was a funeral in which there was a concourse of a hundred thousand people following the bier. Ah, Sir, after the miserable failure of the efforts of the friends of the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence to blacken the reputation of Honoré Mercier, it ill becomes him to come and traduce his memory in this House, and I take this occasion of resenting those imputations upon the memory of this great man. There is one point more, Sir to which I will refer, and then I will close my remarks. It is of a personal nature. One hon. gentleman asked me about my own position in this House. I am sorry to say that my own position is, perhaps, a very humble one in this House; it is also a very humble one in the country; but, such as it is, it is just as dear to me as the position or the reputation of any hon. member may be to himself. I wish to correct a statement in regard to my position which was made by the hon. Premier of Canada at Belleville a short time ago. The hon. gentleman, in the course of his speech said:

There is a member of the House of Commons named Devlin.

That is true. I know the hon. Premier would be very much pleased if there was no such member. I know, from steps taken by the hon. gentleman recently, that he is bound to try and get rid of such a member. He continued:

Neither his position in the House nor in the country would justify me in referring to him at any particular length.

That is the position I occupy—a very humble one; but I am quite satisfied with it. The position is one which I have been accorded by the great majority of the electors of the grandest constituency, perhaps, in the Dominion of Canada. I am quite satisfied with it, I am able to take care of it, and I am quite sure to have it again. The hon. gentleman goes on:

But he is one of those Irishmen who has the gift of the gab; and, whenever he rises to speak, he denounces what he calls "sectarian bigotry."

That is true.

Speaking recently at Montreal, he said: "I do not for the life of me see how any Irish Catholic can support Bowell, who did not reach his position through any intelligence he possesses, but simply by his hatred of the Catholic people. For my part, this is a matter of conscience, and I cannot support such a man."

That is untrue. I never said such a thing.

Now, if he has a conscience, and his conscience leads him to that conclusion, he is quite right in saying he cannot support me—

Mr. FOSTER. Question.

Mr. DEVLIN. Mr. Speaker, this is a matter which has been given a great deal of publicity. The hon. Premier tried to make political capital out of this matter at a banquet that was non-political in its character. The facts are the following: I spoke at Sohmer Park in Montreal, and I was misrepresented by the "Gazette," of Montreal, which, according not only to Liberal opinion, but even, I believe, to the opinion of the hon. Minister of Justice, is not a reliable authority. That paper, which reported me on the following morning, made me say what I never said in my life, no doubt, because the "Gazette" would wish that I had said such a thing. The "Star," of Montreal, which reported my address in full, had no such expression in it, for the simple reason that I did not utter it. On that occasion, I took good care to say that I did not oppose Sir Mackenzie Bowell because he was an Orangeman. Perhaps there would have been some justification for giving way to a little bit of bad temper, in view of the manner in which he deals with some of us, and using some strong language concerning him. I did not, however. It is true—I know it—he has been severe in his dealings with men who do not think as he does. Is it not a fact that only two years ago—and this gives you an idea of the force of mind of this great Senator—he moved a resolution at Sault Ste. Marie, in Ontario, that $500 be sent to Ireland for active aid purposes.

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope the hon. gentleman can find some relevancy in his remarks, for I confess I cannot.

Mr. DEVLIN. Very well, Mr. Speaker, I am quite satisfied to follow your ruling. But I have had the opportunity I sought of putting one matter right, at all events—of denying a false and malicious report reflecting upon me, and also of answering a question put to me by an hon. member in regard to my position in this House. Have I not a right to defend my position in the House when it is assailed? My position is simply that of a humble follower of the Liberal party—a party which has a clean, a good, a sound record; which has a distinct policy on every question; which has a straight policy—a policy which is thoroughly understood, and which I am sure will be accepted by the people of this country. I am a humble follower of that party, because I place my faith in the men who are its leaders, who speak not for selfish purposes, but who speak, who think, who act for the benefit of all classes of this country. I propose recording my vote for the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for South Oxford—an amendment which contains a true and just principle, which is couched in vigorous language, and which is submitted to this House by an hon. gentleman who is an authority on the subject of finance, and who, notwithstanding all the attacks which have been made upon him, is one of the foremost political men of the day.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, I was rather surprised to hear the attack made by the hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin) upon the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn). This attack was ostensibly made because the hon. member said that the hon. member for Centre Toronto had attacked the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I heard no such attack except on political grounds; but I consider that the attack of the hon. member for Ottawa County upon the hon. member for Centre Toronto was a personal one, and I do not think the hon. member was justified in making the statement he did. Now, Sir, in regard to that attack, what do we find? We find that the hon. member for Centre Toronto was sent as a commissioner to Chicago, that he spent five and a half months in Chicago without a salary, that he expended $3,000 of his own money, and now he is charged by an hon. member on the other side with, I don't know what sort of crime, because he has sent in his vouchers for the money spent by him in his official capacity. However, I need not come to the defence of the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn), because he has already expressed his willingness, or rather his anxiety, to appear before the Committee on Public Accounts and have the whole matter fully ventilated. I would have been glad if the hon. member who has just spoken had given me something to reply to; but as I listened to his declamation—what I might call his oratorical effort—I found he said very little on the question before the House, but a great deal on other questions. He did make one statement, which was rather remarkable, and that was that the Finance Minister should be ashamed to speak of deficits because he has had to confess to two deficits, one of $5,000,000 caused by the rebellion, and which it is absurd to call a deficit, and the other for the present year, which the hon. gentleman places at the same figure. In that he is just half a million dollars over the mark, and he forgot to mention that the Finance Minister estimates for the next year a surplus; and I have no doubt that as business revives, and it is reviving rapidly, we will find that the expectations of the Finance Minister will be amply borne out. There is one other statement of the hon. gentleman which I think needs a reply. He stated that hay is worth $5 to $6 a ton. Well, I am credibly informed that hay is worth at least $7 to $8 a ton in Ottawa, and some say $7.50 to $9 a ton. I refer to this simply because it is on a par with other statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite when they seek to decry the National Policy. They put the question: Has the National Policy raised the price of farm products? and they answer that on the contrary it has decreased the prices, and refer to hay selling at $5 to $6 a ton as an illustration.

Mr. EDWARDS. I do not desire to enter into this discussion, and I do not know that this question of hay is material, but I wish simply to say that I am in a position to know, as well as any one can, what the price of hay has averaged throughout Canada during the past year. I have known of purchases of many thousands of tons, and the average price to the farmer has not been $5 a ton. I do not desire to enter into this matter at all, but simply wish to correct what I know to be an incorrect statement.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If my hon. friend behind me will permit me, I would ask the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) how the price of hay compares this year with last?

Mr. EDWARDS. Hay is much cheaper this year than last.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Half the duty was taken off hay last year.

Mr. EDWARDS. I may be allowed to answer that.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CRAIG. I hope that everything I say will not provoke a speech from a member of the Opposition, or I shall have to continue my remarks until a very late hour, which I have no desire to do. I have stated that hay in Ottawa to-day was sold at a certain figure, and I do not think that statement was contradicted. No doubt what the hon. member for Russell says is true, and he possibly may have bought very poor hay. I wish to say a few words on the statement made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in criticising the census returns. If it had not been for this statement, I do not think I should have spoken at all. Speaking about the small industries, he said that in Port Hope there were a great many industries that employed only one man and some only two, and that 116 industries employed only 219 people. I do not know whether that statement is correct or not, because I have not verified it; but I do know that we have five industries in Port Hope employing 200 people, or an average of about 40 each; and I merely mention this in justification of the town of Port Hope, as I do not wish the statement to go uncontradicted that all our industries are small ones. While there are some small industries, there are some pretty large ones as well. I wish to say further that the National Policy has not hurt Port Hope. It is stated that the population of that town to-day is five hundred less than it was ten years ago. But the explanation of this is that the Grand Trunk, which had large works there, removed them to Lindsay, thus causing a reduction in the population. Without this explanation, people might believe that the reduction was caused by the National Policy. I may add that all the business men in Port Hope are doing very well, and that we have had no failures. To come to the subject before us, because I intend to adhere closely to it, and not talk about matters foreign to this debate altogether, I wish to say that the Reform party, in discussing our fiscal policy, find themselves in a very awkward position. They find it absolutely necessary to show that this country is going to the dogs. I am very sorry for any party which is reduced to taking that line of argument. When they make these blue ruin speeches the consciences of hon. gentlemen opposite must give a remorseful twinge, because they must feel that they are not dealing with facts but fancies. But possibly, by looking so long at the condition of our country through blue glasses, they begin really to believe that it is in the depressed condition they depict. We must all admit that this country has passed through a world-wide financial crisis in a very creditable way indeed. I remember the depression that came over this country when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, and which was far more severe than the one through which we have just passed. Hon. gentlemen opposite themselves admit that while they held office there was a very serious depression, and they give that as the excuse for their deficits. It is true, they say, that we had deficits, but no wonder because the country was passing through a very serious crisis. But the deficit, they argue, was caused by the world-wide depression from which Canada could not hope to escape. Well, Mr. Speaker, although they contend that the policy of their party was not responsible for the severe depression that then existed, they blame the National Policy for the crisis through which we have passed. I do not say that the depression from 1874 to 1878 was caused by the policy of the Mackenzie Government, but I say that it was aggravated by that policy. I say it was aggravated, because they did not take steps to lessen the evil. I am going to consider for a few moments the amendment moved by the hon. member for South Oxford. That amendment calls for a tariff for revenue only. I intend considering the purport of this word "only." That is the emphatic word in his amendment. If the amendment had simply called for a tariff for revenue, I could have taken no objection to that, because I believe in a tariff for revenue; but when the statement is made that we shall have a tariff for revenue only, I think it is worth while trying to find out the meaning of this phrase. First of all, I take for granted that it means the absolute abolition of all protection. There is not to be a vestige of protection left. If we needed any confirmation of that statement, we could find it in the speech of the hon. gentleman who has preceded me. He said, in a very loud voice, that the principle of protection is to be left out in the Reform tariff. How will they frame that tariff? The first thing they must do is to exclude protection. The hon. member for South Oxford sets to work at framing his tariff, and he says, first of all, there must be no protection, this tariff must be for revenue only. Well, what then? I say that under this system there must be no duty on any articles manufactured in this country. If there is any duty at all, even if there is a duty of only 10 per cent, I hold that is an acknowledgment of the principle of protection and that cannot be allowed; I will not allow them to put that in at all. So there must be no duty on cheese, for cheese is a manufactured article. Then on what shall we levy the duties? They must be levied on articles not produced in this country. We must not have a duty upon a single article we grow in this country, because we are going to do away with every vestige of protection. We must put a duty on tea, we must put a duty on coffee, on rice, on sugar and other goods that we cannot produce here at all. These things must be heavily taxed, because we are not levying a tariff for revenue only, without one particle of protection. There must be no duty on beef, no duty on pork, on wheat, on butter, on apples or on fruit of any kind. All these things must come into this country free of duty, because there must be no vestige of protection, as we are levying a tariff for revenue only. I might dwell longer upon this question, but, generally, what would be the result? One result would be that our beef would come from Chicago, being supplied in the same way as beef is supplied in the Eastern States by Armour & Co., and other large Chicago firms. Would our farmers like that? How would they like the beef supplied to our large hotels and local trade to come from abroad and no cattle bought from them, or bought from them at very low prices? Some may say that it would not work out in that way. I contend that it would. These multi-millionaires would compel our butchers to buy their beef, or open shops, as they have done in the United States, and retail this beef at prices so low as to defy competition. We should find our cheese trade utterly demoralized. American cheese would be sent in here, would be branded as Canadian cheese and sent to the old country as of Canadian manufacture. Then as to our cotton mills and woollen mills and our shoe factories, what would happen to them? They would be compelled to do one of two things, either to reduce the wages of their men one-half or else close up and go to the United States. There they would have the United States market as well as the Canadian market, for the American and English manufacturer would have free access to this market. These manufactured goods would come here from England, from Germany and from other parts of the world, and this would verily be a slaughter market, and our manufacturers would find they would have to go to the United States. Over there they would have a protected market and free access to the market on this side. We have had the changes rung upon the exodus. It has been told over and over again how many have left this country every year. Under a tariff for revenue only we should not need statistics to tell us about the exodus, we should see it with our own eyes going on in every part of this country. I hold that this is no caricature but a fair picture of what this country would be under a tariff for revenue only. If the amendment does not mean this it means nothing, and, if they do not mean this, all the speeches we have heard against protection mean nothing. We might characterize this tariff as it has already been characterized:—Free trade as they have it in England. What do we find as to free trade in England? I have been for some years taking a leather journal published in England; and in that I find constant lamentations over the tanners of that country, who are forced to compete with leather brought in from the United States with no duty put upon it. A little while ago there was a great strike in the shoe trade over there, but it was brought to a sudden end, because it was found that the Americans were putting in their goods and taking the market away from the English producers. So the masters and men were obliged to meet and come to terms as a matter of self-defence. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that no man to-day mentions protection in England. Why, it is constantly talked about. This paper I refer to constantly advocates protection to tanners. It points out that it is absurd that their tanners should be there helping to support the country and maintain its institutions while leather is coming in from all over the world and taking the market away from their men. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say that they would put a duty on goods produced in this country, but only for the purpose of revenue. But I cannot accept any such excuse as that from them, for I hold that if they impose such a tax it would take the ground from under their feet in this argument. I hold that this is exactly what we are doing, and if they impose such a duty they would be doing only what we are doing, and their policy would not differ from that of the Conservative party. Is not our tariff so arranged as just to collect sufficient revenue? Hon. gentlemen tell the people that they are being oppressed, that they are being robbed by the Conservative party, and that this tariff takes millions of money from the people of this country. Why, Sir, in arranging the tariff the object is to produce sufficient revenue, and, further, to give incidental but moderate protection to our manufacturers. I cannot conceive of a tariff being arranged upon any more common-sense plan. I cannot conceive of men deliberately so discarding protection. I can only come to the conclusion that hon. gentlemen opposite feel that they must have some cry, they must have some excuse to offer why they should ask to take the places of those who are in power to-day, and they can find nothing else to say. They indulge in scandals, but these fall to the ground. They indulge in tirades against the Government, but these do not accomplish the purpose and so they have been for years talking about protection as legalized robbery, calling the manufacturers of this country, as they were called by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), "plunderers." And this hon. gentleman, even while he speaks thus says he does not intend to do injustice to the manufacturers. Is it no injustice to these men to call them plunderers, to say they are robbing the people of this country, assisted by the Government through the tariff? I think the manufacturers of this country know how to resent such attacks, they know how to value the statement of the hon. member for South Oxford, that he does not intend to do them injustice. The hon. gentleman says that he and his friends know no class. But we know that he does know one class. We know that the votes he is after are the votes of the farmers. But I think that the intelligent farmers of Canada, when they consider this question fully and calmly, will find that their true friends are not the men who would eliminate every vestige of protection to our native industries, but those who mean to give those industries moderate protection. I believe in moderate protection; I do not believe in high protection. I believe that high protection would produce the evils which hon. gentlemen say have been produced under the present tariff. High protection would produce monopolies; it has done so in the United States. But moderate protection prevents monopolies, because men can only go so far. It insures the production in the country of a good quality of goods, for the manufacturers know that the duty will not stand in the way of bringing goods to the country if the home manufactured goods are of poor quality. After all, what is chiefly protected by this tariff which is decried so earnestly by hon. gentlemen opposite? First and foremost wages are protected. That is sometimes forgotten. But wages are protected, and why? As I said before, if the duty was taken off manufactured articles, the manufacturers would be compelled, in self-defence, in order to make anything at all, to reduce their wages one-half. What do we find the wages are in a country like Germany? They pay 50 cents a day to a man working in a tannery, and 25 cents a day to a woman working alongside of him. The hon. members on the other side of the House want our workingmen to compete with men who are working for wages like that, with men who are living as those German labourers are living from day to day, living from hand to mouth, not able to save a dollar, in fact, not able to live in any way as our labourers are living. I believe there is no country in the world where the artisans live as well as they do in this country. I know that in the factory with which I am connected, in Port Hope, a great many of our men who have been working for years, not only live well every day, not only dress well, as well as I dress myself, but many of them live in houses of their own, which they have bought with their own earnings; and I say that is a creditable showing for this country. Sir, I will not advocate any policy that will reduce the wages of these men one-half; I will not advocate any policy that will compel them after a while to mortgage those houses which they have acquired with so much labour and so much saving; but I will stand by the policy which protects the wages of every workingman in this country. I ask the Reform party, Do they object to protection for the wages of the workingmen of this country? If they do, let them tell them so, when they go out into the country before the next election; let them say plainly that they object to this; because I hold, and it cannot be disproved, that protection protects the workingmen more than it does the employers themselves. Why, Sir, how is that? Suppose that I cannot carry on business in this country, what can I do? I can go somewhere else. But what about these men who have their houses in the towns and villages scattered all over the country? What are they going to do? They cannot sell their houses, because everybody is going away, and nobody has got any work. What can they do? They are left destitute, I do not know what will become of them. So I say that the men themselves reap more benefit from protection than their employers do in this country. We heard something this afternoon about free trade in England. Well, Sir, I think hon. members can find a statement made by Mr. Kier Hardie, one of the labour leaders in England, who said that at the present time there were one million men out of employment in free trade England. Why, Sir, if we had anything like that state of things in this country, we would never hear the end of it, there would be a constant cry going up all over the country against the National Policy. But I believe that in this country, while times have been hard—and I am glad to know they are reviving—I believe that most men have been able to earn something and have been able to keep their families in some way, although not as well as they do when times are prosperous; and I believe we have to thank the National Policy for that in a great measure. Now, Sir, what classes are protected? I answer that the National Policy protects the farmers of this country. I ask hon. members on the other side of the House, Do they object to protect the farmers? Will they go to the country before the electors and say, We object to give you protection? I am afraid not. What will they do? Why, Sir, they will do just as they do to-day; they will go and talk about monopolists and the bloated manufacturers who are bleeding them all the time. But when they go to Montreal, they will say to the manufacturers, You need not be afraid, we will do this very gradually. You need not be afraid we are going to hurt you; we will do it very gradually indeed. We may have to do something, but you can trust us, we won't hurt you very much, it will be very gradual and very slow. Now, Sir, I think it is not fair for hon. members to sing two songs. I think they should have the same song everywhere. Are they going to the country and tell the farmers that they object to the duty on farm products? Will they say they think the farmers of this country do not deserve any protection, and, if they get into power, they are not going to give them any protection? But I am afraid we will never see them do that. Well, Sir, I would ask another question. It is said by some that this duty does not raise the price of farm products in this country. I am not going to discuss this question, but I am going to answer it by asking another question: Do the farmers themselves object to protection on their own products? They may object to protection on manufactured goods, and I am not surprised at that. People will always look out for themselves. But do they object to protection on their own products? Do you find the farmers objecting to protection on wheat, to protection on apples, to protection on pork, to protection on beef, or on butter or cheese? I do not think any one will say that they find farmers objecting to that. There may be some who call themselves farmers, men who do not live by farming, men who have enough land to call themselves farmers, who may say that they do not need any protection at all. But I think, if we travel through the country, from one end to the other, we shall find that the farmers themselves want protection on the things they produce, and I say they are the best judges themselves of whether protection benefits them. I do not think hon. members in this House need to get up and argue whether protection raises the price of wheat, or raises the price of beef, or anything of that sort. The real question is this: Do the farmers think so themselves? Do the farmers know that protection does enhance the value of their articles? When I hear speeches in this House delivered by members who do not know anything about farming, giving the farmers advice, I think of a certain farmer who came home one day and said to his wife: "Things are getting pretty well mixed up." "How is that?" she says. "Well," he answered, "politicians are teaching the farmers how to farm, and the farmers are teaching the politicians how to conduct politics." I think we find a little of that sometimes in this House.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was answering the question: Who, after all, are protected, or what is protected? I answered, first, wages, or the workingmen of this country. Then I said that farm products are protected. In discussing that point I said it is often stated by hon. members on the other side of the House that the protection of farm products did not raise the price. I said, whether that was so or not, it was not for us to discuss here; but the question for us to settle was, do the farmers want protection? They know their own business better than we do, and although we have some farmers here, I believe that the farmers in this House, if we obtained their disinterested opinions, would say that it is an advantage for the farmers to have protection for their products. I find, however, that the farmers never object to protection, that is protection afforded to themselves. I said they might object, naturally, to protection placed on manufactured goods, believing that in some cases they had to pay more on account of that protection, because, after all, we are inclined to look after ourselves; but I think we would have to travel a long way in this country before we found any farmers to object to the protection of articles produced by themselves. I might say in reply to the assertion that protection does never raise the price of the products of the farmers, that we have, at this moment, a striking instance of the benefit of protection to farmers. What do we find with respect to wheat in this country? We find that in the United States wheat, to-day, is 15 cents less than it is in this market, I suppose owing to the scarcity of wheat here, and, no doubt, the farmers, and I hope many of them, will reap the benefit of that increased price. I now go on to mention another class who received benefit from protection. This class is the employer of labour. I know that for him no sympathy is expressed by members of the Reform party. I mentioned in a former part of my speech that manufacturers in this country had been called by the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in a speech in this debate, legalized plunderers, men who were authorized by law to plunder the people. Well, Sir, I think the manufacturers are not plunderers, but, on the other hand, I consider they are benefactors. When you go into a town, you find men there who are worth $50,000 or $100,000, and they are living on the interest of their money, and doing nothing else. You find the people saying those men are no good to the community, that they have money, but no enterprise, that they will not use their money to advance the interests of the town or the country. But we find there are men scattered all over the Dominion who possess $20,000 or $30,000, or $60,000, or $100,000, or more, and they are enterprising men, not men who can sit down and do nothing, but men who will put their money in some factory or business which will employ a large number of workmen, and they are a direct benefit to the country. It is felt so by every one; in fact, instead of such manufacturers being called plunderers by the people of the town in which they live, they are looked upon as benefactors, and there is hardly a town in the country that is not willing, not only to encourage manufacturers to settle among them, but to give large bonuses to induce manufacturers to come into their midst. I remember a circumstance that took place not very long ago in the good city of Brantford, represented by a member (Mr. Pater-son) opposed to us in political faith. There was a by-law before the people to give a bonus to a manufacturing concern, and that by-law was carried in a town in which, on other occasions they vote the Reform doctrine. That proves to me, that if people would lay aside their prejudices and their early convictions on political matters, they would admit that in every case manufactories are a benefit to the country. I think that they would go even further, and admit that these manufactories are entitled to some protection against the competition of manufacturers in other countries. Let me ask, why should farmers, workingmen, and employers in this country be protected? The answer that occurs to my mind is this: These men, living in this country, contribute to pay the expenses of government, whether they are protected or not. If we have a tariff for revenue only, as is proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), they would then be taxed heavily to pay our expenses. I contend, Sir, that if we have men living in this country who are helping to pay the expenses of government, and the expenditure on our public works, they should not be placed on the same footing as men who live in a foreign country, and who are not contributing a single cent towards our national expenditure. To bring it down to a very local affair, we find, Sir, that in towns where men have stores, it is considered by councils that the shop-keepers should have protection, and if pedlars and hawkers come around to compete with the citizens, they make them pay a license. Is not that done because it is felt that the residents are paying taxes and should not be placed in unfair competition with men who contribute nothing at all to the maintenance of the town? That, in itself, is a sort of protection. So I think that the manufacturers of this country, the farmers of this country, and the workingmen of this country who contribute out of their resources to develop the country, should not be subject to an unfair competition from foreigners, who are rather helping to build up a rival country. It is objected to by some that prices are raised by protection, and that is an argument adduced very often. I do not suppose that hon. gentlemen of the Opposition object to the amount of duty that is paid, but they say, that on account of the duty, another tax is imposed on consumers, on account of the prices being largely raised. Now, I admit that in some cases prices are raised. I think every man will admit that who looks at the subject from a fair standpoint; but I contend that even where these prices are raised, the buyer has compensation. If a farmer lives near a manufacturing town, and gets a very good price for his produce, he will be willing to pay a little more for his goods, and he can afford to do so. If all the manufacturers in this country were blotted out, and the farmers had to sell their produce to middlemen who would ship it to England or the United States, it is quite clear that they could not receive as good prices for their produce, and, although they might get their goods a little cheaper, yet, in the end, they would be no better off. I believe that if the question were put before the farmers they would say: We prefer to pay a trifle more for the goods we need so as to have the privilege of taking our produce to the home market and selling it to the working-people who produce the goods that we want. That argument might be turned in the other way. Workingmen in a city like Toronto or Montreal might object to pay more for farm produce than they would under certain circumstances, but if you say to them: These men that you are buying these products from are the very men who wear your boots and shoes, would not they say: Well, we are quite satisfied at that. People believe in reciprocity, and not in any one-sided arrangement. Now, I maintain that in a great many cases, prices are not raised by protection, and I may ask, how is it that they are not raised by protection? It is because of the competition among manufacturers in our own country. I might illustrate that by a great many instances, but I know this: That in some cases, the competition in Canada has been so great that men in some lines of business have not only not made money, but have lost money by selling their goods so low on account of competition. I believe that while it may be, when an industry is first started in this country under the fostering care of the National Policy; while it may be that the consumers will have to pay more for their goods, yet, after a while, other factories will spring up in the same line. and the prices will be reduced, so that the consumer would have to pay no more than if there were no protection at all. I may give an illustration of this in reference to the clothing industry. I think, Sir, we must all admit in this House that clothing in this country is not dear. I was rather amused the other day, when, in wandering along the streets in Ottawa, I saw a suit of clothes hanging outside a store, marked $2.75. I could hardly believe my eyes, for they did not look very bad, either. They were a very decent looking suit, and I asked the man how he was able to do that. He said: We are able to do it, it is all right, that is the price, $2.75. Well, I said, nobody need complain that clothing is dear here. Again, I saw, in a window, a decent looking pair of boots marked $1. I could not imagine how they could be sold for that, but there they were. That does away with the argument that clothing, and boots and shoes are rendered dear by the National Policy. I might say right here, what I had no intention of referring to, that I do not think that there is in this country a better illustration of the benefit of the National Policy than is afforded by that same industry of boots and shoes. The growth of that trade in the city of Quebec and the city of Montreal during the last few years has been simply marvellous, and not only have many factories been established, and the number of operators increased, but the quality and the style of goods now compare favourably with those produced in the United States. But, Sir, if gentlemen on the other side of the House think that cheapness is the greatest recommendation for anything in this world, I might advise them to live in China, or in India, or in Japan, and surely things are cheap enough there. There is no trouble to find countries where everything is cheap, but I do not believe that it is the greatest desideratum in the world to have cheapness. I hardly think that farmers want to live in a country where everything is cheap. I do not think that if wheat were 25 cents a bushel, that the farmers of Canada would think that we had reached perfection. It is utterly unreasonable to say that because things are cheap in a country, that, therefore, the country is in an excellent condition. On the contrary, when the price of everything is low, then business is extremely dull, and when prices are advancing and reasonably fair, then I find that everything is in a healthy condition. Now, Sir, I come to speak on a question that has been talked about so often that it is almost threadbare. However, these discussions have to be repeated over and over again. People forget, and I know sometimes members of the Opposition forget, and I suppose they will thank me for reminding them, of some of the facts that I am about to mention. The question of reciprocity, for instance, has been discussed over and over again. Let me say that I have always spoken in favour of reciprocity with the United States whenever I have had the pleasure of addressing this House. I have done so because I would like to see a fair reciprocity treaty myself, and because my constituents are strongly in favour of it, living, as they do, directly opposite the United States, and having a steamboat running across every day. But, Sir, I say "a fair reciprocity treaty." Now, Sir, the Reform party often twit us, that our Government have not really endeavoured to obtain reciprocity, and they say that our negotiations in that regard were only humbug, and done to deceive the people. I take exception to any such statement as that. I believe that our Government was in earnest in this matter. I believe that when they went to Washington, they went there determined, if possible, to secure a reciprocity treaty; but, Sir, they also went there determined to protect the interests of Canada. They were not looking after the interests of the United States; they were not anxious that the United States should get the best of the bargain; but they were anxious that Canada should get fair treatment. I believe that our Government did everything in their power on that occasion; I believe they did everything that this House would back them up in doing, and I am glad that they were not willing to sacrifice the interests of Canada, and that they were not willing to discriminate against Great Britain in order to obtain a reciprocity treaty with the United States. Now, after all the anxiety displayed by the Reform party for reciprocity, what did they ever do to obtain it when they were in power themselves? I remember reading that on one occasion the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie was asked in this House what his Government were going to do about reciprocity, and he replied: We are going to do nothing more. If the United States want reciprocity they can ask for it. Mr. Mackenzie said that his Government had done all that they were going to do, and that they had gone as far as they were going to go; and I admire him for the manly stand he took then. But how, in the face of that, hon. members can get up and twit us on this side with not trying to do more, I cannot understand. I remember also reading about another hon. gentleman who sometimes talks about reciprocity in these days. What did he say at that time? Why, Sir, he made a most patriotic speech—I wish he would make one to-day—I believe, at Charlottetown, P.E.I., in which he said: "We have men and we have ships, and we will carry the war into the enemy's country." In that remark, Sir, he foreshadowed the very course of the Conservative party. That is what they have done; they have men and ships, and they are carrying the war into the enemy's country. When they are refused reciprocity by the United States, they do not sit down and say, "We can do nothing"; but they endeavour to open up new markets; and, while I myself think there is a good deal of force in the saying, "Why go off to Australia and not to the United States?" there would be force in that saying if we could get the markets of the United States; but there is no force in it when we have done all we can to get the United States market and cannot get it. Now, there may be some people in the country, even on the Conservative side, who, hearing so much about the iniquity of the National Policy, wonder if, after all, it is as bad as represented. Well, Sir, I do not pretend that it is perfect. I do not know that it could not be improved; but that is not the question. We are not asking whether the National Policy is perfect; but we are asked to make a choice. We have to choose between the two policies; that is the position we stand in. On the one hand, we have the policy of the Reform party. That policy, I think, may be characterized very fairly as indefinite. I do not think you could find three or four members on the opposite side of the House who would give the same definition of it, or who could tell exactly what it is. So I say it is indefinite. In one place it means one thing, and in another place it means another thing. In Winnipeg it may mean free trade; in Montreal it may mean incidental and moderate protection. It is not only indefinite, but it is unsettling, because up and down through the country their policy unsettles people. People wonder what they do mean, what they are going to do. They have promised so many things that some good, honest souls are unsettled, and do not know what may turn up. Their policy is also variable; it changes very rapidly. If we studied their policy of three or four years ago, we would not know anything about their policy of to-day. It was said by the speaker who preceded me that their policy was the same now as it was years ago. If it is, I do not know the meaning of words. If it is, they ought to get some one to write it out for them, or find some other way of expressing it, because I cannot find that it is the same, but that it varies and varies frequently, just to catch the popular wave. Now, I do not feel inclined to choose that policy; so I turn to the policy of the Conservative party. I find, in the first place, that the Conservative policy is definite. I think everybody in this country knows what it is. Even the Opposition know what it is. What is that policy? It is a policy for revenue, with moderate protection to our manufactures. I do not think that is indefinite; we all understand that. The people of this country understand it, and I believe that when they study it, they will endorse it. Then, in the second place, I find that this policy is not only definite, but that it is endorsed by all the great countries of the world except Great Britain. It is endorsed emphatically by the United States—I say emphatically, because of the elections held there very recently. It was thought that a wave of free trade was sweeping over that country, although what they call free trade there is what we would call high protection here. But, Sir, what do we find? We find that very little of that satisfied the people of the United States, and when they got the chance to turn out the men who had given them what they called free trade, they elected a Congress which will in time give them a higher protection than they have now; because, I repeat, their low tariff is higher than our tariff. Then, it is not only a definite policy and a policy endorsed by the United States, Germany and France, but it is a Canadian policy. Now, I believe in making a policy for Canada. I do not believe that when we sit down to make a tariff, we should make one for the United States, or one for Great Britain. We are thinking about ourselves; we are making a tariff to suit this country. We are not studying those other countries. It is our business to make a Canadian tariff, and I hold that the policy of the Conservative party is a Canadian policy. I mean by that not only that it is made for Canada, but that it is a policy that has faith in the future of Canada, that looks to the development of this country, and believes that it will be a great country. Sir, I make my choice for the Conservative policy. I do not see how any man who looks at the question calmly can do otherwise. I pity those men on the other side of the House who have their eyes so blinded that they cannot see the difference between these two policies. Sir, I advocate this policy. At the same time I believe in economy with efficiency. I think the affairs of this country should be, I believe they generally are, managed with economy; and I advocate economy and shall always advocate economy in managing the finances of the country. Now, I wish to say two words more before closing. This country has great advantages; I am sure I need not tell any member of this House that, although sometimes, when we hear speeches from the other side of the House, we fancy that this country has nothing but disadvantages. We have in this country an equable climate, we have great stores of minerals, we have magnificent lakes and rivers, we have a great railway system, we have farming lands not excelled in the world, we have a hardy population, we have civil and religious liberty, and in the great North-west we have homes for all who may come. Now, Sir, I appeal to the people of Canada to throw aside their prejudices, to examine the policies of the two parties, and judge which is the best for building up this country; and if this is done, I for one do not fear the verdict.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, if the few observations which I shall address to the House to-night have no greater quality, they will at least be brief. I agree with the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat as to the magnificence of our country and the immensity of its natural resources, and if those resources were properly developed, we would have a very great country, indeed. The hon. gentleman opened his remarks by referring to what I consider the most important question in a debate of this kind, that is, the labour question. That, I think, is the fundamental question underlying this whole subject. He stated, however, that the labourers of this country were benefited by protection. I deny that statement most emphatically. Neither the labourers of this country or those of any other country under the sun are benefited by protection. In his closing remarks the hon. gentleman referred to China, and he advised the people of this country to go there if they were not satisfied here. That is the most highly protected country in the world, and the country in which the people receive the least compensation for their labour. I deny emphatically that protection can, in any measure, enhance the value of labour. On the contrary, there is no class in the world that is so injured by protection as the labouring class. All the exports from this and every country are the product of labour. And I would like to ask the question, how can labour be benefited by imposing a tariff on the articles it produces? Such a proposition cannot be sustained for a moment. Commerce is nothing more nor less than the exchange of the surplus products of labour, and any instrumentality that prevents the free exchange of the products of labour places an embargo on labour which is an injustice and the greatest possible injury to it. Supply and demand regulate the price of labour as they regulate the prices of all other things where protection does not come into play. You may protect cotton, sugar, iron, or any other product you like, but what instrumentality is there to hinder the people of one country going to another and engaging in the labour of that country? The truth is just this. If there is one man seeking employment and there are two employers, that man has something to say in the price he has to get for his labour, but if there are two labourers seeking employment and only one employer, the employer makes the price. I have already stated that in my humble opinion no other class in the world is so injured by protection as the labouring class, and I have given my reasons. I am very glad indeed that this question has been raised, because there is none to-day in the whole civilized world of such importance as this question of labour. In too many instances labour does not receive its just reward, and particularly in countries where high protection exists. Two of the greatest enemies of labour are protection and the standing armies of Europe. And why? Because protection, in the first instance, robs the labourer of a large share of his just reward. In the second instance, because the people of this world are simply a community on the face of the earth. In every country where men who should be labouring are soldiering, the result is that the men who do labour in these countries have to maintain those armies. There is nothing on the face of the globe that labour does not pay for; and not only are those countries injured, but the purchasing power of those countries is so impaired that the commercial countries of the world, which do not maintain standing armies, are also injured. Why is this? It is because the purchasing power of those countries is so reduced that they are not able to buy to the extent they would from commercial countries which do not maintain standing armies. This is the great question of the world to-day, and one that must be settled in the interest of the wealth-producers of the world. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat referred to the fact that there are a million unemployed men in Great Britain to-day.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS. Some hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." That may possibly be true, but why are they idle? Is it because of the conditions regulating trade and commerce in England? Not at all. It is because of the high tariffs in other countries of the world. That is the reason, and there is no other reason. In making a comparison between the value of labour in one country and its value in another country, it is not fair to take a European country and compare it with the United States, and for this reason, that in every new and undeveloped country, wages, as a rule, are higher than in the older and more settled countries. With the United States in its normal condition, you could not make a comparison between the east and west, because wages are uniformly higher, as a rule, in the west. But a fair comparison would be between Germany and Great Britain. Are the wages in highly protected Germany as high as in free trade Great Britain? Nothing of the kind. The wages in Great Britain are 50 per cent higher than in Germany. There is no country in the world, in my humble opinion, that does the justice to its consuming masses which Great Britain does. A second statement made by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken is that our farmers are protected. I deny that proposition most emphatically. They are not protected at all.

They may have a small protection or a pretended protection, in the one article of pork, but even the protection on that is more a packer's protection than a farmer's protection. Now, let me enumerate some of the articles. Does this country, or does it not, produce a surplus of wheat? Does it, or does it not, produce a surplus of cheese, of butter, of beef, of barley, and articles of that kind? Can it be possible, when we are exporting all these articles to a foreign country, that the products of the United States passing through this country could possibly injure the farmers of this country? The only result, from the admission of United States products, would be greater activity in our carrying trade and greater benefit to the country as a whole. I challenge any hon. gentleman opposite to prove in any degree whatever that the farmers of this country are protected, except possibly to a very small extent, in the article of pork. Who are the producers of the wealth of this country? They are, above all others, our farmers! If any class should be protected, it is the farmers and the labourers; but I defy any hon. gentleman to prove that either of these classes is protected in anything whatever, except as I have said. Now, some hon. gentlemen may say: Oh, yes, at this moment the farmers are receiving a benefit from the tariff on wheat.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS. Some hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." Well, the real truth is that a few speculators, who have cornered the wheat market in Canada are deriving some benefit from the tariff thereon, but the farmers are not deriving any benefit. This is just one of the exemplifications of the operations of this system and it exemplifies it in a better manner than any other that I can think of. The position is simply this: We raise a very considerable surplus of wheat, which finds its market in Liverpool, just where the surplus grown in the United States finds its market. The prices are maintained low until the speculators have bought up the entire crop of wheat. Then they ship just sufficient to keep up the price, and they sell a good deal of wheat in the shape of flour back to the farmers themselves. Let me refer to another item—that of beef. I might, perhaps, better deal with it in connection with the short reference I shall have to make to the question of reciprocity; but I will refer to it now as I think of it. Now, the farmer of Canada is a very considerable seller of beef. The conditions of to-day are such that it would pay far better to sell this beef in the United States than to sell it in England, because the price is relatively higher in the United States than in England. But there are two reasons why we cannot sell it there; one is the tariff, and the other is the embargo upon the sale of animals from Canada in the United States and upon the sale of animals from the United States to Canada. Now, as I understand it, if the embargo were removed, we could sell our beef to better advantage in the United States than we can in England, even though there is a duty upon it. And I would just make the suggestion that it might be worth while for the Government to endeavour to remove the embargo from cattle coming from the United States to Canada, and to get the embargo removed from our cattle going into the United States. Now, I am not finding fault in this; I only wish to make the suggestion. Some hon. gentlemen may say that that would be unwise, because if it were done the embargo would be continued in Great Britain, preventing the sale of our cattle there alive and making it necessary to slaughter them on arrival. Well, my information about the matter is this: That as long as the embargo exists between Canada and the United States, so long we proclaim to England that there is disease in this country which there is not, nor do I believe there is to any considerable extent in the United States. But, so long as this impression is continued by the embargo between Canada and the United States, so long it is impossible to get the embargo removed from our cattle going to Great Britain. This afternoon, the hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin), in the course of his speech, referred to the price of hay, and he mentioned what he believed to be the average price in Canada. Some hon. gentleman on the other side seemed to think that hay was much higher than the price stated by my hon. friend from Ottawa. Having a very considerable knowledge of that matter I simply endeavoured to correct the statement, taking no part whatever in the arguments, either on one side or the other. The Secretary of State asked me what the relative price of hay was this year and last. I stated that it was a little less this year, and he seemed to think he was saying a very clever thing when he said that the removal of $2 per ton duty on hay going into the United States could not have affected the price in this country. The hon. gentleman was quite right—so long as there is a surplus of hay in the United States. There was an abnormal crop there last year, and when our hay was offered there, the reduction of duty could not affect the price here. The hon. gentleman seemed to think his was a wonderfully clever remark and it was received with great favour by hon. gentlemen on the other side who seem never to have studied any question of political economy at all. Now, I listened with a great deal of interest indeed to the speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Militia on this subject. But he did exactly what a large number of gentlemen on the other side of the House do. He failed to deal with the question of protection versus free trade, or with the question of protection versus a revenue tariff. He simply read from different individuals' opinions, and he dealt with the condition of the country from 1874 to 1878, and since. Every advance the country has made within recent years he claimed as due to the acts of the Government. I deny that proposition entirely, and I hold that, just so long as the people of this country are industrious and economical they can stand a great deal of robbery, even under a high protective system, and yet thrive to some extent. But the real question is: Are the people of this country thriving as they ought to thrive? The hon. gentleman said he would not deal with the abstract principle; he acknowledged that he did not understand the abstract principle very well. I think that that is quite true, or he would not have made the speech he did. But, Mr. Speaker, the abstract principle is the question we ought to discuss in this House. And why? Because it is the only question that can be intelligently discussed. Suppose that this country existed for twenty years under a high protective system, but during that whole time we were borrowing very largely from foreign countries and expending the money on public works. Would not that very much stimulate the trade of this country? And if after we got through this period of twenty years, we lived for another twenty years under free trade, during which time we were paying the penalty for our previous borrowings—could you make a fair comparison between these periods? No, Mr. Speaker, you could not. And I hold that the only question that can be discussed intelligently is the abstract question of protection versus a revenue tariff. Sir, let me say here that I am a free trader—I am a free trader in principle, out and out, and I have never been afraid to say so. In the first election that I ran, in 1882, I declared myself in principle a free trader, in my address I sent to every elector in the county; and if every individual in this country held my views, we would be prepared to adopt free trade as soon as we judged it expedient to do so. Let us remember that we have had certain industries built up in this country dependent upon banks and financial institutions, and knowing what I do of trade and commerce, I would not bring a crisis upon this country by introducing a great change at once. I would bring about this fiscal change by degrees, but I would bring it about far more speedily than would hon. gentlemen opposite. And why, Mr. Speaker? Simply because, as has been stated to-day, their masters would not allow them to do it. But, Sir, I am a free man, and I would bring about this change just as rapidly as I think would be expedient in the interests of this country, and that would be very rapidly indeed. But this country may not yet be sufficiently advanced for that proposition, and the best that we can do to-day is to adopt a revenue tariff. Now, let me say here, that every man who is in favour of a revenue tariff as against a protective tariff, is in principle a free trader, every man who advocates a revenue tariff is a free trader. The Minister of Militia the other day thought he asked a very clever question, when he asked an hon. gentleman on this side, who is a free trader, if he would be prepared to rob the people to the extent of 25 per cent, and he said, No. Then he asked, Would you be willing to do it to the extent of 15 per cent? I do not know what the answer was, but the question suggests this well-known fact, that under a protective system there is a large amount of revenue that does not go into the treasury, but goes into the pocket of certain manufacturers, and there is where the robbery comes in. Now, I hold that even under a revenue tariff, taxation is not distributed in the most equitable way, and I am not afraid to say that, although I am a very large land-owner, I would like to see the tax upon land only.

An hon. MEMBER. Talk saw-logs.

Mr. EDWARDS. Well, Sir, I think the hon. gentleman knows very little about saw-logs, or about anything else; and I would advise the hon. gentleman to study this very important question of a revenue tariff, because it is very important indeed to the people of Canada. But, Sir, I do not expect to see in my time such an advance in public opinion on this question as I would like to see; I do not expect that for some time to come we shall go beyond a revenue tariff. But a revenue tariff I am prepared to support, as I believe, considering all the conditions of this country, that it would be the very best system for the people of Canada to-day. Now, the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Northrup), in the course of his address yesterday, referred to the condition of the farmers of England, saying that they were in the most deplorable condition imaginable, and that they considered their only remedy was protection. Well, I suppose, Sir, if you were to go to England and travel over that country, you would find a certain number of farmers who advocate protection, perhaps a large number. But the difficulty in England to-day is simply this, that transit has become so cheap, and agricultural products are so plentiful the world over, that the tenant-farmers of England, who pay a very high rent for their land, are undoubtedly suffering. But that is a difficulty that will adjust itself in time, and the farmers of England will yet be in as good a position as ever they were, not because protection will be introduced into England, because protection will never be introduced into England. If England became a protective country, what would be the condition of the farmers of Canada? Their condition would be this : That they would be taxed at both ends, they would be taxed on everything they bought, and taxed on everything they sold. England's legislation considers the welfare of her entire people. Supposing that England did adopt a high protective policy for her agricultural products, would England be the manufacturing country that she is to-day, and would the farmers of England even be as prosperous as they are to-day? The fact is, Sir, that England, notwithstanding all that may be said to the contrary, is the greatest example of the benefits of free trade that we have in the world. England lends to almost every nation in the world. When other countries fail as did the Argentine Republic, and when the banks of Australia, and of other countries, failed, were those failures an injury to the countries I have named? Not at all. They were a great injury to Great Britain, who had loaned them money, but the countries themselves gained thereby, because they unloaded a very large amount of their indebtedness. This drain is going on continually; England is a continual loser in this respect; but, notwithstanding all that, she is the greatest commercial country the world has ever known, and will remain, as long as she maintains her present commercial system, the wonder of the entire world. The very fact that the farmers of Great Britain desire protection, taken in connection with this other fact that the manufacturers of Canada also desire protection is one of the strongest arguments possible against the system. The very class who desire it in England is the very class who do not wish for it here. In the course of this debate a good deal has been said about the depression that existed from 1874 to 1878. That certainly was a very severe depression and a world-wide depression. It was a depression that was intensified as the result of the American war. At that time the Liberals of this country denied that it was their policy that brought about that result. To-day hon. gentlemen opposite denied in the same way that the present depression has been brought about by their acts. So far as that is concerned I hold this, that a country can be fairly prosperous either under a protective or a revenue tariff, but I hold most firmly that any country will be more uniformly prosperous under a revenue tariff. Nothing is so conducive to unsteadiness in trade as a system of protection; it is the most dangerous system that can possibly be introduced. I am not one of those who hold hon. gentlemen opposite responsible for the prices at which our products are sold in foreign markets. During the contest of 1892 a circular was sent into the county I represent, and no doubt into other counties, comparing the prices of farm products under the Mackenzie Administration and under the Conservative Administration during the four succeeding years. I then denied, as I now deny, that the Government has anything whatever to do with the prices of our products sent abroad. Those prices are regulated by the law of supply and demand and not by any act of government. Irrespective of the question of free trade and protection, what is the commercial and financial condition of Canada to-day? For years past we have heard in each Budget speech that the country was in a flourishing condition. Being engaged in the lumber trade, I discovered last year that the country was not in a flourishing condition, but those not so familiar with that trade only discovered this year that a depression existed. The depression appeared in this country in a very marked degree last year, and while I sincerely hope that the state of trade will soon improve, I am afraid such will not be the case. Conditions may temporarily improve, because this is not a financial depression from which we are suffering but a commercial depression. I have heard hon. members speak as if finances had something to do with it. So far as this country is concerned finances have nothing to do with it, it is a commercial depression, and while I hope we may soon recover from this commercial depression, I fear for the future of this country. I hold that this country is loaded with indebtedness beyond its capacity to bear; I hold that we have reason to fear, sooner or later, financial difficulty as a result of the administration of public affairs during the past number of years. The system pursued is simply one of bridging over, and what I fear is that when the bridging over ceases, there will be a bad day for Canada. When we cease to be borrowers abroad, for we borrow in order to pay interest on our indebtedness, I shall be afraid of our financial foundation. I perhaps should not make this statement, but I say it in all sincerity, and while I hope for better things in this country, I regret most sincerely as a Canadian the administration of public affairs which has marked recent years. We are loaded, I say, beyond our capacity. We cover too much territory; the cost of transportation, considering our population, is too great; I regret that we cover so much territory, and having considered this question, I fear for our population, considering the conditions that exist. I will say this in all frankness, that there is an evil day coming to Canada, and while so far as I am individually concerned, I would always besire to be in Opposition, because I have no desire to be on the treasury benches, yet I desire the Liberal party to come into power and the principles of that party to prevail, but I believe the present time would be a very bad one for the Liberals to take office because there is no question but that the odium which properly belongs to hon. gentlemen opposite would be placed upon the shoulders of the Liberal party. In the course of this debate it has been made to appear by hon. gentlemen opposite that hon. members on this side of the House are entirely opposed to manufactures in this country. That is not the case. Hon. members on this side of the House are perfectly in accord with the large proportion of the manufacturing industries carried on here. We desire that manufacturing shall be carried on to the fullest extent possible. We also consider that a very large proportion of the manufactures can be carried on without any protection whatever, and what we find fault with is that manufactures are promoted which require high protection in order that they may be continued. Under that system how do those who develop the natural resources of this country benefit? Who are the producers of our natural resources? The farmers, the lumbermen, the fishermen and the miners. These are the men who are engaged in developing our natural resources and thereby enriching our people, and yet they are called upon to pay tribute to certain manufactures in order to obtain the articles they require. Those producing classes are injured thereby, and that is what we find fault with, and why the Liberal party desires that we should live under a system of revenue tariff instead of under a system of high protection. It is sometimes said also, that under the policy of the Liberal party we would not obtain sufficient revenue. I deny that proposition entirely. Under our system the revenue would be more easily obtainable, for the reason that a large amount of material is now imported into this country under the protective policy from which the treasury of the nation derives no benefit at all. A highly protective system is a system that is the very opposite of being productive of revenue. The hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Craig) said that the prices of materials were not raised by protection. Well, if that be the case, and if nobody is injured by protection, then according to his idea it would be better to pile on still more protection. But I deny his contention, and I say that it all depends upon the conditions. In some instances the importer pays the duty and in other instances the exporter pays the duty. It depends entirely on circumstances, and under our condition of things in Canada the people know too well who pays the duty in a general way, in so far as these highly protected industries are concerned. Let me refer, Mr. Speaker, to the question of reciprocity. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that the Reform party have departed entirely from any idea of reciprocity, and that we have changed our base in that respect. Well, Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, we have never changed our position on that question. We have always been low tariff men, we judge of our climatic and geographical conditions, and bordering as we do for four thousand miles along the great republic to the south, we believe, and properly believe, that freer trade with that country would be desirable in the interests of the producers of Canada. But Sir, we want that reciprocity on fair grounds, and on fair grounds only. Having covered so much territory as we have in this country with our sparse population, I, as a Canadian, understanding something of commerce and viewing the question in all its aspects, say frankly, that something must be done in the direction of reciprocity with the United States. I admit at once that a free trader cannot be an out-and-out reciprocity man, and I make the statement without fear. I am not, and never was, one of those who would make reciprocity a fundamental principle, but I believe that the difficulty surrounding the situation is so great that freer trade with the United States has got to be obtained in some way in order that the people of this country may prosper as they should. While I regard the English market as a great market indeed, yet I say that it is simply preposterous, it is insane, to say that we will seek trade with the antipodes, while we have to the immediate south of us such a great country as the United States. We on this side of the House are accused of being annexationists because we advocate these views. I say, Mr. Speaker, that any Canadian who regards with appreciation our system of government, our banking system, and our institutions, cannot be an annexationist. We have in this country responsible government. It may have its faults, but it has its advantages. I am a lover of our system of government, and I always hope to live under it, and not for one moment would I exchange it. I may say here, that for the development of a new country, I believe we have the very best banking system in the world. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that the farmers of Canada are satisfied and that they do not desire that the policy of the Reform party shall prevail. That, I believe, is not a correct statement. You know very well, Mr. Speaker, that many men are so wedded to party that they cannot be convinced that they are wrong in principle, some were born Tories, their fathers were Tories, and no reasoning whatever could change them. However, we have now in existence in Canada a body known as the Patrons of Industry. Would any sane man believe for a moment that we would have such an organization if it were not for the fact that a large number of men wished to withdraw from the Conservative party because of its high protection, and that they do not want to go into the Liberal party because they would not exchange their colours. And so the dissatisfied Conservatives and some Liberals have joined together and formed the party of the Patrons of Industry. Their platform is almost identical with the Liberal platform, and for that reason, I believe, they are to some extent making a mistake. I say that, because this third party has been organized, advocating almost precisely the same principles, so far as trade and commerce are concerned, as are advocated by the Liberal party. There could be no stronger argument than the existence of the Patron organization to show that our farmers generally are not satisfied with the protective policy. But, say hon. gentlemen on the other side: Oh, we carried the country so many times and we will carry it again. Well, Sir, I state here, that at the general elections in 1882, 1887 and 1891, this country was not carried by the policy of protection. If it were carried on the protective policy, why was it necessary for the Government to pass the Franchise Act and the Gerrymander Act to maintain themselves in power? I say that if hon. gentlemen opposite will only be manly enough to contest the country on fair and equitable grounds, and to have a fair and square fight on their fiscal policy without the instrumentality of any other issue, the ministerialists will not come back with a corporal's guard. Before I resume my seat, Sir, there is just one statement that I wish to make, and I do not wish to make it in any manner reflecting on my political opponents, because I believe that in a general way the gentlemen on the other side of the House are honest. I do not for one moment think, that because a man calls himself a Tory or a Conservative that he is dishonest. I have the greatest admiration for a narrow-minded, bigoted, ignorant old Tory, because I believe that he is generally an honest and square man. But what do we see to-day? Are there men in this ministry who have had great commercial experience; are there men who have had any commercial experience at all? In order that this country should be governed in the interests of the people, we should have a ministry composed of men who have some ideas on commercial questions, and who would not find it necessary to send agents around the country to make inquiries upon the subject. It is high time that we should have sitting on the treasury benches men who have some knowledge of trade and commerce. I wish to make no reflection on any gentleman on the other side; but I hold that there is not to-day in the Cabinet one single hon. gentleman to whom a large commercial concern in this country would entrust the care of his business—not because of any inferiority in them, for they may be very clever men in their own callings. A gentleman who has been a lecturer and a professor may be highly qualified for the position which properly belongs to him, but he never should be Finance Minister of this country. It is high time that we should have on the treasury benches hon. gentlemen who have commercial knowledge, and who would put their commercial knowledge to practical use in the country's affairs. The Budget speech of the hon.

Mr. EDWARDS.

Minister of Finance was a very good campaign speech—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS. Yes, it was a very good campaign speech for the ignorant, but not a speech that any gentleman having a knowledge of commerce could endorse. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have nothing more to say. I, myself, have no desire, as I have said, for a seat on the treasury benches. It is just possible that when the Liberal party come into power I may cross the House just for the purpose of being in Opposition; but I do not think I shall, because much as I love, personally, to be in Opposition I could not do that, because I could not endorse the principles of the Conservative party.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. gentleman who has just sat down should be so hard on his financial leader. He said he was making no reflections on this side of the House, but he held that the Finance Minister should have practical business experience. I wonder how he would like to entrust the finances of this country to the late Finance Minister, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I have listened with a good deal of attention to the hon. member's speech. I tried to make out what his definition was of a revenue tariff, or a tariff for revenue only. He told us that free trade was impracticable—that as a theory it was very good, but that it could not be attained now. He told us that he was opposed to protection, and was in favour of a tariff for revenue only. Several times he was about to tell us what a tariff for revenue only was, but each time he backed down again; he came up again, and again backed down; so that we are still in ignorance of what a tariff for revenue only is. I must say that in that respect the hon. gentleman is on a par with all the other members of the Opposition who have spoken in this debate. I was very much touched to-night by his references to the necessity of protecting the workingmen. That was his great solicitude—to see the workingmen of this country protected, as they were not sufficiently protected to-day. Suppose we found a man in this country engaged in a most lucrative business, and employing a large number of men, and paying them in store pay instead of in cash; suppose he found that man paying them in a currency that was depreciated in the neighbourhood. I am sure that his bosom would rise in righteous indignation against such a man, and he would do all he could to prevent such a practice.

Mr. EDWARDS. I desire to ask the hon. gentleman if he knows of a case of that kind in the country?

R

Mr. WALLACE. I have been told of one—that of a man engaged in a large lumber business not very far from the county of Russell.

Mr. EDWARDS. I deny the statement entirely. Such was never the case, and is not the case to-day. It is an entire fabrication.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the hon. gentleman denying—that there was a gentleman in Russell employing a large number of labourers, and so very solicitous about them that he paid them in store pay, and used a species of script? What is he denying?

Mr. EDWARDS. If the hon. gentleman refers to me, I say I never did it, and do not do it to-day.

Mr. WALLACE. Very well. I am saying what has been told me on the best authority, that this has been done in the county of Russell, and done to the knowledge of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is only on a par with the position of other hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. Last session we were regaled with a speech from a gentleman who brought in a Bill to preserve the sanctity of the Lord's day, and who, it was proved in this House, chartered his tug for service on the Lord's day. There were other gentlemen who clamoured for free trade as the only desirable thing for this country; but we were told by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) that though free trade was the great desideratum for the country, we must have a protective duty of at least 100 per cent on coal oil. We were asked by the hon. member for (Mr. Featherston) to put an enormous protective duty on glucose, because there was a glucose factory in his riding. Three or four other members of the Opposition—if I mistake not, the members for Lincoln, Welland, and Essex—went as a delegation to the Government to ask for what? To ask for free trade in wines? No, Sir; to protest against the duty of 65 per cent on wines being reduced to 35 per cent.

Mr. GIBSON. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken. What we did say to the hon. Minister of Finance and to the hon. First Minister was that if there was anything that would stand protection, it was wine.

Mr. WALLACE. I think we might be protected from interruptions of such a character as that. It is no contradiction at all; it is simply an admission of what I said. The present duty on wines is 65 per cent, and the hon. member for Welland protested against 30 per cent being taken off by the French treaty, in return for corresponding advantages, because it would injure the industry of some of his constituents; and his denial is simply no denial at all, like the denial of the hon. member for Russell. We had other members of the Opposition advocating protection for other articles. I need not give their names or mention the particular articles, because they are familiar to every member of this House, and they show the hypocrisy of those hon. gentlemen. Now, Mr. Speaker, these gentlemen always profess to be great advocates of economy. Our expenditures during the year 1894 amounted to $37,585,000. Of this, there were fixed charges as follows:—Interest on the debt, $10,393,000; subsidies, $4,250,000; sinking fund, a little over $2,000,000; making a total of $16,750,000 in round numbers, and leaving a balance of $20,853,000 to be expended in other ways. This $16,750,000 consisted of fixed charges which the Government must pay in order to fulfil pledges made to the people of this country.

Mr. CHARLTON. Did the Government create any of those fixed charges?

Mr. WALLACE. Certainly they did. At confederation they created a fixed charge of bonuses to the provinces to the extent of $4,250,000; they assumed the debts of the provinces, amounting to over $100,000,000; and they promoted great enterprises which could not be built for nothing. There were fixed charges amounting to $16,750,000, and there were controllable expenditures amounting to more than $20,000,000. Upon what items of those $20,000,000 do the Liberals say they propose to economize? We have gone over the whole range of the expenditure of this country, and have pared down that expenditure of controllable items to the extent of $2,250,000. I would like to ask those hon. gentlemen upon what items they would still further propose to economize.

Mr. McMULLEN. We will point you out that when we go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman made a very long speech yesterday and was unable to point it out to them. In the Committees of Supply, in other years, as the records of Parliament show, they have not put upon the pages of "Hansard" very many objections to the expenditures that were made. Why, we remember that when they were in opposition before 1874, they had the same cry that they use to-day. They professed then a great anxiety for economy. They urged that the expenditures of every kind had been largely increased by the Conservative party of that day, and that these could be reduced? What did they do? The total expenditure of 1872-73 was $19,174,000. When the Reform party came into power in 1873, that expenditure jumped up to $24,488,000 in 1875-6 or an increase of $5,318,000, despite their many professions of economy. And I think it would require no prophet to assure us that if they should come into power to-morrow, we would find history repeating itself. We would find that instead of reducing the expenditure as we have done, instead of bringing down the expenditure, in times of stringency, to the lowest possible basis, they would, as in 1875-76, increase the expenditure in two years to the extent of $5,250,000. I intend to refer to another feature of their expenditure as compared with ours, and that is the cost of collection of revenue. I mean the collection of revenue from the post office and the public works, including railways and canals, and all the other public services of the Dominion. In 1872-73, we expended $2,564,051; in 1877-78, after five years of Grit rule, we expended $4,196,375, or an increase of $1,632,324. That was the expenditure during those years. What revenue did we receive in that period? From these same services we received, in 1872-73, $2,150,292, and in 1877-78, our revenue had increased to $3,243,273, being an increase in revenue of $1,091,981, against an increase of expenditure of $1,632,000. That is to say, it cost the country, under Liberal rule, $1.50 to collect every dollar of additional revenue from those two services during those five years. Now, we will take the corresponding period when the Conservative party were in power—or take the whole period from 1877-78 until 1894. The expenditure on post offices and public works, including just the same services, railways and canals and the other sources of revenue, in 1877-78, was $4,196,375. In 1893-94 it had increased to $7,432,068, being an increase of $3,235,693. The revenue derived from these sources in 1877-78 was $3,242,273, and in 1893-94 it was $6,512,086, making an increase in that period of $3,269,813 revenue, against an increase of expenditure in the same period of $3,235,000. This shows that every dollar of increased expenditure, under Conservative rule, has been met by an equal increase from the revenue of these services, without the imposition of a single cent of new taxation. That is a fair comparison between the two political parties during the years that they were respectively in power. A good deal has been said by the various speakers opposite as to the financial standing of this country. They all have to admit two things, namely, that the credit of this country has increased, and that we made an excellent loan the other day; but they qualify that statement by saying that the rate of interest has gone down everywhere, and that all the other countries have floated loans at correspondingly low rates of interest. It is not so. I have in my hand a statement here of the values of four per cents in 1879 of the various countries and of the values of those in January, 1895. I will not read the whole statement, but it shows this, that four per cents in Canada, which were worth, in 1879, 89 to 91 per cent, are to-day quoted

Mr. WALLACE.

110 to 112. That is that they have increased 21 per cent in those years. New South Wales 4 per cents have increased 13 per cent; the colony of Victoria, 10 per cent; the United States, 13 per cent; South Australia, 17 per cent; Queensland, 17 per cent. This shows that the credit of Canada has risen more than the credit of any of those countries named—than that of any other country in the world. Our 4 per cents have risen 20 per cent in that period, while the United States 4 per cents have only risen 13 per cent; and in no other country with which we are acquainted has the value of their securities risen in the same proportion as ours. Our Canadian 3 per cents are quoted to-day at par in the markets of the world. That shows that not only have we participated in the advantages of cheap money with other countries, but that under the judicious and wise administration of the Conservative party during those seventeen years, our securities have a greater value in proportion than those of any other country. With reference to the loan, some hon. gentlemen opposite have made a comparison between the loan floated by the Finance Minister last November and that made in February last by the United States. What are the facts? Our loan was made at a net cost of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. That was the net cost of our loan at that time. The loan made by the United States, bearing 4 per cent interest, in thirty year coin bonds, for which \$65,000,000 were obtained—

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). That is not the United States loan.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). I did not mean to be disrespectful, but some one has made a mistake.

Mr. WALLACE. The one to which I allude is $62,400,000, 4 per cent, thirty years coin bond, for which $65,000,000 were obtained.

Mr. GIBSON. It was a $50,000,000 loan at ten years.

Mr. WALLACE. I am speaking of the loan of last February—the last loan they made—and on which they paid the rate of $3\frac{3}{4}$ per cent, but it was said that they may pay that loan in silver, and that is the reason it did not sell so high as the Canadian loan. Not so. I have here a paragraph from President Cleveland's message, in which he says:

Of course, there should never be any doubt in any quarter regarding the redemption in gold coin of the Government bonds which are made payable in coin.

Mr. CHARLTON. President Cleveland asked for legislation from Congress to make that point clear, and Congress refused, and consequently the bonds were put on the market subject to that doubt as to how they would be redeemed.

Mr. WALLACE. There is the statement of the President of the United States with regard to the loan.

Mr. CHARLTON. That made no difference.

Mr. WALLACE. And the same pledge was given by Senator John Sherman, who was the leader of the opposite party in the United States Senate.

Mr. CHARLTON. At the time severe criticisms were indulged in by the press of the United States against Congress which refused to take action which would have enabled the Administration to place this loan on much more favourable terms and save to the treasury of the United States some millions of dollars.

Mr. WALLACE. I am aware of that, but the fact remains that these are the terms of the loan, and it is payable in gold.

Mr. CHARLTON. Not at all, payable in coin. Those are the terms upon which the loan is made.

Mr. FOSTER. The United States Government could not stand five minutes if it did not pay in gold. It intends to do so, and it must do so.

Mr. WALLACE. If the hon. gentleman is not satisfied with my statement of the case, he can make his speech afterwards. These gentlemen have stated that this Conservative Government of Canada is an extravagant Government.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WALLACE. "Hear, hear," some of them say. Now, I propose to compare the expenditures of the Dominion Government for the last five years with the expenditures of the various provinces for five years up to the latest period we have been able to obtain particulars of their expenditures. During the last six years our expenditure on consolidated fund account increased from $36,500,000 to $37,393,000, or less than 2 per cent during the whole of these five years. Sir, what is the history of these provincial governments controlled almost wholly during that period by the Reform party, by the allies of hon. gentlemen opposite, by men working hand in glove with them? I will not give the details of the various provinces, though I have the figures here. The expenditure of the provinces in 1887 was $9,614,000. In 1892, the expenditure of these provinces was $12,704,000, an increase of 32 per cent in five years, as compared with 2 per cent increase by this extravagant Administration.

Mr. CHARLTON. That would be more satisfactory if we had details as to the separate provinces.

Mr. WALLACE. I can give the hon. gentleman that if it is more satisfactory. These are the figures:

Ontario	$3,454,372	$4,068,257
Quebec	3,288,798	4,446,640
Nova Scotia	664,103	822,462
New Brunswick	667,647	676,483
Manitoba	520,190	1,000,345
British Columbia	731,307	1,430,920
Prince Edward Island....	288,052	259,012
Total	$9,614,496	$12,704,119

You will notice that half the New Brunswick Government, or little more, is Conservative and their expenditure was nearly at a standstill. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, these provinces have largely increased their indebtedness. I find I have not the increases, but I can give the amount of the indebtedness of each province:—Quebec, $14,672,169; Nova Scotia, $1,673,511; New Brunswick, $2,183,564; Manitoba, $4,398,258—the assets are not given—British Columbia, $1,694,722; Prince Edward Island, $185,000.

Mr. CHARLTON. These are net debts, excepting the case of Manitoba?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes. Now, there is another point, namely the increase of the federal debt under the two governments. The Reform party, during the time they were in power, increased the public debt from $99,500,000 to $140,000,000, or at the rate of $8,000,000 per annum. The Conservative party during the last five years increased the indebtedness from $237,500,000 to $246,000,000, a total increase of $8,500,000, or less than $2,000,000 a year.

Mr. GIBSON. There are a hundred millions which you have not accounted for.

Mr. WALLACE. But which I can easily account for. That would be extended over a very long period, and besides it represents expenditures which were endorsed, and are endorsed to-day by almost the entire population of Canada. And even the Reform party themselves, though they opposed the expenditure at the time with all the vehemence and hostility they could command, were obliged to cease their hostility, because they found the people of Canada were against them—and it is one of the reasons why they are where they are to-day. Though we increased the expenditure only eight and a half millions, we have much to show for the expenditure. I need not read the whole of the items, but I have here a statement showing more than $16,500,000 spent on capital account for the benefit of the people of the whole Dominion during those five years. For instance, we have expenditures for our canals, the Welland Canal, $417,000; the Williamsburg Canal, $429,000; the St. Lawrence River Canal, $154,000; Port Arthur Harbour and Kaministiquia River, $340,000; the Lachine Canal, $600,000; Cornwall Canal, $1,120,000—

Mr. GIBSON. There is nothing about the Tay Canal there.

Mr. WALLACE. I think if the Tay Canal did not exist the hon gentleman for Lincoln could not exist either. It seems to be his whole stock in trade. We have an expenditure of $1,500,000 for the purchase of the Rivière du Loup branch, and a large number of other expenditures, every one of which can be justified as being in the interest of the people of this Dominion, expenditures intended for the promotion of trade, for the opening up of facilities of communication, for the benefit of the whole Dominion. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have heard on a good deal to-night and we have heard on a good many other occasions from the Reform party about their various policies. Their policy of unrestricted reciprocity has been criticised by the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Craig) who spoke to-day, and it was also alluded to by the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn). Sir, the policy of the Conservative party has always been favourable to a fair and equitable reciprocity treaty with the United States. Our statute-books to-day show that we have been willing, that we are willing to-day, to do what is fair to promote trade between those two countries. But, we have not been willing to hand over to a foreign country the control of the finances of Canada. We have not been willing in our trade policy to discriminate in favour of a foreign country as against Great Britain, we have not been in favour of adopting a policy of reciprocity which would involve a much higher taxation than we have to-day in the Dominion, and which would inevitably lead to direct taxation. Those gentlemen had a policy of unrestricted reciprocity, but there are some little doubts about that policy, which have been referred to in this House, and which I will refer to again. The hon. leader of the Opposition, in a speech he made in Toronto, and portions of which have been quoted in this debate, but which I will refer to again, spoke as follows:—

The conditions are not equal upon which you can form a closer commercial alliance between Canada and Great Britain, but there is alongside of us a kindred nation, economically situated as we are, the United States, and we claim that commercial union, which at this moment is not possible with England, is possible with the United States; and the policy which we have advocated, which we still continue to advocate, is the removal of all commercial barriers between this country and the great favoured nation to the south of us.

I do not hear any "hear, hears" from the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) to that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is not my speech.

Mr. WALLACE.

Mr. WALLACE. And I am glad to see that he does not endorse it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not say so.

Mr. WALLACE. Only by manner. The leader of the Opposition said still further:

If Sir John A. Macdonald will adopt our programme, and give us unrestricted reciprocity, with all my heart, in this matter, I will pledge him that he will have my most emphatic support.

He was very enthusiastic. He said still further:

I have read history in this way, that every reform has cost to the reformers years of labour; and those years of labour I am, for one, prepared to give; and though the Democrats may be defeated in the United States, and though Canadians may grow faint-hearted in Canada, the Liberal party, as long as I have anything to do with it, will remain true to the cause until that cause is successful. I will not expect to win in a day, but I am prepared to remain in the cool shades of opposition until the cause has triumphed. But some think that, although unrestricted reciprocity is possible, it is not probable. We are on the eve of triumph, the triumph is in our hands, if we only know how to play our cards.

Apparently they did not know how to play their cards.

Mr. CHARLTON. You had two aces up your sleeves.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not know what the hon. member for North Norfolk means by having two aces up his sleeves. The aces they had up their sleeves did not work.

Mr. CHARLTON. I mean that was the course of the Government.

Mr. WALLACE. He said, still further:

We will take fresh courage and look for more, because I tell you the Liberal party will never cease the agitation until they triumph and obtain continental free trade.

But they did cease, they stopped their agitation, they grew tired, notwithstanding that their leader had pledged himself, had pledged the party, and other members of the party had pledged themselves, that they would never rest until they had obtained continental free trade, or unrestricted reciprocity, or some other of those names of their policy, because it is all the one policy. But, Mr. Speaker, those gentlemen who have been leaders of the Reform party, have not hesitated to change their policy. I say that commercial union, continental union, and unrestricted reciprocity, are all the one policy. But that was not their only policy. The Conservative party, within the present Parliament, has had four leaders, but they have had only one policy during the last seventeen years. The Reform party have had, during recent years, one leader, but they have had four different policies, and we do not know how soon they may have another. A few years ago, it was a tariff for revenue, and that is what they are apparently coming to to-day. After that, we had the Hon. Edward Blake preaching all over the country, in 1886 and 1887, in favour of a modified form of protection. He told the manufacturers, You need not fear me at all, I am a better friend to you than the Conservative party. I am your real, true friend, put your confidence in me and all will be well. We won't disturb the protective tariff. It would be impossible to do so, and we do not intend to do it. That was their second policy, and then we had this changeful bantling, unrestricted reciprocity, or commercial union. Still later, we had another policy, free trade as they have it in England.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Where did you see that ?

Mr. WALLACE. Well, in various places. You have not read your leader's speeches. I will read you one :

We shall give you free trade, and although it will be a hard fight,—

Something like his language on unrestricted reciprocity.

—we shall not give in one inch, or retrace our steps, until we have reached the goal, and that goal is the same policy of free trade as exists in England to-day.

Is that satisfactory ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No.

Mr. WALLACE. Then I will read a little more. I will give you another speech made by his leader. In Montreal, on the 22nd January, 1895, he spoke as follows :—

The Liberal party believe in free trade on broad lines, such as exist in Great Britain.

Is that pretty definite ?

A very important object is a revenue tariff, a tariff to be derived from customs, which will levy no duties except for the purposes of revenue for the means of government. For all economical principles I go to the land of sound government and sound common sense, old England.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Hear, hear.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, free trade as they have it in England. Again :

It is from that land I take my theories, and upon that platform, exemplified as I have told you, the Liberal party of Canada will fight the next battle.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) A customs tariff for revenue.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. member is not in accord with his leader to-day.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Thoroughly.

Mr. WALLACE. He is not in accord with the other leaders of the party, as I shall endeavour to show in a few moments, and they are not in accord with one another at any one time. Then, there was a resolution proposed at the great Ottawa convention. Their leader became disgusted, he tried to explain its meaning, and he failed. Then he adopted the theory of free trade as they have it in England. Even the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., tried to explain its meaning, and he failed, and he blamed the failure on the Conservative newspapers because, he said, they had misreported what he intended to say. Then he made his explanation, carefully revised it himself, and that explanation, I may say, he will have to explain away when he gets up to make his speech in this House. I have a copy of it here, and it is a beauty. If it does not mean that hon. gentlemen opposite are going to put forward a horizontal tariff, as indicated by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), who said a little while ago that there were lots of articles coming in free from which a revenue might be obtained—and that is departing from the Conservative policy of bringing in free raw material whenever possible so as to produce cheap goods and place the necessaries of life as far as possible at low prices, by admitting free those necessaries of life that are not produced in this country, this being the policy of the Conservative party—it means nothing, but it is evident that hon. gentlemen are going to impose duties on everything that comes along.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Where are you quoting from ?

Mr. WALLACE. From the "Woodstock Despatch," which gives a full report. This is what Mr. Davies said :

The political party now in power challenges your votes, and holds that the proper way to apply Customs taxes is to have two purposes ; one to raise the revenue the country requires, the other purpose to do what they call developing and encouraging, which means enriching a certain manufacturing class in the community. We attack the last proposition as unjust to the great mass of people. That is simply the difference between the two policies ; but they say to us all over the Dominion : "Why, that means two things unjust in themselves ! It means the tariff must be a uniform tariff all over, so that the poor man will pay a great deal larger amount than the rich man, and it means there will be no free list at all." Now, nobody but a lunatic escaped from an asylum could be guilty of making such a mistake as that.

Now, the hon. gentleman says that nobody but a lunatic would make such an assertion. That is about what the hon. gentleman for Russell said.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is clear enough.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the hon. gentleman should apologise to the hon. member for Russell. The report continues :

A revenue tariff would not be under 15 per cent, on an average ; it would not be 15 per cent on everything. Some articles would pay more, some less. Whether the average tariff be 15 or 15 or 17½ per cent,— 17½ per cent is not robbery, but 20 per cent is regular pillage :

—somewhere in that neighbourhood, it will be a tariff sufficiently high to enable us to derive a revenue sufficient for the purpose of carrying on the Government. We simply say that every dollar put on in addition is so much taken out of the pockets of those compelled to pay it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It seems all right.

Mr. WALLACE. If it means anything sensible, it means the present tariff policy of the Conservative party ; if it does not mean that it does not mean anything, or else it means uniform tariff on all goods, but calling the hon. member for Russell, who holds a different view, a lunatic, will not mend matters. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) alluded this afternoon to a speech made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in this Parliament in 1891, when he said, we are going in for unrestricted reciprocity, just as his leader had said. He said they would never rest until they got it. He said the benefit to the farmers of Ontario—as was quoted by the hon. member for Centre Toronto—would amount to $10 per cultivated acre the very moment unrestricted reciprocity was given, which would mean $220,000,000 increase in the farm lands in one day, an increase of $30 upon each horse, which would be $37,000,000 increase in the value of horses, and in the same ratio about $30,000,000 increase in cattle and $15,000,000 in sheep, making a good deal more than $300,000,000 for Ontario. The hon. gentleman said further there would be a benefit equal to that amount probably derived by the other provinces. If $300,000,000 of benefit would accrue to Ontario, that system should certainly have been secured. But, Mr. Speaker, the question we should like to ask to-day is this : Those hon. gentlemen having stated that the farmers were going to have $600,000,000 placed in their hands by securing unrestricted reciprocity, and the hon. member for South Oxford, having stated that he knew what he was talking about when he made that statement, why have hon. gentlemen opposite abandoned that policy ? Why are the farmers not going to receive $600,000,000, as promised by those hon. gentlemen before the last elections ? Their leader stated that he would never weary of the fight until unrestricted reciprocity was obtained. Yet the party met two years afterwards in convention at Ottawa, 3,000 of them, the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) said, about 1,600 or 1,700 according to their own report.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Two thousand five hundred.

Mr. CHARLTON. Two thousand five hundred by actual count.

Mr. WALLACE.

Mr. WALLACE. Well, I have the report here and the list of names. I cannot get more than 1,636 names, and hon. gentlemen opposite called the number 3,000, but that is not much exaggeration for them. This statement is according to their own report. Of course they will deny their own report if they want to use figures. But $600,000,000 were promised the farmers, who received the declaration of the hon. member for South Oxford that he would never rest day and night until they obtained it. The party, as I have said, held a convention less than two years afterwards. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) submitted a long resolution, covering about fifteen clauses, but there was not one line in it about unrestricted reciprocity, or commercial union, or continental free trade. Yet they have solemnly pledged themselves to unrestricted reciprocity, commercial union and continental free trade, just as solemnly as they have pledged themselves to a revenue tariff, which they do not understand, which the member for Queen's does not understand, and which no living man can understand. That was the policy of the Reform party at that time. I should like to know, and I think we are bound to ask them to explain why they have abandoned it. Was it because the general elections at that time, and more particularly the bye-elections which followed next year, when the subject was thoroughly discussed and the people had full opportunities to examine the question, and when in fact it was debated in the constituencies from one end of the country to the other, and the people investigated it as thoroughly as they ever did any subject that came before them, were decided against the party ? Was it because at the bye-elections almost every candidate the party put up was defeated that they abandoned the policy of unrestricted reciprocity and looked round for some new policy, a policy which they called tariff for revenue or some such name ? It was fortunate for the Dominion of Canada that they were not successful in 1891. It was fortunate for us—

Mr. LANDERKIN. Yes.

Mr. WALLACE. It was fortunate for us. I say—I speak as a Canadian loyal to our country, and perhaps this does not include the hon. gentleman who is interrupting—that the policy was not successful then. If it had been successful, we would have been in the same condition as the people of the United States have been since that period, with their hundreds of broken banks, and with their thousands of destroyed manufacturing establishments, and with their hundreds of thousands of people walking the streets without employment. We would have been experiencing all these evils if the party opposite had been successful in 1891, and were still further successful, if it may be called success, in obtaining an unrestricted reciprocity treaty with our neighbours to the south of us.

Mr. GILLMOR. Have they not got protection over there in the United States ?

Mr. WALLACE. They have not the judicial protection that we have here in Canada. Now, after the Liberal party passed that resolution, and after the leader of the Opposition had stated in Toronto and in Montreal that he is going to have free trade as they have it in England, what becomes of the happy family. I take a speech delivered by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), and what does he say ? He says : We take no stock in this free trade as they have it in England ; I am not a free trader ; I believe in a policy of incidental protection. That is the doctrine of the member for South Brant. In his own words :

Protection was a policy of the Tory party, while with the Liberal party it was merely an incident.

According to him they were to have incidental protection, and while some of his political friends say, that they are to have a tariff for revenue, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson), the ablest financial critic of them all, says : Oh, it is to be incidental protection ; the policy of the Liberal party is not free trade. He says still further :

The policy of the Liberal party was not free trade.

But, Sir, the leader of his party says "it is free trade, and free trade as they have it in England." The hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), said still further :

He was amused at the efforts made to fasten free trade upon the Liberal party.

Well, who was trying to fasten free trade upon the Liberal party ? Was it not the leader of that party, and, therefore, is not this a criticism by the member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) on his own leader. He says :

He was amused at the efforts made to fasten free trade upon the Liberal party. It was no part of the Liberal platform. The great Ottawa convention made no mention of free trade. It might be that in the Conservative party those high in authority may change the party policy at will. It was not so in the Liberal ranks. The convention at Ottawa had framed the Liberal party policy, and it was composed of 3,000 delegates.

Three thousand delegates ! That was a whopper, just like some of the other remarks. The hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) further says :

No leader in the Liberal party had ever attempted to set aside that platform, and no leader could, if he so desired.

What a nice time these gentlemen would have in their caucus, when one of their chief men states publicly that his leader dare not change the policy, and when that leader after changing it had to get up and defend his change of front.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What sort of a time had you in the caucus to-day ?

Mr. WALLACE. I do not think we had such disturbing questions as these, and questions in which the policy of the party was interpreted in directly opposite ways by two of the leading lights of the party. Then, Sir, what does the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) say about the policy of the Liberal party. He says :

We do propose free trade with all the world.

But the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) says, that is not correct, and the hon. member appears to have the argument in his favour, for there was nothing said about free trade at the Ottawa convention. I have the convention resolution here, and although there are about twenty different clauses in it, it is like their resolution on reciprocity : it says pretty nearly nothing. "We do propose free trade with all the world," says the member for South Oxford. Let me ask, how do hon. gentlemen opposite account for the discrepancy between these two great men ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is that all you are going to read from that ?

Mr. WALLACE. I have the whole speech here, but I do not think I will read it tonight.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Are you reading from "La Minerve ?"

Mr. WALLACE. No ; I am reading from the "Globe" newspaper report of a speech delivered by the Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Mr. CHARLTON. Is there not something in that speech a little further on that qualifies that expression somewhat ?

Mr. WALLACE. Well, perhaps, I had better read what follows for the hon. gentleman, and before I read what follows, a little explanation might be interesting. The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) had gathered a number of Liberal members of Parliament around Mr. Laurier and they went to the North-west together. There were about half a dozen of them, the member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson), the member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser) and some others, and they comprised a nice little troupe. The member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) and the leader of the Opposition, and a number of others, a different troupe ; but with the same leader had travelled through the province of Ontario. They had gone to these counties together, and Sir Richard Cartwright was making some comments on them, and he says—and this is what follows, and what qualifies the extract I have read from Sir Richard Cartwright's speech, and which the hon. member for North Norfolk wants to hear :

You may have observed also that several of these gentlemen are exceedingly anxious about my welfare, and apparently very much exercised over my doings. They cannot understand why I have not spoken here and why I have not spoken there, and, above all, why I am not always to be found within a yard of Mr. Laurier's elbow. Sir, it is very nice of them, I am sure, to take so much trouble on my behalf, and you may be sure I appreciate their disinterested kindness very thoroughly. Perhaps, were I to adopt King Solomon's advice as to dealing with a certain description of persons, I might remark that it is a well-established fact in natural history that wolves hunt in packs, but that lions most generally go alone.

Now, that is a fine expression for the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to use with regard to his own leader and his own colleagues who sit around him. He calls them wolves. What does the member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser) say to being called one of those ravenous wolves? What has the member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) got to say about it? What has the member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) to say; and he is the hon. gentleman who planned these meetings, and these campaigns, and these nice little troupes, which Sir Richard Cartwright calls a menagerie. But, continues the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) :

I won't do that; I will only observe that this entire minstrel troupe and Jamaica car combination.

Now, what do hon. gentlemen on the opposite side think about Sir Richard Cartwright calling his colleagues, not only a minstrel troupe and a menagerie, but "a Jamaica car combination" as well. I wonder whether in the Liberal caucus they made the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) apologize, or whether he refused to apologize? Perhaps the member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) could explain that.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I shall be most happy to give any explanation the hon. gentleman asks for, and, perhaps, when I get through the Controller of Customs will give an explanation about his trip to Washington.

Mr. WALLACE. When I went to Washington, I did not go to sell our country to the Yankees, as some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House did.

An hon. MEMBER. Did you go to raise troops?

Mr. WALLACE. I did not go there to get them to pass resolutions inimical and injurious to Canada, as the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) did. I did not fraternize with men of the Farrar stamp, who were plotting and scheming to hand this country over to the United States. I was not one of those, like some members of the

Mr. WALLACE.

Reform party, who were assisting him in that traitorous act.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Why did you not go to Haldimand, it would look more loyal?

Mr. WALLACE. Why did not the hon. gentleman go to South Grey during the last local election?

Mr. LANDERKIN. I did.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, but they told the hon. gentleman to stay away or the county would be lost. But he would not stay away, and he went surreptitiously to his riding, and the county was lost to the Grit party by 300 votes. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Landerkin) had come out openly against the other candidate instead of surreptitiously, his political friend would have been beaten by 500 or 600.

An hon. MEMBER. He was beaten by 600.

Mr. WALLACE. Worse still. Any more remarks from the member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin)?

Mr. GIBSON. Give us some more about the menagerie. I like to hear that.

Mr. WALLACE. I will hand the hon. gentleman the paper and he can read for himself the very interesting story that the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) tells about him. Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to this new theory of the Opposition: "free trade as they have it in England." That is the latest. That is the key note of the speech delivered in Toronto, and in Montreal, and in Winnipeg, by the leader of the Opposition. He says they must have "free trade as they have it in England," and he is speaking principally for the benefit of the farmers. The leader of the Opposition knows that he has no chance among the artisans and the residents of the cities and towns of Canada, and so he is trying to make the farmers believe that it would be well for them to have free trade. Why, Mr. Speaker, free trade was agitated for and adopted in England, not because it was to be of benefit to the farmers, for it was ruinous to the farmers of England, but because it was to be a benefit to the manufacturers by providing them with cheap raw material, cheap food for their workmen. That was the great argument of the advocates of free trade in England. Now, let us see how it has worked? I have here a speech of Lord Salisbury delivered last year at Trowbridge, and he says :

But because free trade is inevitable, I do not think on that account it is our duty to conceal from ourselves the harm and injury it has done, in addition to the advantages it has conferred, and it has undoubtedly been the ruin of a great part of this country.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The landlords.

Mr. WALLACE. Before I sit down, I will show that it has gone beyond the landlords, and I may say that a policy that will ruin landlords will ruin their tenants as well. Now, I have in my hand a resolution which was moved in the British House of Commons on the 6th of February, 1895, by Mr. Jeffreys, and I will read that resolution to the House :

That we humbly represent to Your Majesty, that we view with the greatest apprehension the disastrous condition of the agricultural interest, and the prolonged depression of the textile and other industries, and the consequent increase in the number of the unemployed ; and we humbly express our regret that Your Majesty's Ministers have shown no appreciation of the extreme gravity of the present situation.

That resolution was defeated, it is true, by 12 majority, but it was defeated because the leader of the Government, Sir William Harcourt, moved an amendment, in which he pledged the Government to appoint a select committee to make the investigation asked for.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And your friends the Redmondites all voted for it.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not know exactly what the hon. gentleman means : I do not suppose he knows himself ; but if they voted for that resolution, I think they were about right. Mr. Chaplin, who has devoted himself more than any other leading statesman in England to that question, and who was chairman of the Board of Agriculture in the Conservative Government, spoke as follows :

What did seem strange to him was that, when they remembered what a deplorable condition the agricultural interest was in, when they knew that so many other interests were greatly depressed, and that vast numbers of people were being every day put out of employment, Her Majesty's Government showed no adequate sense of the urgency and gravity of the situation. It was quite impossible to exaggerate the gravity of the agricultural situation. It was reported that in almost every district of the country it was steadily and rapidly growing worse. The whole mass of the evidence taken before the Agricultural Commission, from witness after witness, teemed with statements to the effect that reductions in rent varying from 20 to 50 and to 80 per cent, and even up to 100 per cent, had been made throughout the country. And, further, it should be remembered that agriculture was not the only industry that was suffering at the present time. On the contrary, the great difficulty at the present day, unhappily, was to find one industry that was flourishing in any degree.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir William Harcourt, spoke as follows :

It declares, and it is unhappily too true, the deplorable depression of the agricultural interest. It is imputing to us not only want of heart, but want of sense, to suppose that we do not share with hon. gentlemen opposite their feeling of distress at the depression of the agricultural industry, and that, of course, is equally true of the textile and other industries of the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite ought not to impute to us that we do not feel as strongly as they do the terrible condition of suffering, which we know at this moment is being endured by many thousands of our countrymen.

Mr. Fellowes said :

In Norfolk, between 1874 and 1894, the fall in the corn crop had involved a loss of three millions, and the loss of stock had been £384,000. The owners in that period had lost about £25 an acre, or £30,000,000 : the farmers had lost £5 or £6 an acre, or £6,500,000. The yeoman farmer was almost extinct ; and if the present state of affairs continued, the labourers would be thrown out of employment in hundreds. In Norfolk, between 1874 and 1894, the rent of best lands had fallen between 25 and 35 per cent ; of the medium lands, between 40 and 60 per cent ; while for light and poorer lands there was no rent at all, and many farms had been abandoned altogether.

That is the state of agriculture in England ; that is the state to which hon. gentlemen opposite, if they had their way, would reduce the agricultural interest of this country.

Mr. GIBSON. Is that general throughout the British Islands ?

Mr. WALLACE. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that it was general.

Mr. GIBSON. He said in England : he did not refer to Scotland at all, because it is not in that condition.

Mr. WALLACE. Well, I am very glad to hear it. Hon. gentlemen opposite propose that we should have free trade in Canada as near as possible as it is in England, that is, that we should have the English tariff. They wish to convey the impression that there are no taxes in England. Why, the amount raised by taxes in England last year was $285,000,000. That was the amount of revenue collected.

Mr. GILLMOR. From trade.

Mr. WALLACE. From everything for the purposes of the general Government ; it does not include local taxation at all. They raise 17¼ million dollars on tea and coffee, which in Canada are free, and 1¾ million dollars on fruits. Their total taxation amounted to $7.38 per head, at least $2 per head more than ours, and we have a great many important public works which we have found it necessary to construct to open up the country. Now, Mr. Speaker, what do they tax in England ? I have an article here from an English magazine, "Temple Bar," which says :

Birth is taxed, marriage is taxed, death is taxed ; the carriage we keep is taxed ; the omnibus we ride in is taxed ; the railway train we travel by is taxed ; the house dog is taxed ; everything we drink, wine, tea, coffee, is taxed ; light is taxed ; the linen we sleep on is taxed ; the tobacco we smoke is taxed ; the Christmas plum-pudding is taxed ; our anti-bilious pills are taxed; we have local rates, poor rates, county council rates, water rates, vestry rates; householders, lodgers, married and single men, women and children are all taxed in some form or other. "One-ninth of what everybody earns in this country," Lord Sherbrooke said. "goes in taxes; but the proportion is more now and is growing all the time.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman wish the House to believe that that is correct? Has he verified its correctness? if not, why does he quote it?

Mr. WALLACE. Does the hon. gentleman deny its correctness?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, I do, so far as it alleges that they put a tax on linen.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman has no information of the fact he is stating.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have in my hand the Statistical Abstract of the Trade and Navigation of the United Kingdom for the year 1894.

Mr. WALLACE. Just read it where it says they do not tax linen.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear

Mr. WALLACE. I have said that I am quoting what is in "Temple Bar." Now, I am going to quote what I will be responsible for myself. They impose a railway duty of nearly $1,500,000, so that if we had such a tax in Canada that amount would have to be obtained by an increase either of passengers' fares or of freight rates.

Mr. GILLMOR. That is good; the poor people do not have to pay them.

Mr. WALLACE. Men who carry guns have to pay half a million dollars, and if they kill game with them they have to pay $1,000,000. If a man keeps a carriage with four wheels, he has to pay £2 2s. on one horse he has to pay 1s. 1d. On a cart there is a tax of fifteen shillings—$3.75 to be paid by a man driving a cart along the road.

An hon. MEMBER. Good.

Mr. WALLACE. Our friend says, "good." Every man who keeps a dog has to pay, notwithstanding the local rate, 7s. 6d. to the British Government.

Mr. CHARLTON. That is better still.

Mr. WALLACE. Every dealer in almost every kind of article has to pay duty to the British Government. A probate duty of £4,823,000 is collected in England. If a man sells a piece of land he has to pay a tax to the Government, besides the conveying fees. That amounts to a total of £2,290,000.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. WALLACE. Everything is all right. In addition to the lawyer's fees for conveying—

Mr. LISTER. Do you object to the lawyer's fee?

Mr. WALLACE.

Mr. WALLACE. No.

An hon. MEMBER. The best system in the world.

Mr. WALLACE. It prevents real estate passing freely from hand to hand; it puts restrictions upon such transfers, it taxes every man owning a piece of land, of building his own house. Receipts and drafts pay a tax of £1,173,000, or more than $5,500,000. If you buy or sell goods of any description, and have to receive or give a receipt for over two pounds, that receipt must be stamped, and the revenue from that source in England is over $5,500,000. Trade is restricted in every direction. Yet, hon. gentlemen opposite will say, good, again. When they were in power they put a duty on every promissory note and bill of exchange. It was a most annoying tax, not only for the tax itself, but because of its interference with trade, and the annoyance it caused. When the Conservatives came into power, they abolished that tax, and we have never heard any one ask for its reimposition. But hon. gentlemen say good again, that is all right. On inhabited houses—farm, lodging, and dwelling-houses—a further tax of £1,441,000 is levied, or $7,000,000. Every farmer has to pay, not only the local taxes, but a Government tax, for the privilege of living in a house. And this tax amounts, in the aggregate, to $7,000,000. Then, $17,250,000 are levied on tea and coffee, which here are absolutely free. All those other taxes amount to more than $2 a head higher than in Canada. That is the kind of taxation which the leader of the Opposition proposed, without any authority whatever, as the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) said, because no one ever authorized him to enunciate any such policy.

Mr. LISTER. They have free sugar, though.

Mr. WALLACE. Well, we had free sugar until a few days ago.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. WALLACE. Hon. gentlemen say no. I was going to answer that these gentlemen do not know what they are talking about, but that would be adopting their own style of argument, and I will not do so. As soon as we abolished this duty on sugar, sugar dropped that amount exactly. We reduced the duty on granulated, and we abolished the duty on raw sugar, and the price fell to that extent.

Mr. LISTER. You said it was free, but it was not.

Mr. WALLACE. It was free. It was practically free in this country. There was not—I will not say a pound brought in, because that would not be correct. But last year there were 3,000,000 pounds brought in under a condition of trade which did not exist before, and about 1 per cent of the sugar brought to this country paid the duty.

Mr. LISTER. The manufacturers got the duty.

Mr. WALLACE. No, they could not. If they had got the whole of the duty, there would have been as much brought in as was refined here, and there was only 1 per cent brought in in the most favourable year, and not a quarter of 1 per cent in other years. But these gentlemen may disavow free trade as they have it in England just as they have disavowed all their other policies. The resolution before the House appears to have that object in view, and there is no doubt that the leader of the Opposition has been hauled over the coals for enunciating such an absurd policy, not ratified or approved by the convention at all. Therefore, they are hedging, and now they call it a tariff for revenue. We have had the benefit of this tariff for revenue during the five years the Reform party were in power, and it did not produce revenue, as we all know. I will tell you what it did produce. It encouraged trade with the United States as against Great Britain, and against our own country. I will quote one article. In 1874 the amount of tea imported from the United States was $49,000 worth. In 1878, after they had been four years in power, they imported from the United States, $1,250,000 worth, and only Great Britain to the value of $1,700,000, and $117,000 worth was imported direct by Canadians. In 1874 tea was imported from Great Britain to the value of $1,700,000 and in 1878 there was just a million dollars worth imported. Now, the result was this, that the trade in tea was almost entirely being transferred to the United States, and away from our own country. That was the case with many other articles of which I have a list here. Hats, caps, manufactures of iron, rubber, paper, wool, cotton. Let me refer specially to cotton. We imported from the United States, in 1874, manufactured cottons to the extent of $906,894, and in 1878, notwithstanding the hard times and shrinkage of business, we imported from the United States, $2,488,235 worth, so that the imports increased almost three-fold during those years. In 1894, the importations of those goods from the United States had gone back to $889,676, or nearly the figures of 1874. What was the case as regards Great Britain. In 1874 our importations of cotton goods from Great Britain amounted to $10,264,273, and in 1878 to $4,401,994, or the imports had shrunk more than one-half, while from the United States they had increased three-fold. The effect of that was that the direct importations were going away from Canada to the United States, the manufacturing business was being transferred from Great Britain to the United States, and the United States were getting the benefit. That was the result of the hon. gentleman's policy of tariff for revenue. Take all these articles I have mentioned, and the imports entered for consumption from the United States amounted, in 1874, to $5,291,418; in 1878, to $8,695,279; and in 1894, to $7,589,568. From Great Britain the amount entered for consumption in 1874 was $27,729,357. In 1878 this had shrunk to $15,733,277, or a shrinkage of $12,000,000. And in 1894 it increased to $17,958,497. That is the general result of this policy of tariff for revenue purposes. Comparing 1874 with 1878, we find that the imports from the United States increased 63 per cent, and from Great Britain they decreased 44 per cent; whereas, in 1894 the imports from the United States decreased 13 per cent, and from Great Britain they increased 14 per cent.

An hon. MEMBER. What did that ?

Mr. WALLACE. The Conservative policy which was more favourable to Great Britain, whereas the Grit policy was more favourable to the United States.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You have discriminated against Great Britain.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman has not been listening to the figures.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman's tariff discriminates practically against Great Britain, and he denies that.

Mr. WALLACE. Suppose we had had a Grit tariff in force to-day ?

Mr. LANDERKIN. We would not have had a deficit.

Mr. WALLACE. I will tell you what you would have had. On tea and coffee and sugar we would have had a revenue of $8,557,000. I have the figures here, but will not trouble the House with reading them. And, if we took that tariff to-day, there would not be a deficit of $4,500,000, but there would be a surplus of $4,000,000. But, Mr. Speaker, that would be a tax upon the people. A tariff levied upon any article that cannot be produced in this country is a burden upon the people.

Mr. GILLMOR. Are not all taxes a burden upon the people ?

Mr. WALLACE. No.

Mr. GILLMOR. What, taxation not a burden ?

Mr. WALLACE. No. The tax on tea was over $1,000,000, on coffee, $60,000, on sugar, $7,440,000. These are taxes upon articles that cannot be produced in this country and would necessarily be a burden upon the people.

Mr. LISTER. But the country gets the whole of the tax ; it all goes into the treasury.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes. Hon. gentlemen say that we have not reduced taxation. Why we have made free 189 articles that formerly were dutiable.

Mr. GIBSON. Name them.

Mr. WALLACE. I will furnish the hon. gentleman the list, but I may name a few :—Coal tar and coal pitch and coke, formerly dutiable are now free ; copper in pigs, bars, rods and bolts ; copper ingots ; copper sheathing, not planished or coated ; drugs, crude, such as barks, beans, berries, and a long list, formerly dutiable at 20 per cent are now free ; logwood and fustic ; patent prepared dyes ; flax fibre, scutched or hackled ; steel masts for ships ; flax or hemp yarn for manufacture of carpets, etc. ; olive oil for manufacturing purposes ; platinum sheets ; plumbago crucibles ; salt from the United Kingdom or British possessions ; saltpetre and a number of raw materials for manufactures ; timber and woods of various descriptions ; zinc, seamless drawn tubing, and a hundred other articles.

Mr. WALLACE.

Mr. LISTER. Are diamonds free ?

Mr. WALLACE. Diamonds were free before. They were free when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power. They are free only under certain conditions.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Did you get any revenue from these articles ?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes. Hundreds of thousands of dollars. What was the opinion of these hon. gentlemen when they were in power. I have a report here, Mr. Speaker, made when the Hon. Isaac Burpee was Minister of Customs in 1875. These were his views, and evidently the views of the Reform party of that day. He says :

It will be observed that the per capita taxation has steadily increased every year, ranging from $2.62 in 1868 to $3.93 in 1874. This circumstance, however, only proves that the increase in the commerce of the country has exceeded, in proportion, the increase of population, and is really one striking evidence of steadily increasing general prosperity.

I have just referred to the list of goods free to-day that were dutiable last year. There is even a larger list, Mr. Speaker, upon which the duties have been materially reduced. And more than that, I make this statement, that in last year's revision of the tariff, except, perhaps, incidentally no articles were made dutiable at a higher rate than before. But there is no article I can recollect the duty on which has been increased over what it was, while hundreds of articles have been decreased. Among them the following :—Wall paper shows a reduction of about 40 per cent ; illuminating oil, 16½ per cent—

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the average duty on wall paper ?

Mr. WALLACE. It is now 40 per cent less than it was before.

Mr. McMULLEN. What was it before ?

Mr. WALLACE. I am not going into more details. I submit these statements, and I challenge contradiction. Barrels containing oil are reduced 50 per cent. Linseed oil is reduced 33½ per cent ; school slates 53½ per cent ; harness and saddlery are reduced from 35 to 30 per cent duty ; iron slabs, blooms, loops and puddled bars, being the raw materials of manufacture, are reduced from $9 to $5 per ton. Bar iron is reduced from $13 to $10 per ton ; iron sheets from $13 to $5 per ton, which is a reduction of from 75 to 80 per cent in the duty. Chains of certain dimensions are reduced from 30 per cent to 5 per cent ad valorem ; clothes wringers are reduced by about 20 or 30 per cent ; and, as hon. gentlemen know the reduction on agricultural implements is from 35 per cent to 20 per cent ad valorem. The reduction on shovels and spades is about 30 per cent; on hay knives about 30 per cent; pronged forks, 27½ per cent and garden rakes 30 per cent.

Mr. CHARLTON. What is the aggregate amount of these reductions? Will they reduce the revenue?

Mr. WALLACE. It will be impossible to state exactly in figures to what extent they will reduce the revenue. On buggies and carriages we have reduced the duty by 50 per cent; on farm and freight wagons, 50 per cent; on cotton seamless bags, 25 per cent. On woollen clothes we have reduced the rate very materially. With reference to cotton goods it was stated, I think, by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) who had made elaborate calculations that the duty on cotton goods under the old tariff was 41½ per cent. The duty on cotton goods now is 22½ per cent 25 per cent or 30 per cent, the average being perhaps 25 or 26 per cent.

Mr. CHARLTON. The average is 20 per cent.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman cannot tell what the average will be under the new tariff, because the year is not up and the returns are not in. Hon. gentlemen say, what about the taxation? We have gone into enormous enterprises; we have built railways, we have dug canals, we have opened up this country; and yet we have not increased the taxes or the percentage of taxes very materially. Now, Sir, in 1850, forty-five years ago, when this country had invested in canals to a very limited extent, and had spent very little money in public enterprises, what was the average rate of taxation in that year? First, let me say that in 1894, the average rate of taxation was 15·69 per cent; in 1878, 13·75. That was a taxation that did not produce revenue, it did not produce nearly enough revenue to enable the country to pay its way. This year the rate for the first six months was 15 per cent. But I am not going to quote that 15 per cent, because an incomplete year may give an incomplete idea, therefore, I will not quote that as bearing upon the case. But last year the average rate of taxation was 15·69 per cent upon importations made into Canada; whereas in 1878, when the Government did not nearly pay their way, the rate was 13·75. In 1850, when, as I say, there was little money invested in public enterprises, the average rate of taxation was 14·5. To-day more than 40 per cent of our importations are free goods; then there were only 7 per cent free. The imports in that year amounted to 17 million dollars, the duty to $2,462,000, and the ad valorem rate was 14·5 per cent upon all the goods. There were $1,176,000 of free goods, and $15,705,000 of dutiable goods. So, Sir, in forty-five years, during which Canada has done more, perhaps, than any other five millions of people in opening up and developing their immense empire, we have increased the taxable rate upon the people of Canada, that is to say, upon the imports of Canada, only about 1 per cent. Yet those hon. gentlemen tell us we are rushing the country into debt, that we are increasing the burdens of the people. The people to-day are more able to pay 15½ per cent than they were forty-five years ago to pay the half of that, or 7½ per cent, yet at that time they paid 14·5 per cent. I say that is proof that we have not imposed a great burden upon the people of Canada. But we have put higher duties upon luxuries. I have a statement here, showing that in 1878, for instance, the average rate of duty on luxuries was 30¼ per cent; the average rate of duty on luxuries to-day is 50 per cent. The duties upon those luxuries amounted then to $2,400,000; to-day they amount to more than double that sum, or $5,000,000, showing that we have judiciously imposed those taxes so as to make the heaviest burdens fall upon those articles of luxury on which people can well afford to pay the higher impost. Those articles are of various kinds—fancy goods, manufactures of gold and silver, jewellery, musical instruments, paintings, engravings, spirits, wines, tobaccos, toys, silks, velvets, perfumes, fancy soaps, tobacco pipes, and so on, amounting to nearly 10 millions altogether, in 1893, whereas they amounted to only $7,400,000 in 1878.

Mr. GIBSON. Valuable paintings, considered as works of art, come in free.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Just the same as they did in 1878.

Mr. WALLACE. Canada is the only country on the face of the earth to-day whose foreign trade has increased in the last five years. Great Britain's trade has decreased 966,277,000, or $325,000,000. The trade of the United States has decreased from $1,647,000,000 to $1,547,000,000, or exactly one million dollars. The trade of Canada has increased from $218,000,000 to $241,000,000, or an increase of $22,390,000. You cannot find any other country in the world whose foreign trade has increased during those five years. Another test of trade and commerce is the clearing house returns. I think it is almost an infallible test as it represents exactly the business of a country. The city of New York does 74 per cent of the Customs and import business of the whole United States, and the clearing house business decreased 22 per cent; whereas in the city of Montreal it decreased only 4 per cent. That is a fair test of the business as between the two countries during the last year. It has been made a reproach against us that our policy has discriminated against foreign shipping. Well, what are the facts? In 1882 the foreign shipping in the port of Montreal amounted to 554,000 tons; in 1894 it amounted to 1,096,000 tons, or almost twice as much as in 1882. The imports of raw material are about as good a test of the progress of manufacturing industries as you can find. I have a list of those imports, as follows:—Logs and lumber, raw furs, hides, wool, grease, raw silk, broom corn, hemp, raw tobacco, raw cotton, gutta percha, jute cloth, crude rubber, rags, coal, tin blocks and sheets. These amounted to $8,947,000 in 1878, and in 1894 to $23,219,000 or an increase of 259 per cent. The details are as follows:—

Increase, 259 per cent.

This does not represent the whole of the increase of the trade of the country and work of the country, because raw materials are cheaper now than they were in 1878, and, therefore, to that extent the increase does not represent the additional work given to the Canadian artisan. Now, Sir, let me say that the farmer of this country is the one who requires, and who receives, the most protection. I have here a partial list of the imports of farm products in 1894, amounting to $3,200,000, the duty on which amounted to $690,000, or 23 per cent. In the year 1878 the imports of those same farm products amounted to $15,773,000, but the most of those articles paid no duty. I think I am correct in saying that on not one of them—

Mr. CHARLTON. Were they grains entirely?

Mr. WALLACE. Eggs, flax, undressed flax seeds, barley, oats, pease, beans, rye, indian corn, wheat, other grains, flour of wheat, flour of rye, indian meal, oatmeal, all other meal, hides, horns, pelts and wool, all duty free. In 1878 these articles, the importations of these articles, as I say, amounted to $15,773,000. Most of them are dutiable to-day, and the imports, leaving out hides and wool, would amount to less than $1,500,000. If the duties were not payable on those articles, we would be overwhelmed with the product of the United States.

I have heard hon. gentlemen make statements in this House during the last two or three days, which show that they have not been reading their daily "Globe" very diligently. I have an extract from the "Globe." The hon. member for Russell said to-night, the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) said the other night, and the statement has been repeated by several members of the Opposition, that no duty imposed is of any benefit to Canadian farmers, and I think the hon. member for Huron quoted Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, and quoted him approvingly, when he said that "you could not raise the price of grain in this country a quarter of a cent a bushel by any system of protection." In the "Globe" of May 11th, I find the following:—

Mr. WALLACE.

There has been a good demand for wheat for milling, and, owing to the small stocks of Ontario wheat, the market is very firm. There have been sales of winter wheat as high as 86 cents at Ontario points, and now there is no talk of bringing in United States red winter wheat, which, it is said, has been offered, laid down at an Ontario mill, duty paid at 85 cents.

So they pay 15 cents per bushel duty, and lay it down here and undersell Canadian wheat by one cent per bushel.

Mr. McMULLEN. Owing to a corner in wheat.

Mr. LISTER. What wheat is there to sell in Ontario?

Mr. WALLACE. No one can tell. A farmer had his barn burned last night, and he had 500 bushels of wheat in it. There is sufficient wheat, however, to keep our mills going and to feed the Canadian people. The "Globe" gives the quotations:

	Toronto.	Buffalo.	Detroit.	Chicago.
Spring wheat...	85c.	70c.	67¼c.	62¾-63

Mr. CHARLTON. How is the market for barley?

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman can quote the figures when he speaks.

Mr. LISTER. How did the markets compare six months ago, or even three months ago?

Mr. WALLACE. I am not speaking of the markets at that time. The "Globe" continues:

	Toronto.	Buffalo.	Detroit.	Chicago.
No. 2 hard....	88	71½	71
Oats	35-35½	28¼-28¾

Mr. CHARLTON. The price is 39 cents in Oswego.

Mr. WALLACE. But it was 28 cents in Chicago, and it costs less than two cents to bring it from Chicago to Oswego.

Mr. CHARLTON. The Chicago quotation is wrong.

Mr. WALLACE. I am quoting from the "Globe" newspaper. It continues:

	Toronto.	Chicago.
Heavy mess pork	$15.75	$12.02-$12-12

It will cost 40 cents per barrel to bring it to Toronto from Chicago. The duty is $4. and so the Canadian farmer gets $3.25 of the $4 duty on the article of mess pork.

Mr. CHARLTON. What is the price of live hogs?

Mr. WALLACE. We have hogs here, I am afraid.

Mr. McMULLEN. They are all on that side.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not say that on every article on which we impose a duty we enhance the price to the full extent of the duty; but hon. gentlemen opposite cannot mention any time that the Canadian farmers do not get the benefit of the protective policy on their farm products. The "Globe" says we do not use an umbrella unless it rains; that we do not need to use an umbrella unless there is need for it. But a man, because he has an umbrella and it does not happen to rain, does not sell it or dispose of it, but he keeps it for the day when it will be required. We keep the National Policy for the time it is required. To-day there is a large amount of protection on articles raised by the Canadian farmer. To-morrow there may not be so much, but there may be a large protection on other articles. Therefore, the National Policy protects the Canadian farmer, and no men know it better than hon. gentlemen opposite, because last year when we were readjusting the tariff, and in many cases increasing it, not a word of protest was uttered by hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) urged that a much larger increase be made in the duty on certain articles.

Mr. CHARLTON. On what goods?

Mr. WALLACE. On canned goods; on tomatoes.

Mr. CHARLTON. Tomatoes were never spoken of. Peaches were referred to.

Mr. WALLACE. Canned fruits and vegetables are all in the one list and have the same rate of duty, and on those goods the hon. gentleman urged there should be a much larger duty imposed, although we had a very high duty. There is no part of the community who have received a greater advantage from the National Policy and the policy of protection than the farmers of Canada; and nobody knows it better than hon. gentlemen opposite, because they dare not move a resolution to remove the protection given to Canadian farmers. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) will have an opportunity to move a resolution to carry out the prayer of the petition which, it is understood, he is about to present, which will be the only way which he can give effect to it. Let him move such a resolution, if he dare. Neither he nor the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor), who is the only free trader on that side of the House, would dare to move such a resolution, and they would not vote for it even if they were moved. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) told this House that there was not a single article of farm product which had been increased since 1878, except cheese. Cheese has decreased in price since that time.

Mr. McMULLEN. In the face of the National Policy ?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, cheese has decreased. The export price of cheese in 1878 was 10½ cents, and in 1894 it was 10 cents, a pretty good price still. According to the Trade and Navigation Returns which, are a fair criterion of value, horses have increased from $89.80 in 1878, to $108 in 1894, an increase of 20 per cent. Cattle increased from $38.50 in 1878, to $75.50 in 1894, an increase of 99 per cent. Sheep had increased from $2.87 in 1878, to $3.56 in 1894, an increase of 24 per cent. Butter has increased from 18½ cents per pound in 1878, to 19¾ cents per pound in 1894, an increase of 7¼ per cent. Eggs have increased 15 per cent.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Eggs.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, eggs have increased in value and in export quantity. In 1878 they were 12 cents a dozen, and now they are worth 13.08 cents per dozen, an increase of 15 per cent. Bacon increased 27 per cent; hams increased 16 per cent; pork decreased 23 per cent; barley decreased 25 per cent; oats decreased 7 per cent; peas decreased 15 per cent; wheat decreased 46 per cent; potatoes increased 6 per cent. Hay was $9.47 a ton in 1878, and is now $9.54, so that it has remained about stationary. We exported more eggs in the last two years than we did in the years 1877 and 1878, and we exported a great deal more of nearly all the agricultural products. Our exports last year to the United States amounted to less than $7,000,000, while to Great Britain our exports were more than six times greater, or over $40,000,000, and the year before that they were $42,500,000. The policy of the Conservative Government has been to cultivate the British market. The policy of the Reform party is to try and cultivate the United States market. They are to-day advocating trade with the United States, notwithstanding the fact that every farmer in this country knows that the farmers of the United States are producing in larger quantities than they require for their home consumption, and that they are exporting enormous quantities of the very product that the Canadian farmers have to export.

Mr. McMULLEN. How many potatoes did they export ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) have a little manners ?

Mr. WALLACE.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. All this is not Parliamentary at all.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) does not know any better, you must excuse him.

Mr. McMULLEN. If I did not know more than you, I would get outside.

Mr. WALLACE. These gentlemen opposite have been telling us in the past that we are discredited, defeated, frightened, out-of-our-lives-party. Well, I remember a speech delivered by the Hon. Edward Blake, at Malvern, in 1887.

Mr. McMULLEN. Give us a rest, we have had that often enough.

Mr. COCHRANE. Take your medicine.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) did not read that I am quite sure. Mr. Blake, speaking of the Conservative party, said :

We want to win in our struggle for the preservation of our national life. We shall win, any way.

Well, they did not win, and then they had another election and they did not win then, and they had an election before that and they did not win, and they have had an election since and they did not win then. The party of hon. gentlemen opposite are desperate now. They are more desperate than ever before, more hungry for office, more ravenous, more unscrupulous—

Mr. LISTER. If you were not hungry for office you should have got out when you made that speech to the Orangemen.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Hon. gentlemen must not address one another like that. They must address themselves to the Chair first, and any member making a remark, I think, should take off his hat.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Speaker, I am afraid, Sir, you will not succeed in your efforts to make these gentlemen respect the rules of the House. They have never done it yet, and they never will. I say, Sir, that members of the Liberal party have become more desperate year by year. They are more unscrupulous in their attacks on the Government, but, Sir, I venture to say that as the predictions they made in the past were not successful, neither will the predictions they are making to-day be successful, and when we go to the country—

Mr. McMULLEN. When will that be ?

Mr. COCHRANE. Time enough for you.

Mr. WALLACE. I say, Sir, that when we go to the country, and when we discuss these questions before the electors, the Conservative party will return to power stronger than ever in the confidence of the people of Canada.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, with your permission I desire to rise to a personal explanation. I am very glad to say that I am able to enumerate on the other side of the House a very large number indeed of personal friends, and so far as I am concerned, I have the enmity of none. On no account would I drag a personal matter into this House as applying to any member of it, and more especially would I refrain from doing so if the personal insinuation were perfectly untrue. There can be no question at all but that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace), who has just taken his seat, cast a very serious reflection upon me in this House to-night. I now state upon my honour as a member of this House, that ever since I employed labour I never paid a man in scrip, nor ever paid a man in anything else but cash. I never bought a product that I did not pay for in cash, and my men are paid regularly in cash, and paid in nothing else. The statement that the Controller (Mr. Wallace) made to-night results entirely from a campaign that has been going on in Russel for the past four years by my opponent. Now, I do not wish to make challenges, but I will say this: If any gentleman will make that statement outside of this House, above his name, in a newspaper, or otherwise, I will take action against him, and prove that the statement is entirely untrue.

Mr. WALLACE. As I understand the hon. member for Russel (Mr. Edwards), he says that the same statement is being made in the county of Russel.

Mr. LAURIER. And what of that?

Mr. WALLACE. He says himself that it is made by his political opponents in the county of Russel. It is made through the newspaper press, and, as far as I have heard, he has not taken any action. He has not contradicted the statement.

Mr. EDWARDS. When I take an action I will take an action against a responsible party, and I will not take an action against an irresponsible and unworthy newspaper.

Mr. WALLACE. I can only say, that a man's reputation does not depend upon whether a newspaper is worth money or not. This statement has been made in the public press, and it has gone uncontradicted. I have no desire to do an injustice to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Edwards).

Mr. CARGILL. Mr. Speaker, being somewhat conversant with the lumbering industry in this country, having been engaged for some years in that line myself, and being somewhat familiar with the way in which the manufacturers of this country conduct their business, I must say that if, as I understand, Mr. Edwards has an extensive store in connection with his lumbering and agricultural industries at Rockland; if he does pay his hands all in cash instead of giving goods out of the store monthly and settling up with them at the end of each month, and paying them the balance of wages due for each month's labour; he is conducting his business in a very exceptional manner to that in which other lumbering industries are carried on in this country.

Mr. CHARLTON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I have no objection, but I understood that the question was settled.

Mr. LISTER. No; the Controller has not withdrawn the charge.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Speaker, I made no charge.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman made an insinuation, which is just as bad.

Mr. WALLACE. I have said that statements have been made in the papers. The hon. member for Russel says that the statements are being circulated in his own county, where those mills are, and where their operations are known. I have no desire to do an injustice of any kind to the hon. member for Russel, or to any other hon. member of this House. I heard of those statements, I knew they were uncontradicted, and I think that if statements of that kind are permitted to go uncontradicted, it is justifiable to use them.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, it appears to me that there is no place where an hon. gentleman's statement should be taken more freely than in the Dominion House of Commons.

Mr. WALLACE. I accept the statement of the hon. gentleman, but he has made a further statement. I do not wish to contradict a statement made by a member of this House with reference to himself.

Mr. EDWARDS. The insinuation is still there. As the hon. member for East Bruce (Mr. Cargill) has stated, we have a store at Rockland. I came there in 1868, when there was no population there above perhaps twelve people, and I was obliged to establish a store. But at no time since our business has been carried on there has that store been conducted on any other than a cash basis. In the store we keep no accounts whatever, and we have never bought for barter or for anything but cash. I saw the statement in an Ottawa paper, but I did not think it worth consideration, because the people who know best, the people who reside in Rockland, know that that statement is perfectly untrue. When the statement is made in this House I think it is perfectly right for me to deny it, and my denial should be accepted at once.

Mr. LAURIER. I think the hon. Controller of Customs will admit, and everybody will admit, that if a member of Parliament were to take notice of everything published against him in the newspapers, the life of a member of Parliament would not be worth living. It is just as well to ignore all those things which appear in the newspapers against any member. But when such statements have the endorsement of a man occupying the position of Controller of Customs, they acquire an importance which gives my hon. friend the right to resent it.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, there is now nothing before the House but the motion of the hon. member for North Norfolk that the debate be adjourned.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understood that the hon. Controller of Customs wanted to withdraw the statement after the denial of the hon. member for Russell.

Mr. FOSTER. No, the hon. gentleman stated that he accepted unreservedly the statements made by the hon. member for Russell; that is all he can do.

Motion agreed to; and debate adjourned.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 16th May, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PRIVATE BILLS—EXTENSION OF TIME.

Mr. MASSON moved:

That the time for presenting private Bills be extended to Tuesday, 28th May instant.

Mr. TISDALE. Before that motion is adopted, I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that only two sessions ago, on a recommendation from the Committee on Railways and Canals, the time for the reception of private Bills was doubled; and a special direction was given to the Clerk of the House to give notice of that change in the advertisement with regard to the standing orders of the House, and also to send a circular to every solicitor or other person advertising a private Bill, calling attention to the change, with the view that there should be a definite period in the session when the committees would know what business was coming before them. This is the last day for the reception of private Bills, and, while I do not object to any Bill being introduced after this date on its own merits, I certainly do object to extending the time for the reception of all private Bills for two weeks. At the present time I understand that there are only a few Bills which have exceeded the time limit. By refusing to pass this motion, the House would be making a beginning of the enforcement of its rules with reference to private Bills legislation, which it is necessary to adhere to if the committees are not to be congested with business, as they were last session. Last session the Railway Committee had to meet three times a week or else neglect the business coming before it, although early in the session there would have been ample time to attend to it if hon. gentlemen had observed the rules. I therefore object to this motion being passed. Let each Bill that comes before us stand on its own merits as to whether we should set aside the rules in its favour or not.

Mr. MASSON. I understand that there are six or eight Bills not yet introduced, and they are not such as will congest the business of the Railway Committee or any other committee. While it was suggested that an enlargement might be made for a week only, next week will be a broken one in consequence of the Queen's Birthday and another holiday, and it was considered better to make one enlargement to the 28th, it being understood that at that time all the Bills now in sight would be introduced.

Mr. AMYOT. Moreover, the Senate is not sitting at present, so that we cannot present the Bills there.

Mr. LAURIER. I, for my part, quite endorse the remarks of the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale). It seems to me that it is not only lowering the dignity of the House, but largely discounting the utility of the private legislation of this Parliament if we allow the rules to be broken as soon as they are made. There should be a closer adherence to the rules that we have laid down. It might perhaps be too much to expect an absolute adherence to those rules under all circumstances; but I submit that after the time which Parliament has decreed for the introduction of private legislation has expired, no legislation should be introduced unless good reason is shown. In most cases these Bills are presented without any reason being given why they have not been presented before. If Parliament adhered to its rules more strictly in this respect, there would be greater diligence on the part of the public in having private Bills introduced in time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would add that in my experience a good many of these Bills are delayed purposely, and from motives which are not very respectable. Over and over again I have known Bills to be brought forward at a late period and hurried through the House without due notice being given to parties whose interests are affected by them. I think the practice of extending the time, particularly when the House sits late, is very objectionable indeed, and for my part I would be disposed to refuse at this time, which is about the time Parliament usually rises, any extension unless good cause be shown.

Mr. SCRIVER. I may say, as a member of the Committee on Standing Orders, that in every instance in which the right to present a preliminary petition has been granted, the committee took great pains to inquire into the cause of the delay. And in every instance coming within my knowledge, plausible reasons, if not insuperable ones, were given for the delay. I can assure my hon. friend that the committee is not wanting in care in regard to this matter, and in due regard for its own dignity and for the rules of the House; and I think the committee can be trusted not to set aside any rule without reasonable cause.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that by granting these long delays we certainly minimize the rule of the House which is intended for a certain and well defined purpose. I do not want to enter into a debate upon this matter, but I have simply this suggestion to make: That, as the committee have looked into the matter and have made their report, we might allow it to go, but with the condition that it shall be understood that hereafter these long general delays shall not be granted; and, if the business is not here according to the rules, each special case must stand upon its own merits; if it has strong merits the House will take them into account. It really is dallying with the rules of the House, and with the other business of the House, to have these constant delays and postponements in the items of private Bills. I think that, under the circumstances, we might allow the committee's report to be adopted for this time.

SUSPENSION OF THE RULES.

Mr. McALISTER moved that that portion of rule 49 which limits the time for presenting petitions for private Bills be suspended in reference to the petition of the Grand Falls Water-Power and Boom Company for an act of incorporation, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not going to object specially to the hon. gentleman's motion, for I do not know much about the merits of the Bill. But I may take occasion to remind the leader of the House that we have time and time and time again heard excellent declarations from the treasury benches that this thing should not be repeated, and time and time and time again we have seen these good resolutions broken. I would recommend the hon. Minister, if he wants peace in future, to make an example this time at any rate and to refuse point-blank to extend the time that he has at present fixed upon. Were that done once, I make no doubt whatever you would find the promoters of private Bills would take the hint and we should not have any more of these delays.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask the hon. member what is the special reason why this particular request for delay is made?

Mr. McALISTER. The reason in this case is that one of the promoters—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Excuse me, what is the name of the company, and where is its headquarters?

Mr. McALISTER. The name of the company is the Grand Falls Water-Power and Boom Company, with headquarters at Grand Falls, in Victoria County, N.B. The reason for asking for the delay is that one of the petitioners, and promoters of the Bill, Mr. Proctor, an American, has been delayed by illness and was unable to attend in time to getting the petition forwarded. The cause of delay is given in the petition asking for an extension of time.

Mr. SCRIVER. I believe that in this case all the forms have been complied with, but that the delay was simply in the presentation of the petition.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. AMYOT moved that that portion of rule 49 which limits the time for presenting petitions for private Bills be suspended in reference to the petition of the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix Railway Company for amendments to their act of incorporation, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman as to the special reason for delay in this case.

Mr. AMYOT. The reason is that the president of the company, which is already incorporated by local charter, after preparing all the papers and signing them, went to New York to make some financial arrangements, trusting his secretary, in his absence, to send the papers forward. But the secretary fell sick and the president, on his return from New York, found that nothing had been done.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 84) to amend the Act to incorporate the Supreme Court of the Independent Order of Foresters.—(Mr. Northrup.)

Bill (No. 85) to incorporate the Hamilton and Lake Erie Power Company.—(Mr. McKay.)

Bill (No. 86) to incorporate the Canada Insurance Promotion Association.—(Mr. Choquette.)

Bill (No. 87) to incorporate the James Bay Railway Company.—(Mr. Macdonell, Algoma.)

Bill (No. 88) respecting the South Shore Railway Company, Limited.—(Mr. White, Shelburne.)

Bill (No. 89) respecting the Thousand Islands Railway Company.—(Mr. Taylor.)

Bill (No. 90) respecting the Oshawa Railway Company.—(Mr. Smith, Ontario.)

FISHERIES ACT.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 91) to amend the Act 57-58 Victoria, chap. 51, intituled an Act to further amend the Fisheries Act. He said: The Act passed last year requires every case of lobster to be painted with the name of the packer and the date. This has been found impracticable, and we now provide, by this measure, that every case of lobster shall instead have attached to it a label, signed by the Commissioner of Fisheries, certifying that the lobsters are Canadian and have been packed in the proper season. This label can be attached at the close of the fishing season to all packages remaining in stock.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

POST OFFICE, LENKLETTER, P. E. I.

Mr. YEO asked, Has a petition been received from the people of Lenkletter Road, township seventeen, Prince Edward Island, asking that a post office be established at that place? If so, has the petition been referred to the inspector for his report? Has he reported, and is it the intention to comply with the prayer of the petitioners?

Mr. FOSTER. Such petition has not been received.

MR. HENRY LOW.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, Whether Mr. Henry Low is employed by the Government?
Mr. ANYOT.

ment? If so, in what department, at what duties, and what salary?

Mr. FOSTER. He is not employed by the Government.

LOUIS ZENOPHILE MALLETTE.

Mr. GUAY (for Mr. Monet) asked, Whether the Government were officially notified that Louis Zenophile Mallette was associated in the building of the Langevin block?

Mr. OUIMET. The contract for the construction of the new departmental buildings on Wellington street was signed by A. Charlebois alone. On the 17th August last, Messrs. McIntyre, Code & Orde transmitted a letter from Messrs. Robidoux, Geoffrion & Chenevert, notifying the Government not to pay any money to A. Charlebois without the written consent of his partner, L. Z. Mallette, and, on the 2nd September following, Messrs. Robidoux, Geoffrion & Chenevert, have sent to the department a document, purporting to be a copy of a declaration of partnership between Charlebois and Mallette. These are all the documents in this matter in the department.

OFFER OF CANADIAN TROOPS TO ENGLAND.

Mr. RIDER asked, Whether it is within the knowledge of the Government that the Canadian High Commissioner, Sir Charles Tupper, did, during the past year, publicly announce that the Canadian Government had offered to send troops to England in case of a war with France, or with any other foreign power? Did the Government ever offer to send Canadian troops out of the country for war purposes?

Mr. DICKEY. In answer to the first question, no. In answer to the second, the Government did on one occasion offer to the Imperial authorities a portion of the permanent corps for garrison duty.

SHIPMENTS OF BUTTER ON GOVERNMENT ACCOUNT.

Mr. RIDER asked, How many packages of butter were shipped to Great Britain for sale on Government account during the present year? To whom was the butter consigned, and how many packages to each? Have the consignees completed sales, and sent in their reports? If so, what are they? Were the twenty-seven packages of butter purchased from Hodgson Brothers (April 6th, 1895) made by them, and where? Does the Government intend to continue similar business ventures?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Nine hundred and fifteen packages of butter were shipped from Montreal. The particulars of two small shipments from Prince Edward Island have not been received. 2. On February 16th, 175 packages were consigned to A. Clement & Son, at Manchester; on March 4th, 79 packages were consigned to Hodgson Bros., at Liverpool; on March 26th, 271 packages were consigned to A. Clement & Son, at Manchester; on April 5th, 215 packages were consigned to A. Clement & Son, at Manchester; on April 21st, 175 packages were consigned to A. Clement & Son, at Manchester; total, 915 packages. 3. The account sales of the first two consignments only have been received. The 175 packages were sold at prices from 78 shillings to 96 shillings per cwt., and realized 16.3 cents at Montreal. The 79 packages were sold at prices from 76 shillings to 85 shillings per cwt., and realized 16.04 cents at Montreal. 4. On April 3rd, 27 packages of butter were received from Hodgson Brothers, Montreal, and were reported as from the creamery of E. J. Madden, Newburg, Ont.; 80 packages of butter were received from Park, Blackwell & Co., Toronto, and were reported as from the Black Creek creamery, of Thos. Ballantyne & Sons, Stratford, Ont.; 14 packages of butter were received from Park, Blackwell & Co., Toronto, and were reported as from the Avonbank creamery, St. Mary's, Ont.; the remainder of the butter was received direct from the creameries where it was made. It is the intention of the Government to encourage the butter industry by assisting the placing of the same upon the British market in the best possible shape. This assistance will be given in the shape of providing cold storage.

AUZIAS TURENNE.

Mr. RIDER asked, Is Auzias Turenne in the service of the Government? (a.) When was he engaged? (b.) What position does he occupy, and what is his salary?

Mr. FOSTER. He is not in the employ of the Government.

DOMINION LOAN.

Mr. RIDER asked, 1. By whom, or through what financial institution was the Dominion loan of October, 1894, negotiated? 2. What is the total amount of the bonds issued, and what was the net amount received thereon, stated in decimal currency? 3. What will be the total expense incurred in its negotiation for cost of management, discount, &c.?

Mr. FOSTER. Most of this information has already been given, but I have no objection to repeating it. The financial agents of the Government are, of course, the Bank of Montreal. The total amount of bonds issued was £2,250,000. The net amount received was £2,192,854. Total expense, $335,933.

INDUSTRIES OF BRAMPTON.

Mr. FEATHERSTON asked, What is the description of each of the industries established in the town of Brampton, county of Peel, Ont.? What are the names of the several manufacturers in the said town, and what is the number of employees in each of said industries?

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend, I am sure, knows that it takes some little time to prepare these figures from the statistics, and such being the case, the question would have to stand for some time on the Notice paper. I would be glad if my hon. friend would drop the question, and put a notice of motion on the paper, and we will bring down the information.

Mr. LAURIER. That will take a still longer time.

MAILS BETWEEN WEST KOOTENAY AND SPOKANE.

Mr. COATSWORTH (for Mr. Mara) asked, Have the Government taken any steps towards arranging for a direct exchange of registered mail matter between the towns in West Kootenay and Spokane, Washington?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes. On the 26th April, 1895, a communication was addressed from my department to the Postmaster General at Washington, proposing an exchange of registered matter between Nelson, B.C., and Spokane, Wash., via Nelson, Port Shepherd, Spokane Falls and Northern railways, this exchange to include registered matter posted at the Ainsworth, Balfour, Kalso, Nelson, Pilot Bay, Robson, Rossland, Trail Creek, and Waneta post offices. No reply has been received to this communication from the Washington office.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I want to call the attention of the Minister of Finance to a promise made over a fortnight ago, that he would give the Estimates for the current year on the occasion of making his budget speech. Now, a delay of a day or so, in view of the extreme difficulty the hon. gentleman had in delivering himself of his budget, might have been pardonable, but it is really trifling with the House, and trifling with his own promise, to have allowed very nearly a fortnight to elapse without redeeming his word. More than that, it is a matter which we ought to have before us in discussing the financial situation of the country. Surely the hon. gentleman, having now allowed thirteen days to elapse, cannot possibly plead that he has not had time enough to prepare supplemental estimates for a year which terminates in six weeks, or thereabouts, from the present date. The hon. gentleman ought certainly to have brought down these estimates.

Mr. FOSTER. I am sorry the delay has occurred. It was not from any difficulty I found in delivering the budget that the delay occurred; it may have been somewhat from the exhaustion after the delivery. But really the only excuse I can plead is lack of time. With the many things that I had to try to do, I found it difficult to get one or two small items disposed of by Council. I will try and have them down to-morrow, if possible. I may say, however, that it is not so large a matter, because in the budget speech I have made allowance for all that are to be brought down, and the supplemental estimates will not be large. I will try to expedite them as much as possible.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH NEWFOUNDLAND.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There was another promise which the hon. gentleman made to me across the House some time ago, to which I desire to call his attention, namely, with reference to the negotiations between the Dominion and Newfoundland. That promise was that the House would be treated with proper respect and regard, and that simultaneously with the report of the Newfoundland commissioners being laid upon the Table of the Newfoundland legislature, a report would be laid upon the Table of this House, so that information would be in the possession of members here as soon, at least, as it was in possession of members there. Now, telegrams were sent from Newfoundland, dated yesterday, and published in the newspapers of Toronto and Montreal, to the effect, positively, that the leader of the Government had pledged himself to lay the report of the commissioners before the Newfoundland legislature to-day. I would ask the hon. gentleman whether he is prepared to carry out his promise, and lay it before this House, so that we may be in possession of the information as quickly as they are? I see by the papers that one of the commissioners from Newfoundland, about whose mission here the hon. gentleman stated the other day he had no information, has reached here, and I would like to ask the Minister of Finance at the same time, whether that commissioner has reported himself, or whether the hon. gentleman has had the honour of meeting him; also whether any new negotiations have been opened, or the old negotiation have been re-opened?

Mr. FOSTER. I did make a promise much in the terms my hon. friend has stated, and if to-day the Premier of Newfoundland lays those terms before his legislature, I have them under my hand, and they will be placed upon the Table of the House. When that is done, this House will be treated, as

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

I said, in the very same manner as the legislature has been treated in Newfoundland.

Mr. LAURIER. So this House is subordinate to the Newfoundland legislature?

Mr. FOSTER. I did not say so. That is an inference of my hon. friend for which I do not care to be responsible.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman said a moment ago that if the papers were laid before the legislature of Newfoundland to-day, they would be laid before this House to-morrow.

Mr. FOSTER. My interpretation of that would be that we are quite within our right to keep faith with the Government of Newfoundland. As I stated before to this House, what we proposed to do was to lay the terms before Parliament and the legislature of Newfoundland simultaneously, that is, upon the same day. My hon. friend can make what inference he pleases from that arrangement. Certainly I shall not be responsible for anything but the facts.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Will the hon. gentleman say whether Newfoundland has the right to take the initiative?—because the hon. gentleman makes his act dependent upon theirs. Their act does not seem to be dependent upon ours. Is it so that Newfoundland has a right to decide whether the terms shall be laid upon the Table of their legislature or not, but the hon. gentleman has no right to decide, only in the event of Newfoundland so acting, whether they shall be laid on the Table of the Canadian Parliament?

Mr. FOSTER. That is so metaphysical a question that I do not care to enter upon a discussion of it. With reference to the second question concerning the departure of Mr. Bond, when I came into this House, the Government had no knowledge of his arrival.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) May I ask whether the hon. gentleman has had any information that it was the intention of the Newfoundland Government to take the legislature into their confidence to-day?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. LAURIER. If the hon. gentleman had notice to that effect, why does he not lay it upon the Table of the House now?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman will do just what the hon. gentleman said he would do, and what he is pledged to do: he will lay the papers on the Table of this House simultaneously with their being laid on the Table of the House in the Newfoundland legislature.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman has just told us that is not what he is going to do. He promised us that he would lay them simultaneously on the Table of this House, and he says he has been informed that they will be laid before the legislature of Newfoundland to-day.

BEHRING SEA CONFERENCE.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question on another matter. I see it is stated in the telegraphic correspondence from Washington that Great Britain and the United States have come to an agreement to hold a conference on the Behring Sea question in that city, in October, and delegates are to be sent thither from Canada. I would ask whether that report is true?

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot say definitely as to the dates, but I know we have intimated our willingness, and I think negotiations have gone so far, that it is pretty well understood the conference will take place. I read the correspondence referred to, but I am not able to say whether the exact date has been fixed. I did not ask the Premier.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And the points of the conference?

Mr. FOSTER. The conference is to take into consideration some means of arriving at the amounts that are to be paid. The conference takes place owing to the failure of the United States Congress to carry out the recommendation that was made by the President for the payment of the sum of $425,000 odd as reparation to the sealers.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are we to understand that is the only matter which will come under the consideration of such a conference?

Mr. FOSTER. So far as the negotiations have gone, that is to be the subject-matter of the conference.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is that to be the only matter?

Mr. FOSTER. I say, so far as the negotiations have gone, that is the only matter which is to be taken into consideration.

RETURNS.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think it right at this stage of the proceedings, that we should bring before the notice of the House the action of the Government in refusing to give an answer to the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Featherston) to the question he put. Those questions were submitted last year with respect to the industries, and they were answered. It is unfair that he should be refused an answer now, considering the questions are the same as those put last year. It is a very singular proceeding.

Mr. FOSTER. It is very true that some of the questions were put and answers obtained, but the work proved to be very burdensome, and these questions lumbered up the Order paper and took a great deal of time, and it was thought better that they should be put in the form of motions, as the information could be brought down just as readily.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman is forgetting that there was no money in the treasury last year.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). When shall we obtain the return ordered respecting the census of the city of London, which was moved for two years ago?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have given an order that it be prepared.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But we want the return.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Make a motion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I beg to call attention to the fact that the House is treated with very gross disrespect by the Government when, as I understand, no return has been made to an order granted 18 months ago. I think on every occasion when the House meets, all motions passed at the last session should undoubtedly, if the Government do their duty, be placed on the Table of the House, and if this is not done I think we shall have to cause a report to be made by you, Mr. Speaker, or your officers as to what motions have been complied with. As I understand, when the House orders the Government to bring down papers, the Government must do so, otherwise it is treating the House with very gross disrespect.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have prepared a circular to the various departments calling attention to the returns that have not been furnished, asking that they be prepared at once.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Is this the first step taken in the matter?

Mr. MONTAGUE. No.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Here is a motion that was passed and papers ordered a year and a half ago, and a circular in respect to them was issued yesterday. This is not treating the House courteously, fairly or properly, I think. I consider these questions may fairly be asked, and thereby a good deal of expense saved, and this is very important as we are very anxious, seeing we have a deficit, not to put the Government to further expense.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee to consider of Ways and Means ; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, before entering upon a discussion of the questions which are pertinent to the motion before the House, I wish to say a few words of a personal character with respect to some remarks made by the Controller of Customs in his speech last night. That hon. gentleman gave us an exhibition, not of dignity or of respectability, but an exhibition of temper, and he pursued a course of conduct that was the exact reverse of respectability. He made an unwarranted attack, an attack entirely without foundation, on the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards). He accused that hon. gentleman of paying his men in goods, of forcing them to take payment out of his own store, of issuing scrip to them, and that he oppressed them in the matter of payment of their wages ; and when the hon. member for Russell rose and explicitly denied the accusation, the Controller of Customs failed to accept that denial, as he was bound to do from a brother member of this House, and he equivocated and quibbled about the story having appeared in the papers, about the hon. member for Russell not having brought suits for libel, and he failed to accept frankly and fully the disclaimer made by that hon. gentleman. I venture to say that the hon. member for Russell is well respected by almost all members of this House. He has never introduced a Sabbath Observance Bill, he has never introduced a Bill for the punishment of seduction, and he has never incurred, by his course, the hostility of hon. gentlemen opposite ; and the Controller failed to do that which, by parliamentary rules, he was bound to do, and pursued a course of conduct that failed to meet the approval of the great majority of his own followers, and certainly failed to meet the approval of the friends of the hon. member for Russell. With respect to the charges made against myself, I will pass them over, so far as the running of tugs on Sunday is concerned, because they are not pertinent to the question under discussion. The hon. gentleman, however, when reference was made to the fact that he had been in Washington, said he was not there for the purpose of selling his country to the Yankees. I presume he went down there to borrow something. His party had already borrowed from the Americans the Gerrymander Act, and had borrowed from them protection, and very likely the Controller thought he would borrow something else in the same line that might be used in the elections that are approaching. So far as the allusions to myself are concerned, I have this to say, that the hon. gentleman and his colleagues were very glad to accept the advantages that were secured—whether I was instrumental in securing them or not at Washington—in connection with the free lumber negotiations. We secured, under the Wilson Bill, the admission free of—Logs and round unmanufactured timber not specially enumerated or provided for in this Act.

Firewood, handle-bolts, heading-bolts, stave-bolts and shingle-bolts, hop-poles, fence posts, railroad ties, ship timber and ship planking, not specially provided for in this Act.

Timber, hewn and sawed, and timber used for spars and in building wharfs.

Timber, squared or sided.

Sawed boards, plank, deals and other lumber. Pine clapboards.

Spruce clapboards.

Hubs for wheels, posts, last-blocks, wagon-blocks, oar-blocks, gun-blocks, heading and all like blocks or sticks, rough hewn or sawed only.

Laths.

Pickets and palings.

Shingles.

Staves of wood of all kinds, wood unmanufactured.

We secured the free entry of all these articles into the American market, and in return for this, there was a condition that we should not impose an export duty or discriminate in stumpage dues. I repeat, that the hon. gentleman and his colleagues were very glad to avail themselves of this condition, and having so availed themselves they close the door of criticism on any persons who may have been instrumental in securing those concessions, concessions which are more important to Canada than any commercial concessions secured from the United States since 1854. Now, the hon. gentleman showed a sense of the importance of these concessions by abandoning—or if he did not do it his colleagues did—by abandoning his petty boom duty ; a duty the imposing of which in the month of May last year, came very nearly losing us the whole of these concessions. I might say with regard to this that I was requested by the then Premier of this Government to do something in the line of averting the disaster, and without entering further into this case, I may repeat, I am ready to meet at any time, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) with regard to the imputation he has made, and to go fully into the question. That is all I have to say with regard to these personal affairs, further than to regret, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) did not conduct himself in a manner consistent with the dignity of his position, that he did not display a statesmanlike line of conduct in his presentation of his case to the House, and that he did not abstain from these petty malignant attacks upon members of this House ; attacks which had no bearing whatever upon the subject under discussion.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the discussion of the matter legitimately before the House in connection with the motion of my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). The Government present several postulates in this discussion. They assert. in the first place, that the farmer needs protection. My hon. friend, the Controller of Customs last night said, that the farmer stood more in need of protection than any other business interest in this country, and that the farmer had received a greater extent of protection than any other interest. The next assertion made by the Government is : that protection is beneficial to the development of manufactures ; the third assertion of the Government is : that all classes have benefited by protection ; the fourth assertion made by them in this debate is : that the financial policy of the Government has been prudent and commendable : their fifth assertion is : that their financial management has been honest and clean : their sixth assertion is : that their laws and general policy have been good ; and the seventh assertion of the Government is : that the Liberals are drifting aimlessly and without a policy. I propose to deal briefly with those points, and only briefly, because this discussion has been protracted for a great many days and these subjects have become threadbare, so that I shall treat them in a general way without entering very fully into particulars.

First, with regard to the assertion that the policy of the Government has afforded protection to the farmer, that the farmer requires protection, and that the farmer is now receiving protection to a greater extent than any other interest in this country. I deny in toto that the farmer requires protection or that he has received protection, or that he has anything to thank the Government for in connection with its fiscal policy. This assertion, of course, Mr. Speaker, is very industriously promulgated by Ministerialists and there is a reason for it. The farmers of this country control the Government, they are the majority of the electors. The Government must of necessity secure a considerable portion of their votes or it cannot carry the elections. Consequently it is necessary to induce the farmers to believe that the beneficent character of the Government policy is of a great benefit to them, so far as their interests are concerned. I am bound to say that hitherto the Government have succeeded to a large extent in their design, and I am bound further to say, that I do not believe they will succeed to any great extent again. Now, Sir, the farmer is a manufacturer. His raw material is the soil that he cultivates, the seed that he casts upon that soil, the sun, and the wind, and the rain, and the transusive forces of nature which take the seed that is cast upon the earth and bring forth the blade, and then the ear, and then the full corn in the ear. His raw materials are machinery, and clothing, and food, and all that it is necessary for him to use in the prosecution of his enterprise. These are his raw materials. His finished products are, golden harvest, fruits, flocks, herds, dairy products, vegetables, and all that the soil produces. He is in the highest and noblest sense a manufacturer, and he depends, not upon man's legislation, but he depends for the outcome of his labour upon the blessings of a kind Providence. Now, the farmer being a manufacturer, the question is, To what extent can he be benefited in common with other manufacturers ? What have been his profits under this policy which it is claimed has done so much for him ? Will any man here assert that the farmers of Canada are making 5 per cent net on their operations ? Will any man point out that farmers are able to rent their farms for 5 per cent upon their cash value ? Neither of these assertions could be substantiated : the business has not been a remunerative one. The farmers of the country have not secured large profits. Where are their markets ? They have a home market, of course, but they have markets in every country under the face of heaven that require the articles they produce. They send whatever the soil produces to any corner of the globe where that product is needed. Who are the competitors of the farmer ? His competitors are the producers in all lands. If he is selling wheat, he must compete with the peasant of Russia, with the coolie of India, with the poorly paid labourer of the Argentine Republic. All these classes he must meet upon a common ground and compete with them in the open markets of the world. He competes with the world at large in all his other products. Now, what the farmer wants, and what is essential for his prosperity is, that if he is obliged to sell his products in the open markets of the world subject to competition from every quarter and from all men, he should be allowed the privilege of buying what he requires under the same conditions. If he is obliged to meet competition in selling, he should have the privilege of having the benefit of competition in buying ; and so far as the Government can grant him that, with proper regard to its revenue wants, the farmer is entitled to demand, that if he sells in the open markets of the world, he should be allowed to buy in the open markets of the world upon the most favourable terms that can be secured. He wants relief from taxation, he wants relief from the burdens that press upon him, and he wants to purchase and buy the necessaries of life under the same conditions as he is obliged to sell his products.

I do not deny that agricultural protection under certain circumstances would be beneficial to the farmer. Agricultural protection would benefit the farmer of England, because the farmer of England raises his products and sells them in a market that he does not fully supply. He sells them in a market which must receive the surplus from other countries, of all the kinds of things he produces, and if a duty were put on these products that would enhance the cost of what was brought in and so would increase the price of what the English farmer raises. Agricultural protection in England would be a benefit to the farmer, but in Canada the case is quite different. Here we have a country where is raised all that is required for the supply of the wants of our own people, and we have a surplus in addition, which is sold abroad; and whenever there is a surplus of any article, it is unnecessary to argue that the price received for that surplus in the open markets of the world will cover the price of the entire crop raised in the country. This being the case, protection cannot be made advantageous to the farmers of Canada.

My hon. friend the Controller of Customs said last night that the farmers of Canada were subjected to great losses under the Mackenzie Administration by the free admission of American grains and other agricultural products, and he pointed to the fact that the importations of agricultural and animal products in 1878 amounted to $15,773,000. I contend that the free and untrammelled admission of grains under the tariff of 1876 was not in any degree detrimental to the agricultural interests of this country. We had constructed a costly system of public works; we had united Lake Erie with Lake Ontario; we had united Lake Ontario with the navigable lower stretch of the River St. Lawrence; we had expended millions of dollars for the purpose of diverting from the Western States a portion of that trade which passed through American channels to New York and other American seaports. The purpose of these expenditures was to secure as large a volume of traffic as possible; and in order to make that purpose effectual it was necessary to remove all restrictions, and allow the flow of that traffic unimpeded through our commercial channels. Well, what was the effect, so far as the farmer was concerned, of American wheat being ground at mills at St. Catharines, at Thorold, or on the St. Lawrence, where water power was furnished? So long as we had a large surplus of wheat, as we had, the American wheat which we used simply displaced so much Canadian wheat and flour, which took its place in our exports; and the mills on the Welland Canal, or on the St. Lawrence, found it to be to their advantage to grind the hard spring wheats of the west mixed with certain qualities of Canadian wheat. This gave employment to Canadian labour, to Canadian capital, to Canadian coopers who made the barrels, to Canadian vessels which exported the product of the mills, to Canadian shipping warehouses, and to Canadian bank capital; and it was in every way an advantage to the country. It was a trade that swelled the volume of our commercial transactions, and did not in the slightest degree interfere with the prosperity of the farmer. Why, Sir, during the Mackenzie Administration the average price of wheat was $1.11, whereas until recently it has not gone above 60 cents; the average price of barley was 83 cents, the average price of oats 42 cents, the average price of pease 76 cents. The average prices of all the products of the farm were from 30 to 80 per cent higher during the time of that Administration, under which occurred all those disasters which the hon. Controller of Customs says it inflicted on the country, than they have been for years past; and the country could not offer up a prayer better calculated to bring blessings upon it than the prayer that the same condition of things that existed under the Mackenzie Administration should be brought to this country again. The only grain affected in price by a duty would be a grain that we consume in excess of our production, and the only grain we consume in excess of our production is Indian corn. A duty would affect the price of Indian corn; but even the importation of Indian corn was advantageous to Canada.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes. It was the raw material of the stock feeder, who was producing beef; it was also a grain relatively cheaper than other coarse grains, so that the farmer who bought corn could sell barley, oats, pease and rye at relatively higher prices, replacing them with corn, and make a large profit in the exchange. I found by a careful computation, in 1878, that the advantage to the farmers of Canada from the importation of 7,387,000 bushels of corn in that year was $1,400,000.

Now, it is said that the National Policy has had a good effect upon the price of pork. My hon. friend the Minister of Militia the other day descanted on the great advantages that resulted to the Canadian farmer from the duty on pork. If we were producing pork in quantities less than our consumption, the imposition of the duty would raise the price of pork; but we are doing more than that. Last year we exported 26,826,840 pounds of bacon, 1,682,167 pounds of ham, and 755,722 pounds of pork, a total of 29,264,729 pounds of hog products, valued at $2,976,503. Now, 30,000,000 pounds of pork in round numbers, valued at $3,000,000, is a surplus so large that it is folly to talk about the duty on pork enhancing the price in this country. It has no effect on the price whatever. We are selling in the same markets as the Americans, and—

Mr. DICKEY. I did not intend to say that the duty affected the price of pork, but that it increased the production of pork.

Mr. CHARLTON. Well, I can tell the hon. gentleman what has led to the increase in the production of pork. It is the fact that the production of other things has not paid—that the National Policy or something else has depressed the prices of wheat and of other grains, and that the farmer has been forced by the necessities of his cir-circumstances, into the production of some crop that would be more remunerative, and he has therefore gone into the production of pork and cheese; but it is senseless to talk about this increased production being brought about by protection.

Mr. SPROULE. How was it that the production expanded so rapidly after the duty was put on, and did not before?

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. I must ask hon. gentlemen to refrain from these unseemly interruptions. Every member who has not spoken on this question will have an opportunity of speaking.

Mr. CHARLTON. Now, I wish to point out how utterly without foundation are the assertions that duties on agricultural products have enhanced the prices of those articles in this country, or that we need protection against American agricultural products. At the present moment, owing to exceptional circumstances, the price of wheat is higher in Canada than it is in the United States. This, I presume, is the first time that this has occurred in at least ten years. The reason is that at the low prices which have prevailed for wheat, farmers have been feeding that grain to their hogs, their horses and their stock, and we have waked up suddenly to find that the country has sold short, and that we have not enough wheat to carry us till next harvest. Consequently, we have to import wheat and pay the duty on it. But the farmer in general has no advantage from that, because he has sold his wheat, though any who held wheat may derive some advantage. It is owing to that exceptional circumstance that wheat is higher in Canada than in the United States. I have watched the wheat markets, and there has not been a period for years, till now when wheat would not have been from 3 to 5 cents higher in Canada than it was, if we had free admission to the American markets. Although the surplus of both countries are designed for the same general market, yet, for some reason, probably from closeness of competition and the larger amount of money employed in grain transactions in the United States, wheat has been almost uniformly higher in the American than in the corresponding Canadian markets; and until this circumstance of the shortage from over exportation there has scarcely been a day when the farmers would not have been benefited to the extent of 3 to 5 cents a bushel by the free admission of wheat to the American markets. I have compiled some quotations for the 14th day of this month at Toronto and Buffalo, as relative markets and Chicago as a market not as favourably situated as Toronto. And I want to point out that in this list there is not an article that would be at all likely to be imported into Canada if the restriction were removed. Take oats.

I place them upon a basis of 34 pounds to a bushel, because the American standard is 32; and if you make a comparison between 32 in the one place and 34 in another, it is not a fair comparison. I find, based upon 34 pounds to the bushel, that the prices were as follows:—

Toronto	35	@ 36c.
Chicago	29½	@ 30½
Buffalo	38	@ 40

Or 4 cents higher at Buffalo than at the relatively situated market at Toronto. My hon. friend the Controller would prevent the buying of oats in Buffalo at 40 cents, paying freight, and bringing them to Canada for sale at 36 cents:

Rye—
57c. in Toronto.
64½c. in Chicago.
70c. in Buffalo.
Buckwheat—
41c. in Toronto.
55c. in Buffalo.
Barley—
45 to 47c. in Toronto.
16½ to 52c. for the inferior western barley in Chicago.
63c. in Buffalo.

Nobody is going to pay 63 cents for barley in Buffalo, bring it to Toronto, and sell it for 47 cents. It is not necessary to impose a duty to prevent that, and that is about all the benefit the National Policy confers upon our farmers:

Cattle—
$3.00 to $5.60 per cwt. live weight in Toronto
3.50 to 6.15 in Chicago.
3.75 to 5.87 in Buffalo.

We have heard a great deal about Armour sending in beef and supplying our hotels. We have heard a great deal about the danger of having American beef brought in here if the duties were removed and our markets slaughtered. Who is going to buy heavy steers in Chicago at $6.15, bring them to Toronto and sell them at $5.60? Hogs—the National Policy advocates stand firmly upon the assertion that the duty does some good in hogs. Well, on the 14th of this month, the quotations were as follows:—

Hogs—
$3.00 to $4.80 in Toronto.
4.30 to 4.80 in Chicago.
$4.00 to $4.90 in Buffalo.

They were not as high in Toronto as in Chicago, five hundred miles further west. The Controller of Customs, the other night pointed out that mess pork was cheaper in Chicago than in Toronto. That does not affect the farmer. The farmer is affected by the price he receives for live hogs. He sells his hogs alive; and if mess pork is sold higher in Toronto than in Chicago, that simply shows that the packers are making larger profit in Canada than in the United States. In Chicago they carry on the business systematically; they utilize everything except the squeal—bristles, bones, everything else, and they thus manage to sell mess pork cheaper than in Toronto. But live hogs have been uniformly higher for some years in the American markets than in ours, and the duty on live hogs is utterly useless. We do not need it at all. With regard to the sheep market, the quotation for sheep in Toronto by live weight, as near as I can get it, for they were quoted by the head—

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Does the hon. gentleman say there should be no duty on pork coming from the United States ?

Mr. CHARLTON. My assertion is that the duty is useless. It does not make any difference and has not any effect; as regards pork from the United States sent here. What we want is the duty taken off pork going to the United States :

Sheep—

$3¼ to $3½ in Toronto.

3½ to 4½ in Buffalo.

Lambs—

$3 to $4 per head in Toronto.

I do not know what the live weight would be :

In Chicago the best are worth $6.75 per cwt.

In Buffalo, $4.75 to $8.50 per cent.

I venture to say that the average price of lambs is $1.50 higher in Buffalo than in Toronto :

Baled hay—

Toronto $ 9 00

Chicago 11 00

Buffalo 12 50

New York 16 00

Eggs—

Toronto 10 to 10½c.

Buffalo 13 to 14

Butter, potatoes, turnips, vegetables—all are higher in that market than here. What we want is not protection against American agricultural products that are coming from the higher-priced markets to the lower, but the ability to get into that higher priced market with our products. The Government would have shown some sense if they had at least opened negotiations upon the suggested basis and see how far it would be necessary to go when invited to offer to the American Secretary of State proposals based upon the introduction of a list of manufactures in a reciprocal arrangement. If they had entertained that proposition instead of summarily dismissing it, the farmer might have got some advantage from the action of this Government. But he has never received a dollar from it. He has never received any protection. The whole thing is a mockery, a delusion and a snare, and he is beginning to find that out. My hon. friend the Controller of Customs says that the United States is no market for us because they sell everything we do, because they export everything we do. No need, he says, going to that market; it is folly to think of such a thing. Why, Mr. Speaker, the

Mr. CHARLTON.

United States is our best market for hay, small fruits, horses, sheep, lambs, poultry, eggs, hides, wool, flax, barley, beans, malt, vegetables, potatoes, turnips, even with the present scale of duties. It would be much our best market for cattle if the duty were removed. Nothing could confer so great an advantage upon the farmers of Canada as the sweeping away of the entire schedules of American agricultural duties.

So much for this question of protection to the farmers. I proceed next to consider the assertion that our manufacturers depend for prosperity upon protection, and I think that I shall be able to show that protection, even in the case of manufacturers, has not exerted the beneficial influence which is claimed for it. I think that I will be able to show—and I shall take some pains to do so—that protection is entirely unnecessary, as compared with a revenue tariff, even for the manufactures of this country. I may point out, first of all, that we had manufactures before we had the National Policy. We had manufactures that were well developed. We had extensive manufacturing interests in this country which grew up under a revenue tariff policy of 15 per cent duty. In 1871, according to the census of that year, our manufactures stood as follows:—

Capital invested	$ 77,964,020
Hands employed	187,942
Raw material	$124,907,846
Wages	40,851,000
Products	221,617,773

How does that compare with the assertion that the National Policy created our manufacturing system? That was the condition of things almost ten years before that policy was inaugurated. There was scarcely a manufacturing interest existing in Canada to-day which was not in existence then, and not only in existence but doing a profitable business. Passing on ten years to 1881, for in 1881 the influence of the National Policy, which was adopted in 1879, had scarcely begun to be felt; it took a little time to adjust interests to the new condition of things, and you may say that the entire decade from 1871 to 1881 was also passed under revenue tariff conditions—in 1881 what was the condition of our manufacturing industries? Had they grown? Was there any evidence of prosperity or growth in that decade between 1871 and 1881, under revenue tariff conditions? Or were they stagnant? Did they give evidence of some pressing need for a change of policy? Let us see. The capital invested in 1881 had increased from $77,960,000, at which it stood in 1871, to $165,202,000. The number of hands had increased from 187,942 to 254,955. Wages had increased from $40,851,000 to $59,429,000. The increase in raw materials was from $124,907,846 to $179,918,593; the increase in product was from $221,617,773 to $309,171,-

068. A little later I will give the percentages of increase in this decade, and also in the decade following. But let me say that in 1891, the nominal value of factory products was greater than the true value, because these values, as compared with those of 1871 and 1891, are inflated by protection, while in the other they are down near to rock bottom; and you may safely deduct from the totals of production given in 1891 from 15 to 20 per cent in order to have them on the same basis as those of 1871 and 1881. Bearing this in mind, let us see what the result was in 1891: Capital, $354,620,750; employees, including boys and girls, 370,256; wages, $100,663,650; material, $256,119,042; products, $476,258,886. Now let us endeavour to ascertain, Mr. Speaker, what were the profits realized in the gross, in these three periods. Let us see whether we can ascertain from these returns of the products of manufactures whether the business in 1871 was a ruinous one, and let us compare the profits received in 1871, 1881 and 1891. This is a very important matter in connection with this case. If it can be shown that, even though the product was large, in 1871 or 1881, the business was unprofitable, some argument will be given in favour of a change which would make the business more profitable. What do the figures show? In 1871:

Raw material	124,907,846
Total	$165,758,855
Product	221,617,773
Balance of profit.....	55,858,918
Capital	77,964,020
Percentage of profit, 73.

Was this a struggling industry? Was this an industry that required bolstering up by higher duties? It is folly to talk it. What was the result in 1881:

Wages	$ 59,429,002
Raw material	179,918,593
Total	$239,347,595
Product	309,676,068
Balance as profit	70,328,472
Capital invested	165,302,623
Percentage of profit, 42.

That is a good enough business. Now, take the figures for 1891:

Wages	$100,663,650
Raw material	256,119,042
Total	$356,782,692
Product	476,258,886
Balance as profit	119,476,214
Capital invested	354,620,750
Percentage of profit, 33.6.
Profit on working capital of $181,450,136, 65 per cent.

So that we see that the profit in 1871 was 73 per cent on the capital invested; in 1881 it was 42 per cent; and in 1891 it was 33.6 per cent. Who complains of the condition of things in 1871 and 1881? What reason was there to complain? None whatever. Now, the increase in hands between 1871 and 1881 was 35.6 per cent, while the increase in population was 17 per cent. The increase in hands between 1881 and 1891 was 45 per cent, while the increase in population was 11.66 per cent. The increase of raw material between 1871 and 1881 was 44 per cent, while the increase in raw material from 1881 to 1891 was 42.3 per cent, showing a greater increase in the first decade than in the second by 1.7 per cent. I ask you to bear in mind these statements with regard to raw material, because they furnish a criterion by which the other lists can be judged, showing that some of these lists were stuffed as regards the products, and as regards the number of hands employed. The increase in capital from 1871 to 1881 was 112 per cent, while the increase in capital from 1881 to 1891 was 114 per cent, 2 per cent greater in the second decade than in the first. Now, as to the evidence showing stuffing of the lists I will take, first, boots and shoes, and blacksmithing. These are what are called "natural industries"; they exist in all countries, blacksmithing especially, and the result could not very well be manipulated or stuffed in these cases:

Boots and shoes, 1881	$17,895,903
Boots and shoes, 1891	18,990,381
Increase	$ 1,091,478
Equal to 6 per cent.

Blacksmithing, 1881	$7,172,469
Blacksmithing, 1891	8,942,106
Increase	$1,769,637
Equal to 24 per cent.

Here were increases that were natural. The increase in population in the second decade was 11.66 per cent, with the increase of production in blacksmithing of 24 per cent, and in boots and shoes of 6 per cent. Now, let us look at some industries, the tables regarding which may be stuffed a little. Take carpenters and joiners:

1881	$3,893,910
1891	9,111,299
Increase	$5,217,389
Equal to 125 per cent.

Now, does anybody believe that while boots and shoes increased 6 per cent, and blacksmithing, 24 per cent, the work of carpenters and joiners increased 134 per cent, with an increase in the population of only 11.66 per cent? It is absurd on the face of it. Next take dress-making and millinery:

1881	$ 4,926,871
1891	11,111,510
Increase	$ 6,184,639
Equal to 134 per cent.

This increase is nonsense. These figures are due to the fact that in 1891 every woman who sewed in a garret, every woman who had a sewing machine was entered as a manufacturing industry. Now, considering that the increase in raw material used was less by 1·7 per cent between 1881 and 1891 than it was between 1871 and 1881, these statements of the increasing number of establishments and increased number of hands employed are illusory, and not in accordance with the facts. And I believe that the Government was capable of deliberately entering into the business of giving instructions to enumerators to get figures showing an apparent swelling of the industries of the country that did not exist. Now, Sir, I infer from this table that all these statements made by hon. gentlemen on the Government side that the institution of the National Policy, and the necessity of putting on heavier duties for the purpose of promoting manufacturing interests in this country were false assertions. I assume that the returns made by the census of 1871, showing $221,000,000 of products, that the census returns for 1881 showing 309,000,000 products, the returns showing that the net profits in 1871 were 73 per cent, in the next decade 42 per cent; that all these facts show that all the assertions made by the friends of National Policy, that the introduction of that policy was essential to the well-being and continuance and growth of the manufacturing interests of this country, were wrong. It is a pure fallacy, that does not rest upon a solid foundation in any respect whatever. In fact, Sir, the returns show that our manufacturing industries were more prosperous, in reality, the general degree of prosperity was greater, under the revenue tariff policy than it has been subsequent to that time. What kind of establishments had we in operation, then? Why, Sir, we had cotton mills, well established woollen mills, agricultural implement manufactories, foundries, saw mills, planing mills, sewing machine establishments, machine shops, hat factories—we had nearly all that we have got to-day, and these industries were well established. They were not exotic industries, they were not industries struggling for an existence. Many of these had practically full control of the field. The saw-mills and the wood manufactories of the country, planing mills, sash and blind factories, wooden and hollowware, foundries, agricultural implements, boots and shoes, leather—in fact, all the principal manufacturing industries in Canada had almost exclusive control of the field in this country. How desperate was the condition of the manufacturers? J. & R. Molson had accumulated a fortune of a million dollars; J. G. Worts, a million dollars; E. & G. Gurney, commencing as moulders, were worth $750,000 that they had made in their business of manufacturers; E. K. Green was worth half a million; A. E. Gault was worth half a million; and scores and scores of others were worth from $50,000 to $250,000 apiece.

But it happens that we had a period of depression, extending from 1874 to 1879, and our manufacturers imagined that the world-wide depression that existed was due to something that did not cause it, and they wanted to have something done by the Government to put them in a position that time would have put them in, that the removal of the depression would have put them in. But I think I can show that even in 1878, almost at the close of that depression, the condition of our manufacturing industries was not an unfavourable one. I took occasion to correspond with about 100 manufacturers in 1878, and I received letters from twenty of them, in various lines, in the province of Ontario, and in one or two other provinces. I will give the result to the House now, for the result of that investigation has a direct bearing upon this question. One cotton mill stated that they had made no dividend, and I found out afterwards that they had earned 10 or 12 per cent, and had applied it to the purchase of machinery in order to enlarge their operations. One woollen mill, with a capital of $180,000 reported 10 per cent dividend. One foundry, with a capital of $180,000 reported no dividend in consequence of having been unfortunate in making bad debts to a large amount. One woollen mill reported a dividend of 6 per cent; one hosiery mill, 6 per cent; another hosiery mill, 8 per cent; one sewing machine factory, 6 per cent; one carriage factory said their business was remunerative; one extensive clothing concern said they could make more money by shaving notes; one agricultural implement manufactory said business was satisfactory, and they were very busy; another sewing machine factory said they were running on three-quarters time, and their profit was slightly reduced, and they wanted free trade in iron, steel and coal; another agricultural implement factory were making satisfactory profits; one large foundry made 20 per cent; another agricultural implement factory made 23 per cent; another, 40 per cent; another, 20; another reported business satisfactory; one knitting goods factory was satisfied that they were holding their own all right; and that was the general state of trade in their line. The summary of the statement is that in these twenty establishments one paid a dividend of 40 per cent; one of 28; one of 23; two of 20; seven somewhere between 10 to 15; one of 8; six of 6 and over; and one in iron reported that they had made bad debts, and had no dividend. Now, I want to compare that condition with the condition of manufacturing establishments in New England, where they had heavy protection, a protection that had existed for seventeen years. I want to make a comparison between the conditions of these concerns in Canada, under a revenue policy, and forty-eight of the principal manufacturing concerns in New England, in 1877 with a capital of $53,320,000. Sixteen of these forty-eight establishments reported no dividend, compared with only one out of twenty in Canada. Nine of them reported dividends of less than 6 per cent; eight reported dividends of 6 per cent; and ten reported dividends of 10 per cent and upwards. Now, if the relative condition of things was such that out of twenty establishments in Canada one only had no dividend, while out of forty-eight in New England, sixteen had no dividend; if, while 9 of those establishments in New England paid less than 6 per cent, and there was only six in Canada that paid as little as 6 per cent—I say that the manufacturing industries of Canada were beyond all question in a relatively healthier, more prosperous, and more profitable condition than they were in six New England states, where they were enjoying very heavy protective duties. I think, Mr. Speaker, that I may venture the assertion that the protected industries in the United States throughout the depression that existed from 1874 to 1879, were more severely affected than ours were in Canada, and were in a less prosperous condition. I make that assertion without hesitation, I make that assertion believing fully, in fact, knowing, that it is true.

Now with regard to protection in a general sense. If one solitary interest could procure protection, it would obtain an advantage; but if you distribute protection over all the industries in the country, or attempt to do it, you handicap one by putting a duty upon what is its raw material, which is the finished product of another; and after you have gone the round of the circle, you leave matters relatively in as bad a position for the manufacturers as they would have been if you had made no attempt to put the duties on. A blast furnace produces pig iron. Where one establishment produces pig iron, forty establishments in the country use it, and the protection that benefits one is a burden upon forty. One establishment produces steel billets, and where one produces them, fifty use them, and the protection that protects one is a burden upon fifty. And so it is around the list. One manufacturer is buying what another has produced; the manufacturer that produced it has been protected, and the protection adds to its price, and the manufacturer that is using it is obliged to buy it at an enhanced price, and charge a higher price for his goods. He is no better off, and the consumer is very much worse off. That is the trouble with protection. It takes out of one pocket and puts into another, and takes out of that pocket and puts into a third, and it goes the round, and the only man that has had anything taken out of his pocket that he does not get back again, is the consumer, who is necessarily robbed by the operation of the system.

I think I can show that the operation of the protective policy in the United States has not been, in any sense, advantageous to the manufacturing interests even of that country. In 1846 the United States abandoned protection after a brief trial, and passed a revenue tariff, which decreased, by a graduating scale, every three years. As that tariff decreased, the manufacturing interests of the country took a new bound towards prosperity, and in 1850 the product of manufactures in the United States amounted to $1,019,000,000 in value, and the number of hands employed was 957,000. In 1860, in a clear decade of a revenue tariff policy, without the intervention of protection at all, the number of hands had increased to 1,311,000, the wages to $378,000,000, and the product to $1,885,000,000; or the increase in the decade from 1850 to 1860, under a revenue tariff, had been 37 per cent in the number of hands employed, 60 per cent in the amount of wages paid, and 85 per cent in the products. Well, this is a highly favourable showing; and it happens, Mr. Speaker, that at no time since 1860—for high protection was introduced in 1861—has the condition of manufacturing industries in the United States been more prosperous or satisfactory than it was between 1850 and 1860 under a moderate revenue tariff. I have prepared tables as to the increase in wages, in prices, in raw material, capital, and in products, for the three decades following 1850, and are as follows:—

Hands, males	731,137

Increase of hands, aside from children, in all cases, 611,306—31 per cent.

Increase of wages, $172,369,352, or 22 per cent over currency basis.

Increase over gold basis in 1870, $366,263,537—63 per cent.

Increase of product, on currency basis of 1870, $1,137,253,749, or 27 per cent.

Increase of product, on gold basis of 1871, $2,195,335,109, or 69 per cent.

A summary of the results shows that, reducing the figures to a gold basis, which is necessary to do in order to make a comparison with the gold basis that preceded it and succeeded it, the increase was as follows:—Increase of hands, not children, 1860, 37 per cent; 1870, 47 per cent; 1880, 30 per cent. Increase of wages, gold basis, 1860, 60 per cent; 1870, 78 per cent; 1880, 63 per cent. Increase of products, gold basis, 1860, 85 per cent; 1870, 68 per cent; 1880, 69 per cent. There is nothing here to show a material acceleration in the development of manufacturing industries in the United States under protection. It shows, on the whole, the reverse, that the development during the decade from 1850 to 1860 was as great as between 1860 and 1870 or 1870 and 1880, and it furnishes corroboration of the statement I have made, that both in Canada and in the United States the operation of protection, as contrasted with the operation of the revenue tariff—I refer to the first period as shown by these statistics—shows beyond question that protection fails to protect, that it fails to secure the object it is ostensibly aimed to secure, and that manufacturers are no better off under high protection than under a moderate revenue policy.

There is another feature of this case which has a bearing on the matter, Mr. Speaker, and that is the population statistics. You take the population statistics of a nation, and if there is a material variation between one decade and another, it is reasonable to suppose that fiscal conditions may have had something to do with that variation. During the decade ending 1860 the United States increased their population by 35·10 per cent, and of that the increase 24·98 was a natural increase, without reference to immigration. In 1890, under a high protective policy, the natural increase had fallen from 24·98 to 14·39 in 1890. If we take our own country, we find in Ontario the increase from 1851 to 1861, under a revenue tariff, was from 952,000 to 1,396,000, or an increase of 46 per cent in ten years; while in Quebec, for the same period the increase was 25 per cent. From 1871 to 1881, under a revenue tariff, the increase of population was 18·88 per cent, while that of Quebec was 14·05, and of the whole Dominion, 17·31. With the full benefit of protection, the increase of population in Ontario, from 1881 to 1891, was 9·65; in Quebec, 9·53; in the whole Dominion, 11·66. This falling off in the ratio of increase, I think, indicates clearly that the condition of the country was unfavourably affected by the operation of something, and I assert that that something was the National Policy, and that under the operation of the protective policy we declined, as regards increase of population, in the Dominion, from 17·31 in 1881, to 11·66 in 1891.

There is another matter in connection with this question which is deserving of attention. It has been asserted that the condition of this country is satisfactory. The hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Northrup) was driven to asserting that an increase of 11·66 was satisfactory. He compared that increase with the increase of some of the countries in Europe, with France, for instance, and he was highly satisfied that we had increased in as great a ratio as the European countries, which are throwing off emigration every year, which have reached the full development of their resources, and are cultivating all the soil capable of furnishing sustenance to man. I assert that Canada is a country whose natural conditions are such that it should increase in population as rapidly as any country ever has or ever will. We have abundance of food, abundance of soil, a vigorous population, room for expansion, everything favourable to the rapid increase of population. If we take the United States—and I will deal with this question of natural increase alone—the natural increase of that country for the decades from 1790 to 1890, was as follows:—

INCREASE OF POPULATION IN UNITED STATES.

	Total increase.	Natural increase.
1790 to 1810.....	35·10	33·00
1800 to 1810.....	36·38	35·32

1880 to 1890.....	24·85	14·39
Average nat. increase,

That was the natural increase of population, leaving aside immigration to the country. Is there any reason why we should not increase as rapidly, especially when it is remembered that when this increase of 25 per cent, in round numbers, took place, the United States had a population of 31,500,000? Here we are with a population of 5,000,000, with as many advantages, with as great room for expansion as the United States had even in 1810, when they had about 7,000,000 of population. How has the population of Canada increased? We should have a natural increase of 25 per cent. That was the lowest rate of increase in the United States, down to 1860, and we certainly should have that. It is reasonable to say that our increase should be 25 per cent—I believe it should be more than 30 per cent. Estimating on a basis of 25 per cent increase in 10 years, what should have been the condition of things in this country as regards population in 1891? We had in 1881 a population of 4,324,810. If we had added 25 per cent for natural increase to the population of 1881, that natural increase would have been 1,081,202, and without receiving a single immigrant we should have had, when the census was taken in 1891, a population of 5,406,012 inhabitants. I take the natural increase at 25 per cent for the ten years, which is only 2½ per cent for each year, and that was the lowest natural increase they had in the United States up to 1860. During that period between 1881 and 1891, we received 886,173 immigrants. It would be fair to add a considerable percentage for natural increase to these immigrants, but I will add nothing on that account. I will add to the population of 1881 the bare 886,173 immigrants, and plus the increase of 25 per cent on our actual population in 1881, it would have given us in 1891 a population of 6,292,185 souls. Well, we had 4,833,239 inhabitants in 1891, and so we fell short of what our population should be by 1,458,946, and we fell 572,773 short of our natural increase without the immigration at all. Will any man tell us that is a satisfactory condition of things? Will any man doubt that these figures which show that we fell 1,458,000 short of our proper population, on a moderate estimate of what our increase should be, do not prove that there must be something wrong in this country? The advocates of this policy who base their expectations for success in the future, and attribute to the policy every blessing received in the past; will they tell us, in view of the facts presented here, that this policy is not a failure? Sir, the policy is a failure. It is a lamentable failure, and every argument made in favour of that policy is an argument without foundation and not based upon reason.

Now, Sir, with regard to the next postulate, for it is a postulate, that this policy benefits all classes. Does it benefit the lumber interest, Mr. Speaker? Does it enable you and me to buy blankets, and chains, and axes, and saws, and the outfit for our camps, any cheaper than we could buy them without it? Does it enhance the price of a single article we have to sell? Do we sell in markets that are affected by this policy or reached by it at all? Does it reach the consumer in the United States; the consumer in Great Britain, the consumer in Australia, in the Argentine Republic, or in South Africa? It does not have the slightest influence upon prices, and it loads the producer of lumber with burdens which are incident to the policy, and gives him no compensating advantage in the slightest degree whatever. Does it benefit the mining industry? Well, we do produce a little pig iron, but how much? We produce 46,000 tons. I think, and in return for that little production of pig iron we load up the consumers of this country with duties upon $10,000,000 worth of bar-iron and other kinds of iron, and where the producer of iron gets $1 in protection the consumer in Canada pays $10 out in return.

Mr. McNEILL. How did they build up their iron industry in the United States?

Mr. CHARLTON. Natural advantages.

Mr. McNEILL. Oh, yes; which we do not possess, I suppose?

Mr. CHARLTON. Iron in the United States at Birmingham, can be produced cheaper than at any other point in the world. The actual cost of producing it there is only about $5.75 per long ton.

Mr. McNEILL. We have as great natural resources in Nova Scotia as anywhere in the world.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then we do not need protection.

Mr. CHARLTON. Then with regard to coal. Would it not be better for Nova Scotia to have free access to the markets of the New England States, to New York, to Philadelphia, and to other seaport cities, than to force coal against nature by a long railway route to Montreal and points further west? Would it not be an advantage to British Columbia to be able to sell coal in San Francisco and other Pacific coast cities for consumption in California or Oregon? How is it about iron ore, Sir? There are every year 8,000,000 tons of American iron ore shipped from the Lake Superior region, and with our own mines as accessible and as valuable as those in Michigan, we are shipping only about 2,000 tons per year; a mere dribble compared with that vast stream of commerce that employs one-third of the lake shipping in the inner Lake Basin. With free access to the American market we could swell our exports of iron ore from the paltry 2,000 tons that we have now, to millions of tons. How is it about marble and stone? Sir, $25,000,000 worth of structural materials are used in the United States every year, and we exported to that country in 1894 a paltry $32,226 worth. If the duties were removed, the magnificent quarries we have on the north shore of Lake Huron, of Lake Superior, and the quarries in the region back of Lake Ontario, would share in that lucrative trade. We could supply cities like Chicago, Milwaukee, Detroit, Cleveland and Buffalo with millions of dollars worth of structural material. We could send our structural material through the Erie Canal, and supply builders in New York, Philadelphia and other cities. If we had free access to the American market for our iron ore, free access to the American market for our structural material, we could furnish to the labouring man of this country, $10 worth of labour for every dollar's worth he would be deprived of if we swept the whole system of the National Policy away with one clean sweep.

Does this policy of protection benefit the fishing industry? No. Where does the fisherman find his market? He finds it in the West Indies, in the United States and in Europe. He must meet in competition in the sale of his products, the fishermen of all other quarters of the world. Protection enhances the cost of his supplies, handicaps him, and makes him less capable of meeting that competition. And as regards the labourer. Is the labourer benefited by this policy: a policy that injures the lumberman, a policy that injures the farmer, a policy that injures the miner, and a policy that injures the fisherman? Will any one tell us that the labourer is benefited by this policy? If the labourer makes $1 out of increased employment furnished by manufacturers—if this policy does promote manufacturing, which I deny—his class loses $10 on the other hand through the operations of this policy. The labouring industry of Canada loses heavily in being deprived of the different lines of employment that would be prosperous, and that would employ an enormous number of labourers but for the imposition of these duties and burdens which are incident to the policy of hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House.

There is another feature, Mr. Speaker, with which I have not yet dealt. My hon. friend the Controller of Customs said last night: A tax on articles not produced in the country is a tax on the people. That is true. But the tax on articles produced in the country is a double tax. It is a tax on the people to the extent that the people pay taxes into the treasury, and it is a tax on the people to the extent that the people pay in enhanced cost for all articles of that nature produced in the country. That enhanced cost is what the political economist denominates an incidental tax. Now, Sir, the price of a domestic production is enhanced to nearly the full extent of the duties imposed upon the corresponding article imported into the country. The duty goes into the treasury, but the enhanced cost upon the domestic article goes into the pockets of the combine, and the monopolist, and the manufacturer who secures this unjust advantage. For instance, the production of cotton in this country would, I suppose, amount to nearly \$10,000,000 a year. The cotton import amounted in 1894 to \$4,001,618. Upon that the Government received a revenue of \$1,139,068. Upon the \$10,000,000 worth of domestic products, the manufacturer receives enhanced cost to the extent, perhaps, of \$2,500,000 more. So that the consumer is paying \$3,600,000 of enhanced cost on cottons in order that the Government may receive a revenue of \$1,139,000. The woollens we imported in 1894 amounted to \$9,493,629 worth, on which the duty paid was \$2,876,873; but on the woollen goods which were manufactured in Canada, the consumer paid almost a corresponding amount in this incidental tax, which did not go into the treasury, but went into the pockets of the manufacturers who produced the woollen goods. During the discussion in the United States on the policy of a revenue tariff, a very interesting paper was compiled by the Hon. Wm. Springer, who is considered a good authority on economical questions, bearing on this very question of the burdensome character of the incidental tax. Mr. Springer selected a line of articles, the aggregate importation of which in to the United States for the previous year was \$194,464,758. He showed that the domestic product of the same line of articles was \$2,440,502,649. The number of hands employed in the production of that domestic product was 1,327,881; and the wages paid were \$463,606,049. Now, mark this, Mr. Speaker, the increased cost to the consumer of these goods, \$2,440,000,000 worth, in consequence of protection, was \$556,938,637. The excess of increased cost over the wages paid in that production was \$163,600,000. In other words, the people paid, in direct tax the duty on the goods imported, and in indirect tax, in the enhanced cost of the goods produced, \$751,403,395; and of that sum the Government got \$194,464,758, or 23·7 per cent, and the monopolist got \$556,693,000, or 76·3 per cent. Is that not a beautiful system that compels the consumer in the country, of every dollar he pays, to pay to the Government 23 cents and 7 mills, and into the pocket of the monopolists, 76 cents and 3 mills? That is protection. That is the operation of the incidental tax. Now, my hon. friend the Controller of Customs claimed that we had free sugar. Well, we had, in a sense. We had free sugar of a kind that the refiner wanted, but we had a duty of $\frac{1}{16}$ per cent on the kind the refiner wanted to sell. The result was that while the Government received no revenue, the refiner was able to take, at least, half a cent a pound more for his sugar than it could be imported at: so that on the 300,000,000 pounds consumed in the country, he was able to take out of the pockets of the people, and put into his own pocket at last, \$1,500,000, not one farthing of which went into the treasury. That sum would pay all the wages of all the men employed at the refining of the sugar. A costly, wasteful, absurd system! My hon. friend told us last night that if we had had the tariff of 1878 in operation last year, we would have realized a revenue on tea, coffee, and sugar, of \$8,000,000. Well, Sir, I suppose we would, and there would have been no incidental tax connected with it. The people would have paid the tax: the money would have gone into the treasury of the country: there would have been no domestic product of sugar or coffee, or tea, to be enhanced in price to the consumer by the tax ; and, instead of paying to the Government 23 cents and a fraction, and to the monopolists 76 cents and a fraction, they would have paid the whole dollar to the Government. That would have been the advantage of a revenue tariff upon those articles. But, Sir, on refined sugar, on cottons, on woollens, and on many other articles produced in this country, we are paying, in this incidental tax, in enhanced prices charged by the manufacturers under cover of the duty, more money than the entire amount paid by those manufacturers for labour in the production of those articles ; and we would be better off if we just turned those labourers loose, paid them their wages for doing nothing, and saved the balance. The obvious inference from all this is that this is a costly, wasteful, absurd system.

I have proved that under a revenue tariff in this country, from 1861 to 1881, the progress of our manufacturers and the net profits made by them were so satisfactory that there was no reason under heaven for a change in that policy in order to promote their welfare. I have pointed out that in the United States, from 1850 to 1860, under a revenue tariff policy, inaugurated four years before 1850, the increase in wages paid, in hands employed, in raw material consumed, and in product put out, was as satisfactory as in the decade from 1860 to 1870, or in the decade from 1870 to 1880, reducing the product of 1870 to a gold basis ; and, when we examine into this matter, everything points inevitably to the conclusion that the imposition of this tax, which bears so heavily upon the producing community in consequence of the diversion of the greater part they pay to the pockets of the combines, is not warranted on sound principles, and cannot be defended.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we shall come to that postulate as to the financial policy of the Government being prudent and commendable. The following tables gives comparisons of the controllable expenditures for 1874, 1878, and 1894 :—

Now, I wish to draw the attention of my hon. friend the Finance Minister and my hon. friend the Controller of Customs to the fact that the Mackenzie Government, commencing with the controllable expenditure in 1874 at $7,641,000, reduced it by 1878 to $6,398,000, being a reduction of $1,245,000, and that the Conservative Government, commencing with that expenditure of $6,398,000, increased it to $11,720,000 by 1894, an increase of 83 per cent. If this is consistent with their assertion that the financial policy of the Government has been prudent and commendable, I certainly am unable to see it. Now, I will give a similar comparison of the cost of the collection of revenue in the same years :

In whatever way you institute a comparison between the financial results under the Mackenzie Government and those of the succeeding Government, that comparison is, in every instance, in the highest degree favourable to the Mackenzie regime. In 1873-74 the expenditure of the Mackenzie Government was $23,316,000. In 1878 it was $23,503,105, being an increase of $186,000, or an annual average increase of $46,710. If it be possible, let us arrive exactly at what the increase was in the five years of the Mackenzie Administration. Take the Supply Bill of 1878-79. The Mackenzie Government went out of power in October and were not responsible for the expenditure of the balance of that year. Take the Supply Bill of that Administration for 1878-79—and that Administration never exceeded its Supply Bill—and upon the basis of that Supply Bill its increased expenditure for the five years was $356,000, or an average of $71,200 per year. My hon. friend, the Controller of Customs said last night that the fixed charges were $16,750,000, and that the balance of the charges, which was $20,000,000, could not be reduced, and he challenged us to show how they could be reduced. I first of all take the ground that the Government are responsible for the enormous amount of the fixed charges. Although the fixed charges cannot be reduced, yet the enormous figures of these charges is due to the supineness, neglect and extravagance of the Government. Those charges ought not to be nearly so large as they are. With regard to the hon. gentleman's challenge to show where the balance of the charges, $20,000,000, can be reduced, I will call his attention to some figures which I think will show that some reductions can be effected :

In civil government we expended in 1878, $823,000, and in 1894, $1,400,000. That is too large an increase. That is an increase four or five times greater than the proportionate increase of population. If we strike $250,000 from that, the expenditure of civil government will still have increased in a much greater ratio than the increase of population. On fisheries we expended $93,000 in 1878, and $466,000 in 1894. Suppose we allow this fishery expenditure to be three times greater in 1894 than it was in 1878, we will still have $100,000. On agricultural statistics we spent in 1878, $92,000, and in 1894, $265,000. Strike $75,000 off that, and still the increase will be out of all proportion to the increased population. On immigration we spent in 1878, $154,000, and in 1894, $202,000. Strike off $50,000—strike the whole thing off, it would not make any difference. On Indians in 1878, we spent $420,000, and in 1894, $968,000. It takes 47 cents out of every dollar to pay the other 53 cents to the Indians. I think I could arrange that so as to save $300,000 and leave the Indians as well off as they are. On steamship subventions we spent $257,000 in 1878, and $530,000 in 1894. We have subsidized a line to Australia to bring in Australian frozen mutton, and we shipped $18 of agricultural products there last year. We need that line as badly as a cart needs a fifth wheel. Strike it off. On militia and defence we spent in 1878, $618,136, and in 1894, $1,284,517—more than double what we spent in 1878. What is the sense of that? The population has not doubled; it has not increased over 20 per cent. Strike off $280,000 from that, and leave a round million for militia expenditure, and that will be plenty. On mounted police we spent in 1878, $335,000, and in 1894, $611,000. We can effect a saving there, I think, of $125,000. In the North-west Territories we spent $18,199 in 1878, and in 1894, $277,000. We could save the whole of that expense by allowing the North-west Territory people to manage their own concerns. Give them self-government, do not lead them around as infants with a string, but let them manage their own business like free British subjects, and save the whole amount of $276,000, or allow $76,000 for incidental expenses and strike off $200,000. On penitentiaries we spent in 1878, $308,000, and in 1894, $466,000. Strike $50,000 from that. On public works we spent $997,000 in 1878, and $2,034,000 in 1894. Why can you not get along with an addition to the expenditure in 1878 corresponding with our increasing population and wealth. On superannuation we spent $106,000 in 1878, and $262,000 in 1894. I think the way to do with that is to wipe it out. At all events, we can strike $50,000 from that. On the Franchise Act we spent $250,000. Cut the whole thing off. On customs we spent in 1878, $714,5227, and in 1894, $921,000. A reduction can be effected there. You can wipe out the Controller and some other officers and be all the better off for it. I think we could effect a saving there of $100,000. Weights and measures, $94,975. Strike that off altogether. On excise, we spent $255,000 in 1878, and $485,000 in 1894. Knock another $100,000 from that, and another Controller. Adulteration of food, $24,000. Strike that off. Post office, in 1878 we spent $1,725,000, and in 1894, $3,517,000. While the population of the country has increased about 20 per cent only, was there any sense in increasing the post office expenditure over 100 per cent. I think not. Strike from that $150,000. Railways and canals, in 1878 we spent $2,374,313, and in 1894, $3,760,549. Strike $750,000 from that. What does all this amount to? My hon. friend challenged me to say where any reduction could be effected in this expenditure of $20,000,000. There is a reduction of $3,948,000. If we can get rid of Controllers and supernumeraries and introduce a system into the Civil Service which will require a man to do a day's work for a day's wage and put men in the service who are capable of doing work, and discharge those who are mere attachés, put there by political friends, we can save an enormous sum of money. The men who appointed them will never do that. They cannot discharge these useless civil servants, because these useless people have too much political influence. But put an Administration in office who does not care a continental whether the friends of these useless attachés are friends or enemies, and we will start them on the run sufficiently fast to effect a great saving. Put men in the departments who will turn things over and allow the country to see what is going on. Let in the light. Let us know what is going on. Let us know what there is that is rotten in Denmark. We voted $4,600,000 in railway subsidies last year—waste, the most of it. Almost all these subsidies were purely for political purposes, without any design to benefit the country, without the remotest idea of benefiting the country. Then we can refrain, Mr. Speaker, from constructing Tay canals, from building Curran bridges, from making appropriations for Trent canals; we can refrain from this whole abominable system of squandering millions of the money of the people of this country to benefit ridings and strengthen candidates. Why, my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals justified the expenditure of $476,000 upon the Tay Canal that paid last year one three-hundredth part of the interest upon its cost and its charges of management, on the ground that his riding had had no benefit in the shape of an expenditure of public money before. That is the principle these men have acted upon—laying out money, squandering millions for the purpose of making themseleves solid in their constituencies, for the purpose of improving their own political fortunes, acting upon the assumption that all the wealth of Canada can be legitimately used for the purpose of securing them in the possession of power and of excluding their opponents from power.

Then, Sir, with regard to the debt. My friend the Controller of Customs told us last night that the net debt had increased five and a half million dollars in the last five years. Well, I suspect that the hon. gentleman did not prepare his figures himself, and possibly got them mixed a little.

Mr. WALLACE. I stated that the net debt had increased eight and a half millions.

Mr. CHARLTON. Well, eight and a half millions. I will take the net debt for four and half years up to 31st January last. The debt on 30th June, 1890, was $237,809,000, and on the 31st January last it was $249,407,000, which makes an increase in four years and seven months of $11,598,000, instead of $8,500,000. And we do not know how much more it is now—it may be a million or two more. What reliance can we place upon the hon. gentleman's statement, if he cannot sum up the increase of our public debt for four and a half years without making a mistake of about $3,000,000?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Perhaps he has an explanation to offer.

Mr. WALLACE. I quoted the increase of the debt for five years from 1889 to 1894. I stated that it was about $237,500,000 at the beginning of that period and about $246,000,000 at the end of it. The public accounts will show that I am right.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman must have chosen the period very prudently. But he will be judged by the country by the condition of the debt up to the present time. I will venture to say, without looking at the public accounts which I cannot take time to do now, that the hon. gentleman is wrong, even for the period he chose. At the end of the period he chose the public debt, as he states it, was $246,000,000. Now, the public debt on 31st January last was shown to be $249,000,000, and we have $8,700,000 voted but not paid for railway subsidies, we have appropriations for the Trent Valley Canal, the St. Lawrence Canal and a lot of other public works involving expenditures of $63,000,000 worth? Will they realize their nominal value? How much can you get for the $370,000 in the Fredericton Bridge and arrears of interest? How much can you get for three or four millions of dollars of Quebec harbour bonds? What do these assets that are put down there and carried forward, year after year, represent of actual value? What would they realize if we put them on the market or closed them out? If we squeeze the water out of them, I believe they would shrink several millions of dollars. I venture to say that at this moment the net debt of Canada is in reality not a dollar less than $275,000,000. And this is the prudent, economical, financial policy that these hon. gentlemen talk about and justify before the country. The increase of the public debt since 1878 is $109,045,000. The hon. gentleman told us about the increase in the debt under Mr. Mackenzie. But he stopped there. But since Mackenzie's Administration closed, these hon. gentlemen have increased the debt over $109,000,000. The Controller of Customs told us last night—another evidence of his accuracy—that the public debt had increased on the average eight and a half million dollars a year under Mr. Mackenzie. That would be a total of over $40,000,000. But the increase of the debt from 1874 to 1878 was $32,037,000. The increase of the debt from 1874 to 1879, eight months of which was under Tory administration, was $34,665,000. So the hon. gentleman is millions of dollars out of the way in the reckless statements that he makes. And who was responsible, Mr. Speaker, for that increase of the debt? The debt increased from $75,728,000 in 1867 to practically $275,000,000 to-day. The Conservative Government, I say here, in the face of this House and of the country, is responsible for every dollar of it—responsible for the increase from 1867 to 1873; responsible for the increase from 1873 to 1879; responsible for the increase from 1879 to 1894. Why? Because the increase of the debt under the Mackenzie Administration was incurred in the discharge of obligations that that Administration never entered into; incurred in carrying out contracts that their predecessors had made; incurred in consequence of public works or undertakings initiated wholly by their predecessors, except for a paltry sum of one or two hundred thousand dollars. The Mackenzie Government was not responsible for the selection of the route upon which the Intercolonial road was built; it was not responsible for the building of that road, for it came into power when that road was partly constructed and contracts were out for the construction of the remainder. The Mackenzie Government was not responsible for the enlargement of the canals—the whole work had been provided for so far as the incurring of the obligation was concerned, and they had to carry out the agreements and contracts entered into by their predecessors. And so I say that the whole debt from 1867 to the present moment must be shouldered by the present Government and their Conservative predecessors, for they are responsible for every dollar of it.

An hon. MEMBER. Everybody knows that.

Mr. CHARLTON. Everybody knows it. Nobody denies it except those who want to deny a fact.

Now, with regard to deficits. The Mackenzie Government is responsible for deficits up to 1878, amounting to $1,489,000. But if we make them responsible for the year 1879, for more than eight months of which they were not in office, the whole amount of their deficits would be $6,427,000. Gentlemen opposite have incurred deficits since then of $16,138,000, including the estimated deficit of $4,500,000 for the current year. And yet they have the brazen effrontery to stand up here and talk about deficits under the Mackenzie Government, as though they themselves had never incurred one. Yet in reality their deficits are nearly three times as large as those of the Mackenzie Government, even shouldering upon that Government the year for which they were not responsible. Again, the different circumstances under which these deficits were incurred must be taken into consideration. The deficits under the Mackenzie Government were incurred during a period of extreme stringency lasting through four out of the five years of their term of office, and they were incurred mainly through the refusal of the Administration to increase the taxation. Deficits under the present Government have been incurred in face of the largely-increased taxation; the burdens upon the people are from 30 to 40 per cent greater than they were under the management of my hon. friend to my right. Still, with these increased burdens, with these largely increased duties, with much larger revenue, the Government have incurred deficits of over $16,000,000. But my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) did not want to increase the duty, and he said: Wait, the circumstances under which we are living now, are abnormal in their character; wait till this depression passes away; wait till the normal condition of trade returns, and then we will see where we are. In the meantime, with the cruel depression existing, we do not want to pile additional burdens upon the people, and we can afford to wait. Suppose he had remained in power a year or two longer, suppose he had been in power in 1880—

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is that the reason the Minister of Finance at that day gave for not imposing new taxes?

Mr. CHARLTON. It is.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think you will find out differently.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think not. I think the hon. gentleman took the ground that when trade resumed its normal condition, the revenue derived from the tariff as it existed then, would be sufficient for the needs of the country.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think my hon. friend will find, if he reads the Budget speech, that that was not the reason. My hon. friend from South Oxford won't say that was the excuse he gave.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Most undoubtedly it was.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend from South Oxford gave the excuse that he did not want to mix up the discussion with the trade question.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have given the reason the hon. gentleman assigned. I sat in this House and heard him assign that reason; I heard his Budget speech, I am a living witness, and know about it. I know the question was discussed in party caucuses. I know what the decision of the party was, I know what reasons he gave the party in refusing to augment the burdens upon the people of this country. I know, furthermore, that the position assumed by my hon. friend would have succeeded, and would have proved that his prognostications were correct, if he had remained Minister of Finance for two short years longer. Our revenue, in 1879, was $12,900,000 from customs; the revenue of the United States, in 1879, was $137,250,000. Now, we changed our tariff in 1879; the United States did not; and if we take the experience of the United States, passing from the depression to that condition of things when trade resumed its normal course, and find what the effect was upon the revenue of that country, we may fairly assume that a corresponding effect would have been produced upon our revenue if no change of tariff had been made. Now, Sir, in 1879 the United States revenue was $137,000,000; their revenue in 1880, after the depression had passed away, was $186,000,000, the increase of revenue in one year was $49,272,000. Now, the increase of revenue in this country between 1879 and 1880, providing our tariff had remained the same, would have been $4,650,000; the entire revenue would have been $17,544,000 in place of $12,900,000, if it had borne exactly the same proportion to the increased revenue of the United States between 1879 and 1880. If taxation had been no higher in 1880, this Government would have had a surplus of $3,100,000, and the assumption upon which my hon. friend proceeded would have been borne out triumphantly by the outcome. The policy of not increasing the burdens of the people, was a good one; it is the policy the Reform Government pursued upon all occasions. They were careful about increasing the expenditure they were careful about increasing the taxation, they were prudent in the management of our fiscal affairs; and in all these things their record has been in striking contrast to the record of their successors. These hon. gentlemen were imprudent, they were reckless, they increased the debt, they increased the taxes, they increased expenditure by fourteen million dollars, and they have piled upon the people of this country burdens under which they stagger to-day; they have piled upon people of this country burdens which, even if an honest, an economical Government comes into power, only long years of self-denial and economy will remove.

Now, to the next postulate, that their financial policy was honest and clean. How was it about the sweating of public contracts? How was it about the imprisonment of McGreevy and Connolly, and their pardon, because there were men upon the treasury benches more worthy to be in jail than they? How was it when Mr. McGreevy took his seat in this House with a cloud resting upon his reputation? I felt sorry for the man. I felt indignant that he had not had the moral courage to expose the whole of this thing from top to bottom, and to have shown that there were other men in this Chamber who were more worthy of punishment than he; that he had been simply goaded on by men who are enjoying the fruits and reaping the advantages of transactions for which he was punished. We saw him come in here escorted by the two Tory whips: he ought to have been introduced by the ex-Minister of Public Works and the present Postmaster General. How much money, Mr. Speaker, do you suppose the Government made by this contract sweating system? How many hundreds of thousands of dollars were diverted from their proper purposes of honest expenditure, and carried into that election fund? How many? And then this railway bonussing to the extent of $7,800,000 yet to pay, besides all the millions that have been paid on the same account—what has been done with that? How much good has the country got out of it? How much advantage does the Government reap from that? To what extent have they benefited by these subsidies? Have they taken 10 per cent, or 25 per cent toll, or what did they take? What do they propose to do with the Hudson Bay Railway grant of $2,500,000 to build a section of the road that will not cost more than $2,000,000? Are they to take $250,000 of the surplus for their election fund, as has been reported, and allow the contractors to take the other half of the surplus? Are these charges that have been made, true? Has the policy of the Government been a clean and honest policy? Why did they increase the mail subsidies to the Canadian Pacific Railway while a contest was pending in 1891 by order in Council? How much of it did the Canadian Pacific Railway give back to their election fund? Why did they give to the Canadian Pacific Railway 6,400 acres of land per mile for a railway already constructed, that they knew, and every man knew, the company had built for its own purposes, and would have built anyway? Why have they squandered the area of an empire in putting bogus railway schemes upon their feet, and investing speculative companies with the possession of franchises of enormous value, when they knew, and every man knew, that these companies were not intended to proceed with their work, but intended simply to hawk these charters around the country for sale? How pure was their transaction when they gave away 25,000 square miles of Dominion timber limits to their friends? What were the motives that actuated them in building the Tay canal, the Trent Valley canal, and the Curran bridge, and changing the contract for Sheik's dam? Has their record been an honest and clean record? I deny that such is the case. They have been engaged in humbugging the people. They have been engaged in denying to the people that which could alone conduce to their prosperity. They have made no attempt to secure reciprocity. They have palmed off upon the people their absurd schemes for promoting trade with Australia, trade with South Africa, trade with the West Indies, trade with these outlying countries that could not all together furnish a trade of $2,000,000; and the Government offer this as a substitute for that market of 67,000,000 of people at our doors. They have been the paid agents of the monopolies, and rings, and combines; and they have sat in this House and upon the treasury benches, and have shaped the legislation of the country to promote the interests of this small fraction of its population, regardless of the interests of the agriculturist, of the miner, of the fisherman, of the lumberman, and of the labourer; and they have received from these interests, as a compensation for their services, the funds that have kept them in power. Have their laws been salutary laws? Look at their Gerrymander Act, which gives to 300,000 Liberal voters in Ontario less power than 200,000 Conservative voters, an infamous, cut-throat, assassin-like policy, borrowed from the United States with their National Policy. Was their Franchise Act a proper measure, when the Government took into their own hands the making of the lists and the printing of the lists? Do they tell us that the National Policy has secured them success in three elections, when they have at the same time been supported by the gerrymander, the Franchise Act, and boodle covering millions of dollars which have been acquired in the way I have described? No; in none of those respects are the claims they make before the House and the country founded on fact; and this Government is unworthy of the confidence of the people, unworthy of their confidence either as regards their fiscal policy, their general policy, or as to the manner in which they are discharging their trust, and for that reason I hope to see the Government replaced by a better one. I shall labour for that purpose and to that end, and I shall consider it a godsend to this country if ever the efforts for securing such change are crowned with success.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. AMYOT. Mr. Speaker, the important question now under discussion before this House attracts, naturally, our attention. I have done my best to study it so as to be able to give an intelligent vote and be able to understand fully the consequences of the decision in which I will share. The question, which has been mixed up with diverse side issues, is as to whether the protective policy adopted and followed since 1879 should be persevered in, or whether it should be changed. In order to understand exactly the position taken by the Liberal party, we must, I think, look back, and not be entirely satisfied with the motion which the future Finance Minister has presented. I think we have to go back as far as 1889 to understand exactly the meaning of his present motion. Under similar circumstances prevailing in that year, he proposed an amendment to a similar motion to that now in your hands, Mr. Speaker, and that amendment reads as follows:—

In the present condition of affairs, and in view of the recent action of the House of Representatives of the United States, it is expedient that steps should be taken to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity of trade therewith.

In 1891, under similar circumstances, and with a new Parliament, the hon. gentleman expressed the views of the Opposition in a motion in these terms:

That the situation of the country requires that the Government should forthwith reduce all duties on articles of prime necessity, and more particularly on those more generally consumed by artisans, miners, fishermen and farmers, and further, that the negotiations which the House has been informed will be opened in Washington in October next, be conducted so as to secure the most extended freedom of reciprocal trade between Canada and the United States in manufactures, as well as in natural products.

In 1893 the hon. gentleman moved another resolution, as follows:—

That the present Customs tariff bears heavily and unjustly upon the great consuming classes of the Dominion, and should be at once thoroughly reformed in the direction of freer trade, and that the amount of taxes collected be limited to the sum required to meet the necessities of the Government, with efficient and economical administration.

In 1894, the hon. gentleman moved another resolution:

That, while recognizing in the reductions proposed an admission to that extent of the injury inflicted on the people by the system of high protective duties, this House is, nevertheless, of the opinion that the amendments suggested, being based on the principle of protection, and not solely on the requirements of the public service, are inadequate to afford sufficient relief from the burdens of excessive and unfair taxation.

And further on the hon. gentleman said :

The tariff should be reduced to the needs of honest, economical and efficient government, and should have eliminated from it the principle of protection to particular industries at the expense of the community at large, and should be imposed for revenue only ; and it is the duty of the Government to make free, as largely as possible, the necessities of life and promote freer trade with the whole world, particularly with Great Britain and the United States.

Besides these motions submitted to the House, we have had speeches delivered by the leader of the Opposition in this country and in the United States ; and I think I am acting rightly in quoting from those speeches in order to show exactly the aim of the Liberal party in this House. On 12th February, 1891, Mr. Laurier wrote in the public press a letter setting out the then programme of his party, and I find in that programme the following sentence :—

The proposed reform is unrestricted reciprocity, the liberty of commerce between Canada and the United States.

On 17th November, 1891, the hon. gentleman went to Boston and attended a large meeting, and addressing the Americans, he said :

If you are willing to open to us your markets, we are quite willing also to open our markets to your products of all kinds, natural or manufactured.

Further on, he said :

We are willing, therefore, when a new treaty is negotiated between the two nations, that it shall not apply to one class, but to all classes of goods, whether natural or manufactured.

In Montreal, on 22nd January last, there was a large meeting held, and Hon. Mr. Laurier said there :

The programme is reciprocity of trade with our neighbours. * * The first item is condemnation of the present fiscal policy, the second is reciprocity of trade with our neighbours. * * This is the whole programme of the Liberal party.

Explaining that programme, the hon. gentleman said :

The Conservative party believe in protection, all their hope is in protection. The Liberal party believe in free trade on broad lines, such as exists in Great Britain.

A few days afterwards there was a meeting in Sohmer Park, and there the hon. gentleman said (I translate from the French) :

We will start by modifying the tariff with the object of obtaining a revenue, and will try to reduce the taxes to a minimum. The present system places the taxes at a maximum, not only on the consumer, but on the manufacturer.

* * * * *

Mr. AMYOT.

Protection is a fine thing, but only for some monopolies. It prevents the growing of our great natural industries. Now I have been asked, what we shall do ? We will have a tariff for revenue, and we will completely abolish the duties on raw materials.

A few days afterwards, on the 13th March, there was a large meeting at St. Roch, Quebec, but at that meeting not a word was said as to the fiscal policy of the Liberal party. The hon. leader of the Opposition was satisfied there with throwing out jets of eloquence, but he did not throw any light upon the programme of his party. Next he went to Lorette, in the neighbouring district, and there he said :

And, after all, if we have to choose between the farmers and the manufacturers, my choice would be speedily made. I would side with the farmer. I am not indulging in demagogism. I declared the same thing at Montreal, Quebec and Toronto. When the farmers are rich, the manufacturers are rich ; on the contrary, when the farmers are poor, the manufacturers are poor. The prosperity of the farmer, that is the national wealth.

Mr. Speaker, I might ask : What is the exact meaning or bearing of these diverse programmes ? I believe that a greater number of economic heresies are not to be found anywhere than in these addresses of the leader of the Opposition. He says that the farmer is the basis of national wealth, and that he would prefer the farmer to the manufacturer, but how can the farmer become rich if he has nobody to buy his goods ? If he goes to town and finds the manufacturing closed and the labouring classes idle or going away, to whom will he sell his products ? I will quote another extract from a speech delivered by the leader of the Opposition at Lachute, on the 8th March, 1895. He said :

In the first place, farming does not pay, because farm products have fallen in value. The Government does not control this matter, but what I blame the Government for is, because you have to take free-trade prices for your goods, and you have to give high tariff prices for your materials.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) at present before the House, concludes by advocating a tariff for revenue only. And so, reciprocity is given up entirely by the Liberal party, and we have a right to ask the leader of the Opposition and his friends : Why do you give up reciprocity ? You proposed that system in 1889, you have repeated the proposal constantly before this House in your official motions, you have repeated it from hustings to hustings and in the press for many years, and why have you given it up ? There is only one reason, Mr. Speaker, which I can discover. It is because the Hon. Edward Blake is coming back to this country and he has already declared that the unrestricted reciprocity asked for by his then colleagues, was treason to Canada, was the giving up of our authority over our customs, was the giving up of our autonomy, was the giving up of Canada to the United States, was sacrificing the tie which binds Canada to England, and was disturbing the present and the future of Canada. With his loud voice, the Hon. Edward Blake has condemned that project. In spite of that, and when he left the country, the Liberal party continued saying, that they would ask for reciprocity, but now when they see that Mr. Blake, who is their schoolmaster, is coming back, they give up reciprocity. At all events if such is not the reason, why do they not give us their reasons? They must have a reason; what is it? What change has taken place in the American market, or in the American condition of affairs, or in American manufactures to cause them to give up their plan of unrestricted reciprocity? One thing is certain, they have gone back on that policy and they now want a tariff for revenue only. Let me ask them: What is your revenue tariff? In the years 1868, 1874, 1879 and 1894, we had our principal tariffs in this country, and they were all revenue tariffs. In 1879 we made a tariff subordinate to the interests of protection, but it was a revenue tariff; and last year we amended our tariff, but we always have framed it in such a way as to have sufficient revenue for the wants of the country. Then what is the distinction between the tariff policy of the Liberal party and the tariff policy of the Conservative party? The Liberals have given one often. They have said that they want to take away from the tariff all vestige of protection, and they want to make a tariff in such a way that it will, as nearly as possible, amount to "free trade as they have it in England." Such is the programme which we have to guess at between the lines in the motion before the House. Let me ask, Mr. Speaker, will they tax the raw material with their revenue tariff? There are many hon. members of the Liberal party around me and let them answer that question. I would like a straight answer to that. The juggling of figures by millions and millions is all very fine, but the people of this country have a right to know whether or not the Liberal party propose to tax the raw material. At Montreal, Mr. Laurier declared most emphatically that the raw material would not be taxed, and perhaps many a manufacturer in Montreal, admiring his eloquence, said to himself: I will vote for that man who is so brilliant and who will protect the manufacturers by not taxing the raw material. But, Sir, if the Liberals do not tax the raw material they will not take away every vestige of protection. Again let me ask: Does the Liberal party propose to tax the produce of the farm? That is another question to which we have a right to know the answer, because they must go before the country with an open programme. I suppose their tariff for revenue only means pretty much the same tariff as they had when they were in power before, but still we have to guess at what it means, and I ask them: Will they not be good enough to come straight before this House and say, that their proposed tariff means this and nothing else. I challenge the Liberal party to declare to the House whether or not they will tax the raw material, and whether or not they will tax the products of the farm. At all events for the present, we have to deal with their statement, that they will endeavour by their tariff to remove the last vestige of protection. I ask myself, what will be the effect of that? Seeing in the press so many contradictory contentions, and hearing speakers either in this House or on the hustings expressing views so diametrically opposed to each other, I thought proper for my own information to institute an inquiry. I will not use the results of an inquiry made in 1878, as the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) did this afternoon. I will use facts as they are at the present time, and I beg to draw the attention of hon. gentlemen of the left to them. I prepared some questions and sent them to manufacturers carrying on business in the division which elects the hon. leader of the Opposition. It is perhaps the most liberal division in the province of Quebec. I could not find one which would be more unlikely to give answers favourable to the policy of the Government, though I wanted to ascertain the truth, and I thought that any answer favourable to the policy of the Government I might obtain there could not be looked upon as from partisans. I will give the names of the parties whom I addressed, and their answers. The first answer I received was from Messrs. Cantin & Bresse. It is as follows:—

Question.—Since what date has your establishment been in operation? Answer.—Two years.

Question.—How many persons do you employ? Answer.—Forty persons.

Question.—What is the total amount of wages paid by you yearly? Answer.—$13,000.

Question.—What is the effect, as regards your establishment, of the duties imposed by the Canadian tariff on products similar to yours manufactured abroad? Is it advantageous or disadvantageous? Answer.—Advantageous.

Question.—Are the said duties a sufficient protection for your establishment? Answer.—Yes.

Question.—What would be the effect of the abolition of the duties? Answer.—Against my industry.

Question.—How many persons do you estimate are employed in the leather industry in Quebec? Answer.—12,000 persons.

The second set of answers is from A. Pion & Company. Their establishment has existed for twenty years; they employ 75 people, and they pay $22,100 in wages every year. According to them, the present duty of 17½ per cent is not sufficiently high; it should be made 25 per cent. In answer to the question regarding the effect of the abolition of the duties, they say :

The effect of the abolition of those duties would be advantageous, provided our products would be received free of duties in other countries.

Mr. LANGELIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. AMYOT. These, the hon. member for Quebec Centre knows, are strong Liberals, their establishment having existed for twenty years, is so strong that they would be in favour of free trade in their line, although they find, as conditions are now, with the protective duties which they have to meet in the United States, that our duties should be increased from 17½ to 25 per cent. I will next give the answers from Mr. John Ritchie. His establishment dates from 1879, and he employs 375 men, and pays $80,000 annually in wages. He says that the present duties, so far as his trade is concerned, are about right. If the duties on raw material should advance, the present tariff on shoes will not be sufficient. I ask him what would be the effect of the abolition of the duties—and now I will see whether we shall have “hear, hear,” from the hon. member for Quebec Centre. The answer is, “ruinous.” I ask him how many persons are employed in the leather industry in the city of Quebec, and he answers, about 6,000 people. The next answers are from Mr. H. Griffith. His establishment dates from 1883, he employs about 150 people, and he pays wages to the amount of about $37,000 annually. He says the effect of the tariff is advantageous, and he adds :

Several articles of machinery for the manufacturing of boots and shoes, also what is termed findings, would, if admitted free of duty, be of great advantage for the boot and shoe industry, not only of Quebec, but of the Dominion at large.

He says that the duties are sufficient protection for his establishment. I ask him what would be the effect of the abolition of the duties. His answer is “ruinous.” I next take the answers of G. Bresse & Co. Their establishment dates from 1869; they employ 500 people, and pay $140,000 of wages annually. They say the effect of the tariff is advantageous, but would require to be higher in certain lines. They require more protection, especially in fancy goods, a great quantity of which are still imported. I ask them what will be the effect of the abolition of the duties, and they give me a detailed answer, which I translate, as follows :—

The complete abolition of the tariff could have no other effect than to reduce to an insignificant figure the amount of our operations, for the reason that American manufacturers work on a much larger scale, are infinitely ahead of us in their machinery, get their leather in their own country, and have tanneries much ahead of ours.

Mr. AMYOT.

We have to import from the United States part of our green hides for the upper leather, all the leather for soles, and a great part of the fine leather, such as goat-skin, patent calf-skin, &c. The abolition of the customs duties would favour the importation of boots and shoes. We believe that after one year their manufacture in Canada would amount to very little, if to that we add the spirit of enterprise of the American people and their way of doing business. They will always be ready to sell at any sacrifice, so as to take hold of a foreign market, and we fear that they would be disposed to sell their goods in Canada much cheaper than in the United States.

They say that the number of people employed in that industry is from 3,500 to 4,000 people. The next set of answers comes from Mr. F. Gourdeau, whose industry is that of a currier. His establishment has existed for eighteen years; he employs from 80 to 100 men, and pays $35,000 in wages every year. He says that the effect of the tariff is advantageous, but should be made higher for certain articles. He says the present duties afford a sufficient protection for the leather made in Canada or imported without paying duties, but not for leathers subject to a duty of 15 per cent. I ask him what would be the effect of the abolition of the duty, and he answers :

For us it would be ruinous, and we believe it would have the same result for the industry of leather in general.

He believes that at least ten thousand people are employed in the leather industry in Quebec. Now, let us see what Mr. H. Polley says. He is asked: How long is your establishment been in operation? Nine years, he replies. He employs 100 people and pays $50,000 in wages. He says the National Policy constitutes a sufficient protection for him. I ask him what would be the effect of the abolition of the duty, and he answers:—It would close up our establishment. How many persons are employed in your industry altogether? Six thousand, he replies. Let us take Mr. Elie Turgeon, tanner, of St. Roch. His establishment dates from 1840. He has a small establishment, employing fifteen people, but he pays $9,650 wages per year. He says: The protective tariff should be maintained upon all the leather and boots made in other countries. The tariff should be made higher, especially upon don-gola. He would be against commercial union because it would ruin his industry. The tariff should be made higher on black leather made in foreign countries, because in spite of the actual tariff, a great quantity of that leather still comes from the United States. I ask him what would be the effect of the abolition of those duties? It would be the ruin of our leather industry, he says, in which from ten to twelve thousand people are employed in Quebec. What does G. H. Larochelle of Quebec, boot and shoe manufacturer, say? His establishment exists since five years. He employs between 125 and 130 people, and pays about $600 per week in wages, or $30,000 a year. He says the effect of a protective tariff is advantageous, but that higher duties are required. I ask him what would be the effect of the abolition of the duty. It would kill the manufacture of boots and shoes, in which about 6,000 people are employed in that line. Here is Mr. Max Frankenberg. This gentleman is an Englishman from Manchester, where he is a large manufacturer of india-rubber. He sells a great many of his goods to the States, but seeing that in Canada we have a protective tariff, he conceived the idea of establishing a branch of his manufacture in Quebec. He obtained a small bonus from the corporation, bought a property and laid down his engines, but he found that some of the raw material he has to employ is so heavily taxed that he will not be able to go on unless he receives a further protection in the way of a reduction on raw material. Mr. Frankenberg answers me as follows:—

My establishment has been in operation seven months. I employ 200 to 400 hands and pay $75,000 to $100,000 in wages every year. The effect of the tariff is advantageous, but it would be more so if raw materials were admitted free. The actual protection is not sufficient. On proofed cloth in pieces, the duty ought to be 32½.

I asked him what would be the effect of the abolition of the duties. He answered:

Removing my works to the United States.

That is, if we abolish protection and adopt a revenue tariff he will have to remove his establishment to the United States. And he gave the reason:

I will have to remove to the United States, where my industry will be protected, and my losses in this country will have been enormous.

To give an idea of the value of this industry to the population of Quebec, he writes me as follows:—

Your letter of yesterday to hand. In reply I beg to say that my contract with the corporation is thus: They granting me a bonus of $2,500 per year for five years, payable at the end of every year, on condition that I employ one hundred hands; and that I must lay down machinery sufficient for such number of hands, and that I must establish the manufactory within six months from the date of the local parliament passing the grant of the bonus, and in the event of my failing to establish the works within the time specified, to pay a penalty of $500.

That I deposit $300 as security for expenses to be incurred by the corporation in applying to the local legislature. In the event of such legislature passing the grant and I should change my mind in the meantime, to forfeit the above deposit and pay the additional amount of $200, making the $500 mentioned.

I deposited the $300 in October, 1894, and the local legislature passed the grant.

Now, a great many of our manufacturers to whom we have applied have answered: Oh, we see that what you want is to strike at our chief, Mr. Laurier; we will not give you any answer. What is the average of the answers I have received? Ten manufacturers employ 1,756 hands and pay in wages $600,000 a year. Ask one of those manufacturers, how is it that you are in favour of protection and Mr. Laurier? Mr. Laurier tells you that he will establish free trade and yet you support him. Oh, he answers, Mr. Laurier is not serious, he will never do it. What is the inference to be drawn from that? The hon. member from Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) is here and he hears me. He knows that the whole city of Quebec, more especially St. Sauveur and St. Roch, live exclusively on the leather industry.

Mr. LANGELIER. They export to England.

Mr. AMYOT. The hon. gentleman knows the contrary. He knows that they provide only the local market, and that they cannot sell in England because the English people themselves manufacture boots and shoes too cheaply. I say that the whole of St. Roch and St. Sauveur live on this industry, and I challenge the hon. gentleman to ask for an inquiry and examine those manufacturers under oath. He knows that they would say under oath: If you take away protection, we will have to close our establishments. If the policy of free trade or revenue tariff should prevail, over 8,000 heads of families in Quebec would be deprived of work, and that would mean that over 20,000 people would be without a means of subsistence. What would be the consequence? The farmers in Bellechasse, Montmorency, Quebec County, Portneuf, Lévis and other surrounding places would be deprived of a market for their produce. When they came to Quebec and found nobody earning any wages and no market, where else would they go to become rich? Now, in Quebec, those who do not work in the manufacturing industries are grocers or milkmen or joiners or men of other avocations; but if they have nobody to work for, what will become of them? Therefore, the policy of the Opposition will have the effect of killing the city of Quebec by destroying its industries. Many of those who answered my inquiries are Liberals, and the others who did not answer would have given the same reply did they not fear being obnoxious to their chief who speaks so well. But the whole appeal to Parliament is: Please keep up protection in this country or we will be ruined. What has been said with regard to the leather industry. Mr. Speaker, may be said of all the other industries of the country. Take, for instance, the sugar industry. If you remove the protection on sugar, some of the large manufacturers in the United States will invade this country with cheap sugar, and will make any sacrifice to kill the sugar industry here. And they will succeed in choking it, and then all our people employed in this manufacture would be deprived of work. But we are told that Mr. Redpath makes millions. Suppose he makes a million, is it not as well that a Canadian should make a million as that an American should make it? Suppose that after selling his sugar very cheap and making an eighth or a tenth or a sixteenth of a cent per pound, he makes a million or two millions, who suffers by it? Somebody has to make a profit; the manufacturer is supposed to make large profits, because his sales are large. I say it is better that these manufacturers who make money out of things they sell in Canada should be Canadians rather than Americans; and if Mr. Redpath and others make millions, I am well satisfied, because they sell me my sugar very cheap. And they cannot do otherwise, because there is competition in the country, many being occupied in refining sugar here, and, besides, the tariff is made in such a way that if the Canadian refiners sought to make exorbitant profits, immediately the American sugar would come into the country and undersell the Canadian product. What I say about sugar applies to all the other industries; the brass industry, glass, furniture, ship-building, and so on. So far as ship-building is concerned, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the Government will seriously consider this great question. For my part, I would be willing to make any sacrifice to encourage iron ship-building in our country. I would be ready, and I know the people at large would be ready, to vote millions for that purpose. We are able to carry on that industry; we are well situated for it. That industry requires protection, and heavy protection at the start. But, this given, we are sure to succeed. Years ago, we had a large industry in the building of wooden ships. But these have been supplanted by ships of iron construction. We should do our utmost to start ship building in iron, which would employ many people in this country and give rise to so many other industries. We have seen what would be the effect of the proposed tariff upon manufacturing industries. What would be the effect upon agricultural industries. Let us see in what condition the United States are in this regard. On the 10th December last, in the House of Representatives at Washington, Mr. Hatch moved the following, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture:—

Whereas, the current market prices of the principal agricultural staples have declined about half their former rates, and are sold, in many instances, at and below the cost of production; and whereas such a condition must tend to the elimination of the independent land-owning farmer and his replacement by a dependent peasant tenantry, which, unless prevented, will not only prove detrimental to agricultural and the kindred industries, but also to the perpetuity of American institutions: Therefore, resolved, that the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives be, and are hereby directed to inquire into the causes of the depression of American agricultural staples, and the relative condition of agriculture to the manufacturing industries, and report the same to the House with such suggestions as they may deem proper regarding the differences or inequalities, if any exist, so far as they are caused by legislation, or as legislation can remedy them.

So here we have an official admission that in the United States farm products have diminished by one-half in value. And yet we want that country of 65,000,000 people, exporting domestic products to the amount of $831,000,000 a year, to be allowed free competition with our farmers. This is the most extraordinary proposition that ever was dreamed of. Hon. gentlemen say that the Liverpool market rules the prices for America. Let us admit that for the sake of argument. Let us suppose that wheat at this moment is worth 50 cents a bushel, or a dollar a bushel, in Liverpool. Then, at this moment, it would be worth the same in Quebec, Toronto, or New York, and you wish that we should allow American wheat to come in free. My answer is that the Canadian farmer has the right of privilege in the local market. The Canadian farmer should be allowed to sell his wheat first, then, when he has sold the whole of his wheat, let the American wheat come in. If the American wheat is worth the same price as our wheat, give a better price to our wheat by a duty imposed upon the American product. It is not only a question of equality of prices, but it is a question of giving the local market to the Canadian farmer. I have spoken of wheat, but I might speak of all the other farm products in the same way. Those products represent a value of $350,000,000 a year, of which $50,000,000 are exported and $300,000,000 sold in Canada. That shows the value of the Canadian market to the farmer, and I contend that it is our bounden duty to protect the Canadian producer by securing for him the Canadian market. I will not go into the details of the exportation of the United States in that line of products, because the hon. Controller of Customs went over that yesterday. Now, we frequently hear it said: we want free trade as they have it in England. On that subject we have had the authority of the hon. members of the left in this House; we will seek some other witnesses now. I will translate from Jules Domergue, in his book entitled "Comedy of Free Trade," published in 1891. On page 84, he says this:

Our neighbour (England) has been sensible enough to become by means of prohibited measures the first marine power of the globe.

During nearly two centuries, any merchandise in destination to England or her possessions, had, under penalty of paying double duties (and those duties were then pretty high), to be transported upon an English ship, belonging to an Englishman, built in England, commanded by an Englishman, and provided with an English crew.

Such were the prescriptions of the Navigation Act, only abrogated in 1849, and passed in 1660. That is, in two words, how England became mistress of the seas. It is from her island, to-day the warehouse of Europe, that the manufactured products on the continent, ours amongst others, are directed to their ultimate destination.

Whilst I have the honour and advantage of holding the floor, I think I could not better occupy the time which I am allowed, than by reading to the House a quotation from Mr. Jules Poincard, a French economist who wrote last year some of the reasons why England has become a free trade country. There will be nothing in these lines but glory and praise of the English people, and in fact any one who has read that book will necessarily become an admirer of the English people. He begins by a quotation from Montalembert :

Montalembert has said it in his own matchless words : " There is within Europe, within seven leagues of Paris, within sight of our northern shores, a people whose empire is vaster than that of Alexander or the Caesars—a people at once the most powerful, the richest, the most manly, the most daring and the best ordered to be found in the world. No nation presents a more instructive study, a more original aspect, more striking contrasts.

" Eager for conquests and discoveries, the Englishman wanders and rushes to the ends of the earth, and then returns imbued with an affection deeper and intenser than ever for his native land, and more jealous than ever of her stability and her venerable dignity and greatness. The Englishman is gifted with an originating energy that nothing can appall, and a perseverance that no obstacle can overcome.

Further on he says :

By thus holding aloof from political influences the English succeeded in preserving in full vigour their private manners, and these latter, modified by the exigencies of the times and of facts as they arose, have imprinted upon the race certain essential characteristics. The general practice of the duties of rural life, and the personal and permanent conduct of agricultural operations, have established in all classes the habit of industry and of self-reliance in constant vigilance and activity. This latter was fostered yet more by the extent and the power of the institutions of local government. The undivided transmission of property compelled the father of a family to train up his children to a sturdy, active life, in order to avoid leaving them unprepared to encounter the difficulties involved in the inevitable task of making their own way in the world. The very tradesman himself, though often but a temporary occupant of communal land, shared in that training.

Further on he says :

In short, the Anglo-Saxons constitute a race singularly vigorous and well fitted for action. Work sustained with energy from generation to generation, for fifteen centuries, has imbued the race with its own special qualities, and laid the foundations of its greatness. It is by the exercise of the useful arts, practised in all classes of society, with hardly any exception, that the race manifests its superiority, wheresoever nature requires the help of man. Work and the spirit of enterprise explain the fact that that race is, it would seem, about to over-run the world. Its whole history is summed up in those words, expressing, as they do, its power and accounting for its unfailing success. This is manifested unceasingly in daily practice, and inspires every manifestation of the national life, and even its very literature. English novels are, in the first place, truthful pictures, setting forth, not the silly or scandalous adventures of a so-called elegant and aristocratic life, but the precise and useful actions of a real life, and are fraught with good examples and manly counsel.

Further on he says :

We have already referred to the great changes operated during the eighteenth century in the fundamental conditions of property and agriculture. After 1750, there came a revolution of a like fundamental kind in English industry, a revolution which, in less than sixty years, wholly modified the relative position of agriculture and manufactures. Manufacturing industry, which had up to that time remained in all but embryotic condition, in a few southern and midland towns, then began a rapid movement, which has been accelerated ever since from year to year. This is the result of a radical reform in implements and the substitution of mechanical motors for human strength in the handling of machinery. After 1750, and in quick succession, were accomplished six great discoveries destined to transform the conditions of labour : in 1769 Arkwright invented his water-frame, in 1770 Crompton his mule, in 1792 Kelly his self-acting mule.

These inventions found a multiplier in the steam-engine, which, patented by Watt in 1769, was applied in 1785 to the cotton industry, the very year in which Cartwright constructed his power loom.

Coincidentally with this improvement in the industrial implements, came a great advance as to rapidity, thoroughness and perfection in the methods of labour. Thus, smelting with coke was inaugurated in 1740. This was a priceless discovery for a country stripped of timber ; the metallurgical industry is indebted to it for the leading element of its importance. In 1788 steam bellows were applied to the fusing of iron. In 1793 the invention of the flying shuttle greatly simplified the process of hand-weaving ; mechanical weaving sixty years later operated a perfect revolution in the textile industry. Chemical works, the making and dyeing of cloth, the manufacture of delf, pottery and porcelain made immense strides between 1750 and 1815. Lastly, the subdivision of labour, which was early adopted on a large scale to nearly all branches of production imparted to them a mighty impulse.

Since that period the movement in advance has not only continued, but it has gained in speed. To say nothing of the more perfect product resulting from the mere fact of using machinery, it is safe to say, that within the last fifty years great industries have sprung up into new life. Metallurgy has adopted as to smelting and as to steel in particular, processes of wonderful efficacy and power. The same is true as to tanning, in which time, space and products have been economized.

And that is one of the reasons why the tanners of Quebec do not sell in England :

This applies also to paper-making and printing. The textile industries and their products have not lagged behind, and we all know the variety, richness and economy which have been attained therein to-day. England, in short, was the first country which succeeded in applying machinery to most branches of labour, and in establishing the great workshop. In this way she took twenty-five years' start of all her competitors, and has always kept it.

Further on he says :

From all these causes, the improvement in machinery and the method of using it in a country otherwise richly supplied, and occupied by an energetic and highly gifted race of people, the consequence was, the development in the United Kingdom of an enormous growth of manufactures. Let us endeavour to measure its extent.

Again he says :

The situation which has carried England on to free trade is at once simple and manifest : the immense development of manufactured products necessitated the opening up of new markets, for this reason, that this increased production far exceeded the capacity of the home market to absorb it. Now, when people produce, it is in order to sell, and when customers are wanting at home, it is well to go in quest of them at a distance.

That is exactly what the English do, and we shall see what means they took to increase their customers in proportion to the growth of their manufactures.

Further on he says :

With respect to manufactured products, there is but a small part of them that can pretend to enter into English consumption in competition with similar ones of local origin. Certain manufactures have indeed succeeded in forcing themselves, in some sort, on the English market, but it is necessary to see under what conditions. The industry of refining sugar, for example, has almost disappeared in England. The competition of the continent succeeded in destroying it. Let us see what it cost to do it. The Governments of France, Germany, Austria, Holland, Russia, and Belgium agreed to pay to the exporters of native sugar, under different forms, high premiums, enabling them to sell the exported article abroad at a very low price. In this manner the English consumer can purchase sugar at a low price, for which the inhabitants of the countries mentioned have to pay double, and even more.

Behold, then well settled, well defined, the type of a country of free trade. It is so, not through the effect of a sentimental, unprofitable and chimerical theory, of a priori artificially combined system, but, "in truth," by the powerful and logical result of a long course of natural circumstances which pushed forward English production to the greatest extent possible. The economical policy of England has been successful, and remains unchangeable, because it is directed by special facts, by the wants which imperiously obtrude themselves.

I draw attention to this fact :

To take England as a pattern, without possessing its natural resources, its social organization, wonderfully worked out, its economical and technical advance, and to wish to enter into rivalry with her, this is to go into battle with unequal forces, it is to expose oneself to a competition impossible to be sustained. We find numerous proofs of it in the course of this work. But we shall study first the economical condition of some countries which, without presenting the amplitude of figure of the British Colossus, are, however, brought also to practice free trade naturally and for analogous reasons.

Mr. AMYOT.

This is the reason why England is a free trader. France has had to give up free trade in spite of all her economic writers. If I had more time at my disposal I would go on reading from these authorities, but I will not abuse the patience of this House by giving the reasons why France, Spain, Germany, Italy and Russia are protectionist countries. But it has been admitted this afternoon that England has suffered from free trade so far as her agriculture is concerned. I have many quotations at hand to prove it, but as so many quotations have already been given to the House it will be useless, perhaps, to increase the number. But why is England suffering in its agricultural departments from her free trade policy ? Because the economic situation of nations has changed. There are agricultural communities in hot countries where the land cost but a trifle, and where for 10 cents a day a man can be fed and clothed, and from these countries agricultural products can be transported to almost any part of the world for almost nothing. If free trade prevails in a country, the farmers of that country are called upon to meet the competition of the farmers of Russia, South America, the Southern States and all other countries where there is cheap farming. Here in Canada we have to pay taxes levied by the local governments and municipal institutions, we have to endure our severe winter, we must dress heavily, and be fed in a particular way, and we must spend a great deal of money on the education of our children. All these items involve a large outlay, and at the same time our summers are short ; and so when we have a bushel of wheat to sell, that wheat has cost a large amount to grow. By adopting a free trade policy you bring the Canadian farmer's wheat in competition with the wheat of other countries which has not cost to grow more than one-tenth that sum, and the transportation of which will not amount to more than one or two cents a bushel. We have only to consider the position of the United States. There they complain that the prices of their agricultural products have decreased over one-half. Why ? On account of the competition of other countries of the world. Let protection to agricultural products be abolished and on the very next day Canadian farmers will suffer immensely. I had prepared notes to explain the term free trade as applied in England, and to establish that in England while they collect over seventy millions in taxes, yet only one-fourth of this amount is collected from customs ; but that subject having already been treated at length I will not further discuss it. We have listened this afternoon to a lecture upon the effect of protection in the United States, in which it was stated that protection has been useless there and that a revenue tariff proved more favourable in its results. I deny that proposition in toto. I will not occupy the attention of the House by reading any more quotations. I have in my hand Alexander Hamilton's report on manufactures, 1791; President Washington's last annual address, 1796; President Madison's special message, 1809; Thomas Jefferson's letter to Benjamin Austin, Boston, 1816; President Monroe's address, 1817; President Adam's message, 1828; Ex-President Adams' address to his constituents, 1844; James Buchanan's speech in the House of Representatives on the Tariff Bill of 1824, and many other quotations. These all show that a revenue tariff destroyed the industries of the country. But I cannot refrain from reading the following extract in answer to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) this afternoon :—

The history of free trade and protection in the United States, a country having so many points of resemblance to our own, is more instructive to us as a modern example. In the language of Dr. Carey, one of the most vigorous writers :

"Protection ceased in 1818, bequeathing to free trade a commerce that gave an excess import of specie, a people among whom there existed great prosperity, a large public revenue, and a rapidly diminishing public debt."

Free trade ceased in 1824, bequeathing to protection a commerce that gave an excess export of specie, an impoverished people, a declining public revenue, and an increased public debt.

Now, protection began in 1824, and here is the result :

Protection ceased in 1834-35, bequeathing to free trade a commerce that gave an excess import of specie, a people more prosperous than any that had ever been known, a revenue so great that it had been rendered necessary to emancipate tea, coffee, and many other commodities from duty, and a treasury free from all charge on account of public debt.

Free trade ceased in 1842, bequeathing to protection a commerce that gave an excess export of specie, a people ruined and their Government in a state of repudiation, a treasury bankrupt, and begging everywhere her loans at the highest rate of interest, revenue collected and disbursed in irredeemable paper money, and a very large foreign debt.

Protection ceased in 1849, bequeathing to free trade a commerce that gave an excess import of specie, a highly prosperous people, state Governments restored to credit, a rapidly growing commerce, a large public revenue, and a declining foreign debt.

So, Mr. Speaker, every time they had protection in the United States since they have become an independent country, they prospered, and so soon as the dreams of the economists brought in free trade, or revenue tariff, depression began, and went on until they got the proper remedy by protection again.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Are you in favour of protection ?

Mr. AMYOT. Mr. Speaker. We have been speaking of Mr. Gladstone in this House, and I will quote what Mr. Gladstone himself said. I take this quotation from a book entitled "Protection and Free Trade," by Mr. Hurlbert, page 102:

When Mr. Gladstone, an out-and-out free trader in theory, was called upon, while Finance Minister, by the free traders of Liverpool to throw off the shilling duty on corn instead of reducing the income tax—for, they said, to retain the duty on corn was inconsistent with free trade, which they were supposed to have adopted—his answer was a very remarkable one for a scholar of Cobden and Bright, though it would have been perfectly natural had he been a protectionist, not as immutable truths, but as policies, wise or unwise, according to circumstances. Gentlemen, said Mr. Gladstone, free trade in theory, no doubt, is right, but have mercy on us while in office.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Are you in favour of protection yourself ?

Mr. AMYOT. The hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) has been acting like a little mosquito, and he wants to put some questions which he thinks will trouble me. I am for protection of common sense and the hon. gentleman does not seem to respect it. That is the answer he deserves. He does not put his questions to get information, but he only throws them out to put obstacles in the way of a gentleman he is not able to disturb; he is too small.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I have a speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Amyot) here in which he says he is not in favour of protection.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. AMYOT. What is the matter with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Choquette). Is he sick? If so I would entrust him to the care of my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Landerkin). If what I say is too hard a pill for him, let him go outside and take fresh air and the House will get rid of him for a time.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I have your own speech here.

Mr. AMYOT. Now, Mr. Speaker, what has been the consequence of protection in Canada? On that point I will not repeat what I said elsewhere. I printed it in the press, and I challenge contradiction, and I printed it subsequently in pamphlet form, and I still challenge contradiction. My conclusions were the following :—

A protective tariff has created and developed thousands of manufactories, employed over 100,000 labourers additional, gives millions of dollars additional in wages, contributes to the diminution of the cost of manufactured articles, makes us independent of the monopolies of the other countries, develops the agricultural industry, increases the value of the products of the farm, encourages the farmers to join together to add to the quality and value of their products, ameliorates the home market, increases the foreign market, has brought a stop to emigration in large numbers, and has brought in repatriation and colonization, keeps Canadian gold in the country, insures the solidity of our financial institutions, increases the national credit, develops our marine, consolidates the work of confederation, and makes the colonial tie the firmer.

I will not go into details, but I will take as a proof the external commerce of the country. In 1874 the total commerce of Canada, imports and exports, amounted to $217,000,000 in round numbers. Instead of increasing, in the following year it decreased, and in 1875 it was brought down to $200,000,000. In 1876 it decreased to $174,000,000; in 1877, it was $175,000,000, and in 1878 it amounted to $172,000,000. Therefore our total trade had decreased from 1874 to 1878 by $45,168,000. Here was a decrease of $9,000,000 a year in our commerce with other countries during the five years that the Liberal party were in power in Canada. Let us take now our trade during another period when Canada was under a protective policy. From a total of $172,000,000 in 1878, our trade was in 1894, $1,857,000,000, and in 1893 it amounted to $240,000,000, while in 1879, a year for which the tariff of the Liberal Government is responsible our total trade was only $153,000,000. Therefore, our trade increased from 1879 to 1894 by $87,000,000, making an increase of $5,000,000 a year under protection. In 1893 our trade was $247,000,000. It is true that during the year 1894 our trade fell off $7,000,000, but, Mr. Speaker, Canada is not the only country where there was depression during that year. In the United States the total foreign trade was in 1893, $1,857,000,000, and in 1894 it only amounted to $1,714,000,000, making a decrease for that year of $143,000,000 in the external commerce of the United States. Now, let us take what happened in England. In 1892-93 the trade of England was £631,000,000 sterling, and in 1893-94, it was £628,000,000 sterling, a diminution of £2,351,000 sterling or about $11,000,000. The depression which has caused the diminution of our outside commerce was experienced in England. I find in Hazell's Annual of 1895, the following:—

The year has not come up to the sanguine expectations formed in many quarters; but, on the whole, allowance being made for the fall in prices and for many unsatisfactory conditions which are passing away, it is probable that a steady, though slow, improvement will show itself during the next twelve months. After so serious a period of depression as we have passed through, a rapid advance is improbable, and even undesirable.

I will quote from the same work the divers items in which commerce has been depressed in England:

Coal.—The course of the market has been a steadily downward one.

Copper.—The downward movement in prices, which continued pretty steadily in progress throughout 1893, continued through a considerable part of 1894.

Cotton.—The movement of cotton prices, like those of so many other staples, has been in a steadily downward direction during the past year.

Mr. AMYOT.

Iron and steel.—The condition of this important branch of commerce still continues unsatisfactory, both absolutely and relatively to other industries.

Jute.—The market for this article has been, on the whole, a declining one throughout the year, with occasional rallies.

Linen and flax.—Flax prices were firm during the year, but the linen trade was not of a satisfactory character.

Shipping and ship-building.—The freight market throughout the year has been in a very unsatisfactory condition. Prices have ruled very low, and tonnage has been in superabundant supply.

Tea.—Prices have again ruled low this year.

Woollen goods.—The year has not been a satisfactory one so far as woollen and worsted goods are concerned.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is very easy to account for the diminution of trade in Canada last year, but under the protective policy our external trade has been constantly increasing, whereas under the revenue tariff it had been constantly decreasing.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Why, the object of the National Policy was to diminish our trade.

Mr. AMYOT. The object of the National Policy is first to increase the value of the local market; secondly, to manufacture more cheaply; and thirdly, to sell more goods in other countries. The object of the National Policy is to buy in larger quantities in other countries the raw materials which we have not in Canada, thus increasing our external commerce; and, when we have those raw materials, to work them up into manufactured articles, which we sell cheap in the country and export the surplus to other countries, increasing our commerce in that way, too. The hon. gentleman does not seem yet to understand what protection and its results are.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Your leader said that was the object of it.

Mr. AMYOT. If the hon. gentleman wants to speak I will hear him with pleasure, but I hope he will speak in such a tone that I shall understand him.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then you will have to be recreated.

Mr. AMYOT. We will give you recreation after the next election, and you will then have ample time for the recreation of the party. Now, Mr. Speaker, hon. gentlemen talk about having free trade as it exists in England. I say that England is not completely free trade. What is the law of England to prevent the importation of our live stock? Here is what a French author says about it, and I quote it as better authority than my own:

In England, the pretexts for prohibition are never missing. So, as our neighbours are desirous of protecting their cattle, they declare, on their own authority, that all foreign cattle are sick. In consequence, they shut their doors against those cattle. Do learn, if you ignore it, that sound cattle are only to be found in England—that from time immemorial the French stables have fallen from peri-pneumonia into cocotte, from cocotte into cackexy, from cackexy into bradypepsy, and from bradypepsy into all the epizootics, wherein John Bull finds his benefit.

That is the reason Canadian cattle are said to be in a state of disease. That is not the example of a nation wishing to be completely free trade. Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to say a few words about the speech delivered this afternoon. We have heard a great deal about the purity of the party, about gerrymandering, and so on. The first objection I heard to the protective tariff was that we have borrowed the gerrymander and protection from the United States. Mr. Speaker, I do not know how it is in Ontario, but in the province of Quebec the people at large complain that we have had no gerrymandering. In the district of Quebec, the county represented by the young gentleman who interrupted me a moment ago, Montmagny, is a county of about 10,000 people, while other members represent counties having 40,000 people. In other words, the votes in that county are worth four times the votes in other countries. If our Government had wanted to use its actual strength and power to give full justice to us in the province of Quebec, we would have had an equalization and a redistribution of counties so far as population and area are concerned, and we could have returned here a majority of 20 or 25 members, which we have not now. That is the position. There is no use in going around the country and saying that the Liberal party have been ill-treated by gerrymander Acts. In the province of Quebec the Conservative party has been entirely sacrificed; but we do not complain; we endure that; but, instead of receiving thanks from the left for that sacrifice, we have been daily insulted, and generally those who insult the most are those who represent the small counties. To show the purity of the party, Mr. Speaker, let me quote the figures. I find since the last election that 25 Liberals were unseated, while only 13 Conservatives were unseated. Of the 25 Liberals unseated, 16 were rejected on applying to their constituents for re-election, while of the 13 Conservatives unseated, only one was refused re-election. Of course they will preach purity. Oh, they say, Mr. McGreevy has been re-elected—what a corrupt party. But it is not brave to strike an old man when he has paid the penalty of the law.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He did not pay the penalty of the law.

Mr. AMYOT. I repeat it. But there is some thing to his credit—he preferred losing his seat in the House rather than divulge the secrets entrusted to his honour.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. AMYOT. I prefer shaking hands with that old man than with the one who divulged the secrets confided to his honour. I would not shake hands with pleasure with the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) who received these papers under promise of keeping them secret and who nevertheless published them in his newspaper. The one who divulged the secrets received a large part of the boodle money; the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. McGreevy) did not keep a cent of it. He gave it to his friends, to the hon. member for L'Islet, whom the Opposition admire. I do not approve of his actions; but is the party of hon. gentlemen opposite, which has been slaughtered by the courts, in a position to make reproaches? Do they forget the big push? Do they forget those subscriptions of past years? Do they forget those elections where $15,000 and $20,000 and $25,000 were spent to mesmerize the electors? When did these gentlemen get a chance to corrupt the electors and fail to use it? It is true the hon. member for Quebec West, who had gone too far, was wrong, but the electors of Quebec West have thought proper to re-elect him, and this Parliament has no right to deprive them of that liberty. They thought that he had acted nobly in going before the court and receiving his punishment, and in preferring to lose his seat rather than to the laws of honour.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Mr. AMYOT. Let the honourable and gallant knight who says "hear, hear," with such an air of purity come to Quebec and there indulge in his sneering laugh, and there he will meet electors who would be just as free in expressing their opinion as he is. The honourable and gallant knight was re-elected in his constituency although for five years he had led the country to the verge of bankruptcy, and we did not reproach him. I say that the fact that Mr. McGreevy was re-elected to this House does not prove for or against a revenue tariff; and hon. gentlemen opposite must be short indeed for an argument when they resort to such a one as that. We are told that protection is of no use to the farmers. How then is it that the farmers since 1879 do not want anything else? Does the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) think we are going to accept his dictum on that point in spite of the expressions of opinion given repeatedly at the polls by the farmers of this country? That hon. gentleman says that protection is no use to the manufacturers. If not, why do hon. gentlemen opposite call them legalized robbers and plunderers? They say it is of no use to the lumbermen. I would be glad for the present if that class would diminish and we could keep our raw material in the country. I should be glad if we could refrain from shipping it abroad and keep it in the country to manufacture it ourselves. But as matters are, lumbermen do benefit by the tariff. How do they benefit by it? They procure all their tools and their clothing cheaper. We cannot give them more protection than they have, and what protection they have suits them for we have heard no complaints whatever. Our fishermen are protected in spite of what the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says. They have their nets free, and we protect the three-mile limit in which they have the exclusive right to fish. Great use is made of the census to show that protection has not obtained the expected results. But there is one thing that surprises me. When hon gentlemen opposite quote the figures of 1881 and 1891, they forget that in 1881 we had experienced three years of protection. In those three years many an industry had been established and many thousands of dollars of capital invested. It is not just to compare 1881 with 1891, as being one a period of revenue tariff and the other a period of protection. I would rather take 1871 for comparison when we had a revenue tariff. Protection is blamed because we have built the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Intercolonial and deepened our canals and in this way incurred enormous expenditure. But it is always the same cry. Since confederation the Liberal party has been the enemy of all the great enterprises which have opened up Canada and made it a land of value. If we had not the Canadian Pacific Railway, we would not have the wheat of the North-west, we would not have those immense territories which give us the hope of becoming one of the first nations of the world. But what has that to do with a revenue tariff or free trade? I fail to see. They also speak disparagingly of our increase in population according to the census; but they should not forget that in 1881 they complained that the basis selected for the census was not a proper one, because we were counting as Canadians people who were only passing through the country as travellers. That system was blamed, and in 1891 a proper system was followed. Only those were entered who were really Canadians established in this country, so that we cannot really form an idea of the increase from the census figures, but we shall be able to do so when the next census is taken. That will show the real increase during the ten years between the censuses. They also point to raw material, and say that the import of that has not increased very much, but they forget that the raw material is not entirely taken from the United States or England. We have also our own raw material. We have our coal and our timber and our pulp and beet root and any amount of raw material at home, which we did not use when we had not the industries which have been created by protection and in which those raw materials are employed. In conclusion, let me say that I know I will be attacked personally as I was last year. Whenever I make a speech in this House, it is agreed that five or six Liberal members shall look through the pages of "Hansard" in order to find out something in my past speeches to contradict the present one, and they think that they have answered all my arguments when they show that in 1887 or 1889 I said something different. I will answer them in a few words, and we will see the value of the attacks. I have been a life-long Conservative. I was a candidate for this House in 1878 as a Conservative. I was defeated. I contested the election. That contest took four years, and the case came twice before the Supreme Court. At last, I unseated my opponent. I was again a candidate as a Conservative in 1881 and succeeded. My election was contested, but the contestation was dismissed with costs after enquete. In 1882 I was elected again as a Conservative. In 1885 came the Riel question, a question of sentiment and nationality. Yielding to the pressing requests of my political friends, I joined the national movement, and that national movement took me into the arms of the Liberal party. I was elected in 1887 as a National Conservative. There was no question of free trade or protection, then, in my country, the question was whether or not the Government had been right in hanging Riel—or rather, in my county, whether or not the Government had been right in saying to the province of Quebec: Ask for his pardon and you will get it, and then hanging him after all. In 1891, I was again a candidate as a National Conservative. A Liberal parish in my county refused to have me as a candidate, because I would not declare myself a Liberal. I wanted to be a National Conservative, and nothing else, while they said: We want either a Conservative or a Liberal, and we are Liberals. The question was submitted to the hon. leader of the Opposition, and he decided that I should be the candidate. And I have never forgotten that since; I have always thought I was in duty bound to recognize that fact publicly, and never deny it. I was a candidate, and in that year I accepted the programme of reciprocity. I never went so far as unrestricted reciprocity; what I favoured was a treaty of commerce with the United States such as we would make with France or any other country in the world. At all events—I do not deny it—I did my best to convince myself that something else was possible than protection. I did my best to convince myself that I could find something right in the Opposition. I strained every nerve, but it would not work. Mr. Speaker. There was always something lacking; there was always a weak spot somewhere. I asked them: What will you do to raise a revenue if you get reciprocity with the United States? But I could never get an answer. What would you do for a revenue under free trade? No answer. And when I questioned a member of the Left, What is your policy? Free trade, and another, What is your policy? Continental free trade. What is your policy? Commercial union. What is your policy? Unrestricted reciprocity. I found nearly as many policies as heads in that party. And I could not accept them all. I know, Mr. Speaker, that in my speeches they will probably find something in favour of reciprocity. And to-day let us have a good commercial treaty with the United States, and I will be in favour of it. Why not with the United States as well as with Cuba, with Spain, with France, with any country in the world? But not such a treaty as to give up our privileges, to give up our autonomy, to give up our control of our tariff, to give us our right to govern Canada. At all events, Mr. Speaker, suppose I was wrong, should I be justified in continuing in error for ever? When I decided to go back to my party, things had changed. Those men whom I had blamed, rightly or wrongly, were no more. But my party remained, my old friends remained, and my principles were what they had always been, and I thought it was my duty to go back. One day, after the death of Sir John Macdonald, I made a speech in this House and said the Conservative party was wrong to refuse to take Sir John Thompson as its leader because he was a Catholic. I said: You want a Protestant and, therefore, you take Sir John Abbott. Was I right or was I wrong? Later on, Sir John Abbott withdrew, and the Conservative party accepted Sir John Thompson. Was I not bound by my declaration then to go with him? And now that Sir John Thompson has departed this life, the Conservative party have taken Sir Mackenzie Bowell as their leader, and am I not bound to return the compliment of the other and join those Canadians who want to make a great nation here, who want to unite the people without distinction of creed or race, who want to do justice to all? I should not be true to myself and to my past if I did not try to join the party which works for union and for justice in this country. In two words, Mr. Speaker, that is the explanation of my career. I have been, and I am a Conservative. For a certain time, on a national sentiment I was a National Conservative. Being a National Conservative I had to work in the ranks of a party—without being mixed up with it—whose sentiments have never been the same as my own. I withdrew from it. On the day that I withdrew I offered the hon. leader of the Opposition my resignation. I told him that I wanted to go back to my constituents or to leave Parliament and return to my law office.

But he would not consent to that, and I could not impose upon him an election between two general elections. So I had to stay, and I did stay. But, staying here, I want to exercise my independence and my judgment, and to take my instruction from these official records and not from the imaginings of the hon. gentleman who spoke this afternoon. I cannot be ready to answer all he said. He said, or at least I understood him to say, that he had gone to Washington at the request of Sir John Thompson. I have not been able, since that time to have any communication with Sir John Thompson to learn whether that is true or not; but I am sorry that he did not leave some letters to that effect, or some Orders in Council, for it is unusual, I believe, for a Government to charge a private member of the Opposition with the important duty of representing it in negotiations with a foreign country.

Mr. SCRIVER. The hon. gentleman will excuse me. I understood my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to say, not that he was requested to go to Washington, but that he was requested by Sir John Thompson to make representations to the American Government with regard to the duty on boom sticks.

Mr. AMYOT. That is the same thing. It would surely be an unusual thing for Sir John Thompson to ask a member of the left with whom he was not in very frequent amicable intercourse, to make such representations. Of course, I am bound to accept the declaration of the hon. gentleman, but I cannot help it if there remains still some doubt in my mind. Now, I am sorry to have taken up so much of the valuable time of this House. I am thankful for the patient indulgence granted to me, and I am sure that when the country at large will have had all the definitions that we expect will be given by hon. members on the left about a revenue tariff, and when the country has studied that question, the overwhelming majority of the people will ensure the country's prosperity by returning to power the great Liberal Conservative party.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH NEWFOUNDLAND.

Mr. FOSTER. Allow me to interrupt the progress of the debate, that I may lay on the Table of the House the principle papers in connection with the negotiations between Canada and Newfoundland for the entrance of that colony into confederation.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

Mr. LEGRIS. (Translation.) I will not undertake to reply to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), it is a task which would uselessly take the time of this House, and it might, perhaps, take some time without any corresponding usefulness, as I have just stated. The hon. gentleman has just made a general confession. He thought it his duty to explain to us the position in which he stands. He thought it his duty to explain to us why in recent years he changed his course. He thought he was bound to state that he never had been a Liberal, and he endeavoured to have his present course understood. He thought it his duty to state certain facts in relation to the industries and exports of our industrial products. He mentioned the case of the leather manufacturers of the city of Quebec. He told us the leather producers of Quebec did not export to Great Britain. Yet, what do we find? We find in the Trade and Navigation returns of the Dominion that, last year, the leather exports from Quebec amounted to $1,113,458. It is, Mr. Speaker, a trade worth mentioning and the hon. gentleman, who would take under his protection the leather manufacturers of Quebec, ought to have known this particular. He read to this House several letters from Quebec manufacturers claiming that, should the protective system not be continued, they would not be in a position to keep their own ground against foreign manufacturers by continuing their industries. We all know that manufacturers, and monopolists in particular, who so largely and so easily, as is well known, profit by the present tariff, call for protection which is acting against the people's interests and especially those of the agricultural class in this country, which is compelled to support the heavy burden of the present taxation in order to enable those gentlemen to heap up large fortunes. In the course of his remarks, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) mentioned the name of a man named Gendreau, of Quebec. It appears that this gentleman handed him a testimonial in favour of the Government's policy. If I am well informed, Mr. Speaker, the Mr. Gendreau referred to went four or five times into insolvency these few last years. It would show that this gentleman is no extraordinary authority; and if all the other gentlemen mentioned by the hon. member are worth this particular one, I may be allowed, I think, to come to the conclusion that it adds no great force to his arguments. The hon. gentleman opposite told this House that the flour producers were in need of protection. Manitoba and the North-west are large wheat-producing countries, and their wheat is exported to Europe, especially to Great Britain. I never understood, and I cannot yet understand why wheat and flour should be protected, and why we should not be in a position, without any protective tariff, to produce flour and wheat as cheap as in any country in the world. Now, it is plain to me that a protective duty on flour is nothing less than an enormous speculation done at the expense of the people of this country. In December last, and even in January last, a combine was formed through which some speculators grew rich. The price of flour was increased by twenty and even thirty cents a bag or a hundred pounds in Montreal. That increase was solely due to the monopolists who are protected by the Government to the detriment of the people's interests. Yet we export large quantities of wheat to Great Britain and other countries. Last year, we exported wheat for $9,555,000, and flour for $1,842,000. Now, the flour and wheat producers sold a quantity of these products outside the Dominion. They had therefore to compete with the other countries in the world. They necessarily had to compete with the other people when selling their products on foreign markets. It is plain therefore that these producers could now produce these commodities and continue their trade in this Dominion without any protective tariff. They could do it without needing the protection granted now to them by the Government, to the extent of 75 cents a barrel. This duty is imposed for no other object than enabling these favourites of the power that be to make larger profits to the detriment of the people's interests. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down professed his faith in the policy of the present Government. Let us look therefore to the statements he made in 1891. I am quoting from "Hansard," page 4933; here is what he said:

Those who contend with us that we should have reciprocity with the United States and a wide market for our products are right, and those who support the government, who say that in order to be happy and prosperous we should support the manufacturers, are wrong.

In this quotation of the very words of the hon. gentleman, we have the extent to which we are to believe in the statements he made to-day, and we know thereby what we are to think about his professions of sincere devotion to the great Conservative principles. Were I willing to go on with such quotations, I might make many more, Mr. Speaker. However, without giving all the statements which are in contradiction with those he has just made, I will refer to another passage of one of the speeches delivered by the same hon. gentleman. On September 3rd, 1891, he said:

The census returns prepared by the officials of the Government prove to us that over a million of people have left this country. And why? Is it not because they could not live here during the ten years just passed, when the hon. gentlemen have been telling us: We are happy, we are prosperous; Canada is rich; Canada is increasing in wealth and in population? The contrary has been proved to us.

They tell us—these great loyalists—that we prefer annexation. We say that those who are disloyal are those who ruin the country, those who steal from the country, those who chase away the population from this country, those are disloyal, while those who want to purify the political atmosphere and to have a natural commerce with our neighbours are loyal to the Crown, and are true citizens of the country.

No doubt, some of them like power, some of them like to sit near the highly-favoured treasury benches, some of them like to have the ear of a minister, some of them like to know when a contract will be given—not for themselves, they are too good, too pure, but for their friends; and as long as their friends surround them with millions at their disposal, they will say: We are prosperous. And that word "we" means whom? Themselves.

When a young country like Canada is prosperous, the population increases. If, in a young country like this the population decreases, it is absolute proof that the country is not prosperous, and if the country is not prosperous it must be so, because the fiscal policy is wrong.

Prominent members on both sides of the House have taken part in this debate, which has now been going on for several days. The gentlemen opposite mostly endeavoured—as did the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot)—to show that the country is prosperous, the policy of the Government wise and the people happy. On the other side, the Opposition has shown to an evidence, I think, that protection is nothing short of an unfair and wrong political system, a pretense whereby people are made to pay large amounts in order to favour some privileged classes, in order to make those who are strong stronger, while crushing the weak. The time has surely come to go back to years gone by and to ask whether protection has given to the country what the latter was promised when it was led to approve of it. We all of us remember, indeed, that, in 1878, in order to induce the electorate to approve of the political system now in force, we were told that manufactures were going to spring up as if by enchantment all over the country. What do we find now? The Government, in order to try and have it believed that we have manufactures and that the goal has been reached, caused to be made a census whereby people who have not a clear idea of the true position of the country are made to believe that, in fact, we have a great many manufactures. But, if we are to judge of the correctness of the census by the number of manufactures it gives for the place where I live, fifty-two, while there are hardly five or six, we may safely say it is quite wrong. Then protection was to put a stop to emigration. This is another point as to which it is plain we have been deceived. Yet, the Government went to a large expenditure to bring here foreigners who were to increase our population. For the last twelve years, we have been paying, on an average, $270,358 a year for immigration, or a total of $3,244,296. In the meantime, the present Cabinet Ministers were guiltily unconcerned about our own citizens going to the United States, who were the best fitted people to go and take possession of the Manitoba and North-west lands, and it never occurred to them that they could direct towards these new countries that agricultural part of our population which was best fitted to develop their resources. Protection was likewise to increase the value of lands. Well, there is no man in this country, if he observes at all what is going on, who is not aware that the price of lands has decreased, especially in the rural districts. In country places, farms are surely worth thirty, forty and even fifty per cent less now than in 1878. Again, with respect to this, the National Policy has been a disastrous failure. They also wanted to deceive us with the promise of a so-called local market. Yet, our rural parts are in a very critical condition, and for some years past, had we not had the British market where to send chiefly the products of our dairy industry, such as butter and cheese, the position of the farmers would be much worse still than it is. But now the overloading of this very market has brought a decrease in the price of these products, and our farmers are not without feeling some uneasiness for the future. We are greatly threatened with seeing this market pass away from us, and this last resource on which our farmers relied to meet their liabilities, is going to vanish, or, at least, to be much decreased. Those were quite wrong, therefore, who claimed that protection was to be a benefit to this country. We were likewise promised that Manitoba, as soon as 1891, would have a population of several millions. Optimists went so far as to say fifteen millions. What do we find now? Manitoba and the North-west Territories put together had but 346,941 souls at the time the last census was taken. Such were, however, the promises made by Sir John A. Macdonald. And Sir Leonard Tilley announced that the sale of lands alone, in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, would, in a few years, yield so large a revenue, that it would cause the public debt to decrease by a hundred million dollars. Well, the proceeds of the sale of lands can hardly meet the expenses in connection therewith. Therefore, we are right when we say that the country was utterly deceived by the promises of the Conservatives. I am not ready to say that protection cannot sometimes be useful. I believe that an infant industry is in need of protection. But such a policy ought, at least, to be carried on with prudence and justice. But where is the sensible man to be found who will hold that industries protected during fifteen or twenty years by a high tariff cannot self-support themselves, in this country as well as in any other country? The duties imposed by the Government on certain goods are nothing short of an injustice to the people of this country, and especially to the agricultural class. As an evidence of this statement, Mr. Speaker, I will mention, among other things, the fence wire, on which there is a duty of three-fourths of a cent per pound, which, along with the other duties imposed on the raw material, has caused an increase of from forty to fifty per cent on this article, which is, so to say, indispensable. Nails are also an article of prime necessity which no one can dispense with, and yet the Government has imposed on it duties to the like amount of three-fourths of a cent per pound, which, added to the other duties on iron, are found to raise the price of this article to such an extent that in this country nails, which in the United States are sold for 90 cents or $1 per hundred pounds, are sold to our Canadian consumers at a price varying from $2.20 to $2.30. If, however, this was of some use to the Government, if it enabled them to get the money which they need in the management of public affairs, it could be tolerated; but when it is considered that on the articles I have mentioned the Government, last year, only collected duties to the amount of $13,000 and that the nail manufacturers, who exercise a monopoly, got from $225,000 to $250,000 out of this duty kept up by the Government, it is simply intolerable. There is also the duty on cotton, which raises from 25 to 30 per cent the price of this article of prime necessity to the people. This duty has caused an increase of $3,836,000 in the price of the cotton goods consumed last year in the Dominion, and yet the Government only got for their share, out of this large sum paid by the people, $1,140,000, while the monopolists got $2,696,000. Coal oil is likewise an article of prime necessity. Last year, we imported 6,546,000 gallons of coal oil, valued at $420,575, on which the duties paid amounted to $466,164 for the Government. But a certain quantity of coal oil was also extracted from our own mines. The quantity thus extracted amounted to 11,000,000 gallons, and as coal oil is protected by a duty of six cents a gallon, the owners of the Petrolia wells, owing to this duty, must have raised their prices by at least four cents a gallon, which enables these favourites of the Government to get out of the current prices of the market, in excess of a fair profit, the sum of $440,000. The Government only got $466,164. Let us now come to sugar, of which so much was said during the present session. We imported, last year, 3,356,526 pounds of sugar. We all know that the duty is 65 cents per 100 pounds. The Government collected duties to the amount of $168,000, but the monopolists, I mean the refiners who profit by the advantages of this so-called protection granted by the Government, got at least 50 cents per 100 pounds. They therefore realized a trifling profit of $1,500,000. In reply to those who contend that sugar is cheap, I say this is no answer. The market here is ruled by the foreign market prices. The price of this article is therefore raised to that extent, owing to the protective duty imposed by the Government, which enables the producers and sugar refiners to sell it at a higher price. By means of this policy, by means of the protective duty it imposes, the Government favours to that extent the sugar refiners. We find the same state of affairs existing with respect to rice. We all know, Mr. Speaker, that imported rice has to pay a duty of 1¼ cents per pound, and unmanufactured imported rice three-tenths of a cent. The Government got out of this duty, last year, $76,942.23, but the manufacturers, that is to say, the two manufacturers we have in Montreal, got for their share about $200,000. Yet these manufacturers need no protection, at least, they need not be protected any longer. Is it not quite a disastrous policy, adverse to the true interests of the people of this country, to keep any longer in force duties which are intended to favour people who are in no need of any such protection, to keep up duties in order to swell up the fortunes of those who are already rich, and cause to suffer the people who pay these imposts? We are often asked by our opponents what we mean by a tariff for revenue and how the Government committing itself to it could continue to get the revenue required for the public service; how such a Government could get the amount required to meet the cost of administration, if the present duties should be taken away? It seems to me, however, the thing is easy to be understood. We would adopt quite a different principle. Instead of imposing duties intended to favour monopolists and manufacturers, the duties would be lowered, but they would be imposed so as to protect only the interests of the public treasury. Instead of causing the people to pay three dollars for each dollar received by the Government under the system now in force, the proceeds of the duties would go into the public treasury and would enable the Government to meet the expenditure of the country. While on the one hand we view the perpetuation of a deplorable state of affairs, while we find the working and agricultural classes in unprecedented straightened circumstances, on the other hand we find some favourites of the party now into power heaping up colossal fortunes, we find the Government following a policy based on quite different grounds, a policy utterly to be regretted and censured. If we consider what has been going on for some time, it is truly astonishing that in a free and civilized country as this is, in a country where people are the arbiters of their own destinies, it is, I say, truly astonishing that political scandals can happen such as were seen during these last years. I intend making no extensive reference to them, but it is necessary to recall some of these scandalous doings for which the Government is responsible. Let me mention here the McGreevy-Langevin scandal through which the country lost several hundred thousand dollars, I might even say in round numbers a million dollars. True, the Government, fearing for a moment the people's wrath, made a show of their intention to cause to be reimbursed to the public treasury the sums embezzled at its detriment by those who had profited by these frauds, who had extorted these funds which were nothing else than the people's money. As we all know, they took proceedings for a sum of $570,000. They acknowledged thereby that the public treasury had been robbed to that extent. The Government acknowledged thereby that their friends had got out of the public treasury, under various pretenses, a sum of $575,000. Now, what have we learned, from the very mouth of one of the Crown Ministers, since the opening of this session? We learned that this trial has been settled. Instead of receiving the amount which the Government claimed, they were satisfied with accepting $60,000 by an arrangement. But what is astonishing is that not a cent of this has been paid, and I will be very much surprised if the Government ever receives a cent of this money. This arrangement was therefore nothing else than dust thrown into the eyes of the people so as to allow the storm to pass, and a means of favouring their friends. This House is also perfectly aware that for the St. Charles Railway branch, a large amount was illegally got out of the public treasury. The building of this railway which, according to the estimates of the very engineers of the Government, was to cost $140,000, has reached the sum of $1,750,000. And during last session, when the Minister of Railways was asked whether the last sum asked for by the Government would settle all the pending claims, he said he did not know about that. We also, all of us, are perfectly aware of the Little Rapid lock affair, on River la Lièvre. This work, originally estimated by the engineers of the Government at $44,000, has now cost $260,000, and there is a pending claim for $90,000 which will likely be paid when an election is near. All the members of this House are also aware of the extravagances indulged into in the building of the famous Tay canal, which was built we are still to know why and for whom. According to the estimates of the official engineers, its cost had been fixed at $132,660, and it has reached the enormous sum of $476,128.73. To show the uselessness and even the absurdity of this work, we have only to give the following figures: According to an answer given by the Government last year, $2,600 were expended thereon, and it gave a revenue of $135. This year, the Government expended $2,458.89 thereon, and the receipts were $128.79. It is plain, since there is neither trade nor navigation on this canal, that its building had only one purpose, that of giving some patronage, of expending large sums of money in a county represented here by a Crown Minister. And then there is the Cape Breton Railway, for which the Government paid, notwithstanding the disapproval of the Auditor General, a final claim for $230,066.75. But there again there were friends to protect. Indeed, one is led to believe, that the present policy of the Government has no other purpose than to use the people's money to favour their friends. Indeed, one is led to believe, that the Government have come to this, that they cannot keep themselves into power otherwise than by wasting the people's money. Let us now come to the Curran bridge. Here is another piece for edification. According to the original estimates, this bridge was to cost $125,000. A committee of inquiry appointed by the Government brings these estimates up to $160,000. It has now cost $430,000. In this case again, the Government have been acting a good farce. As we all know, they entered proceedings against Mr. St. Louis for a sum of $144,874. This trial has afforded to friends of the Government an opportunity for receiving large fees. Now that the farce is over, we know that the part played by the Government was simply this, that they wanted to gain time so as to evade the question, while making a show of taking at heart the interests of the people. During last session, the Minister of Railways was forced to admit that much waste had accompanied the building of the Curran bridge. He gave as an excuse to this House and to the country, that it was no fault of his, that he was not guilty. Well, Mr. Speaker, who else is responsible for all these scandals, all these robberies which the Government allowed to be committed in the various public departments, if the Ministers themselves are not? I contend that a Minister who receives the large salary of $7,000 a year is responsible to the people for all his officials, and he has no right to come here and throw on his officials the responsibility for these squanderings. The Minister is responsible, and so is the Government, for the Ministers are jointly and severally responsible. Then again we have a nice little scandal which was brought within the knowledge of this House by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). I refer to the Fred-erickton bridge. There is something for edification in the history of this bridge. It has been told the other day, but it is well to recall it again, since I am giving the nomenclature of these various scandals. This bridge was built by a company which appears to have subscribed a capital of $20,000. The Government loaned to the company a sum of $300,000, while giving it a bonus of $30,000. Here is again a masterpiece from the friends. Here is again a construction in which the people's money is utterly wasted. Do the Government think they will ever recover these moneys? Do they think they will ever receive a cent of this money? I earnestly hope they will, for the sake of the country, but I am incredulous as to that. This money was expended for no other purpose than to favour friends of the Government. Now, looking at it from another standpoint, I beg to call the attention of the hon. members of this House to the way the Government expends large sums, the expenditure of which is unwarranted. Let us take in the first place the expenditure the country has incurred for the Behring Sea commission. It cost to the country the sum of $134,191.68. Another commission, more famous still, and which was undoubtedly quite useless—and here I have no hesitation in openly saying that, in my humble opinion, the appointment of such a commission was a stupid action, that is the word—was the Prohibition Commission. This commission, which ought never to have existed, will throw no light whatever and will be productive of no good result. It was appointed for the mere purpose of evading the temperance question, which threatened to become embarrassing for the Government. As usual, the Ministers wanted to throw on somebody else the responsibility of a decision, and they entrusted this commission with the trouble of solving the question. If, on the contrary, the Government had risen to a sense of their duty, they would have freed the public from the expenditure of an amount which will, in all likelihood, exceed $150,000, and cause quite useless costs. Then we have the famous Franchise Act. The electoral lists prepared last winter under this Act already cost $195,415.05, and there will be an additional expenditure which will increase that amount, so that I may safely say that the cost of the final revision will be at least $200,000. What benefit has this Act procured to the country? In what respect are we better than we were before it was passed? The present electoral lists are no better than those formerly prepared by the municipal councils. The electoral lists made by the municipalities for the local elections are better made and less liable to errors than those made under this Federal Franchise Act. They are less obnoxious to voters when it comes to correcting the errors which may creep into the making of these lists, and they cost nothing to the Government. We might adopt these same lists, as we once did, and spare these costs to the public. It is, therefore, a useless expenditure, an extravagant expenditure, and this Act has cost to the country, since it was passed, the enormous sum of $1,200,000, and that for nothing worth mentioning, simply to cause inconveniences to voters when the lists are made and revised; nothing worth mentioning, nothing that might be approved of. True, the Government used it in some cases to appoint compliant friends, who set to work from the standpoint of party interests. It is nothing short of an abuse of power, of which the Government became guilty in order to appoint their favourites, their friends, while causing the people to pay large sums. We have also another Act, to which an occasional reference was made last year and this year. I refer to the Civil Service Superannuation Act. Nobody approves of this Act. It is an insidious Act, which costs to the country over two hundred thousand dollars a year, an amount utterly wasted; an Act which has caused the public treasury to pay a total amount of $2,531,810, and which above all is a cause of enormous abuses in the hands of men not over-scrupulous, such as are those who make up the present Government; an Act which leads to notorious abuses. To show to what extent this Act gives rise to shocking abuses, I will only cite one single case. Mr. Thibault, who is well known in the country, and especially in the province of Quebec, is a state pensioner. He had the advantage of being in the Civil Service during nine years, as secretary of a commission. During nine years, he received a salary of two thousand dollars a year. During that time, he contributed to the Superannuation Fund to the amount of $286.79. Six years ago, he was superannuated when he was only forty-nine years old. The Government deemed it proper to superannuate him, although he was still able to work, and now we are paying him $759.76 per annum, and that for his lifetime. Ah! if the people are in the end made aware of such monstrous doings, if in the end they may discern those who deceive them under pretense of taking their interests, who delude them and extort large sums from them, if the people made aware of the turpitudes we have seen here for years and years, may at last have an opportunity of pronouncing themselves. I am satisfied they will hand over the management of public affairs to men who will be more honest than those who are now into power. But we must not forget, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Thibault, to whom I referred as a state pensioner, is a man always willing to come and give the party a helping hand. He is a man whom they send in localities where there is a bad cause to defend, where there is dust to throw into the eyes of the voters. Mr. Thibault is devoted to his party, and this is why he is entitled to a pension at the cost of the people. As the party assures his living, he may well be devoted to it, and those who know Mr. Thibault know that he is not a scrupulous man, and that he spares no pains. Any means are good for him, false statements, anything is good for him. Is there any room for surprise, Mr. Speaker, if he is paid for that? Is not this fact sufficient to evidence the danger there is in leaving such an Act as the Superannuation Act at the disposal of men with as little scruples as those who are now ruling this country? With such a system continued and carried on from year to year for too long a time already, must one be surprised if the Government find themselves now in a most difficult financial position, in a financial position really alarming, at a time of depression such as this? The Government are guilty for not having managed the public affairs in a straightforward and honest way. They are guilty for causing heavy burdens to bear on the people's shoulders through the imposition of onerous and unfair taxes. The following table shows the rate of increase in taxes and expenditure from 1878 to 1894 :

	1878.	1894.
	Liberal Administration.	Conservative Administration.
Taxes	$ 18,476,613	$ 27,579,203
Total revenue ...	22,517,382	36,374,693
Expenditure	23,503,158	37,585,025
Net debt	140,362,069	246,183,029
Gross debt	174,957,268	308,348,023
Interest	7,773,868	10,212,596

But, moreover, according to the last number of the Canada "Gazette" the gross sum total of the national debt amounts to $317,166,193 for a population of about five million souls. This is a debt of $63 per head of the population. Our expenditure is reaching the enormous figure of $38,000,000 a year. It has been increasing from year to year, since 1878, at an average rate of $900,000 a year, and last year, notwithstanding the need of saving money, it has increased by $922,127. As we all know, the deficit, last year, was $1,210,302. The Minister of Finance acknowledges one of $4,500,000 for this year. But any one who only knows the hon. gentleman knows that it will be larger than stated by him. The deficit of the present year will surely exceed $5,000,000. He contended that, for next year, it would only be $1,700,000. If we bear in mind that we are on the eve of a general election, we cannot help thinking that the Minister of Finance has given such a low figure in order not to afraid the electorate. I have no hesitation in saying that the deficit for next year will be in the several millions. We find, however, in the Speech from the Throne that the Government are intent on practising economy. These savings are not visible with the naked eye; on the contrary, the very same course is followed and I have no doubt whatever that the Government, once the election is over, if they remain in office, will impose new burdens on the people, so as to be able to favour their friends and remain on the treasury benches through the people's money. Another point which deserves a protestation on my part is the steady increase in the number of officials. It is impossible to think that if the Government were intent on lightening the burden which bears on the people of this Dominion, they would not begin by decreasing the number of their employees. If they would compel the civil servants to work reasonably, I have no doubt whatever that they could dismiss a great number of them, but this is no part of the policy of the Cabinet, since it has likewise increased the number of its members. With a population under five millions, we have come to have eighteen Ministers to rule us, while our neighbours to the south of us, with a population of seventy millions, have only eight Ministers receiving the very same salary ours receive. Is not this again a new evidence of an intolerable abuse of power? To sum up my views in relation to the various points to which I have referred, I can do no better, I think, than to give the following observations with respect to Canada taken from an American paper :

CANADA: BORROWINGS AND PLUNDERINGS.

(Translation.) The October number of the "Investors' Review" may be said to be a Canadian one; almost half of its columns being devoted to a scathing criticism of Canadian methods and financing. It appears that Canada is fast being driven to the state of things which confronted Australia two years ago. The prosperity of Canada, like that of Australia, was created by capital borrowed in England. The "Investors' Review" gives a list of the moneys raised on the English money market, in behalf of governments, municipalities and railway companies, from which it appears that since 1878 the total amount of money poured into Canada from abroad reaches up to £85,000,000 sterling ($413,000,000). When it is borne in mind that the population of the country is under five millions, that the public debt of the Dominion Government alone is £50,000,000, one cannot help granting that it is high time for this sparsely settled colony to begin cutting down its expenses. Canada being ultra-protectionist, its import and export trade is practically at a standstill. The loans secured by Canada were mostly devoted to the establishment of cities and to public buildings, or to the subsidizing of railways of problematic utility. The Canadian population, like that of Australia, instead of toiling for the development of the natural wealth of their vast territory, flock to the towns in search of means of livelihood, which they find in industrial pursuits or booms on real estate. In a letter which he sends us from British Columbia, Mr. Nicholas C. Shou, formerly of this city, writes: "The land is valueless, for want of capital and labour put in reproductive industrial undertakings, and not, as is too generally the case, in speculations in town lots."

Another shameful job which the "Investors' Review" calls attention to is the Act by which the Canadian Government agrees to pay to a fast line of Atlantic steamers running between Canada and England, a yearly subsidy of £150,000 for a term of ten years, and further to guarantee, for the ten years subsequent, the interest of 4 per cent upon the capital of £1,500,000. Canada cannot afford to supply enough traffic to the old lines which run steamers between Liverpool and the Canadian ports, and which do as excellent service for those ports as for those of Boston or New York. This little scheme is going to cost the citizens of Canada two millions sterling before they see the end of it; and all this expenditure for the benefit of a band of schemers and ship-builders, who succeeded in getting this job through the Canadian House of Commons.

Such is, Mr. Speaker, the appreciation made by a foreign paper of our transactions with public money. I may, after that, mention one which we know but which, presently, seems to stand. I refer to the scandalous gift made to a railway company known as the Hudson Bay Railway Company. At a time of embarrassment such as this; at a time of financial difficulties such as those in which the Government happens to be, it is simply shameful to see the Cabinet, always to favour its friends, committing itself to as large an expenditure as $2,500,000 promised to that company. And if we are to believe the reports of the newspapers, this company is in a position to have its road built for seven or eight thousand dollars a mile, while the Government pledge themselves to give it a bonus of $10,000 a mile, or the total of $2,500,000 to which I have referred, which will enable the promoters of this scheme to realize a net profit of half a million dollars out of the sole subsidies they receive from political friends. I think it is high time to put a stop to such a system; I think the rural population is tired of causing fortunes to be made by the favourites of the power. I represent here an agricultural county, and in making these remarks, I think I am perfectly voicing the views of the farmers of my county. I thought it my duty to protest against the course followed for years by the Government. I protest against the abuses of power which I have evidenced in the course of my remarks. I also protest against those who wish the same state of affairs to be continued, and in making this protest before this House, I am only filling a duty which is imposed to me by the opinions of the voters I represent in this circumstance, and who desire nothing so much as a change in the tariff which could, as much as possible, facilitate our trade relations with the United States. I hope, therefore, that when the opportunity will offer, the people will pronounce on these various matters; the people will pronounce on all these questions. I hope the people will not fail to see where are their true friends. The people will not approve of the course of those who forsook the cause of the weak to uphold the monopolists and manufactures who are speculating upon them. The people are waiting for the time when they will pronounce on all these questions. I myself, Mr. Speaker, am waiting with confidence for this verdict of the people, and I have no doubt that this time the verdict will be against those who thus abused of the public trust and power confided to them.

Mr. SMITH moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. WALLACE. Before that motion is carried I wish to say a few words. Last evening when I was making some remarks before the House, I used the following language:

That was his great solicitude—to see the workmen of this country protected, as they were not sufficiently protected to-day. Suppose he found a man in this country engaged in a most lucrative business, and employing a large number of men, and paying them in store pay instead of in cash; suppose he found that man paying them in a currency that was depreciated in the neighbourhood, I am sure that his bosom would rise in righteous indignation against such a man, and he would do all he could to prevent such a practice.

Mr. EDWARDS. I desire to ask the hon. gentleman if he knows of a case of that kind in the country?

Mr. WALLACE. I have been told of one—that of a man engaged in a large lumber business not very far from the county of Russell.

Mr. EDWARDS. I deny the statement entirely. Such was never the case, and is not the case to-day. It is an entire fabrication.

A little further on I mentioned the fact that he paid them with store pay, and used a species of scrip:

Mr. EDWARDS. If the hon. gentleman refers to me, I say I never did it, and do not do it to-day.

Now, Mr. Speaker, at a later stage of the debate, the same hon. gentleman got up in the House and declared on his honour as a member of the House of Commons, that the statements I made were entirely untrue. He spoke as follows:

I now state upon my honour as a member of this House, that ever since I employed labour I never paid a man in scrip, nor ever paid a man in anything else but cash. I never bought a product that I did not pay for in cash, and my men are paid regularly in cash, and paid in nothing else.

That was the statement of the hon. member for Russell. I knew that I had seen the statement in the papers that the company of which the hon. member for Russell was the head, were doing business in another style. I find this in an Ottawa paper of October, 1894:

ROCKLAND "MONEY."

THE KIND ISSUED BY THE "WORKINGMAN'S FRIEND" AND M.P.

Below we print a "true copy" of the "scrip" issued by the W. C. Edwards Co. to their employees at Rockland. Study it carefully, and then ask yourself if white slavery still exists:

Here follows a fac simile of the scrip:

"Good for 25 cents in goods at our store, Rockland, and for no other purpose or place.

"W. C. EDWARDS & CO., Ltd."

The newspaper comments on this:

Organization, among the workmen at Rockland, would not only wipe out the scrip, but the obnoxious M.P. as well. Will the toilers of Rockland take the initiative in this matter?

To-day, Sir, I received the following letter from a reliable gentleman, unsolicited by myself altogether, but called for, I suppose, by the fact of the report in this morning's paper:

RE EDWARDS AND THE SCRIP.

The system practiced is to issue scrip to the men, to be paid quarterly in the company's store. This scrip is taken at par at any of their stores, hotels and business places in that village. This scrip is taken at a discount of 20 cents, or worth 80 cents on the dollar.

Mr. CASEY. I think when any one reads a letter, the House has a right to ask that it be laid on the Table.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is not the rule of Parliament. If a Minister of the Crown cites from or quotes from a public document he is bound to lay it on the Table; but this is not a public document of that nature.

Mr. WALLACE. I have two documents in my hand, and for the information of the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) and the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), I shall lay them on the Table. One of them is as follows:

This bon is good for 5 cents in goods at our store in Rockland, and for no other purpose or place.

W. C. EDWARDS & CO.,
Rockland, Ont.

Countersigned by J. L. Woodley, who, I believe, is secretary or manager of the firm. I think this justifies the statement I made last night, and I will leave the hon. gentleman to make whatever explanation to this House he may desire.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, the statement that I made last night is absolutely true. I again reiterate the statement, and the statement made—I do not think at all wilfully by the Controller of Customs—is, as I said last night, entirely untrue. We pay our men in cash monthly. We have always paid our men in cash. We never paid a man in script in the manner stated, and we never intend to. The statement is entirely without foundation. It is the case that men come to our office, when there is nothing due them whatever, and ask for advances in which case orders are issued on our store. The man goes to the store, and it used to be the case that if he did not take up the full amount of the order as used that the amount was endorsed on the back of it, he returned again the next day, or when he pleased, and took it. In some instances we found erasures were made, and our store manager—not our business manager at all—simply for his convenience, had these due bills printed, and took up his order and gave him a due bill to return and receive the balance when he pleased.

Mr. REID. It is scrip.

Mr. EDWARDS. Not at all, that is not scrip. No man is ever paid with it, it is nothing of the kind.

Mr. REID. What is it, if it is not scrip?

Mr. EDWARDS. What do you call it?

Mr. REID. Scrip.

Mr. EDWARDS. It is nothing of the kind. When a man has performed his labour he goes to our office, and if he received scrip or anything of that kind, then this charge could be made. But he does not receive it, and the charge cannot be sustained. My statement is absolutely true, and every man in Rockland who understands the case will confirm my statement. I will just say this, though, perhaps, I should not go further, that I think the people in that vicinity have already expressed confidence in me on several occasions, and I believe they will express confidence in me again. I am not going to make any charge against the Controller of Customs or against any hon. member of this House. I do not know how they conduct their private business, and it is not a matter of importance to me or to the country. It is a matter of importance to the people with whom they transact their business, and this is a matter entirely between myself and those with whom I do business, and it is not a matter for this House. I repeat what I have said, that the statement made by the Controller of Customs is entirely untrue and without foundation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly this House should not adjourn without the Controller of Customs withdrawing the remark he has made with reference to the hon. member for Russell.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Withdraw.

Mr. FOSTER. What remark?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If he does not, after the explanation of the hon. member for Russell, there is no business man in this House, or out of it, but will know that the explanation given by the hon. gentleman is true and that the statements made by the Controller the other night, that the hon. member for Russell paid his men in store goods or depreciated currency, must be untrue to the fullest possible extent. The reason I take the opportunity of making this statement is, that I could hardly think the Controller, occupying the position he does in the Government, would acknowledge, or his friends sitting in the House would acknowledge that he is so thoroughly ignorant of the business system of the country, that after the explanations made, he would not be prepared to admit that the business system adopted by the hon. member for Russell, or by the company to which he belongs, would bear out to the slightest extent the statements made by the Controller. The statements he made would be damaging to any business man in the country; they were most unfair, I think, under the circumstances, they were utterly uncalled for, and as an hon. friend beside me says, they were disgraceful. They must tend to injure the good name and standing of any business man, especially a firm doing as large a business as the company to which the hon. gentleman belongs. Instead of the system adopted injuring the workmen, what does it mean? If a man comes and asks for employment and requires something for his family, he having been out of employment for some time, if he requires to make some purchases, as I know is the case in the business with which I am connected, where men sometimes require to purchase their very tools or clothes necessary to commence work, and such men ask for advances, out of sympathy or charity, instead of advancing them money, they are given orders on the store or on some merchant, and the company making the advance takes the chance of the men earning the amount and deducting it from his wages on pay day. Mr. Speaker, you and other hon. members in this House know that it is, if not a general system adopted, one frequently adopted where the men seeking employment have been out of work for some time and their families are suffering—an order is issued on a merchant to give them either goods or tools. It is due to the hon. member for Russell that the Controller should withdraw the statements he made, because it is not pretended that they are correct, that the hon. member pays his men in store goods or depreciated currency instead of in cash. As the hon. member stated, his company do no such thing, but that when the men have done their work and apply for their pay they get it in cash. The company do not ask the men to take store goods or depreciated currency. There is no pretence that the orders issued, either on a store of their own or on a merchant, represent payment to the men in depreciated currency; and it is a matter between the hon. member and the men he employs as to the value received, and at all events those orders are not issued as scrip on which a discount might be made. I think, Mr. Speaker, the case is perfectly clear it is evidently an attempt to bring discredit and injury on the standing and character of the company to which the hon. member for Russell belongs, and to bring such a charge should be beneath the dignity of any member of this House, or any honest business man in the country.

Mr. CASEY. The Controller has seen fit to take advantage of the formal motion to adjourn to renew the attack and reiterate the statements he was compelled yesterday to withdraw, according to the rules of the House. The hon. gentleman has without notice, so far as I know, reiterated statements which had been declared by the hon. member for Russell, on his honour, to be untrue.

Mr. WALLACE. I gave the hon. gentleman notice.

Mr. SUTHERLAND.

Mr. CASEY. Then the Controller is exonerated to that extent. But he has taken advantage to renew his attack and reiterate statements which he was bound to withdraw when the hon. member for Russell made his denial on his honour that those statements were untrue in fact. You, Mr. Speaker, would have to rule that under such circumstances the Controller must withdraw his statements and accept the denial of the hon. member for Russell. The Controller has, however, taken this side opportunity to renew his attack. On what does he base it? On an article in a newspaper, which is hostile, and on a letter from an anonymous individual, which letter he dare not give to the House.

Mr. WALLACE. That is not true.

Mr. CASEY. If the hon. gentleman dare give it, let him do so. If he dare not, let him admit it. Let him either be a man or a mouse. Let him either give the name, or submit to the taunt that he dare not give the name. The Controller has refused to lay the letter on the Table, and he has refused to give the name. He has backed up his statement by producing a worn piece of paper. The hon. gentleman has no right to indulge in such a subterfuge.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. CASEY. Do, you, Mr. Speaker, rule the word "subterfuge" to be unparliamentary?

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. CASEY. Then I withdraw it; and I say the Controller should not use any method for the purpose of concealing the actual facts of the case. The hon. gentleman then read from a worn piece of paper, which he held in his hand and which he said he was going to lay on the Table, but he has not done so yet, although he made a great boast that he would lay it on the Table for the information of the House and the hon. member for Russell. Let him put it on the table even and let us see what this so-called scrip is. It appears to be a dirty piece of paper, or, perhaps, metal, about an inch square which the Controller held between his finger and thumb. He is playing with it now, but he does not put it on the table.

An hon. MEMBER. He won't disgrace the table with it.

Mr. CASEY. On that ground he may be excused for not putting it on the table. The Controller promised to put it on the table and he does not do so.

Mr. WALLACE. So I shall.

Mr. CASEY. So he has not.

Mr. WALLACE. I say; so I shall.

Mr. CASEY. Now, Sir, with this paltry and misleading piece of what he calls evidence, he resumes his venomous attacks upon the member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) and he attacks that hon. gentleman because of his ability and his high standing in the House and in the country. Now, that the member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) has explained, any ordinary man, even though he has no more business ability than the Controller of Customs, must clearly understand that these are not payments, but advances made in the way of charity and friendliness to men who had not as yet done work for the member for Russell. That explanation of the member for Russell was made clear, so that even a child, or even a Controller of Customs could understand it. But the Controller of Customs has not yet apologized and withdrawn the statements by which he meant every one to believe that the member for Russell was defrauding those whom he engaged of a part of their hire. I say that it was a vile attack to make on any member of this House in his business capacity, and an attack for which the Controller of Customs owes an abject apology to the member for Russell (Mr. Edwards). If he does not apologize so much the worse for him in the country. The country at large will know what the Controller is, they will know that he is a man who can make unfounded statements on the floor of this House and back them up with flimsy and anonymous testimony, and who, when the falsity of the statements is clearly explained, will refuse to apologize for them.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CASEY. I said the falsity of the statements and they are false. I did not say the Controller was lying. He has told us that he thought at first there was something in these things, but the fact is now made clear to him that there is nothing in them, and it is his duty as a gentleman sitting in an Assembly of gentlemen to observe the decencies of parliamentary usage, and to apologize and withdraw. We did not expect very much from the Controller of Customs, but we did expect that the decencies of debate would be followed to that extent, and we expect that he will do so still.

Mr. WALLACE. I have only to say one thing in placing these articles upon the Table of the House, and that is, that they were issued by the member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) or his company for labour.

Mr. EDWARDS. No.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. WALLACE. For labour performed—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. WALLACE.—That they were redeemed in store goods—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. CASEY. I rise to a point of order—

Mr. WALLACE. I wish to say that they were redeemed—

Mr. CASEY. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman must take his seat.

Mr. WALLACE. I want to say before I sit down—

Mr. CASEY. No, he will say nothing before he sits down. He is called to order.

Mr. SPEAKER. What is the point of order of the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) ?

Mr. CASEY. The point of order is, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman must accept the statement of the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) that this so-called scrip was not issued for labour performed, but as an advance for labour which might be performed in the future, or might not. He cannot repeat that statement in the face of the denial of the member for Russell. I ask your ruling on that point, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. My own impression is, that the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), having made the statement that these documents or whatever they may be, were not issued in payment of labour, that statement ought to be accepted by the hon. member (Mr. Wallace).

Mr. CASEY. Hear, hear, and it must be.

Mr. WALLACE. I shall place them on the Table, Mr. Speaker, and I shall ask: What were they issued for ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair. Order.

Mr. CASEY. Withdraw. I rise to the point of order that the hon. member must withdraw, as you have ruled, Sir, before he proceeds. That is one of the established rules of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. The established rule of the House is, that if an hon. member is alleged to have made a statement upon the floor of this House, and he denies that he has made it, then the hon. member must accept his denial. This, however, is something that has occurred outside the House altogether. It is not a statement that has been alleged to have been made by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) in the course of debate, but, as I have stated, upon previous occasions, the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), presumably knowing the circumstances better than any person else could know them, having denied the allegations, I think it would be a desirable thing that this denial should be accepted.

Motion agreed to: and debate adjourned.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are we to have the Supplementary Estimates tomorrow ?

Mr. FOSTER. I am not sure whether I will be able to get them to-morrow or not.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then on Monday ?

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I have made several attempts to mention the hour or the day, and I don't think I will say positively whether it will be to-morrow or Monday.

Motion agreed to ; and House adjourned at 11.35 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 17th May, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

Mr. BAKER moved :

That leave be granted to the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts to employ a shorthand writer to take down such evidence as the committee may deem necessary, in accordance with the recommendation contained in the first report of the said committee.

Motion agreed to.

MARKLAND MORTGAGE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I see a notice on the paper in the name of the Minister of Finance with respect to the Markland mortgage. Does that refer to certain properties in or about the city of Kingston or that locality ?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, it does.

BOSTON POST OFFICE, NORFOLK.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, Has the name of Boston post office, county of Norfolk, Ont., been changed ? If so, what name has been substituted for Boston ? If a change of name has been made, what reasons influenced the Postmaster General in making the change ? Is the Postmaster General aware that the post office in question has been known as Boston since it was established over fifty years ago, and that a change of its name will be protested against by a great majority of the inhabitants who are served by the office ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The name has been changed to Shawmut. The reason was that it was alleged that large numbers of letters intended for Boston, Ont., were sent to Boston, Mass. The Postmaster General is aware that the Boston post office has been so named for many years, and he has received a letter from the postmaster stating that certain persons objected to the change.

BEALTON POST OFFICE, NORFOLK.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, Has the name of Bealton post office, county of Norfolk, Ont., been changed to Shawmut, and if so, was the change made at the instance of the inhabitants of the section served by the office through representations made by petition ? If not, what reasons influenced the Postmaster General in making the change of name ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The name has not been changed to Shawmut.

CUSTOMS DUTIES ON AMERICAN HARDWARE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to call the attention of the House to a statement which has been placed in my hands, and if desired I shall conclude with a motion in compliance, Mr. Speaker, with your usual ruling. The statement is as follows, and as it is highly germane to the question now under discussion, I shall not apologize for calling the attention of the Government to it :

For some time past the hardware trade of Toronto and Montreal have been greatly troubled in getting goods purchased in the United States through the Canadian customs. They would purchase a bill of goods, pass the entry, and then get a notice to make an amended entry, some 15 per cent to 30 per cent being added to the original invoice, and then a fine equal to the amount of the amended entry being added. This has unsettled the trade for some time, and set them to ferreting out what was at the bottom. Imagine their surprise at discovering what follows : What the Customs Department have said was that they sent a special agent, who visited all the manufacturing centres, called on the different manufacturers, and asked them for their prices to the home trade, as the Customs Department held that the United States manufacturers sold cheaper to Canada than to the home market ; and on this special agent's report they based prices on which duty should be paid, regardless of what prices they were bought, although invoices were duly sworn to as correct.

Imagine the surprise of the trade to discover that this special customs agent was no other than a Mr. Hawthorne, general manager of the Weland Vale Manufacturing Company, who control all the manufactories of agricultural tools, axes, &c., made in Canada, situated in St. Catharines, Oshawa and Côte St. Paul.

Imagine the Government playing into the hands of the manufacturers to such an extent as to send the general manager to such works as mentioned to visit competitors in the same lines in the United States to examine what they make, examine their books as to prices and terms, acting as a spy and all this time at the expense of the Government for the benefit of the protected manufacturer and to the great inconvenience and annoyance of the trade. This is carrying the National Policy to rather a farce.

Now, Sir, I have called attention to that because I am aware that, whether the statements made in this memorandum be absolutely true or not, somewhat similar practices have prevailed in the department on other occasions; and what I desire specially to call the attention of the House and the country to is this—that the power which has been vested in the customs authorities and in the Government, to enable them to disregard original invoices and to levy, practically at their own pleasure, a large additional sum of money for taxes beyond that which Parliament authorized to be imposed, is one that is likely to lead to the very grossest abuses and a thing which ought to be checked. Apart from that, if the facts alleged in this memorandum be true, I can imagine nothing more indecent, nothing more improper than for the customs authorities to employ the agents of certain protected manufacturers, who have a direct personal interest in interfering with the importation of goods, and, on these men's reports, to take the steps which are explained in the memorandum, amending the original invoice to the extent of 15 to 30 per cent, and then inflicting a fine equal to the amount of the amended entry. I can imagine nothing more tyrannical, more unfair, more outrageously in violation of the liberty of the subject than such proceedings, if, as I say, these statements remain uncontradicted by the Government. And, I must add that if, as I said, these statements are correct, I can imagine nothing which shows more clearly the extent of the servile dependence to which the Government of Canada are reduced, the extent to which they are, as I have frequently pointed out, the mere tools of the protected manufacturers' association. Sir, for the purpose of allowing the Government and other parties to state their views on this extremely important subject, and, if possible to draw the attention of the country to the gross abuse which appears to prevail, I move that this House do now adjourn.

Mr. WALLACE. With reference to the law which the hon. member for South Oxford objects to and which he says is so unjust, I may call the attention of the House to the fact that it was enacted by the hon. gentleman himself when in power in 1877, and it stands on the statute-book precisely the same now as it was then. The Government has to ascertain what the prices of goods are in foreign countries to-day in accordance with the law. I am sorry the hon. gentleman did not inform us in some way that he was going to bring this matter up, so as to give an opportunity to fully answer his charges. This is the first intimation I have had of it. I will read the clause of the Act referred to as enacted by the hon. gentleman himself:

Whenever any duty, ad valorem, is imposed on any goods imported into Canada, the value for duty shall be the fair market value thereof, when sold for home consumption, in the principal markets of the country whence and at the time when the same were exported directly to Canada.

That is the law, Mr. Speaker, and, as one appointed to administer that law, it is my duty to ascertain what the prices of these goods were in the United States, in order to know what the changes were made in the invoices for these goods imported into Canada. We have known, what every member of this House knows, that in many cases—and I could have produced the proof here in scores of cases if I had had notice of the intended action of the hon. gentleman—on goods that are to be imported into Canada, the American manufacturers agree to make a special discount, making the price lower than that at which they sell in the United States. And the duty of the Government is to protect the revenue of this country in accordance with the law passed by the hon. gentleman. In accordance with that law it has been my duty to send to the United States—special officers, trained and competent for the purpose of such duties—to find out the prices of such articles. We have done so in the case of bicycles, agricultural implements and numerous other articles, and we have fixed the prices in accordance with the prices they are selling in the United States. Well, Sir, with reference to the case he mentions, that of Mr. Hawthorne, the case was this: We discovered that the American manufacturers were selling scythes in this country lower than their American quotations. We had their price list giving the discounts on their scythes, and we found that, in order to sell these scythes in Canada—as acknowledged by their own agent to me in Ottawa a week or so ago—they were making differences in the prices, through changes in the descriptions as given in their price lists. They had so changed the goods that our officers, not specially informed in the trade, were not able to detect the difference. For instance, clipper scythes, quoted at $11 in the American price lists were offered here for $8 or $9. There was some change in the appearance of the scythes, but we have proved that these clipper scythes sold by them at $9 were the identical scythes they were selling on the American price lists at $11. In all these prices there was about the same discount allowed off the list. In order to detect these changes I found it necessary to appoint a man specially trained in the business and well informed, and I sent Mr. Hawthorne—to inquire and report to me as to the various scythes that were imported into this country and their resemblance to the scythes that were given in the American price lists. I did so, and in doing so I was protecting the public revenue and the best interests of this country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not a bit of it.

Mr. WALLACE. Does the hon. gentleman mean to tell me that when a scythe is entered on a price list of $9, which is sold in the United States for $11, and we are levying a duty of 35 per cent, we are not protecting the revenue in revising those invoices ?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You are protecting the manufacturers.

Mr. WALLACE. I say it was my duty in the position I hold to take the steps I did for the protection of the revenue. It is because I do that these hon. gentlemen are making these attacks upon the department. I say that the whole course of the Customs Department has been in the public interest, and I challenge investigation into any part of it as to compliance with the law and the carrying out of the law as Parliament has enacted it.

Mr. EDGAR. We know that it has been a provision of the law for a great many years that the Government had the right to examine into the valuations placed upon imports in order to correct these valuations where they are wrong, and we do not complain of that. But we do complain of that provision being made an instrument of tyranny upon the importers of this country, and an instrument to increase the protection of the manufacturers who are already so enormously protected under the law. That is what we complain of, and the statements made in the letter which my hon. friend has read, prove that to a demonstration, in fact the statements are not denied by the hon. Controller of Customs. Why, Sir, could anything be more indecent, as was pointed out, than choosing for such a mission the manager of one of these highly protected industries, whose representative came down here last session and bulldozed the Government and the members who supported them, and forced them to put on specific duties after they had taken them off. This representative of the manufacturers is sent on as a confidential agent of the Government to report upon the subject of importations which would interfere with their own trade, as if the country was not already burdened enough in protecting them. This is what we complain of, and as long as that sort of thing is allowed, we have good reason to complain ; and the more it is exposed the more the people will understand the operation of this whole system of protection.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) says the Government have not looked after the protection of the revenue, but that it was the protection of the manufacturers they were looking after. As a manufacturer I repudiate that statement, and being a large purchaser of goods in the United States as well as a manufacturer, I think I can disprove it. There is no merchant in Canada to-day, selling any class of manufactured goods that he can purchase in the United States but can go over to that country and purchase them from 20 to 50 per cent less than they will sell for in their own country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. All the better for the Canadian consumer.

Mr. TAYLOR. All the better for the Canadian consumer. It may be so ; but I would ask the hon. gentleman what he is going to do with the Canadian labourer ? I say the Government and the Controller of Customs are deserving of the highest credit from the workingman of this country, for the manner in which they have administered the law which they found on the statute-book, placed there by the hon. member for South Oxford himself. If the Canadian importer had been allowed to bring goods into the country during this last year at the face value of the invoices, for what they can be purchased for in the United States, there is not a manufacturing industry in this country but would have been closed, not a labouring man in this country but would have been walking the streets, as the American labourers have been doing this last year. The American manufacturers have a surplus of goods and they would sell them at any price in this country, but they would hold them for their own markets at their regular list prices. I, myself, am just now completing the settlement of a claim for an importer who purchased goods in the United States, imported them into this country, and gave his invoice to a broker, who went to the customs and made an entry on the face value of the invoice. The customs raised an objection. He wrote over to the party from whom he purchased, that party made an affidavit and sent it here, stating that the prices at which he sold to this importer, were the prices that he sold for in the United States. But, upon an officer of the Customs Department investigating the books of this manufacturing concern, he found that the statement they had sent here for the purpose of getting these goods through the customs at an undervaluation was a libel, and that he had decreased the value of these goods to the importer by an amount of $778, and I expect a cheque from this importer to pay the increased value. Had these goods been imported, not only these goods, but goods in hundreds of other cases that have come under my observation, the manufacturers of which in this country sell them just as cheap to the Canadian consumer as they can be bought from the United States—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Just as cheap ?

Mr. TAYLOR. You cannot name an article to-day manufactured in the United States, and which is also manufactured in Canada, which the Canadian farmer is not getting better and cheaper than the American consumer is getting it. I challenge the hon. gentleman to name one. Let him ask for a commission, and we will send them over to the United States and investigate the American price and the Canadian price, and I will pay the expense of that commission if my statement is not correct. If the hon. gentleman's policy were allowed to prevail, there is not a labouring man in this country to-day who would be earning his dollar or his dollar and a half a day in our industries, as he is now doing.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think if the question were raised as to which was the head and which was the tail in the management of the affairs of this country, the Government or the manufacturers' association, it would be a very difficult question to decide. I do not know as it would be, either. Now, Sir, I can conceive of nothing more indecent, than for the Government to employ, practically, as judge and jury for the settlement of this question as to the valuation of the invoice, the person who is directly interested in excluding these invoices from the country. The hon. gentleman chooses the manager of a concern engaged in the manufacture of the very articles in question, and sends that interested party as the Government agent to the United States to make inquiries and to report for the Government, and the Government acts upon the report of the man who is interested in excluding these invoices and these importations from Canada. Now, it does not seem from the Trade and Navigation Returns that the trade in scythes is a very serious matter, that the competition is very great, that a manufacture of this kind is very seriously threatened by the amount of importations. The importation last year was 3,880 dozen scythes, a very small fraction of the numbers used in this country, and the greed of the men engaged in this business is so great that they cannot tolerate even that small importation, and that small degree of competition.

Mr. WALLACE. We have reduced the duty very materially since.

Mr. CHARLTON. Not very materially, I think. You may have done so in name, you may have done so in the letter, but you have not done so in the spirit, because the Government adopts the plan of sending an interested agent to the United States to make reports, and although you may nominally have reduced the duties, yet through increasing these invoices 5, 15, or 30 per cent, through raising the valuation at the Custom House; and then imposing a fine equal to the increase of valuation you double the increase, making it from 30 to 60 per cent, it is simply mockery for the hon. gentleman to talk about having reduced the duties. He is acting in the interest of the manufacturer, he is employing the manufacturer as his agent, he is sending that manufacturer to the United States to report for him what he shall do, and the collector of customs is to obey the behests of that manufacturer. The reduction of duties that the hon. gentleman speaks about—why, you would imagine that the present duty was a mere bagatelle. The duty is still 35 per cent, and if he adds to that duty 60 per cent more from raising invoice and imposing fine why, the duty is a prohibitory one. Now, the hon. gentleman talks about the price lists and about discounts. Is the hon. gentleman aware that almost all articles manufactured in the United States are sold upon price lists that are discounted to the trade in some cases to the extent of 70 or 80 per cent? Uniformly, the price lists in the United States are vastly above the net prices of these articles; and he is playing upon words, he is deceiving the House—

Mr. FOSTER. Order.

Mr. CHARLTON—when he talks about manufacturers in the United States—

Mr. FOSTER. Order.

Mr. CHARLTON—practically deceiving the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member must withdraw the word, "deceiving."

Mr. CHARLTON. Certainly, I withdraw the word. I will qualify the word, and I will say that the hon. gentleman was making a statement with regard to the price lists by which he conveys the impression that the American manufacturers sell to the domestic purchaser at a price much higher than to the Canadian purchaser.

Mr. WALLACE. I said nothing of the kind. I will say, for the hon. gentleman's information that about 60 per cent of this price list is about the same for the United States and Canada. What I said was that practically the same article that was in the American price list for $11, was in the Canadian price list for about $9, with the same discount in each case. I did not refer to the discounts, because they were nearly the same in each case.

Mr. CHARLTON. Upon what authority does the hon. gentleman make that statement? He makes that statement upon the authority of an interested party who goes to the United States, and who is interested in making it appear that the price lists upon which goods are sold to the American customer are higher than those upon which the goods are sold to the Canadian customer. It is absurd to talk about the manufacturing interests of the United States making different conditions and different trade lists with one customer from what they make with another. If the hon. gentleman adopts this course of excluding these importations from Canada, thereby aiding the manufacturers that wish to exclude them, he is laying a burden upon the consumers of this country, in the benefit and for the interests of the manufacturer, and he is extorting from them more than he should do for these goods, more than the law allows. According to my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor), if the manufacturers of scythes and other goods could not maintain their monopoly, all the labour of this country would be idle. Why, what proportion of labour in this country is engaged in the manufacture of goods? There are other labourers besides those engaged in factories. There are farm labourers, labourers in lumber fields, labourers in mining fields, labourers in fisheries; there are ten labourers in other forms where there is one in manufactories. Even if you admit the policy the Government is pursuing may be a benefit to that consumer, or to the labour engaged in that manufacture, it is disastrous to ten times that amount of labour engaged in other industries. I repeat that the Government, in the course it is pursuing in this matter in sending these agents, sending these spies, who are interested in excluding importation from this country, reflects no credit upon them, and their course is a course not conceived and not carried out in the interests of the great consuming masses of this country. What harm would it do if the consumers of Canada got their supplies a little cheaper than they otherwise would? How much damage is there in a man buying a dollar's worth of goods for 75 cents? We could stand that kind of disaster. But the Government is not intending to permit the Canadian consumer to take advantage of the low prices in another country. The gravamen of this charge is the indecency, the impropriety, the injustice of sending the agent of the concern engaged in the business, and at the wish of the monopoly, to the United States to go around among the manufacturers and to make his report, misleading, no doubt, in its character and framed for the manufacturers' interest, and then for the Government to act upon that report. It is a nice commentary upon the management of our fiscal affairs by the Controller of Customs, and by the Government in general.

Mr. FOSTER. This debate, which has been precipitated without notice upon the House, and so much to be deprecated in view of the way in which deliberative assemblies ought to be conducted, is the best illustration of its inopportuneness, and the best reason why the House should come to a conclusion as soon as possible to pursue a different course, and to prevent an abuse which has been growing during several sessions, but which has been especially apparent during this session of the House. But before dealing further with this phase, I want to call the attention of the House to two or three points. The hon. member who made this motion had not primarily the desire and motive of asking for information, of putting before the House the grievance of an elector or a citizen of this country, of asking if information contained in a statement presented to him and as given by him to the House was correct or not, and letting the matter stay there, getting his information. The object of the hon. gentleman was simply to make an attack on the Government. It was to make an attack in an underhand way.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Order, order.

Mr. CASEY. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. What I mean will be seen when my explanation is given.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for West Elgin has raised a point of order.

Mr. CASEY. The word "subterfuge" was ruled out by you, Mr. Speaker, last night. I claim that subterfuge and underhand mean the same thing, they mean deceit. I claim the Finance Minister is out of order, and I ask for your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the Finance Minister had better withdraw the word.

Mr. FOSTER. If so, Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the word, and I will say left-handed. The hon. gentleman's purpose, I imagine, was to make an attack on the Government, and I would direct the attention of the House to the left-handed manner in which he proposed to make that attack. We have certain rules of the House, which are supposed to be for the orderly conduct of business, which are supposed to prevent surprises, which are supposed to give fair notice when attacks are to be made, which are supposed to make it so that the business of the House which is on the Order paper shall have its due precedence, and that those motions will come on when they are expected by the House in due course as notices are placed on the Order paper. But the hon. gentleman makes an attack on the Government without giving any notice at all to the hon. gentleman whose department is chiefly interested, and so giving him no fair chance to marshal the facts in reply. It just happened that the Controller had the information in hand, which enabled him to make a partial reply, I think a very fair and a very good reply under the circumstances, but which did not place him in a position to give the House that full information which the House and the country should have as an antidote to the attack which has been made. The hon. gentleman did not bring on anything of which he had given notice, and he did not give the hon. gentleman's department, which was concerned, the least intimation that he was going to raise a question here to-day. What is the question he did raise? The simple question he raised was, whether or not an officer of this Government, a member of this Government was doing his duty when he exercised and took what means he thought were proper and right—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is not the point.

Mr. FOSTER—to execute a law which was on the statute-book. The hon. gentleman may quarrel with the system of protection, we know he has a standing quarrel with that, and he is perfectly right to do so; but so long as protection is the law of this country, and so long as the Liberal-Conservative Government is in power, and so long as any Government is in power under that system, it is the duty of that Government to see that the system is carried out in its entirety, in its fulness, and not made a sham. This Act was placed on the statute-book under the hon. gentleman's regime. His own Minister of Customs acted upon them. The Hon. Isaac Burpee, I am informed, and the hon. gentleman can put me right if I am wrong, took methods of finding out—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not the same methods.

Mr. FOSTER. I will come to that later. That gentleman took means to find out what were the prices at which goods were made and sold for in the markets where they were produced, and he issued order after order fixing the prices of goods upon which the ad valorem duties were by the Customs Department to be appraised when those goods came into this country. The hon. member for Oxford said that Mr. Burpee did not take the same methods. Mr. Burpee took the methods that commended themselves to him, he took the methods which would be effectual in giving the information he wanted; and the hon. Controller of Customs took the very same, and there has not been an hon. member who has spoken who has impugned the veracity or trustworthiness of the information. They have found fault with the Controller because he took an expert, who happened to have been at one time engaged in the manufacture of agricultural implements himself. They thought that was indecent; but has any hon. gentleman made the assertion or proved the assertion that the information which was given by this expert was incorrect? Not one of them. They have stated that the information, as given by the expert, was acted upon, and that this expert was himself the judge and the jury, the evidence and the judge. There is not a particle of evidence in support of that statement. An expert is asked to give information; he seeks out information, he finds it, he makes his report. There his duty ends, and the Customs Department, its head and its officers, analyse that report, digest the information, and act upon it in whole or in part just as they please. They are the persons who act as the judges. Will any hon. member say that the information given has been misleading, that the decision made thereon has been wrong? If he will prove that, he will make a case, but he cannot prove his case unless he proves that assertion. The person who is to get the information, they may attack. Unless they show that the information is wrong, they have no case whatever against the department. The hon. member for Oxford calls it tyranny. Is it tyranny to see that a law on the statute-book is fairly carried out?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is not criticising the matter fairly.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it tyranny to say that a system of tariff, which has been ratified four or five times by the people, shall be at the mercy of any man who wishes to play double with his prices? Is that tyranny or wrong?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman's code of political and tariff morals is no better, apparently, than to give that as an excuse; it is no better than to say that a foreigner who sells his goods below fair market value, and, therefore, injures a manufacturer who works under the tariff system which has been adopted by the country, is unfairly dealt with when the law steps in and revises his unfair prices.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Unfairly dealt with!

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman says that it is quite sufficient for us, that the person who buys goods at less price may sell them at less, and the consumer, therefore, is not hurt. The consumer is not hurt when the smuggler gets in his work. Will the hon. gentleman's political morality allow him to protect the smuggler?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Certainly, under some conditions.

Mr. FOSTER. And take the halter off the neck of the smuggler, if by smuggling operations the consumer gets what he buys at a less price? It is exactly on a par with the present case. I say the smuggler has as much right to ply his trade and look to the hon. gentleman for a defence as has the man who carries on systematic undervaluations against the law of this country to expect to find a strong protecting defender in the hon. gentleman opposite. So long as he can bring no greater charge against the Customs Department than that it lives up to the law and protects the people who have asked for a certain tariff system, and, despite the efforts of hon. gentlemen opposite, have maintained that system for 17 years, so long as the department has done nothing more than that, hon. members will look in vain to raise much of a breeze in this House or the country from these attacks made on the Controller of Customs. I leave that, and I come back to the point from which I started. I say this system of moving the House to adjourn when the Orders of the Day which are on the Order paper, and to which the House looks for the guidance in the business before it, and when hon. members come here with the idea of taking up the business which is advertised and set out for them; that any gentleman can spring up in this House, and by simply moving to adjourn can bring up any matter that he chooses, can take the place of the regular orders, and can take the whole time of the House day after day; I say that this is not, to my mind, in the interests of that orderly and correct mode of doing business which is most in accordance with parliamentary dignity, and parliamentary efficiency as well. My hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) knows, that is not allowable in the English House of Commons. He knows that the abuse grew so in the English House of Commons that that sturdy exponent of the liberties of the people, and of the liberty of speech and the fullest discussion, was, in 1882, forced to frame rules to prevent an abuse that my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright), more than any other man in this House, is responsible for carrying to the extreme this session. I do not know what the powers of the Speaker are in this respect; but I do know that it seems that any hon. gentleman opposite can move to adjourn when an order of business comes up, and can discuss a question which he declares he thinks is urgent; but under cover of that the hon. gentleman and his friends can introduce any subject, as wide asunder as the poles from the one with which he commences.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. FOSTER. I say that has been done in this House, and the difficulty of making a connection here and there sufficient to give a prima facie case that the two questions have somewhat of a bearing on each other; that difficulty is not great for an ingenious debater, and he can so effectually do this, that I have no doubt the Speaker finds it difficult to rule that the subjects are not in some way cognate. I draw the attention of the House coolly and calmly, and with the best intentions, to this abuse; an abuse which if it is carried on will destroy the efficiency of this House, and will prevent the ordinary despatch and conduct of business. I would like myself to have the ruling of the Speaker, as to how far this matter can be guided, in order that we may consider as to whether, if it cannot be guided by the Speaker, under the rules as they are at present, it will become necessary for this House to protect itself by some rules which will conduce to the orderly execution of business.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. CASEY. Put on the gag.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Casey) has made a splendid argument when he calls out "gag." My hon. friends opposite are looking to Britain in these times, and I suppose they will admit that the British Parliament may be considered to be a very fair exponent of the liberty of discussion. But the British Parliament has felt itself forced to apply a method of restriction to this very matter about which I am speaking. Now, if this practice of moving the adjournment of the House and bringing up every conceivable question upon that motion is to be carried out; it does seem to me that we will have very great difficulty in carrying on the business of this House in an orderly and consecutive manner. I should like very much to have the Speaker's ruling on this matter; as to how this abuse may best be prevented, and as to the limit to which the moving of the adjournment of the House can in such cases be allowed to go.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker: the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has not been very long the leader of the House, and it seems to me, that before he should undertake to propose to interfere with the liberty of discussion here, he had better wait until some serious abuse springs up. Now, one of the most important duties that devolves upon the House of Commons is to discuss the grievances of the people. Legislation is a matter of very much later growth, but the discussion of the grievances of the people is as old as the Commons itself. My hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) has read a communication which shows what a very important grievance this is, and the leader of the House says: that this is not the proper time to discuss that, but it should be put as a notice upon the paper, and that the hon. member (Sir Richard Cartwright) should wait, perhaps a week or a fortnight, before it can be reached, if indeed it can be reached at all. Well, Sir, I dissent from the view which the Finance Minister has expressed. I decline to have the liberties of Parliament interfered with, I insist that the people's representatives in this House shall have an opportunity of discussing their grievances when any member of this House sees proper to submit a grievance to the consideration of the House, and to make the facts known. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has told us how important it is to guard the public revenue, and he says that no one has complained that the public revenue has been interfered with. I would like to know whether it is the practice to make a man a judge in his own cause, and whether a man who is interested in a cause is the best witness that can be called for the purpose of testifying in regard to that cause. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has not denied that Mr. Hawthorne is the agent of a manufacturing company in this country. The hon. gentleman has not denied that Mr. Hawthorne has been appointed by the Government to make inquiry into the prices for which competitors residing abroad are selling their articles for the Canadian market. Does the hon. gentleman think it is a decent thing on the part of Mr. Hawthorne to accept such a position at the hands of the Government, or on the part of the Government to appoint Mr. Hawthorne to that position? Does the hon. gentleman think that Mr. Hawthorne is a man that can be implicitly relied upon with regard to the prices at which these articles are sold in the American market? I say, Sir, that in no courts of justice, in no tribunal in the world where evidence is to be regarded, would the testimony of such a party be looked upon as the highest testimony that could be obtained in such a matter. That is the position which the hon. gentleman has taken with regard to this. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has said: Oh, we are inquiring into this matter, we are determined that the law of the land shall not be made a sham and that this provision with regard to the price of articles shall be honestly carried out. Well, Sir, for what purpose was that provision put upon the statute-book? It was put there for the purpose of protecting the public revenue, and to see that the rate paid by the parties was the rate which the law itself imposed. Is that the object of appointing Mr. Hawthorne? Is that the purpose for which Mr. Hawthorne was appointed? Why, Sir, the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) has indicated that it was for no such purpose. The Government have in view the question of the development of the industries of this country, and not the collection of revenue. The Government have appointed Mr. Hawthorne to prevent articles being purchased abroad and imported into this country, and so to prevent revenue being collected on such articles. The Government are acting simply as the agents, the servants, of the manufacturing interests in this country. A rival establishment to the foreign manufactories exists here, and its manager is appointed to go abroad and get information, by which the Government can shut out of this country the articles which may come into competition with this establishment, and upon which articles alone revenue could be obtained. That, Sir, is the position; that is the work in which the Government are engaged. That is not the protection of the public revenue, but it is a conspiracy to destroy the public revenue, and to secure the market of Canada for the sole use of parties who are engaged in the manufacture of these products in Canada. I will mention a fact which came under my own notice. A year or two ago, an important hardware firm in London were purchasing certain articles. The agent of a New England manufacturing company came to them and offered to sell them articles at a very moderate rate, and they purchased them. A year or so afterwards, the agent of the Gananoque company was in town, and called upon the same parties with the view of selling them articles of the same sort. He did not make a sale. A short time afterwards, an agent of the Government came up, no doubt upon the representations of that gentleman, and insisted upon the production of the firm's books to see on what value they had paid duty on the New England purchase a year and a half or two years before. By this means he put those men to any amount of trouble and annoyance—annoyed and worried and persecuted them because they had purchased their goods in New England. Is that the purpose of the Government? Is that the purpose for which these officers are appointed? Is that the object of inserting that clause in the Customs Act? No, Sir; that is not the object; and I am pointing out the abuse which the Government are practicing under this provision of the law, and under the pretense that it is being carried into effect. The statement of the hon. gentleman in regard to this matter shows that he is not, it is true, making this provision of the law a sham, but he is making it an intolerable nuisance to the business men of Canada. Sir, the manufacturers of Canada are adequately protected, even from the protectionist point of view, by the rates of duty hon. gentlemen opposite have imposed; but the imposition of those duties is not sufficient to satisfy the Government or the gentlemen who are behind the Government in this matter. They insist on going abroad and examining the books of business men in foreign countries, getting possession of information under false pretenses—information which is in many cases wholly unreliable—because of the extraordinary interest these men have—

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. gentleman pardon me? He speaks of obtaining information under false pretenses. I have never authorized any one to obtain information under false pretenses, but, to go to the manufacturers themselves, state what their business is, and ask them if they will give the information, so as to enable us to judge of the value on which we should impose duties on the importations brought into this country.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am not charging the hon. gentleman with obtaining information under false pretenses.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is what you said.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I was speaking of the agents the hon. gentleman appointed, who are not disinterested men, but men who are intensely interested in the business in which they were engaged. In the case I mentioned, did the Government get additional duties from those gentlemen in London, whose books they took possession of?

Not a bit of it. They put them to any amount of trouble and expense, but the result of their investigation was to show that the price at which those goods were invoiced to them was the price at which they were sold all over the New England states. When I say that information was obtained under false pretenses, does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that a man occupying the position of Mr. Hawthorne, the agent and manager of a company in Canada engaged in making edged tools, goes to rival manufacturing establishments in the United States, represents them in business, and gets information fairly from those gentlemen? If the hon. gentleman thinks so, he is very much more credulous than I gave him credit for being. Why, Sir, in the very appointment of this man, he has expressed suspicion; and can he suppose for a moment that the evidence obtained by him has been fairly obtained, or is altogether reliable? I say that my hon. friend, in bringing the matter up, has done his duty. We are not simply attacking the protective policy on this occasion, but we are pointing out to the whole country what are the abuses connected with that system, and to what mischievous and unnecessary annoyances the Government have lent themselves in carrying that policy out.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Finance, in his capacity of new leader, has, as my hon. friend who has just sat down, stated, taken a very new and very fresh departure. He has shown himself in the character of a very fresh young leader, indeed, in trying to teach the older heads in this House how the business of this House should be conducted. He complains that the custom of moving the adjournment of the House in order to bring up grievances has been abused. I admit that the practice of moving the adjournment of the House for certain purposes has been abused, but not for the purpose of bringing up grievances. We know a very late case in which the motion to adjourn the House was used for the purpose of making an attack upon the business character of a member of this House. I am not going to refer to a past debate; that would be out of order; but the fact is well known.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is wrong if he refers to my hon. friend the Controller of Customs. My hon. friend's remarks were made on the motion of an hon. member to adjourn the debate.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman has fitted the cap on the head which I meant it to cover. As for the difference between a motion to adjourn the debate and a motion to adjourn the House, I do not see any difference in the animus of the attack and the unfairness of the proceeding which took place.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Mr. WALLACE. I gave the hon. gentleman—

Mr. CASEY. If the hon. gentleman is rising to a point of order, I will sit down; but I object to being interrupted.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Well, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman will allow me to suggest to him—I do not want to interrupt him—

Mr. CASEY. Then he had better not. I say, Mr. Speaker, it is a distinction without a difference; it makes no difference of principle whether the motion is for the adjournment of the House, or for the adjournment of the debate. But I say it serves the Controller of Customs particularly well right that he has got a dose of his own medicine to-day, with the addition that in this case the charge against him has not been denied, either by his counsel who pleaded for him, or by himself. The charge made is that the manager and agent of a firm manufacturing certain agricultural implements has been engaged by the Government as an expert to settle the price of such goods for duty. The hon. Minister of Finance says that is all right, because Mr. Burpee took means to obtain the same information when he was Minister of Customs. Mr. Burpee did take means, but how far from the same means? Did he send the manager of a manufacturing company to attend to such work? No, Sir. If he had done so, it would not have been endured. No Government previous to this Government, no head of the Department of Customs previous to the present head of that department, would ever have ventured to perpetrate such a glaring unfairness upon the consumers and importers of this country, as has been done in this case. It is not only the consumer that is interested but the importer. If he is going to be worried to death by interested parties being allowed to bring such information to the Department of Customs as they think fit, we have both classes, the consumer and the importer to fight for in this case. As to the fairness or unfairness of this particular person, the Minister of Finance says nothing has been proven, but we all know what is likely. We all know that the Controller of Customs would not have appointed an inspecting agent of this kind unless he wanted to get a certain class of information from him. The hon. Minister of Finance admits that. He said the Controller of Customs had appointed a man to get this information, and he had got the sort of information that the Controller wanted. I do not doubt it at all. Let me tell the House the sort of position this Mr. Hawthorne occupied last year when the tariff of Canada was being revised by the manufacturer's combines, and when the Minister of Finance held a brief and registered their decrees on the statute-book. Mr. Hawthorne was here one evening in the lobby, talking in a general way to everybody who came along about the proposed changes. That was the time when the Minister of Finance, in a moment of weakness proposed to knock off the specific duties. Mr. Hawthorne said: If Foster knocks off those specific duties "and will not put them on again, we will let him know where we stand at the next election." I said to him 35 per cent ad valorem is pretty good protection. Ad valorem be hanged, he said, what we want is the specific duty to exclude these things. Well, the specific duties were put on again, and the Minister of Finance having heard from Mr. Hawthorne, Mr. Hawthorne heard from the Controller of Customs, and Mr. Hawthorne has been paid for collecting information which is to be used for his own private interest. It is about as nice a job as any one can imagine. It is almost incorrect to say, as the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) had told us, that the Government have appointed Hawthorne. The boot is on the other leg. It is the Hawthornes, Masseys, Redpaths, and people of that ilk who have appointed the Government, and the Government do their duty by them as good nominees should. In this debate the complaint of the Minister of Finance would have been fair, if it had been borne out by the facts, that extraneous matter has been introduced. No extraneous matter has been introduced in the debate. We have discussed the question of the grievance and that only, and I claim it is a grievance. To talk about undervaluation being the same thing as smuggling, to pretend that this is a question of undervaluation, is as extraneous as possible to the question. If there was anything extraneous in the debate it was introduced by the Minister of Finance. The question before the House is whether it was right to get an interested party to gather information for the use of the Controller of Customs. I am satisfied the country will believe there is a grievance.

Mr. WELDON. I rise merely to say a few words with reference to the point affecting the rules of the House, raised by the hon. leader of the House. I think it well to call the attention of the House to the English practice. Up to the change made a few years ago in the English rules, it seems clear enough, from the books of authority, that the Speaker had lodged in him, on motions to adjourn the House made on proceeding to the Orders of the Day, the discretion to rule that the matter was or was not urgent. If he ruled that the matter brought up was urgent, he allowed the discussion to go on, but insisted that it should be kept within the narrowest possible limits. And, furthermore, the leaders of the House—and none more strongly than Mr. Gladstone himself, old and experienced parliamentarian as he was—were very careful that these limits should not be exceeded, and sometimes, even where the Speaker ruled that the matter was urgent, Mr. Gladstone, with all the weight of his great authority in parliamentary practice, took the responsibility of insisting that the question must be brought up at another time and in another way, and refused frequently to discuss its merits on such motion. More recently the abuses to which this procedure gave rise, in impeding the proper discharge of public business, caused the House of Commons to take a new departure, and lay down the new rule which, with the consent of the House, I will read:

A motion for the adjournment of the House, for the purpose of raising debate, may only be made when all the questions to members upon the Notice paper have been disposed of, and before the Orders of the Day, notices of motion, or motions at the commencement of public business have been entered upon. The member who desires to make such a motion, having previously delivered to the Speaker a written statement of the subject to be discussed, rises in his place and states that he asks leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, and he states the matter.

If the leave of the House be not given, Mr. Speaker desires those members who support the motion, to rise in their places; and, if not less than forty members rise accordingly, Mr. Speaker calls on the member to make the motion. If, however, fewer than forty members, and not less than ten, have so risen, the member may, if he thinks fit, claim a division, upon question put forthwith to determine whether such motion may be made.

Now, the experience of England is of profit to us. Every one must admit that it is an abuse of power to make so many motions to adjourn in order to provoke a discussion on so many matters, some of them urgent or of very grave importance, as have been on during the present session. I think every hon. gentleman will agree that at no time during eight sessions has that rule been so far stretched as this session.

Mr. LAURIER. How many times?

Mr. WELDON. A good many.

Mr. LAURIER. Three times.

Mr. WELDON. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that we may hear your view of the present rule; and I hope the House will consent, if it be necessary—if the present rule be not sufficiently stringent—to adopt something approaching the stringency of the English rule.

Mr. PRIOR. As an importer, I do not think it would be right for me to be silent on an occasion of this kind, and I feel bound to say a word in defence of the Controller of Customs. Hon. gentlemen opposite, who have spoken on this matter, may be very successful politicians, but it seems to me that they are not practical business men. My hon. friend, the Controller of Customs, as far as I can make out, has done nothing wrong at all. He simply wished to carry out the business of his department in the way he is supposed to do by the country. Any one in business knows perfectly well—any one who buys anything from the United States—the artifices put forward by the American manufacturers to get their goods into this country below the prices at which they sell them in the United States. The hon. member for North Norfolk said, that as a rule, goods were sold on lists and the discounts were changed—that large discounts were given varying from 20 to 85 per cent. That is a fact, but there are lists and lists, and there are manufacturers and manufacturers. There are honest and dishonest manufacturers, and I can assure the hon. member for North Norfolk that in my own personal experience I have seen, time and time again, one list for the United States and one for Canada. That being the case, how can the Controller be expected to accept these lists as authentic unless he has evidence to that effect? Not only that, but there are manufacturers in the United States who are only too willing, if they can make a sale of goods, to send a blank invoice and ask the buyer to fill it up himself. I will leave it to any importer in the House to say if that is not a fact. I do not think that the labourer who has been spoken about to-day is the only man that wants protection; the honest importer wants protecting. Take an importer who tries to do right, who knows what the real prices of goods in the United States are and is willing to pay those prices and does pay them. He has a competitor in the same town or one who is supplying the same district as himself, and this competitor gets his goods in under false invoices and on false lists. Does not the honest importer want protecting against that sort of competition? What the hon. Minister of Finance said with regard to smuggling met my views exactly; I do not think there is any difference between a man who is smuggling and a man bringing in goods at undervaluation. We may have our different opinions as to whether these goods should come in free or be subject to duty, but so long as the law of the land provides that they shall be dutiable, it is the duty of the Controller of Customs to see that they are entered at a proper valuation. I think everybody will agree with me that although the importer and the consumer may like to get their goods as cheap as they can, the honest people among them do not want to do it in any unfair manner, and it is only by the Controller of Customs getting the best quotations he can—and in order to do that he must have the evidence in each case collected by a man who understands the business—that justice can be done to all. I do not see how the Opposition can reasonably attack the Controller of Customs for carrying out his duty. I did not wish to take part in the general discussion, but I thought that as an importer it was not right for me to hear this attack upon the hon. gentleman and not say a word in his defence.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman intervenes in this debate apparently in the character of an impartial observer, and he will probably be surprised to learn that very little exception can be taken to the general tenor of his argument. The larger part of that argument is entirely apart from the question before the House and from the charge made against the administration of the Customs Department. We know that the law exists providing that if goods are imported into Canada at lower prices than they are sold at in the regular way in the country from which they are imported, it is the duty of the Customs Department to intervene. Nobody is here advocating smuggling or the importation of goods at undervaluation.

Mr. PRIOR. Yes, they did.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior), following the lead given him by the leader of the House, who skilfully tried to draw a red herring across the trail, has been arguing upon a point entirely foreign to the specific charge made against the Controller of Customs. The charge is not brought against him that he attempted to carry out the law, because we are anxious to see it carried out, but that in the carrying out of the law, he has engaged the assistance of a party directly interested in preventing goods being brought from abroad and that in this justice is not being done to the importer. It has been pointed out that this gentleman is the general manager of an association of the largest firms engaged in the manufacture of hardware, and it is the interest of that association and their agents that foreign importations shall be hampered and prevented so far as they can be, so that the hardware merchants may be compelled to buy from the manufacturers at home. Now, I would appeal to any honest and impartial man, is this gentleman a fair disinterested man to send upon this delicate errand? Sir, I do not think the hon. member for Victoria will acknowledge the assumption implied in his remarks that the hardware merchants in this country are knaves. I know a good many of them, and I know them to be among the most honest and capable business men in the country. If a spy is to be put upon their track and their importations are to be examined let it be done, but in the name of heaven let it be done with some show of honesty and fair-play. Do not take a man who has an interest in preventing them from importing their goods and send him to report whether there has been any improper valuation or not; send an impartial disinterested man. Now, we have had not only a statement made as to who this gentleman is, but we have a member of this House rising in his place and giving his personal testimony that this gentleman is personally interested to a large extent and that he last session expressed to a member of the House in a manner not creditable to himself as to the improvements the Minister of Finance was making. Will any hon. member say that this was a proper man to send on such a delicate mission? But the Controller of Customs with the knowledge that this was an interested and improper man to choose for such a mission, sent him to make this report, and he makes a report the effect of which is to hamper the importers—

Mr. PRIOR. How does it injure the importer?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How does it injure the importer? Surely that has been made plain. This gentleman goes out to ascertain and to show if he possibly can that the prices at which the importers had purchased their goods are not fair prices.

Mr. PRIOR. If they want to purchase at fair prices—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) They do want to purchase at fair prices. But I suppose you want the investigation made by an impartial man, not by a man who is interested in proving one side of the case. As to the statement made by one hon. gentleman that this question was not of sufficient importance to justify my hon. friend in moving the adjournment of the House, all that I can say is that I do not agree with him. The motion to adjourn has not been abused. It has been moved three times this session, and in each case the question brought up was of the gravest importance, and I venture to say that the three discussions that took place challenged the attention not of this House only but of the whole country from British Columbia to Nova Scotia. Sir, we propose on this occasion to do our duty as we have done it on other occasions; and, having brought this matter before the House we are not going to allow hon. gentlemen to escape by bringing in side issues or attempting to turn attention away from the charge that is brought against them.

Mr. OUIMET. Two questions arise in this debate. The first is a question of procedure—whether it is well for this House to encourage such discussions, and whether it is fair for the Opposition to bring on debates of this kind without giving any notice at all. I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that the motion for adjournment before the Orders of the Day are called has often been resorted to in order to bring up matters of great public importance and of special urgency. In such a case it could not be objected to, but I say that in every such case it is the rule, and it is according to the dictates of ordinary courtesy, that the hon. member who wishes to raise a question of that kind shall give notice, even if only a short notice, to the Minister or member whom the question may affect particularly. In this case I venture to say that an hour's notice given to the hon. Controller of Customs would have placed him in a position to bring all the papers and give a full defence, if he has any, and he has shown he had a good defence to offer. I do believe, Mr. Speaker, that such a practice ought to be discouraged. Now, it has been said that the grievances of the people should be brought up at any time and ventilated. This would apply, Mr. Speaker, if the grievances were really grievances of the people. But I think that in most cases they are only grievances of the Opposition against the Government, and I think the people at large are very little interested in the discussion of these party grievances, which after all have not, as viewed from outside, the magnitude that gentlemen opposite seem to think. These gentlemen seem to be always anxious to bring questions before this House without notice and upon subjects respecting which the papers have not been brought down. But as soon as the papers are down and the question placed fairly before the public, they are very careful not to discuss them. They are very anxious at times to give their advice to the advisers of His Excellency. They appear to be very anxious that we should know exactly what we should do according to their opinions. But in some questions that are before the public and that have been before the public for many years, they do not seem to be so anxious that their position should be known. If this question is to be brought up, Mr. Speaker, in justice to those who administer the Customs Department, notice should be given in the regular way. Mr. Hawthorne can be brought any day before the Committee on Public Accounts, and he can there be called to account for his conduct. The Controller of Customs also may be brought to account for that appointment, and then the country would know exactly what to think of the appointment of Mr. Hawthorne. Then, Mr. Speaker, if this special question is of so much importance for the Opposition, why should it not be referred to a special committee? It seems to me that the challenge of my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor) deserves to be taken up. He has challenged the Opposition that if he was given a committee he would prove to the satisfaction of this House and the country that in every case goods manufactured in the United States were sold to the consumers in that country at a higher price than the same articles are sold in this country. We have been talking here for nearly a week about protection and its effect upon the prosperity of the country; here is an opportunity for the hon. gentlemen to establish the very basis of their contention: that protection raises the price of manufactured goods in this country. The Americans are willing now to send us their goods at a slaughter price in order to compete with the manufacturers of this country, but they must not be allowed to bring their goods in, either free or at an undervaluation. The result would be that our manufacturers would be obliged to close their doors. And, Mr. Speaker, after their doors were closed, what would then happen? The American manufacturers would then sell us their goods at the same price at which they sell them to their own consumers. Sir, the Controller of Customs had only been enforcing the law in the course he has taken. The law must be enforced, because the policy of this country is embodied in the law; and if that law were not carried out, it would be a graver reproach to the Government than is this charge now made against the Government that they are endeavouring to ascertain in an improper way the ordinary price of those goods in the American market. As I said before, two things grow out of this debate: first, that the Opposition are too anxious to start debates on questions when proper information is not before the House; and I say they ought to submit to the ordinary rules of procedure under which no debate can be raised under these circumstances, except on questions of privilege, and even on questions of privilege there must be urgency shown. In the second place, this debate will prove to the public that the law is carried out not only for the protection of the manufacturers, but for the protection of the revenue of the country and also for the protection of the consumers. Who will deny that the tariff has been made to protect the manufacturers? On this side of the House we never conceal our policy—the tariff has been made to encourage and protect the manufacture of goods in this country with the labour of this country, and when possible with the raw material of this country, and we are not ashamed to say that we intend to carry out that policy to its full extent. We will keep faith with the manufacturers, as we will keep faith with the consumers. The course pursued by the Controller of Customs shows, and the challenge of the hon. member for Leeds proves it, to my mind, that we are endeavouring to protect our manufacturers against undue competition from the United States, a competition which, if it were successful, would have no other result than to crush our manufacturers and to increase the price of goods to the consumers of this country.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think the question before the House has been plainly stated by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies). There is not a single Minister on the Treasury benches who has dared to reply to the charge he has made. The hon. Minister who has just taken his seat, either does not understand the charge that is made, or if he does, he wants to avoid answering it. Neither himself nor any other Minister has attempted to reply to the direct charge. The question of protection is not under discussion, the tariff policy of the country is not under discussion. The question under discussion is this: that the Customs Department have placed in the hands of an interested party the right, in the interest of the manufacturers of Canada, to go to the United States, and, in their interest, and in order to exclude the introduction of manufactured goods from that country, to arrange and fix values and prices upon which they shall be permitted to come in here, and upon which duty shall be paid. That is the charge, and no member of the Government has attempted to answer it. Nobody for a moment thinks that it would be improper on the part of the Government to ascertain, through a disinterested party, what is the proper value of goods that may be entered for consumption into Canada, for such a course is in accordance with the Act. But the point is that the Government have taken the chief manager, the man that goes over the whole of the concerns of which he is the general manager, to arrange the price upon which goods shall be admitted into this country and upon which duty shall be paid. That is the man that has been sent to the United States, clothed with authority from the Controller of Customs, to find out, in the interest, presumably, of the country, but actually in the interest of the party that pays and keeps him in his present position, and whose interest is more important to him than the interest of the customs of the country. He goes clothed with that double authority, first, in the interests of the manufacturing institutions of this country, and secondly, in the interests of this country, and he fixes the price upon which the goods shall be introduced here. Now, I want to draw the attention of the House to one point that has not been touched upon, and that is that last night the Controller of Customs said that the price at which goods would be admitted from the United States into Canada, was the price at which they will be placed in the hands of the consumers in the United States. He made that statement with regard to binders. Now, it is well known that there is a difference between the wholesale and retail price of binders in the United States, but the Controller of Customs will not admit a binder into Canada at the wholesale price at which these binders are sold by the car load in every portion of the United States. He won't do that, but he will admit a binder into Canada at the price at which it is placed in the hands of the user.

Mr. WALLACE. No.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes; that was his answer last night. And, as a result of that, what has he done? By Order in Council the Government have decided that the duty on binders shall be $20, no matter what the price is. Binders are sold by retail in the United States for $100, and so the department have placed the duty in Canada at $20. The Controller does not collect the duty on the wholesale price, but on the retail price.

Mr. WALLACE. That is not so. I took the prices that the manufacturers themselves gave to me, and I sent an officer there to verify them. Those were the wholesale prices. They, I may say, were the prices for last year.

Mr. McMULLEN. If hon. members will turn to the Trade and Navigation Returns they will find that there were imported during the year into Canada, 755 binders, and that the duty paid on each was an average of $32. It will also be found that no binder was valued at less than $100. The hon. gentleman cannot pretend to say that $100 is the wholesale price of a binder?

Mr. WALLACE. The Trade and Navigation Returns cover three-fourths of the year under the old tariff, and only one-fourth of the year under the new tariff.

Mr. McMULLEN. The statements show that all the binders have been valued for importation into Canada, at not less than $100 each.

Mr. WALLACE. No; it shows that they were so imported under the old tariff.

Mr. McMULLEN. Last year, I put a question on this subject to the Controller, and he stated that the prices on which the duty was charged on binders coming into Canada was the price at which they were placed in the hands of the consumers in the United States.

Mr. WALLACE. No.

Mr. McMULLEN. I will turn up the question, and bring it to the attention of the House. Instead of placing the valuation of binders coming into Canada at the wholesale prices in the United States, the Customs Department prostituted their powers to meet the wishes of the manufacturers, and imposed duties at the retail prices, and not at the wholesale prices.

Mr. SPEAKER. I may ask the indulgence of the House while I express my own views with regard to the points raised respecting the moving of motions for the adjournment of the House. In order to make my own views more explicit, I beg leave to submit observations which were made by Speakers of the English House of Commons before the rule referred to by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) was adopted. In 1867, Mr. Speaker Denison made the following observations:—

Sir John Pakington made a personal explanation of an answer given by him on a former occasion, and being followed by Captain Vivian, who said he would move the adjournment of the House,

Mr. Speaker said the House had permitted a personal explanation to be made, but the right of moving the adjournment of the House was reserved for occasions on which questions of gravity were to be brought before it.

Then, on 3rd March, 1869, Mr. Speaker Denison spoke as follows:—

Mr. Newdegate moved the adjournment of the House for the purpose of explaining the case.

Mr. Speaker said he could not put the question without reminding the House that the privilege of moving the adjournment of the House upon asking a question, had been reserved, by the common consent of the House, for occasions of urgency. Unless that privilege were exercised with forbearance, the result would be fatal to the successful conduct of public business.

Again, in 1871, Mr. Speaker Denison said:

The House, when deciding that debates should not be permitted to arise when questions were asked, reserved cases of emergency, when a member might obtain the privilege of speaking by moving the adjournment of the House. That point was considered in the committee on the business of the House, and it was agreed not to disturb the existing state of the rule, but to leave it, in the hope that discretion would be ever used, and great forbearance practised regarding the business of the House; under that impression and with that understanding, the rule was maintained as it now stands.

Sir Erskine May, at page 356 of his "Parliamentary Practice," says:

The adjournment of the House had often been moved in putting questions, but such a course was generally reserved for occasions of urgency; and, if otherwise used, was met by the House with impatience and disfavour, and by grave remonstrances from the Chair. And, at length, the inconvenience became so great that the following standing order was made on 27th November, 1882.

And then follows the order, which the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) has read, and which I need not repeat. In regard to our own rules, I may say that rule 30 of the House of Commons reads as follows:—

A motion to adjourn shall always be in order; but no second motion to the same effect shall be made until after some intermediate proceeding shall have been had.

Mr. Bourinot, in his work, refers to the moving of substantive motions for the adjournment of the House in the following terms:—

Substantive motions for the adjournment of the House ought to be reserved for occasions when it is necessary to discuss questions of gravity. They are not unfrequently proposed in the Canadian Commons with a view of bringing before it some question in which a member is immediately interested, and which he believes should be explained by himself with as little delay as possible. Consequently, we find they have been sometimes made for the purpose of giving a positive denial to certain charges made against members. In 1878, a member brought to the notice of the House, on such a motion, that certain Dominion officials were taking part in the provincial elections of Quebec. In 1891—

I am sure we will all remember this :

Mr. Laurier initiated in this way a long debate on the formation and policy of the new Administration, formed on the death of Sir John Macdonald, Premier of the Ministry, consequently dissolved ipso facto.

I may say with respect to my own parliamentary experience, which has extended over twenty-two years nearly, that I have never known any session during the whole of that term when this privilege of moving the adjournment of the House has been so frequently resorted to as it has been this session. Of course, it is for the House itself to determine whether the question brought up by an hon. member is of sufficient urgency to justify the course of moving the adjournment; but I submit, with all due deference to the House, that this right of moving the adjournment of the House ought to be reserved for occasions of greater gravity and urgency than those on which this motion has been moved during the present session.

Motion negatived.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. SMITH (Ontario). Mr. Speaker, an impartial observer of the discussion which has been going on in this House for the past two weeks must have arrived at the conclusion that there is a very great difference of feeling between the two parties as to the future of our country. Those upon this side of the House are bright and hopeful, those upon the other side dark and despondent. Sir, if I were engaging a man for the farm to-morrow, and had the choice of two, the one taking a hopeful and bright view of everything, and the other seeing everything dark, which do you think I would choose? The man that would suit me best would be the one who took a hopeful view of the coming season. So it is with the hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. They have been trying to toy with the electors of this country; but the people of Canada have made up their minds that they prefer a party who has had for a number of years a definite policy—and which for the last sixteen years the people have from time to time endorsed at the polls—in preference to a party which has upon almost every occasion changed its policy. The hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin) stated the other day that the Reform party never changed its policy. The hon. member must have a short memory. In connection with this statement, I would like to read an amendment moved during the session of 1888 by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). It reads :

Mr. SPEAKER.

That it is highly desirable that the largest possible freedom of commercial intercourse should obtain between the Dominion of Canada and the United States, and that it is expedient that all articles manufactured in, or natural products of either of the said countries should be admitted free of duty into the ports of the other (articles subject to duties of excise or of internal revenue alone excepted).

That it is further expedient that the Government of the Dominion should take steps at an early date to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity of trade therewith.

The hon. member, in support of this motion, used the following language. He said :

I am not greatly given to indulging in conventional formalities, but it is not in the spirit of conventional formality that I say that I rise on this occasion to address this House under a sense of grave and weighty responsibility. It is true, that I am fortified and encouraged in bringing forward this motion by the knowledge that in so doing I only voice the opinions of the representatives of the Liberal party in this Parliament; and furthermore, that I have every reason a man can have for believing that when I give utterance to their opinions, I also give utterance to the opinions of the vast majority of those who support us.

Further on, he said :

It has been made a grave ground, it has been attempted to be set up as an insuperable ground for objection, that, when you propose to enter into a treaty for unrestricted trade with the United States, you must thereby, of necessity, discriminate against English manufactures and the manufactures of all other countries except the United States. Now, that is true. I admit that.

To-day the Liberal party are putting forth the plea that they want free trade as they have it in England, and at the same time they are putting themselves in the position that they are giving everything away if they want to obtain closer trade relations with the country to the south of us. I take the ground, Mr. Speaker, that the statement made by the hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin) the other day was entirely incorrect. Now, let me refer for a moment to the matter which has been under discussion this afternoon, and I do so because the constituency that I have the honour to represent is somewhat interested in that trade which has been referred to by hon. gentlemen. I may say that the fears which I had last year, when the changes were under consideration in our fiscal policy, have been to a certain extent realized. I was very much afraid then that the reduction was too great, and I now unhesitatingly say, and I say it as a farmer: That I am a believer, to some extent anyway, in specific duties. I say so because I believe that specific duties are the only effectual mode of shutting out certain manufactures of the United States. The gentleman whose name has been under discussion this afternoon is, to my knowledge, a thoroughly practical man in his business. If, requiring an investigation, the Customs Department wanted an efficient man, surely they would scarcely take anyone but a man who had a practical knowledge of the business. Mr. Hawthorne, for a number of years, has been practically engaged in the business, and whilst it is true that, perhaps, he took strong ground last year against the reduction of duties, yet he has from that time to this manfully accepted the situation. He believed that American goods were coming into Canada at an undervaluation, and there can be no doubt that his investigation proved that, and proved it most conclusively. All I can say, Mr. Speaker, is, that any hon. gentleman of the Opposition who has spoken upon that question can scarcely expect to make very many votes for his party if, when the election comes, he pays a visit to South Ontario, because the people of that riding already feel the effect of the reduced duty. I make the statement, that I believe a number of these reductions were made to a great extent, to satisfy the plea put forth by the farmers of Canada, but whilst the reduction pleased the farmers for a moment, they now find that to-day they are not buying a single article which they require, at a cheaper price than they could buy it for previous to the reduction. They are getting articles no cheaper, and the change of tariff has unsettled our manufactures. I will for a moment, Mr. Speaker, refer to some articles which come into daily use on the farm, and I will compare the prices at which they are sold in Canada with the prices at which they are sold in the United States. The following will give you proof that these articles are cheaper in Canada than on the other side. The price of each article in Canada and the price in the United States is given :

The statement made by an hon. member this afternoon that these articles are purchased as cheaply or more cheaply in Canada than in the United States, is a fair and honest one, and if a thorough investigation were made, that statement would be fully borne out by the facts. Now, Mr. Speaker, there are three points in connection with the commerce of Canada which I would like for a little while to discuss. The first is the contention that any protective duty levied upon foreign imports must necessarily impose upon the consumers of the protected country an additional cost on the goods manufactured in their own country, equal to the duty levied and the profit charged thereon by the importers of similar goods. In 1893-94, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns, we imported from the United States $21,000,000 worth of manufactured goods. In connection with this, I may say that a very large proportion of that was formerly imported from free-trade England. Now, the United States is, perhaps, the most highly protected country in the world, and in selling those goods, it would have to meet the competition, not only of free-trade England, but of the rest of the world, and, therefore, its prices, quality for quality, would have to be as low as those of its competitors, or else they would not be purchased in Canada. We do buy those articles, and, consequently, it follows that the United States, under its almost exclusive policy, has succeeded in producing at as low a cost as the cheap-labour countries of Europe. Superior inventive skill, high-class machinery, and a thorough knowledge of the tastes and requirements of our country have enabled the United States to succeed in competition with the cheaper labour, the greater capital and the longer experience of England, Belgium, and other European countries. This is due wholly to its protective policy. It has given them control of the home market. They are able to compete in the supply of many articles, notably iron and steel, and all kinds of machinery, against the world. They have conclusively proved that protection does not involve burdens upon consumers. This is the result arrived at under the National Policy. Now, after a few years of protection, we claim that the home competition will reduce the cost of the larger part of home manufactures to as low a cost as if the same goods were admitted free of duty. The plea is put forward that the duty should not be maintained. But, take such a period as we have witnessed in the last twelve or eighteen months, when a great business crisis existed not only in the United States, but in some European countries, forcing manufacturers to sell their products in many cases at a great sacrifice. By continuing the duty, we steady our own market, and give our people the control of that market. Now, another point which I propose to discuss is the frequent contention that any duties levied on imports of agricultural produce must prove illusory, and be of no advantage to the Canadian farmer, because the price of his products is invariably regulated by the price ruling in England. To a certain extent, I am prepared to admit that the prices of our farm products are governed by English quotations: but the fallacy of that contention lies in the attempt to establish an invariable rule from general results. In connection with this, allow me to quote a few figures. In 1888-89, we imported, for home consumption, 15,124 bushels of wheat upon which we paid a duty of $2,268.41, and, in the same year, we imported 257,391 barrels of flour, on which we paid a duty of $128,696. In 1889-90 we imported 188,908 bushels of wheat, on which we paid a duty of $28,336, and we imported 167,039 barrels of flour, on which we paid a duty of $83,356. Now, it has been contended, time and again, not only in this House, but on many public platforms in the country, that the National Policy would never allow the price of wheat to go below $1 a bushel; but no advocate of the National Policy, either in this House or in the country, believes that that would be an invariable rule. What we did claim was, that in years of scarcity a duty would be of great service to us. Allow me, in this connection, to refer for a moment to a statement made yesterday by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), to the effect that protection might possibly be of some service to the farmers of England, because they did not produce all that the country needed. Would it not naturally follow that in years of scarcity a protective duty would also be of service to the farmers of Canada? Now, the price of wheat to-day is about 71 cents in Detroit, and 86 cents in Toronto, and the United States millers and dealers, in bringing wheat into Canada, found that its price was 15 cents a bushel higher here than in the United States, or they would have sent their wheat to the English market. They also found that every barrel of flour sent into Canada was 50 cents a barrel higher in Canada than in the United States. Now, I want to refer for a moment to oats. In 1889-90 we imported 351,965 bushels of oats, on which we paid a duty of $35,197. Now, will any one pretend to say that the farmers did not realize more for their oats than they would have done if there had been no duty? We had a duty of 10 cents a bushel on oats; and, in thus shutting out American oats, which are usually cheaper than Canadian it causes a great many more Canadian oats to be consumed in this country. In certain years, it is true, we did export some oats, but not as a rule. Now, I want to call attention to the beef and pork products. In 1889-90 we imported, of lard, bacon, hams and shoulders, pork, beef, prepared meats, pork in the carcass, and meats not otherwise specified, $2,213,936 worth, on which we received a duty of $418,421. In 1893-94 we imported of the same products, $730,360 worth, half of which was in bond in mess pork, and on this we received a duty of $196,525. In the same year we exported $4,093,564 worth. This was after the increased duty had been placed on those articles. I do not for a moment say that the increase in duty on beef and pork had raised the price in Canada by the extent of the duty; but I do say that the protective policy, by securing the Canadian farmer against glutted markets from American imports, has imparted such a stimulus to our trade that our farmers have not only been able to supply our own market, but, by gradual improvement in the quality of the products, have created for themselves a foreign market to the extent of over $4,000,000, besides supplying the home market with $2,000,000 worth of these products, the quantity imported in 1888-89. Now, the true design of protection is to supply the home market, and, after that, to look abroad for the sale of any surplus we have. The last point which I intend to discuss is the frequent assertion that the prosperity of Canada is so dependent upon free intercourse with the United States, that our fiscal policy should be framed, and the best efforts of our Government exercised in order to the adoption of such a treaty of reciprocity with that Government as they may be willing to offer. In the section that I have the honour of representing, there can be no question about this. I do not wish to discuss the statement that under the old reciprocity treaty we were very prosperous. There were many reasons for that prosperity which I do not intend to state here to-day, because they have been stated so often before, but it is just possible that in that particular section we might not be injured by reciprocity with the United States. But I make this statement only from a local standpoint. I wish to say this, however, that I do not think that Canada is compelled to have a treaty with the United States, and I will give you my reasons. In 1893-94, Canada collected $1,634,524 in customs duties on raw products coming from the United States, half of which was on bituminous coal. Under reciprocity, that would be altogether lost. Have we not gone as far as it is respectable with the Government of the United States in trying to get closer trade relations? It is possible that the only thing that would suit them would be to give them control of our fiscal system, so that differences might arise between Canada and the mother country. It is possible, and I speak for certain sections outside of my own, that we might gain on horses, lambs, barley, beans, seed-peas, eggs, potatoes, hay and flax-seed. But we would undoubtedly lose on hog products, flour, wheat, oats, clover and grass-seeds. Comparing the two, there would perhaps be very little difference either way. But I would just, in connection with that statement, refer for a moment to the statement made the other night by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan). He said that on certain articles the farmer had to sell, he had lost during the last three or four years $7,691,000. I scarcely wonder, after such a statement, that the hon. gentleman should keep continually preaching blue ruin. Upon cattle, he said, our farmers have lost $4,363,000, and they would gain $10 per head if we had free access to the American markets. But if you will turn up the statistical records, Mr. Speaker, you will find that the United States exported of cattle alone 360,000 head. The hon. gentleman went on in the same way with hogs, and then he took up barley. He said that the last year of the McKinley Bill, we raised 12,000,000 bushels, and sent 9,000,000 bushels to the United States. I thought it was 10,000,000, but I will not dispute with the hon. gentleman about a million bushels difference; and upon that, he said, we lost 18 cents a bushel. We lost this 18 cents, he claimed, because the United States charged a duty of 18 cents a bushel. Well, is that our fault? Have we not done everything reasonable and honourable to meet the Americans fairly upon that question? That is their business, and we have no right to quarrel with them. But let us look at that a little further. Last year we sent about 1,000,000 bushels of barley to the markets of the United States, but if we had sent 9,000,000, what would have been the result? They had sufficient with our million to supply their wants, but if 8,000,000 bushels extra had gone into that country, that would have completely broken their market. They would not only have been the losers, but we as well. The hon. gentleman went on to take oats and lambs, and I may point out to him in that connection that during the last season the Americans were shipping sheep and horses from the ports of Montreal to the markets of the mother country, and it does appear to me that we should upon all occasions not go into a market which is producing and supplying the same things as we do, but rather seek the market which requires all the surplus of the world. Let me go a little further into the discussion of the commerce of the two countries, and I will make this statement, at the outset, that Canada is in a better position to dictate terms to the United States than the United States are to dictate to Canada. Canada exported to the United States, during the year ending 30th June, 1894, $30,705,649. About $5,000,000 of that was sent to the United States market, not in bond, but shipped out again to other markets. We imported from the United States for consumption, $51,146,091. This shows that Canada imported 70 per cent more merchandise from the United States than the United States did from Canada. But let me go a little further into that question. Take the three years, 1889-90, 1890-91 and 1891-92. In 1889-90, we exported to the United States $32,416,156; in 1890-91, we exported $35,079,402; in 1891-92, we exported $29,452,540, or a total of $96,948,098. In those same years we imported from the United States as follows:—In 1889-90, $52,291,973; in 1890-91, $53,685,658; in 1891-92, $53,137,572, or a total of $159,115,202. So that we imported $62,167,104 more from the United States than we exported to the United States, or 64 per cent. It is said that it would be unreasonable to expect reciprocity from the United States in raw products, but Canada purchased from the United States $26,000,000 in raw products during 1893-94, while in the same year the United States purchased from Canada only $30,000,000 all told. This is convincing, to my mind, that we are not altogether dependent upon the people of the United States for a market, that we are under no particular obligation to the United States, and that if it comes to the pinch, they will have to bow the knee to Canada rather than the reverse. As regards the beet root sugar industry, it is proved that industry has not obtained the hold in Canada which a few years ago it was hoped it would, but its progress has at least been steady; and with the bounty given it, we may hope that that industry will extend throughout the province of Quebec, and even further west into Ontario. That is just another example of what the Government are doing to assist the farmers. Now, the speech of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) yesterday pictured Canada in its darkest colours. The picture he drew was scarcely of the kind to induce the stranger who might come to Canada to settle here. He is somewhat different, however, from his brother, Mr. W. A. Charlton, M.P.P., who represents, I believe, one of the ridings of the same county. Here is an extract from an interview with the hon. gentleman :

"How do you find things?"

"Improving. Everything is looking better. I am largely interested in lumbering, and that, too, is showing strong signs of revival."

"And you think the improvement general?"

"I do. You see, we're like the sick man in the old country. He got so bad he couldn't get any worse. He either had to die or get better. Now, trade in Canada is getting better, and the outlook, as far as I can see, is good."

That seems rather the language of a Conservative, of a good National Policy supporter. Before I sit down, I would like to congratulate the Minister of Finance and the Government upon their hopeful tone for the future of Canada, because I believe, though the clouds may have lowered, and though we may to a certain extent have had adversity in some lines, still Canada is weathering the storm better than any other country under the sun. I venture to say that, with the hopeful Government we have controlling the affairs of this country, Canada must grow in prosperity year by year.

Mr. FLINT. I congratulate my hon. friend from Ontario (Mr. Smith) upon the tone of the first portion of his speech. It differs very materially as a whole from that of many of his colleagues on the other side of the House. Of course the hon. gentleman could not conclude without one or two of the old familiar touches which always tend to bring a little applause from the gentlemen who sit around him. When our hon. friends on the other side of the House touch upon the question of blue ruin, then, of course, they are upon their native heath; for it is by reason of the blue ruin they talked that they got into power, and it is to be assumed that it is by trading upon that cry that they hope to keep gentlemen on this side of the House from attaining power in a short time. Who does not recollect the impassioned outburst of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals when, raising both hands he shouted "Good heavens preserve this country from ruin, devastation and disaster if the Opposition should attain the Treasury benches?"

The history of gentlemen opposite has been one of trading upon that sentiment of our common nature which detests a gloomy view of things; and I protest that the allegation they make that gentlemen on this side have been decrying the country is one opposed not only to the facts, but opposed to the whole tenor of the arguments of the Liberal party from 1879 down to the present day. It is a pure burlesque of the attitude and principles of the leaders and of the rank and file of the Liberal party. It suits these hon. gentlemen when we criticise the claims, the impudent and absurd claims they make as to the progress and the prosperity of the country, to say we are condemning the country. We are only condemning the management, or rather the mismanagement and want of management of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. I was amused to hear one of the hon. gentlemen, I believe he was a professional gentleman, who, in his speech, which was an able argument from the standpoint of the protectionist, stated that "we" had raised the export trade of the country from 1879 to 1892 by a certain number of millions. That is the line assumed by all these hon. gentlemen—that "we" the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Railways, and the Minister of Public Works and the rest, sitting together in council had, by some manipulation, increased the export trade of the country. The export trade of the country has increased to the benefit of all the various classes of the people, and under the blessing of Providence the country has in a certain degree, prospered, but it has been in spite of the policy which these gentlemen have adopted.

I had not the pleasure the other evening, of hearing the address of the Controller of Customs, as I had to be absent shortly after he began his speech. But I can easily picture it in my mind because, as I saw in the newspaper summaries next day, it was of the same character as other speeches of gentlemen opposite, and such as they have delivered for the last ten or twelve years. A Conservative speech will generally be found to be made up about as follows:—You will find about 30 per cent is abuse and misrepresentation of the mother country because she has adopted and adheres to a system of free trade; about 30 per cent consists of gross misrepresentation of the trade and financial history of the country under the Liberal regime from 1874 to 1878 and abuse of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright); about 30 per cent is made up of general criticism and misrepresentation of the present policy of the Liberal party, and the balance of 10 per cent is filled in according to the personal idiosyncracies of the hon. gentleman who happens to make the address. We all know the nature of the attacks upon the Liberal policy. One statement is that the Liberals have no policy, and in every mood and tense, and in almost every tone of ridicule and contempt the Liberals are pictured as men drifting without a policy. But within a few seconds the speaker will often turn to abuse or ridicule of the Liberals because they have too many policies. And upon this ground our Conservative friends always manage to grow exceedingly eloquent. If they adhered to the facts, if they adhered to the record as presented by resolutions in this House or by the Liberal leaders from time to time or by the platform of the Liberal party as enumerated by those authorized to do so, they could not, and would not if they were honest men, say that the Liberal party had a variety of politics in regard to the trade and fiscal legislation of this country. One favourite observation of these gentlemen is that the Liberals have favoured unrestricted reciprocity, continental union, commercial union—and so they vary the phraseology, and attempt, but without success, to represent these as policies adopted at various times by the Liberal party and as policies which differ essentially and in detail from one another. I challenge and defy hon. gentlemen on the other side, from this moment and until this debate shall close, to show one line or syllable from any resolution placed before this House, any resolution adopted by an authorized body of Liberals, or any statement by any leader of the party in favour of commercial union with the United States as has been asserted. It is simply incorrect, and—I do not use the language as applying to any of my parliamentary colleagues—it is an absolute falsehood for any person to make such an assertion. There never was and, in the nature of things, there could not be any such proposition made or supported by a Liberal leader or by the Liberal party. It is true that the professions of the Liberals in favour of a broad scheme of reciprocity looked to the making of an unrestricted list of the articles covered by the negotiations, but this has been twisted so as to imply that the Liberal party desired the entire abolition of a revenue tariff between this country and the United States. It is a burlesque upon any policy ever laid down by the Liberals party or any of its leaders, so absurdly to misrepresent the schemes of unrestricted reciprocity. The very terms of the Opposition resolution of 1888, just read by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Smith), who addressed the House, I must say, in a very straightforward manner, would prove this statement to be true.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Do you mean to say you never advocated the absolute destruction of duties?

Mr. FLINT. I mean to say that no hon. gentleman in this House can point out one line in which the Liberal party ever advocated the total abolition of duties upon articles imported into this country from the United States through any system of reciprocity treaty. The whole contention of the Liberal party was that in entering into negotiations for reciprocity, the whole list of our products should be opened as subjects of negotiation. The very terms of the resolution proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford, and which was quoted by the hon. member for Ontario would prove this conclusively; because in that resolution he said that unrestricted reciprocity was favoured by the Liberal party upon such terms and conditions as would be satisfactory to both countries. Point out where the Liberal party have ever indicated that the terms and conditions should involve the absolute destruction of our opportunities for raising a revenue. No line or statement looking in that direction can be found in the records of this country.

The second line of attack indulged in by our Conservative friends has been a persistent misrepresentation, or a pretended misunderstanding of the Liberal policy as enumerated in the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford. They ask us in the most plaintive tone as to the details of a revenue tariff; they would like to know the exact percentage upon every article imported into the country if the Liberal party came into power. Hon. gentlemen, of course, are aware of the absurdity of the claim they make that such a proposition should be laid before this House, either by the leader of the party, or any other of its members. It is sufficient to state the general principles upon which the Liberal party base their claim to public confidence. What was the line of policy pursued by hon. gentlemen when they were in Opposition? It is true that during four or five years of the Mackenzie Administration there was a depression of extraordinary severity felt throughout the world, felt very severely in the Dominion of Canada, alluded to formally and officially in the Speeches from the Throne delivered at several openings of Parliament, a depression which, in the very language of the Minister of Finance in referring to the condition of affairs at the present time, reduced the prices of imported goods and reduced the values of property generally, and tended to embarrass the Administration of the country in the collection of a sufficient revenue to produce an equilibrium with the expenditure. During all that period the hon. gentlemen who were then in Opposition harped upon the depression from which the country was suffering, and deliberately charged the Administration of the day with being responsible for that depression, with being the cause of that depression, because they would not forthwith enact increased taxation as a part of their tariff policy. To the credit of the Mackenzie Administration be it said that, with but one or two exceptions, they steadfastly refused to increase the burdens upon the people of this country; they refused to increase the taxation beyond a sufficient amount to produce an equilibrium between revenue and expenditure. They were pressed still further by the men then leading the Opposition to the Government, to place a still higher tariff upon the people in order to produce the prosperity which these gentlemen believed must be inevitably produced by high taxation. What was the ground taken by the Minister of Finance of that day? I will not read at length from speeches delivered by him; but throughout all these debates upon the budget during those sessions, we find the tone of the Minister of Finance to have been hopeful and confident in the ability of the country to weather the storm, in view of the great natural resources of the country, and of the probability, nay certainty, that in a short time the depression would pass away and the people would be restored to a condition of prosperity through the natural course of events.

I find in the debates that on the 22nd February, 1878, the Minister of Finance, combatting the contentions made by his opponents that it was necessary to increase the taxation of the country, that it was necessary to prevent the importation of foreign goods as much as possible in order to retain the home market for our own manufacturers, used the language which I will quote; and I ask hon. gentlemen candidly to say whether this breathes an atmosphere of distrust of the resources of our country, or of the character of the people, or of the industries of this country; whether it breathes that "atmosphere of the ruin" of which our hon. friends are never tired of talking.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT said:

Increased taxation, if carried to any considerable extent, might defeat its own object, not only by stopping the growth of this country, but also by the well-known fact that, if you raise the taxes above a certain point, you are almost sure to defeat yourself, either by diminishing consumption, or by encouraging smuggling, as we have more than once discovered to our cost. All things considered, therefore, I am disposed to advise that we should delay the consideration of the question whether it is desirable to impose any further taxes on the people or not, and I do this for these several reasons—first, because, in spite of all that is asserted to the contrary, it appears to me that there are signs of improvement in the general revenue and the general condition of this country; and, in the next place, because I believe that the receipts for the year 1876-77 were decidedly below the ordinary average; because the deficit being largely composed of the sinking fund, is not so formidable as may appear at first sight.

And so all through this address, and other addresses delivered upon the budget and cognate subjects throughout that session. With a far-seeing gaze, the Minister of Finance perceived that the era of depression was about to pass away, and he believed that so sound were all the circumstances of the country, so sound was the character of the people, so great were the natural resources at their disposal, that the depression would pass away and the country would regain its prosperity without having recourse to the drastic measures advocated by the hon. gentlemen then in Opposition. But not content with arguments of this kind calculated to depress the people still further than they were depressed by the circumstances surrounding them, the Opposition at that day called attention to the falling off in the export trade, which every person must see could not at all have been affected by the tariff, could not at all have been affected by any of the internal conditions of Canada; they called attention to the falling off in the revenue from imports, and to the enormous decrease in values, owing to the great depression existing all over the world, a depression which caused a falling off in the imports from the mother country into the United States and to all other nations of the world. These hon. gentlemen proceeded further and enunciated the policy which they intended to pursue in order to lift the country out of the condition into which they claim the Liberal Administration had brought it.

And so the hon. gentleman who subsequently became Minister of Finance in the Conservative Government, as well as the leading supporters, not only in the House but throughout the country, made this statement, and backed it up by repeated assertions of the same general character—I quote from the speech of Sir Charles Tupper, on 22nd February, 1878, in this House:

The policy of the party with which I am allied is not to increase the taxation of the people, because we do not require so much money as hon. gentlemen opposite. What we ask is not an increase of taxation, but a readjustment of taxation.

This was followed by the famous telegram so frequently alluded to, which was sent by Sir John A. Macdonald to Hon. John Boyd, in St. John, and which was afterwards sent all over the country on the eve of an election, stating that he had no idea of increasing the taxes of the people, but that a Conservative Government would reduce the expenditure to the extent of one million or two millions a year, as compared with that the Mackenzie Government had demanded. A great deal was said at that time, a great deal has been said since, until hon. gentlemen opposite began to have deficits of their own, as to the terrible calamity which a deficit brought upon the country. When the Liberals were in power, struggling with all the courage they could muster against the depression in trade, and against the difficulties with which the people were contending, when one or two small deficits, less than one-third of those which we have had to meet in the full bloom and flower of the National Policy, those hon. gentlemen could scarcely find language strong enough with which to denounce the Administration of that day for not equalizing expenditure with revenue. It seems, however, that their tone was not always of that character, that their leaders did not always hold the same views regarding surpluses and deficits as they enunciated when deficits prevailed. In 1875 a Liberal Minister of Finance was able to announce to the country that he had a surplus. This fact, which should have been, in the ordinary course of legislation, a very gratifying one, was not received by the critics of the Government of that day with very hearty applause. We all remember the observations made by the then Dr. Tupper, when a surplus of $935,000 was reported by the Finance Minister of the Liberal Administration. Dr. Tupper said :

The Minister of Finance says we have a surplus of half a million. I say the Government have no right to have a surplus. If they have, they should endeavour to get rid of it, and the best way to do so is that pursued by us and by the Government of Great Britain—by lightening the taxes on the people.

So we find the whole policy, as enunciated from time to time, by the Conservative party when in Opposition, and upon which, presumably, they obtained a certain amount of confidence from the people, was this : In the first place, that it was not a sound policy to have a surplus, that revenue and expenditure should, in the main, be kept about even ; in the second place, that if the tariff was to be readjusted, it was to be so readjusted that there would be no increase of taxation. I think all political economists, and all constitutional judges will say, following history as demonstrated by the financial statements of the motherland, that a sound principle was laid down by Dr. Tupper when he said that the Government ought not to have a surplus. Every dollar of taxation taken out of the pockets of the people, which Parliament has not voted and fairly considered, every dollar of taxation taken out of the people which is not forthwith applied to some useful and desirable public service is unjustly and improperly taken from the people, and is liable to be improperly and extravagantly expended, and on this ground it is an unsound principle in financial legislation to provide for large surpluses.

But hon. gentlemen opposite, when in power, having enormously increased the taxation of the country, having surpluses running up to two, three or four millions a year, violated every principle of sound financial economy, and brought about that result which every impartial observer must admit would, of necessity, be brought about when such a state of things existed, that is an improper and increased expenditure, an era of wild extravagance and corruption which necessarily flows from payments into the exchequer for the expenditure of which Parliament has made no provision. The consequences have been such as we have seen. We have seen enormous taxation placed on the people. We have seen enormous surpluses taken out of their pockets to be spent in the manner I have attempted to describe, and the results that have flowed from that will tend to mar the prosperity of this country throughout the whole of its future history.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair at six o'clock, I had referred to some of the principles laid down by the predecessors of hon. gentlemen opposite when in Opposition, upon which they were building up claims to the confidence of the people of the Dominion. I had alluded to one proposition laid down by them—which has been esteemed a sound proposition in the mother country, and, I believe, by all political economists—that is, that in the main a Government should make its revenue about equal to its expenditure; in other words, that there should be, as a rule, no very large surplus at the disposal of any Administration; that every dollar possible should be left in the pockets of the people, who can administer their own money much more to their own advantage than can any committee of Parliament sitting as a Cabinet.

Of course, this principle would be, to a certain extent, modified by circumstances over which no legislature could have control. A sudden and unexpected rush of imports in one direction or another might give the Government temporarily a surplus for which they had not calculated. Another principle laid down in all the speeches of the leaders of the Opposition of that day was that deficits were disadvantageous to the true interests of the people, and to the best interests of a fair administration; and we can all recollect with what volubility and earnestness those gentlemen inveighed against the one or two deficits which befell the Mackenzie Administration owing to causes over which it is now admitted the Administration could possibly have had no control.

Had those hon. gentlemen, on their accession to power, carried out in spirit the principles which they had laid down when in Opposition, much of the illogical and absurd line of argument which they have carried on from that day to this would have been obviated, greatly to the benefit of legislation and sound political education in this country.

They were, however, entrusted with power; and we found that in both of those particulars, all their promises, as well as their prophecies were repudiated by the event. They came into Parliament and boasted from time to time of the enormous surpluses which their tariff had rolled up, and placed at their disposal—surpluses which brought about the evils to which I have alluded. I find, on glancing over the financial reports, that the total volume of the surpluses which this Administration has rolled up by means of excessive, unnecessary, ill-advised, unfair, and partial taxation, amounted to $27,862,361.

But their boasted panacea for financial reform was a failure, equally in the other direction; and, although they had ridiculed and contemned the Administration of their predecessors for an occasional small deficit, which a calm investigation at the present day shows was entirely beyond the control of any Administration, those gentlemen had deficits aggregating over $18,000,000, leaving a net surplus up to 1895, of $9,786,471. Now, according to any reasonable principle of financial administration, and according to the principles laid down by Sir Charles Tupper, when leading the Opposition in these questions, they should have had a very small surplus indeed, making all allowance for the increase of taxation, and for the change in the trade of the country, caused by the very good times which the previous Finance Minister, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) predicted in his very able review of 1878.

The whole history of the Conservative party when in Opposition was a history of promises and prophecies. They denounced, in the strongest possible terms, the Administration of the day, and the tariff of the day, as being the cause of the depression in trade, the cause of the exodus of the people from the country, the cause of many of the evils which are admitted to have existed during the latter part of that disastrous period. They promised, if entrusted with power, on the principles which they had laid down when in Opposition, and during the campaign of 1878, that they would have no surplus; in other words, that the taxation, unforeseen circumstances alone being excluded from consideration, would about equal the expenditure. They promised that they would bring about a reciprocity of trade with the United States, upon which both political parties were at that time, and upon which both profess to be at the present time, a unit. They promised, if entrusted with power, that they would not increase the taxation, although there would be a readjustment in the line of protection, which might possibly benefit a certain portion of the community. They were, however, very guarded in the use of the word protection during all the years previous to the election of 1878. At the present time, hon. gentlemen are very forward and very strong in the use of that word, and in the use of the arguments with which that principle is supported. Previous to 1878 they were so guarded that you could hardly find that word in any of the speeches either of the leaders or their supporters. As far back as 1876, when it was anticipated, owing to the falling revenue, that the Government of that day would be obliged to impose some increase of taxation in order to bring about an equilibrium between revenue and expenditure, they were severely denounced by the financial critics of that time for the proposition to increase taxation for that purpose. Sir Charles Tupper referred to it as "the thin end of the wedge of protection." Their expenditures were described as being excessive and extravagant, and Sir Charles Tupper, and those who followed him, went into details to show that it was so in almost every particular that was under the control of Parliament. They promised a positive reduction of at least $2,000,000 per annum in that expenditure. They promised that millions of capital would be introduced into the country, as a result of the readjustment of the tariff, and of the encouragement that would be given by that readjustment to manufacturing enterprises.

So strongly did they make promises upon this point that in 1882 Parliament was dissolved expressly for the purpose of receiving a verdict from the people as to whether the protective principle should prevail; and it was formally announced in the Speech from the Throne that capital seeking investment was waiting the decision of the people on that question. The leading men in the party, and notably the one who subsequently became Finance Minister, put the amount of foreign capital waiting the adoption of protection for investment at $200,000,000.

The people were led astray by these extraordinary promises made apparently in good faith. These gentlemen stated that if the country adopted their policy of protection, that policy would keep the people at home, create a home market, and make this country an immense hive of manufacturing industries. As an adjunct to that, they promised, in the strongest possible terms, that our extraordinary large volume of imports would be decreased to the benefit of the home market.

In 1879, Sir Leonard Tilley, one of the ablest leaders of the party opposite, made this statement in Parliament in introducing his Budget:

Regarding the matter as I do, I think it is to be regretted that the volume of imports has not been materially reduced. I look upon the large imports ever since the Dominion was organized, showing a large balance of trade against it, as one of the causes of trouble with which we have to contend, one of the difficulties that it is our duty to remedy. They have been decreasing to a certain extent, but are still very large, showing distinctly and clearly, in my judgment, that they ought to be still further diminished. Under these circumstances, it appears to me that we should turn our attention to the best means of reducing the volume of imports from all parts of the world.

The very thing which brought about the deficits that Mr. Mackenzie had to struggle against, and which gave rise to the denunciations showered upon him by his opponents, was one of the things which the new policy was to remedy. I find, on looking at the Trade and Navigation Returns, that the excess of imports over exports since confederation amounts to the sum of $527,578,888. I find that the excess of imports over exports since the adoption of the National Policy—that excess which the National Policy was to check—has been $247,500,000. Now, all the contentions of the partisans of this policy have been falsified by the event. They have placed enormous duties upon the imports; they have checked imports to the full extent of the powers with which Parliament vested them, and yet the excess of imports since 1879 over exports has been $247,500,000, proportionately equal to the excess under the Mackenzie Administration. A brief examination will show not only that the practical result has falsified the predictions of hon. gentlemen opposite, but also that the position they took is entirely unsound. Great Britain is the richest and most prosperous country in the world, and yet the excess of imports over exports in that wealthy country, in 1892 alone, was £132,000,000 sterling. The average excess of imports over exports for the last ten or fifteen years in the mother country has been over £100,000,000 a year; and yet we find a party in this country laying down seriously the proposition that a large excess, or any excess, of imports over exports is detrimental to prosperity. I leave that phase of the question to the consideration of any who choose to study these suggestive figures.

Hon. gentlemen opposite promised that their policy of protection would check imports. The result, however, shows that the imports not only have not been checked, but that there has been a large excess of imports since the National Policy was adopted. They promised also that their policy would keep the population in the country. They complained bitterly about the exodus. They taunted the Mackenzie Government with having caused the exodus by its policy, but the exodus then was much smaller, in proportion to the population, than it has been at any time since. That has been abundantly demonstrated in this House. I will not ask you to go with me through the census returns because the figures have been very fully discussed already. Yesterday we had the benefit of a speech from the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) in which he demonstrated, to his own satisfaction, the benign results of a policy, which only a short time ago he bitterly denounced and claimed had been the cause of the depopulation of the country. Although I cannot take the hon. member for Bellechasse as a leading representative on the other side, yet so recently has his change of opinion taken place that I think we can refer to a statement made by him as throwing some light upon this subject. After the census returns had been published, that hon. gentleman, then a follower of Mr. Laurier, in a formal speech upon the financial situation, referred to the success of the National Policy in that particular in these words:

The Hon. Mr. Blake, who is a glory to his country, who is pure, who has no stain on his past record—equal in that respect to our present worthy leader—the Hon. Mr. Blake will tell you that the present state of things, if endured much longer, will corrupt all population to the very bones; he would tell you that it is time, if you do not want to demoralize the population of Canada completely and for long generations, it is time to do away with the entire administrative system as at present conducted, so as to cut the corrupt tie that exists between the heads of departments and the officers of the departments; he would tell you that it is time to pass the sponge everywhere, to put in high places new men with new principles; and he would tell you, that under our system of constitutional government, it is not good for any country that the same party should remain too long in power, and recent events have fully exemplified that principle.

The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh) says that we are rich because we have a surplus of $4,000,000, and the people are prosperous. Mr. Speaker, what is this surplus? It is the balance unexpended of the money that is paid into the treasury by the people, that is the surplus. Does that prove that the people are prosperous?

Now we come to something that the hon. member for Bellechasse could speak of as within his own knowledge, and it is upon this point I wish to quote him more particularly that in the portion I have already read:

I know that in my section of the country the people are not prosperous. I represent a rural constituency, and I know that a great many houses are closed and their owners have gone to the States. Look at the city of Quebec, where I live. Quebec West has diminished in population, and the two other divisions of the city have very slightly increased. Is that a sign of prosperity? Is it because a few contractors receive public money, is it because a few hundreds of manufacturers make millions of money? Is it because some of the public employees supplement their salaries with large bonuses and testimonials and presents of all kinds—is that the reason that the people are prosperous? Surely, you will not pretend that the million of people who have left this country are all fools, and that, if they had been prosperous here, they would not have remained. Here is a fact that confronts you at first glance. The census returns prepared by the officials of the Government prove to us that over a million of people have left this country. And why? Is it not because they could not live here during the ten years just past, when the hon. gentlemen have been telling us: We are happy, we are prosperous, Canada is rich, Canada is increasing in wealth and in population? The contrary has been proved to us.

This is a quotation from an hon. gentleman now supporting the Administration, from an hon. gentleman who stood up here last evening and for a long time endeavoured to prove that the National Policy, as administered by the hon. gentlemen had been a success. What I have quoted is not given as a matter of opinion, but as a matter of personal knowledge, as a matter of proof within his own knowledge—and, being a legal gentleman, he knows the value of proof—that a million of people had left the country in consequence of the policy adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite. And so out of the mouths of their supporters as well as from the official reports with which they furnish us, this claim is demonstrated to be, like the others, false and misleading.

The whole line of policy adopted by hon. gentlemen, in their efforts to retain power has been discredited. I will not allude to the extravagant prophecies made as to the settlement of the North-west; I will not allude to the extravagant claims for the various undertakings to which they have committed Parliament, but I will show, if possible, from the public records to what an enormous extent they have violated the promises upon which they obtained power, promises which they could have carried out consistently with their other declarations. It is admitted that the defeat of the Liberal party was caused by the depressed condition of the country, by the denunciations of their opponents, and the extravagant promises those opponents made of reform. The hon. gentlemen came into power with an enormous majority to carry out the terms upon which they claimed the indulgence and confidence of the people. Very shortly after they obtained power, the predictions of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) came true; the depression, which had begun to pass away while he was still in power, passed rapidly off; the labours of the husbandman were abundantly blessed by Divine Providence; general confidence was restored, the markets of the world improved, and our export trade in the great natural products of the country, the products of the farm, the forest, the fishery, and the mine, found profitable sale in the mother country, and in foreign lands. The returns gave the people of the country considerable money to spend in the improvement of their condition. In addition to this, the increased taxation which was at once imposed by hon. gentlemen opposite, placed in the exchequer large sums of money, available to be expended upon various public works. In addition to that, the enormous borrowing powers of the Government were exercised without stint, and money from this source flowed in to the exchequer of the country. The consequence was that there was a large expenditure by the Government, and a considerable increase in the expenditure by private people.

Now, the claim has been made, and is constantly made, that it was the National Policy that brought about the largely increased exports of the country. It seems to me that if ever there was a proposition which bore upon its face its own condemnation for absurdity, this is the proposition. It is an accepted principle of economics that, in regard to the great natural products of the country, the markets of the world, the demand of the market in which the surplus is sold, furnishes the criterion of profit or loss. And Canada sold enormous quantities of these natural products. Was the increased price of fish and the increased draft of fishes from the sea, running to many millions of dollars' worth, the result of taxes imposed upon imported manufactures? Was the increased product of the soil, and the increased price of our agricultural staples caused by the tariff which hon. gentlemen opposite forced upon the people of this country? Certainly not; this improvement would have happened if hon. gentlemen had never existed. This improvement would have happened under any Government; and I think it has been abundantly demonstrated that if the taxation had been kept at a lower and fairer rate the profits reaped by the people would have been greatly enhanced.

Now, the export trade of the country has been recorded, ever since the establishment of the Dominion, under certain heads, and I wish to call the attention of the House to a liberty which, I think, has been improperly taken by the compilers of our statistics, in their arrangement of the statistics of the export trade. Of the thousands of people in this country who receive the Statistical Year-Book and from it seek to glean the trade and financial history of the country, how many are able to tell what are the exports of manufactured goods, and what are the exports of products of the forest? The Statistical Year-Book was a very useful publication as first issued, and might still be the same if it had not fallen into the hands of those whose object is to make it a campaign document. Up to 1891 it gave under the head of "Exports, manufactures," the same statement of exports of manufactures as contained in the Trade and Navigation Returns. In 1874, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns, the export of manufactures were $2,353,663. I have not gone into details, but I presume the figures are substantially correct, and that the proper items have been included to make up this total. Up to 1890, according to this Year-Book, these returns were given as laid down by the Trade and Navigation tables; but in the year 1891 the student of the Statistical Year-Book finds that our exports of manufactured goods were $22,916,431; while turning to the Trade and Navigation tables he finds the figures I have already given. In 1875, the manufactured goods exported from the country, as given in the Trade and Navigation tables, were $2,293,400; turning to the Statistical Year-Book we find that the manufactured goods exported are valued at $20,025,925; and so on, through all the years from that time to the present. Take as an example the year 1878; according to our Trade and Navigation tables, in that year the exports of the products of the forest were $19,511,575; and the exports of manufactured goods in that year were $4,127,735. But turning to the Statistical Year-Book we find that nearly $13,000,000 had been taken from the exports of the products of the forest and added to the total of exports of manufactured goods, thus increasing the volume of the exports of manufactured goods in that year, according to the Year-Book, from $4,127,735 to $17,780,776; while the exports of the forest fell, according to the different way of arranging these returns, from $19,511,375 to $5,912,139. Now, I contend that this method of arranging the statistics, however it may be reconciled to some technical principles upon which the statistician may elaborate his tables, is confusing, misleading and unfair, and the student of our trade economy is not placed in a position in which he can really judge of the effect of the National Policy. It would be necessary for him to go through the Trade and Navigation Returns during the whole history of confederation in order to form any reasonable opinion. The only conclusion I can come to with regard to this is that the statistician, following out the plan that seems to be adopted in that book, and seeing the enormous increase in the exports of the natural products of the forest, by taking certain wood products from the list given as exports of products of the forest and adding them to manufactured products, has swollen up an apparent testimonial to the advantage of the National Policy. If these figures are dissected it will be seen that the National Policy has had no such effect as that which they would seem, on a superficial view, to indicate. Now, if the Statistical Year-Book was consistent with itself, perhaps there might be some reason for allowing these statistics to pass. But the Year-Book is not even consistent with itself. I find upon examination of that work that on page 462 an enormous volume of exports is classed as products of the forest, which on page 474, are classed as manufactured goods. On page 662 is given a list of products of the forest exported from the country which includes basswood, butternut, hickory, sleepers, knees and futtocks, railroad ties, masts and spars; while on page 474 these very articles are classed as manufactured goods. Now, they cannot reasonably be classed under both heads at the same time. They are either properly and legitimately to be considered as manufactured goods, and manufactured goods the production of which is fostered and increased as a result of the National Policy, or the figures are of no utility whatever. Now, one page here shows ashes and pearl ashes are classed as products of the forest. The volume of imports of those articles amounted to $120,000 in the Trade and Navigation Returns, but in the Year-Book they are classed as manufactures. Basswood, butternut, hickory, of which the exports were $25,000, are classed in the Year-Book as manufactures; while in the Trade and Navigation Returns they are given as products of the forest. Deals, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns, were exported to the value of $7,762,275, and they are properly classed as products of the forest in the Trade and Navigation Returns; while in the Statistical Year-Book these articles to the same amount are classed as manufactured products, and a claim is inferentially made to the advantage of the National Policy as encouraging manufacturers to that extent. Deal ends, $295,478, undergo the same process. Joists, scantlings, knees and futtocks, masts and spars, staves, bolts, laths and pickets, planks and boards, to the value of $9,640,638, in the Trade and Navigation Returns are given to the public as products of the forest; while in the Statistical Year-Book they are placed under the head of manufactured articles. Shingles, $755,813, are classed as products of the forest in the Trade and Navigation Returns, but as manufactured goods in the Year-Book. Shooks, boxes and other articles of that kind, are classified in the same way, $119,212. Sleepers and railway ties, $214,892, are in the same category. Let us see how this representation works for any given year. Take the year 1893, for instance. The Trade Returns tell us that in that year we exported $26,539,910 worth of products of the forest; but the Statistical Year-Book tells us we exported of products of the forest in that year only $5,592,893; and they carry somewhat over $21,000,000 into the class of manufactured goods out of a total of $28,462,031 of manufactured goods. The effect of this arrangement would show, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns, that our exports were $7,693,929.

Now, we can imagine the ingenuous youth of the country, we can imagine even older persons anxious to see how the country is progressing in regard to the National Policy—we can imagine them in a country school-house addressing the electorate and showing the enormous export of manufactured goods, and rolling out the figures, $28,462,031, thus completely demolishing their opponents who have not, perhaps, the advantage of having the Trade and Navigation Returns at hand to show that that list is padded by taking over into a wrong column an enormous mass of goods which have always rightly been considered to belong to the class of products of the forest. I presume the rule upon which this change of base has been made by the statistician, so far as I can gather from the returns themselves, is this: that wherever human labour has been applied to any extent to some natural products, such as animals and their products, or the products of the forest, he calls it a manufactured article. The tree that is just cut down, with the limbs lopped off, he might consent to leave under the head of a product of the forest; but if a slab is sawed off and it becomes a piece of square timber, then he calls it a manufactured article. So he goes through the whole list, and twenty-one or twenty-two million dollars worth of this class of articles he calls manufactured goods. He might as well call dried codfish a manufactured article. There is a much larger proportion of human labour applied to that product, in proportion to its value and size, than is applied to most of the articles which are in these tables. He might as well apply this rule to almost everything on which human labour has been expended and call it a manufactured article. He could by carrying out this proposition to its legitimate conclusion swell the list of manufactured articles exported to many millions of dollars more than it has been extended, and thus prove the great value of the National Policy, of imposing taxes which have no more relation to the export trade than has the blowing of the north wind. There is no doubt that the natural tendency of high taxation on manufactured goods has been to increase the cost of production, to prevent the development of our natural export trade in manufactured articles, because the cost has been increased, the value has been increased and our ability to compete in foreign markets has thereby been greatly lessened. The other evening the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Craig) referred to cheese as a manufactured article, and he did so calmly and deliberately, and this member of the House is a gentleman of considerable thought, whose addresses are always received with that consideration which his high character entitles him to receive; yet in a formal address on the benefits of the National Policy he undertook to class cheese as a manufactured article. On the principle laid down by the statistician by which manufactures have been swollen from seven millions to twenty-eight millions, that is perfectly correct, but the principle will not be accepted by the House and the country as a fair means of calculating the development of our manufacturing industries. The benefits of low taxation during the Mackenzie regime and the blessings of providence resulted in great improvement, and I am happy to say, an almost permanent improvement in the growth and development of the great natural resources of the country. These resources are so great as to be almost unlimited, so extensive as to call for the highest powers of eloquence on the part of the hon. gentlemen opposite were not created by them; and because we pretend to say that the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite has been to increase the cost of production on those articles and thereby diminish the opportunity the people have to make wealth out of them, they affirm that we are running down the country. It is not so. There are no hon. gentlemen who have greater confidence and faith and a more wholesome belief in the natural resources of Canada than have the Liberal party in this House. It is because we see those resources fritted away, it is because we see the opportunity to gain wealth and prosperity lost by the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite that we attack it and endeavour to show its failures, inconsistencies and improprieties.

The Conservative party declared they would not increase the taxation of the country; but they did increase it enormously. The average taxation from 1874 to 1878 was $18,989,668 per annum, or an average per head of $4.81. They said in one breath this was excessive and in another breath they said it was not enough. But when it came to a more definite declaration of the views they held, they insisted that not the application of this principle they would not increase the taxation, but would readjust it. The actual taxation during the 16 years from 1879 to 1894, the result of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, was to draw from the people through the custom-houses and Excise Department, $428,814,301. Had the people paid the same rate per head during all those years as they paid per head during the five years of the Liberal Administration, namely, $4.81½, there would have been $356,028,961 taken from them. In other words, the actual amount taken from the people from 1879 to 1894 by those hon. gentlemen, more than would have been taken under the Mackenzie Administration, was $72,785,725. And this was done under a policy which was pledged not to increase the taxation of the country.

To put it in another way : The Mackenzie Government would have taken $72,785,725 less if they had been in power during the last sixteen years. The average annual increase made by hon. gentlemen opposite in the amount of taxation was $4,549,108 over the rate of the Mackenzie regime. But this does not tell the whole story. They blamed the Mackenzie Government for deficits during their career. Had the Mackenzie Administration taxed the people on an average per head as those hon. gentlemen taxed them in 1894, a year in which they boasted of reductions made in taxation and when the Government professed to give the people the benefit of reduced taxation by many millions of money which they had previously taken from them, the average taxation from customs and excise would have been $5.55. Had Mr. Mackenzie been allowed by Parliament and the people to tax them during his five years of office at the rate of $5.55 per head, he would have obtained $107,358,036 ; but he actually levied $4.81 per head, which gave him $94,948,340, showing that had the rate of taxation which prevailed in 1894 been allowed to Sir Richard Cartwright during his five years of office, there would have been $12,402,496 more than he did obtain, and taking out the deficits for two years in which he had deficits, he would have had a net surplus during those years of $9,737,958. This proves conclusively that had the Liberal Government given away to the temptations that were held out to them to increase the taxation on the people, even during the years of depression, it would easily have swamped the deficit and resulted in the enormous surplus of $9,737,958.

But, Sir, let us run through some of these intervening years and see what the taxation that these hon. gentlemen have imposed would have given to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) as Finance Minister. I have referred to the first period of their rule, and I will now take the period from 1882 to 1888. The average taxation of the Conservative Government during these five years produced $112,109,089, the average rate being $5.79 per capita. If Mr. Mackenzie had had that taxation during his term of office, he would have had a net surplus of $14,486,211. Take the next five years, from 1888 to 1893. If Mr. Mackenzie had been allowed to have taxed these people an average of $6.21 per head, as these gentlemen opposite taxed the people of the country, he would have a net surplus, between 1874 and 1878, of $22,504,003, which shows the enormity of the offence which the Conservative Government were guilty of receiving the confidence of the people in 1878 upon the basis of not increasing taxation, and proceeding to enormously increase it, afterwards boasting of the surpluses which it gave them.

I think I have shown, Sir, that the policy which the Conservative party has adopted has done nothing whatever to increase the substantial prosperity of the people. That increase resulted entirely from the profits of their export trade. I have shown, too, that the present Government have violated the promises which they made in regard to the keeping the expenditure within the limits of the expenditure of the Mackenzie Administration, for I have proven that they did enormously increase the expenditure, and thus violated that promise.

I may have occasion before I resume my seat to allude more in detail to some of these particulars, but at the present time I will take up another point of the argument invariably made by hon. gentlemen opposite. One of the points always made by every ministerial speaker, at any rate, during the latter portion of the discussion upon the benefits of the National Policy, has been to attack the operations of the revenue tariff in the mother country. They claim to be pre-eminently the party of patriotism and loyalty ; but they find no language too contemptuous with which to speak of the policy of the statesmen of England. Although the hon. the Minister of Justice is not present, some of the remarks which I will make upon that point are directed to observations made by him in this House ; observations which seem to have been followed up by Government speakers and by Government organs throughout the country, as a safe line on which to prejudice the people of Canada against the reforms which are favoured by the Liberal party.

It is well known that all the governing classes of Great Britain strongly support what is called a free trade policy, but which might more properly be called the revenue tariff policy of the mother country. Hon. gentlemen opposite sometimes try to make capital out of the assumption that the Liberal party, while favouring the free trade principle upon which Great Britain collects a revenue, favour a tariff precisely like that of the United Kingdom. This assumption is misleading to the last degree. It is the principle we are discussing, and not the application of this principle to the intricate details connected with a tariff. These must be governed by the varying circumstances of the two countries. The principle of the tariff in the mother country is the principle of a revenue tariff.

Referring to that, and referring to the admitted fact that agriculture in the mother country is to a large degree depressed; all the opponents of the revenue tariff dwell with great gusto and infinite humour upon the condition of the agricultural classes in the old country. They upbraid England for her ignorance of political economy and for her stupidity in not seeing the way to true wealth and true grandeur by adopting the policy advocated by Canadian Conservatives. I will not pause, Mr. Speaker, to point out the effect upon this country if the statesmen of Great Britain listened with any idea of following the advice of these gentlemen, because we all know what that would result in as regards the producers in this country. But, dwelling upon the distress in agriculture in the mother country, and upon her adherence to the principles of a revenue tariff, they are never weary of intimating—although they are careful never to give the figures—that Great Britain is declining, that she is weakening financially, that she is losing her power, her force and her influence in the world, by adhering to this revenue policy. What an utter absurdity, in the face of the trade and financial returns of the motherland! Look abroad at the protected countries of the world in this year of grace 1895, and you will see every one of them with enormous deficits in their national exchequers: France, Germany, the United States, and Canada—all of them struggling with financial difficulty, owing to the embarrassments brought about among their people, and in their revenue resources, in consequence of the restrictive tariffs which they support, and which they pretend to enjoy. But go to free trade England, and there you find the Chancellor of the Exchequer in this very year announcing a substantial surplus with which to carry on the services of the country.

Coming back to the speech made by the hon. Minister of Justice, I think no one in this House and no one who read it in the country, could have been otherwise than amazed that one enjoying a proud distinction received from his Sovereign, should have descended to use the language which he did in regard to the mother country. He said:

We are considering the Great Britain of 1894, but he (Mr. Davies) gave us statistics of Great Britain in 1886, and the hon. gentlemen themselves scorn and deride all suggestions that her foreign trade was being interfered with. Let him read a statement from the speech of any public man, Liberal or Conservative, in the motherland to-day, who will say for one moment, that the hostile tariffs surrounding that country in every quarter of the globe have not been successful in forcing her out step by step from the position of vantage which she once had in the various markets of the world. What is the whole policy of the motherland to-day?

And here is a sentence which I commend to the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite, especially to those loyalists among them who profess to be the only citizens who are true to the red cross flag:

Driven from the civilized markets of the world steadily, and every year finding their output to those markets decreasing, they spend millions on their navy and millions on their army to force their wares and their goods and their merchandise into the uncivilized markets of the world, which they are endeavouring to occupy, to settle and to control, driven there by the deadly effect upon them of the tremendous competition coming from the protectionist nations in the rest of the world.

I was proud when our eloquent leader, although belonging, by birth, to another race, on the spot rebuked this foul slander on the people of the mother country. "Driven from the civilized markets of the world, Great Britain is spending millions on her army and her navy to force her merchandise on the uncivilized nations of the world."—was ever a fouler slander uttered against Great Britain than that contained in these words? It is not only unpatriotic, but it is manifestly untrue. In every market of the world where England controls, every nation has the same privilege as the mother country. She sets up no protectionist barrier in favour of her own merchants and her own manufacturers. She may civilize those countries and give them sound, healthy government; but as soon as she sets up her own administration, she says to all the world: "Come in and compete with us in a fair, free, and open market." Hon. gentlemen opposite can point to no instance in the whole history of the mother country where she has forced her trade on any civilized or uncivilized nation by means of her army and navy. The soldiers and sailors of England have a nobler work than that to perform. They have a work to perform under the aegis of the British flag, of giving good government, wholesome and equal laws and equal privileges, to all the people who choose to live or trade under the protection of that flag. What has been the result of the free trade policy of Great Britain upon her finances at home, and upon the prosperity of her people? Hon. gentlemen quote isolated cases, from agricultural reports, and other sources, of individuals here and there who advocate protection on grain and other agricultural products as a possible relief or remedy against agricultural distress in Great Britain; but they are not able, and never have been able, and I challenge them to-day, to quote from one leading public man, Conservative or Liberal, in the mother country, who has any responsibility resting upon him, one line or syllable in favour of the adoption of a protective tariff for Great Britain. I hold in my hand extracts from an address delivered by the great unionist leader in England on the 1st of April, 1895, when addressing a manufacturing club representing one of the largest associations in the mother country, he referred to this question. I think the words used are alone a sufficient rebuke and a sufficient reply to all those absurd claims put forward from time to time on the other side of the House as to the attitude of England on this question. Addressing the Birmingham Jewelers' and Silversmiths' Association, Mr. A. Chamberlain said—this is from the London "Times":

I find that there are a number of people who, under the present condition of trade, are coming to the conclusion that our free trade policy has been a failure, and who would, therefore, be ready to go back in the direction of protection. This opinion is not to be treated lightly. It ought to be carefully considered.

I noticed, a very few days after the report of this speech appeared in the London "Times," that that portion of the speech was quoted by the Montreal "Gazette" with a great deal of gusto, while the concluding portion, containing the words which follow, was studiously omitted. He went on to say:

I will only lay before you two reasons why I differ from those who desire to abandon it. My first reason is this: In times past in this country, when England was under protection, and in foreign countries to-day which are also under protection, notably in the United States and in France, trade is even worse than it is here.

And he might have added, Canada.

My second reason is a little more complicated, but I think I can make it clear to you. We cannot maintain by ourselves, by our own efforts alone, the vast population that is crowded within the limits of our territory. We depend upon our foreign trade. But if by any means, by protection or any other, you shut the door upon foreign goods, you may be quite certain that the result will be that there will be fewer English goods that will go abroad.

This is sound doctrine, and it should be taken to heart by every student of political economy in the Dominion of Canada. He went on:

Bear in mind that depression in trade is not a new thing in this country. We have had depression in trade very great and extending over very long periods, at different times in our history. Why, the other day I was reading a most interesting work entitled "A Social History of England," and I happened to come across a description of the state of things in the reign of Henry the VIII.; and the complaints made at that time of the state of trade and the social conditions which were brought about by the depression of trade, might be made at the present moment by any one of us.

That is very close to the halcyon period referred to by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and looked back upon with feelings of pain and regret by the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Mon-tagne). After describing that period, Mr. Chamberlain goes on to say:

Here is the point I want to put to you. In the time of Henry VIII., when people were complaining of the crowded population and want of employment, how many people do you think then were in England? Less than 4 millions. Now, with 30 millions in the same territory, after all, our condition is better than it was then, and the reason is mainly owing to the fact that in the interval our foreign trade has reached such enormous development. Therefore, I say that clearly the policy and duty of this country, the necessity for this country, is to take every opportunity of extending and developing that foreign trade, and especially of securing new markets, which are also free markets, for the introduction of our goods.

The state of agriculture in England has been put forward by hon. gentlemen opposite as one of the causes for a growth, or pretended growth, of the protectionist sentiment in England. Now, there are some 36,000,000 people in the British islands, and it would be only fair to assume, if the agricultural industry is depressed that there would be some, and perhaps very intelligent men, who would look to protection as a remedy; but no political leader or economical leader, no great writer or thinker, can be quoted as favouring this policy, even to assist the distressed agricultural element in the mother country. Mr. Goschen, the Ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer, a Conservative and a man of great financial ability, is reported in the "Times" of 20th April, as having referred to the condition of things in England, in these terms:

The propertied classes, who are they? Thank God, the times are past when property belonged to a small portion of the community. Why, the working classes have become capitalists, to a certain extent, and £121,000,000 are in the savings banks, representing the thrift and the accumulated savings of the working classes. Do I speak simply of savings banks? No, in friendly societies, in building societies, in a vast number of other forms. I am glad to say that the working classes have shown that they are able to take their position side by side with capital in promoting trade and industry. I would like to ask those who view with disfavour anything having relation to capital, what they think of the foreign trade of the country, which could not be conducted, as it is now, with that smoothness which brings to our shores food in plenty and the material for our industries, without capital?

Take the agricultural interests alone. I hold in my hands the "Times" report of the council meeting of the Central and Associated Chambers of Agriculture—a body representing all the agricultural interests of England, containing members of Parliament and men eminent in agriculture and in legislation concerning agriculture. After a long sitting and the hearing of an elaborate and voluminous report of the committee appointed to consider the causes of depression in agriculture, the council came to certain conclusions. No less than twelve or thirteen points were laid down and carefully considered by the council and committee. They refer to local taxation and the system upon which it should be levied, the railway rates, currency reform, the readjustment of the beer duty and the rules with regard to brewers, the conditions of tenancy, the marking of foreign meats and produce, the adulteration of food, the tithes rent charges, but in not one instance is the remedy of protection suggested or hinted at as a means of improving the condition of agriculture. In not one instance is the imposition of foreign corn and produce suggested. It is easy to quote here and there a suggestion by some obscure person—obscure in public life if not in his own particular locality—of a protective duty, but we cannot find any thinker or statesman responsible to the world and to posterity for his opinions, who would suggest the suicidal remedy of protection in the mother country in order to build up the manufacturing interests. The other day a report was published in the London "Times" from Mr. Aubrey Spencer, who was appointed by the Royal Commission on Agriculture, to examine into the question. The "Times" of the 10th April, 1895, has an editorial on the subject from which I quote the following:—

We printed on Saturday an abstract of a very instructive report prepared by Mr. Aubrey Spencer for the Royal Commission on Agriculture. This report is no very pleasant reading for the land-owners and agriculturists. * * * The main causes of the depression appears to be the continuous fall in the prices of farm produce, which has not been accompanied by a corresponding reduction in the cost of production. And the cause has been intensified by a succession of unfavourable seasons. Complaints are heard of high rates, heavy tithes and an excessive land tax, but such complaints are, perhaps, rather the signs of the depression which undoubtedly prevails, than a correct diagnosis of the cause. * * * As for remedies, Mr. Spencer has no panacea to suggest. * * * As the rise and fall of prices are beyond the farmer's control, while the cost of production is, to some extent, within his own control, it seems obvious that it is in this direction, if any, that a practical remedy must be sought. * * * The farmer has the remedy in his own hands. * * * Old methods are being superseded, and he must either learn new methods or succumb. Great as is the interest of the country in the welfare of its agriculture, its interest in the welfare of its international trade is much greater.

Then the "Times" goes on to indicate the lines upon which agricultural reform ought to be based, and in not one is there the slightest indication that an import duty upon foreign corn or products would be in the slightest degree in the interests of the farmers. If the revenue policy of the mother country had been so disastrous, some indication of it would be seen in her trade returns. Some of these returns are very instructive reading, and I think the time is opportune for placing in available form some of the results of an examination into British statistical reports.

Mr. FLINT.

Take the growing wealth of the country as represented by the income tax. In 1871, the amount of property taxed to income was £131,802,902. This has grown steadily from that date to 1891, the last return which I find available, to £587,251,084. One penny on the income tax in 1871 produced £1,654,277. One penny on the income tax in 1891 produced £2,214,000. This shows an enormous increase in the value of property taxed to income, but there may be some property taxed to income which might possibly escape taxation; and the return might not give a fair representation of the whole growth of the wealth of the country. But there is another return. I find that when in 1877 the profits from the foreign and colonial investments of the mother country were £28,200,000, in 1891 they had run up to £55,200,000. There has been a steady and progressive development from £28,000,000 in 1877 to £55,000,000 in 1891, showing that whatever may be the depressed condition of a few industries caused by the peculiar condition of things, the substantial wealth of the country is steadily growing.

Take the British import trade, and let us see how that has been affected by this terrible, narrow-minded policy which the Conservatives of this country bewail as the result of the stupidity of English statesmen. In five years, from 1855 to 1859, Great Britain imported £169,000,000 on an average. In the next five years she imported £235,000,000 on an average. In the following five years she imported £286,000,000. In the next five years she imported £346,000,000. And in the ensuing five years she imported £375,000,000. And from 1880 to 1884 she imported £408,000,000. And in the year 1891, £435,000,000. It is true that 1891 represented about the highest mark. There was a falling off in the imports in 1892 and 1893, owing to the depression that has been referred to by various speakers. But the import trade of the mother country, by five year periods, has grown in an enormous ratio. This import trade must represent growing wealth, growing means of purchasing the goods of foreign countries, and a growing development of the whole country, notwithstanding individual cases of depression.

Let us take the exports of Great Britain. We find that her exports, from 1816 to 1842, when this magnificent policy, calculated to hasten the development of the resources of the country and make it great and prosperous, the policy of protection, was in full swing, averaged £40,000,000 sterling. The export trade reached its highest limit under protection in 1842, when the exports amounted to £50,000,000 sterling in round numbers. Free trade, as it is established in Great Britain, reached almost its full development in 1848 or 1849, and in the five years up to 1852 the export trade had grown to £72,000,000. In 1853, it was £98,000,000; in 1854, £97,000,- 000 ; in 1856, £115,000,000 ; in 1857, £122,000,000 ; in 1859, £130,000,000. The mind begins to grow bewildered in contemplating the significance of these vast sums. Take the period from 1860 to 1866, and we find that Great Britain exported no less than £149,500,000. In 1866, the last year of that period, the total was £189,500,000. In 1870, the exports had reached £199,500,000, and in 1872, £256,000,000. The average exports from 1875 to 1879 were somewhat less than in 1872, but they were still larger than in 1870. From 1880 to 1884, the exports were £234,000,000 on the average. In 1890, Great Britain exported £262,530,000. In the following year there was a falling off, and there has been a slight decrease in succeeding years, the total in 1891 being £247,235,000. This shows that, up to the beginning of the latest period, up to the world-wide depression that has affected every country under the sun, which affected the value as well as the volume of goods, England had advanced, as regards her export trade, by leaps and bounds.

But they tell us that Great Britain is being driven from the various markets of the world, and is compelled to resort to her army and navy in order to force her goods upon the barbarians of Africa and the untutored natives of the South Seas. Of course, these statements have already been refuted by reference to the facts of history.

But let us glance at the export trade of the United Kingdom with various foreign countries for successive periods. In 1840, Great Britain exported to the colonies £34,000,000. In 1860, the exports to the colonies had grown to £89,000,000 ; in 1874, to £161,000,000 ; in 1885, to £170,000,000, and in 1891 to £192,000,000. Does this look like destruction of the motherland through her free trade principles ? Does this look as if she was being forced from the markets of her colonies or from the markets of the protectionist nations of the world ? Let us glance at Great Britain's trade with the United States, where she has to force her goods over a protective barrier and to compete with the protectionist manufacturers of the country, and see how she has survived in the struggle and what headway she has made in the competition in the years that have passed. In 1800, Great Britain exported to the United States £68,000,000 worth of goods. By 1874 that had increased to £95,000,000, and in 1885 to £118,000,000. In 1891, she exported to the United States goods to the value of £146,000,000, and in 1892, £150,000,000. Does this look as if England was decaying, as if she was being trampled under foot by protectionist nations ? No ; the figures are all in favour of the contrary view. Now, consider the exports to France. In 1860, Great Britain exported to France goods to the value of £31,000,000, but in 1874 she had more than doubled this amount, the total being £74,000,000. In 1891, France took £68,000,000 of British goods, and in 1892, £65, 000,000, and at about that figure the trade has remained ever since. So, notwithstanding the enormous protection France has placed upon her import trade, she received English goods to an amount 100 per cent greater than she did in 1840, when Britain was a high protectionist country, and France had comparatively a low tariff. In exports to Germany we find much the same record. In 1860, British goods were exported to Germany to the value of £34,000,000, and in 1892 this had grown to £55,000,000. When we consider the exports to other than those I have mentioned—the colonies, the United States, France and Germany—the figures are so vast that it is almost absurd to give them with any idea that we can understand their full significance. Out of a total export of £375,000,000 in 1860, Great Britain sent to countries other than those I have mentioned £153,000,000. This certainly was a great triumph over her rivals in the markets of the world, but it was eclipsed by the record of 1874, when she exported to these countries £270,000,000. In 1885, though many countries had raised higher their tariff barriers in their endeavours to shut her out, she placed with them goods to the value of £245,000,000, and in 1891 this export had grown to £283,000,000. Tell the members of this House that England is declining because she will not accept the panacea prescribed for her by the gentlemen on the other side ! English statesmen understand their business far better than gentlemen opposite seem to have understood their business of building up Canada.

Britain's shipping tonnage in 1894 amounted to 3,096,342. Under this foolish policy of free trade, so much decried by gentlemen opposite, she increased her tonnage from the figures I have given, in 1894, up to 8,541,838 tons in 1893. And to-day, owing to the wise policy adopted by her statesmen in 1843, Great Britain owns over one-half the tonnage of the civilized world. The consequence is that she is reaping the fruit of her wise policy in every port under the sun and from every nation in the world. All peoples are paying tributes to her merchants, and adding to her power and influence by reason of the wise statesmanship that has signalized her administration. But during all this time, even while sustaining an exceedingly expensive army, the finest for its numbers in the world, while sustaining the most powerful navy in the world, she has reduced her debt by many millions of pounds sterling.

In 1860, the debt of Great Britain was £812,904,106. But while sustaining this army and navy, while pushing her peaceful trade in every portion of the globe, civilizing nations in every clime and under every sky, still she reduced her debt in the 34 years up to 1894 by no less than £148,740,965. In her savings banks her working people, in the period from 1855 to 1859, had £35,900,000 sterling, an enormous sum of money, representing thrift, industry and a certain degree of prosperity. But in the period from 1860 to 1864, the average was £42,800,000. In 1865 to 1869 this had grown to £47,000,000. From 1870 to 1874, the total was £58,900,000, and from 1875 to 1879, to £72,300,000. And so it advances, until in the five years from 1885 to 1889, it reached nine figures, being £101,219,378. In 1892, the savings of Great Britain deposited in the savings banks of that country amounted to £118,238,528, and in 1893 they had reached the splendid total of £122,841,248. This was a larger amount per head by a large percentage than the people of Canada have under the National Policy. The importation per head of the people of the mother country, showing the amount that they consume of the goods supplied from the rest of the world, is the largest of any people under the sun. In 1892 her imports per head amounted to $56, her exports to $29, and her total trade was $93 per head; while in Canada our total trade per head is about $49; showing that the mother country, with all the difficulties she has to contend with, without the unlimited natural resources we enjoy, trading over all portions of the world, has a trade amounting to $93 per head, against the trade of the people of Canada of $49.27 per head.

The total trade of the United Kingdom with foreign countries increased steadily from seventy-nine millions in 1854, to one hundred and seventy-six millions in 1890; to the British possessions it increased from thirty-seven millions in 1854 to eighty-seven millions in 1890; to the United States, it increased from nineteen millions to thirty-two millions during the same period. Her total export trade in manufactured products increased from one hundred and sixteen millions to two hundred and thirty-six and a half millions; showing that the mother country is sound and healthy to the core, that the principles laid down by her statesmen at the time that she was brought so low through an adherence to a false economical doctrine, have placed her where she ought to be, and where she will be so long as she upholds this policy, the foremost of the civilized nations of the globe.

Sir, I think I have disposed of the claims that are made against the policy of the mother country, and now I will call the attention of the House to some peculiarities of our own country. Every step taken by hon. gentlemen opposite has been prefaced by extraordinary promises, wild prophecies, and predictions of extraordinary success if their policy was carried into effect. Perhaps in no particular has the country been more thoroughly misled than in the promises made in regard to the iron and steel duties. And here I will venture to make an assertion of an opinion which has pressed itself for the last eight or ten years upon my own mind. I do not know to what extent it is shared by others, but it has seemed to me, from a careful study of the speeches by which this policy was heralded, and by which it has been supported, that the prime object of the Conservative party has never been protection, but it was to obtain an enormous revenue with which to carry on some ulterior purpose, and that they have adopted protection merely as a catchword, as a means of holding certain classes under their influence, or within their power. I think that the whole indications of the trade and financial returns point in this direction; but under the plea and guise of protection, they have really been grasping at the revenues of the people in order to further some selfish, personal or political ends. Otherwise they would have carried out some of their promises, they would have reduced the enormous taxation from time to time when they found that their predictions were not realized. But the appetite grew by what it fed on, and the men behind the throne, the men who were nursing the infant industries, never believed they had sufficient money from the people, and they never will let go their hold until they are compelled to do so by an outraged and indignant people.

The iron duties were increased enormously over the ordinary protective duties in 1884, followed up by a still further increase in 1887. In introducing the policy of increasing the iron duties, Sir Charles Tupper, in one of his speeches, made these remarks, which are only a sample of his addresses upon the same line during the discussions on this subject:

The moment anthracite coal is free, we shall have blast furnaces at Coubourg, Weller's Bay and Kingston. * * * I believe that at no distant day you will have in the province of British Columbia an iron industry built up which will compare favourably with any other industry in this country. * * * Now, Sir, by the adoption of this policy, you will give permanent employment to an army of men—numbering, at least, 20,000 men, increasing our population from 80 to 100,000 souls, and affording them the means of supporting them in comfort and prosperity.

Now, this was certainly an extravagant prediction, but at any rate, based upon it the legislature gave them the power they asked, and from time to time increased the bounty given for the production of and the import duties on iron and steel. The result, although it has to a certain extent increased the production of pig iron, has been enormously oppressive to the industrial and productive classes of this country.

I find that the total amount of dutiable iron and steel goods imported into Canada between 1874 and 1877, both inclusive, was $35,283,256; while the free goods of the same class imported in those years, was $25,733,836; making a total of $61,017,092, upon which a duty was paid of $4,191,668. The average of dutiable iron and steel imports per annum was $8,820,814, and of free imports of the same class, $6,433,459, the total being $15,254,423, the duty averaging $1,047,917 per annum. The rate the people of this country paid as duty upon that class of goods, was 11¼ per cent. and on the total goods, 0.68½ per cent. Let us look at the result of the imports of this class of goods between 1891 and 1894, when we had the full fruit of the policy which was to bring about such beneficent results. Our total imports of dutiable iron and steel goods during that period amounted to $38,846,092, as against $35,283,256 between 1874 and 1877. Free goods fell off enormously, being only $9,012,093, between 1891 and 1894, as against $25,733,836 in the former period. On a total import of $47,890,185, in the latter five years we paid a duty of $10,848,249, or an average on dutiable goods of 28·10, and on the net total, 22·85 per cent. Nearly eleven millions were collected in duty on forty-seven millions, as against four millions on the sixty-one millions of iron and steel imported between 1874 and 1877. These figures alone are very significant. Had Mr. Mackenzie placed on iron and steel importations during his regime the duty that was placed by hon. gentlemen opposite during the last five years, he would have had an enormous net surplus derived from this one class of articles alone. On the whole the average increase of duty on steel and iron and manufactured goods represented an increased revenue of $800,000 per year paid into the exchequer, which would have wiped out the deficits which occurred during the Mackenzie Administration, and would have given a large sum of money to be expended on public works and for other useful public services.

But what has been the result of this increased taxation? It has fostered combines in every department connected with the iron and steel industry. There is not a free man in Canada to-day when it comes to purchasing anything into which iron and steel enter as an important part of its manufacture. The country is under an abject and absolute slavery, because every seller is bound by obligations, under severe penalties, not to sell an article, except at a rate fixed by a powerful combination, and the consequence is that to-day the whole consuming population of Canada is held down under the iron hand of one of the most powerful and unscrupulous corporations ever known in this country, or, perhaps, ever known in any part of the civilized world. The people are paying into the treasury of that corporation millions every year in order to build up that industry—to what extent? To-day we have but four furnaces in the Dominion of Canada, and we were promised in 1887, that we would have 20,000 men employed, giving a population of 100,000 souls subsisting on this industry, while we have less than 500 men employed, showing a falling off of 19,500 men from the extravagant prediction made by the gentleman who introduced and supported this measure. There never was, and never can be, a more ignominious failure on the part of a public policy than the failure of the iron duties to accomplish the objects which they were levied to secure.

Again, there was to be no increase in expenditure. The finances of this country were to be administered more cheaply. There was to be no increase in taxation, there was to be no increase on the burdens of the people. There was to be a reduction in all the items of expenditure controllable by Parliament. Almost vindictive attacks were made by Dr. Tupper and his colleagues on the expenditure of the Liberal Government, and the inference was conveyed, if the actual promise was not made in Parliament that the expenditure would be reduced. At all events that promise was made on the hustings subsequently.

Let us see how the Conservative party carried out that promise to reduce the expenditure. The average expenditure from 1874 to 1878 was $23,708,043, the average expenditure from 1890 to 1894 was $36,700,514; the average increase, taking the last five years with the five years of Liberal Administration, was $12,992,471, or 54·23 per cent. The average controllable expenditure from 1874 to 1878 was $12,377,854; the same expenditure from 1889 to 1894 was $20,631,977, or an increase of $8,254,123, being at the rate of 66½ per cent. The increase by the Mackenzie Administration over its predecessor was an average of only 46 cents per head, although that Government was saddled with enormous obligations for which they were not responsible. But the Conservative party promised to reduce the expenditure, or at least to keep it stationary, and Mr. Mackenzie did reduce it somewhat during his term of office, the average being $6 per head during his administration as compared with $7·54 between 1889 and 1893. Again, with respect to the increase of debt. The average debt during the Mackenzie regime was $124,496,447. The average debt from 1890 to 1894 was $240,867,545, an increase of $116,371,098, or 93 per cent.

The increase of the amount of interest on the debt was not less than 50 per cent. The net debt per head from 1874 to 1878 was an average of $40·63 as compared with $60·22 from 1889 to 1893, showing an increase of $19·59 per head, or an average of 48·21 per cent. The average increase of taxation was 58·27 per cent, the increase of customs taxation 67·40 per cent, and the increase of taxation per head 35·23 per cent. So it was in every particular, as regards the expenditure, the controllable expenditure, the charges and other items. The charges on revenue increased 77 per cent, miscellaneous or "other expenditures," 84 per cent; Civil Government, 57·78 per cent; legislation, 39 per cent; taxation, 58·27 per cent; while our population increased only 26 per cent. These results are clearly shown by the following tables:—

Was there ever a more complete demonstration as to the difference between promise and performance? Could there be any official figures showing a more complete failure on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to carry out the promises they made to the country, to carry out the honest, fair and reasonable expectations of the people.

Yet, notwithstanding all this, hon. gentlemen opposite from time to time, speak of the progress and advancement of this Dominion. These statements remind me of a story told of a darkey during the Southern war. He was a servant of a colonel in the Southern army, and when he came from the front he was asked how things looked there. He said: "I don't want to demoralize our people; but I can tell you our army is advancing backwards and the enemy is retreating forward." We can apply that to the hon. gentlemen opposite. In all their trade and financial experiments, they are advancing backwards. Now, Sir, in contrast to that, we have the plain simple declaration representing the views and aspirations of the Liberal party. We have not merely the declaration itself, but we have it backed up by the whole history of the party, and the whole history of their attempts at relieving the people from the enormous burdens thrown upon them by the administration of affairs by the Conservative Government.

We have a declaration which favours reciprocity with the United States, a declaration which favours a revenue tariff with the elements of protection taken from it; and, although hon. gentlemen opposite may pretend that they do not know what a revenue tariff means, every gentleman on this side of the House can tell them. It means, in the first place, a just and honest tariff, it means, in the next place, a low tariff. It implies a reduced expenditure, it implies fair and equitable adjustment of the burdens which must be borne by the people, and it implies an honest and economical administration of the affairs of the country. It precludes any Administration which shall come into power upon principles of that kind, from throwing away and squandering money, either upon political or commercial favourites. It precludes the idea that the Administration of the day will submit, for one instant, to any of those robberies which have characterized the maladministration of affairs by the present Government.

Under a Liberal Government, there will be no extravagant expenditure, there will be a low, uniform, and just tariff, there will be no Curran bridge steals, there will be no St. Mary's bridge frauds and humbugs, there will be no Sheik's Island Dam business, and no money wasted on Little Rapid Locks. There will be no money thrown away upon contractors under conditions not nominated in the bond, and under conditions unknown to the people of this country, but which are well known to those who administer the election funds of the present Government. I trust that when the people of this country see in their full enormity the exactions and burdens laid upon them under the guise of building up a trade and prosperity which does not exist, they will replace this present incompetent Administration by one that will do justice to all classes of the people.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, as this is an interesting debate, I would like to offer a few remarks, and I will try and make them as brief as possible. I will not deal with quite so many figures as my hon. friend (Mr. Flint), and I will confine my remarks as closely as possible to the question before the House. I will first investigate, Sir, the effects of the National Policy, and I shall inquire what its effects are on the prices of farm produce. I shall inquire if the National Policy has increased the price of manufactured goods, I shall inquire if the National Policy has destroyed Canada's credit in the London money market, and I shall inquire, too, if the National Policy has reserved the home market to the people of Canada. If I succeed in showing that the National Policy has not increased the price of manufactured goods, if I succeed in showing that the National Policy has, at least, secured the home market for our farmers, if I succeed in showing that the National Policy has not injured Canada's credit but improved it; then, Sir, I am entitled to claim that the National Policy is deserving of the support of the people of this country. We must presume, in the first place, that the policy of our friends of the Opposition is a tariff for revenue only, or free trade as it is in England, or a tariff without a vestige of protection. That, at all events, is their policy for the time being, although we do not know what it may be in the near future, as it changes very frequently. I shall also try to consider how this tariff bears upon the farmer, the wage-earner, the artisan, and the manufacturer, and I will try to show how the tariff bears on the agriculturists, the largest class in this community. In a speech delivered in Charlottetown in March last by the hon. the senior member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), he tried to make out that the National Policy had no effect on the price of the farmers' produce, that it did not raise the price of his potatoes, or his pork, or his oats, or anything of that kind, and in the course of his remarks, he said:

There was indeed some pork imported into this country, but chiefly for the use of lumbermen.

Now, let us consider, for a moment, this question of pork, and see what the importations to this country have been. In 1891, we find, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns, that the importations of pork and pork products amounted to 22,221,114 pounds. We exported, in the same year, 7,621,924 pounds, showing that it took 14,600,000 pounds of foreign pork to fill up the supply in our home market. Under increased protection in 1894 we imported pork products to the amount of only $361,140 and exported them to the value of over $2,000,000. Now, Sir, that being the case, my contention is, that the National Policy secured to the farmers of this country a home market to the extent of at least 14,600,000 pounds of pork. I can, therefore, claim that the National Policy has benefited the farmers of this country to that extent. Let me also look for a moment at the other farm products imported into Canada. Here is the record for 1878, under the tariff for revenue only of the Liberal Government, compared with 1892, under the present Government:

	In 1878.	In 1892.
Butter	$ 23,773	$ 50,013
Lard	211,949	50,554
Bacon	219,293	93,802
Beef	31,709	94,070
Pork	637,845	483,773
Apples and pears..	90,769	80,367
Vegetables	57,683	140,666
Oats	551,365	1,867
Rye	77,398	269
Corn	3,535,579	862,455
Wheat	6,510,131	67,678
Flour	1,853,620	153,229
Total.....	$13,901,114	$2,076,742

We therefore imported $11,824,372 worth of farm products less under the National Policy than were imported under the tariff for revenue only of the Opposition. In other words, if the tariff for revenue only of the Opposition had been in force since 1878, we would, in all probability, have continued to import nearly $12,000,000 worth of products which the farmers of our own country now furnish under the National Policy. I think, Sir, that this, of itself, is sufficient to show that the National Policy is in the interests of the farmers of this country. Not only that, Sir, but to show that the Government have the interests of the farmers of the country at heart. I may mention that they have established experimental farms throughout the country for the assistance of the farmers, and they have appointed a dairy commissioner to assist the cheese and butter industry—and I may say, speaking for our own province, that the dairy commissioner has accomplished wonders there. An industry that did not exist under the former Administration has been brought into existence by the present Government through the protection which their policy has given the farmers, and that industry has been brought into such prominence that the people of Prince Edward Island, as the dairy commissioner said the other day before the Committee on Agriculture, now manufacture the finest cheese in the Dominion of Canada. The present Government have promoted the interests of the farmers in other ways. They have subsidized lines of steamers from the maritime provinces to the West Indies, which are building up a commerce in agricultural produce and fish which is in the interest of the farmers and fishermen of the lower provinces. That West India market is growing, year after year; and, while we have a near-by market to some extent in the city of Halifax, it is always relieved by the quantities which these subsidized steamers carry from that port to the West Indies. In that way, the West India trade tends to keep the market steady, and the prices better than they otherwise would be. One thing we are accused of by the hon. gentlemen of the Opposition is that we have increased the city population and decreased the rural population. Now, Mr. Speaker, I contend that the building up of the city population is building up increased markets for the farmers of this country, and every person from the rural population on being transferred to the city, who was a contributor to what the city required, becomes a consumer. In that way the National Policy has built up cities, towns and villages, and every city and town and village that has been increased in population under the operation of the National Policy has been increasing the markets of the farmers of this country. The Government are accused of spending large sums of money. Well, I think every progressive Government must spend money in a new country like this, in whose future we have such hope and confidence. It may be here mentioned that when the present Government came into power, we had no trans-continental railway; we had no steamship lines with Asia or Australia; we had no steamships subsidized to the West Indies; we had no Sault Ste. Marie canal; we had none of the branch railways that penetrate almost every section of Canada, and one of which we hope to see almost constructed in our province. The Government has certainly aided railways and built and deepened canals. In doing this they were doing what was beneficial to the country, and what strengthened the credit of Canada in the markets of the world. Now, Sir, let us inquire for a moment if the National Policy has increased the price of manufactured goods, as was predicted, and as is still, to some extent, maintained by the gentlemen of the Opposition. We all know, Sir—everybody in Canada knows—that there never was a time when manufactured goods were as cheap in Canada as they are at present. There never was a time when the necessaries of the poor man could be purchased with so little money; there never was a time when the purchasing power of a dollar was as great as it is at present. Everything you eat, everything you wear, everything you require, made in this country, is cheaper now than it ever has been heretofore. In fact, it is scarcely necessary that I should spend any time in proving a self-evident proposition, because everybody in this country knows that what I say is a fact.

Mr. BORDEN. How is it with reference to the prices in other countries now?

Mr. MACDONALD (King's). I am looking at things as they are in our own country. It is all very well to speak about the prices in other countries, but we know that the things we have in our own country are cheaper than ever they were before. Let us take a glance for a moment at the financial standing of this country and contrast it with our standing under the Liberal rule. When the hon. member for South Oxford went to London to raise a loan, he got £90 for his £100 bond bearing 4 per cent interest, and then he had to present the silver side of the shield to the financiers. When the present Minister of Finance went to London on a similar mission, he got £97 10s. for his £100 bonds and only paid 3 per cent, and he could have got many times the amount he required. This improvement in the credit of Canada and reduction of the cost of carrying its national debt, augmented as that debt has been by the extensive public works carried out by this Government, is due to the progressive policy of this Government. And the effect of these heavy expenditures on public works has simply been to add 18 cents per head per annum to the taxation of the population. The events of the past few years have increased confidence in Canada. So firmly established is our position that during the depression in 1893 the financiers and legislators of the United States were looking to us as an example to follow in amending their financial laws. We also find in leading English newspapers that Canada is quoted as a country which has escaped in a remarkable manner the storm of depression that swept over other countries. Glance for a moment at the effect of the National Policy on the wage-earners of this country. In 1891, according to the census, the Canadian manufacturers paid wages amounting to $2,102,000. The boot and shoe manufacturers paid in wages $4,916,000, harness and saddlery manufacturers, $1,000,000, leather manufacturers, $1,522,000. Here, in those very few items, we find that the wages paid amounted to $7,500,000. My contention is that under a tariff for revenue only, this amount will be taken from the income of the people of this country. We also paid wages in other industries as follows:—

Smelting	$ 851,000
Rolling mills	2,225,00.
Foundries and machine shops.....	5,152,000
Wire works	331,000
Tin works	463,000
Tin smelting, smithing.....	1,265,000
Agricultural implement makers.....	1,112,000

Here is an amount of $12,000,000 which the wage-earners of Canada would be sure to lose under a tariff for revenue only, or free trade as it is in England, or a policy from which every vestige of protection is taken. We should consider for a moment the effect of the loss of the very large amount of wages now received by the wage-earners of this country. The effect of it would be ruin to the artisan, the tradesman, the farmer, and the manufacturer. The wage-earner would be ruined by depriving his employer, the manufacturer, of the home market, which is now assured him by the National Policy and exposing him to the combined attacks of foreign manufacturers. As the hon. member for South Brant has said, we are living alongside a country whose manufactures have been fostered by protection until they have been enabled to challenge supremacy with Great Britain in some of the articles in which Great Britain excels. If that was true in 1876, when the hon. member for Brant gave utterance to that opinion, it must be true to a still greater extent now. The farmer also would be deprived of the home market which the wage-earners of this country now give him. The tradesmen would also suffer in the same way, as the wage-earner would be deprived of the means wherewith to patronize them. Thus all classes would be made to feel the dire results should we unfortunately adopt a tariff for revenue only or a tariff from which every vestige of protection is removed. The logical result of such a step would be an invitation to the farmers of the United States to come and take the bread out of the mouths of the farmers of our own country. The Opposition say in effect: We have taken down the barrier that prevented you from taking charge of the market in this Canada of ours; we have removed every vestige of protection. Bring your pork which is selling to-day in Chicago at about $12 per barrel to Montreal where the price now is $16 to $18. You can bring it in here and destroy the home market which the National Policy had preserved for our own farmers. You will be able, under the tariff for revenue only, to bring in your oats which are selling to-day in Chicago at 28 cents per bushel, and 25 cents per bushel September delivery—you can bring them into this country where oats, owing to the National Policy are selling at 42 cts. in Montreal, 45 cts. in Halifax, and 38 to 40 cents in Prince Edward Island. You can bring in your wheat which you are selling to-day at 65 cents in Chicago to Toronto where the price is 85 cents. They say in effect to the people of the United States: Come with the wealth of your vast prairies, come with the surplus products of your long established manufactories—(the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) says they have been fostered by years of extreme protection)—come and possess this land which we throw open to you under a tariff for revenue only. Come and cut down the prices of our farm products which have hitherto been upheld by the National Policy.

Come, they say, we give you the opportunity under our new platform. They say in effect to the manufacturers of cotton goods who have been protected for years: Come: we will take down the barriers that now preserve the home market of the cotton manufacturers of this country and that have enabled them to build up their factories; come in with your surplus products; we give you the opportunity under our new platform. They say in effect to the American manufacturers of woollen goods: Come and contribute a small percentage of your surplus, bring it over to Canada and sell it at slaughter prices, destroying the manufacture of cloths that has been built up in this country under the National Policy. Come and possess these markets that we throw open to you under a tariff for revenue only. They say also to the manufacturers of farm machinery, wagons and furniture: Contribute a small percentage of your surplus, and when we establish a tariff in Canada from which every vestige of protection is eliminated, come in and possess the market we have thrown open to you and destroy the Canadian industries which the National Policy has built up. Four years ago we were told by our Liberal friends that they were going to have the full run of the American markets under the policy of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity. These fads—I suppose I may call them so—have gone to an early grave, unwept, unhonoured and unsung. Now, they are going to remove every vestige of protection under their tariff for revenue only. But what about reciprocity? Reciprocity, as everybody knows means the mutual interchange of commodities by any two countries to such an extent as may be agreed upon. They tried to humbug the people of this country a good deal about this cry of reciprocity, but I think they will not be able to do it much longer. If they introduce a tariff for revenue only, or free trade as it is in England, or a tariff from which every vestige of protection is taken, they will have nothing to offer the Americans with a view to bringing about such a desirable event as reciprocity. Now, Sir, I think I must read to you an extract from the speech of the hon. member for South Brant which applies so well to the question of reciprocity from the standpoint of a tariff for revenue only. Speaking in this House, in 1876, the hon. member said:

I am not one of those who believe in erecting a wall so high that you cannot trade with any other country, but I must admit that I am in favour of a defensive policy. I cannot view with complacency what I see going on in this country. We live beside a country with a population ten times greater than ours, whose industries have been fostered by protection until they are enabled, even in some articles in which Britain excels, to challenge supremacy with her. While that nation has erected against us and other countries a hostile tariff, we have our hands bound, and give them a free and unrestricted right to trade in our markets. Fancy a commissioner, delegated by this Government and sanctioned by the British Government, sent to Washington to negotiate a reciprocity treaty. The question might be asked, what he desired. He replies: "I wish to have a free market in the United States for the products of our mines, our forests and our fields." Then the United States commissioner might ask, "What will you give us in return?" Our representative replies, "The free use of our markets for similar products of your country." The astute American would naturally say, "We have that already; I do not see that you offer anything." We must remember that we should have something to offer when we attempt to open up a new reciprocity question. I need not remind this House, that the great lever we had before in negotiating a reciprocity treaty, is ours no longer.

And, Mr. Speaker, I contend that when these gentlemen introduce a tariff from which is taken every vestige of protection, they will have nothing to offer, should they go to look for reciprocity, that the words of the hon. member for South Brant are even more true to-day with respect to this matter than they were when they were uttered in 1876. We do live alongside a country whose industries have been fostered by many years of protection, and extreme protection at that, and we require to keep our weapons in our own hands in order that we may have something with which to negotiate a reciprocity treaty should the Americans see fit at any future time to change their minds, and offer to enter into negotiations for such a treaty. And I cannot help thinking, Sir, that the hon. member for South Brant, as well as many other gentlemen of the Opposition, if they were frank with the people of this country, and frank with this House, would admit that what the hon. member for South Brant said is as true to-day as it was in 1876 when he uttered it. Now, Sir, we have had free trade advocated by the Liberal party; we have had unrestricted reciprocity advocated by the Liberal party; we have had commercial union advocated by the Liberal party, we have a tariff for revenue only and a tariff from which is to be taken every vestige of protection, advocated by these gentlemen. You would suppose, Sir, that when the hon. gentlemen attack the policy of the present Government they would think proper to show where it bears heavily upon any class in this country, that they would be prepared to show what article in our tariff is too high, what article in our tariff requires to be reduced. But, instead of that, they are content to deal in generalities. They find that the question of free trade, which they advocated at one time, is played out. They find that unrestricted reciprocity would not take with the people of this country, as neither would commercial union. They now bring forward a tariff for revenue only, which may mean, which does mean, nothing at all. They say in effect to the farmers of this country when they advocate a tariff for revenue only, or a tariff from which every vestige of protection has been taken: You have too much protection on your oats, on your pork, on your beef, on your butter, and on your cheese under the National Policy. We are in favour of a tariff for revenue only, for free trade as it is in England, of a tariff from which every vestige of protection is taken. The Liberal-Conservative party now give the markets of our own country to our own people under the present tariff, and we shall stand or fall by it. I would ask these hon. gentlemen, I would ask the people of this country, if a tariff from which every vestige of protection is taken, will establish a new cheese factory in this country, or a new creamery? Will it cause a new mill to be built? Will it give work to an additional workman? Will it bring a new customer to a merchant's store? Will it help any one to earn a dollar? No, Mr. Speaker, I contend, on the contrary, that it will take wages from the people, it will take trade from the people, it will take a home market from the people, it will take trade from the merchants; and if hon. gentlemen opposite carry their policy to its proper conclusion, it will take from the farmer the protection that he enjoys from a paternal government, who looks after his interests by the establishment of experimental farms, creameries, dairies, and so forth. The Liberals declare that a tariff for revenue only will increase the importations of manufactured goods; but it will be to the displacement, of course, of those that are manufactured in our own country. How will this benefit the Canadian workman? How will this benefit the Canadian wage-earner? How will this benefit the farmer? A policy that brings in the manufactured goods of another country to the displacement of those that are manufactured in our own country, will close up the factories in our own country, and will deprive the farmer of the home market, will deprive the wage-earner of the employment which is now given by the manufacturers in this country. Now, Sir, let us consider the tariff in force in 1878 under a Liberal Administration, and see how it affected the taxation of the people. We find that between 1882 and 1894, inclusive, the Government of this country took off duties on tea amounting to $10,053,697; they took off duties on coffee amounting to $478,827; they took off duties on coal amounting to $4,058,808; on tin, amounting to $1,152,025; on sugar (1892), $4,500,000; on billstamps, $1,845,000; on newspapers, $685,000; amounting, altogether, to $23,773,357, which was taken off the tax-payers of the country on these items between 1882 and 1894. The Liberals say that we have increased the taxation of the country since 1878 by $14,000,000 per year. Let us inquire for a moment if that is the case. The revenue collected during the last year of Liberal rule was $22,375,000; the amount of revenue collected in 1894 was $36,375,000, showing an augmentation of 60 per cent, or $14,000,000. Now, the Opposition try to make the people believe that this is increased taxation, although nothing could be further from the truth. One third of this $14,000,000 is received from railways and canals, interest on investments, patent fees, public lands, &c. From this source there was derived in 1894, $8,795,000; from the same source there was derived, in 1878, under Liberal rule, $4,533,000. Therefore, we have gained, from this same source, over $4,000,000, not a cent of which constitutes increased taxation. In 1878 the taxation within the country under Liberal rule, on liquors and tobaccos was $4,858,600; in 1894 the same taxes yielded $8,381,000. Here, again, on these articles we have a gain of over $3,500,000. I am sure this is a taxation that meets with universal favour. We can consider this subject from two or three standpoints. The actual amount of customs collections in 1878 was $12,782,800; in 1894 it was $19,198,100; or a difference of $6,415,300. It is important to observe here, in the first place, that this larger revenue does not by any means imply a corresponding increase of taxation. The percentage of duty on the total value of goods entered for consumption in 1878, was 14.3. If the same rate were applied to the total importations of 1894, it would have produced, on $113,093,983 worth of importations, a revenue of $15,867,085, or within $3,331,000 of the sum actually collected. The simple fact is, therefore, that instead of the taxation being increased $14,000,000 annually since 1878, it has not been increased one-fourth of that sum. Let me show you now, the way our taxes are levied at present, as compared with the manner in which they were levied in 1878. My contention is that any increase in taxation has been put upon the luxuries imported into this country and not on the necessaries of life, as will appear by the following table, showing the amounts collected in 1878 and 1894, respectively:—

	1878	1894
Ales and porter	$ 43,863	$ 65,061
Spirits	1,000,864	2,086,559
Wines	207,566	309,339
Tobacco	188,550	287,703
Patent medicines	29,744	62,973
Perfumery	5,953	10,280
Playing cards	4,014	10,913
Plate glass	14,467	66,668
Gold and silver manuf'ers.	41,476	79,418
Silks and satins	240,669	743,402
Jewellery	46,404	51,124
Totals	$1,829,570	$3,772,540

On the articles I have named, it will, therefore, be seen that the Government collected customs duties, in 1894, of more than double the amount that they obtained in 1878. These articles are practically all luxuries. While we are sorry, of course, to see a large increase in the importation of spirits. I am sure the temperance people, as well as others in this country, will make no objection to the increased taxation under this head. Now, I contend that the increase has not been put on the poor man or on the wage-earner, but it has been put on those articles which may be called luxuries. A word or two with respect to protection as it now prevails in all parts of the world. It was promised when free trade was inaugurated in England that before very long all the nations would follow England's example; but not a single nation has free trade as it exists in England. Austria adopted protection in 1879; Russia adopted it in 1877 and 1881; Germany put up her walls higher in 1879; France increased her tariff for purely protection purposes in 1882; Spain did the same in 1877 and 1882, and is now further considering it; Greece adopted a high protection tariff in 1885; Switzerland in 1885; Sweden and Norway followed suit in 1887 and 1888; Italy began protection to her agricultural products last year; Victoria had an election last year and out of 79 members 65 protectionists were returned. There is the sweepout of tariff reform, free traders in the United States only a few months ago. It looks as if Lord Salisbury was correct when he stated that "we live in an age of a war of tariffs, that every country has its weapons, and that we cannot fight unless we have our weapons too." The Liberals say never mind the experience of ages and every civilized country with the exception of England, but let us throw away our weapons and adopt free trade as it is in England. The Liberal-Conservatives say our own and the experience of other countries teach us that we should stand by a defensive tariff. Let us hold our own markets until other nations are willing to reciprocate by opening theirs. Which think you is the more desirable? The people of this country are too intelligent to vote for throwing away their means of defence in accordance with the policy of the present Opposition who favour throwing away our only weapon of protection. Let us look at the Liberal record. Their record, while in charge of the Federal Government has been so damaging in the eyes of the country that they have not been able to obtain the confidence of the people for the past seventeen years. There is a saying: "Tell me the company you keep and I tell you what you are." It is very true and very true as applied to our Liberal friends. Let us judge them by their Liberal friends in the local governments of this country. In Ontario the Grits came into power in 1871. This is their record of economy: Annual expenditures, 1871, $1,816,784; 1893, $3,903,195; provincial debt, 1871, nil; 1893, $1,401,598. In Quebec the Grits began their last innings in January, 1887. Here is the record of Grit economy: Annual expenditure, 1886, $3,032,607; 1891, $4,095,520; provincial debt, 1886, $19,068,023; 1891, $25,842,148. In Manitoba the Grits obtained control in 1888, and here is their record of economy: Annual expenditure, 1887, $520,190; 1893, $632,000; provincial debt, 1887, $2,229,106; 1893, $4,398,250. In New Brunswick: Annual expenditure, 1882, $614,236; 1892, $696,000; provincial debt, 1883, $1,268,272; 1893, $2,752,297. In Nova Scotia: Annual expenditure, 1883, $541,000; 1894, $863,000; provincial debt, 1882, nil; 1893, $3,167,000. As regards Prince Edward Island, I am ashamed to give the figures to this House. A Conservative Government was in power for thirteen years, and they conducted the affairs of that little province practically without taxation and left office with the province having a trifling debt. When the Liberals came into power they soon incurred a debt of hundreds of thousands of dollars. Besides, they put taxation on lands, they imposed a succession tax, they raised the fees in the public offices and taxed the people in many ways; but notwithstanding this increased taxation and inducements held out to the people to purchase public lands on terms never previously offered, the province is head over ears in debt and will in the near future have to resort to further taxation. These, Sir, are the effects of Liberal rule in the province of Ontario, in the province of Quebec, in the province of New Brunswick, which has a Liberal leader, although it is a coalition Government, in the province of Nova Scotia, in the province of Manitoba, and in the province of Prince Edward Island. The people of Canada will judge of the Liberal party in this House by the company they keep, and judging them by that standard, it will be a long time before the electorate give them a chance to rule the destinies of this country. Hon. gentlemen of the Opposition say: We want a change; but that change, in my opinion, will never come while they continue their policy of "advocating everything by turns and nothing long." That change will never come while they continue to advocate "a tariff for revenue only," or "free trade as it is in England," or "a tariff from which every vestige of protection is taken;" because such a policy and such a tariff is detrimental to the best interests of the great mass of our people, the farming community. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) the other night intimated that the manufacturers of Canada "have nothing to fear from the Liberals," but I can assure him that his party will never get into power until they come out and say, as the electors of this country have already said on four different occasions: "We believe after all, that the National Policy is the policy for this new country." I prophesy that one of these days the Liberals will declare "It is no use of our fighting further against the National Policy, because we have been fighting against the vast majority of the electors." I am here reminded of a story I once heard of a comfortable farmer who was riding into town on his well-kept, well-groomed, and well-fed horse. He met a city dude coming out, with a raw-boned, disreputable looking nag, and the city man reined up and said to the farmer: "I say, Mr. Smith, how is it that you always have your horse in such good condition; I have tried Derby Condition Powders, and I have tried Sheridan's Condition Powders, and I have tried sawdust and bran, and I have tried various other condiments, and yet my horse is in bad condition." And the old farmer answered him by asking: "Did you ever try hay and oats? I think this story is very applicable to the present condition of the Opposition. They have tried unrestricted reciprocity, they have tried commercial union, they have tried reciprocity, they have tried a tariff for revenue only, they are now trying free trade, they are wanting to try a tariff from which every vestige of protection is eliminated; but they will have to try protection, or else they will never sit on the treasury benches. I think, Sir, it would suit them better, and they would be more likely to find favour with the electors, if as a body they advocated protection, as so many of them, individually, have already done in regard to some pet industry in which they are interested. If as a party they turn their attention to protection, and if they criticise the Government in respect to economy of administration or something of that kind, they would then have a better chance of obtaining their desire to get into power. I am sure, Sir, that the wrench they would receive to their sensitive nerves by changing from their present position to becoming protectionists, would not be so severe as the wrench it would give them to take up the question of economy of administration, judging from their past records, and the records of their party in the local governments. I feel sure, Sir, that many of these hon. gentlemen of the Opposition who are now listening to me, will live to thank me for the good advice that I have just given them, and which advice I believe they must adopt before they can ever expect to reach the treasury benches.

Mr. SEMPLE moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to; and debate adjourned.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11.15 p.m.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 20th May, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. FOSTER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 92) to amend the Insurance Act.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to explain the Bill?

Mr. FOSTER. The Bill is not an important one. In the Act that was passed last year, a certain time was set for the production of the reports of the companies, and no distinction was made as to whether the companies were foreign or Canadian. It came out in practice that it was absolutely impossible for English companies doing business all over the world and holding their yearly meetings, in some cases, after the date which had been fixed in the Act for filing reports, and, in most cases within too short a time before that date to comply with the law and forward reports. Consequently matters came to such a pass that the Treasury Board had to allow those companies to continue under license, not to revoke their licenses, even though they had failed to comply with a condition which operated forfeiture of license, and, now, to ask the House, in the first place, to amend the Act as regards the date at which these reports shall be in from these companies, and in the second place, to legalize the licenses which we did not feel it was prudent for us to revoke.

Mr. LAURIER. What is the provision in this Bill with regard to the time of sending in the reports?

Mr. FOSTER. It fixes a later date so as to allow of these reports coming in after the annual meetings and before the date fixed in the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE MARKLAND MORTGAGE.

Mr. FOSTER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 93) respecting the discharge of a mortgage to Her Majesty known as the Markland mortgage.

Mr. LAURIER. What is the object of this Bill?

Mr. FOSTER. The object of this Bill is to enable the Government to discharge a mortgage on certain property in Kingston, which has been for a long time in a position where we have been unable to sell it or realize from it. The mortgage was given in the year 1858, by the Hon. George H. Markland, in the city of Kingston, in the province of Ontario. The property was sold under the mortgage in the year 1862. This Bill is to give power to convey the property so sold and to discharge the said mortgage so far as they can be conveyed by Her Majesty, upon the payment of a certain sum of money—I think about 50 per cent of the original claim. During all this time that the Crown has been unable to give a mortgage, the properties, which are not important, have been deteriorating.

Mr. LAURIER. What? Deteriorating?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. The wood has actually been wearing out although the National Policy has been in force for the latter part of the period. It is the opinion of the department—in which I coincide—that the sooner we get something for this and discharge the mortgage, the less loss we shall ultimately sustain.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman has not stated as to the origin of the debt which this mortgage is intended to cover, nor has he stated who are the debtors.

Mr. FOSTER. I will explain that fully on second reading.

Mr. LAURIER. It would be hardly sufficient for the hon. gentleman to explain it then, we should have the papers.

Mr. FOSTER. All the papers will be brought down.

Mr. LANDERKIN. If property is deteriorating as rapidly as the hon. gentleman seems to think, it would be well to get this mortgage sold as soon as possible.

Mr. FOSTER. And whilst you have some ready money in hand.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

REPORT.

Report of the Minister of Justice as to Penitentiaries in Canada, for the year ended 30th June, 1894.—(Mr. Curran.)

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 94) to further amend the Post Office Act. He said: The object of this Bill is to prevent the carriers of Her Majesty's mail through the country—but not the railway or steamship companies—from carrying intoxicating liquors in their vehicles from place to place and thus violating the by-laws that are passed in the different municipalities. There is another clause suggesting that this provision be embodied in the contracts for carrying the mails.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CHIGNECTO SHIP RAILWAY.

Mr. WELSH. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to call the attention of the Government to an article in the Montreal "Gazette" of to-day in relation to the Chignecto Ship Railway. It is as follows:—

CHIGNECTO SHIP RAILWAY.

Mr. Provan, M.P. for Blackfriars division of Glasgow, and managing director of the Chignecto Marine Railway Company, appeared before Council yesterday and asked for an extension of two years for the completion of the road. The Government guaranteed a subsidy of $170,000 a year for twenty years after the completion of the work. Mr. Provan explained that about three millions and a half had been expended, and about a million and a half more was needed. This amount had been subscribed by the shareholders, and the work would be completed, if the extension of time asked for was given. Mr. Provan said that it was through no fault of the company that the work was not completed within the time required by the charter. That was caused by the failure of the contractor, Mr. Meigs who was largely interested in contracts in the Argentine Republic at the time of the suspension of Baring Bros. The Government promised to consider the matter. It will be remembered that Mr. Provan and Mr. Ketchum, the engineer of the railway, were here last summer, and went up to Muskoka to see Sir John Thompson about this matter, but did not, so far as is known, succeed in getting any promise from him.

I call the attention of the Government to this matter, and desire to say that it is a serious matter, one that will affect the taxpayers of this country to the extent of about $3,000,000, if this wild-cat scheme is carried out. I think it would be much better if it were stopped. However, I ask the Government if this account is correct, and if they intend to renew this contract for a further term. We have had this Chignecto Railway project before Parliament for nine years, and I have denounced it for nine years as a wild-cat scheme. If the matter was brought before Parliament, I think the members from New Brunswick—

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think the hon. gentleman ought to make a speech on this matter.

Mr. WELSH. All right.

Mr. FOSTER. With reference to the paragraph which was read, the question was not very definite, but I will give the information that I think the hon. gentleman wished. It is true that Mr. Provan has been here, and has laid the case before the country and before the Government. The Government have not yet made its decision.

I.C.R.—BURNING OF SHEDS AT RICHMOND, N.S.

Mr. STAIRS. I desire to call the attention of the Government to a despatch in the morning paper announcing the destruction by fire of the Intercolonial Railway sheds at Richmond, near Halifax; and to ask the Government what report they have had from the officers of the department in relation to the matter. I hope that prompt measures will be taken to provide the necessary facilities at Halifax, so that no interruption of trade may take place.

Mr. HAGGART. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I have to say that I got word to-day of the loss by fire of the Intercolonial shop and railway buildings at Richmond, on yesterday, 19th May. There were destroyed a large warehouse, a sugar warehouse, a large cattle shed, a large wharf, an elevated pole trestle, 11 box cars, one refrigerator car, three platform cars, and other property. I have not yet come to any decision what steps to take, but immediate steps will be taken for the purpose of carrying on traffic as usual.

Mr. LANGELIER. Any insurance?

Mr. HAGGART. There is no insurance on any of the Government property along the Intercolonial Railway.

QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY—ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LAURIER. I would call the attention of the leader of the House to the fact that Thursday and Friday next are holidays, and I desire to know whether it is the intention that the House shall resume again on Monday next?

Mr. FOSTER. That is a matter about which we might have a little conversation. Last week the leader of the Opposition will remember that I had a short conversation with him as to what time we might fairly expect to come to a vote upon the amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford. My understanding with him at the time, after a little casual conversation, was that it would be possible to come to a vote on Tuesday of this week. So far as I am concerned, I have been working with that end in view, and I have gone so far as to intimate that I thought a vote would be had on Tuesday evening. Hearing that the same definiteness did not exist on the other side, I yesterday addressed a note to my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition; and in reply he stated that the understanding was not at all definite with him, and he found some difficulty in promising that the vote should be taken on that evening. I would like to ask him now whether he thinks it will be possible for us to take a vote before we separate? It is immaterial to me whether it is Tuesday or Wednesday; but if we separate on Wednesday, it would be of great moment, I think, for the despatch of business in this House, if we could come to a vote upon the question we have been debating for 10 or 12 days now, before we separate for the holidays that are to come; and for my own part I should be willing to sit up late in order to do that. We have been adjourning at a very reasonable hour, under the impression that business would be forwarded just as much; but whether it is or not, I think we are all prepared to sit a little late to-night and to-morrow night, and, if necessary, to have a session Wednesday morning, so that we might get a vote, if possible, before we adjourn. I would like my hon. friend's view on that.

Mr. LAURIER. I have a distinct recollection of the conversation which I had with my hon. friend not more than eight days ago with regard to this debate, and I told him at the time that perhaps we might expect a division to-morrow. I must say, however, that my expectations have not been verified at all. I look upon it as absolutely impossible to have a division to-morrow, and very improbable to have it on Wednesday. It may be, however; we do not know. But I must say to the hon. gentleman that he is not at all correct in stating that the House has sat until reasonable hours. I do not object that the House should sit later this week, and that we should also sit until a reasonable hour in the morning, or till about midnight. As to a sitting on Wednesday morning, I do not think we could agree to that at all. It is impossible for me to say whether we would be in a position to come to a division before the adjournment; that will depend altogether upon the course which the debate takes to-day and to-morrow and the day after. There is no disposition on this side of the House to protract the debate any longer than is absolutely necessary to allow every member who desires to do so, to speak upon this most important question. I can say no more than that, and can make no binding promise. I may say that it is not my intention, nor the intention of my hon. friends, to put any obstacle in the way of coming to a division. But the hon. gentleman has not answered the question I put, as to whether he intends to resume on Monday.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know that I could ask the hon. gentleman to go any further than he has gone in relation to the course of the debate, but I take his answer to mean this, that if possible we should come to a vote before we separate, and I think the House will be quite willing to sit later than usual to-night and to-morrow night, in order to bring about a vote if possible. In reference to the other question, as we shall adjourn on Wednesday, it is for the members of the House to say whether they would rather come back on Monday or on Tuesday. Monday is private members' day, and it is for the members of the House to say whether they desire to sit on the following Monday or not. We could return after the recess and sit on Monday night at eight o'clock, or on Tuesday at three o'clock; I will not be prepared to go any later than Tuesday at three. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition might express his opinion as to whether the House should meet on Monday or not.

Mr. LAURIER. I think, with a view to accommodate those hon. members who reside at a distance and enable them to go home, the best way will be to come back on Tuesday.

Mr. FOSTER. Then the House will adjourn from Wednesday until 3 p.m. on Tuesday.

On the order being called for second reading of Bill (No. 88) respecting the South Shore Railway Company (Limited).—(Mr. White, Shelburne.)

SUGAR IMPORTATIONS.

Mr. EDGAR asked, How many pounds of sugar above No. 16 Dutch standard in colour and of refined sugars, as classified under item 392 in schedule "A" of the Customs Amendment Act of 1894, were imported between the 27th day of March and the 3rd day of May, 1894, both inclusive? How many pounds of sugar above No. 16 Dutch standard in colour and of refined sugars, as classified under item 392 in schedule "A" of the Customs Amendment Act of 1894, were imported between the 27th day of March and the 3rd day of May, 1895, both inclusive?

Mr. WALLACE. 1. The quantity of sugar above No. 16 Dutch standard in colour and of refined sugars, as classified under item 392 in schedule "A" of the Customs Amendment Act of 1894, entered between the 27th day of March and the 2nd day of May, 1894, both inclusive, was 70,677 pounds. 2. The quantity of sugar above No. 16 Dutch standard in colour and of refined sugars, as classified under item 392 in schedule "A" of the Customs Amendment Act of 1894, entered between the 27th day of March and the 2nd day of May, 1895, both inclusive, was 552,181 pounds.

Mr. EDGAR asked, 1. How many pounds of sugar not above No. 16 Dutch standard and other qualities of sugar, classified as free goods under item 708 in schedule "B" of the Customs Amendment Act of 1894, were imported between the 27th day of March and the 3rd day of May, 1894? 2. How many pounds of sugar not above No. 16 Dutch standard and other qualities of sugar, classified as free goods under item 708 in schedule "B" of the Customs Amendment Act of 1894, were imported between the 27th day of March and the 3rd day of May, 1895, both inclusive?

Mr. WALLACE. 1. The quantity of sugar not above No. 16 Dutch standard and other qualities of sugar classified as free goods under item 708 in schedule "B" of the Customs Amendment Act of 1894, entered between the 27th day of March and the 2nd day of May, 1894, was 20,528,021 pounds. 2. The quantity of sugar not above No. 16 Dutch standard and other qualities of sugar classified as free goods under item 708 in schedule "B" of the Customs Amendment Act of 1894, entered between the 27th day of March and the 2nd day of May, 1895, both inclusive, was 85,519,717 pounds. I may add that there are certain cargoes in regard to which free entry is asked, but on which duty is claimed by the Customs Department.

Mr. EDGAR. What is the quantity?

Mr. WALLACE. I did not mention the quantity. Probably sixteen or seventeen millions of pounds.

INDIANS TRANSFERRED FROM OKA TO MUSKOKA.

Mr. FRECHETTE (for Mr. Girouard, Two Mountains) asked, 1. What is the number of Indians transferred from Oka to Muskoka since 1872? 2. What is the extent of land occupied by them? 3. What has been the cost of their removal and of establishing them? 4. How many Indian families left Oka for Muskoka, during the years 1883 and 1894?

Mr. DALY. 1. 142. 2. 25,582 acres were purchased from the provincial government as a reserve for these Indians, 4,171 acres of which are held by different Indians under location tickets. There is no information of record as to quantity of land occupied by Indians who have not received location tickets, but the acreage so held must be small. 3. $1,625.03. 4. Two.

COLLECTORS OF CUSTOMS AS BROKERS.

Mr. FRASER asked, Are collectors of customs allowed, with the knowledge and consent of the Government, to act as brokers in the custom-house where they are collectors ?

Mr. WALLACE. They are not, either with the knowledge or consent of the Government, except along the boundary in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, at which points they are specially instructed to assist the settler in making settlers' effects entries, but no charge of any description is allowed.

ISLAND OF ANTICOSTI.

Mr. FAUVEL asked, To which electoral district of the province of Quebec is the island of Anticosti attached ? Has the list of voters been revised there at the last revision ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The island of Anticosti is attached to the electoral district of Chicoutimi and Saguenay, and the lists have been revised during the present year.

MILITARY SCHOOL—SEWAGE.

Mr. MILLS (Rothwell) asked, Do the Government propose to take immediate steps to prevent the discharge of sewage from the military school, in the city of London, into a small creek known as Carling's Creek ?

Mr. DICKEY. The Department of Militia and Defence has been inquiring into the effect of the discharge of the sewage in question, but is not yet in possession of sufficient information to deal finally with the matter.

SUPERVISOR OF CULLERS, QUEBEC.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Is James Patton, the present supervisor of cullers at Quebec, the person the Government intend to appoint as chief inspector of cullers ? If not, whom ? What is the age of the said James Patton ? Is the said James Patton a practical culler of timber, deals and staves, and is he capable and competent to cull timber, deals and staves ? Has the said James Patton passed his examination for culler ? If so, on what date, and has he taken out his commission, and on what date, and has he taken his oath of office as a culler ? Did the said James Patton ever perform the duties of a culler ? If so, when and where ?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Mr. Patton is the person whom it was intended to appoint as chief inspector of timber; should the Bill now before the House become law. 2. Mr. Patton's age is sixty-five. He is a practical culler, and has a very thorough knowledge of all classes of lumber. 3. Mr. Patton passed his examination as a culler in 1844, before the Board of Examiners, constituted under the Cullers' Act. 4. The department is not aware of any commission having been issued to Mr. Patton, but his examination is recorded in the Minute Book of the Board of Examiners. 5. He took the oath as supervisor of cullers, as required by the Act. 6. Yes, for upwards of thirty years—so the department is informed—in Quebec.

ASSISTANT RECEIVER GENERAL, ST. JOHN, N.B.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Who has been appointed Assistant Receiver General at St. John, N.B. ? When was he appointed ? What is his salary ? What length of service had he in the Civil Service before his appointment ? What salary was the late Assistant Receiver General drawing at the time of his superannuation ? How many years was he in the Civil Service before he reached the salary paid him as Assistant Receiver ? What is the salary of the present incumbent ? Is the present Assistant Receiver General a relative of the Finance Minister ? What is his relationship ? What is his age ? Is it customary to put these officers at the maximum salary after a few months' service ? What amount of superannuation allowance is to be annually paid the recent Assistant Receiver General ?

Mr. FOSTER. The person who has been appointed Assistant Receiver General at St. John, N.B., is Mr. H. Douglas McLeod. He was appointed on the 1st of February, 1893. His salary is $2,200. He was eight months in the service before his appointment as Assistant Receiver General. The salary of the late Assistant Receiver General at the time of his superannuation was $2,200. He was twenty-five years in the service, before the salary paid him as Assistant Receiver General was $2,200. The age of the present incumbent of the office is fifty-six years. In answer to the question: "Is it customary to put these officers at the maximum salary after a few months' service ?" that depends upon circumstances. As a rule it is not. The superannuation allowance of the recent Assistant Receiver General is $1,540.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. Finance Minister overlooked my question with regard to the relationship.

Mr. FOSTER. I did overlook that, yes. I am not yet certain that my relationships are so important, that the fact that such and such a person is a relation of mine or not, is worthy being recorded in "Hansard."

PRIVATE SECRETARY TO THE MINISTER OF FINANCE.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Is S. J. Jenkins, who is drawing a salary of $1,400 a year, the Jenkins who also is drawing $600 as private secretary to the Minister of Finance ? Is the said Jenkins related to the Minister of Finance by marriage or otherwise ? If so, what is the relationship ?

Has the Finance Minister an assistant or joint private secretary? If so, what is her name? Does she work in the department? If not, where does she work? Is she a relation of the Finance Minister's family? What is her salary?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. S. J. Jenkins, who is drawing a salary of $1,400 a year is the Mr. Jenkins who is also drawing $400—not $600—as private secretary to the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance has an assistant or joint private secretary, who is receiving the other $200 of the $600, the amount of the allowance. As private secretary to the Minister she is doing private secretarial work for the Minister, and her salary, as I have said, is $200. With reference to the other part of the question, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) has any desire privately to sit under my genealogical tree, I will give him an opportunity any time he requires it.

TIGNISH BREAKWATER, P.E.I.

Mr. PERRY asked, Is the Department of Public Works aware that the Tignish breakwater, Prince Edward Island, requires repairs, and that if said repairs are not attended to immediately the breakwater will sustain serious damage? Has the Government engineer made a report recently of the state of the breakwater?

Mr. QUIMET. The attention of the Public Works Department was called in March, 1892, by the Department of Marine, to the fact that the Tignish breakwater required repair, and during June and July of the same year, the sum of $350 was expended thereon. Since that time the Department of Public Works has not been made aware that this breakwater is in danger of sustaining serious damage, and there has not been any report made on its state since 1892.

LITTLE RIVER ST. FRANÇOIS.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, Whether work has been done within the last year or two in Little River St. François, in the county of Charlevoix? If so, what work, what has been the cost, and under whose direction has it been done?

Mr. QUIMET. During November, 1894, a number of boulders were removed from the channel of the Rivière St. François, which is frequented by schooners at high tide. The expenditure amounted to $101, and the work was done under the direction of Mr. L. Danglade, acting under instructions from Mr. U. Valiquet, assistant engineer of the department.

COLUMBIAN EXHIBITION EXPENSES.

Mr. CAMPBELL asked, How much has the Columbian Exhibition at Chicago cost the Dominion of Canada, to date? Have all the accounts and bills been received and paid? If not, what further sums will be required to settle all accounts and just demands?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The amount already paid in connection with the Columbian Exhibition is $243,019.57. All accounts that have been approved have been paid, and it is not expected that any further appropriation will be required.

COST OF TORONTO DRILL HALL.

Mr. CAMPBELL asked, What was the original estimate of the cost of the drill hall at Toronto? Has that estimate been exceeded? If so, by how much? Is the building now completed? Are there any claims for extras? If so, how much are they? Do the Government intend to pay them? Who were the contractors for this work, and the amount of their several contracts?

Mr. QUIMET. The original estimate of the cost of the drill hall at Toronto was $282,350. The estimate has not been exceeded. The building is completed, and has been in occupation for some time. A few inside fittings and the fencing are now on hand and will shortly be finished. The department has before it and under consideration claims for extras amounting to $17,942.94. The Government intend to pay to the last cent all legitimate claims. The contractors for this work were as follows:—Excavation, Davis & Sons, price 25 cents per yard, amount paid $2,200; main contract, Col. John Stewart, $240,000; heating and ventilation, Bennett & Wright, $6,665; fittings for armouries, &c.: Dominion Key Board and Art Manufacturing Company, $7,035; gas fixtures, Keith & Fitzsimons, $673.50; locks and hardware, Peterborough Lock Manufacturing Company, $1,576.63; in all, $258,150.13.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. SEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a few remarks on the important question now under discussion. If I failed to do so, I would not be properly representing the large number of people in the important constituency which I have the honour to represent. I do not intend to speak at great length, knowing the desire of the House that the debate should be brought to a close as soon as possible; yet there are many important questions involved in this discussion in which the country takes a strong interest at the present time. In my constituency, according to the census, there are not only farmers, but also a number of manufacturers. While a few of the latter are benefited by protection. I think the majority would state that the protection has rather been an injury to them than a benefit. The farmers do not want protection; they believe it is of no use to them; although it has been tried for a number of years. We do not find the farmers coming to this House in large numbers, flooding the lobbies and asking for increased protection. They say they have more protection than they want, and the sooner it is abolished the better it will be for them. Only a short time ago I had placed in my hands a petition from a farmers' association known as the Dominion Grange. That petition, which was presented to this House, reads as follows:—

The agriculturists of Canada are large purchasers of goods, and it is their interest to procure them at the lowest prices. That the imposition of heavy customs duties enables home manufacturers to charge high prices, which enrich themselves without adding anything to the national treasury. That this increases the price of living, while the duties upon agricultural products do not increase the values of those products to any considerable extent, as the prices of the bulk of them are controlled by prices in foreign markets.

We, therefore, ask that the tariff be reduced to the lowest basis consistent with the requirements of the revenue.

From past experience we know that the Dominion Franchise Act has been found to be both cumbersome and expensive, and liable to gross irregularities and errors.

We, therefore, respectfully ask that some other system be adopted which will ensure greater accuracy, more simplicity and less expense.

We desire to enter our most strenuous protest against subsidizing a line of steamships to Australia. As the products of that country are similar to the agricultural products of Canada, but are produced at a very much less cost, this would be a blow at our home market, and taxing ourselves to destroy our interests.

The Patrons of Industry, another farmers' organization, have also spoken on this subject. They insist on tariff for revenue only, so adjusted as to fall upon luxuries and not upon the necessaries of life, and they say they are in favour of reciprocal trade on fair and equal terms between Canada and the world. I am glad, Sir, to know that the deliverances of these important bodies of farmers agree exactly with the platform of the Liberal party. An attempt has been made to show that the Liberal party are in favour of free trade as it is in England. We deny that. Two years ago a convention was held in the city of Ottawa, attended by Liberals from every part of the Dominion—not only members of Parliament and ex-members, but by other representatives from the people. That convention did not decide for a tariff as it is in England; but the trade platform laid down was this:

That the tariff should be reduced to the needs of honest, economical and efficient government;

That it should be so adjusted as to make free, or to bear as lightly as possible upon, the necessaries of life, and should be so arranged as to promote freer trade with the whole world, more particularly with Great Britain and the United States.

It is evident, Sir, that we cannot have free trade as it is in England. Our conditions are quite different. We have borrowed large sums of money in England, and, as the wise man has said, "the borrower is servant to the lender." We have borrowed abroad $207,000,000, on which we have to pay interest every year; so that we occupy a very different position to that occupied by the people of Great Britain. The hon. Finance Minister, in his Budget speech made a comparison between the present Government and that of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie—the one representing a protective policy, and the other tariff for revenue only, as far as possible. The more the comparison is made, and the more it is studied, the better it will be for the Liberal party of the Dominion. What a change altered circumstances make. For years, in every session of Parliament, at all political meetings, it was stated that the hon. member for South Oxford was a failure as a Finance Minister, that it was because of his incapacity that deficits existed. But the present Finance Minister, by the position he now takes, and the statements he makes,—and his followers endorse all he does and says—virtually takes it all back. He virtually admits that he has been mistaken. Deficits, he now says, are caused by not enough of taxes being levied. His followers applaud their level-headed Finance Minister, as they are bound to do, no matter how much the position he takes in his Budget speech contradicts all they have said in the past concerning the management of the finances of the country by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I shall present figures to show the great difference in the expenditure of the present Government compared with that of the Mackenzie Government. Take the records of the Mackenzie Government and taxation levied during their term of office:—

1874-75	$ 20,664,817
1875-76	18,614,415
1876-77	17,697,924
1877-78	17,841,938
1878-79	18,476,613

Total$ 93,295,768

Compare that expenditure with the expenditure of the last five years:

1889-90	$ 31,587,071
1890-91	30,314,151
1891-92	28,446,157
1892-93	29,321,367
1893-94	27,579,203

Total$147,247,949

Or an average of $29,449,589 against an average of $18,659,153 in Mr. Mackenzie's time, being an average increase of $10,790,436 in one year, or an increase in the five years of $53,952,181. While the expenditure increased at this enormous rate, our population was almost at a standstill. From 1871 to 1881 it increased only 19 per cent, and from 1881 to 1891 the increase was only 11 per cent, so that there is no proportion between the increase of taxation and the increase of population. But the present Government, from what we know transpired last session, is a Government that exists for the benefit of the manufacturers. The manufacturers seem to control this country. Previous to last session, the Government felt bound to yield to the force of public opinion to the extent of sending out some of its members to find from the people what they wanted. The prompt answer was: We want reduction of taxation, and the Government resolved to try and do something to please the masses. Therefore, the Finance Minister, in his Budget speech, made many changes. But all these changes disappeared, and the tariff was brought back to near its former condition at the representations of the manufacturers. I will just read from the report of the secretary of the Manufacturers' Association a few extracts which will bear out what I say:

The object of the association was to devise ways and means to prevent their industries being crushed out of existence by unfair competition of those in other countries engaged in similar industries, and that the association has been a strong factor in Dominion politics ever since, is the best evidence of the necessity for its existence; and we congratulate ourselves that in Sir Mackenzie Bowell we have a Premier who is in close touch and sympathy with us, and in whose hands our interests will be safe. We are assured by him, and by his colleagues, that in the future, as in the past, protection to Canadian industries will be inscribed upon the banner under which they will fight the political battles of the country.

What has been done for the manufacturers, or what the Government has enabled them to do, may be gathered from the census returns:

Capital invested	$353,836,817
Value of manufactured products.....	475,455,705
Cost of raw material.....	$255,983,219
Wages paid	99,762,441
Total	$355,745,660

Therefore, $353,836,817 capital invested in one year makes a clear profit of $119,710,045, or between 33 and 34 per cent. It must be borne in mind that many manufactories which existed long before the National Policy was established are still in existence, and doing good work without receiving any benefit from protection. Some of the manufacturers, however, under the National Policy, must have made enormous profits. We know that the manufacturers of coal oils make a profit of 110 per cent. The value of coal oil brought into this country was $420,575, and the duty was $466,163. The Government had come to the conclusion to do something. They knew it was necessary, and they came before the manufacturers and asked what could be done—how much reduction should be made. The Government knew that tariff reform was wanted, and in this opinion were no doubt confirmed by the reports of certain members of the Government, and the Controllers who had visited different parts of the country and found a general desire that the tariff should be reduced and that combines and monopolies should be checked and prevented taking such large sums of money unjustly from the toiling masses of this country. At a meeting held in Toronto the Government sounded a note of warning, when a member said they were prepared to cut of the mouldering branches. But very little was done in that direction. In the speech made by the Controller the other evening, he said the increase in the duties in the last ten years was only 1 per cent. I figure out the difference in duty, and find that 2.72 per cent is the difference between the tariff in 1893 and that now in operation. So that it does not make very much difference, after all the great effort to make a reduction. Further, the organ of the manufacturers says:

It was evident, however, that some changes in the tariff were imperative, and that, if they were not inaugurated by the friends of protection, the Government could not survive, and that the enemies of protection would accede to power. It was under these circumstances that the Tariff Committee entered upon their labours, having the counsel and assistance of many of the most experienced members of the association, the result of which was an embodiment of their views in a communication to the Finance Minister (a copy of which is here before you), which elicited from him a kindly letter, in which he alluded to it as a well-prepared brief, in which all the matters therein discussed had been done full justice. Perhaps it might be going too far to even surmise the effect these recommendations of your Tariff Committee to the Minister may have had in the final arrangement of the tariff; but it is but an act of justice to the committee to direct attention to the large number of changes that were made in the tariff along the lines suggested in the recommendations, and that, in many instances, the language used is substantially identical.

It goes on to say:

The association has just reason for congratulating itself upon the influence it possesses in assisting to mould public opinion in the matter of affording tariff protection to our manufacturing industries, and in shaping the laws of the country in conformity thereto. There never was a time since the formation of this association, twenty years ago, that its influence was stronger or more pronounced than now. The personnel of its membership, now greater than ever before, is of the highest standard, and composes a glorious array of patriots, who are making this Canada of ours the one of the most important nations of the earth, and the brightest and most valued jewel in the British Crown.

United and harmonious as they have always been, it is of the utmost importance that, as members of this association, our manufacturers should continue to hold together and to work together for the perpetuation of the great cause they have in view—that of protection. No other body of men better comprehends the true interests of Canada—no other body is more concerned in her prosperity.

And again—and this is the last I will read from this report :

It is pleasant to contemplate that the outlook for the maintenance of the National Policy is much brighter now than it was even a year ago. In Sir Mackenzie Bowell we have a man at the head of our national affairs who is a sturdy and devoted adherent to our existing system, and who, having the courage of his convictions, will hold his way steadily in the course he long since helped to mark out, and as an association, and as individuals, no doubt your best and most earnest support will be given to the Government as long as the Government adhere to the principle of tariff protection to Canadian manufacturing industries.

Now, Sir, it is evident from these facts that the manufacturers have been granted their wish, that the Government have helped them to carry out their aims to their entire satisfaction. And the manufacturers, as I have said, have been able to make a profit upon the capital invested in their works of between 33 and 34 per cent. I am sure, Sir, that if the farming community could prosper in that way they would be prosperous indeed. If the average farmer having a capital of about $6,000 invested in his lands, building, farm implements, &c., and if he could clear $2,000 a year, we might all rejoice. Even if he could make $1,000 yearly the beneficial influence would be felt in every city, town, village and hamlet in this great Dominion, for the farmers would spend the money and all classes would receive the benefit. It would help all branches of trade, and there would be work for all. People would not then be leaving the country, as they are doing, to seek some better place. In the past very little attention has been paid to the farmer's interest. We know that deputations have come here and asked in vain for the small favour of the removal of the duty on binding twine. It was reduced by half, making the duty 12½ per cent. The effect of that was to reduce the price of binding twine, and the farmers now ask that the whole duty be taken off as it has been in that highly protected country the United States. Binding twine is necessary for the farmer before he can get his grain into the barn: it is his raw material, just as different articles are the raw material of the manufacturer. But all the efforts of deputations that have come here have been fruitless, all remonstrances have been in vain. The same is true of another important article much used on the farm—that is wire for fencing, which is necessary for the farmer in order to protect his fields from animals that otherwise would break in and destroy his crops. But, although these two articles, barbed wire and binding twine yielded to the public revenues last year only $21,000 the placing of them on the free list was denied the farmers. There is still another thing respecting which the farmer is at a disadvantage and in respect of which even the Canadian manufacturer seems to be at a disadvantage—I refer to agricultural implements. The freeing of these from duty would be a great gain to the farmers, especially to those in Manitoba and the North-west. But that fact was not regarded by the present protective Government. I understand that the large and enterprising firm, the Massey-Harris Company, was about to open an establishment at Suspension Bridge to manufacture for the foreign trade. They are all right in their operations, so far as the home market is concerned, for the Canadian farmers must bear the burden of these protective duties: but they cannot compete with other manufacturers for the foreign trade without a reduction in the tariff on the raw material. I understand that, as the Massey-Harris Company were on the point of establishing their works in the United States, the Government gave them a rebate of 99 per cent on the iron and steel imported by them and used in manufacturing articles to be exported. Consequently, the farmers of this country are at a disadvantage, and had to pay 20 per cent more for the goods turned out by the Massey-Harris Company than the foreign consumer has to pay. The reasons for this will be apparent from the following table of relative prices in Toronto and Buffalo:—

	Toronto.	Buffalo.
Pig iron (long ton).....	$16 50	$10 50
Bar iron, per 100.....	1 60	1 00
Galv. barb wire.....	2 87½	2 00
Wire nails	1 90	1 00
Coil chain, 3-8.....	4 25	3 40
Cut nails	1 45	0 80
Sleigh shoe steel.....	2 50	1 30
Horseshoes, per keg.....	3 60	3 00

I have no doubt that this firm, which is able to compete with the American manufacturers in Australia and other neutral markets, if they could import their raw material free of duty, would be able to hold the Canadian market against all comers. If this were done they would be in the same position as the Canadian farmer, who has to compete with the whole world. But it was said, Sir, and said in this paper which I shall read, that the object of these iron duties was to encourage the manufacturer of steel and pig iron in Nova Scotia. Well, Sir, if that was the object, it has helped that province very little, for in the last census it is shown that the increase of population in that province in ten years has been less than 10,000 souls. This comes far short of the prophecy Sir Charles Tupper made in this House, that, if the iron and steel duties which he proposed were adopted, an industry would be created in this country which would employ 20,000 hands, making with their families an increase of 100,000 in the population in a short time. Sir, that prediction is very far from having been fulfilled. As I said before, the interest of the farmers received very little attention, because they do not come here and fill the lobbies as do the manufacturers. Some of the members of this House seem to be of the opinion that the tillers of the soil are of very little account. I will read to you the opinion on that subject of an hon. gentleman who spoke in this House last session :

Some of the farmers in the country seem to think that they are going to receive great benefits from the Wilson Bill, if its various provisions are crystallized into law. I have my doubts about that. I admit that it might be a good thing for this country to have the 5 cents duty taken off eggs which the farmers send into the United States ; it might be a good thing for this country, perhaps, if the duty on potatoes were brought down from 25 to 15 cents a bushel ; I admit that it might be a good thing for our farmers if the duty should be lowered on various other articles that they are able to export into the United States. But the events of the last few years have proved one thing conclusively, to my mind, and that is that it is not for the ultimate good of the Canadian farmer that the raw products of his farm should go freely into the United States market. The farmer is a peculiar being. With him sufficient unto the day are the evils thereof. Far be it from me to say anything derogatory to their intelligence, but I say that the farmer of this country, if he can raise enough from day to day to keep him, is generally satisfied.

It is one of the finest traits, it is one of the finest incidents of agricultural life, that a man is satisfied with little ; it is one of the finest features of agricultural life, that the man who lives on a farm, and digs his living out of the soil, is satisfied with what the soil will give him. He is not avaricious, he does not want the world and all its belongings—like some hon. gentlemen whom I see on the Opposition side of this House.

I suppose the extract voices the opinion of a large number of members. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to think that by making certain statements they will be able to induce the farmers to vote for them when the election comes around. We know that the farmers have been accustomed to follow the old rut in politics, and they have been accustomed to say : I do not want any change, my relations voted that way, I have voted that way, and I will continue to do so. I am glad to know, however, that they are beginning to think and to judge for themselves. They will not be content always to remain hewers of wood and drawers of water. They have a stake in this country ; their farms are mortgaged for the large debt of the country, and they have an interest in the good government of the country. I think it would be well if they read at first hand everything that is said and done in this House, and paid no attention to what is said by the party newspapers : if they did this for a short time we would see a great change take place in the opinion of the agricultural class. Now, there was a quotation made the other evening by an hon. member, which I beg leave to quote again, as it is short. I wish to compare it with another statement, showing the difference between Great Britain and the United States in their respective trade policies. Now, last session the Minister of Justice used the following language :—

Who will say for one moment that the hostile tariffs surrounding that country in every quarter of the globe have not been successful in forcing her out, step by step, from the position of vantage which she once held in the various markets of the world ? What is the whole policy of the motherland to-day ? Driven from the civilized markets of the world, steadily, and every year finding their output to those markets decreasing, they spend millions on their navy and millions on their army, to force their wares and their goods and their merchandise into the uncivilized markets of the world, which they are endeavouring to occupy, to settle, and to control, driven there by the deadly effect upon them of the tremendous competition coming from the protectionist nations in the rest of the world.

The reason I quote that is that I may compare it with another statement which I find in the New York "Herald," as follows :—

NEW YORK "HERALD."

Old England, by means of her free trade policy, is now enabled to import annually 1,700,000,000 pounds of cottons (mostly from the United States), out of which she manufactures yarns and piece-goods of the value of $500,000,000. Of this total production of cotton goods she exports and sells annually in foreign markets an amount valued at about $325,000,000. Nothing but our "protective" tariffs prevented the United States from reaping the vast profits which our free trade rival reaps from the manufacture of American cotton. Of course, we can never hope to do this while our "protective" system is retained. The very means we have adopted to shut out foreign manufactures from our markets have necessarily shut us out of the markets of the world. We can never sell freely to other countries from whom we refuse to buy freely.

That is the difference, that is the true reason of Great Britain's greatness, that is what gives Great Britain control of the markets of the world. It is by means of her trade policy that she has been able to bring most of the nations of the earth into tribute, by loaning them large sums of money upon which she receives interest from them. It is estimated that the interest which Great Britain receives from other countries upon money she has loaned them, amounts to no less a sum than £50,000,000, or $250,000,000 annually. Where is the country that can compete with Great Britain who receives that amount of money yearly taken from the earnings of the labour of other countries ? She has reached her present proud position by pursuing a free trade policy, by which she is enabled to trade without obstruction with every nation of the world. Her population has increased, her army has increased, her navy has increased, there is progress on every hand. On the other hand, we see countries like the United States, which show many evidences of prosperity for a time; then we heard about thousands of her people being out of employment and armies of tramps, and industrial depression, all because of protection. This trouble overtook them when the time came for them to pay back some of the money they had borrowed. Our hon. friends opposite like the appearance of protection, but they do not like its effect. We hope to see better things in this country when it shall have abandoned the protective system. We have heard a good deal about our credit being good. Well, Sir, we can join with hon. gentlemen opposite in congratulating ourselves that our credit is good. But it is not a wise plan to stretch our credit to the utmost limit. We should not do like the old farmer who only began to curtail his expenses after the farm was gone. It is best to take a look ahead of us before it is too late. I do not think that any country can become permanently prosperous upon borrowed money. Things may run smoothly while the expenditure is going on, but there will come a pay day when we shall have to pay the money we have borrowed. Looking over the Public Accounts, we see there has been an increase in the public debt of $4,500,000 since last session. There were subsidies voted during the dying hours of that session, when members were preparing to return to their homes, to the enormous sum of $4,661,000. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) stated there are about twenty millions of obligations to pay under this head. That being the case, the outlook is serious. It will be remembered that last year a large deputation visited Ottawa and interviewed the Government with respect to the improvement of the Trent Valley Canal. Members of the deputation made full representations to the Government, and explained that they approved the Government's policy. Some of the Ministers replied that they would require something more than moral support. I suppose that was the reason that, notwithstanding the failure of the canal to the present time, a contract has been given amounting to $429,000, for further works. The expenditure on construction prior to confederation (1867) was $309,371.31; ditto from 30th June, 1879, to 30th June, 1893, $1,079,112.56; from 30th June, 1893, to 1st March, 1894, $3,382.32; total, $1,391,822.19. Cost of maintenance, 1892-93, $12,926.07; cost of staff, 1892-93, $3,739.86. Total revenue, 1892-93, $888.95. During the last two years, the amount of expenditure on the canal and charges to management was $8,822, as compared with the small revenue of $2,175. These facts show that the expenditure is unnecessary and not in the best interests of the country. They have also another important canal, the Tay Canal, the cost of construction of which amounted to $476,000. During the last two years the receipts reached $262.70, they being $126.94 in one year, and in the following $135.76. During these two years no less than $5,000 were expended for repairs and cost of management. In regard to bonuses to railways, $4,661,160 are to be spent over the country. When we bear in mind that other subsidies were expended, and an instance is known where a president who received large subsidies gave to an election fund $25,000, it is evident that something was expected from the large expenditure voted last session. Hon. gentlemen opposite, in the course of this debate, have declared that the United States afford no market for our agricultural products. If hon. gentlemen opposite will, however, study the official returns they will find that there is an excellent market in the neighbouring republic, and they will learn that our farmers are of the opinion that it is the most profitable market available. A return covering twenty years, shows a larger amount of trade between Canada and the United States in eight years than between Canada and Great Britain; and for the other twelve years the trade was greatest with Great Britain. In 1889, trade between Canada and the United States was within 11 millions of the whole amount of trade between the Dominion and the rest of the world. That occurred the year before the McKinley tariff came into force. I have heard hon. members opposite declare that the people of Great Britain wanted a protective tariff, and they have cheered such statements made in this House. How can it be supposed that the people of Canada would like a protective tariff in Great Britain as they found it in the United States.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN. What had the farmers of Canada to do with the McKinley tariff?

Mr. SEMPLE. If a protective policy was adopted in England, it would be on similar lines, and the farmers would not favour protection. The farmers of Canada were injured by the McKinley tariff, and they would not like to be injuriously effected by having a McKinley tariff both in the States and Great Britain. To those who say there is not a market for the farmers of Canada in the United States, I would say, consult the Trade and Navigation Returns for 1894. For the benefit of those hon. members who think so, I will read to the House figures to show the products of farmers that find their best market in the United States, and returns to show the products of the farmer which finds in Great Britain the most profitable market:

Until last year our best market for hay was found in the United States. The reason we exported more hay to Great Britain last year is that there was a good crop in the United States, and a scarce crop in Great Britain. However, last year was exceptional in that respect. Mr. Speaker, it is apparent from the figures given in the Trade and Navigation Returns, that the best market for the Canadian farmer, for his horses, sheep, barley, beans, potatoes, poultry, and vegetables, is the United States; and his best market for cattle, hay, butter, cheese, eggs, wheat, pease, oats, apples, and clover seed is to be found in Great Britain. Canada received, last year, from Great Britain, $68,538,856 for the amount of exports sent to that country, and from the United States she received $35,809,940 for the goods she sent there. Now, Sir, it is quite plain, from that, that we need both markets for Canada, and, in order that our farmers may get good prices, and in order that this country should prosper, we should have both markets. The Minister of Finance told us in his Budget speech that it is likely we would have more prosperity in this country. I agree with him in that, but I believe that when that prosperity does come we shall see more of the produce of this country sent to the United States market. The signs are encouraging already in our increased exports there. The duties levied under the McKinley tariff were almost prohibitive, but notwithstanding that, during the years that tariff was in force, we did a very large trade with the United States. We received $750,000 for the hay shipped to that country during last year, and it must be borne in mind that there was $4 duty charged on every ton of hay that went there. If the crops are as good, we may, therefore, expect better prices. There is also reason to expect that barley may increase in price. Last year we only received $216,000 for Canadian barley sent to the United States and Great Britain, but in 1889, the year before the McKinley tariff came into effect, we received no less than $6,400,000 for the barley we sent to the United States alone. This year the amount that we received for the sale of eggs in the United States and Great Britain is only a little over $700,000: whereas, before the McKinley Bill came into force, we received $2,156,725 for eggs sold to the United States, being a larger sum than we received for the wheat and oats sold to the different countries in the world. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, when these facts are considered, we see the intimate trade connection which this country has with the United States, and we find, also, that the depression existing in the United States has been very detrimental. I know that two years ago, the farmers received for lambs $4 and $4.25 each, whereas the highest price received last fall was $2.50. If things in the United States improve, there will be more money there, and they will buy more goods from us, because the reason our trade has fallen off with them is on account of the depression. I wish now to refer to some statements made in a speech by the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Smith). I know that hon. gentleman, and I am sure that he would not make extravagant statements such as have been made by members of his own party in this House. He is a practical farmer, and he has endeavoured not to go too great a length in exaggeration. He said:

All I can say, Mr. Speaker, is, that any hon. gentleman of the Opposition who has spoken upon that question, can scarcely expect to make very many votes if, when the election comes, he pays a visit to South Ontario, because the people of that riding already feel the effects of the reduced duty. I make the statement, that I believe a number of these reductions were made to a great extent to satisfy the plea put forth by the farmers of Canada, but whilst the reduction pleased the farmers for a moment, they now find that to-day they are not buying a single article which they require, at a cheaper price than they could buy it for previous to the reduction. They are getting articles no cheaper, and the change of tariff has unsettled our manufacturers.

The change in the tariff made last year only amounted to a reduction of 2-72, compared with the tariff of 1893. The reduction was so very small that it could hardly be expected much difference would be felt by the farmers, or that they would derive much benefit from it. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Smith) in another part of his speech, said:

Now, it has been contended, time and again, not only in this House, but on many public platforms in the country, that the National Policy would never allow the price of wheat to go below $1 a bushel ; but no advocate of the National Policy, either in this House or in the country, believes that that would be an invariable rule. What we did claim was, that in years of scarcity a duty would be of great service to us, but that only helps a few, and a large number suffer thereby.

To carry out that idea the hon. gentleman quoted the difference in price of wheat in Chicago and in this country, and he found that the difference amounted to 15 cents a bushel in favour of Canada. Had that taken place last winter, about January or February, it would have been of great advantage to our farmers. But at present they have sold nearly all their wheat. I venture to assert that in the county I represent, where there is one who has a bushel of wheat to sell, there are twenty who have to buy their flour. In that county they generally raise oats, and sell their oats and buy flour. So that the high price of wheat to-day is of no advantage to the farmer who has no wheat to sell. If anything could be done that would make the market steady all the year round, that would be an advantage. But it is poor consolation to the farmers to tell them that prices have gone up, when most of the things they sell are out of their hands. Now, I wish to touch just for a moment upon a remark that was made by the hon. Controller of Customs in regard to pork, in order to set that matter right, because our hon. friends opposite have come to be very ingenious in the way they present their arguments, and the hon. Controller presented this one with great skill. The hon. gentleman said the price of heavy mess pork in Toronto was $15.75 a barrel, and in Chicago $12.02 to $12.12, it would cost 40 cents per barrel to bring from Toronto to Chicago, the duty is $4, and so the Canadian farmer gets $3.25 of the $4 duty on the article of mess pork. When I heard that statement I was curious to find what was the price of live hogs. I went to the reading room and consulted the "Mail-Empire," and found that the price of live hogs in Buffalo was $4.90 per cwt., live weight ; in Chicago, $4.70 ; in Toronto, $4.80, and in Hamilton, $4.75 ; so that the price in all these places was nearly the same. Probably in Toronto only a few barrels of pork were sold, while in Chicago large quantities were sold. But, at all events, when the farmers are getting no higher price for their hogs in Toronto than in Chicago or Buffalo, and there is such a difference as $3.70 in the price of mess pork, the difference must be due to the combines ; therefore, they cannot be getting their share ; there must be a combine in pork that forces up the price in Toronto, and I do not consider that that would be to the general advantage ; it would only put more money into the pockets of the gentlemen forming the combine. A great many of the arguments put forward by hon. gentlemen opposite are devised as ingeniously as that argument. Now, it has been paraded as a great advantage to the farmers of Canada to stop the importation of such a large quantity of wheat as came into Canada during the time of the Mackenzie Government. I cannot see the point of that argument. Any person who consults the Trade and Navigation Returns will see the exports of wheat, the produce of Canada, and the exports not the produce of Canada. I am glad that at that time our enterprising exporters and merchants were enabled to make profits by purchasing wheat at Chicago and sending it through to Liverpool. In 1878 there was a profit made by those who handled wheat in this way of 37 cents a bushel. They also handled a large quantity of indian corn, on which they made a profit of 20 cents a bushel. This was a benefit to the people of Canada. I remember the circumstances very well. Only a small quantity of wheat came into the country for consumption, but in return a larger quantity was exported to the United States. I remember farmers teaming ten, twenty, thirty or forty miles to the city of Toronto and selling their wheat to American buyers on the wharfs. The wharfs were so crowded that sometimes the farmers had to wait four or five hours before they could get their wheat delivered, so great was the quantity exported to the United States ; and it is a well-known fact that when the American vessels went away, there was a drop in the price of wheat of three or four cents a bushel. This year 7,000,000 bushels of corn, not the produce of Canada, have been exported, and this has been brought through Canada and shipped to Great Britain, while only 711 bushels of Canadian corn has been exported. The great majority of the farmers of this country would prefer to be able to import corn free of duty, because it would enable them to feed their stock cheaper, and sell their stock at a greater profit. So that it would help them if corn were brought in free. This is the opinion of the most intelligent farmers in my riding. Now, Sir, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) asked if the Liberal party would put a tax on raw materials. I do not know what they would do if they were in power, but the Conservative party have put a tax on raw material, that is, on sugar, and I do not know under the circumstances that they have done wrong ; because when a revenue has to be raised, I think it is just as well to raise it from raw sugar as anything else. All the money raised by that tax will go into the public treasury, and none of it would flow into the hands of the manufacturers. Speaking of the deficit of $4,500,000 this year, there was not one hon. gentleman on this side of the House who accused the Finance Minister of incapacity because of that deficit. But when the Mackenzie Government was in power and there was a deficit under the then Finance Minister, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), the staple argument of hon. gentlemen opposite, heard from every platform, was that he was incapable, because he had a deficit. They should take this charge back, because we know that our present Finance Minister has had a deficit this year nearly as large as the total of the deficits of four or five years under the Mackenzie Administration. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) claimed that protection would ruin the city of Quebec. I wonder how Quebec managed to exist before there was a National Policy. Probably just as well as it does now. He closed with an appeal on behalf of Uncle Thomas, now the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. McGreevy). He contends that that hon. gentleman did not act for himself, but for others. It will be remembered that, in 1891, the hon. gentleman was instrumental in assisting contractors to make a profit of $950,000 out of contracts amounting to less than $3,200,000, which led to a parliamentary investigation. Now, however, he is paraded as a martyr. We are told that he did that for the good of his party. He appears to have been a scapegoat. He was not, however, led into the wilderness, but to a substantial building on the banks of the Ottawa Canal, his friends were unceasing in their efforts in his behalf, he was not allowed to put in the full term allotted him by an impartial judge, and now that the people have re-elected him, no doubt he is entitled to his seat, for he appears to be satisfactory to the electors where he has been elected. The greatest sinner can be forgiven, and there is no reason why an exception should be made in the case of the hon. member for Quebec West.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I do not intend to discuss all the subjects to which the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has drawn the attention of the House. He has complained of the present Administration for its expenditure; he has complained of the subsidies which have been granted to railways; he has complained of the increase of our debt, and of the deficit last year. I do not intend to discuss all these points, as they have already been discussed by those that have preceded me, and no doubt will be again by those who will follow. The hon. gentleman also gave us his version of the policy of the Liberal party. That is a question upon which there seems to be a very great deal of uncertainty, and I regret to say that the hon. gentleman did not throw very much additional light upon it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Where is the uncertainty—in the resolution or on the platform?

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). In both. The resolution does not agree with the platform; and nearly every gentleman opposite who addresses the House had a different version of the resolution. The hon. gentleman himself has a different version from any given in the course of the discussion. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken devoted the greater portion of his remarks to the condition of the farmer. He told us that the farmers did not want the National Policy, that it was no advantage to them, and that it had failed to meet the expectations of its promoters. I shall ask the indulgence of the House while I devote a very short time in answering the arguments of the hon. gentleman on that point. It will be remembered that the underlying principle of the policy of the present Administration was this, that the great bulk of the goods required by the masses of the people in this country could be manufactured in this country as well as imported from abroad, that it was desirable that this end should be accomplished, and that the best way to bring about this result was to impose a protective tariff upon agricultural products, and those classes of manufactured goods the manufacture of which was adapted to the conditions of the country, and the character and genius of our people. We have had upwards of fifteen years' experience of the operation of this policy, and the experience of those fifteen years furnishes us abundant proof that, in theory, the policy is sound, and that in practice its operation has been successful. In this general scheme, one of the principal objects was that the farmers of this country should have the privilege of supplying the markets of this country, and for this purpose a protective tariff was imposed upon agricultural products imported from abroad. That it has had the desired effect is proved by the fact that the imports of agricultural products have, year by year, decreased, until, at present, they are utterly insignificant. Now, the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House said this was no advantage to the farmers. I presume, although he did not give us his reasons for making that assertion, that they are the same as those which were given the other day by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). That hon. gentleman said that when any country produced a surplus which was exported abroad, the prices received abroad fixed the prices in the home market, and that any imposition of duties did not increase the price in the home markets. That argument was answered by the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Smith) the other evening, when he gave us the market prices for wheat at present, and pointed out that the effect of the present duty on wheat was to give the Canadian farmer fifteen cents per bushel more for his wheat than he could obtain if wheat were imported free of duty from abroad. I was somewhat amused at the answer of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Semple) who has just addressed the House. He told us that the farmers derive no advantage from the fact that wheat was higher here at present than in the United States, because they had no wheat to sell—that the farmers in his neighbourhood raised oats. That may be true, but there are, nevertheless, a large number of farmers in the country who do raise wheat, and have it to sell, and those farmers are at present obtaining fifteen cents more for their wheat than if it were imported free of duty from abroad. What is true of wheat this year may be true of oats or potatoes or of some other agricultural product next year or some subsequent year. The principle is this:—That, while the theory which my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) laid down is, in the main, a sound one—that where there is a surplus for export the imposition of a duty upon the article does not increase the price at the time in the home market—yet as a matter of fact, in the different lines of agricultural produce, occasions frequently arise—almost every year—in which, in some particular line there is a scarcity in the market. That scarcity may result from failure in the crops or from other causes, but, almost every year, the market at some time becomes bare in regard to some class of agricultural products; the demand is greater than the supply; and when that condition of things arises, the farmer gets the benefit of the increased price which the duty gives him. I think that under these circumstances, the hon. gentleman will have great difficulty in persuading the farmers that they have derived no benefit from the duties imposed on agricultural products. They have not been very successful in their attempts in this direction in the past, and I do not think they will meet with much greater success in the future. The principal object of the protective policy of the present Government was to stimulate the growth of manufacturing industries in the country. That it has been successful in that object appears to me to be too evident to admit of discussion. The figures given in the last census returns show how very rapid has been the growth of manufactures in this country during the ten years which these census returns cover. These figures have already been presented to the House; but they are so important that I shall ask the privilege of reading them again. The increase during the ten years in the number of establishments was from 49,000 to 75,000; increase in capital invested from $164,000,000 to $354,000,000; increase in number of employees from 254,000 to 370,000; in wages from $59,000,000 to $100,000,000; in cost of raw material from $179,000,000 to $256,000,000; and in products from $309,000,000 to $476,000,000. The only criticism of these statistics which has been offered and which appears to me worthy of notice is that of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that they were not reliable because the enumerators had included among the industrial establishments a number of establishments in which only one or two persons were employed, and which could not properly be classed as manufacturing establishments. The hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) answered that argument when he pointed out that the classification of these establishments showed that the increase in the number of small establishments had been no greater in proportion than in the larger ones. The classification of the different industrial establishments of the country shows an increase in those having an output of less than $2,000 to be 55 per cent, in those having an output of from $2,000 to $12,000, to be 23 per cent; in those with an output from $12,000 to $25,000, to be 29 per cent; in those having an output of from $25,000 to $50,000, to be 26 per cent; and in those with an output of $50,000 and upwards, to be 69 per cent; and the average of all 53 per cent. These census returns, if they needed any corroboration are corroborated by the Trade and Navigation Returns, which show the enormous increase that has taken place in raw materials imported from abroad, augmented by the increase of raw materials that have been produced at home. However, I merely refer to this matter of the increase of the industries of the country, and I shall not dwell upon it, for it seems to me too self-evident to admit of discussion. I wish to devote a little attention to the theory which has been advanced by my hon. friend opposite, to the effect that the protective duty which has led to this great increase in manufactures in Canada has proved prejudicial to the great masses of the people, because it has increased the prices of manufactured products, while that increase in prices has not been paid into the public treasury. The answer which the advocates of the National Policy make to that theory is this:—That, although, under a protective policy, the cost of manufactured goods may be somewhat enhanced—not to the full amount of the duties imposed, but while they may be somewhat increased for the time, while these manufactories are in the early years of their existence—another principle, the principle of home competition, comes in and eventually reduces the prices to the same level that they would reach if they could be imported from abroad. These are the two opposing theories, and in order to ascertain which of the two is correct, we can only appeal to the experience of the past; and then leave the question to the judgment of this House and to the good sense of the people of the country to say which of these theories is most nearly correct.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How does that work, may I ask the hon. gentleman—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am asking for information. I ask the hon. gentleman how his theory works out, when it is proved that these factories or industries enter into a combine ?

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I will come to that presently. We might appeal to the experience of the United States under a protective policy, it could be shown from the history of that country that under the protective policy the principle of competition has come in, and that the manufacturers of that country are supplying the people with goods in all the leading lines of manufacture of as good quality and at as cheap prices as the same goods can be obtained in any country in the world. The experience of Canada during the fifteen or sixteen years' operation of the National Policy proves the same thing. Take, for instance, the woollen manufacture of the country. The woollen manufactories of Canada are furnishing the people of Canada with a class of goods that are in every way suited to the people's wants, they are furnishing us with woollen yarns and flannels and tweeds which are durable, which are well suited to our climate and which are in every respect as well suited to the wants of the people as any that can be imported from abroad. Any one who has watched the progress of this industry must have observed that there has been, during recent years especially, a very marked improvement in the quality of the goods produced, and that there has been at the same time, a very marked reduction in the price at which these goods are sold. That has been the result of the introduction of improved machinery, the adoption of better methods and efforts that have been put forth in different ways to reduce the cost of manufacture, and the consumers in Canada have derived the full advantage from every reduction that has been affected in the cost of manufacturing these goods. The same is true with regard to cotton goods, with regard to the different lines of leather goods, boots and shoes, hats and caps, with regard to different manufactures of woodenware, and indeed of all the leading industries of the country. Hon. gentlemen endeavoured to illustrate their theories by referring to the sugar refining industry. The hon. member for South Oxford made the statement that the protective duty given to the sugar refineries of Canada increased the price to the consumers by the amount of that duty ; that upon the import of sugar at the present time, this would amount to a tax equal to about \$2,000,000 which the people of Canada pay, and not a dollar of which goes into the public treasury. That argument has been answered in former discussions in this House, by comparing the prices in the United States and in Canada, showing that the people of Canada were paying no more for their sugar than the people of the United States. Taking the cost of raw material and the cost of manufacturing, and assuming them to be the same, the refiners of Canada have no larger profit than the refiners of the United States. Previous to the adoption of the National Policy, our sugar was purchased in the United States after it had been refined ; since the National Policy, it has been purchased from our own refiners, and our people have paid no higher for it than they would have paid if they had bought it, as they formerly did, in the United States. Now, I do not wish to detain the House with figures upon this point ; but I have taken the trouble to ascertain the prices in Canada and in the United States in the months of April and May. On the 5th April, quotations in Montreal for granulated sugar were 3 5-16 to 3 $\frac{3}{8}$ cents per lb. ; at the same date the New York quotations were 3 15-16 to 4 $\frac{1}{8}$ cents, a difference of about 75 cents per 100 lbs. On the 1st of May the prices in Montreal were 3 $\frac{1}{4}$ to 3 5-16 cents ; on the same day in New York the prices were 4 cents to 4 3-16, a difference of something more than 75 cents per 100 lbs. It must be remembered that at these dates the duty upon raw sugar in the United States was 40 per cent ; that calculated upon the present prices of raw sugar, would be about equal to 75 cents per cwt. So that if we take that into account, in April and May, the people of Canada were getting their sugar as cheaply as they would if they had bought it in the United States. If we take the prices at the present time, we find the same result. On the 16th May, I ascertained by telegraph the prices of sugar in New York and the prices in Halifax. In New York the quotations were : Granulated, \$4.44 ; in Halifax, 4 cents per lb. For yellow sugars, New York prices were \$3.56 ; in Halifax, 3 cents. It must be remembered that this was after the imposition of the 50 cents duty on raw sugar on the 3rd May last, and alters the relative positions of the markets to that extent. Nevertheless, if we allow for that, the difference in price is still in favour of the Canadian buyer by about 20 cents per 100 lbs. on granulated, and about 30 cents per 100 lbs. on yellow.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Would the hon. member repeat the figures in New York and Halifax ?

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). The price in New York on the 16th May was $4.44 per 100 lbs., and in Halifax the price was 4 cents per lb.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And the difference was what ?

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). The difference was 44 cents ; but from that you must subtract 25 cents, which is the difference between the duty on raw sugar in the United States and the duty on raw sugar in Canada ; that leaves 19 cents in favour of the Canadian consumer as against the New York consumer, in comparing the two prices. I will ask the House to make another calculation. Assuming that the theory advanced by the hon. member for South Oxford is true, assuming, for the moment, that the consumers in Canada pay not only the duty imposed upon raw sugar, but also the protective duty upon refined sugar, which is given for the protection of the sugar refiners, if that theory were true, the price of sugar in New York at the present time would be the cost of raw sugar with the cost of refining added, and that would be increased, first, by the duty on raw sugar, which is 40 per cent, and which at the present time would average about 75 cents per 100 pounds; and, in addition to this, the price of the refined sugar would be increased, if the hon. gentleman's theory was sound, by the $\frac{1}{8}$ of a cent per pound, which is given as a protection to the refining industry. These two duties would increase the price of sugar in New York 87 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents per 100 pounds. Upon the same theory, in Canada the price of sugar would be increased, first, by the duty on the raw sugar, which is 50 cents per 100 pounds, and again by the protection, which is 64 cents per 100 pounds; adding these together, it would be increased in consequence of duties imposed under our present tariff, by \$1.14 per cwt., as against 87 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents in New York. Now, if that theory were sound, taking the cost of the raw sugar and the cost of refining to be the same, the price of refined sugar in Canada should be higher than in New York by the difference between \$1.14 and 87 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents, which would be 26 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents per 100 pounds. If the hon. gentleman's theory were correct, I say that I cannot see any possible reason why sugar in Canada at the present time should not be 26 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents higher per 100 pounds than it is in New York; on the contrary, in the quotations which I have in my hand from New York, it is actually 44 cents per 100 pounds higher there than it is in Canada. Now, it appears to me that these figures, which are the actual market quotations of the day, give a clear and convincing answer to the arguments of the hon. gentleman, and they prove beyond the shadow of a doubt, that the theory he advances is not a sound one; but that the theory which the advocates of the National Policy advance is sound, and that in their practical operation, they realize the results which the promoters of the National Policy claim for it. I do not propose to discuss this point further, except to give my answer to one of the questions which hon. gentlemen opposite ask in connection with the statement I have just made. They ask, If this is the case, if the imposition of duties on manufactured articles for the protection of the manufacturers do not increase the price of goods, why impose the duty? In my opinion, there is more than one reason for imposing these duties. The first benefit which results is that it gives steadiness and stability to the market. It enables manufacturers to estimate, with a very tolerable degree of certainty, at least, the demand upon which they can certainly rely. It gives them definite data upon which they can base their business calculations. A second advantage from the imposition of these duties is the protection which it affords from the disastrous competition which would at times result from over-production in foreign countries. This is especially important in times like the present, after or during a period of business depression. It is, as every business man knows, of the greatest importance in the early history of manufacturing industry, and while the capital is not large. It is absolutely necessary in a new country where the market is limited to the consumption of the people of the country, and where the population is not large, in order to induce capitalists to invest their money in manufacturing industries. There is a third reason for the imposition of those duties, and that is for the purpose of securing a revenue. While the prices of the leading lines of the manufactured goods which are manufactured in the country have not increased, while the wants of the great mass of the people are supplied by these manufactures, it nevertheless results that there is in all these leading lines a very considerable quantity of goods imported from abroad. This is a limited demand, it is not a large demand; it usually comes from the wealthy and independent class, it is a very proper class from which to secure a portion of our revenue. Take, for illustration, the manufacture of carriages. Every person knows that the carriage manufacturers in this country are supplying the bulk of the wants of our people, that they make the ordinary driving wagons, buggies, trucks, and those vehicles which the mass of our people use. They are supplying those goods as cheaply as they can be brought in from any other country. Nevertheless there are a considerable number of carriages imported, and I find, on referring to the Trade and Navigation Returns, that last year we derived a revenue of over \$150,000 from duties on carriages. It arises in this way: There is a certain class of persons who desire a particular make of carriage; it may be a barouche or a fashionable carriage of some kind. They do not find such a carriage at home, or they find abroad a vehicle which suits them better; they buy it, it is brought in and pays duty, and that duty goes direct into the public treasury. The same is true in regard to certain classes of woollen and cotton goods, boots and shoes, hats and caps, and every other leading line of manufacture. The revenue derived in this way amounts to a very considerable sum, and I claim that there is no class of goods and no class of persons from which the revenue could be better derived than from those to which I have referred. If hon. members will take the trouble, as I have done, to analyse the receipts of our customs, they will find that after taking out the duties imposed on wines and liquors, on fancy goods, silks and other luxuries of that character and on the class of goods to which I have just referred, the balance remaining is very small, amounting, according to my calculation, to not more than one dollar per head of the population. Of course we cannot arrive at the amount with absolute certainty. But if we make the most liberal allowance possible, the tax on those articles used by the great mass of the people and the duty paid on them does not amount to more than \$1.25 or \$1.50 per head, at the outside of our population, and any reasonable man will admit that that is not a tax which can be considered burdensome even to the poorer classes of the community. I wish before I close to offer a few observations in answer to another line of argument adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite, and that is the argument which had been used in regard to the movement of our population, by which hon. gentlemen opposite have attempted to show that the country has not been prosperous and the National Policy has failed. They pointed to the fact that the immigrants who have arrived in Canada have, to a large extent, disappeared; that some of them may have returned, but that others have gone southward across the line. But the census returns show that taking into consideration the immigrants that have come into the country during the last ten years, and the natural increase of population, the population is not so large at the present time as we might reasonably expect it would be. Hon. gentlemen from these facts jump at the conclusion that the country has not been prosperous and that the National Policy has proved a failure. I desire to endeavour to show that these conclusions are not justifiable from the premises, and that the course of reasoning is illogical. In the first place, I should like to call the attention of the House to this fact, that the growth, progress and prosperity of any country depend, not so much on the number as on the character and habits of its people, and that those countries which have had the largest immigration, or are most densely populated, are not the most progressive or at the present time the most prosperous. To go to the old world, Great Britain is a country which, for many years, has been the great commercial and manufacturing centre. She has received few additions to her population from abroad, but she has sent out constantly a stream of emigration from her shores. Germany, next to Great Britain, has had the largest emigration of any European country, yet no one will say that Germany is not a great, thrifty and prosperous people. Norway and Sweden have had the largest emigration of any European country in proportion to population. These countries are sparsely settled, yet they compare favourably, so far as the ratio of progress and prosperity goes, with other European countries where the population is more dense and from which there has been no emigration. I do not, however, claim that from those countries we learn the most useful lessons. The most practical lessons may be learned by a study of the census returns of the United States, where the conditions more closely resemble ours. The United States for many years received the largest number of immigrants of any country in the world. A high authority estimates that two-thirds of all the emigration has for many years gone to the United States. During the ten years covered by the last census the immigration to the United States amounted to upwards of half a million annually. This foreign element, the census shows, is scattered largely, almost entirely, through the northern and western states. In the North Atlantic Division, which includes New England and New York, the percentage of foreign population, according to the last census, was upwards of 22 per cent. In Rhode Island, where it was the largest percentage, it reached upwards of 30 per cent. In the North Central States, it was upwards of 18 per cent. In some Western States it averaged from 30 to 40 per cent, and in North Dakota, where it was the largest, it attained 44 per cent, almost one-half of the entire population of the state. In the Southern States the proportion of foreign element was small. In Texas, where it was the largest, it was less than 7 per cent; in almost all the other Southern States it was less than 1 per cent. The point in these statistics to which I wish specially to direct attention is, that notwithstanding the large immigration which has been added to the natural increase of population, and notwithstanding the population of the northern and western states has been increased by this large foreign element, the centre of population of that country has remained undisturbed during those ten years. Indeed, for the last one hundred years it has remained on the same parallel of latitude. In 1790 the centre of population of the United States was in the neighbourhood of Baltimore. In 1890 it was in the neighbourhood of Columbus, in Southern Indiana. These are practically on the same parallel of latitude. It has removed westward during these hundred years upwards of 500 miles, but during all that time it has moved but a few miles north or south of the same parallel of latitude. The study of these figures show, that while there has been a movement westward of population in that country, there has also been a movement to the south, and this movement may be accounted for in various ways. In the first place, there are the wealthy, independent classes who go south in search of rest or health. Then there is the class who are physically and intellectually weak, who find life a struggle for existence, and who desire to carry on that struggle under the most favourable conditions possible. Then there are the vagrant classes, the ordinary tramp, who pays us a visit in July and August, but who, during the greater part of the year makes his home at a safe and convenient distance to the south of us. Besides there is the class—I regret to say it is a large class—that are idle, indolent, and unambitious, whose whole desire seems to be merely to exist, who are satisfied if they can maintain their existence for a whole week on a few cents' worth of corn meal and bacon, and who are content with an entire wardrobe which can be made out of a few yards of cotton cloth. This class of people naturally gravitate towards the south, and they find in those warm climates a more congenial home than they do with us in the north. But the point to which I wish now to direct the attention of the House is this: That these are the non-productive and not the productive classes; that while they add to the numerical strength of a state or a country in which they live, they add very little, or absolutely nothing to its growth or prosperity. Another point revealed by the census returns of the United States, to which I desire to call attention, is this: That the growth and prosperity of that whole country has been principally confined to the northern states; that the increase in wealth, the growth in manufactures, the activity in trade and commerce, have been almost entirely in those states which most nearly correspond with ours in geographical position, in natural resources, in climate, and other conditions; and in addition to that, the movement of population in those, which are the most prosperous states of the union, has been precisely similar to the movement of population in this Dominion of Canada. In the older states of the union, there has been the same decrease of the population in the agricultural districts, and the same increase in the cities and manufacturing towns. There has been the movement of population westward; farmers leaving the unproductive lands in the older states to take up the new lands in the west, where the soil is more fertile, where little or no capital is needed, where their labour is better rewarded, and their condition is in every respect improved. There has also been the movement to the southward to which I have alluded. Now, I do not wish to be understood as underestimating the value of population. Population is an important element of consideration in the growth or prosperity of any country. But particularly in a new country like ours where there are large tracts of land unoccupied, where there are great natural resources undeveloped, it is of the utmost importance that by every legitimate and practical means we should add to the population of the country. But what I do wish to draw attention to is this: The difference in the value of the productive and industrial classes, as compared with the idle and unproductive classes, the difference between those who are active, industrious, energetic, thrifty, and ambitious, and between those who are idle and indolent, who seem to have no desire to accumulate wealth, or to obtain social position, but who simply try to work out the problem of existence in the easiest, and simplest, and cheapest manner possible. I wish further to impress upon the attention of the House this fact: That while we must, in considering the progress of a country, take into account the increase of its population, we cannot accept any estimate of its growth which is solely based upon the increase or decrease of its population. Such arguments are utterly valueless, unless they are supported by other and better testimony. I wish, in this connection, to point out the utter worthlessness of the arguments used by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and by many other gentlemen who have addressed us from that side of the House, and which arguments are based upon the exodus of our population. These hon. gentlemen have relied principally upon the fact that the farming population of Canada has decreased in the older provinces, and that if you take the Dominion as a whole the farming population has not increased. That is true; the census returns show it. But that does not prove that our farmers are not prosperous. We have abundance of evidence to prove the contrary. Although their numbers have not increased, yet the quantity of land in Canada under cultivation is 6,500,000 acres greater in 1891 than it was in 1881. That our farmers have increased in wealth, is proved beyond all doubt by the enormous increase in the amount of capital invested in their agricultural enterprises. As was shown by the Minister of Railways the other night, that increase has amounted to \$95,000,000 in Ontario alone. Our farmers have obtained improved and labour-saving machinery; they have adopted better methods; they have enormously increased their producing power, and in addition to this, they have a larger and better market to supply to-day than they ever had before. This market is provided by the increase of population in our cities and manufacturing centres. The returns show that the increase during ten years was 38 per cent, and that, in this way, 380,000 people have been added to that class of the population which are not producers, but consumers, of agricultural products. Under our present tariff, the farmers of Canada have the privilege of supplying this large market, and though their numbers have not increased, they are supplying that market to-day. They are giving us a better and more abundant supply than we ever had before, and, in addition to that, and what is still more remarkable, they have every year increased the surplus which they send abroad, until, at the present time, it has reached the enormous sum of \$50,000,000 annually. There are no 537,000 people engaged in agricultural pursuits in any country in the world, that can show a better, or even as good a record of success and prosperity. It is little use, in the face of facts like these, for hon. gentlemen of the Opposition to talk about the decrease in the value of farm property. We know that farm property in the older provinces, in the agricultural districts, has decreased in value. But that is an experience which is common to every civilized country in the world. It is the inevitable result of having opened up large tracts of fertile land for settlement and having placed these on the markets at nominal cost, or absolutely free, to those who were willing to settle upon them. It is useless, too, for hon. gentlemen to base upon the so-called exodus of our population, and upon the fact that our population has not increased during the ten years covered by the census as rapidly as we might expect, in view of the number of immigrants landed on our shores, added to the natural increase of our population—to base upon these facts any argument to show that this country is not prosperous. If you wish to test the prosperity of the country, apply any of the tests which are recognized as the most reliable and most accurate by the best authorities in every civilized country in the world. Take the earnings of the people; take their savings deposited in the savings banks, in the chartered banks, in the insurance companies, in the loan and investment companies, and in other financial institutions; take the enormous increase of capital invested in agriculture, in manufactures, in building operations, in railway enterprises, in every class of commercial industry throughout the country; take the enormous increase in the purchasing power of our people, the higher standard of living and the higher standard of comfort among all classes; take the enormous increase in the trade we are doing with each other and with other nations; and take that which is the best test of all, the improved position of Canada in the great financial markets of the world. By any of these tests you choose to apply, there are no 5,000,000 people in any state or country, either in the old world or in the new, that can furnish as many and as convincing proofs of their growth in material prosperity as can the people of Canada since the adoption of the present fiscal policy in 1879. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to detain the House any further. There are a number of other questions which have been raised in this debate which it would be interesting to discuss. Many of them have been fully discussed already; others will be dealt with by those who are to follow. My principal object in addressing the House at all was to press upon the attention of hon. members the fallacy of the arguments which hon. gentlemen opposite have been advancing, based upon the southward movement of population, a movement which has been shown to be governed by climatic conditions merely, and which is influenced by no policy and can be controlled by no Government. I am sure that the financial statement which has been presented by the hon. Minister of Finance is satisfactory to this House, and will be satisfactory to the country. In any of the criticisms which have been offered in the course of this debate, I have not heard anything which should shake the confidence, either of the House or of the country, in the policy of the present Government, or in its administration of our public affairs; and I believe that no statement has been made since this Parliament opened will be received with more general satisfaction than the clear and explicit declaration of the Government, that the policy of the past is to be adhered to in the future.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess

Mr. McISAAC. Mr. Speaker, hon. gentlemen opposite profess to be very much concerned as to what is and what is not the policy of the Liberal party. Some of them assert that we have no policy at all, others say it is free trade as it exists in England, while all unite in saying that the policy propounded and agreed upon by the Liberals of Canada at their great convention a short time ago, is general, vague and indefinite in its terms. Sir, I think that any person who can read, and who will read that platform for himself, will at once come to the conclusion that it is not vague or general, but clear and definite as anything can be made by the English language. But if you want to know whether it is or whether it is not as clear as it should be, the very best possible way of ascertaining that is by way of comparison. I will ask you to come back some seventeen years in the history of this country, to the time when the leader of hon. gentlemen opposite introduced into this House the resolution upon which was based the National Policy of the Conservative party. I will read to you that resolution word for word; I will ask you to compare its words and meaning with the words and meaning of the platform of the Liberal party; and then I will ask hon. gentlemen opposite if the policy of the Liberal party, as laid down in their platform, is not more definite and clear in its terms than the National Policy resolution. Here it is:

That this House is of the opinion that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a National Policy, which, by a judicious readjustment of the tariff will benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing and other interests of the Dominion; that such a policy will retain in Canada thousands of our fellow-countrymen, now obliged to expatriate themselves in search of the employment denied them at home, will restore prosperity to our struggling industries, now so sadly depressed, will prevent Canada from being made a sacrifice market, will encourage and develop an active interprovincial trade, and moving, as it ought to do, in the direction of reciprocity of tariffs with our neighbours, so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand, will greatly tend to procure for this country, eventually, a reciprocity of trade.

I ask hon. gentlemen opposite if that resolution is clear and definite in its terms; I ask them if it is as clear and definite as the platform of the Liberal party? They cannot say that it is; not one of them will say that it is. Institute a comparison between the two, and you must admit that the Liberal platform is far more clear and definite in its terms than the resolution moved in this House by Sir John Macdonald. Examine that resolution from end to end, and you will not find the word protection in it, although the other day the hon. Minister of Public Works stated that the National Policy, the policy of the present Government, was protection pure and simple, as it was laid down in 1878. In that resolution you will not find the word protection; it is readjustment, fostering, encouragement—anything and everything but protection. There is nothing definite in the whole resolution from beginning to end. I do not give you that as my opinion merely, it must be the opinion of any person who understands the English language. I will read to you what Sir John Macdonald himself said in this House before he placed that resolution on the Table of the House, to show that he realized that it was vague, general and indefinite in its terms. The resolution was moved on the 7th of March, 1878. On page 853 of "Hansard" I find that Sir John Macdonald, speaking on the resolution, said:

It is not forced upon the Opposition to find a new policy with regard to matters of revenue and tariff and expenditure; they could not, of course, because they have not the power to do so. As far as matters of tariff are concerned, it is impossible for the Opposition to enter into details, or explain before the House and the country their policy; they have not the material; the Government alone have the opportunity, and the only opportunity, of collecting the facts upon which a tariff can be formed. The Minister of Finance has already informed you that, even with all the materials he has at hand, it is not an easy matter to form the tariff; and it would be presumption in the Opposition to attempt to do so. I shall, therefore, confine myself to general principles.

Now, is it not idle and useless and inconsistent in hon. gentlemen opposite to say that the policy of the Liberal party is not definite and clear, when their own great chieftain, in moving the National Policy resolution, had to make an apology and give an excuse to the House for not being more definite, saying that it was not the place or the duty of the Opposition to define what their policy on tariff and revenue should be. Sir, that is not all. In the great campaign of 1878 which followed, the resolution was understood in one of the provinces to mean protection, and in another to mean low tariff. As the chieftain of the party knew that that would be the case, he no doubt purposely made it vague and indefinite. You remember that some months after this resolution was proposed there was a great agitation in the province of New Brunswick against any increase in the tariff. You will remember, the famous telegram sent by Mr. John Boyd, of St. John. Having a great influence in the councils of the Conservative party and knowing that the feeling in the maritime provinces, especially New Brunswick, was very strong against an increase in the tariff, he sent a telegram to Sir John Macdonald, and in reply the late chieftain assured him that the meaning of the National Policy was not the increasing but only the readjustment of the tariff. Does that not show that the resolution was made purposely indefinite so that every one could interpret it according to his views? Yet hon. gentlemen to-day boast that their policy has never changed, that it is the same policy which was enunciated in 1878 and has been carried down to this day—protection pure and simple. In the face of their own records, resolutions and speeches, in the face of the declarations of their own leader, surely whatever other defence they may try to set up for the National Policy, they cannot say that their policy has always been the same. Failing to defend successfully protection, some hon. gentlemen opposite, for the last few days have resorted to the tactics of quoting garbled extracts from speeches delivered by some members on this side many years ago, in order to prove that they were at one time protectionists. This is a miserable way of defending their policy—this quoting of extracts from speeches delivered twenty or twenty-five years ago. But if hon. gentlemen opposite adopt these methods, we can follow the same tactics. Do you remember, Mr. Speaker, that in 1874, when the then Finance Minister raised the tariff of this country from 15 to 17½ per cent, that Sir Charles Tupper said: The hon. gentleman is entering the thin edge of the protectionist wedge by increasing the tariff 2½ per cent. Sir, the National Policy was to benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing and other interests of the Dominion. So says the resolution. Well, so far as the agricultural industry of this country is concerned, I am not going to read you any statistics. I ask any man to be his own witness. The best witness is the man who can look and judge for himself, and not the one who takes his information second-hand from other persons. Travel on the trains, anyway and everywhere, especially through the maritime provinces, and you will see with your own eyes the results of the National Policy. The low price of farm products, the depreciation of farm lands, the boarded windows, the vacant farms along the country, are the best evidence that the agricultural interests have not been benefited but destroyed under the influence of the National Policy. And as to the mining interests of the country, I think it is unnecessary for me to say one word, because no person will have the hardihood to stand up here, and say they have been benefited by the National Policy. But the manufacturing industries—oh, the manufacturing industries of this country. The National Policy was to erect tall chimneys all over the country. The hum of the factory was to be heard all over the land; and whatever else should be the result of the National Policy, that was sure to follow. The other evening we heard the Minister of Public Works, in his attempt to prove the benefits of the National Policy to our manufacturing interests, say that to-day we have 75,000 industries in Canada as the result of that policy. That same tale and those same figures were repeated to-day by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr Wood). It is easy to give the number, but when hon. gentlemen opposite are asked to point to a given province or given county or city and show where these manufactories exist, they are dumb. Take the province of Nova Scotia, and let them enumerate the manufactories which have arisen there under the National Policy. The House will pardon me if I, for the moment read a few extracts from the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford, delivered a few days ago. This will save time, and it puts the case in a nutshell. He says:

Nova Scotia is specially privileged. Of the 223 knitting factories, 99 were developed in Nova Scotia. And more than that, of the 99 developed in Nova Scotia, 93 were developed in the county of Shelburne. I find, on further examination, that the 93 industrial establishments in the shape of knitting factories in the county of Shelburne, employed collectively 126 hands. I find further, on the same page of the census, that they earned in that year, $1,833, being at the rate of $14.55 per year for each hand, or 28 cents a week, and 4½ cents a day. I find that in Quebec, in the county of L'Assomption, there were 12 industrial establishments known as knitting factories, employing collectively 12 hands, earning an average of $63 a year, being at the rate of $1.20 per week, wherewith, I suppose, to discharge the wages of superintendents, the cost of finding power, and dividends to the company. Portneuf is equally favoured. It has 12 establishments, which average $90 per year in wages, or $1.60 per week. Now, I find here that the machinery and tools employed in each factory are given; and it may interest the hon. member for

Mr. McISAAC.

Shelburne (Mr. White) to know, that the 93 knitting factories in Shelburne actually consumed for machinery and tools, a total of $623, being at the rate of $7 per factory for machinery. Now, I want to call the attention of the House to this fact. We are told there were 25,000 new establishments; I have shown you what some of these consist of. I have analysed these further, and I find that out of the 223 knitting factories, there may possibly be 30 that deserve the name by a stretch of courtesy. Those 30 pay $228,000 in wages out of a total of $322,000. The remaining 193 pay an average of $200 a year for all purposes. But, Sir, great as the knitting factory is, fine as the work which the National Policy has got in there, finer still is the work which the census commissioners got in there, it pales before the industry of carpet-making. The House will be glad to know, I was glad to know, that there are now 537 industrial establishments for making carpets in the Dominion of Canada. I find, by a reference to the census returns of 1881, that there were only 11 then in existence; we have, therefore, an increase of 546, which is something like—how many thousands per cent? Is it 5,000 or 50,000 per cent. Some of these hon. gentlemen, who are good at it, may occupy their leisure time in making the calculation. Well, Sir, of these 557, 51 are in New Brunswick, under the fostering care of the Minister; and they employ 51 hands, mostly old women. Their collective wages are $1,792; so that each of them earns $75 per year, or 76 cents per week. Nova Scotia possesses 106 factories for carpet-making, employing 117 hands, who earn $62 a year, or $1.10 per week, according to the census. Prince Edward Island, I am happy to inform my hon. friend, averages $100 per year. Assiniboia has one factory for carpet-making, paying $15 per year in wages. Now, I may remark that, of the 213 knitting factories in all the provinces except Ontario, not one appears to average $100 a year in wages, or, to employ 2 men. The total wages paid in those 213 factories amount to $14,827, which is not quite $70 per year each.

It is quite easy to get 75,000 industries when you count such industries as those. Why, a member of the Government, the other day, was compelled to say that even a little boy splitting kindling wood was counted an industry. If you count all the little boys who split kindling wood and put them in the 75,000 list, you will find very few industries of any description left. Oh, but the National Policy, according to the resolution, was to stop the exodus; it was to give employment to our own people at home, and bring back thousands of people who had left Canada before 1878. These were the promises made; these are the exact words of the resolution of 1878. I ask you to compare the promises with the result. How many thousands of people have come back to this country as a result of the National Policy? How many thousands of people have been prevented from leaving this country during the last seventeen years, as was promised, as the result of this policy? The fact is that from 1881 to 1891, no less than 1,200,000 people, more than one-fifth of the present population of Canada have left the country, an average yearly exodus of 120,000 from this Dominion. What is the record with reference to the maritime provinces? In Nova Scotia, the increase in population from 1871 to 1881 was 13·6 per cent. From 1881 to 1891, during which time the National Policy was in force, the increase in Nova Scotia was only 2·4 per cent. In New Brunswick, the increase from 1871 to 1881 was 12·4 per cent, and from 1881 to 1891, under the National Policy, there was no increase whatever. In Prince Edward Island, in 1871 to 1881 the increase in population was 15·8 per cent, and from 1881 to 1891, it was only a decimal—17 per cent. Yet hon. gentlemen contend that, although the census returns are against them, still, the country is happy and prosperous. But I ask them to compare the result as shown by the census with the promises in this resolution, that this policy would stop the exodus, increase our population, keep our people at home, and bring back those who were expatriated before 1878. This is the result of seventeen years' experience of the National Policy. But we were told in the maritime provinces that the National Policy would encourage our sea-going shipping. This was the great industry of that country. I will give you a few figures of the rise, progress, and decrease of this industry:

	N.S. Tonnage.	N.B. Tonnage.	P.E.I. Tonnage.
1873	449,701	277,850	38,918
1878	553,368	335,965	54,250
1893	396,263	156,086	20,970

From the foregoing table, it appears that while the registered tonnage of the three provinces in 1873 was as follows:—

	Tons.
Nova Scotia	449,701
New Brunswick.....	277,850
Prince Edward Island.....	38,918
Total.....	766,469

It had increased in the year 1878 to the following figures:—

	Tons.
Nova Scotia	553,368
New Brunswick	335,965
Prince Edward Island.....	54,250
Total.....	943,583

Or an increase of 177,114 tons which, at the average value per ton, estimated by the Marine Department, of $30, make an increase in the value of the registered tonnage of $5,313,420, between the years 1873 and 1878. The National Policy was introduced in 1879, and has continued in force ever since. The registered tonnage in 1893, was:

	Tons.
Nova Scotia.....	396,263
New Brunswick	156,086
Prince Edward Island.....	20,970
Total	573,319

Or a decrease or loss of 370,264 tons, and, at the same estimate of $30 per ton, of $11,108,220. That is the result to the sea-going shipping of the maritime provinces. But could you expect anything else? No, Mr. Speaker, this result was prophesied in this House before the National Policy was adopted at all by Sir Charles Tupper, when he said that the policy of protection in the United States had driven the flag of that country from the seas, and given to other nations the carrying trade of the world. His prophecy has been fulfilled so far as the maritime provinces are concerned, not because he said it, but because it was inevitable. But, although the National Policy has not benefited any of these industries, I want to be frank and fair; and I must confess here to-night that the National Policy has done some good in this country; it has benefited some people. It has benefited the combinations of this country; it has enabled combines to come into existence in this country as it has done in every country where protection is the policy. It has given us a cotton combine, a cordage combine, an oil combine, a nail combine, a sugar combine, and scores of others. And some people made millions out of the combinations thus fostered and encouraged by the law of the land, and all these millions have been unjustly made, although legalized by the action of this Parliament; and these millions came out of the pockets of the toiling masses and consumers of this country. Our friends opposite now declare: We never change our policy. But we have heard from them this year something far different from what we heard before. I remember, when, four years ago, we had a general election in this country, the Liberal leaders were branded as unpatriotic politicians plotting evil against the country, as men disloyal to the old flag, and to the motherland. The monopoly of loyalty, as of everything else that was good, was claimed by hon. gentlemen opposite. But we hear very little now about the old flag. Four years ago they were loud in their praises of England, its policy and its consequent prosperity. To-day they actually tell the people of this country that England is suffering and going to destruction because the policy of free trade is adhered to. They bemoan the fate of England because the policy of that country is not protection, but free trade. They have lately started upon a mission to redeem and regenerate and save poor England from the effects of the free trade policy that she has followed for the last fifty years? The great Conservative party in England has been led within the last fifty years by some of the most eminent statesmen of the century. Is it not singular that it never dawned upon these great leaders that protection would be the better policy for England, that they never dropped free trade and embodied in their platform and emblazoned on their banner the policy of protection as we have it in Canada? Is it not strange that even now, on the eve of a general election in England, the great Conservative party do not adopt protection as their policy? They are very anxious to get into power, no doubt, they are anxious to submit to the people a fiscal policy that will prove popular, but no prominent man in the Conservative party of England has the courage to propose protection as the policy of that party. No, Sir, it is left for hon. gentlemen in this House on the Government benches to say that England is going to destruction, and that the policy of free trade has been the cause of it. In a short time you will see a general election in that country, and although on other questions the various parties will differ widely yet upon the question of free trade, Liberals and Conservatives, Unionists, Parnellites and Anti-Parnellites, will all agree. Sir, do you not remember that a little more than a year ago, the late Premier of this Dominion said that the National Policy as it existed for many years previously, should be changed, that it had brought about combines, and that it was doing some injury to some classes of the consumers of the country; and he said that the time had come when they should lop off the mouldering branches of that policy. What did that mean? If it was to be protection pure and simple, as the Minister of Public Works said the other night, protection as it was in 1878, why should the Prime Minister say that they were going to lop off the mouldering branches? That declaration, if it meant anything at all, meant that the policy of protection as it existed previously should not be continued in its entirety, but that some changes should be made, that the mouldering branches should be lopped off. A short time afterwards, in pursuance of that promise, the Minister of Finance made the announcement that the mouldering branches would be lopped off, that a reduction would be made in a great many articles upon which the consumers had been paying high duty. That announcement was received in this House by hon. gentlemen on both sides with a great deal of satisfaction. I remember well how hon. gentlemen opposite boasted throughout the country that the Minister of Finance was at last about to reduce the tariff on a great many articles; I remember how the Conservative press announced to the people: You are going to be relieved of some of your burdens now. It is true that during the first years of the National Policy, while the infant industries were in existence, it was necessary to keep up the tariff; but now as those industries have outgrown their babyhood and have reached manhood, it is necessary to give the consumers a chance, and these industries must now stand on their own feet. Such was the language of the Conservative press throughout the country; they promised the consumers that they were now going to get some benefit on account of the reduction promised by the Minister of Finance. The Liberal party also received the announcement with a great deal of satisfaction, and although it was not such a reduction as we had been fighting for, still we accepted it with pleasure, on the ground that half a loaf is better than no bread. But, Sir, did the Government make these reductions which were promised? We know they did not. They attempted to do so, and why did they fail? In almost all cases the Minister of Finance put back the duties of their original figures. And what excuse had the Finance Minister to make except that humiliating and degrading one, that it was a mistake of the printer, a clerical error? That was all the satisfaction he could give the people. And yet to-day, hon. gentlemen boast that their policy is the same as it was in 1878; they boast that the duties are as high to-day as ever they were. Why are they so high? They did try to lop off the mouldering branches. They knew that their policy had been injurious to the people, they felt that the time had come when the people should be relieved of some of their burdens; the Prime Minister had promised to give relief, and the Minister of Finance had come down with a revised tariff. Why, then, did the Government not go on and carry out their policy? Because, Sir, the combinesters had taken them by the throat and called a halt, and the Minister of Finance was compelled to put the duties back to the figures at which they were before; and to-day the Conservative party are boasting because they are not free men, because they were not able to carry out the promise of the late Premier and of the Minister of Finance; they boast, in face of the fact that they were taken by the throat by their masters, the combinesters, and compelled to restore these. Again we were promised that the National Policy would eventually give us reciprocity with the United States; but to-day they laugh at any person who will say that we want reciprocity with the United States. Oh, they say, it is only the Grits want that; reciprocity means annexation. Well, what did they mean when, in 1891, they dissolved Parliament one year before the time, and asked to be returned to power that they might negotiate reciprocity with the United States? This time, however, they have taken great care not to go to the country one year before the time; it is likely to be one year after the time. But four years ago they said to the people: Return us to power that we may enter into negotiations with the United States to obtain reciprocity in natural and in some of the manufactured products. Why did they say so? Did they mean it, and if they meant it, why did they not go on and make the treaty? They were convinced the people wanted reciprocity, they knew reciprocity would benefit Canada, and that it would be a good platform upon which to go to the people, if they could make the people believe that they were sincere. They made the appeal upon that platform, they wished to get a fresh expression of opinion at the polls in order to strengthen the hands of their delegates to Washington in 1891. They realized that the people would return no party in power which was not in favour of reciprocity. Sir, it is not necessary to waste any more time in relating what took place, what attempts they made, and how sincere they were and what the result of the negotiations was. Upon false pretenses they obtained a verdict from the people, largely upon that platform; they sent a delegation to Washington with the result that in a few hours the whole thing was at an end; and no genuine bona fide effort was ever made on behalf of Canada to obtain a reciprocity treaty. Sir, why was it? Because reciprocity itself is irreconcilable with the interests of the combinesters of this country, and the Government did not even dare to make a sincere effort to obtain it. But there is something else. You will remember how, during the regime of the Mackenzie Government, the Minister of Finance of that day was branded and hounded from pillar to post all over this country, because he had deficits for three years, although he had surpluses for two years. The people were told that the incompetency of the Liberal party was such that it was impossible for them to have anything else but deficits. We were told what would happen if the National Policy was at an end; and no genuine, bona fide were adopted. We were assured that although the National Policy might increase the burdens upon the people, although they would have to pay higher duties, still there was one thing the National Policy would do, that although it might raise the tariff and make the people pay more, all the money would go into the treasury, we would get back the money we had paid ourselves, and there would be no such thing hereafter as a deficit. But what is the result? After seventeen years the Minister of Finance is obliged to come down and acknowledge that, in a year when there is no famine and no rebellion, after seventeen years' experience of the National Policy and of a high tariff, there was a deficit of $4,500,000. But the present deficit is more than the combined deficit of the three years under the Mackenzie Administration. In justification of that deficit, what did the Finance Minister say to the people? He said: It is true there is a deficit this year, but I will explain it in this way: If we had not reduced the duties two years ago on sugar, there would not have been a deficit of $4,500,000 this year, of over $1,000,000 last year, and an anticipated deficit of one or two or three millions next year. The Finance Minister throws out this crumb of comfort to the people that, while there is a deficit, it is because he did not tax them higher. The hon. gentleman now turns round and says, we must make up this loss and increase the duties in order to wipe off the deficit, and he announces to the people that by giving another turn to the taxation crank he will increase the duties, tax the people to the mast-head and wipe off the deficit in this way. It is extraordinary how the Finance Minister can claim credit for his feats. In eloquent and rounded periods, he boasts that while there was large deficits this and last year, still he had permitted the people to keep in their own pockets the money which he might have taken from them; and now when he is face to face with the problem of getting rid of his ugly and ill-visaged deficits, he again actually claims and expects credit when he proposes to do the very thing he boasted of not doing before, namely, raise the duty again and bleed the consumer more and more. Sir, I think the Finance Minister could give a better explanation to the people of this country as to how he could get rid of the deficit. He could tell the people with a good deal of satisfaction and sound reasoning that instead of again placing duties on sugar and other articles and compelling the people to pay duties to make up the deficit, a better way to wipe out the deficits would be to reduce the duties on articles now controlled by the combines. Instead of reducing the duties on sugar, why does he not lower the duty on rope and cordage for the benefit of the fishermen and workingmen? Thus he would take away some of the millions of dollars of profit which the cordage combine is reaping, and leave these millions in the pockets of the consumers. Besides, more money would be taken off the shoulders of the people. The hon. gentleman could also reduce the duties on cotton, and instead of the people paying taxes to the cotton combines, more money would flow into the public treasury and so also relieve the burdens of the consumers. It would be more satisfactory I should imagine to the Minister of Finance, if instead of raising duties to make up these deficits he should on all articles under the control of the combines, reduce them, and thus enable the people to obtain cheaper goods and at the same time have the treasury replenished, and withal keep away that ugly and ill-visaged visitor, whom we have had with us last year and this year and which will be with us next year, the deficit. The Finance Minister could take the people into his confidence, and tell them frankly the cause of his deficits. He could say: There has been for years past a continual leakage in the treasury, by which contractors and others have robbed, swindled and gobbled up the public revenue. He might perhaps say, I had nothing to do with it, it was a matter beyond my control, but the treasury has been leaking ; in some way the contractors and others have wasted, swindled and taken away millions of the public money, and if this had not taken place it would not have been necessary to come before the people and admit we have a deficit. I will enumerate to the House some of the instances showing how the treasury has been robbed of millions. The Government have thrown away on Tupper's "Dear Onderdonk," $1,118,000 ; on the Tay Canal, familiarly known as "Haggart's Ditch," $476,000 ; on the Caraquet Railway, $224,000 ; on Little Rapids Lock—a useless work which has no traffic and yields no revenue, $124,000 ; on the Galops Rapids Channel, which shipping men will not use, because of its danger, $600,000 ; dredging Wet Basin—contrary to terms of contract, $22,500 ; allowed to be stolen in connection with the Quebec Harbour Commission, over $1,000,000 ; in connection with the Lévis Graving Dock, $139,000 ; the Cross Wall contract, $92,000 ; Esquimalt Graving Dock, $207,000—this being more than the amount of tender Curran Bridge, over $270,000 ; paid to the "Hard Pan" claimants to which they had no legal right, $272,000 ; Harris Land Job at St. John, $100,000 ; Sheik's Island Dam, $125,000 ; St. Mary's Bridge, Fredericton, principle and interest, $372,000 ; Langevin Block, cost less than $500,000 and for which over $781,000 was paid—$281,000, and there is an outstanding claim of about $250,000 ; wasted, stolen or boodled on the St. Charles Branch of the Intercolonial Railway, $1,500,000. Then there was the Liquor Commission, $70,000, for the purpose of shirking and putting to one side the prohibition question.

Mr. LANDERKIN. $125,000 last year.

Mr. McISAAC. Then there is the Labour Commission, which cost $87,718 ; and for what ? That money was expended in order to find out whether the National Policy was good or bad. We have always been told by hon. gentlemen opposite that it is a great and glorious policy, and yet over $87,000 were expended on the Commission to ascertain whether it was a good or bad policy. These items, not including the outstanding claim for Langevin Block, show an aggregate of over $7,000,000 wasted, boodled or stolen. I have not given all or nearly all the items, but these will be sufficient for the present. I now desire to tell the House what a Minister of the Crown stated not many months ago. The Minister of Militia at Amherst, on 15th January, said :

We have heard a great deal of late about corruption in the Government, and he would like to say a word in this connection. There were three instances generally quoted, namely, the Curran bridge affair, the Caron scandal, and the liberation of Thomas McGreevy. Concerning the first, he said it was a clear case of steal.

Mr. McISAAC.

That is from a member of the Government, reported in his own organ.

The Government trusted a contractor who was a thief. To-day the Government is at work securing evidence, and besides punishing St. Louis for his theft, it has entered an action for the recovery of the money.

This language was used by a Minister of the Crown, and one of the last Ministers who has entered the Cabinet.

Mr. LANDERKIN. And the last of them that ever will.

Mr. McISAAC. It was stated by this Minister in his own constituency on nomination day. He told the people that the Curran bridge case was a clear steal, and that the contractor was a thief, and he claimed credit for the Government because they were trying to punish that contractor. A few days ago, we had the result of the St. Louis case in the court. Although a Minister of the Crown said he was a thief, and that it was a clear case of steal, yet that contractor has been discharged and found not guilty. Therefore, the thief is at large yet. Where is he ? and are the Government going to pursue him any further ? I have shown that over $7,000,000 had been boodled, stolen and swindled. That amount would have wiped off the deficit for this year, and last year, and the anticipated deficit for next year. Would not the waste of this money have been a more truthful explanation to the people of the country of why we have had a deficit this year and last year, and expect to have another next year, than the explanation given by the Government ? The people of the country are now getting so used to the surfeit of scandals that they do not realize what a million of dollars is, because so many millions have been stolen. I propose, Sir, for a moment to illustrate the loss of this enormous amount of money to Canada, this enormous amount of $7,000,000, so that the people will understand what it means. If this amount were divided among the seven provinces of this confederation, it would give each province $1,000,000. If divided among the counties of this Dominion, it would give each county over $32,000. I am going to be a little selfish, now, Sir. I want to illustrate what this $7,000,000 would do for some of the maritime provinces. If it were applied to Prince Edward Island it would have built the great tunnel between that province and the mainland, and there would have been enough left to build the railway extensions required in the island. If it were applied to my own province of Nova Scotia, what would it have accomplished ? As you well know, Mr. Speaker, there are a great many districts in my province clamouring for railways, and I wish to show how many railways this money would have built if it were expended in Nova Scotia. Supposing the Government applied this money to the province of Nova Scotia to build railways, and that they even allowed $10,000 a mile, how many roads would it build? I shall enumerate: It would build a railway from Yarmouth along the coast line through Shelburne to Lockport, and thence to Halifax along the southern coast of Nova Scotia. It would further build the following railways:—The Nova Scotia Southern Railway; the Hants Central and the Stewiacke Valley and Lansdowne, and a railway to Musquodoboit. It would build a railway from Sunnybrae or from James River on the Intercolonial Railway to Country Harbour; a railway from Heatherton or Tracadie, in my county, on the Intercolonial Railway to Guysboro'. It would build a railway from Hawkesbury to Louisburg, with branches from St. Peters to Arichat and L'Ardoise. It would build a railway from Hastings to Cheticamp; and from Orangedale to Broad Cove, with a branch to Baddeck. It would have constructed a network of railways throughout the length and breadth of Nova Scotia, and, after doing all that, a large margin would still remain to repair and build breakwaters and piers, and lighthouses on the coast for the benefit of our fishermen. Sir, the protective system as it is operated by the present Government, on the people of this country is like a candle burning at both ends. The people have to pay, either in duties to the treasury or in contributions to the combines. One end of the system is the enormous amount of money taken from the people which never gets into the treasury, but goes into the pockets of the vampire element, the combinesters, who suck the national life-blood of Canada; and the other end of the waste is the continual leakage ever going on from the treasury on account of mismanagement, extravagance and boodling. Let us compare the expenditures during the time that the Liberal Government was in power with the regime of the present Government, and we find this sad state of things well exemplified. In 1877-78, under the Mackenzie Government, our expenditure was $23,503,658, while our opponents then contended that we should do with $22,500,000. Look at the expenditure in 1894 under the present Government, which has reached to the enormous figure of $37,585,025. The public debt of Canada in 1878 was $174,957,268, and in 1894 it has reached the sum of $308,348,023. I believe that the people of this country are becoming alarmed at the enormous magnitude of the combines, that they are becoming disgusted with the power which the combines have in this country, and that they are getting sick and tired of the National Policy. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite if it is not especially the case in the maritime provinces, and particularly so in Nova Scotia, that the people are getting tired of it. I hear no one say, "no." Sir, I have made this statement, and I am going to prove it. I will prove that the people of Canada are getting alarmed at the fiscal policy of this Government, and at the magnitude of the illegitimate operations of the combines, and I will prove it on the statement made on the floor of the Assembly of Nova Scotia by a man who is not a Liberal, by a man who is one of the most pronounced Conservative partisans in the province of Nova Scotia, by a man who, for four years led the Opposition in the House of Assembly there, and by a man who, at the time he used the language I shall quote was one of the editors of one of the largest subsidized organs of the Conservative party in the maritime provinces, the "Morning Herald." In the session of 1893 in the Nova Scotia legislature, a Bill was introduced to incorporate the Acadian Sugar Refinery Company, Limited, and on that occasion the leader of the Opposition, Mr. Chas. H. Cahan, one of the most pronounced party men in Canada or anywhere, used the language which I shall read to the House. He is not what hon. gentlemen opposite would call a "vicious Grit hungering for office," but he was, at the time, leader of the Conservative Opposition, one of the editors of the "Morning Herald," which always gets more money from the treasury at Ottawa than any other subsidized paper in Nova Scotia. Much as I know it was against his taste, he gave use to these expressions. It is the speech of a Conservative who was basking in the sunshine of the pap which this Government had given his paper for years before, and has given it ever since. Notwithstanding that, he felt that the great majority of his own party, the Conservatives, were getting seriously and dangerously alarmed at the condition of the finances of the country, and by the large combines which are ruining the country. Here are his words, taken from Nova Scotia debates of the House of Assembly, Nova Scotia, 1893, page 143:

In regard to this Bill, a number of the corporators were his (Mr. Cahan's) personal friends, and they were men for whom he had the highest esteem; but, notwithstanding that fact, the principle of the Bill was one to which he could not agree.

I think I may correctly say here that some of these personal friends of Mr. Cahan's are sitting in this House to-night, and looking across the floor at me just now. Mr. Cahan further said:

It was a principle under which it was proposed to consolidate and combine the sugar-refining industries of the maritime provinces. Under this Bill two sugar refineries, which are located in Nova Scotia, might be purchased by this company, and a third, which was outside the province, might be united by this company controlling a major portion of the stock in that refinery. While he believed in giving a fair protection to an industry of this character, and while he had supported that policy, in another arena of politics, he was not in favour of giving to these corporations legislative facilities for effecting combinations and restraining competition. In so far as this Bill had a principle, it might be stated as facilitating a combination of these interests. He was opposed to it. He looked with the utmost jealousy upon giving these corporations large facilities for effecting combinations. He thought that at the present time Canada was suffering from such combinations, and he believed that, as time went on, whether the country enjoyed a protective tariff or not, it would be necessary for gentlemen assembled in Parliament, representing the interests of the whole people, to throw the utmost possible safeguards around these corporations, in order to protect the public interests. At the same time, if the Nova Scotia sugar refinery, or any other sugar refinery in this province, desired its corporate powers amended, and could show good cause why larger legislative facilities should be given to it to allow it to carry on its industry profitably and so as not to cut down necessary competition, he would support such a measure. But this company, under this Bill, could be organized without a cent of capital. The dangers which had arisen from such legislation could be seen in the neighbouring republic, and similar dangers had arisen in this country. While, on personal grounds, he should desire to facilitate the operations of these corporators, some of whom were his personal friends, he could not forget, while he held a seat in this House, that he did not represent their interests, but came here to represent what he believed to be the interests of the public.

Sir, these are the words uttered by a man whose every sympathy and every prejudice would have led him to say anything but what he did say. As he said himself, those who were promoting that legislation were his personal and political friends; but he had a great struggle in his mind between the interests of his own friends who were promoting this Bill and the fear entertained by Conservatives throughout the province of Nova Scotia, feeling as he did that they were getting restless and discontented on the subject of the combines in this country. He was troubled and wrestled with himself, and to use the words of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) the other night, he strained every nerve to see if he could not vote for the Bill, but it was no use. I believe, Sir, as it is laid down in the platform of the Liberal party:

That the customs tariff of the Dominion should be based, not as it is now, upon the protective principle, but upon the requirements of the public service;

That the existing tariff, founded upon an unsound principle, and used, as it has been by the Government, as a corrupting agency wherewith to keep themselves in office, has developed monopolies, trusts and combinations;

It has decreased the value of farm and other landed property;

It has oppressed the masses to the enrichment of a few;

It has checked immigration;

It has caused great loss of population;

It has impeded commerce;

It has discriminated against Great Britain;

Mr. McISAAC.

In these, and in many other ways, it has occasioned great public and private injury, all of which evils must continue to grow in intensity as long as the present tariff system remains in force.

That the highest interests of Canada demand a removal of this obstacle to our country's progress by the adoption of a sound fiscal policy, which, while not doing injustice to any class, will promote domestic and foreign trade, and hasten the return of prosperity to our people.

That to that end the tariff should be reduced to the needs of honest, economical and efficient government.

That it should be so adjusted as to make free, or to bear as lightly as possible upon, the necessities of life, and should be so arranged as to promote freer trade with the whole world, more particularly with Great Britain and the United States.

We believe that the results of the protective system have grievously disappointed thousands of persons who honestly supported it, and that the country, in the light of experience, is now prepared to declare for a sound fiscal policy.

That the people deplore the gross corruption in the management and expenditure of public moneys which for years past has existed under the rule of the Conservative party, and the revelations of which by the different parliamentary committees of inquiry have brought disgrace upon the fair name of Canada.

Sir, it was upon these issues that I appealed to the electors of my county some few weeks ago; upon these issues and upon these issues alone I asked for their verdict. I assailed the record of scandals of this Government and condemned their fiscal policy, and I asked the electors, if they believed with me, to support me. Our opponents made every effort to dodge and evade the real issues by substituting other and unfair issues; but the electors of that county, as Mr. Cahan said of the people all over this country, became aroused and alarmed at the condition of our public affairs, and the result was that that county, which endorsed the policy of this Government four years ago by 227 majority, reversed that decision on this occasion and condemned their policy by a majority of 118. It was the last occasion on which we have had from the maritime provinces an expression of opinion from the people at the polls, with the result that they condemned in unmeasured terms this Government's record of corruption and scandals and repudiated their fiscal policy, and endorsed unreservedly the great, popular, able and distinguished leader of the Liberal party, and adopted the platform of the Liberal party in its entirety.

Mr. COATSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, in the torrent of eloquence which the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac) has poured upon us, he gave us one of the strongest arguments which he has been able to use on behalf of his friends and himself, when, referring to a certain gentleman, he said: "this is not a Grit hungry for office." It appeared to me, Sir, that he accepted that attitude as being characteristic of his party—a Grit hungry for office ; and I am not disposed to correct him, because we find that the hope, long deferred, of holding the reins of Government has truly made that definition a fair and proper one. Now, the hon. gentleman says that the people of Canada are alarmed ; and I must say, speaking for my own constituency, that there is a certain degree of alarm pervading it ; but I find the alarm to be based upon a fear that, in the gropings for a policy which hon. gentlemen opposite have been making for the last few years, they may find something that will be delusive enough to appeal for a time to the majority of this people of this country, and that we may be so unfortunate as to have in this House a majority of hon. gentlemen opposite. But I feel assured that when the next election passes over and the people are relieved from this cause of alarm, the alarm will be quickly dissipated, and they will be quite satisfied again to settle down quietly to business, as we have been going on under the National Policy. Now, the hon. gentleman in the concluding part of his oration, referred to certain public works ; and, without going over all the ground he did, I would like to call attention to this weakness in his argument. He takes for granted that the first estimate of the cost of public works ought not to be exceeded, and that, if it is exceeded, the whole amount above the estimate has gone in boodling and robbery. Now, I would like to call his attention to the fact that in the province of Ontario, which is under a Liberal Government, we have recently erected a legislative building, of which the original estimate of the cost was $300,000 or $400,000, and the final cost, $1,250,000.

Mr. McMULLEN. That is not so. The original estimate was not the amount the hon. gentleman says.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I think the hon. gentleman is right in his correction. I merely placed the first estimate a little too low ; it was about $500,000, while the actual cost was $1,250,000. The hon. gentleman has argued that where a public building costs more than its original estimate, the balance has gone in boodling. If that be the case, the friends of the hon. gentleman, on that one small, public building at Toronto, have boodled to the extent of about $700,000. My mistake, if there be any mistake, is a very slight one, and the hon. gentleman knows it very well. What I say is this : That if the hon. gentleman applied the same argument to all their own public works that he has applied to the necessary public works of this Government, the boodling would have gone up to $20,000,000 or $30,000,000, instead of being so small as $7,000,000 or $8,000,000. He referred to the deficit. It is an old friend of hon. gentlemen on the other side, and I was not surprised that he should refer to it ; but it seems strange that in the same breath he should blame us for lopping off the mouldering branches and also for having a deficit. The fact is the hon. gentleman and his friends are very desirous of seeing us cut the tree down altogether, because, should we cut the old National Policy down, instead of lopping off the mouldering branches, we will fail in our duty to the country, and then hon. gentlemen opposite will no longer be hungry for office, but will occupy the places from which we will have been deservedly turned out. The hon. gentleman also referred to the question of reciprocity with the United States. I do not propose to deal with that at any length, but there is this difference between our attitude on that question, and theirs. We have always been in favour of a fair, reasonable reciprocity with the United States, which would not sacrifice the interests of this country. We stand in that position to-day, we have stood in that position for the last twenty years, and we will remain in that position rather than sacrifice the interests of this country to those of another. On the other hand, hon. gentlemen opposite, with their unrestricted reciprocity, were prepared to sacrifice the interests of this country. They were prepared to have reciprocity at any price : they were prepared to break down the barriers on this side, give the Americans control of our tariff, allow them to dictate to us what duties we ought to put upon goods, and, ultimately, drive us into annexation. Another subject which the hon. gentleman has mentioned is free trade as it is practiced in England. I must say that we do not yield one iota to hon. gentlemen opposite in our loyalty to the institutions of the mother country. We have forced these hon. gentlemen into a position of loyalty. I say, without any hesitation, that during the last general elections, we heard no word about free trade as it is in England. It is only since hon. gentlemen opposite have found that the people of this country will neither be badgered nor cajoled into supporting any such policy as they have been previously advocating, that they have made up their minds, that, as the Tory party are notorious for their loyalty to the institutions of the old country, the best thing they could do was to copy a leaf out of our book. And so they conceived this policy of free trade as it is in England. I sincerely trust that they will stand to their guns as they have them loaded to-day. We are prepared to meet them on the issue they have laid down—free trade as it is in Great Britain, with a revenue tariff as England provides it. We are prepared to meet them on that issue, and are satisfied that the verdict of the people will be, as it has been heretofore, in favour of the present Government. That policy has been referred to a number of times on both sides. It was most clearly set forth, I think, in the language of the hon. leader of the Opposition, speaking in Winnipeg, on the 3rd September, 1894, where he laid down his policy in the following words—and I take the precaution of quoting from the "Globe," the organ of hon. gentlemen opposite freedom of trade as it is practised in Great Britain. This is the policy we adopt:

As soon as we shall have a Liberal Administration in Ottawa—and I think we shall have one before very long, although it is not for me to say when—there can be a very radical alteration of affairs looked for. We shall give you freer trade, and, although it will be a hard fight, we shall not give in one inch or retrace our steps until we shall have reached the goal, and that goal is the same policy of free trade as exists in England to-day.

To make up the deficit which will arise, it will be necessary to get an addition from some other sources.

That is the policy of the leader of the Opposition, and that is the policy upon which hon. gentlemen opposite are standing to-day—free trade as it exists in England at present, with a revenue tariff as collected in England. This was also laid down by the leader of the Opposition in what was known as the Massey-Hall meeting, Toronto, where he expressed himself as a Liberal of the English school. With all the loyalty we may feel for the institutions of the old country, the means of raising revenue adopted in Great Britain are not at all applicable to this country. This is where we must take one of our greatest issues with hon. gentlemen opposite. If we adopt the policy of free trade as it exists in England, then we adopt the means which Great Britain takes of raising a revenue. The one part of the policy involves the other. That is what the leader of the Opposition, I take it, meant when he said at Winnipeg that to make up the deficit it will be necessary to get an addition from other sources. Now, they have never gone into detail, and it is only fair to the country that we should be taken more into the confidence of the hon. gentlemen. When they profess they have a panacea for the alleged woes of this country, they ought to give it out to the country; they ought to scatter it far and wide; they ought not to deal in generalities, but should come down to the practical details so that every constituency in the country will be able to see and understand. They have not done so because the question of revenue is an exceedingly ugly one. They talk about their economies, they talk one thing and another, but they all know that they have to raise a revenue. They know that the affairs of this country cannot be carried on without a revenue. We have already fixed charges upon our revenue amounting to $16,000,000 a year, or thereabouts, and they would have from $18,000,000 to $20,000,000 to work upon. In all their propositions of economy, they do not propose to economize to the extent of more than a million or two; and even if they did that, they would still have a revenue of $35,000,000 to raise. This must be obtained, according to the proposition of the hon. gentleman, in the same way that revenue is raised in Great Britain, and I presume it can hardly be raised in any other way. We give the British people, and I think, rightly, credit for a great deal of discretion and business judgment, and it is quite impossible to conceive that they would not have the best possible way of collecting revenue under the free trade system which they have adopted. But I ask the question: Is the British method of raising revenue possible in Canada? And I answer it in this way: We will find, even upon the most superficial analysis of revenue, as it is raised in Great Britain, that it would be simply an impossibility for us to raise revenue in the same manner in this country, because we would be robbing every municipality and every province in the Dominion of a large proportion of their present revenue, and we would place on the people a burden of direct taxation which they could not possibly bear. Now, the items of the British revenue are not very numerous, and I would just like to refer to them for the purpose of calling the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the position in which their own policy places them. The revenue derived in the mother country during the years 1893-94 amounted to £90,375,000. This revenue was derived from customs, excise, stamp and land tax, house duty, property and income tax, post office, telegraph service, crown lands, and miscellaneous items of revenue. It is not proposed by the hon. gentleman to abandon altogether the customs revenue; and I presume that if they adopt free trade as it is in England, as one of the hon. gentlemen said the other night, they would not be bound by the veriest details or revenue as it is in the old country. At the same time, we must assume that they are substantially bound by the principles of raising the public revenue, and the main items of that system in use in the old country. For instance, we place a tax upon carriages. But the hon. gentleman cannot adopt that tax and yet have free trade as it is in Great Britain, because there is no tax on carriages in that country. So I might go on with a long list of items to show that hon. gentlemen must practically adopt, on the whole, the tariff of revenue as it is in Great Britain if they are to adopt, as the leader of the Opposition says, free trade as it is in England to-day. The customs revenue in Great Britain is raised from beer, chicory, cocoa, coffee, currants, raisins, spirits, tea, tobacco, snuff and wine. Now, the hon. gentlemen pretend that they are going to take the duties off the necessities of life. That is one of the sprats they offer to the electors in this country, that they are going to throw off the duties upon the necessaries of life. But if they adopt the tariff of Great Britain, they must put an enormous tax upon tea and coffee, which come free into this country to-day, but the customs tax upon which in Great Britain is $17,259,000 a year. Then, there is the item of excise. The excise collections are on beer, spirits, chicory, coffee, tobacco, and railway duties. And, coming to the railway duty, we come to see one of the first items in which they would interfere with the taxes and the duties that are levied by our municipalities. Now, in the various cities where the electric railways are being organized and carried on, a percentage from the receipts of these railways is becoming one of the sources of civic revenue. Hon. gentlemen would propose to transfer that revenue from the municipalities to themselves. Then there are the license duties in Great Britain. The brewers, distillers and rectifiers, tobacco manufacturers, patent medicines, beer and wine dealers, spirit dealers, publicans, wine and spirits, refreshment houses, tobacco dealers, dog, gun, game, male servants, carriages, plate dealers, and others, are subject to these duties. Now, what I have to say with regard to that, is this—that with us the great proportion of these, where they are taxed at all at the present time, are taxed for local purposes; and if the hon. gentlemen propose to put a tax on them, it must be either by taking the taxes from the municipalities or the provinces and appropriating them to themselves, or by placing an additional tax upon the people of this country. It is for them to say in what way this is to be done. For instance, we take the matter of licenses. Our province of Ontario, at the present time, has an income of over $200,000 from licenses, and if this is taken from them, and if the large revenue which the province of Quebec obtains from the same source is to be taken from that province, there will be a great outcry against the change. But it is needless, and would be wasting the time of the House to go through all these items. It is sufficient for my general purpose to show that nearly all of these are taxes collected now by the municipalities or the provinces. Take under the head of what is called the death duty, property duty, estate duty, duty on realty, and the duty on personality. All these taxes are now collected here by the provinces, so far as they are collected at all. We have recently established in Ontario a system of estates duties, and a large revenue has already begun to be derived from it. I presume that what hon. gentlemen mean is that they would sweep this source of revenue from the province and appropriate it to themselves. But, Sir, one of the most serious elements in their position would be what is known as the land tax and house duty and income tax. Sir, we all have a good deal of taxes to pay at the present time.

The taxes in the old country which are collected by the Imperial Government are collected, in the first place, as a land tax on lands and tenements, and also in what is known as the inhabited house duty. Are the hon. gentlemen going to take these from the municipalities of Canada and appropriate them to themselves? That is a question. I think, the people of this country will ask them very seriously. If they are going to raise the revenue as it is raised in England, do they propose to take from us our municipal taxes, or are they going to propose an additional burden of taxation beyond what we already bear? If they do they place themselves in a position of antagonism to the people of the country. If they will go into details of their policy and show the country what they mean—

Mr. MONTAGUE. They will never have the chance.

Mr. STEVENSON. They don't mean what they say.

Mr. COATSWORTH. An hon. gentleman says they do not mean what they say. I am inclined to think that he means what he says when he says that. I do not think that hon. gentlemen opposite are to be taken seriously. I do not think they seriously intend to upset all the existing institutions of this country, and to impose upon this country taxes which have never been heard of heretofore and which I trust will never be heard of for centuries to come. Now, take the income tax. There is an income tax imposed already in municipalities. We have a large revenue from that in my own constituency in Toronto. Do the hon. gentlemen propose to take that income tax from us? If so, there will be the same representation from Toronto as there has been for years past—all on this side of the House. Now, Mr. Speaker, I might dwell somewhat upon the stamp duties if I did not feel some hesitation about taking up the time of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. COATSWORTH. We find the stamp duty has become something terrible in the old country. You can hardly carry out the smallest transaction there without coming under the imposition of the stamp duty. I would like to read, for the benefit of the House, a few lines from a letter I received from a friend, a gentleman whom I believe to be a Liberal, though I will not pledge my word to that, who spent many years in this country, and two or three years ago returned to the old country, the place of his birth, so that he might spend his declining years there. He writes me about the British trade policy and its applicability to this country:

And supposing she is to a large extent a free trade country, does that lessen the burden of taxation to her citizens, or subjects, as they like to call themselves. The excise taxes are enormous, the stamp, which pervades almost every department and every transaction here from the huxter's shop to the Court of Chancery, is something dreadful. You can scarcely carry out any transaction, except the very pettiest, without the presence of the stamp. In law proceedings the cost on this account alone is frightful. The death duties are simply confiscation, the income tax, which is not to be evaded, is a government and not a municipal tax, is 8d. in the pound, and applies to every cent you receive as interest or otherwise. So I could go on to endeavour to show that the prodigious revenue of England has to be paid by methods far more galling and exasperating than if to a large extent collected from customs, while the expenditure is prodigal in everything that goes to sustain caste, beyond that of any other country. The "Globe's" picture of free trade England is a very different affair from the actual one.

That, Sir, is the experience of a returned Canadian. Now, with reference to the economy that hon. gentlemen propose to practice, I would like to say a few words before I sit down. They say they propose to economize the public expenditure. Now, there are three or four things that go to prove that they will not and cannot economize in public expenditure. In the first place, we have to be governed in our judgment of them to a large extent by their former performances. When they were a few years in power, they ran up the expenditure at once several millions, and I claim they would do the same thing again.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You had better look at the figures.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I think the hon. gentleman has looked at the figures until his eyes are sore, and I do not think he has changed them any. The hon. gentleman knows that the figures increased very largely and I think he feels they would be bound to increase again. In the next place, we must remember that their friends the Liberal provincial governments recently met in an inter-provincial conference and demanded additional subsidies; so that the moment hon. gentlemen get into power there would be a general demand from all the Liberal provincial governments for increased subsidies, a demand which, I believe, in view of the aid and assistance that these Liberal governments are preparing to give them, would be almost if not entirely irresistible. In fact, it is said that the hon. gentlemen opposite, before the last election, were committed to the increase of the provincial subsidies in case of their success at the polls. In the next place, if I might use again the expression of my hon. friend who preceded me, they have the hungry Grit to reckon with; and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that that individual is not confined to any particular place in Canada. He may be found all over the country, and there would be a demand for place and position such as led the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie to state, in that remarkable letter, that during his Administration he had literally to stand by the door of the treasury with a loaded revolver in his hand to keep his friends from robbing it. Hon. gentlemen opposite would have the same demand for place and position, and there would be a far greater number of men demanding to fill those places, so that I feel assured that hon. gentlemen opposite, even with the best intentions, would be quite unable to resist that demand.

Mr. COATSWORTH.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Humanity has kept away the revolver for the past eight or ten years.

Mr. COATSWORTH. Yes, and the leader of the Opposition says they will be able to resist.

Mr. LAURIER. No; I said the men in power resisted very well.

Mr. COATSWORTH. Yes, and the hon. gentleman would be able to resist by keeping out of power. Then we have the example of the provincial Liberal governments. They have not been very economical; in fact, I believe that in Ontario the provincial government has been rather an extravagant one. I might refer to a good many items of expenditure which characterize that government, but I will simply mention one, because it is an illustration that comes home to us in this House. In the Ontario house they have 66 sessional clerks, while we have only 37 here. That shows how economical they would be; and I think if hon. gentlemen have the good fortune to get into power, and the country had the misfortune to see them in power, we would see the same thing pervading the whole system, and a Liberal Government would enter upon an era of extravagance such as we have never known in Canada before. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen to talk about the extravagance of this Government; we would have the same thing repeated that we had in 1874, the expenditure of the country would go up to 40 or 45 millions, and there would be deficits every year. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the people of this country are too well informed to think for one moment of allowing hon. gentlemen opposite to get into power.

Mr. PERRY. I desire to say a few words upon this all important question. We are discussing the ways and means by which the people may be taxed in order to keep up the expenditure and extravagance of the present Government, and it is a question which our constituents expect us to consider carefully. I intend to devote a few of my remarks to the speech delivered the other evening by my hon. friend from the county of King's, P.E.I. (Mr. Macdonald). He was good enough to say the other evening that the farmers of Canada, and more especially the farmers of Prince Edward Island, had protection under the National Policy. Well, I fail to see how they are protected, in fact, I think he must fail himself. We find that the farmers of the Dominion are taxed more in the articles they consume under the present duties, than any other class in the country. We find that carriages are taxed 31 per cent; manufactures of cotton are taxed 28 per cent. No doubt the poorer classes of people use cotton. Earthenware is taxed 33 per cent; manufactures of flax, hemp and jute, 22 per cent; manufactures of glass, 26 per cent. Perhaps the Minister of Finance will say that these are luxuries, that poor people can do without them. Hats and caps are taxed 30 per cent; manufactures of iron and steel, 28 per cent; musical instruments, 27 per cent. I suppose my hon. friend would say also that musical instruments are luxuries. Paper and manufactures of, including wall paper, 33 per cent. I suppose he would deny the propriety of a poor farmer having a little paper on the wall of his house. Provisions, 36 per cent; soaps, 54 per cent. Well, now, it is a wonderful thing to see such a high duty on soaps, for I was under the impression that it would require a great deal of soap to wash away the political sins of hon. gentlemen opposite, and therefore soap ought to come in duty free. Champagne, 54 per cent. Champagne is used by the richer class of people, at these great state dinners, and it is only taxed 54 per cent, while kerosene oil that is used by every poor family in the country, is taxed about 160 per cent. Is that the protection that hon. gentlemen opposite intend to give to the farmer? You tax the farmers 150 per cent more for the articles they use, than you tax the richer class of people upon their champagne wine. Now, Sir, my hon. friend from King's, P.E.I., endeavoured to show that it was good policy to populate the cities of Canada and to depopulate the rural districts. My version of that is that it is robbing Peter to pay Paul. That does not increase the population of a country, and no country is worth anything unless it has population. We have seen in Canada the effect of overcrowding cities and depopulating the rural districts. In Montreal, not quite a year ago, many people were starving, thousands of men waited on the mayor and asked him for work or bread, and soup kitchens had to be brought into requisition. The same conditions of things existed in Toronto and other cities. That is one of the results of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite as enunciated by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Macdonald). It would be much better if many of the people now in the cities were settled in the country districts and became producers, tillers of the soil, for then they would not only produce, but they would also consume goods brought into the country and would help to provide a revenue. The hon. member for King's also told the House how prosperous we were. He said that when the present Government came into power we had no continental railway and no Sault Canal and certain other public works. One hundred millions has been spent on building the Canadian Pacific Railway, which meant so much money given to the company; but what benefit has it been to the people of Prince Edward Island or to the people of King's County? I thought when the hon. member was alluding to public works he would announce to the House that the Government had determined to build the Southern Railway Branch in the Island. Meetings were held which the hon. gentleman attended and at which he made strong speeches, and at which a member of the Cabinet for the island also attended and made great promises and held out great inducements; but we must remember that this was done when the country considered it was on the eve of a general election. The hon. member was silent on that point when addressing the House; he did not state whether the Government were going on with the surveys, or whether they were going to place a vote in the Supplementary Estimates. When at home the hon. gentleman, addressing his constituents, tells the people there, for election purposes of course, that the Government are going to build the southern branch; but when he comes here his masters tell him to hold his tongue on that subject and not to say a word until after the election, and that then if successful—which I doubt very much—they will build that branch. The hon. gentleman, I say, was silent, and no doubt it was the best course for him to pursue, because I am well aware that, although the hon. gentleman and his colleagues accompanied a delegation from the east end of the island when they waited on the Cabinet Ministers with respect to this great question, the Government made no promises, not even that they would take the matter up on a future occasion, and although the members of the deputation came here expecting from the promises made by the Cabinet Minister for the island that their request would be entertained, they went away fully satisfied that the Government had determined to do nothing. If we are to judge the future by the past, it was the only natural conclusion to which we could arrive. Look at the great work of the tunnel from the island to the mainland, which has been a subject of agitation for ten years. In 1891 we were so near securing its accomplishment that we expected to have that great public work commenced at an early date, and everybody thought it would be an accomplished fact in a comparatively short time. What has become of it? Just what is going to become of the project connected with the Southern Railway Branch, so long as its construction is left in the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite. So much for the promises of the Government. The hon. member for King's (Mr. Macdonald), further stated that goods were cheaper under the National Policy than they had been under a tariff for revenue purposes. If the principle is correct, why not add a little more duty, and instead of 30 per cent increase the duties to 40 or 50 per cent? I admit that goods are cheaper to-day than they were twenty or forty or fifty years ago. But what are the reasons? One reason is that the facilities for manufacturing are much greater than they were at that time; labour perhaps is cheaper, raw material is cheaper, and the great cause and the almost only cause is that free trade England is now supplying the whole world, wherever her manufactured articles are carried, cheaper than any country that has protected manufacturing industries. Sir, we find that in 1874 England exported 220,599,074 yards of cotton yarns, worth £14,516,093 sterling, while in 1884 she exported 271,077,900 yards, and that quality only realized £13,811,767. Therefore, the same class of goods sold 18d. cheaper in 1884 than they sold in 1874. Now, in the year 1894, England exported 236,198,500 yards, which only realized £9,289,078 sterling, or 12·8 per cent cheaper than in the year 1884. That shows conclusively that free trade England can afford to manufacture and sell her manufactured goods cheaper than any country in the world. English goods are getting cheaper every year, and if goods are selling cheaper to-day in Canada, it is not because of the effects of the National Policy, but because our home-made articles have to compete with the goods manufactured in free trade England. Supposing that there were free trade between Canada and England now, and supposing English goods came in here free of duty, why, Sir, it is an undoubted fact that they would sell at from 25 to 40 per cent cheaper than they do now. However, I am not advocating a policy of allowing goods to come in here from foreign countries free of duty. I am well aware that a revenue has to be made up, and although the Liberal party is accused of being ready to wipe away the customs duties altogether, and to have recourse to direct taxation, I may say, Sir, that that is a false accusation, and I maintain that it was never the intention of the Liberal party to endeavour to carry out such a principle. Now, with reference to cotton fabrics. In 1874 England exported 4,417,481,000 yards which only realized £51,000,000 sterling, or 20·2 per cent cheaper than they sold for in 1874. In 1894 she exported 5,312,753,900 yards, which sold for £50,223,291, or 20½ per cent less than they realized in 1884. That shows that these articles are now being manufactured and that they are selling in England at from 25 to 30 per cent cheaper than they were selling twenty years ago, and that is the reason why the goods manufactured in Canada have to sell to-day at a correspondingly reduced price. Articles of iron and steel manufacture are just in the same category, and their comparatively lower price is regulated by the price in free trade England. Hon. gentlemen opposite boast of the great things they have done. They boast of our great North-west Territories. Well, ten or fifteen years ago we had some great expectations from the North-west, but where are they now? We believed then that the North-west was going to receive fifteen or twenty million people in ten years. We believed that it was going to be a home for the surplus population of some of the lower provinces, and we believed that we were going to receive a good revenue from it. These great prophets on the opposite benches told us all about that. I remember when Sir Charles Tupper made the statement from his seat in this House, that in 1892, Canada would have $70,000,000 in its treasury as the proceeds of the sale of lands in the North-west. He told us that without a blush; and although we all know that he was apt to stretch things, yet this was one of his greatest exaggerations. If I asked the Finance Minister how much he has to-day as a surplus from the lands of the North-west his answer would be that Canada is paying $150,000 a year more for the management of the North-west lands than the yearly revenue derived from them. We are told to-day that the railway companies—that is if they succeed, and no doubt they will, if they press hard enough—we are told that the railway companies want the Government to take their lands off their hands, and pay them a stipulated price per acre. Are the Government prepared to do that? We will see. My hon. friend from King's County (Mr. Macdonald) stated that the labourers, the artisans, and the farmers were better off under a protective system. He told us that the farmers' market for pork, beef, oats, and barley, was better than it would be if the farmers were not protected under the National Policy. He did not mention mackerel, because he had not the hardihood to do that. I hold that that argument of the hon. gentleman will not bear investigation, because we are not importers of pork, or beef, or mackerel or horses or sheep, or potatoes, or eggs. We have all these articles in abundance, and to sell, and I contend that although these articles are protected by the National Policy, yet that has nothing to do whatever with keeping up their prices. Although it may happen that pork in the barrel is something cheaper in Chicago than it is in Toronto, yet that does not go to prove that the Prince Edward Island pork, or the Canadian pork, as a general rule, will always carry the same price. A quantity of American pork is imported into Canada, which is used by lumbermen, but the Prince Edward Island pork, or the Canadian pork, as a general rule, can never be superseded by the American pork. The hon. gentleman also said that free trade with the United States could never be carried out, and if carried out, it would be of no service to the people of Canada. Now, the following table shows that in certain articles our exports to the United States are more than our exports to all the rest of the world. The figures are for the year 1893 :—

Mr. AMYOT. Will the hon. gentleman say what he is reading from ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. PERRY. If the hon. gentleman will have a little patience, he can speak after I am done. If he does not understand, I will speak to him in French.

Mr. AMYOT. I only wanted to know from what the hon. gentleman is reading. Is he ashamed of his book ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend has a perfect right to inquire, as he has done, what the hon. gentleman is quoting from, and I do not see that there can be any objection on the part of the hon. gentleman to say what he is quoting from.

Mr. LAURIER. My hon. friend can take care of his own case.

Mr. ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. HAZEN). It would seem to me, unless the speaker is willing to be interrupted, that the question cannot be raised.

Mr. PERRY. I am quoting from the blue-book—le livre bleu—which I got under the immediate supervision of the hon. Postmaster General. Hon. gentlemen opposite have the political impudence to say that we ought not to have free trade with the United States. It is true, in 1891, they went through the sham of opening negotiations ; at all events, they told the people at large that they had opened negotiations for trade with the United States on a certain basis. That was a short time before the general elections—they must always have such things to do service for them in the elections ; and they knew perfectly well that nothing would captivate the minds of the people of this country to a greater extent than the promise of free trade with the United States. On that they dissolved Parliament and went to the country on that and that alone. They carried the elections ; and in less than a month after, a flat denial was given to their statement by Mr. Blaine. He told them they were liars—that nothing of the kind had ever taken place, nor could take place on the basis offered by the Government of Sir John Macdonald. I have no doubt that they may have some other promise previous to the next elections, which must be soon—or perhaps they may hold on to the very last day before they issue the writs ; because they are trembling in their boots, and they are not scrupulous as to the statements they make. They are willing to make any sort of statements for political purposes.

An hon. MEMBER. Order.

Mr. PERRY. It is order. I know it does not suit the hon. gentleman, but it is the fact. Now, Sir, for the information of hon. gentlemen I will read Mr. Blake's letter. It is dated Washington, 29th January, 1891. Now, that was very near the eve of that general election. You will all remember that the writs were issued some time in February, and the election took place on the 5th March. Mr. Blaine wrote to Mr. Baker :

I authorize you to contradict the rumours you refer to. There are no negotiations whatever on foot for a reciprocity treaty with Canada, and you may be sure that no scheme for reciprocity with the Dominion, confined to natural products, will be entertained by this Government. I know nothing of Sir Charles Tupper coming to Washington.
J. G. BLAINE.

This was a direct contradiction of the statement made by Sir Charles Tupper and hon. gentlemen opposite. They rode that horse out for election purposes and they got into power on its back, but no sooner did they get into office than they allowed the poor old animal to go and graze for itself. They did not need him any longer, they allowed him to die, and to-day we do not hear a word from them about reciprocity with the United States. The Government and their supporters do not tell us that they are going to open up negotiations with the United States. Every one in this House knows well that the United States are prepared to-day to entertain an offer from Canada of reciprocity upon certain lines. The idea of asking the United States to reciprocate in trade relations with Canada, on the same basis as the treaty of 1854, is preposterous. We know very well that that would be a one-sided policy. The American people have told us: you want to open a trade with the United States for your products, but we cannot reciprocate; you do not want the corresponding article. Admit, however, a certain line of manufactured articles as mentioned in the schedule, and we are prepared to meet you. These manufactured articles the present Government would not admit duty free. Why? Because it would starve the monopolists, because it would destroy the opportunity of obtaining money for elections. We know very well that the manufacturers, the monopolists, are to-day the masters. We know that last year, when the Minister of Finance was introducing his tariff, which was certainly an amelioration upon the old one, the very next day we found these corridors thronged with delegations waiting upon him in order to urge him to reconsider the tariff. In fact he had to reconsider it. He called them clerical errors, but the clerical errors all turned out to be in favour of the monopolists and the manufacturers and against the consumer, which goes to show that the manufacturers are the masters of the Government, and that the Government are not at liberty to act in the manner which they know would be for the welfare of the people. Now, millions have been spent in the North-west, and millions are still being spent on different parts of Canada. We find railways subsidized here and there, and canals being built, such as the Tay Canal and the Curran Bridge, and we find money spent by the millions everywhere except in the lower provinces. Look at Prince Edward Island. About $150,000,000 have been expended on public works in Canada since 1873, the year that Prince Edward Island entered confederation, and show me how much of that has been expended in Prince Edward Island. Why, the fortieth part of that is the legitimate share which the people of the island have to pay; and if our net debt is $250,000,000, at least, representing $50 per head, man, woman and child, make up the interest at 4 per cent, and you will see what the people of the island have to pay. And yet, they are refused even a special train from Summerside to Tignish. When the Government were asked to build up a branch railway they are refused. I do not believe they have been asked; I believe that the hon. member for King's County (Mr. Macdonald) is too much afraid of the Government to ask them for a cent. I believe he insinuated in the King's County that the Government would build it if only he were elected, and if the people would only elect Mr. Martin against Mr. Welsh and Dr. Jenkins against the senior member for King's County. But when these gentlemen came here, they had not firmness enough to tell the Government that they must build it. Having expended so much money in other parts of Canada—the money of Prince Edward Island as well—is it not time for the Government to think of doing justice to the people of the island. It is now ten years since the agitation began for the building of the tunnel. We know that it has done service in two elections, and the Government expect it will do service at one more. However, I doubt that very much. I have been told to-day that the Government have made up their minds to give up the idea of building the tunnel. I would like to know if that is the case. I am told they have also given up the idea of subsidizing the ferry, and also that they are going to enter into a contract with a certain gentleman to open up a ferry in the winter between Cape Traverse and Tormentine. Is that the case? We were told about a month ago by the Minister of Finance that it was intended to bore holes again this summer across the strait. The weather was so stormy in 1893-94 that they could not bore one hole, and if we can judge of the coming summer by the weather now, I am afraid it will be so stormy that they will not have the opportunity afforded of boring even one hole. But if they are determined to give up the building of the tunnel, I ask these gentlemen to resign and pay the island $150,000 or $200,000 per year for the number of years during which they have failed to carry out the sacred terms of confederation. It is time that the Government should begin to pay its debts. I saw the other day in a paper published in Toronto, the "Mail and Empire," in which it was stated that unless the tunnel were built, the people of the island were going to rebel. I deny that I ever made such a statement. I said that the people of the island were badly used and robbed of their rights, and that the Government had better not push them too far—that they were independent, that although small they were a strong, intelligent people, and just as worthy of an expenditure as the people of British Columbia. And I think they were as worthy of having a few thousand dollars spent there as the people of British Columbia were. I repudiate and deny the statement that this was said merely for an election dodge. Why, Sir, this was sent out broadcast. I do not know how many copies were sent, perhaps by direction of the Government for all I know, down in my own county trying to make out that the senior member for Prince County is disloyal and is trying to breed dissension. They think it is time to put down the senior member for Prince County. But, I made no such statement. I say we are loyal in Prince Edward Island. We know how to be loyal, how to be decent; and how to do justice to other people—not like the Government. We are proud of being Canadians and we are Canadians first and perhaps French, English, Irish or Scotch next. I deny, and I throw back in the face of the Government paper the statements made against me. I suppose that this must have been inspired here in order to get it into that paper. It is a shame that such things should be. I wanted to bring the matter up the other day but I was not allowed. But I have now an opportunity of denying the charge, the foul charge made against me by that paper, and I say again that I hold the Government responsible, because it is well known to be a Government paper. If I am so much in the way, why do they not send down their thousands and half millions and try to drive me out? They have tried it on several occasions but they have not succeeded. They have tried their bribes, even by thousands. But, Sir, I cannot be bribed. The Liberal blood is in my veins and will be, I hope, while I live. Let them try their hands at the next election whenever it comes. I defy them. The people of Prince County know how to appreciate honesty, industry, and fair-play. The great majority of them are Protestants, but they never ask me whether I am French or English, Catholic or Protestant, but they are glad to have as their representative a man they can depend upon, a man who will not be bribed. I doubt if I could say as much for several of the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. I believe if they got the chance they would very soon take it.

Mr. PERRY.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Order.

Mr. PERRY (P.E.I.) I know this does not suit some hon. gentlemen, but I cannot help it. If the hon. gentleman is tired of my talking English, I may try to administer to him a dose in the French language. Perhaps that will do him better. Now, we will see what the farmers are taxed. On agricultural implements, including shovels and spades, 50 per cent per dozen, and 25 per cent. Now, every poor farmer must have a spade and a shovel. Axle grease is taxed 25 per cent. The grease that goes to grease the poor man's truck, wagon and cart, while the rich man who can afford to drive fine buggies will use sweet oil, or something of that kind. Bags or sacks of hemp, linen, or jute, and cotton seamless bags are taxed 20 per cent. Bags, cotton, made by the needle 32½ per cent. Did you ever hear the like of that before Bags, paper, printed or plain, 25 per cent. Who uses these? Members of the Cabinet? No; but the poor people. Baking powder, 6 cents per pound. Barbed wire fencing of iron or steel ¾ cent per pound. Binder twine 12½ cents per pound. Blankets 5 cents per pound and 25 per cent. Now, the poor people cannot very well do without these blankets. And a coarser class of blankets will weigh twice as much as the finer kind, so the tax upon the blankets used by the richer class is at a less rate than that used by the poor. Look at the discrimination in this part of the tariff as against the poor man in favour of the rich. And yet my hon. friend from King's County, P.E.I., (Mr. Macdonald), says the farmer pays nothing. Bolts, nuts and washers (iron and steel) 1 cent per pound and 20 per cent ad valorem. The farmer uses all these things. Bolts, nuts and washers (iron or steel, less than ⅜-inch in diameter) 1 cent per pound and 25 per cent, but not less than 35 per cent. Boots and shoes (leather) 25 per cent. I am sure the poor people must have boots and shoes. Braces or suspenders, 35 per cent. What keeps up the poor man's pants? He is taxed 35 per cent. Do they expect him to go without these braces? Brass nails, rivets, screws, &c., 30 per cent. Who uses these, if not the poor people? Brushes, 30 per cent. I suppose the Finance Minister will say these are a luxury. But the poor people require brushes and soap and a good deal of it. Buckles, iron or steel 27½ per cent. Brass, 30 per cent. Builders' hardware, 32½ per cent. The poor man who wants to buy a lock or a latch for his door must pay this heavy duty. Candy and confectionery, 35 per cent. Caps and hats, fur, 25 per cent. The poor man's cap or hat is taxed. Carpets, two-ply and three-ply, ingrain, whose warp is wholly composed of cotton or other material than wool, worsted, hair of alpaca goat or like animals, 3 cents per square yard and 25 per cent. Oh, dear! And yet we are told that the tariff has been changed in favour of the poor man. Carpets, other than above, 30 per cent. Carriages, buggies, pleasure carts and similar vehicles (not elsewhere specified costing not more than $50, $5 each, and 25 per cent; costing more than $50, 35 per cent. Now, you will see, Mr. Speaker, how the carriages that are used by the poorer classes of the people are charged more than the rich man's buggy. Carriages: Farm and freight wagons, carts, drays and similar vehicles, 25 per cent. Last year the whole was down to 25 per cent, but through a clerical error, I suppose, it was put up. Chains, trace, tug and halter, 32½ per cent. How is the poor farmer going to plough without chains? How is he going to work his farm? The farmer is charged 32½ per cent for the chain he uses in working his farm, and the rich man is charged very little more upon the champagne he drinks to have a good time and make him have the appearance of a gentleman.

Then we find lamp chimneys, 30 per cent ; churns, wood, 20 per cent ; china and porcelain ware, 30 per cent ; clothes wringers, 25 per cent ; cordage, $1\frac{1}{4}$ cents per pound, and 10 per cent. Now, this revenue which they collect upon cordage does not actually go into the treasury, because we import no cordage. We have two or three cordage industries amalgamated into one ; they are able to manufacture all the country needs, and being protected by a high duty of $1\frac{1}{2}$ or 2 cents per pound, no person can import it. We give the manufacturer of that cordage the benefit of the duty, which does not go into the treasury, but goes into the pockets of the manufacturers. Collars, cotton and linen, 24 cents per dozen, and 25 per cent. Now, will the Minister tell me that the poor people do not wear collars or cuffs ? Cuffs, 4 cents per pair, and 25 per cent ; cultivators, $32\frac{1}{2}$ per cent ; curry combs, $32\frac{1}{2}$ per cent—for the curry comb that curry the old horses that hon. gentlemen opposite were riding a few years ago. Table cutlery, not plated, $32\frac{1}{2}$ per cent ; duck, cotton, printed, dyed or coloured, 30 per cent ; earthenware, 35 per cent ; drain tiles, 20 per cent ; edged tools, 35 per cent ; fanning mills, 35 per cent ; flour, 75 cents per barrel. I am afraid we shall have to ask the Government to take the duty off flour. Barbed wire fencing, iron or steel, $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent per pound ; flags, cotton or bunting, 30 per cent. Just fancy a tax of 30 per cent on the old flag. Now, if I had my way I would admit that duty free, but these disloyal hon. gentlemen opposite tax the old flag. Mirrors, $27\frac{1}{2}$ to 32 per cent. Well, I suppose poor people must do without mirrors. Grindstones, 25 per cent ; hammers, 25 per cent. Now, we can see from these items what sort of protection the poor farmers are getting under this National Policy. To speak seriously, we must admit that it is high time a change should take place. It is high time that these hon. gentlemen, if they intend to hold on to the reins of Government much longer, should begin to show by their actions that they intend to legislate for the welfare of the people at large. The policy of this Government tends to make 10 per cent of the population millionaires, and to starve the other 90 per cent. Sir, what proportion of the population of this country are the manufacturers compared with the farmers, the workingmen, and the artisans ? They are just about 10 per cent as compared with 90 per cent, and the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite is to benefit the 10 per cent at the expense of the 90. It is time the people should understand these things, and I believe they do understand them. I believe the people are only waiting for the year, for the month, for the week, for the day, for the hour, when they will have an opportunity of going to the polls and sending these gentlemen into the shades of oblivion. Sir, I believe the people are beginning to see that this Government have been squandering millions of their hard-earned money. How hon. gentlemen opposite can afford to look hon. gentlemen on this side of the House in the face, and stand these charges without ever a blush, is what I cannot understand. Why, Sir, the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) referred to Mr. Mackenzie's letter wherein that gentleman said that he was bound to protect the treasury. He meant by that, I suppose, that he was bound to see that every dollar extracted from the people in the shape of taxes, was properly expended for the legitimate interests of the country. And, Sir when he left office he had protected the treasury, he had saved the treasury. But unfortunately for this country, so many booblers subsequently came around that they took all there was in the treasury, and taxed the people 75 per cent more than they were taxed under the Mackenzie regime. And what is the result of all their taxation ? Why, Sir, last year they had over a million dollars deficit, and this year they have five million. It was hard dragging it out of the Minister of Finance, he called it four and a half, but I call it five ; and I am afraid that before the next session it will be six millions. What kind of a showing is that ? Notwithstanding that we are taxed at the rate of \$40,000,000 a year, in place of the \$23,500,000 in 1878-79, notwithstanding all that, we have an expenditure over estimates of more than a million dollars, with a deficit of over five millions. What is the reason of this deficit ? Will hon. gentlemen tell me that there has been a war during the last year ? Were there any great public works ? Was the Canadian Pacific Railway building ? Was the tunnel building ? Was the Southern Branch Railway building in Prince Edward Island ? How can they account for the mismanagement which has produced a deficit of five or six millions ? During the last year the national debt of this country has increased over seven million dollars, if you can rely upon the blue-book. Take up the Auditor General's Report, and what do you find ? You can hardly turn two pages, one after another, but you find war between the Government and the Auditor General. The Auditor General refuses to pay certain accounts. How is he prepared to pay that \$2,500,000 which the Government have passed an Order in Council to give as a bonus to the Hudson Bay Railway Company ? How are they going to get over that ? They expect to get a vote from this House to back up their Order in Council. Will they get it ? I am sure they won't get it on this side of the House ; if they do, I will leave my party, I will not belong to them one minute longer. This is the way things are mismanaged, this is the way things are muddled, and no wonder the deficit is there. No wonder the debt has increased over seven millions during the last year. One would think that, within the last ten years, having had no rebellion, having had good crops, having had good times, and a high tariff, the Government would have wiped out 50 or 100 millions of the national debt. Instead of that the debt has increased alarmingly, and I speak for the majority of the people of this country when I say that it is high time to put an end to this mismanagement of our affairs. It is time this country were administered honestly, not for the benefit of the few at the expense of the many, but for the general welfare of the people at large. Sir, the people are not asleep, the people are not ignorant, and they cannot be bamboozled much longer by the sophistry of the Conservative party.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will be glad to learn that at this stage of the debate it is not my intention to inflict a long speech on the House. It is very interesting, I am sure, to myself and to many older members of the House to listen to a discussion on the National Policy. It is true the National Policy has been established as a compromise between the various interests and industries in the Dominion. In 1867, at the outset of confederation, the tariff on goods imported into Canada was 20 per cent, in New Brunswick, the tariff was 15 per cent; in Nova Scotia, 10 per cent. As might be expected, a compromise was made between the various tariffs on goods imported from abroad into the several provinces forming the confederation, and the tariff originally adopted by this Dominion was a tariff of 15 per cent. This, as can easily be seen, was a compromise between the tariffs adopted previous to confederation by the several provinces of this Dominion. For the first six or seven years of confederation this was the tariff in existence. When the Conservative party was defeated in 1874, the Liberals adopted a new tariff. It was then found necessary to increase the tariff from 15 to 17½ per cent. During the Liberal regime, it was ascertained that the tariff was not sufficient to maintain the revenues of this Dominion at a figure to enable the Government to meet their obligations. It was found necessary in 1877 to increase the tariff. They increased it on various lines of goods, and on many articles which were imported into the Dominion from 17½ to 25 per cent. If a careful analysis is made of the tariff in existence in 1877 and 1878 it will be found that it was not very materially lower than the existing tariff. In 1870, I may observe, the Parliament of Canada conceived the idea of adopting a national policy. At that time, Parliament determined to adopt a policy of protection to the natural resources of the Dominion of Canada, as regards the products of the mine, of the field, of the sea, and of the forest; but, unfortunately, owing to a great desire on the part of the western provinces particularly, to have coal imported into Canada free of duty, that policy lasted but a short time. It was found, however, that it gave a great stimulus to the various industries, even during the short period in which it was in existence, and after it had been abandoned for several years, the Liberal-Conservative party, very wisely, as I believe, adopted a national policy, which, as was properly stated at the time, did not, after all, mean or intend to mean an increase of taxation on the people; the object at the time was simply to so readjust the tariff as to foster the industries of this Dominion, to develop the natural resources of the country, and in this way prove a benefit to the Dominion at large. This has been the policy since 1879. This policy has been assailed by hon. gentlemen opposite for a long period now, and if I am a judge of the situation, they seem to me to be just as far from displacing the Government from the treasury benches on the lines of their policy to-day as they have been in years past. They adopted, for a short time, it is true, commercial union, then unrestricted reciprocity, continental union, and now at last they have come down to a policy for revenue only, on the lines of British free trade. The resolution which is now under consideration of the House was moved by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and is as follows:—

That, inasmuch as enormous sums of money are now exacted from the people of Canada which are not paid into the treasury, and inasmuch as the burthens of the people are thereby greatly and unnecessarily increased, and it is of the utmost importance to the well-being of the community that not only should the present extravagant expenditure be diminished, but that the said burthens should be reduced as largely and speedily as possible,—it is expedient that in making provision to restore “the equilibrium between revenue and expenditure,” as recommended in the Speech from the Throne, the existing tariff be so modified that it may be made a tariff for revenue only.

This means nothing more, and nothing less than a revenue tariff on the lines of British free trade, as enunciated by the leader of the Opposition from the Atlantic to the Pacific. This resolution, therefore, is one on which, it appears to me, hon. gentlemen opposite have determined to appeal to the people at the polls. It is, therefore, of interest to Parliament and the people of the whole Dominion, to inquire how a revenue tariff, on the lines of free trade, will affect the various industries of this Dominion. The revenue in Great Britain is raised by customs to a considerable extent, and practically, the balance of it is raised by direct taxation. As has been pointed out by my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth), it is impossible that Canada can adopt the British free trade policy in its entirety. But, the leaders of the Liberal party have announced, that every vestige of protection must be eliminated from the tariff, and to that extent they can be in line with British free trade. They may adopt the customs and excise tariff of Great Britain, but it will be impracticable for them to adopt the stamp duties and other taxes which are imposed by the Imperial Government. Now, we find that in Great Britain the following amount of taxations raised under the following heads :—

Customs	£19,715,000
Excise	25,360,000
Stamps (excluding fee, &c., stamps)..	13,805,000
Land tax.....	1,040,000
House duty.....	1,410,000
Property and income tax.....	13,470,000
Post office.....	10,400,000
Telegraph service.....	2,480,000
Crown Lands (net).....	430,000
Stamps in lieu of fees.....	832,563
Interest on advances.....	220,396
Interest on Suez shares.....	198,829
Allowance from the Bank of England.	170,970
Miscellaneous	862,714
Add local taxation.....	7,214,202

Total national income..... £97,609,579

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the Imperial Government imposes customs duties to the extent, in round numbers of $100,000,000, or five times the amount we raise by our customs duties in Canada. I presume the Liberals, if they ever get to power, will adopt that line of policy, and in order to do so, they must impose a duty on tea and other articles which are now admitted free for the benefit of the consumer. When such a policy is generally understood and properly explained to the electors of Canada, I have no hesitation in predicting that, after the next general election, the defeat of the Opposition will be more overwhelming than ever it was before. The hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac), called attention to the effect of the National Policy on the farmers of the country generally, and the farmers of this country particularly, and he referred to the vacant houses and boarded windows in Antigonish as evidence of the disastrous results of our protective system. I am fairly familiar with the condition of things in that beautiful agricultural county which he represents, and I am free to admit that in passing through it, you will find some vacant houses and boarded windows. But, strange to say, the farmers' sons who left those houses vacant and boarded up their windows have not gone to free trade England; but they have crossed the line to the United States, there to live under a much higher protective tariff than we have in Canada. It is not owing to the fact that we have a National Policy here that these men have emigrated to the United States. The farmers' sons of the county of Antigonish, as is the case in many of the rural districts throughout the country, find that their occupation on the farm is not to their taste, and they move towards the large cities in Canada and the United States. Naturally, they go to the United States, where they have a wider field for their energy, and enterprise, and pluck, and I am happy to say that to my own personal knowledge the sons of farmers who left vacant houses in Antigonish have been very prosperous in the United States under the high protective tariff of that country. I have no doubt whatever, Sir, that if they had gone to the western part of this great Dominion they would have succeeded equally as well. Forty years ago the tide of emigration from the maritime provinces to the United States commenced, and it continues to the present day, and it will continue unquestionably, because those who have gone there and prospered in times past have been encouraging their people to follow them. In that way many have left us and more will follow. It is often stated in this House that under the National Policy the farmer is not fairly treated. As the son of a farmer, and as a farmer myself, I have no hesitation in saying that there is no line of industry in this Dominion so well protected as the farming industry. It is simply idle for the Liberal party of Canada to endeavour to mislead the farming community into the belief that they are not fairly treated under the National Policy. In times gone by, when education was not so general as it is to-day, it might perhaps be possible to fool the farmers by such fallacies. My own experience is, that there is no class of people in this Dominion who so fully realize the advantages they derive from the National Policy as do the farmers. They have all the products of the soil protected, and protected to a very large extent. They have their pork protected, their beef protected, their cheese protected, their mutton protected, their eggs protected, and, in fact, everything which is produced on the farm: and in this way, not only the products of the soil, but also those important adjuncts of the farming business, namely, pork, beef, cheese and other lines, are protected also. There are some hon. gentlemen in this House who are farmers—I am sorry to see they are not in their places just now—who complain bitterly that they do not get free corn for the finishing off of their cattle. Now, it is quite evident that those gentlemen, who speak so loudly in that direction, are not farmers any more than millers are. They are running a line of manufacture which is specific. They raise cattle, and hogs, and horses, and they are very anxious, in the same manner as millers are anxious, to have feed for their lines of products as cheaply as possible. But would it not be unfair for the agriculturists of this Dominion that their customers, and possibly their best customers—as millers are their best customers—would have an opportunity of squeezing down their prices, to the lowest possible figure, by allowing the agricultural products of the other side of the line to enter into competition with the agricultural products of Canada, in order to enable them to secure feed for their lines of products at a low figure. The natural enemy of the agriculturists in one sense is the miller, for the miller who requires the products of the soil to a large extent would like to obtain those products as cheaply as possible. Therefore, the removal of the duty from wheat would be to the advantage of the miller; but I feel assured that the farmers of Ontario would be very sorry indeed to see the duty taken off wheat, while a duty of 75 cents a barrel was maintained on flour. For a similar reason it would be equally unjust for the agriculturists of the Dominion to have the duty taken off coarse grains with a view to enabling the feeders of stock to secure feed for their cattle at a lower figure. The object of the National Policy is to so adjust the advantages to the different industries as not only to make it beneficial to all concerned, but also to enable the Government to raise a sufficient revenue to maintain the public services of the country. My hon. friend from Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac) referred to the protection of coal. Surely, there is no one from the province of Nova Scotia, particularly, who would ever advocate the abolition of the duty on coal. During the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite there was no duty on coal, and, unfortunately for that industry, it was so depressed that the coal miners were begging for aid throughout the districts in which the mines were situated. The output of coal in 1878 did not amount to more than half a million tons in the whole province of Nova Scotia, whereas in 1895 it amounted in round numbers, to 2,000,000 tons. This was unquestionably owing to the beneficial effects of the National Policy; and that industry, besides giving employment to the coal miners, also gave employment to ships, gave markets for the farmers in the neighbourhood of the mines, and increased the revenue of the province, in fifteen years, to the amount of $150,000 a year. Would it not, therefore, be most disastrous to the industry to have the duty on coal abolished? And if the duty on coal, or the duty on any other important line of products of this Dominion be abolished, then, as I predicted in this House on a former occasion, the National Policy would fall to pieces. It is essential, in the interests of the National Policy, that all lines be equitably protected; therefore, the abolition of the duty on any great line of products of the Dominion would be disastrous to the whole policy. It has also been said that the National Policy has not been of any advantage to the fishermen. Surely no one from the maritime provinces would make a statement of that kind, expecting it to be believed, at least in the maritime provinces. The fisheries are well protected under the National Policy. A bounty has been given to the fishermen, lines of goods which are used by the hardy fishermen of the maritime provinces have been admitted free of duty, and the fish itself is protected. So that it is idle for any person to say that the fisheries of this Dominion are not well protected by the National Policy, and that the fishermen are not contented with that policy. The mechanics and labourers are also protected, as well as the manufacturers. Without the market afforded by the manufacturers, the labourers, the mechanics, the miners, and the fishermen, and, unless these industries are prosperous, the farmers will have but poor markets for their products. It is necessary, in order to maintain the equilibrium between the various industries, to have the compromise, as it is, and as it was, and as it should be, between the various industries well maintained, and to have withal a sufficient revenue to enable the Government to maintain the public service of the country. In 1878 the policy adopted by the Liberal-Conservative party was this:

Mr. CAMERON

That this House is of the opinion that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a National Policy, which, by a judicious readjustment of the tariff, will benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing and other interests of the Dominion; that such a policy will retain in Canada thousands of our fellow-countrymen now obliged to expatriate themselves in search of the employment denied them at home, will restore prosperity to our struggling industries, now so sadly depressed, will prevent Canada from being made a sacrifice market, will encourage and develop an active interprovincial trade, and moving, as it ought to do, in the direction of reciprocity of tariffs with our neighbours, so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand, will greatly tend to procure for this country, eventually, a reciprocity of trade.

In all the discussions that have taken place in this House up to the present time, I find that the impression is general that the object of the National Policy was reciprocal free trade. But the resolution speaks for itself. Its object was to move in the direction of a reciprocity of tariffs, and its aim was to retain those people at home who were obliged to expatriate themselves in search of employment abroad. Therefore, it was not, in my opinion, the intention of the National Policy to have reciprocal free trade between Canada and the United States. It has been changed at various times as much as practicable in the direction of a reciprocity of tariffs. At present, it is true, the revenue tariff of the United States is about 10 per cent higher than that of Canada. In my opinion, the present Government should go further in the line of a reciprocity of tariffs, as indicated in the resolution introduced by Sir John Macdonald as early as 1877 and 1878. Let us examine how far even that extent of reciprocity of tariffs has affected the trade between Canada and the United States. Referring to the imports and exports, I find that the imports for home consumption from the United States in 1878 amounted, in all, to $48,631,739.

The exports from Canada that year amounted in value to $25,775,245. There was a balance against Canada of $22,856,494. The people of Canada purchased $22,000,000 from the United States more than the United States purchased from Canada. In my opinion that is a very unfair trade. That was the trade which existed under the revenue tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite, and it was with the view of correcting that unfair condition of things that the tariff was readjusted by the Liberal-Conservative party when they came into power in 1878. Let us now examine the condition at present. In 1894 the imports for home consumption from the United States amounted in value to $53,034,100, and the exports from Canada to the United States amounted to $35,809,940. The balance of trade was $7,224,160. As my hon. friend from Bothwell will observe that balance is unfortunately in favour of the United States.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Very much more than before.

Mr. CAMERON. No, at that time it was $22,000,000 in their favour; at present it is only $7,000,000, showing that a fairer trade with the United States has been secured by the National Policy to the extent of $15,000,000. During the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite, the exports from Great Britain amounted in value to $48,941,539, and the imports amounted to $37,431,180, leaving a balance of trade in our favour of $8,510,359. In other words, England purchased from Canada more than Canada purchased from Great Britain to the amount of $8,510,359. Under the present system—hon. gentlemen opposite may make such use of the figures as they like—I find that the exports to Great Britain were $68,538,856, and the imports from Great Britain amounted to $37,510,359. The imports from Great Britain to Canada increased about $2,000,000 during that period, but our market in England has increased from $45,941,539 in 1878 to $68,538,856 in 1894. So that we find after all that England is our best market, and it would be simply puerile in my opinion to argue that the free trade policy of Great Britain would be applicable in any sense to the wants of the Dominion. Great Britain is so situated that to some extent, her industries are protected by the cost of the transportation of goods from other countries into that island. The position there is very different from what we occupy here. The condition of things that exists in England does not exist here, and the laws of tariff that would be adapted to the wants of Great Britain would be ruinous to the best interests of the Dominion. The idea was that the object of the fiscal policy of this Dominion, as contemplated in 1878, was to have a reciprocity of trade in which the advantages to both countries would be as nearly balanced as possible. I am one of those who believe that it is in the interests of the

Mr. DAWSON.

United States to have a National Policy as they have had in that country for many years, and that for the same reason it is equally in the interest of this Dominion, as our industries are to a large extent similar, to have a National Policy also. It would be in the interests of both countries that each would so protect the industries of its own people that general benefit would result. I have therefore no hesitation in saying, as I did on one occasion some years ago, that in my opinion hon. gentlemen opposite will never have an opportunity of crossing the floor of this House unless they abandon the revenue tariff on the line of British free trade in the same manner as they have abandoned commercial union, unrestricted reciprocity and continental free trade.

Mr. DAWSON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion negatived.

Mr. DAWSON. The last hon. gentleman who addressed this House, like many others who preceded him, seemed very anxious to clear away the difficulties which may beset the path of the hon. leader of the Opposition when he takes the reins of power. They seem to be anxious for the success of the Liberals when they come to power, and wish to point out in advance the difficulties of raising revenue and all the other difficulties that may have to be met by the leader of the Opposition.

But I will say, as a humble follower of that hon. gentleman, that I have no fear at all for him, and that, without the assistance of our friends opposite, he will himself solve all difficulties when the people, in due course choose to trust the affairs of this Dominion in his hands. This debate, so far as it has proceeded, seems to have made one point very clear at any rate, and that is, where hon. gentlemen opposite are on the National Policy.

For some time past they have been very chary about saying much in favour of the old policy. Some of them have been wont to describe it as a tree decaying and tottering to its fall, from which the rotten branches must be removed; and the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat likened it, last year, to a building so fearfully and wonderfully made that if you took one brick away from the structure, it would tumble down about their ears, burying them in a political sense, in its ruins.

Last session we thought they were beginning well in the direction of tariff reform and that something would result; but when the delegations of the highly protected interests began to pour into this city from their palace cars, the policy of tariff reform was abandoned, and now they have drifted back to the old policy under which they have sheltered themselves the last sixteen years. We now know that the National Policy is to be maintained by them, let the cost be what it may to this fair young country.

To prove its worth they point to our vast exports. They say, look at the amount of our exports, $104,000,000, and exultingly exclaim: see what the National Policy has done for us. Analyse the returns, and you will see that of the $104,000,000, $61,000,000 went to England. They were sent to the free ports of that country, there to fight their way against the products of the world.

Our wheat has to meet there the product of cheap native labour from the fertile valleys of India, and the millions of bushels now being sent from the plains of Argentina.

Our beef has to compete against the exports from the limitless pasture lands of La Platte, and the cheap frozen beef from the Antipodes. Our butter has to compete with the dairy products of Denmark, Belgium and the Netherlands, and our cheese with the cheap production of the Australian farmer.

Yet, in spite of all this opposition, in spite of all this competition, our products have held their own in the British markets, the excellence of quality securing for them a place there. We have been able to sell our products, but the price that we have received has been just such as we have been able to get, not such as would yield us profit on the goods sent, but such as the markets in England allowed.

There is no sentiment in that market. The English buyer will pay for a like quantity exactly the same price to us as to any other person. We have received no more or no less for the products we sent than the shipper from the Argentine Republic, from India, from Russia or from any other part of the earth. Sixty-one millions of our exports found their way into the open ports of England: $43,000,000 had to fight their way unaided by any effort of this Government across the tariff barriers of the other nations of the world. Scarcely, unaided, however, for I should not forget that the Government has granted subsidies to lines of steamships to convey our products to other lands. For instance, $122,000, or, the subsidy being in pounds, £25,000 sterling, for a line of steamships to Australia. When the delegates to the intercolonial conference were here, I was told, they brought samples of Australian cheap mutton, butter and cheese, and told the Canadian people how much more cheaply these products could be placed upon the market here than the products of the Canadian farmer.

So the Canadian farmer is asked to contribute $122,000 a year to subsidize a line of steamships to be employed in bringing these cheap products of the Australian farms into competition with our home products. But what was the result of this subsidy? A trade aggregating altogether half a million dollars, yielding to the revenue of this country $16,000 a year in return for $122,000 spent.

We are told that it is treason to look with longing eyes to the vast markets for just such products as we have to sell to be found in the great cities of the United States within close reach of us here. We are told that it is treason to look with longing eyes to this market, our prospects in which have been growing less and which now—thanks to the incapacity of the present administration—is almost lost to us.

We are told that trade follows the flag or ought to follow the flag, and we are advised to cultivate trade with the other British possessions of the world. We have been cultivating trade with the other British possessions, and the Trade and Navigation Returns show us some of the results. Excluding Great Britain, these Returns show our exports to the British possessions to be five and a half millions. This includes Newfoundland and the British West Indies, which took four and a half millions. Thus, we find that the whole British Empire, outside of the mother country, Newfoundland and the British West Indies bought from us a scant three-quarters of a million dollars worth of our products. These are the markets that are offered to us in exchange for the market that can so readily be found in the United States. Cultivate trade, they say, with our British fellow-citizens throughout the Empire, and look no longer to the market we promised to secure for you in the United States.

If the Government had been able to show that they had induced countries from which we had purchased our supplies to take our products in exchange, then they might have something to be proud of. How is it? I find in the Trade Returns that the whole value of our exports to the following countries:—Uruguay, Bolivia, Hayti, Mexico, Dutch, Danish and French West Indies, Madeira, Denmark, Turkey, Switzerland, Russia, Austria, Spain and her possessions, aggregated less in a year than we spent on the Curran Bridge or the Tay Canal. We bought from these countries and brought to our shores no less than $1,500,000 worth of their products.

In China we sold half a million dollars worth of our products, and purchased a million dollars worth of theirs. In France we sold half a million dollars worth, and purchased $2,500,000 of theirs. In Germany we sold two-thirds of a million dollars worth, and bought $6,000,000 of theirs. In Japan, as the result of subsidizing a line of steamships to trade with that country, we sold less than one-thirtieth of a million dollars worth, and bought one and a half millions worth of theirs. For every $8 we have spent in Germany they have spent $1 here. For every $50 we have spent in Japan they have spent $1 here.

We have sold of our products to all the nations of the earth, outside of the British Empire and the United States, just $5,000,000 worth, and we have purchased from these nations in exchange rather more than $18,000,000.

Seventeen years have passed away since the promise was made that hon. gentlemen opposite would secure for us a reciprocity treaty with the United States—not a reciprocity of tariffs but a reciprocity of trade with the great country to the south of us. This promise was made by the great chieftain, Sir John Macdonald himself. It was that promise that returned him to power in 1879, that promise the fulfilment of which meant the return of prosperity to this country the like of which those engaged in agriculture have not enjoyed since the days we lost our treaty with that nation. No man of sense can fail to see the enormous benefits of that market to us. Ask those who are engaged in developing the natural wealth of this country what they think about it; ask our fishermen; our miners, our lumbermen, or our farmers, what benefit that market would be to them. In reply to the demand that an honest effort be made to obtain a reciprocity treaty with the United States, securing to us free access to their markets, an effort is made to attract our exports to Australia, Mexico, South Africa, Brazil—any where in all the broad earth rather than to the market lying at our door.

In our country we have vast mineral wealth. The Geological Survey has been piling up evidence of this, year after year, for many years; and now it is known that Canada is rich beyond the conception of man, in mineral wealth. Well, vast as is our mineral wealth, our exports last year were less than $6,000,000, of which more than $3,000,000 was for coal, leaving about $2,500,000 as to the value of our exports of every other kind of mineral. Surely this is a pitiful showing for a country so rich in mineral wealth as Canada undoubtedly is. Countless millions of tons of iron ore are to be found everywhere throughout the province of Ontario, and last year our total export of this article was 618 tons, less than a week's output for a small pit.

In what way has the Government contribute to the prosperity of the lumber trade? Is it by taxing the blankets, axes, saws, iron and machinery used in that industry? How have they contributed to the development of it? They have contributed by leaving it alone. Never having been made the subject of the class or special legislation of this Government it has grown to be one of the two mighty interests of our country, second only to agriculture, and contributing $26,000,000 to our exports, unaided by any legislation, allowed to go free, to develop itself by a natural process, until the great lumber trade of Canada has become an object of pride to all Canadians.

The farmers have contributed $52,000,000 to our exports. What has protection done for them, a class seeking markets in foreign countries, a class to find markets for whom hundreds of thousands of dollars yearly are spent by this Government, so they say? What use is protection to them? Protection on their cereals, and on their meats, when they have vast quantities of these to sell, and do sell them in the same market in which their great competitor, the American farmer sells his.

Let me tell hon. gentlemen opposite that the farmers of Canada have nothing to fear from American competition. The Americans furnish a discriminating market; they know a good article when they see it, and they know it better when they taste it. Canadian farm products, as was shown by the World's Fair, stand second to none in all the world. Americans recognize this fact, and in their large cities, when their market is open to us, we will find abundant customers for our butter, for our cheese, for our meat, for our barley, our beans and pease, all known to be of quality superior to any that is produced in the United States.

The National Policy, however, has done something for the farmers, it has oppressed him, it has forced him for sixteen years to pay heavily through the customs on such goods as he chooses to import. It has forced him also to pay tribute to the manufacturers of this country; it has forced him to pay tribute to the sugar refiners; it has forced him throughout the whole of the last year to pay a uniform price for his sugar, 20 per cent in excess of what the same article could be laid down for by the British refiner. It has forced him to pay more for his forks, rakes, hoes, nails, chains, shovels, axes, wire fencing, agricultural machinery—everything, in fact, that he requires—more than he would have to pay were it not for protection. The tariff practically prohibits him from purchasing abroad, compels him to buy at home, and pay the enhanced prices which it enables the manufacturer to charge.

A short time ago I noticed a comparison of prices between Saginaw and Montreal, in a few articles in common use by farmers. I found that the farmer who purchases in Montreal must pay 60 per cent more for his cut nails than the prices charged his American neighbour, the price in Saginaw being $1.25 per cwt., and in Montreal $2.25. For his piping for pumps he pays 55 per cent more, the price in Saginaw being $5.25 per 100 feet, and $8.10 in Montreal. He pays 39 per cent more for spades, the price in Saginaw being $3.50 and $4.75 in Montreal. He pays 40 per cent more for barbed wire, the price being $1.90 in Saginaw, and $2.87½ per cwt. in Montreal. Now, we learned the other day the extraordinary precautions the Government are taking to prevent the importation of hardware from the United States. In this short table of prices we find the secret of their hostility to American goods.

Let the farmer of Canada purchase his supplies in the cheapest market he can, and he will ask you for no protection. Doubtless, the farmers were bringing their grievances to the ears of the Ministers when they were out on a tour last fall, and to comfort them the Ministers assured them that while it was true their products had fallen in value, the purchasing power of such as they had to sell was as great as ever it was. They said the purchasing power of a bushel of wheat, then worth 60 cents, was as great as it was in the period from 1871 to 1881, when it was worth 90 cents per bushel. According to this argument, then, 60 cents in money in 1894 was worth as much as 90 cents in 1881, and, I suppose, still more in 1878. If 60 cents to-day has a purchasing power equal to 90 cents in 1878, then it puts us face to face with a very curious problem in finance.

It takes 37½ millions to govern this country now; if what they say is true, then 37½ million dollars to-day will go as far as 56½ millions in 1878. What a tribute this is to the skill of the hon. member for South Oxford and the Government of which he was a member, who, in that year, governed the country for ten million dollars less than one-half this amount.

Will 60 cents to-day go as far as 90 cents in 1879? Will it go as far as 90 cents in the farmer's payment on his mortgage, or on his land, or his interest, or on his taxes, or on any other debt? Then, there is another thing that must be remembered, the farmer's crop is not all his to spend. There is a lien upon it for seed, for rent, for interest, for the cost of production. He must first set aside a sufficient sum to meet these charges, and the balance only is his to spend.

Hon gentlemen are fond of quoting Mr. Blue. Mr. Blue says that he has ascertained that the cost of producing an acre of wheat is $14; the average price of wheat was 90 cents per bushel, the crop 20 bushels an acre. At 90 cents per bushel, this would be $18 as the value of the crop of each acre of wheat. The difference between the value and the cost of production would leave in the farmer's hands $4 on each acre for him to spend. But the price of wheat last year was only 60 cents per bushel, that is the price received by the farmers of this country. The cost of production may have been a little less, let us say $13 per acre. Now, 20 bushels of wheat at 60 cents yields $12 per acre; so that if the unhappy farmer had to pay the cost of production in cash, if he did none of the work himself, he would be producing his wheat at a dead loss of $1 per acre.

It is well known to the farmers themselves that it is only by incessant labour that they have been able for some time past to escape the hands of the sheriff, that constant toil, day after day, yields them the necessaries of life and little else.

But while the Government has done nothing for our miners, our fishermen, our lumbermen or our farmers, they have done much for the manufacturers. They have forced all the rest of the community for sixteen years past to pay a heavy tribute to this favoured class. For sixteen years they have been fed on the pap of protection, and by this time should have attained a lusty growth which would cause us to feel proud of the manufacturers of our country. By this time, after sixteen years of protection, they ought to cut some figure, surely, in the export of our country. Let us see what the exports are. I find that we exported last year, manufactured goods to the value of seven and three quarters million dollars. But of this I find that one million is put down for household effects of the people leaving the country, reducing the export of manufactured goods to 6¼ million dollars.

The Year-Book for 1893, informs me that protection was of no benefit at all to the tanners of this country, that apparently it has paralyzed that industry. It tells me that there were 1,012 tanneries in 1881, against 802 in 1891; that the output had fallen from $15,000,000 in 1881, to $11,000,000 in 1891. But the tanners last year exported a million and a half dollars worth of sole and upper leather. Wood manufacturers, who, surely, do not owe their existence to the fostering care of the tariff of protection, exported ¾ of a million dollars' worth, and we exported half a million dollars' worth of wood pulp; so we will have to write off a million dollars for household goods, and 2¼ million dollars for manufactures that were not aided by protection, and that leaves four million dollars as the contribution of the protected manufacturers of all Canada to the exports of the country. Even these four millions include some manufactures which I cannot see are the result of protection. I find they include jewellers' sweepings, gypsum, lime, brick, building stone, grindstones, ice and rags. Rags alone, of the whole list might fairly be called a product of protection.

But among the most curious features is the effect of the tariff on our trade with England. Hon. gentlemen have become somewhat famous for their loud declarations of loyalty. I have little faith in the man who is for ever proclaiming as to what an honest man he is. So soon as he informs me in unctuous language of his honesty, a cold distrust of the man grows up within me, and my respect, faith and belief in the loyalty of the man is not increased by his constant declarations. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite are treating the country with loud and oft repeated assurances of their unflinching loyalty to the old flag and their great devotion to the mother country, and that they are ready to follow the lead of the motherland. But, while professing loyalty, those hon. gentlemen have been, I cannot but think deliberately taxing the goods which we import from Great Britain more heavily than they do the goods imported from the United States. Their own Trade and Navigation Returns reveal the fact beyond all question.

If hon. gentlemen will turn up the returns, they will find that they took $8,245,845 in duty on goods of the value of $27,483,160 imported from Great Britain. These are dutiable goods, they do not include free goods or goods brought in for manufacture. This is equivalent, they will find, if hon. gentlemen will figure out the calculation, to a duty of 30 per cent. In the same year they levied $6,960,950 in duty on dutiable goods worth $25,823,936 imported from the United States. If they will figure that out, they will find that I am correct when I say the duty levied on dutiable goods imported from the United States was 27 as against 30 per cent of duty levied on goods imported from Great Britain. This means paying a bonus of 10 per cent of duty as an inducement to importers to purchase goods in the American market rather than in the markets of the motherland.

This has had its effect on our trade with the motherland which they profess to love so well. In 1893-94 we sold in Great Britain of the products of Canada—I do not include in this amount products we sent on as carriers, but the products of our own country—the value of $60,000,000, and we purchased their goods, dutiable and free, to the value of $38,000,000. In the same year we sold in the United States of goods the products of Canada the value of $32,500,000, and purchased their goods, dutiable and free, to the value of $53,000,000; in other words, we sold in Great Britain products to the value of $60,000,000, buying only the value of $38,000,000, and taking $22,000,000 in cash to balance our account. We sold in the United States products to the value of $32,500,000, and spent all that sum there in the purchase of goods of American production, and we left them over $20,000,000 in cash besides.

The iniquitous discrimination of the tariff against British trade was long since denounced by Liberals, and in 1892 the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), moved :

Inasmuch as Great Britain admits the products of Canada into her ports free of duty, this House is of the opinion that the present scale of duties exacted on goods mainly imported from Great Britain should be reduced.

On division it was found, however, that the House was not of this opinion, that the Liberals only were of this opinion, and that the Government and every hon. gentleman in the House supporting them was of the contrary opinion and believed that the discrimination should be continued.

The hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) moved the following motion :—

That if, and when, the Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland admits Canadian products to the markets of the United Kingdom upon more favourable terms than it accords to the products of foreign countries, the Parliament of Canada will be prepared to accord corresponding advantages by a substantial reduction in the duties it imposes upon British manufactured goods.

Not content with the admission into British ports of our products free of duty, the hon.

Mr. DAWSON.

gentleman and his colleagues and friends in this House would have Great Britain tax the food supply she draws from the nations to whom she sells her goods—tax that food supply, admit ours free, and in return we would not remove the duty levied on goods imported from England, but grant substantial reductions.

Well, she will never do it. We send her 6 per cent of her whole supply. It is rather too much to ask her to tax 94 per cent and admit 6 per cent free in return for such advantage as a substantial reduction on the duties laid against her goods would be. England knows too well the blessing of free trade to ever consent to such an arrangement as that. The noblest statesman England ever had, the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone—I am sure it is unnecessary for me to mention his name—has said :

You might as well attempt to overthrow trial by jury. You might as well attempt to overthrow the right of petition and of public meetings. You might as well try to tear out of our social and political system any one of the most cherished ideas that Englishmen have inherited from centuries of history, as to overset our free trade.

And well might he say it. Mightily has England prospered under free trade. It has become the fashion of hon. gentlemen opposite of late to decry the motherland. Driven from protectionist countries, tens of thousands of men every year find their way to the shores of England in search of that employment which they cannot find at home, and if hon. members will analyse the ranks of the unemployed in England, they will find that almost every man unemployed is a foreigner, who has come to England seeking that employment which he cannot obtain in the protectionist countries of Europe; and, when people hold up the fact that four millions of people are to-day wanting employment there, it is no argument whatever against the system of free trade which has so long prevailed in England.

They say, however, that free trade is killing England; and the Minister of Justice declared in this House that she, driven from the civilized markets of the world, is forced to spend millions on her army and navy to enable her to force her manufactured goods on the uncivilized nations of the world. And yet with England in this pitiful condition, compelled to spend millions to enable her to force her goods on unwilling customers, they will not open Canadian ports to her. They even tax her 3 per cent more than they do her great rival, the United States.

Wealth has increased in England under free trade. The national debt has been reduced, pauperism has decreased, crime has decreased, and trade has mightily expanded. The United Kingdom exported, in 1840, $255,000,000 worth of goods; in 1893, she exported $1,348,000,000, an increase of over 500 per cent. These $1,348,000,000 worth of exports were so profitably sold abroad, so profitable were the voyages of the ships engaged in distributing those exports throughout the world that they were enabled to bring back in these same ships, goods in exchange to the value of $1,970,000,000, showing a profit on that year's transactions of $400,000,000.

Wealth, as indicated by taxable incomes, increased from $1,255,000,000 in 1840, to $3,461,000,000 in 1893, an increase of 250 per cent. The wealth of the English people, as indicated by their savings—and this will commend itself, I am sure, to hon. gentlemen opposite, who are fond of quoting such statistics as an evidence of the prosperity of this country—the wealth of the English work people, as indicated by their savings rose from $122,500,000, in 1841, to $220,000,000 in 1894.

While this wealth was rolling up in the hands of the people of that nation, the nation paid off $650,000,000 of its national debt, paid off $200,000,000 of the Crimean war debt, and paid the millions which the Minister of Justice said she was forced to spend to compel the uncivilized nations of the world to buy her goods. Pauperism decreased in England and Wales from 201,000 able-bodied paupers, in 1841, to 107,000 in 1893. While the population of England increased during that period 45 per cent, the number of able-bodied paupers decreased 45 per cent. Crime decreased in England, the convictions for indictable offences being 34,000 in 1841, and 13,000 in 1893.

Now, as to the foreign trade of England. I will compare the trade of free-trade England with that of some of the principal protectionist countries of the world, and I will give the latest year for which a comparison is possible, 1891. In 1891 the population of the United Kingdom was about 38,000,000, and their exports and imports aggregated $3,600,000,000. The German Empire, with a population of about 50,000,000, had a total trade of $2,000,000,000. The United States, with a population of 65,000,000 had a total trade of $1,717,000,000. The total trade of Germany and the United States scarcely exceeds that of England alone, with one-third of their population. France and Russia, with four times the population of the United Kingdom had a foreign trade of $34,000,000 less, and Italy and Spain, with ten millions more population have a trade in value less than one-sixth that of England.

Mr. GRIEVE. And all these are protected countries.

Mr. DAWSON. These are the great protectionist countries of the world. Not one of them has a trade in any way equal to that of England. All of them are hopelessly behind her in her foreign trade. It is not likely then that the statesmen of England can be induced to turn back the hands of the clock of time for fifty years, and to reenact the Corn Laws, for even so loyal a man as the member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) and his friends in this House.

The Government now in power in Canada still stick to protection. They say that the "duty imposed on imported articles does not increase the price of articles manufactured in this country." Mr. Speaker, it does increase the price of every one of them. Competition among our manufacturers, there is none. The moment competition appears, combination kills it at once, and every member of this House who is engaged in mercantile pursuits knows the answer which is given to him if he demurs at the price of any article of Canadian manufacture. The answer is a shrug of the shoulder, and "I cannot help it, it is the combination price." The combination price! A sufficient answer always for the representative of a commercial house to make.

Prices on articles of Canadian manufacture are kept up as high as the duty will let them go. The moment you lower the duty, that moment you lower the price. This was proved last session by the very slight attempt the Finance Minister made in the direction of tariff reform. The prices of binder twine, coal oil, agricultural implements, and general hardware dropped when the tariff was touched.

The benefits of having manufactures in our country was preached to our farmers up west by members of the Government on their missionary tour last fall. Senator Ferguson, speaking of the competition our farmers had to meet, from India and the Argentine Republic, declared:

You cannot enter into competition with such producers. The only thing you can do is to keep your own markets for the products of Canadian farms.

According to the Hon. Senator, the English market is no good, the foreign market is no good, the markets in the other parts of the Empire are no good, for he declares that we cannot enter into competition with the producers from the Argentine Republic and India, and that we must keep our own markets for the products of the Canadian farm, and cease striving for any extension. The Senator evidently has given up hope of our extending our export trade. He says further:

I desire for a moment to call your attention to where you must get your market. You all know you cannot sell an article to an idle man, who has no money to buy it. * * * In order to have your consumer in the position to buy your products, you must give him work.

The farmer has to do at all. First, he must give work to the person to whom he hopes to sell, and then he has the privilege of selling to him if he can. He says:

Give him work by getting him to make exactly what you want at your own doors.

But not at your own price by any means. The manufacturer who employs him and gives him work at your door is permitted by the tariff to charge just what he likes, up to the limit fixed by the tariff for the product of his labour; but the farmer must sell to him at the prices that are fixed in the open markets of the world.

The same Senator had declared a moment before :

Now, I want to show you, no Government can keep your prices up.

No Government can keep prices up for the farmer, but this Government has been very successful in keeping up prices for the manufacturers. He continued :

I desire to show you that we have the market that I have been speaking of. We have it in the manufacturing industries of this country. According to the census of 1891, the number of industrial establishments in this country was 75,741, the hands employed numbered 370,104, the wages paid was $100,656,502. Now, that $100,000,000 paid finds its way where? To the butcher shops, and every kind of establishment, and into the pockets of the farmers of this country.

Senator Ferguson did not tell his listeners that the wage sheet had been stuffed by the addition of industries that were not reckoned when the census was taken in the preceding decade. He did not tell them that in spite of all the stuffing, the wage sheet of the manufacturers of this country had increased only $40,000,000 since the dawn of protection.

It has increased $40,000,000 since that time, and I have not the slightest doubt, and I do not think that any self-respecting Canadian would doubt, but that the manufacturers of this country would have increased, and largely increased, had they never had protection at all; perhaps not the forty millions, but a large part of that amount. To get our consumer into a position to buy our farm products we have been forced to give him work, but we have enacted a law that has empowered the manufacturer giving him that work to charge so much more for the product of his labour than it is fairly worth, so as to do away entirely with the benefit that the spending of his wages might otherwise have been to us. The wage sheet has increased under protection, but the more it increased the lower fell the price the farmer received for his products.

Now, in substantiation of the truth of what I have said I will give the House an object lesson, one that is easily understood, an object lesson on sugar. Sugar enjoys a protection of 64 cents per 100 pounds. Do the refiners take advantage of this, and increase the price of sugar under cover of this protection? The low price that has prevailed during the past year has blinded the eyes of the people to the fact that, although the price was low, vast sums of money were being wrongfully taken from them in an overcharge. Protection, it was said, was simply to enable the manufacturers to start up; and, as soon as they got their machinery in running order and their capital secured, they would be able to sell as cheaply as the manufacturers in any foreign country. It was said that sugar could be refined here as cheaply as in any other country in the world, and I cannot see why it is not so refined. The Canadian refiner and the English refiner pay the same price for their raw material; it can be delivered in ships at the port of Montreal and at the port of London at the same rates. So that refiners here get their raw material at practically the same price as the refiners in London; but what is the difference in price to the consumer?

I had the curiosity to look through the files of the London "Times" and the Montreal "Gazette" to obtain the prices for the last thirteen months, and I have made the following table which shows the average prices of granulated sugar at those two places every fortnight during that time:--

Difference in price per 100 lbs. in favour of London.....		0 78

The average price during those thirteen months was $3.18 in London and $3.96 in Montreal, a difference in favour of London of 78 cents per 100 pounds. So we find, although sugar can be refined in Montreal as cheaply as in London or anywhere else in the world, that the refiners take care to sell at the highest price which the tariff will permit them to extort.

On the 300,000,000 pounds consumed by our people, this difference of 78 cents per 100 pounds in price means that they paid $2,340,000 more last year than was charged in England for the same quantity. While they were paying this excessive tax or tribute to the refiners, our public treasury received only $23,000 in the form of duty collected on refined sugars. If we removed the duty, the English refiners could lay down sugar in Montreal, freight paid, for 60 cents per 100 pounds less than the average selling price there throughout the year. This would effect a saving on the 300,000,000 pounds of $1,800,000 a year.

But Senator Ferguson says: "In order to have your consumer in a position to buy your products, you must give him work." The men employed by the refiners are the consumers of products. The wage sheet of the refiner is the measure of the benefit their employees may be to the food producers of this country. Now, the refiners employ 1,927 men altogether, and pay them $709,811 a year in wages. This $709,811 finds its way, according to Senator Ferguson, "to the butcher shop and every kind of establishment, and into the pockets of the farmers of this country," and in return the same butchers and farmers pay 2½ times that amount more for their sugar than they would have to pay if there were no sugar at all refined in the country.

But we are told that without protection the refiners would have to be shut down. I would be sorry if they were; but, as the consumers are forced to pay $2.50 to the refiners in unearned profits for every dollar which the refiners pay in wages to their men, I may be pardoned if I even say, let the refineries go. If they shut down, many of the hands now employed would be required to handle the imported article. But would they shut down? As I have said, raw sugar can be laid down in Canada at the same price as in England. The half cent per pound of duty which is now on raw sugar would be also on refined. Then, the freight between London and Montreal would itself be a very large protection and ought to be sufficient to maintain this industry, even though the refiners have to pay higher wages than are paid in England. Whether they do or not I do not know. I do not think they do. But at the lowest rate the freight charges would amount to over half a million dollars a year on our present consumption, equal to over 75 per cent of the total amount of wages paid to the employees engaged in this industry, which is surely an ample protection for even the most timid refiner.

Mr. SPROULE. Do you take that into account in your calculation of the value of sugar in Montreal as compared with London—the increased freight rates on the raw sugar?

Mr. DAWSON. I have said they are the same. What does my hon. friend say they are?

Mr. SPROULE. You have been giving it yourself, and it must be considerable.

Mr. DAWSON. I hope the hon. gentleman will profit by the information I am giving him. Now, this object lesson illustrates the position of the protected manufacturers generally. In every case they take for their products all that the law will allow, and if competition threatens they simply combine and kill competition. We know now, after several days' debate, that it is the intention of the Government to stick to protection; and I must say that they display a large amount of worldly wisdom in so doing though little regard for the welfare of the country. They are wise politicians in sticking to the policy which has carried them through so far. They are wise in keeping up the class legislation which has served them so well. By their class legislation they have made rich men richer, but they have robbed the poor. They have kept themselves in power by the lavish use of boodle contributed by the men whom they have helped, for the reptile fund is the largest element in bringing about their success at the polls, as is well known to them and to us, and to the people of this country, and, I am sorry to say, to those in the beloved motherland also. But I think that the day has gone when they will again succeed in bribing the people with their own money. The people know that the money which the protected manufacturers contribute to the election fund of the party in power is money which has been taken wrongfully from them, under cover of special legislation, enacted in behalf of those interests. They know that it is their money which has been paid into the fund to be spent in their own undoing.

And I think the day is gone by when they will be so easily deceived as to consent again to return to power the men who have ruined the great mass of the people of this country and built up only a small and a favoured class.

Before sitting down I wish to congratulate the Government on having at last accepted the advice of their opponents in this House. Year after year, members of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition have been pointing out to that Government how savings could be effected. They were laughed at for their pains. Game was made of the proposition of hon. gentlemen on this side by the subsidized press of

hon. gentlemen opposite. But this year, when the Minister of Finance brought down his Estimates, we found he had at last taken the advice of the Opposition and reduced his Estimates by some $1,682,000. Had he done so before, when the possibility of doing it was pointed out, time and time again, by hon. gentlemen around me, immense savings would have been effected of the people's money. Tens of millions would have been saved in the years that are passed.

But there is one scheme about which he has not very clearly declared himself, and that is the Hudson Bay Railway. We know that there was an Order in Council passed granting $2,500,000 to this road, but whether the Government will summon up courage enough to ask Parliament to ratify that Order in Council or not, is unknown to us. Surely, considering the finances of the country, considering the desperate condition in which the Minister of Finance knows them to be this Order in Council was passed in another of his many moments of weakness. I hope he has thought better of it, and that the Government will not ask this House to ratify that order. The time is not ripe, we do not know enough about the navigability of the frozen straits of Hudson. All we do know is contained in a little blue-book in our hand—the report of Lieutenant Gordon; and this report is pleasant reading in the sultry days of July and August. We read of icebergs and fields of ice in every month of the year throughout those straits.

We do not know as a matter of fact, whether they are navigable or not; and until that is settled, it is too soon for Parliament to vote one dollar of money in aid of any such enterprise. There is another thing—the hon. gentleman should consider the temptations that may be lurking under that subsidy. He must not forget that there are milkmaids in his Cabinet. Expert, confessedly expert in the art of extracting, by gentle pressure, a golden stream from railway subsidies. The milking of bonuses is an accomplishment of which the Postmaster General is passing proud.

Do not put temptations in his way. $2,500,000—fancy what golden vistas that opens up before his enraptured gaze. What possibilities it suggests, just on the eve of an election. $2,500,000—would 10 per cent be too much to expect as the result of his expert manipulation? That would be a round quarter million dollars in hand, just on the eve of an election. What a magnificent election fund that would make. And now that his old treasurer from Quebec West is safe in his seat in this House, he would be here to guard the money well and pay it out to the order of the Postmaster General to help him and his friends in their election, to give them the sinews of war in their day of need, their golden armour when they face the foe.

I hope the Minister of Finance will think better of it and not press this vote of $2,500,000 through this House. Let hon. gentlemen opposite for once face the Liberals in open battle and fair fight, and just so sure as the sun will rise on the day after the next elections, just so sure will it rise on our noble and gifted leader, crowned with victory, and just so sure will dawn better days for this country of ours.

QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY—ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FOSTER moved:

That when the House adjourns on Wednesday, it do stand adjourned until the following Tuesday, at three o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

CHARLES GUY, OF PETERBORO'.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Does Charles Guy, of Peterboro', receive a pension? if so, what for and how much? When was it granted? What service was he engaged in? What is his occupation, and is he now in good health?

Mr. DICKEY. Charles Guy, of Peterboro' receives a pension because he became insane in consequence of fatigue and hardship endured during the campaign of 1885 in the North-west Territories. The pension is 25 cents per diem. The pension was granted by Order in Council of 21st January, 1887. He did service with his battalion during the campaign. His occupation was that of a watchmaker at the time his name was put on the pension list. He has been paid the above-mentioned pension until now, on the receipt by the Department of Militia and Defence of the required medical certificate showing that he still suffers from the disease in question, and therefore is reported not in good health.

MR. WEIR, OF KEENE.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Does Mr. Weir, of Keene, receive a pension? If so, how much and when granted? Was he a volunteer? If so, to what battalion did he belong? Was he in the North-west rebellion? What engagements was he in? Was he wounded in battle or did he incur disease in the service? Why was he pensioned? What is his occupation, and is he now in good health?

Mr. DICKEY. Mr. Weir, of Keene, receives a pension. The pension is 55 cents per diem, and was granted by Order in Council of 21st January, 1887. He was a volunteer, and belonged to the Midland Battalion. He served in the North-west rebellion, but he was not in any engagement. He was not wounded in battle. He incurred a neuralgia of the left side and chest in his military service. He was pensioned on account of such disease. His occupation was that of a carpenter. He has been paid the above-mentioned pension until now, on the receipt by the Department of Militia and Defence of the required medical certificates showing that he still suffers from the disease in question.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would ask my hon. friend opposite if he sees any clearer light with reference to bringing the present debate to a close?

Mr. LAURIER. I see that light is constantly being shed upon the subject, but I do not know what is to come. I cannot at present see any prospect of having a division this evening or to-morrow.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. SPROULE. After the lengthy debate which has taken place upon the Budget speech delivered by the Minister of Finance some time ago, and the amount of light which has been brought to bear upon the condition of the country, and the results of the policy of the present Government, I do not propose to take up a great deal of time in discussing the question further. I may at the outset with propriety congratulate the Minister of Finance on the very clear and able financial statement which he made regarding the condition of the country, both as to the past and the future. It was one that every citizen of Canada might well feel proud of, it was one so easily understood that there are none so dull that they could not comprehend it readily. The financial condition of the country since the National Policy was introduced in 1879, was briefly traced up to the present time, and it was shown in the most conclusive manner. I think, that the condition of the country was such as to command both the respect of the people of this country and the respect of the supporters of the Government. Whether we view the condition of the country from the imports and exports, or from the savings of the people deposited in the Post Office and other savings banks, or from the increased life insurance in the country, the increased trade that has been done, or from the industrial pursuits of the people, from whatever standpoint the country is viewed, I think it must be admitted that it has been making fair progress since 1879, that the people have been tolerably well employed, and that the financial condition of the country is such as ought to commend itself to the judgment of the people in general. If we take the increased circulation in the banks and compare it with 1878, and observe that in 1878 the amount was about $65,000,000, and in 1895, $174,900,000, that fact tells the tale that there is a larger trade being done, which necessarily requires a larger circulation of money to carry it on. If we look at the development of the country as found in the additional miles of railway constructed, that affords evidence that the Dominion is rapidly prospering. The mileage in 1878 was 5,000 as compared with 15,000 in 1894, and this is evidence of the fact that Canada has now three times the railway mileage it possessed formerly, and suggests that it must be doing three times as much trade. The earnings in 1878 were $6,000,000, whereas we find that to-day they amounted to $14,000,000 during last year, and this also indicates development. If we take the tons of railway freight carried in 1878, represented by 8,000,000, and compare it with the tons carried in 1894, represented by 20,000,000, that fact tells a very important story. If we take the tons of freight carried by vessels in 1878, represented by 3,000,000 tons, as compared with 5,000,000 tons in 1894, this also indicates development. Taking the total tonnage of freight, vessel and railway, we find it aggregated in 1878, 11,000,000 tons, and last year, 26,000,000 tons. If hon. gentlemen will take any of these items they will find that it affords unmistakable evidence of the development going on in the country. And that development is going on under the fostering care of a protective policy or the National Policy, which is so strongly condemned by hon. gentlemen opposite. That development has taken place under the management of the Conservative party, which has been controlling the destinies of this country for the last sixteen or seventeen years. And people cannot shut their eyes to these facts which present unmistakable evidence that Canada has been fairly prosperous during the last sixteen years. Then if we make a comparison between our country and other countries it will be found to be in favour of our own. If we compare our country with the United States, and look back a few years, only two years, we find that in the adjoining republic during the period of five months no less than 565 banks and banking institutions utterly collapsed, that there was stagnation in trade and a condition of the people unparalleled in their history from the earliest period up to the present time. If we take our own country, lying alongside the republic, we will find that our banks are in a stable condition, that the pursuits of our people are carried on peacefully and satisfactorily and that, comparatively speaking, there is peace and plenty in the land. We find our banking institutions are doing well, our commercial interests are fairly prosperous, the number of traders breaking down in business from year to year has been much less in proportion to the population since the National Policy was introduced, and on every one of these lines we must admit the National Policy has been a success. If we look to the employment of our people and compare their condition with that of the Americans we find Canadians are much better employed, and if we compare their condition with that of the working classes in the mother country, that country to which hon. gentlemen opposite are always directing attention and with which they desire to make comparison as being a country having a fiscal policy admirably suited to Canada's needs to-day, we must remember that a few days ago it was reported that over 4,000,000 people there were out of employment, while at the same time our industrial pursuits are being vigorously carried on and are increasing from year to year and our people are fairly well employed. These are some of the evidences that show the condition of the country under the management of the Conservative party, which has been in control for the last sixteen years. But when hon. gentlemen opposite are disposed to criticise the policy inaugurated in 1878, which has been perfected from time to time since then up to the present and which is carried out to-day, we believe, in the interest of the country as it was in 1879, we naturally ask, what are they offering the country instead of the National Policy, provided they were returned to power. We can only answer that question by referring to the resolutions which they have from time to time offered to this House as embodying the policy by which they would be guided in the event of being returned to power. I take the various resolutions embodying that policy, and in connection with them there is one significant fact which will occur to any one perusing them, namely, that while hon. gentlemen come to this House and crystallize their policy in a few words, which they call a resolution, and which they present to the House as showing what they would do if returned to power, when they go out into the country and elaborate and explain their policy, telling the people what they would do if returned to power, there is a marked difference between the resolutions and the policy, the resolutions meaning one thing and the explanations of the policy meaning something entirely different. I will read to the House some of the resolutions submitted by hon. gentlemen opposite since 1879. In that year, when the National Policy was introduced, Mr. Mackenzie moved an amendment as follows:—

That the said resolution be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved, That, while this House is prepared to make ample provision for the requirements of the public service, and the maintenance of the public credit, it regards the scheme now under consideration as calculated to distribute unequally, and therefore unjustly, the burdens of taxation; to divert capital from its natural and most profitable employment; to benefit special classes at the expense of the whole community; tends towards rendering futile the costly and persistent efforts of the country to secure a share of the immense and growing carrying trade of this continent; and to create an antagonism between the commercial policy of the Empire and that of Canada that might lead to consequences deeply to be deplored.

What was the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite in 1888? It is embodied in this resolution, moved by the hon. member for South Oxford:

That this House views with alarm the extremely rapid increase of the debt and taxation of the Dominion, especially in view of the fact that there has been contemporaneously a very great reduction in the debt and amount required for necessary taxation by the United States; and that this House is of opinion that any considerable addition to the debt or taxation of the people of Canada will work very great hardship to the great bulk of the population, and will tend powerfully to place them in a position of great disadvantage as regards the people of the United States, besides seriously prejudicing their chances of securing improved commercial relations with the people of that country.

The hon. member for South Oxford, in the same session, moved the following amendment:—

That it is highly desirable that the largest possible measure of commercial intercourse should obtain between the Dominion of Canada and the United States, and that it is expedient that all articles manufactured in, or the natural products of either of the said countries, should be admitted free of duty into the ports of the other.

Hon. members will observe that in 1879 hon. gentlemen opposite were afraid that the action of the Government might disturb harmonious relations between Canada and England by interfering with the trade policy of the Empire, or free trade; and in 1880 they go to the very opposite extreme—they are not afraid of destroying our harmonious relations with the Empire, but they demand unrestricted reciprocity or continental free trade between Canada and the United States, and there is not in the whole resolution a word with respect to England or how the policy might affect her interests. The one goes in favour of England, the other is the very reverse. In 1889, the Liberal party in this House moved another resolution which declared that:

In the present condition of affairs it is expedient that steps should be taken to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted trade.

We were told by the leaders of the Opposition party then that this meant trade without any restriction whatever. They told us that we were to have no custom-houses along the frontier, and no barriers between the two countries. Their cry was, that there was to be perfect freedom of trade between the United States and Canada. They had no regard or care for the mother country then. In 1890 we had another resolution from the Liberal party in this House which proposed:

To abolish or reduce the taxes now imposed upon the articles of prime necessity to farmers, miners, fishermen, and other producers of the country.

Then in 1891, the Liberals set forth their platform by resolution in this House, as follows:—

The situation of the country requires that the Government should forthwith reduce all duties on articles of prime necessity and more particularly on those most generally consumed by artisans, miners, fishermen and farmers, and further, that the negotiations which the House has been informed are to open in Washington in October next, should be conducted on the basis of the most extended reciprocal freedom of trade between Canada and the United States, in manufactured, as well as natural products.

That resolution of the Liberal party does not say anything about a tariff for revenue purposes, nor does it say anything about free trade with England, about which the Liberals are now very solicitous. That is a straight declaration for unrestricted reciprocity. The Hon. Mr. Davies, who I see sitting before me, in 1892, moved the following resolution:—

That inasmuch as Great Britain admits the products of Canada into her ports free of duty, this House is of opinion that the present scale of duties exacted on goods mainly imported from Great Britain should be reduced.

The hon. gentleman would throw off the duties entirely upon goods coming in from the United States, but he would only reduce the duties a little on goods coming from England. That policy certainly must have been very consoling to the mother country, and to those loyal members of the Opposition who are now protesting to be so solicitous for the welfare of England, and for the promotion of our financial relations with her. In 1893, the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved:

That the present customs tariff should be at once thoroughly reformed in the direction of free trade, and that the amount of taxes collected be limited to the sum required to meet the necessities of the Government, efficiently and economically administered.

That was out and out free trade. Before that, their policy was commercial union, but it was feared that we might endanger our relationship with the mother country, because we had departed from the free trade lines which she followed in her relations with other countries. In 1894, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved an amendment on the lines of the resolution of the Ottawa conference, and they were all to this effect:

That the tariff should be reduced, should have eliminated from it the principle of protection, and should be imposed for revenue only; that it should be so adjusted as to make free, or bear as lightly as possible upon, the necessities of life, and to promote freer trade with the whole world, particularly with Great Britain and the United States.

Now we come down to the present amendment moved by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and let us inquire what it is. It practically declares that a tariff for revenue only with every vestige of protection taken out of it. That is the Liberal policy to-day. Now, let us go back to last winter, when it was thought we were going to have an election, and when hon. gentlemen opposite were travelling around the country, endeavouring to enlighten the people as to what their policy was, and what they were prepared to carry out if they were returned to power. Let us see what their leader told the people then. I have here a speech made by the leader of the Opposition at Toronto, and as it is one of his latest addresses to the electors, I think it may fairly be taken as embodying his views. He first talked about various questions connected with the policy of the present Government, and, after condemning them in no unstinted terms, he said :

But before I sit down there is another question upon which I wish to say one word or two. I have told you the policy of the Liberal party. We want a party which will collect the greatest amount of revenue with the minimum of taxation. Now, what is the method in which this policy will be carried out? I am not a revolutionist. I am a Reformer of the English school. I know it is impossible to make changes without time. But we have the great precedent of Sir Robert Peel, who carried the change from protection to free trade, and did it by a gradual process. This is the programme which we intend to follow. This is the precedent. There never was a time in my career when I did not proclaim myself a disciple of Fox, of Peel, a disciple of John Bright, and a disciple of William Ewart Gladstone. (Cheers.)

The Hon. Mr. Laurier in those remarks said: I am not a revolutionist. Some people might have thought he was from what he said previously. He told the people: We are going from protection to free trade; that is the programme we intend to follow; that is the precedent we will be guided by in the event of the electorate of Canada returning us to power. It is strange, Mr. Speaker, that after this declaration, the Liberal party should come to this House to-day, and, in their declaration of principles, say scarcely anything about free trade, but only refer to a revenue tariff. There is another feature about the policy of the Liberal party to which it is as well to draw the attention of the people. They tell the people that while it is intended to collect a revenue they will have a tariff which must be divested from every incident of protection, or, in other words, if the requirements of the country should demand protection, and if the needs of the country should require protection, the Liberals declare that they will have no protection, because their principles are the very reverse. They tell the people of this country that they will not give the country protection, though they could do it, for their policy is against protection, and if they are returned to power they say they will sweep away every vestige of it. Here, then, we have a great difference between the platform of the Liberal party, as laid down in the House and the platform which they have preached to the people in the country. At Toronto, the leader of the Opposition declared for a free trade platform, but here they announce themselves in favour of a revenue tariff, and they desire to catch the votes of the people upon one or the other issues. If these gentlemen of the Opposition go to one section of the country, and if it is said to them: Oh, your policy is free trade; then they turn up their records of the House of Commons and they answer: Oh, our policy is embodied in that resolution, and that says that we shall have a tariff for revenue only. If, in another part of the country it is said to them: You are not in favour of free trade; then they can turn to the speech made by the leader of the Opposition in Toronto, and say: There is our motto, Mr. Laurier told them that his precedent was established by Fox, and Peel, and Gladstone; he was in favour of the free trade of England, and the Liberals were bound to have a tariff in Canada the same as they have it in the old country. The resolution of the Liberal party here declares for a tariff for revenue only, but the speeches of their leaders pronounce for free trade as they have it in England. Mr. Speaker, it is quite plain that the Liberal party of Canada is endeavouring to ride two hobby horses, either one of which they are willing to accept if it would only ensure their getting to the treasury benches. Their position reminds me of the story of the Wisconsin boy and the missionary. In the early history of that state, a Wisconsin missionary, one of the pioneers of the country, and a very good man, was travelling around from place to place, and he carried his worldly effects with him on a very poor specimen of a horse. He met a man on the road, and he asked: Which way he should turn to take the road to Bloomington, but he afterwards forgot whether the man told him to turn to the left or to the right. There was a boy standing at the corner, the usual specimen of a youth out there, with one suspender and a straw hat, but he had an eye for a good horse, and he paid great attention to the animal which the missionary was riding. He thought it was about the ugliest nag he had ever seen, and so when the preacher rode to the corner, he inquired of the boy, which way he should now turn to reach Bloomington. The boy was watching the horse, and did not answer. Then the missionary called out again: Are you deaf, boy, which way now to Bloomington? The boy said: Who are you, and where are you going? And the missionary replied: "I am a follower of the Lord." Well, the boy retorted, I do not think it matters much which way you take, for you'll never overtake Him on that horse. So it is with the Liberal party. I do not think it matters which of these hobby horses they will ride, because the people of this country are too intelligent, and they will never overtake the electors on that horse. They will never get into power by riding on either or any of their hobby horses, and, after the electorate poll their votes next election, I have not the slightest doubt that they will just be as far from power as they have ever been for the last fifteen years. Now let me turn my attention for a few moments to some of the criticisms directed against the National Policy by hon. gentlemen opposite. I take first the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton): what does he say? He says: "I deny in toto that the farmer needs protection or that the farmer got protection." The farmer does not think so; he has said, on several successive occasions, by his vote and his voice, that he does not think so. Then, the hon. gentleman said: "The free admission of grain in 1878 was not detrimental to the interests of the farmer; it did not in the slightest degree interfere with the farmer." Well, he voted differently. The hon. gentleman said further: "The importation of Indian corn was a distinct advantage to the farmers of Canada." Then, we had the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Semple), who, instead of advocating the policy laid down by his leader, free trade as they have it in England, said: "We can never have free trade as they have it in England, because our conditions are different." I take it, therefore, that the hon. gentleman must come into our ranks, because if his party are advocating free trade as they have it in England, he cannot be one of them. Then, I take the hon. member for Addington (Mr. Dawson), who spoke last night. He told us that everything was made dearer in Canada by the National Policy, and that the danger of the situation to-day is that we are drifting into boodling and corruption, and that we want a pure and economical Administration. I wondered at the time if the hon. gentleman had considered what was the result of the searchlight of the courts being thrown upon hon. gentlemen opposite after the last general elections. He said: "We may expect, if that Order in Council relative to the Hudson Bay Railway is carried out, that the Government may get 10 per cent of the money for election purposes;" and, therefore, he said, speaking to the country, "You want an economical Administration and one that will not indulge in boodling, but that will honestly and faithfully attend to its duties." Now, when the searchlight of the courts was thrown upon the hon. gentleman's friends after the last elections, was it found that there was no boodling among them, and that they were pure? I have here a list of the men who were unseated; and, as there are fewer representatives of the Opposition in this House than on the Government side, if the proportion on both sides were the same, the number ought to be larger on the Government side. But what do we find? We find that the courts decided that there were evidences of corruption sufficient to unseat the Reform members for the following constituencies: Lincoln, East Bruce, Soulanges, Peel, Queen's, N.S., Lennox, North Victoria, Digby, N.S., King's, N.S., Ontario South, Huron West, Vaudreuil, East Simcoe, London, South Perth, Monck, Montmorency, Northumberland West, Carleton, N.B., Prescott, Welland, North Perth, L'Assomption, Pontiac and Chicoutimi. Twenty-five of those men who were so pure, went down when the searchlight of the courts was thrown upon them.

Mr. WALLACE. What was the politics of those twenty-five men?

Mr. SPROULE. They were all on the Reform side, and they were the men who the hon. member for Addington says should be put in charge of the affairs of this country, because they are so pure and honest and free from boodling. The courts said they were not, and unseated them because of corruption, and what did the electors say when they went back for re-election? The electorate said: "We believe you are not pure; we believe you are dishonest," because they left at home the Reform candidates in the following constituencies: East Bruce, Soulanges, Lennox, North Victoria, South Ontario, West Huron, Vaudreuil, East Simcoe, London, South Perth, Monck, Montmorency, Northumberland West, L'Assomption, Pontiac and Chicoutimi. To sixteen of those twenty-five men, the electorate of the country, when asked their opinion, said: "We believe you are not as pure as you ought to be," and left them at home, and put Conservatives in their places. Now, how many Conservatives were unseated by the courts? There were thirteen in all, although if they had been unseated in the same proportion as the members of the Reform party, there would have been more than twice the number. And when those Conservative candidates who were unseated went back to the people, what was the result? They were re-elected for the following constituencies: Glengarry, Richmond, N.S., Cumberland, N.S., Halton, Halifax (both members), Prince Edward, East Middlesex, Victoria, East Elgin, Montcalm, Brome and Soulanges. Only one out of the whole number failed to be returned.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask a question? Do I understand his argument to be that those respectable Conservative gentlemen who were unseated were impure and dishonest?

Mr. SPROULE. I am not talking about Conservative members. I am talking about the argument of the hon. gentleman who spoke last night. He said: "If the country wants purity and no boodling, return the Reform party to power." Where did the courts leave them after the last elections? They left them out. Where did the people leave them when they returned for re-election? They left them at home. Both the courts and the people said they had no confidence in their professions of purity and honesty. But the hon. gentleman said, "The Government have an Order in Council before this House to subsidize a railway to Hudson Bay, and what does it mean? It may mean that they are going to get out of that subsidy money to run the elections. "If they get 10 per cent of the subsidy," he asked, "what will that amount to?" But he said, "Return the Reform party to power, and we will do away with this boodling and corruption, and these big steals from the country." I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he remembers what took place in the province of Quebec before the last general election, in connection with the Baie des Chaleurs railway scheme? And has he any remembrance of what was revealed when the purists who handled the money in that transaction were brought before the courts? Has he any remembrance that $15,000 of that money was taken to retire three notes made by E. Pacaud and endorsed by Mercier, the two Langeliers and Senator Pelletier, one of these being a gentleman who occupies a seat in this House? Has he any remembrance that $8,000 was taken to retire two notes made by E. Pacaud and endorsed by Mercier, C. Langelier, Pelletier, and the honourable and immaculate Tarte? Has he any remembrance that $6,788 was taken for payments made to Mercier, or that $9,391 was taken for "ditto" to C. Langelier? Has he any remembrance that $1,582 was taken for payments to members of the legislature who were not members of the Cabinet? Has he any remembrance of the $2,000 that were used to take up Mr. Tarte's note, which was endorsed by the Hon. Mr. Langelier? Has he any remembrance of the $27,900 that went to Pacaud for personal expenses? But, of course, this is all purity; no corruption in all this. Has he any recollection of the $24,456 that was passed over into Mr. Pacaud's hands? or the $25,000 that went to Mr. Geoffrion? Or the $24,500 that went to the credit of Mr. Pacaud in connection with another deal? No, he has not any recollection of these, and, of course, everything is going to be pure if the people will only return them to power. In connection with that election, there is a great deal to come out. The hon. gentleman said that members supporting the Government talked a great deal about their loyalty, and ran their last election on loyalty and attributed to the Opposition disloyal motives. I have here an extract taken from a Buffalo paper which discloses some information, but which shows, to my mind, that there is a great deal more behind which the Canadian people ought to know. The people ought to know where hon. gentlemen opposite got their money, for although they got some from the Baie des Chaleurs Railway and other schemes, we believe and are credibly informed that they got a large portion from the United States. How did they get it? Because they were allied to men over there whose sole aim and object was the annexation of Canada, and who, in order to accomplish that, were prepared to dive deep into their own pockets and pay out money freely to the Canadian Reform party. Let me read this despatch from Washington to a Buffalo paper, dated 1st May, 1895:

Washington, D.C., May 1.—Special to the Buffalo "Commercial":—Behind the late resolution of the New York Legislature in favour of the annexation of Canada, was this interesting story, the material facts of which are as follows:—In the fall of 1893 a French Liberal member of the Canadian Parliament, accredited by ex-Premier Mercier of Quebec, and accompanied by a delegation of other Canadian politicians, came to New York to see if a campaign fund could not be raised there to put the question of annexation, as they said, fairly before the Canadian rural constituencies. The business embarrassments of Mr. Ras Wiman, who had heretofore financed the annexation propaganda—

What does that mean?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is a shame that this should be lost, and I would advise the hon. gentleman to wait until the representatives of the Conservative press come back to their places in the gallery.

Mr. SPROULE. We will have a sufficient record to supply the hon. gentleman and the press and the country, whether the members of the Conservative press are here or not:

—the business embarrassments of Mr. Ras Wiman, who had heretofore financed the annexationist propaganda, was the assigned reason for seeking broader and more direct relations with American friends of Canadian annexation. The delegation was successful in enlisting the support of Messrs. Charles A. Dana and Andrew Carnegie, who brought in so many other adherents that, as the result of a series of conferences, the delegation went home with the assurance that $50,000 should be immediately supplied to put the movement on its feet, and afterwards as much more as might be needed to keep it in successful operation. After the departure of the French Liberal and his compatriots, Mr. Carnegie, who had agreed to look after the financial end of the international alliance, concluded he would make some independent and confidential inquiries in Canada to ascertain if Messrs. Mercier and company might be trusted with the disbursement of the annexation fund, and whether their political influence was sufficient to put the question of annexation effectively before the Canadian electorate. He was informed in reply that Hon. Wilfred Laurier, the leader of the Liberal party, who was the only politician who could give the question a practical standing, positively refused to openly adopt annexation as a part of the Liberal platform.—

He would not openly adopt it. What are we to assume from that? Evidently we must assume that he would scarcely adopt it. Yet these hon. gentlemen talk loyalty, and boasted of the great loyalty on that side of the House:

—positively refused to openly adopt annexation as a part of the Liberal platform, though favourable to closer and friendlier relations with the United States, and to a continental policy in all matters short of actual political union.

He would go the whole length; he would do away with the whole tariff to satisfy the American people, if they would only furnish the financial assistance requisite to enable his party to carry out that policy :

Mr. Carnegie and his friends were not satisfied with this limited programme, they were advised to drop the whole matter, as any fund sent to the guerilla wing of the Liberal party would be simply wasted and misapplied. Messrs. Carnegie and Dana then drew out of the movement. Their friends followed suit, and the international alliance came to an end.

What is the case ? They are without funds to-day. I only give this as an evidence to show that the very men who were talking about the Government providing funds to run an election were supplied with funds by Mr. Wiman—undoubtedly the evidence is conclusive—for the last campaign, and they are in hopes of being supplied with funds for the next campaign by the annexationists on the other side, who are moving resolutions and showing their willingness to raise the funds, if the money be only put into the hands of reliable parties. They have put at the disposal of hon. gentlemen opposite $50,000, and are prepared to go on and raise sufficient means to enable them to carry on the party warfare.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman tells us there are $50,000 deposited. I want to know where it is.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds and Grenville). He did not say deposited.

Mr. SPROULE. I said that the information disclosed in this correspondence from Washington to a Buffalo paper is that $50,000 was raised and at the disposal of hon. gentlemen opposite, and that the annexationists on the other side would raise much more if hon. gentlemen opposite could only prove their bona fides, and that the money would be put into the hands of responsible parties who would use it in the interests of annexation. I did not say deposited. Then we had a speech from the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac), and I was very much amused at the line of criticism that hon. gentleman indulged in. As I looked at that hon. gentleman and remembered the man whose place he has come to fill, the exclamation of the poet was recalled to my mind : " Shades of the mighty dead, what calamities befall a nation ! " Think of the great man, the noble character who preceded him, and whose untimely death in the house of his Sovereign, at the very moment when he was receiving the highest tribute which could be paid to a colonial statesman for his integrity to the Empire, think of his good work and his great ability, and of his untimely end which drew forth the sympathies, not only of the Dominion, but of the united Empire—think of that great man, and how dwarfed must not his successor appear. The country has to bear not only the calamity of this great loss, but the spectacle of the vacant
